Showing gratitude for our Endlessness after a negative emotion has been a really effective way in bringing my conscience to my consciousness. The postures really give a strange, yet very new and fresh experience that can give a certain energy because they're from a new place. Also reminding myself to try to "like what it doesn't like" has been a great way to be able to accept things as they are, rather than always putting a negative spin on certain things. Overall these exercises gave great results for remembrance.

Thanks

---

by Chuck

This week's exercise pointed out a facet that's sometimes been lacking in my Work - the idea of something Higher. The 'prayer' to Endlessness, and thoughts of infinite things (unenjoyable, unlikeable, unlovable) helped make this clear, and helped me incorporate these ideas into daily work.

Regards,
Chuck

Work Program week beginning 31 December 2007

---

by Lift

End of Year Theme: Remorse of conscience; atonement; rebirth.

"When I am laid in earth, may my wrongs create no trouble in thy breast. Remember me, but forget my fate."

(Dido's Lament/Janet Baker - http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=VCXj07cNVKM)

While listening to the above aria, Sense your body and breathing while observing your emotional reaction to the above aria.

Every mid-day, Ponder: What is my fate? Is it to die a conscious or unconcious death? Is it to die like a dog or like a god?

During the week, while sensing your writing hand and observing your natural breathing:
- Make a list of as many actions from your life that you can remember, that you are ashamed of.
- Make a list of selfless actions from your life that you can remember, that you may be be proud of.

Every evening, in a three centered state of all brains balanced being perception, ask from your heart that those selfless actions may be redeemed against the selfish or shaming actions you have committed during your life, and that you pledge your heart and soul to strive toward performing more selfless actions, and less selfish actions, during the coming year.

Every morning as you awake and arise, imagine and visualize that you are emerging from an illuminated cocoon of bed-clothes as a new born being with with no pre-conceptions or beliefs of what the day ahead may bring.

---

by Judy

Dido did not believe living was worthwhile without Aeneas, her true love.

What is my true love? Am I steadily and consistently working to keep it close, to develop and grow the integration into personality, so that I may become whole and awake? Or am I so enamored by the earthly distractions that the real Work is neglected?

I had strong resistance to doing this exercise, so pondered something along the lines of;
If I do not Work, will I be lamenting like Dido did on her death bed ?
"Remember me, but ah!, forget my fate."

(I used the wonderful prayer from a recent post by John to overcome the resistance. together with the word "Mercy!")
I am deeply wishing success against resistance for everyone here.

Agape,

---

by Cassandra

While pondering the mid day question, it occurred to me that I'd rather live like a god rather than a dog, as well. What of the quality of my living. Like Judy I encountered much resistance to pledging selflessness initially but realized later that living like a dog or god is related to this striving and so many others like it. I claim to want 'freedom', 'peace' etc. but the work of doing that...well.

I appreciate the chance to see these contradictions.

Cassie

---

by Dean

While listening to the aria Dido's Lament I experienced sentiments that brought forth a sense of seeing myself in the moment and realizing my inevitable fate and also the fate of others. A certain feeling was apparent that could be described as feeling a bit emptied of illusions, and at the same time creating a certain perception that brought a feeling of possibilities with such a shattering insight. The sensation of presence was quite strong and some thoughts about remorse of conscience for past actions and efforts also arose in the face of this realization.

The pondering exercise brought me to the conclusion that my fate is to die a conscious rather than an unconscious death. To die like a dog without understanding the meaning of life or the possibilities of consciousness seems like a very depressing prospect that gives a certain amount of initiative and encouragement to make more efforts. To be able to truly accept death without regrets and with a clear conscience seemed to be something that entered my consciousness while pondering this question. The questions made me examine myself and reinforced the pursuit of my ultimate aim.

Regards

Work Program week beginning 7 January 2008

---

by Harry

When we work we should not draw attention to ourselves. This is a power walk, or a shaman's walk. It draws attention to observing your own movements. But it is key to do this exercise so that it is not drawing attention to yourself.

While walking curve your fingers so that the forefinger and thumb make a "D". (If you are carrying something, just continue carrying it.) Focus your eye sight on the horizon.

While walking you will do three movements. Once with each foot. You will scrape the sole of the left foot on the ground as you step, then the right. The second movement is to finish each step by tapping the toe of the foot behind you as you finish the stride. Finally, as you move forward you will step forward as if you are stepping up a step, even though no step is there.

These actions do not have to happen on subsequent steps. In fact they are likely not going to happen on subsequent steps if you are not drawing attention to yourself.

While you are moving your arm movement is, ideally, coordinated with your leg movement. So if the left foot is moving forward, so is the right arm.

It may be necessary to take each of these components one at a time before combining them into a full exercise. Always remember yourself and remember that you are in the presence of others who aren't to notice what you are working on.

---

by Cassandra

The first thing I noticed when practicing the heel scrape and opposite toe tap was that it slowed me down considerably. It seems obvious that my pace would be slower-even slower I'm sure with the full practice. Still, I was more aware of the heaviness of my body and that I tend to walk swiftly on my exercise walks.

---

by Judy

This exercise is an ongoing wake-up call connecting some awareness with Moving Center. There were some almost comical muddles for a couple of days and I'm still only doing it at home, but it is settling into something smooth enough to try out soon at the local shopping mall.
So - first comes the lifted step, then the slight brushing of the sole as the left foot lands, then a little tap with the right big toe and this sequence is then repeated with the other foot - a bit like being on the ice in skates.

Between attempts I do some visualization practice of it.
The D is not so difficult but the arm correlations have yet to integrate properly.

The early attempts, when I tried to do the scrape before the lifted step, and ended up seeing myself as if I were wiping my feet on the outside mat, were quite amusing (and incorrect I suspect)!

Some inner movement is happening which is interesting and unexpected.
Thanks for sharing this walk exercise, Harry.
Regards,

---

by Harry

It's interesting that exercises like this somehow train us; train our moving center, at least. I had to have some car work done yesterday and had two hours to wait for it to finish, so I walked over to a nearby shopping center. This kicked in quickly. The steps fell back into place as I learned them. But they still weren't automatic. I still had to think. But could do the exercise without thinking about doing it.

Think of the scraping as a single swipe gathering static electricity, Judy.

---

by Lawrick

Harry writes:

> It's interesting that exercises like this somehow train us; train our moving center, at least

In what way is our moving centre trained? In the sense that we can be conscious of it? Our movenents become less mechanical perhaps.

I have no recollection (the Congressman stated) of doing anything quite like this exercise. I would like to report some wonderous epiphany but.....

This exercise is quite consuming in terms of concentration particularly when the hands be come involved. Forgive me Harry but I can't help thinking of Monty Python's English department of funny walks.

I find it very interesting to do in a busy environment but of course it can only be done for a very short period if one is to escape being caught. It's as if I'm trying to become invisible, a Shaman exchanging energies with the world. Strange as it may sound, I'm still trying to find some flow with this exercise. One thing I've noticed, is that it's not getting any easier. But I still have a few more days to find the dog.

Lawrick

---

by Harry

You're right. It's for short periods. But perhaps short periods built on top of each other.

As to the hands and arms, perhaps begin with that. I tend to walk like that regularly as it's part of my unfocused walk.

---

by Judy

Harry wrote:

> But could do the exercise without thinking about doing it.

This hasn't happened as yet for me, but I somehow strangely know that it will. There is the beginning of it there, though I cannot explain.
If, as you suggest Harry, the Moving Center is being trained, then this has huge implications and possibilities.
If Moving Center will sometimes partly initiate the work attempts, then there is a great opportunity for the overall daily total attempts to increase - yes? I mean - it is also called "the moving brain" - correct? - so this is possible theoretically.

Thinking of the scrape as static electricity evokes a feeling of vitality/strength and is a nice addition. I can't help recalling Walt Whitman's "I sing the body electric....."
I had noticed that emotional center was brought in anyway - for example there were instant feelings of "how wonderfully we are made" and new-found respect for the intricacies of the instinctive center which we have been given.
My ideas of how to work using three centers have expanded from this exercise.
The inner shifting around of energies of some sort which I noted earlier still occurs. It is as if there is a bit of a shaking-up going on.

I'm adding "Shaman's Walk" to my favorites. It is unlike anything else I routinely do.
Best wishes, Harry,and thanks for the extra clues.

---

by Lawrick

Today i managed to use the exercise for a long period. A "good" way to continue invisibly is to use the walk while grocery shopping. The slow walk and tap is not apparent when one appears to browse for items when in fact one's gaze stays on the level of the horizon. The "lifting" step was practiced by apparently lifting one's leg for a scratch.

Synchronizing the hands with the legs is still problematic. If anything has been gained so far, it is the realization of how mechanically I walk in a normal state. As well I'm somewhat stunned that when doing this exercise my brain cannot separate the arms from the legs and tries to synchronize both. Is it not strange that when doing a "normal" walk my hands work perfectly opposite to my legs. Nothing in the way of an epiphany has occured as yet. I'm going to continue working this week and see if I can't stop stumbling over myself. Who would have thought such a seemingly simple exercise could create such problems.

Thanks Harry,
Lawrick

---

by Chuck

I found that this exercise really made me concentrate - I had trouble with the timing of the slide-tap sequence, wanting to hurry through it. Since there were several other things to remember too (the curved fingers, stepping up a step, focus eyes on the horizon), it required real focus. My moving center enjoyed the movements though - tapping the toe of the rear foot is something I do anyway occasionally. I could do the exercise pretty much blatantly around the house, since I'm always doing some ungainly movement anyway.

I found that a key thing for me when attempting the whole movement on subsequent steps was getting into a rhythm - until that happened, it was difficult and the steps didn't mesh.

Curving the fingers reminded me a little of Carlos Castaneda, which many of you also probably read a couple of decades ago:

> You have to curl your fingers gently as you walk in order to keep your attention on the trail and the surroundings.... By forcing the hands into a specific position one is capable of greater stamina and greater awareness. -Journey to Ixtlan

Regards, Chuck

---

by Judy

Chuck wrote;

> Curving the fingers reminded me a little of Carlos Castaneda

Yes, quite Don Juan-ish - a walk of the Nagual.
There is a book very recently published called "The Life and Teachings of Carlos Castenada" and it is by William Patrick Patterson, who is in the Gurdjieff work.
The reviews by the Castenada family praise it highly.

Lawrick wrote;

> As well I'm somewhat stunned that when doing this exercise my brain cannot separate the arms from the legs and tries to synchronize both.

Yes, this is interesting. At a simpler level, begin moving your right foot clockwise in a circular movement, and then try to continue whilst simultaneously moving your right hand anti-clockwise in a circular movement. Notice what happens to the right foot.
Lawrick, you'll have more success matching up opposite sides such as right foot and left hand and vice versa; different neural pathways from opposite sides of the brain.
I had fun with this bit too.

---

by Dean

The shaman's walk definitely drew attention to observing my movements and I found it quite difficult to perfect. When I did it out of the public eye I found that my movements weren't discreet enough and would have been reacted upon by someone, so I had to tone it down considerably and consider the perception of others. It felt quite strange and foreign to walk in this way, and it gave a new experience that was fresh because it wasn't the ordinary way in which I would walk. I did feel some internal considering while doing this, and sometimes wondered what someone would say or do if they noticed. Doing it for short periods and without exaggerated movements concealed the fact that I was working on my moving center, and I was able to benefit from the new impressions that I received from this exercise. It was something that built my attention and made me get out of my usual auto pilot mode.

Regards

---

by JohnS

Although I too still have awkwardness in the various steps, I find that it works much more smoothly with using Alexander techniques to carry it out. Then again, anything works more smoothly with AT. The "D" in the hand I combine with an African technique of facing the wrist down vertically and bending it slightly backwards: there is a point you find where there is a shoot of extra energy arising from the first finger, though only if the neck and shoulders are following the AT as well. If I follow this with the "D", the feeling is like closing a circuit, though the energy boost isn't there anymore, but it is energising in an awareness area. AT is always good for moving centre awareness, but I think the addition of this exercise (if I can keep remebering it) is a big step because of the detail. AT encourages you not to think, just to be aware of the right movement. Doing both at the same time is taking practice.

Work Program week beginning 14 January 2008

---

by Ian

There may be aspects of personality or essence that we may not consider as Negative Emotions, in that they are not directed at ourselves more than at others - things such as pride of accomplishment, thinking well of ourselves, considering that out intellect is superior, craving the admiration and approval of others, self-pity, feeling sorry for oneself, feeling unappreciated, depression, enjoying tastey food, indulging in esthetic experiences.

Whenever you observe yourself manifesting one of the aspects mentioned above, relax three centers, establish a Sightless Gaze, and then intone the following prayer 3 times - "It is nothing; I wish to be". Sense the sound resonating in your spinal cord and skull.

Any Prayer may be heard by the Higher Powers and a corresponding answer obtained only if uttered thrice:
Firstly, for the welfare or the peace of the souls of one's parents.
Secondly, for the welfare of one's neighbor.
And only thirdly, for oneself personally.
(G. I. Gurdjieff)

---

by Dean

Relaxing the centers and establishing a sightless gaze after observing a negative emotion has been a very regular exercise due to the fact that I've been observing these manifestations quite often. It's been put into practice a lot to say the least, sometimes I find that I try to lie, or sense myself trying to create a buffer to avoid the task. If my observing is somewhat permanent I find that I can't deceive myself so easily though. Intoning "It is nothing; I wish to be" has also been helpful, especially when sensing the spine and skull, it brings my presence back into the present moment and also seems to wipe away the negative manifestation quite well, at least momentarily. This exercise will keep me occupied for awhile, I can see that it is of great value in relation to observation, as well as relaxing and taking in energy with the sightless gaze.

Regards

---

by Lawrick

I've been ill for the past few weeks and have been unable to integate some of the programs. I have felt aspects of self pity and the "why me" feeling sorry for itself. In many cases I have been unable to reconcile these quite useless manifestations. A certain energy is required which I have had trouble creating.

I have been able to do the shaman's walk with some synchronization finally. In the mall the other day I experienced a moment of insight watching my fellow man walking around in madness. Ouch

I'll continue to do both progarams as my health improves.
Regards,
Lawrick

---

by Cassandra

There is not one of these negatives that don't regularly pop up for me. I'm caught at every turn. A 'good' deed becomes self congratulations for the ego, even when I promise not to tell anyone or myself! The exercise permits no excusses for self-righteousness (even in an election year in the U.S.). How can I get through this year without justifiably expressing some of these emotions (just kidding), but seriously what a challenge to hold this mirror up to my face.

I liked this task very much but many times forgot to intone the mantra, rather I said it silently. I didn't sense any lessening of negative emotions after invoking the prayer, it simply made me stop. After saying the prayer, the negativity was still there. Still, there was the temporary interruption. This task will be an ongoing one for me because it expresses so well why I pursue this path. 'It' really is nothing. For I want to experience Being. Whatever that is. My hope is that this exercise represents one of the many ways of clearing out for the higher to come in and inform.

Thanks, Ian. I hope you feel better soon, Fred.

Cassandra

---

by Ian

Dear All,

Please keep in mind that we are all weak, and not always able to complete the tasks fully as described. This is not a failure on our part - it is an opportunity to learn about ourtselves. Keep up the good work.

Work Program week beginning 21 January 2008

---

by Judy

Exercise:

The following is a mantram which is used to aid Presence and to improve state. It is to be slowly intoned on waking, before retiring and several times during the day.

“I” represents the relationship between a man and all higher levels of being, up to and including God.
“Am” represents your amness, your existence as a being, unconsciously living on this earth.
“Now” is the actual moment which is between memories of the past and anticipations of the future.. It is the crossing-over point between past and future; thus it avoids space and time.

I am now
Now I am
Am I now
I now am

Collect yourself with the breath: Inhale, feel the life-giving air.
Say “I” as you mentally connect with higher forces.
Exhale slowly, then say “am”. Sense or imagine a reverberation in the chest here.
As you recover from the breath, say “now”.

The attitude is to be serious and sincere – prayerful if you wish. You may choose to add some basic Work attempts of self-sensing, self-observing and self-remembering after the intonations.

Pondering:

I have heard it said that objectivity is what we are essentially, and that subjectivity is how we mostly are right now (personality). Yet to even think about objectivity implies that we are not one hundred percent subjective. We have to dig into the objective field to uncover what is there, to allow it to shine through and express itself in the world.

Ponder the connections and relationships between the following two concepts:
1.essence and personality
and
2.objectivity and subjectivity.

When we do the exercise above, could we be attempting in an applied practical way, integration of the two, in the actual moment? Is there a connection between this blending and the increased awareness?

Remember to sense the body and feel the emotions whilst pondering.

---

by Lawrick

Judy,

Does one follow the same breathing pattern with the other repetions such as Now I Am or do we follow the same pattern as I Am Now?

regards,
Lawrick

---

by Judy

Hi Lawrick,
I collect using the breathing and meaning for the "I am now" first line only. The breathing with meaning helps evoke the state of "I am now" and the variations sometimes keep presence alive a little longer.

Best wishes,

---

by Dean

The I, Am, Now exercise gave a number of sensations that were quite profound and also fresh and new. While inhaling, saying I, and mentally connecting with higher forces I felt an uplifting sensation, as well as the sensation of my head and being in the present moment. On the exhale I felt a deep sense of being in my chest and solar plexus, a feeling of my body and just the sensation of being, I'm not sure how else to describe it. Recovering from the breath and saying now created a state of presence, where I usually saw myself looking into my present environment, and it sometimes created almost a realization of myself in time, something of an existential experience.

> Ponder the connections and relationships between the following two concepts:
> 1.essence and personality
> and
> 2.objectivity and subjectivity.

While pondering these concepts I felt that essence seems to be ruled by laws of objectivity, while personality seems to be ruled by laws of subjectivity. In this sense I'm speaking of essence which has been formed through conscious efforts and has become developed, and when speaking of personality I'm seaking of false personality that is subjective and has been formed through subjective education. One could say that essence obeys the laws of God while false personality obeys the laws of man, one is a function of conscience while the other is a function of morality. Laws that essence obeys and understands are objective laws that are applied to the self, the true self, while laws that personality obeys and understands are laws based on subjective associations and prejudices. These are based on subjective things in the first place, likes and dislikes and stereotypes, and basically seeing things either as positive or negative depending on your own personal viewpoint. Essence on the other hand, if it were developed would see the truth, things in themselves detached from associations and words. It may see positive and negative, but based on if something is strong or weak, or healthy or unhealthy, and just based on a universal understanding of what is true and what is false, and what is useful and what is destructive. Personality doesn't see the truth, and its truth is unflexible and formatory, as well as being purely subjective. Essence can see things from different perspectives and its knowledge is based on observation rather than from previously percieved impressions. It must be noted however that personality is needed for the growth of essence, but this is true personality that is based on objective knowledge which is then applied to being.

Great food for thought, there's a lot that can be said on this subject

Regards

---

by Dean

> When we do the exercise above, could we be attempting in an applied practical way, integration of the two, in the actual moment? Is there a connection between this blending and the increased awareness?

I felt this exercise did promote the feeling of essence becoming integrated with the objective impression of being indebted to higher powers. The feeling of presence while being aware of something higher seems like a very effective exercise. It seems like it would give a certain amount of force to essence and at the same time would put things into perspective and give an insight into ones purpose and ones aim, along with other highly objective philosophical contemplations.

Regards

---

by Lawrick

Hey all,

This week's pondering is very large indeed.. And it is difficult precisely because while I have a lifetime of subjective and personal experiences, Essence and objectivity have not been adequately defined for my use as yet. Furthermore, Essence seems to run like a vein of gold through the marble of both my Essential and subjective nature. It's there I'm told and beautiful, but how to get at it?

For many years I assumed the personality had to be destroyed to free Essence. Now it appears otherwise. Personality seemingly has two sides.
1. An almost objective or Essential portion that seens to accompany the Essence during the lifetime of it's sojourn.. This may be called type and forms the blueprint for the manner in which an individual grows.

2. Alongside is the exclusively subjective personality of negative behaviors conforming with life and eventually suplanting the chidhood essence.
However like the white of an egg it provides the sustenance, the higher energies we acquire through confronting and neutralizing its manifestations. Whithin lay the seeds of our objectivity.

The "good" personality is necessary for externally considering, for recognizing the Righteous things of this world in concert with Essence.
Walking in another's shoes and recognizing within ourselves the suffering that brings endurance, the forebearance that brings being, the unselfishness that creates Conscience, the fear that brings hope. And to create a Hermetically sealed shell. That personality that can act for us as a shield in the pain factory of this world.

As to the objectiveness of Essence I can truly say little. Both Objectivity and Essentiality come from a deep and distant place. They are ideals, the gold strand in the granite that runs like a river through every part of our lives. We may catch the odd glance looking within while pondering or meditating. And we may bear witness without during moments of self observation and remembering. And we may observe the subtle changes that bring us to the calm waters during moments of great stress or anxiety. To me these are the "smells" of objectivity that relate to this week's pondering.

I wonder about this fine interface where objective-subjective, personality-essence meet. The one constant is that none of it can exist outside of our own personal consciousness. Thoughts without consciousness are just scattered energy. Food for the Moon. Emotions and movement without consciousness even more so.

I realize how inadequate are my thoughts in this area.

In summing up I realize that my weeks work on this topic, while not being very conclusive, has engaged my Being here and there, and have awoken the sleeper more than a few times. And as Martha says, "that's a good thing"!

This week's "I am exercise" is one of my favorites as it can be conducted anytime, anywhere under our cap of invisibility. There are few outward manifestations except for the fine inner smile that arises with the realization that we are humbly communing with God and the World within.

This is a warmth without guilt, a gift from on very high. And for a few moments, from time time, it doesn't hurt to remember this.

Regards to Judy for all the work,
Lawrick

---

by Chuck

What a wonderful exercise this has been for me this week! The current foundation of my work on a minute-to-minute basis is the IAM exercise. The addition of 'NOW' and the additional insight given with this week's exercise really enhanced the usual IAM experience. With my normal method (as specified at one point by Mr. G.), there is self-sensing during the 'AM,' but adding invocation of the NOW between past and future, and just being present, magnified the effect.

I'm not very up on the use of the terms objective and subjective as used in the work, and so will be taking this opportunity to keep a watchful eye for these during reading and study of Beelzebub's Tales.

Regards,
Chuck

---

by Ian

> Chuck wrote:
> I'm not very up on the use of the terms objective and subjective as used in the work, and so will be taking this opportunity to keep a watchful eye for these during reading and study of Beelzebub's Tales.
>
> Regards,
> Chuck

Chuck,
I think this is a problem for most of us n the Work. As you say - let us all keep a watchful eye on all our experiences and try to maintain an impartial stance towards everything.

Work Program week beginning 28 January 2008

---

by Ian

Filling the Body with Air Energy

Once a day, preferably in the morning. This can be done sitting, standing or even lying down. Sitting is the preferred position.

As usual, begin by relaxing and obtaining the Collected State.

Breathe out, emptying your lungs as much as possible. Then take as deep a breath as you comfortably can (never try to force yourself to breath more deeply, faster or slower than you feel comfortably able to do), hold it for a moment (again only as long as you can do it comfortably, without any forcing) and while breathing out the used air from the lungs, will/imagine that at the same time the special "subtle" energy/constituent of the air enters from the lungs into your body and goes to your generative (sexual) organs to be stored there. Hold your breath with the lungs empty (as always, only for as long as there is no discomfort whatsoever) then breathe deeply in again, hold your breath and breathe out again, imagining/postulating that as new energy is entering your sex organs, the energy already stored there moves into your right leg and begins to fill it (as if it were an empty container, waiting to be filled) from the bottom (i.e. the toes) up. Repeat this breathing in and out and filling until the righ leg "feels" full of energy and then do the same with the left leg, left arm, right arm, trunk and finally head. Stop when you feel that the whole body is vibrating with this influx of new fresh energy and that the generative organs' storage place is also full of energy, available and ready to be used as and when needed.

---

by Zenas

Hello again, everyone.
This was a nice exercise to come back to after taking so long to bring the body back to where it would not be center attention. Air energy was good, getting the lungs and breathing passages to obey. Full of energy sounds so much more wonderful than you imagine, and it is an imaginative state. We work so hard at not "being in our head" it doesn't even know what "being in our head" is until our other parts demand awareness. Storing energy is so good. I was only able to do the exercise a couple minutes at a time so worked to do it at least twice a day. It helps.

Elsewhere on the forum, I will post about the difference between remorse and regret, they are so far apart. One thinks about G's remorse when you're in a place you have to while you can.

---

by Dean

This exercise was great for getting the energy flowing, it was quite invigorating and almost always resulted in a state of exuberance. The breathing was hard at first, but soon I settled into a rhythm and it became almost second nature. It really just took some practice and it soon smoothed out and my breathing patterns became more comfortable. Sometimes the energy was more profound than other times, probably due to my inner chemistry as well as the amount of efforts I had been making during the day. When I did do it well and with concentration I felt electrified but also calm and collected, it definitely lived up to it's description of filling the body with air energy. I enjoyed this exercise very much and think it can be used for filling the body with energy in just a matter of minutes.

So good to hear from you Zenas, can't wait for your future insights.

Regards

---

by Ian

> Dean wrote:
> This exercise was great for getting the energy flowing, it was quite invigorating and almost always resulted in a state of exuberance. The breathing was hard at first, but soon I settled into a rhythm and it became almost second nature.
> Regards

Hi Dean,

Breathing should always be smooth; not forced.
As to exuberance - not to be a Party-pooper - but it might be expedient to consider that extreme positive States can be Denying forces just as negative states can. In other words - we shouldn't Identify with positive states any more than negative states. They can both be equally manifestations of Denying Force.

---

by Dean

Ian,

Thanks for the advice, that's something that recalls to me something from what Nicoll says about being in the center of the pendulum rather than at one extreme or the other. I suppose emotions should only be used for a purpose rather than for pleasure, I'll have to work more on that because it is something I'm definitely inclined to. It's pretty easy to get identified with positive states because of the intensity they sometimes reach, I'll have to train my brain to be able to be more controlled in regards to that. The work guidelines for the next few months will obviously be a good place to start.

---

by Chuck

From doing similar exercises in the past, I imagine this was a familiar task for most. For me it had a couple of twists. Although many energy manipulation exercises involve concentration on the generative organs, I've seldom done an exercise that stored the energy there, or used it for 'staging' like this one does. Usually storage has been at the navel, solar plexus, etc.

I found this exercise worked quite well and was very invigorating. The "filling" part of the exercise also led to new sensations as it presented a field of energy rather than the usual concentration in a given spot.

I tried to maintain the energy during the day with mixed success, but this form of the exercise has given me new possibilities.

Regards,
Chuck

---

by Cassandra

After getting into the rhythm of this exercise, I felt a familiar elation, maybe similar to what Dean described. This feeling or rather burst of feeling often comes during sittings or other concentrated efforts. In some ways it's a bit annoying because I can predict the rise and fall of the feeling and can anticipate it's expression. I don't want this to become habit or a psychological response. In any event, the high feelings come, and I'm compelled to respond (to what?) "yes," maybe like some part of me is communicating with something my normal state can't perceive. But I know I should put all this aside and simply continue.

Lots of confusion and doubt nowadays about the Work. But read last night in Real World that nothing can be changed at the beginning, just try to observe. Then there's also the advice given by Gurdjieff to verify these sayings.

Thanks for all your posts.

Cassandra

---

by Chuck

Cassandra said:

> "Lots of confusion and doubt nowadays about the Work."

Excellent! Now you're getting somewhere!

Regards,
Chuck

Work Program week beginning 4 February 2008

---

by Ian

Whenever you are angry, irritated, sad, worried, anxious, indignant, exasperiated, distracted, bored, happy, enthusiastic, talkative, concentrating, listening, satisfied, etc., visualize observing yourself in a mirror.

Give up a physical, emotional or intellectual indulgance for Lent.

---

by Judy

Hmm - this is interesting.
First observation is that I have a definable expression on the face a lot more of the time than expected. I'll let the expectations go (they give a quite false picture), and just observe. This will be a busy week.

Regarding "mirrors", yesterday I trawled the second-hand book shops here at Huonville and am currently enjoying "Daniel Martin" by John Fowles. It is reviewed as a portrayal of a contemporary Englishman's attempt to see himself and his time in the mirrors of his past and present.

It is also allegorical, to my way of thinking.

Here's an exerpt from the first chapter "The Harvest", about the author's boyhood on a wheat farm in Devon, and the unavoidable death of several rabbits as the harvester works the final field.

"He (Daniel Martin) sits with his back to a beech-trunk, staring down through foliage at the field. Without past or future, purged of tenses; collecting this day, pregnant with being. Unharvested, yet one with this land; and this was why he had been so afraid. It wasn't death, the agony of the mower's blades, the scream and red stumps... but dying, dying before the other wheat was ripe.
Inscrutable innocent, already in exile.
Down, half masked by leaves. Point of view of the hidden bird."

And Zenas - lovely to hear from you.
Best wishes,

---

by Lawrick

Hey all,

Yes Judy, this was my experience as well. It comes as quite a shock to see just how "ugly" I look when angry. Not a pretty sight, still a good learning experience. How easy I see the faultlines of others but looking into myself first requires I neutralized the inner guardians of self love and pride. I am always amazed at how subtle and evolutionary dangerous are these guardians.

Hope your vacation is "filling" you with rich new experience.

Yes and glad to see you back Zenas.

And Kieth, welcome and hope to hear from you soon.

Be well all,
Lawrick

---

by Cassandra

This exercise asks me to visualize myself in a mirror. It's a challenge to visualize different emotional expressions. For me colors come to mind more easily, like if I'm sad, this translates into a gray color. In the last couple of days, I've felt anxious, and I see that as something grayish. It's funny, I don't like looking into mirrors because the image I see is often not how I imagine myself looking physically. I actually avoid mirrors, but I was at the optomitrist earlier this week and also had to look into a big magnified mirror while being fit for new glasses. It was okay. Thanks for the exercise.

---

by Chuck

Until now, I totally missed the fact that the exercise was to visualize observing ourselves in a mirror rather than actually looking in a mirror. I usually get a funny "who is that?" feeling upon looking in one, and have often thought it would be a good exercise. At any rate, on to the correct exercise for a couple of days.

I've given up sugar for Lent - pretty standard, but a good one for me.

Regards,
Chuck

Work Program week beginning 11 February 2008

---

by Harry

Build on the previous exercise (7 January 2008) by bringing yourself into an all centered state. Lay on the floor or sit in a comfortable straight chair. (You can also do this on a bed, but it's better if that's upon awakening in the morning. When falling asleep again isn't likely.) If laying you may have a pillow to support your neck.

Go into an unfocused gaze. Pick a spot on the ceiling and just unfocus on that spot. Let the surface of the floor take the weight of your body. Hands palm up at your side. Thumb and forefinger touching. Feet slightly separated so your legs form a narrow V.

If something enters your mind, let it flow. Don't go with the thought. As Gurdjieff said, just say "I'll pay attention to you later, now is for me." You will find thoughts flow around. Some from inside, some from outside.

For the duration of the exercise you're not moving. You're just settling the body. Breath easily. If you must pay attention to something, focus on your breathing. Don't think about it. Observe it. If your eyes close, let them. But retain the unfocused gaze.

Once you are able to settle in this exercise add some music when you are beginning.

Gurdjieff's music with de Hartmann is a good choice. So are ragas from someone like Ravi Shankar. If you choose a Gurdjieff piece, make sure you let the entire selection play. Don't stop in the middle of a song. Likewise a raga. With a raga also try to pick one for the time of day. These will be indicated on the liner notes in most cases. With these, as well, don't stop in the middle. This usually means you're settled for a minimum of 20-30 minutes.

If you want to try other musicians try to stay with instrumentals to start. Keith Jarret has done some interest work on Gurdjieff. Anderson has done some wonderful meditations for flute. Robbie Basho did some guitar work that is also in the raga style. There are even popular songs that can be used. Dark Star by the Grateful Dead. If you want to start getting into language add something like The Incredible String Band. "A very cellular song" comes to mind.

When you have reached your duration for the exercise, quietly stand and try to maintain the centered state. Move about your business. See if you can get passed Ouspensky's tobacco shop.

---

by Dean

This has been an exercise in awakening indeed, it produced quite vivid states of awareness and many lucid sensations. The presence of my body was evident and I felt the sense that I was stationary and had weight, I could feel gravity pulling me down and holding me in place where I was. The first time I did the exercise I was sitting and put on some music. These were just two improvisation pieces, the first was Interstellar Overdrive by Pink Floyd and the second Dark Star by the Grateful Dead which Harry suggested. This was a good thirty minute session that filled me with energy very efficiently. I felt the music resonating with me on a higher level and could hear subtleties in it that I hadn't heard before. It created a strong impression and I felt ready to go about my day. The second time I did it laying down in bed and focusing on areas in the room without music though, this was also a good experience that brought in a large amount of energy. It is an exercise that brings many benefits and brought about conscious moments that lasted even after I had moved on to other efforts of self observation. It's affects were sustained in a feeling of being more awake and aware, and it will be one that I'm going to practice in the future.

Regards

---

by Cassandra

I did the exercise both with and without music, the first time without. My thoughts wandered most of the time, and it took effort to bring focus back to a fuzzy blur on a far wall. When I could focus on the object, I had a familiar sudde elation, and then it would subside. A waxing and waning which is sometimes frustrating. It seems my attempts at practice are stuck in this place. For music, I listened to music composed by G., prayers set to music. Can't remember who performed it.

Thanks for the exercise.

---

by Harry

Waxing and waning can be normal. The idea is to just let things flow by you. A thought wants to enter, let it go by. Once music is added then the music can help with the stray thoughts. Of course it is important to pick music that is intended for this type of exercise.

Paul Horn did a series of flute solos. Inside the Taj Mahal, Inside the Great Pyramid, etc. John McLaughlin did some guitar work. I think it was called Meditations.

Work Program week beginning 18 February 2008

---

by Judy

This week's suggested Work program is paraphrased from pages forty-five and forty-six of a 1951 publication by Kenneth Walker titled “Venture with Ideas” which I uncovered in a second-hand bookshop in Hobart last week.

The Idea:
Consciousness cannot be defined, but everyone knows what it is.
Thinking, feeling, sensing and moving are functions and consciousness is awareness of these functions.
It is a subjective state and can only be known by experiencing it. It is generally said that man is a self-conscious being, but this statement is quite untrue. Man's usual state in fact is best described as one of waking sleep.

Exercise:
This is the experiment suggested by Mr Ouspensky to be performed a couple of times daily for several days to verify this big idea and make it our own. It describes an attempt to self-remember.

Look at a watch and try to be aware of yourself all the time you are looking at the watch. Say to yourself “I am looking at this watch”, and make an effort to feel yourself sitting there, gazing at the watch and following the second hand as it moves around. All the time keep up the feeling of “I”, maintain your awareness of your existence here in this room, and see how long you are able to continue doing this.

Mr Ouspensky commented about this experiment:
You'll find that you will not be able to maintain self-consciousness for more than about two minutes and if you repeat the experiment soon afterwards, it will not last even as long as this. By making these experiments you will learn what self-consciousness really means, and for what a short time it lasts.

***

The following Exercise comes from Ms Marty Mann, an early leader of a Gurdjieff Group in Chicago. She was also the first female member of Alcoholics Anonymous to maintain lifelong sobriety and had significant input into Twelfth Step Program literature. The co-founders of the first Twelfth Step Program were members of the same Gurdjieff Group.

Exercise:
I will try to be unruffled, no matter what happens. I will keep my emotions in check, although others around me may be letting theirs go. I may be feeling hurt, depressed, resentful or self-pitying, but I will not show it. I will keep consciously centered in the face of disturbance, keep that deep inner calm through all the experiences of the day. In the rush of work and worry, the deep inner balanced silence is necessary to keep me on an even keel. I must learn to take this calm consciously with me into the most hurried days. I ask that I may learn patience, humility and endurance. I ask that I may grow my soul today by doing someone a good turn that isn't found out; and by doing at least two things that I don't want to do. Each night I will give thanks for my many blessings and have true remorse for my many failings.

---

by Dean

One thing I noticed when doing the first exercise was that I was not as attached to external things, and a lot of my negative manifestations were wiped out while I was actively doing this exercise in divided attention. I noticed my fears were subdued to a degree and my tension levels were reduced while I was aware of myself looking and aware of what I was observing. This two-fold awareness definitely brought out a sense of peace and unidentified perception that was great for diminishing mechanical reactions and kept me watchful and absorbed in my internal work. A trick I used was focusing my attention on the end of my nose, not crossing my eyes but just seeing it while I was looking, which was something I had read at some point in time in some book or another. This exercise brought about a feeling of I in the present moment, something that was easier to sustain after I had been on a roll for period of time and also gave an emotional element that widened my view of myself in my environment.

Thanks for the exercise Judy

Regards

---

by Karen

Figured it was time to get back on the horse and wake up a little after having a drawn out argument with the flu. Good riddance to that nasty ditty that I let in.

Almost made it to 60 seconds on the watch exercise! Great exercise and surprisingly difficult. So many things bidding for attention. The object in the room seem to breath live. Focus is good, then 30 seconds later enter the sounds of the television, thoughts, ramble as fast as an auctioneer, the cat vies for affection, the phone rings and GONE, in 60 seconds.

And man thinks he has freedom. Yikes

Found this to be helpful:

Set my intention: "to be consciousness" then,
Breath...follow the second hand...awareness of breath...follow the second hand...just be...follow the second hand...breath and so on and so forth

Thanks Judy

Glad to be back online

Namaste,

Karen

---

by Cassandra

Hi Karen,

Glad you're feeling well again.

Work Program week beginning 25 February 2008

---

by Ian

Will Exercise - Visualize a simple task that you WILL do tomorrow without fail at a specific time. Visualize all aspects of the task, including:

- physical motions, physical sensations, breathing pattern, etc.
- thoughts, eg. a mantra or Affirmation that you will use while doing it.
- emotions, eg. you may evoke an Inner Smile or a feeling of Remorse or Joy, etc.

Next day, after performing the task, review your performance and how closely you were able to repeat exactly what you visualized. Repeat the task every day until you get it right.

Breathing Exercise - Every day after eating, perform a breathing exercise in conjunction with a Prayer:

(Slow in-breath and pause)
(Exhale and intone from the heart) Holy Affirming
(Slow in-breath and pause)
(Exhale and intone from the heart) Holy-Denying,
(Slow in-breath and pause)
(Exhale and intone from the heart) Holy-Reconciling,
(Slow in-breath and pause)
(Exhale and intone from the heart) Transubstantiate in me,
(Slow in-breath and pause)
(Exhale and intone from the heart) For my Being.

Impressions Exercise - Three times every day for 5 minutes, try to enter a state of All-Brains-Balanced-Being-Perception and use the Sightless gaze and Soundless Sound exercises to take in Third Being Food in conjunction with a passive awareness of ones breath.

---

by Chuck

I had forgotten about the Sightless Gaze and Soundless Sound exercises and how powerful they could be. I spent some time with my mom in the hospital this past week for a bypass operation (she's doing fine), and had ample opportunity to practice these in that noise-rich environment. This was especially true for sounds. The beeping of the monitors and scraps of conversation that floated by were great opportunities to not identify what sounds were but just register the vibration. Being thrown out of my regular routine was also valuable a learning experience, as were the new impressions that became available.

Regards,
Chuck

---

by Cassandra

With the sightless/soundless gaze, I had to try constantly to bring attention back to the task. I also noticed a warmth radiating in my hands (my extremeties are usually cold this time of year). But mostly, I noticed resistance to doing the exercises. Just five minutes each, but there was a lack of will most days although I did the tasks mostly.

The Holy Equation exercises were also nice reminders to remember myself.

---

by Lawrick

Hey all,

I experienced some difficulty with the visualization exercise both in its planning and execution. It was only after several days that I realized the task chosen was too large to benefit from the parameters of the exercise. My choice was the act of sitting at the computer each morning which includes a response to the daily ponder in my journal, random readings, checking the site, making coffee etc.

I found that even a simple act, just turning on the computer can involve all manner of movements, associations, tensions and so on. I'll begin with something smaller next time. So much material can be included in even the simplest act if one tries to be aware.

The breathing exercise after eating is so imporatnt and should be a part of my daily life even as habit. Yet I forgot several times. When I did remember breath and the Holy Equation there was a sense of Peace and Gratitude for the nourishment of our first being food. We are so fortunate in the west.

Much more success was encountered with the impressions exercise. The sightless gaze and soundless sound helped to produce lengthy periods of just Being. One day I caught "something" thinking, "one more hour and it's time to do the impressions exercise". And I laughed. The best time to do the exercise or something like it is of course, right now not later.

Best wishes to Ian with the A and E Conference next week. I doubt we have any idea of the enormous amount of effort it takes to prepare, plan, and execute this absolutely vital part of our Work. My sincere thanks Ian.

If you've never read the proceedings of the Conferences you could spend your money less wisely. There are many deep insights into Beelzebub, and the nature and meaning of what we do. Again, good luck Ian!

Regards,
Lawrick

Work Program week beginning 3 March 2008

---

by Ian

Each morning the Seeker will sense his body in a relaxed posture while contemplating the Tao symbol, then visualizing himself as a whole composed of part suffering and part rejoicing.

When you are happy or sad, hurried or relaxed, hungry or full, sleepy or awake, watch your breath and repeat silently: It breathes in; It breathes out; etc.

Ponder the saying: every real happiness can arise only from some real unhappiness.

---

by Dean

The contemplation and visualization exercise has been a helpful way to endure suffering and also to realize that joyful manifestations are also denying forces if not kept in balance. One thought I kept coming back to in connection with the Tao is that the circle represents the universe while the white represents the affirming force and the black the denying force within the universe and that both are necessary and serve a purpose. This also gave me a more realistic vision of myself without always expecting smooth traveling, and just being too comfortable and avoiding suffering. I was thinking that conscious suffering is more useful than joyful or pleasurable manifestations because the former leads to transformation while the latter usually leads only to self comforting, although the process of transforming suffering is probably the most pleasurable thing that a person can experience.

> Ponder the saying: every real happiness can arise only from some real unhappiness.

The key word seems to be real, what is real happiness and what is real unhappiness? This obviously isn't the sort of happiness the average person feels every day, it is the happiness that comes from efforts and having a clear conscience. This seems like it could be related to the idea of being disappointed in yourself or external conditions enough to where you want to change yourself and your situation. This real unhappiness could be seen as a positive thing that moves someone towards esoteric influences. This unhappiness is something that should affect a person's essence enough that they should search for something that will bring them genuine happiness. The reaction is somewhat instinctive I think, something that comes from the intuitive part of someone who isn't willing to give up their individual self for the "good" of mainstream society. A person's conscience should be a force in this in the sense that it acts as a means of seeing truth, through the illusions that herd morality creates and reinforces. The process of being unhappy with external conditions or lifestyles that are promoted, as well as being disappointed in oneself for lack of willpower and force, seems to be important in regards to how a person works and struggles with themselves. This saying made me ponder my own path in life and how I came upon the fourth way teaching.

---

by Lawrick

Hey all,
While pondering the Tao symbol this week, aside from the Peace and Quiet of the meditation, a sense of dynamic movement and energy emaerged from the symbol. I couldn't help but notice an affinity with the Swastika. Strange that I expected to find oriental harmony and instead sensed the nature of elekilpomagtistzen.

The symbol seemed to constantly fold and envelope itself, a picture of the fourth dimension I recall seeing in either an Ouspensky book, or a book about time and the fourth dimension, a favorite topic of his. the black and white "tadpoles" would be drawn through the event horizon of the black and white holes to emerge on the other side as opposite to that with which they had entered. No, really. Symbols can say so much.

Be well,
Lawrick

---

by Lawrick

Hey all,
While pondering the Tao symbol this week, aside from the Peace and Quiet of the meditation, a sense of dynamic movement and energy emaerged from the symbol. I couldn't help but notice an affinity with the Swastika. Strange that I expected to find oriental harmony and instead sensed the nature of elekilpomagtistzen.

The symbol seemed to constantly fold and envelope itself, a picture of the fourth dimension I recall seeing in either an Ouspensky book, or a book about time and the fourth dimension, a favorite topic of his. the black and white "tadpoles" would be drawn through the event horizon of the black and white holes to emerge on the other side as opposite to that with which they had entered. No, really. Symbols can say so much.

Be well,
Lawrick

Work Program week beginning 10 March 2008

by Ian

THE BODY AND ITS NEEDS
From: Transformation by J G Bennett

There are many ways of producing deep relaxation by conscious energy. I shall now describe one that works well for most people. Start by taking a com-fortable sitting posture, with the spine as straight and erect as you can make it without straining. You can support your back at the base of the spine. Verify that your head is freely balanced on your shoulders and that there are no obvious tensions. Rest your hands palm downwards on your knees. Now — become strongly aware of your eyes as if 'you' had entered into them and were experiencing the sensation of being present in your eyes. You can now relax your eyes and all the muscles surrounding them. Keep them open or you will fall asleep when you relax deeply, but you should now be seeing without focussing on any object. To avoid strain, lower but do not close the eyelids. Move your awareness over your face, into your mouth, to your throat and successively wish each part to relax. Pass on from the throat to the back of the neck —where you should feel yourself present in the muscles of the neck — and move your awareness down the right arm, penetrating into the muscles all the way to the finger tips. The same with the left shoulder and arm. Then return to the throat and let your awareness travel through the thorax down to the diaphragm. Here comes the familiar 'awareness of the navel' which is so often treated as a joke. It is very far from comic, because there is in this region a concentration of the vegetative energy which must relax. It is necessary to spend several minutes relaxing the abdominal muscles and obtaining a deep rhythmical breathing. The awareness is again made to travel into the right thigh and down the right leg. This must be done slowly enough to make sure that there is a real contact between 'you' and 'your leg'. The same is repeated for the left side.

Once this is completed there should be a general sensation of the mass of the body and a coherence of awareness of your own presence within the body. The whole exercise is then repeated; but with the deter-mination to penetrate more deeply into the nerves and blood vessels. This causes a tingling or vibrating sensation followed by a feeling of the 'wholeness' of the body. The exercise is continued for as long as one can keep from falling asleep or losing the thread of what one is doing. It is not easy and it may have to be done twenty or thirty times before one can be sure what is meant by 'contact with the body'. It should never be done more than once a day. Once one has learned how it is done, the time taken can be reduced.

There are many variants of this relaxation exercise, but so far as I can ascertain, all of them require to be done by concentrating conscious energy. This cannot be done by an effort: on the contrary any kind of force makes relaxation almost impossible. It is purely a matter of skill. This skill is a special kind of struggle: it is hard work — very hard indeed to go really deep — and yet it must not be forced. Any forcing is bound to produce tension and defeat its object.

This illustrates the importance of understanding what we are about. The aim of relaxation is to allow a free flow of the vital and psychic energies. Deep relaxation goes further and enables the creative energy to work in us and to organize the mind and transform it into soul. We cannot accomplish this transformation by the energies that are more or less under the control of the mind, and so we must allow the work to be done in us. Those who practise deep relaxation — sometimes also called deep meditation — become aware of this working and learn to co-operate with it.

---

by Judy

How is everyone going with this? I'm finding it really effective. Don't miss the opportunity to try it as the daily meditative Striving folks.

It dovetails well into some work I've been doing recently which has involved the sense of self (I) being felt in the chest predominantly. This came as a little epiphany some weeks ago and I'm able to repeat occasionally. Most of the time my "I" seems to be firmly in the head. Of course it isn't absolute by any means, but more like 80/20 or so sense of self in the chest/heart.
Regards,

---

by Karen

Judy,

Synchronicity - what a beautifull thing!

For the past few months I've been working on the same thing and often find myself in the head and have to pull my attention down between the solar plexus and heart. Coming from the chest brings about much different results - often answers that I'm sure are not my own but seem more true to my being.

How often "I" am in the head. I guess its a nice start to recognize this and intend to work towards a balanced state.

Great exercise

Namaste

Work Program week beginning 17 March 2008

by Judy

The following is paraphrased from Sy Ginsburg's “Gurdjieff Unveiled” Appendix 3 “Exercises”.

The author divides our exercises into three groups; first are the Strivings, which are considered so fundamental that they should be done all the time; second Sy calls the various Stop exercises and thirdly, all the psychological exercises. He suggests that the second and third groups be altered weekly to avoid mechanicalness.
Into the first group, he has added an extra seven strivings. Here they are for those who may not have the book:
The first five are of course the familiar Obligolnian Strivings found on P386 of Beelzebub's Tales.
Then:
Striving to watch the reflection of the splendor of the sunrise every day. P78
Striving to meditate every day. P355
Striving to consciously labor. P792
Striving to intentionally suffer. P792
Striving to put ourselves in the position of others. P1164
Striving to be cognizant of the inevitability of ours and others deaths. P1183
Striving to manifest “as if” we already stand in objective consciousness. P132 – 136
(this last is from Life is Real only then when “I am”.)

This week our exercise involves the first of these additional strivings. It is part of our BT Forum reading for this week, on P78.

“So in the meantime, exist as you exist. Only do not forget one thing, namely, at your age it is indispensably necessary that every day, at sunrise, while watching the reflection of the splendor, you bring about a contact between your consciousness and the various unconscious parts of your general presence. Try to make this state last and to convince the unconscious parts – as if they were conscious – that if they hinder your general functioning, they, in the period of your responsible age, not only cannot fulfill the good that befits them, but your general presence of which they are part, will not be able to be a good servant of our COMMON ENDLESS CREATOR and by that will not even be worthy to pay for your arising and existence.” (from BT 1950 pdf)

Ponder: Do I feel the true remorse that Hassein feels, even at his young age, at not realizing fully enough just how much has been given to me, at great cost to those who have gone before? Have I considered clearly how best to pay for my arising and existence?

Make a list, please, of three unconscious parts or manifestations which I notice are hindering the most mindful and effective doing of my daily being-duty.
Please share these observations with the group.

by Cassandra

Unconscious parts hindering work:

What comes to mind first is laziness. In the mornings, I resist getting up to sit for morning meditation because I don't want to face the chilly morning air. But this seems obvious to me, so I don't know if I could call this observation unconscious. Laziness could be influencing me in a way that's not so obvious when I loose focus of daily exercises or intentions to work. I loose vigilance and just ease into what's more comfortable--day dreams, identification, meanness, etc.

There is also fear which seems to be like a red thread through much of my life nowadays. I believe there are many unconscious aspects of these fears, some I can recognize but others that may influence my behavior and I not realize it.

A third might be pride.

A for remorse at not realizing those who have sacrificed for me. Mostly I don't think along these lines. I don't feel any remorse because it's not occurred to me that others have given much. But I realize that they have. I think immediately of my mother. Being influenced by Christianity, I'm always reminded of Christ's sacrifice for humanity and the debt owed by humankind, but I don't relate to this that much.

---

by Lawrick

Hey Jude,

This is a timely exercise. There has been little remorse of or for anything in the last three months. It is not the long winter nights, nor the weather. More like a lack of depth, living along the horizontal line.

How does one enjender real Remorse of Conscience? It is not something from which I turn away. In fact real Remorse is painful but cleansing for me. I just keep forgetting to use the soap. It's a conscious act of washing for me at least.

This is a perfect time of year for both the exercise and reflecting on the Easter Holy Days. I can believe pyhsical "death" held no terror for the Christ. Inevitable, and from my Work perspective not frightening whatsoever. But how does one knowingly and willingly expose oneself to the physical Cross with all its terror,violence, humiliations and unimaginable drawn out pain. And as we recently read, for a completely indifferent race of beings. Completely indifferent! A worthless criminal has been suitably punished. Good!

Truly something much greater was at work here. A model. A path by which we can imitate and compare. But these are big things. The question for me is engendering real remorse for negleting the daily exercise, for not trying to understand, for not recycling a plastic bag, for watching too much TV, for not observing my behavior with intent, and so on.

So this Sunday I will attend church, look at the Cross, and beg for forgiveness. I will try to place myself up there and sense some of the suffering to deepen my Remorse. And hopefully my prayers will be heard.

Peace,
Lawrick

---

by Dean

> Do I feel the true remorse that Hassein feels, even at his young age, at not realizing fully enough just how much has been given to me, at great cost to those who have gone before? Have I considered clearly how best to pay for my arising and existence?

I would have to say that I don't feel remorse as often as I should and I even find it hard to feel remorseful in a conscious way, I realize the times when I've felt the most remorseful are times when I am working well and I have more emotional energy than usual. The times I've felt true remorse are times when I've been laboring cosciously and have actually made efforts, when I don't make efforts I feel less emotional and can't evoke this feeling or realization. Overall I would say that lack of remorse in me has always coincided with lack of conscious work.

Three unconscious manifestations that are hindering my being-duty recently would have to be imagination, internal considering, and laziness, it's something that seems be part of a recurring cycle of bad habits. I've been doing last weeks meditation quite often and have had some success at some other exercises, so it's not all bad though. Striving to put myself in the position of others is sometimes difficult, but when I am able to do it, it puts things into perspective and is a way to see things with more clarity. Also being cognizant of death is a way to be more in touch with reality and is something that puts everyone on a level playing field. Striving to manifest as if I already stand in objective consciousness is something that only seems to work some of the time, when I'm able to concentrate sufficiently and actually make real efforts to try to be in the present moment. These were all effective ways to bring about some realization or new idea that was deep and insightful.

Happy Easter

---

by Chuck

In terms of the sunrise exercise, I managed to be ready at sunrise and try it three days this week. The question remained though, how to "bring about a contact between your consciousness and the various unconscious parts" and convince them, etc. I tried a visualization of my separate unconscious parts, but was at a loss as to how to do this. As we discussed in another thread, visualization, repetition and symbols are techniques for this, but I lack practical experience. I will continue to work on this exercise and ponder this question as we go through Beelzebub's Tales.

In terms of listing unconscious parts or manifestations which I notice are hindering the most mindful and effective doing of my daily being-duty: something that almost invariably brings mechanicalness and identification for me is talking to another person. I can be in a self-aware state (or whatever passes for it in my case), and the moment I interact with someone, it all goes out the window. I have tried at my job specifically working on this by going to talk to someone while attempting to remain unidentified. It's still a work-in-progress.

Regards,
Chuck

---

by Judy

Hi Chuck,
This is true for me too:

> I can be in a self-aware state (or whatever passes for it in my case), and the moment I interact with someone, it all goes out the window. I have tried at my job specifically working on this by going to talk to someone while attempting to remain unidentified. It's still a work-in-progress.

Just yesterday I read something (P165 Exchanges Within by Lord Pentland) which is helping along this particular line, so will pass it on.
He is answering a question about why attempts to go into "presence", to become "more quiet" will not work if there is any violence in them. He gives this as an example:
"It's like we were listening to somebody and - you can't be above the whole thing, you know - you're not free enough to listen and be in contact with yourself and all that. And suddenly, quite spontaneously, you're able to take in the whole situation: yourself and the person and the conversation. That comes about suddenly, doesn't it? It may be connected with a kind of determination to go on trying. What, one can't say, but sometimes it's a kind of determination not to be in such a narrow frame and longing and longing for that. Suddenly one is able to listen to the conversation andat the same time see all sorts of distractions, and see how little one is able to remember, to be aware of how impossible it is to follow. I don't have the attention. Now, the "quiet" appears like that, spontaneously. It's almost the same thing."

Anyway, I've been experimenting with a more accepting attitude (better impartiality I suppose) while trying several times today. Results different - closer. As you say, though, definitely a work in progress.

It's strange the way, over time, self-observation, which begins as looking at myself as I am and where impartiality is reasonably good, slowly and insidiously takes on a subtle element of changing myself - even if it is only wanting to be more conscious, for example. And somehow or another, this admirable aim sneaks its way into the Work attempts, which of course detracts from their quality a lot. Quite often I have to go back to the basics to eliminate unnecessary things my mind has added, even such things as small tensions as to why I still cannot "do" some exercise as well as my mind thinks it should be able to.
Our exercise of this current week on the "I am" is particularly effective for the purity of observation and remembering. Invaluable.

Regards,

---

by Chuck

Judy, thanks very much for that quote by Lord Pentland and your insights. It jibes with other comments that sometimes one has to 'let go' in order for something to happen.

From that information, it sounds like a combination of determination to keep trying and work on impartiality might be the ticket. Interesting that you said one has to be continually going back to the basics, to keep a vigilant watch for changes based on one's expectations (for example), even if they seem pretty noble. Thanks for your words of wisdom.

Thanks,
Chuck

Work Program week beginning 24 March 2008

---

by Ian

Gurdjieff I AM Exercise

"When a normal man, that is, a man who already has his real I, his will, and all the other properties of a real man, pronounces aloud or to himself the words "I am", then there always proceeds in him, in his, as it is called, "solar plexus", a so to say "reverberation", that is, something like a vibration, a feeling, or something of the sort. This kind of reverberation can proceed also in other parts of his body in general, but only on the condition that, when pronouncing these words, his attention is intentionally concentrated on them. If the ordinary man, not having as yet in himself data for the natural reverberation but knowing of the existence of this fact, will, with conscious striving for the formation in himself of the genuine data which should be in the common presence of a real man, correctly and frequently pronounce these same and for him as yet empty words, and will imagine that this same reverberation proceeds in him, he may thereby ultimately through frequent repetition gradually acquire in himself a so to say theoretical "beginning" for the possibility of a real practical forming in himself of these data.

He who is exercising himself with this must at the beginning, when pronouncing the words "I am", imagine that this same reverberation is already proceeding in his solar plexus." (Life is real only then when I AM, p134).

I AM Exercise from a handwritten note given by Mr G in 1939

"Breathe in - "I". Breathe out - "am". With all three parts do. Not just mind. Feeling and body also. Make strong! Not easy thing.

When breathe out, imagine part of air stays in and flows to corresponding place.

I take the word 'corresponding', to mean, with successive breaths, the Head, the Spine, the Solar Plexus, the Sex Centre and the Whole Body.

Where flow, how flow, that's its business. Only feel that part remains.

Before beginning exercise say: "I wish to keep this substance for myself".

Without this conscious and voluntary labour on your part nothing at all will be coated. All in time will evaporate.

Just this small property in blood makes possible very big result if done with conscious labour. Without this, one month you must work for such result.

When doing, must be careful not to change exterior. It is inner thing. No one need know. Outside keep same exterior. Inside you do.

Not hold breath. Just breathe in and out. Of course, to change thinking will take time. Automatically breath will adjust.

To be able to do exercise not lopsidedly you must put whole attention on it.

To arouse feeling, interest and attention, for cooperation you must think following before beginning: "I am now about to begin this exercise. With full attention I will draw in my breath, saying "I" and sensing the whole of myself. I wish very much to do this in order that I may digest air."

To arouse body to cooperate, take corresponding posture. Inner tension of forces. Mobilise your centres for working together for this aim.

In breathing, imagine something flows, like when inhaling cigarette.

I am now about to begin this exercise, which I have been fortunate enough to learn from Mr. Gurdjieff, and which will enable me with the aid of conscious labour, to coat higher bodies in myself from active elements in the air I breathe."

---

by Cassandra

This exercise helped me connect with Ouspenky's theoretical discussion of the various substances that we take into our bodies, air being one, and an actual practice of the same. I also liked connecting head, spine, solar plexus and other body parts with the breath. I will try to do this everyday.

---

by Chuck

Thanks very much, Ian, for giving us this exercise and posting the Gurdjieff quotes relating to it.

This was great for me, as "I AM" seems one of the fundamental exercises G. recommended, and so has become my fundamental one. G. mentions that repetition is important, and not to look for results, that we should just do the exercise.

The "imagination" technique seems applicable in other areas as well - for example, it seems that the technique is used in the "Imagine that you are a conscious being..." exercise of 7/23/07.

My experience in doing the "I AM" exercise is that it often leads to to an increased awareness of the present. I've found that the duration of this can be extended by the counting technique as discussed in the Discussion Forum. This exercise produces a definite feeling in the solar plexus, although it may just be awareness of the muscles there. An any rate, I'm not looking for results, just doing the exercise!

This information is new to me, and I'm excited to give it a try:

> I take the word 'corresponding', to mean, with successive breaths, the Head, the Spine, the Solar Plexus, the Sex Centre and the Whole Body.

Regards, Chuck

Work Program week beginning 31 March 2008

---

by Harry

Gurdjieff tells us that one of the first things we must do is "pay for our arising".

Ouspensky gives us an exercise to try to trace back any object to its origins, how it was made where the raw materials came from, how they were shaped. Be it an ashtray or something else.

But our arising in the Work is something we don't often trace back.

How did we come to the Work? Trace back your influences. How was your soil tilled before you came to the Work? Who was behind the plow? What allowed the seeds to grow in your soil as opposed to your sibling, or your neighbor or your classmate?

Post your reflections here for others to share.

---

by Harry

I've spent some time doing this lately. Here are some reflections.
I was raised Roman Catholic. There is mystery and miraculous there. But most importantly, there is an education that focuses on something more than utility. Transubstation and prayers before meals. Saints that were almost frightening. Confession as it has degenerated.

My Mother insisted I read. A novel a week, at least. This created a taste for something beyond the ordinary.

My stepfather taught me to take care of ordinary life. To do what has to be done. And not to shirk those duties.

I went to a Liberal Arts College, when there actually was such a thing. We were required to have a minor in Philosphy as well as 12 upper level hours in Theology. Not that I cared for it at the time. But the training was crucial.

I had two instructors there, a husband and wife, amazingly. She introduced me to e. e. cummings when I was a Freshman. cummings certainly had a vision beyond the ordinary. Sleep and undead are not that far apart. And one must work to understand cummings. He taught Modern American novel. A book a week. And I believe in each one there was a Christ symbol. So I had to learn a different language, the language of symbols. He also started an on campus Film Society that showed films that went beyond "movies".

Finally there were two book stores. One, the owner would be hanging around at opening and we'd chat. He introduced me to many pieces of great literature. The other was a "child of the 60s". A couple took over the basement of an old fashioned book store. There they sold Rolling Stone, the LA Free Press and PD Ouspensky.

This last was probably a part of one of the periods of automatic development that G describes. From the late 60s through the early 70s there was this type of development all around us. Music--Dylan, Cohen, Airplane, Beatles, Stones, Dead, films from people like Antonioni, Fellini, and Bergman. Ionesco, Pinter, etc. in Theatre.

---

by Dean

My earliest influences were transmitted to me by my parents, who brought me up in a natural setting with somewhat normal virtues. My father was, and still is quite heavily into outdoor hobbies, we always had pets and I grew up in an environment that was wholesome and quite pure. We would go on hikes in the woods behind our house and have picnics, and my brother and sister and I would explore the various landscapes that dominated our perception. At one time when I was still young we had a wide variety of pets that included cows, goats, pigs, chickens, cats, a dog, and pigeons. We even brought our goats on hikes with us who would follow us in a line and graze in the wilderness, which gave a nice pastoral impression. My parents didn't spoiled us and I was never infected with the disease of worshipping money over other more important things in life.

My family was only religious when I was very young, but as time drew on my parents rejected religion altogether, and I was an atheist who only believed in evolution up until I found the work when I was 19, and then I soon realized that science doesn't necessarily oppose religion, it just depends on whether a person's perception is limited.

I was always interested in martial arts as a kid, and watched Bruce Lee movies and had a desire to be extremely disciplined even when I was quite young. When I was in my early teens I got heavily into music, first into hard rock and heavy metal bands like Black Sabbath, Metallica, and Led Zeppelin, and later I was influenced more by classic rock music which included a lot of bands from the 60's like The Beatles, The Doors, Jimi Hendrix, Syd Barrett, Pink Floyd, and Bob Dylan. This phase promted me to get into poetry and philosophy especially since by this time I was in high school and was searching for alternative influences.

Poetry in the form of music attracted me, and I liked the Beatnik style of stream of consciousness writing, which I suppose started with Dylan, and ran down the line to influence the rest of that era. I got interested in Jim Morrison's poetry which was in the same vain, and was also a bit shocking and anti-establishment. I had heard that he was influenced by Blake, Rimbaud, and Nietzsche and began investigating the older poets and philosophers. This lead to me to begin reading existential philosophers such as Sartre, Camus, Dostoevsky, and especially Nietzsche. I was quite heavily into existentialism and the idea that life is unreal, and also Nietzche's concepts of the Superman and The Will to Power, as well as master morality and slave morality. This was a period when I felt a bit disolusioned, since I was going to public school and had a hard time relating to my peer's conformist ideals, and the whole social hierarchy. After I graduated I basically just began re-educating myself and found Gurdjieff's teaching in a book called The Outsider by Collin Wilson. I began researching it on the internet and realized after a few weeks of doing exercises that this was what I was looking for, and then made G my primary source of knowledge from then on.

This was a really good exercise, I liked looking at things in retrospect and feel that I've gone a long way from where I first started.

Regards

---

by Judy

I've been considering this week's most interesting question since it was posted.

Seeds which may have led to the Work were there in my childhood. For example, I spent time from an early age with an uncle who was a devotee of Krishnamurti's. I had what would be described as a "classical" childhood - being brought up to read prolifically and being exposed to opera and classical music from as early as memory. I was brought up to be independent and enjoyed a good first education, which included studies in pharmacy and classical music for many years. It was a busy and privileged time. Then I married and had children. This brought all the daily activities involved in becoming a good householder. So this takes us up to the late seventies, when I discovered the teachings of Gurdjieff. There was no looking back really. Gurdjieff's system had a sudden, joyous and immense effect.

The eighties brought more studies, this time in different areas such as the natural therapies and classical guitar. I was attracted to courses run by serious seekers of truth and one of these became a mentor. The pharmaceutical career also expanded.
In the nineties, I had still failed to appease the inner yearning despite every life advantage and dissatisfaction set in in earnest, with the children grown and a divorce in the recent past. The divorce was largely connected with my putting God before husband and insisting on a continuing search for meaning. There was much pain and suffering in that decade, as parents and godparents passed away, amongst other life-sadnesses including a serious accident. By the turn of the century I was really ready to work seriously. It wasn't considered a way to avoid suffering, but rather to make sense of it and use it. Gurdjieff's work of intentional suffering has provided a path to bearable acceptance of life's sufferings and often transforms them into growth. This is just one of the many blessings of his work.

Many authors in addition to Gurdjieff, Ouspensky and Nicoll being paramount, have been invaluable in reviving "wish" during those dry spells which inevitably occur. Prayer and meditation play an important role there too.

So although external influences were present, they were not primary. More accurate is it to say that, from childhood, then more especially around my early thirties, there was a clear recognition of a lack of some kind. I had always been intrigued by the big questions: Who am I? Where have I come from and where am I going to? It was time to go deeper and the teachings of Gurdjieff were what made the most sense. There were also early "tastes" in experiences from work attempts. These gave assurance that I indeed do not know myself and live in only a small part of myself, most of the time comparatively asleep to the real possibilities.

This inner hunger is much more what has led to the arising of the Work in me. And the same inner drive keeps it going.

I could say much about external influences, but the more I ponder, the more it seems possible that the ones I single out could be more illusions or dreams mixed-up somehow with reality. I just don't know which ones were truly important. Deeper reflection brought to the surface the memories of my father's strong work ethic and insistence that I must always support myself. This seems a valid influence.

Anyway, thanks Harry for the opportunity to write these somewhat vague thoughts on paper, thus organising and clarifying them a little. It has allowed me to observe considerable inner friction as I struggle to sort between realities and imagination.

Best wishes,

---

by Harry

Dean, I'd be interested if you went back to Rimbaud now to hear your insights.
Judy, Krishnamurti was someone else that I glossed over. Somehow got to him through Jung. All of those books came from that basement bookstore I talked about.
And it is difficult to maintain a relationship with someone who isn't on the same path or a similar one. I saw it myself and I saw it with my son, as well. Eventually paths diverge. But someone said they all lead back to Rome, eventually, as well.

---

by Lawrick

This is an interesting question, reviewing the past for current influences.
Is there an ideal Work profile?

I was born in a small Canadian mountain coal mining town (now a ghost town and Canadian Heritage site) which was effectively isolated from the world because of the terrain. For years, the only way in and out was by rail and afterwards the town remained guarded by a single lane mud road hopelessly winding its way through the mountains. My first influence was a sense of separation. Childish wonder. Mountain beauty.

My father was a typically hard working miner who came to this country when 7 years old and started working the mines when he turned 15. His mining carrer kept him out of the war.. He brought with him many Scots-English values with respect to work and a "man's" place in the value system. He was also a mountain guide who was physically powerful and physically fearless. From him I learned the zilnotrago of fear and that respect is something earned. My father was terrified of emotional situations. Eschewing all religious values, nevertheless he still asked for a priest before he died.

My mother might qualify as one of Mr. G's obyvatals. She was the daughter of wealthy Russian peasants forced to immigrate because of the war. She was brilliant, creative, industrious. My mother did almost everything better than others. Gardems blossomed under her care. She took care of the house, pickled fish, jerked beef, sewed all our clothes, and sewed the most beautiful intricate pictures free hand. From her I learned to love classical music and the idea of learning itself.
She was left handed,in Russia, a sign of the Devil, so whenever her left hand was used, say for writing, the hand was smashed with a stick. Imagine! She later developed a nerve disease in her left hand called Dupytrens which was later passed genetically to her children. When I was 13 my mother tapped me in the middle of my forehead and said I had a gift and never explained herself to me. I still have no idea what she meant. From my mother although much later, I learned the value of sacrifice.

Although we had little access to libraries or other learning facilities, and in spite of our relative poverty, my parents sacrificed for the best set of Encyclopaedias money could buy, and this became the source of my early education. No computer could have given me more. I can never thank them enough for that gift.

My father drank too much, fought too much, and argued too much. Yet outwardly he maintained the pretence that all was well and perfect in his domain. Madness! Along with a charismatic, creative uncle who went on to own a professional hockey team and who was a genuine psychopath and pedophile who died of aids, I had my first perceptions of the effects of Mr. Kundabuffer. A world of unreality, the influence of false appearances.

My early and late teen years were spent in a state of hopeless rebelliousness the why of which completely escaped me. It was enough to know something was amiss without taking any steps towards redemption. A true rebel without either clue or cause. Mired in the competion of sport and the drink and wenching of my peers, I was a perfect candidate for future Hasnamuss. Such was the inertia I needed to overcome later in life. I still have not.

When I was around 20, a father, and married, I picked up a book called "The Stoned Apocalypse". In this book the writer in his zeal to bed a "graceful, poised" woman from the "New York Gurdjieff Ouspensky Foundation", agreed to read BT as the first condition of obtaining a date and possibly getting "lucky". The rest as they say, "was history". Left behind was the woman, New York, and his career, in a rambling drug induced tour of America which ended in the book, "One Flew Over the Cookoo's Nest".

Why this tiny blurb in some insignificant book made such an impact on my psyche I have no idea. How could this happen? But I knew I had stumbled accross a great truth. I do know everything changed after ordering and reading BT. Gone were the junk novels and serials, replaced by anything else Gurdjieffian as well as ideas dealing with Spirituality, Psychology, History, Ancient Religions, Metaphysics and so on. The learning truly began.

Also left behind were the drugs and alcohol. Frankly my friends thought I had gone quite mad. In fact, just the opposite was occuring but at the time I wasn't sure.

I have tried to dismiss the influence of the Work more than once but it is now too late. Last week I mentioned to a friend that not for all of Trump's money, Pitt's good looks, nor all the power in the world would I trade the insights I have gained into this deeper reality. What does this really mean?

I reckon that I really don't fit the typical Work profile.

Yes, looking back is an excellent exercise. I feel a little closer to the Workmates who have posted their biographies. I hope others will also take the time to do so as well.

Thanks to all,

Lawrick

---

by Harry

If we follow O's ash tray example, there can be another level of this. Those who came before us and allowed the publication of such works as G's and O's. James Joyce. Thomas Jefferson.

Plus the advent of education for the masses. How many of us are "ruling class". At one time they would be the only allowed to read.

Who prompted these changes? Who planted these seeds.

Of course there is a difference between ordinary and extra ordinary. But is that pyramid with the all seeing eye on US money just by accident? Did those who came to Australia evolve accidentally?

Would we be anywhere without Judas?

---

by Chuck

We moved a lot when I was a child, but besides being shy and always being the new kid, I mostly had a carefree youth. I was brought up going to church in a Christian home; my mother was the driving religious force, and although my father didn't go, he didn't object. I went along to church, but didn't really believe. While in my 20's, I read many psychology and self-help books and practiced several martial arts. This was probably the seed of my interest in the Work ("magnetic center"), and I gradually became interested in the esoteric.

I chanced upon Ouspensky's In Search of the Miraculous, and that changed everything. It made so much sense, and sounded so right. I read all of his books, and all related books I could find, but then lost the thread for a while.

As some may know, there is a Gurdjieff/Ouspensky group that puts bookmarks in Work books in bookstores to advertise their group. I happened upon one of these and contacted the local group. I ended up joining and attending meetings. Although this group is the subject of criticism, I will say that the students I worked with were sincere and knowledgeable. After a couple of years in the group, my father became terminally ill with cancer and I had to move back to my parent's house and help take care of him. This and some pending issues with the group resulted in my leaving the group.

Now it's a couple of decades later, and I've wandered back to some semblance of Work. Although I can't envision it, I know the law of octaves will cause my diversion out of the Work again unless a properly-timed shock keeps the path straight. I guess that's what the second and third lines of work are for, to deliver those shocks.

In answer to the question of why did I end up in the Work and not my siblings, neighbor or classmates - if I had to attribute it to anything besides luck, I'd have to say that amongst all the usual confusion, ego and baggage that we all have to deal with, I do somehow have a feeling and yearning for what's real.

I appreciate the usefulness of this question, and everyone's detailed and introspective replies - thanks Harry and all of you for that.

Regards, Chuck

---

by Cassandra

There have been many people who’ve influenced me greatly over the years. Probably some of whom I wouldn’t immediately say had much to do with my inner growth but in fact did show me things about myself. I grew up in a conservative church and believed very much in the teachings. My mother had a big impact on my religious upbringing, and I appreciate her for that. She brought to my attention morals and responsibility. At age 13 I remember praying, asking for a closer relationship with God, then it occurred to me that the baptism I’d received wasn’t sincere enough. I felt something more genuine was required for real spiritual growth, but I was too fearful to admit to my anxieties. I spent years, really, until I went off to college worried that I wasn’t a real Christian because of my cowardice. What I remember most about this time was that I tried to cover up my fears with lots of distractions. This continued until I realized around age 23 that I didn’t need another baptism. I didn’t believe so much anymore that conservative Christianity was the way to God.
I owe a lot to the 12-step group Al-Anon as well. This is where the much broader concept of Higher Power and ‘working’ a spiritual program was introduced to me. There are many similarities between the Work and the ideas conveyed in 12-step programs. I realized the necessity of both active and passive roles in spiritual development. Meditation, yoga, Jack Kerouac, Langston Hughes, A Course in Miracles, smatterings from Bhuddism, eastern meditation, foreign travel, all imparted something in the way of higher consciousness. In the meantime, I noticed Beelzubub's Tales and other G. books at my then boyfriend's (later husband's) apartment. I asked questions, and he gave cautious but intriguing answers. A number of years passed, and I came across Eckhard Tolle. Read a review of the Power of Now in which someone commented that Tolle's ideas were largely from Gurdjieff. Being somewhat familiar with the titles of some of the books, I asked my husband about them, and he presented me with BT and In Search Of. I found a practicing group in Atlanta (about 60 miles away) and tried to have more or less regular contact with them. This didn't work too well. As it happens, I found the online group last summer.

---

by Karen

Ever since I can remember most things externally seemed off. As a child, the adults, for the most part had strange opinions and views about everything with weak retort when questioned or challenged.

In time, defenseless, I stopped asking so many questions and learned to adapt in this seemingly absurd society by playing along, single file. Collecting habits, mirroring behaviors and forgetting myself, layer upon layer, year after year became commonplace.

I had a great childhood filled with laughter, friends and family. Most days were spent outdoors, riding bike, building forts in the treed areas of the neighborhood and playing medicine woman.

I spent my adolescent years analyzing, criticizing and judging myself in the dense jungle of peer pressure and the world of trying to fit in, wanting very much to comprehend why things happened the way they did and what caused me to act certain ways. Of course, the hysterical ladies had been busy behind the scenes rehearsing for their big debut. Those ladies topped the charts with their music and managed to stay on top with the same old songs. Attempts to channel the burst of hormonal chaos included reading, music, writing poetry, playing the piano, sketching and painting. Went to a high school that specialized in the arts and finally felt at home socially, but something was still missing!

Accepted to an arts college right out of high school I graduated with a diploma in computer graphics and digital media. Soon after, I found myself in the land of suits!

From the late 90's to January 07 I was deep in the desert thirsting for water, and starving for food. Thus far, I'd recognized reoccurring patterns in my live and began to think running away would just make it harder because the same situation seemed to repeat itself until confronted. Easier said than done.

Most of my searching was external and the inward search was definitely not done impartially. I traveled, read a lot of poetry and books, did yoga, karate, chi gong and looked to material goods to fix the inner hunger. All I ever came across were temporary calm spots, sand storms and mirages. Things were really beginning to stink. I had become a very negative, unhappy person, desperate and knew there was more to the story than what lay on the surface. I was deeply confused, with a very strong desire to find the truth of who I really was and what purpose I served in this earth game.

A strong urge came over me, to go buy a loaf of wholesome ancient grain bread from a café I hadn't been to in over 6 years. I went out of my way to go there that day. In the far corner of that café sat a familiar face I had not seen in over a decade. Something clicked immediately and a part hidden very deep within was excited I had ran into my uncle, a teaching and a work group. How rare and beautiful to have all three enter into my life at the same time, at such a young age and at the opportune moment. Conditions to study were optimum. Book after book, (In search of, the fourth way, all and everything, meetings, herald of coming good, our life with Mr. G...) 2007 was the year of dedicated study, of letting go, releasing, overcoming, shedding and dying. An education like no other I had ever come across. The fall of 2007 scared me. Something was coming very close to dying and I became afraid and started future-wisacring. Whatever it was it was strong and didn't want to die or I wasn't ready. 2007 was the most aware I had ever been, with dreams and symbols flashing in my minds eye and heightened psychic capabilities. The cycle was at its peak.

2008 I find myself immersed back into life full force, only this time with the method of the sly man. Nobody said it would be easy or even rewarding, but something says I have found a true teaching. I wish for the strength and disciple to do the exercises now that the honeymoon is over.

---

by Ian

> Harry wrote:
> Eventually paths diverge. But someone said they all lead back to Rome, eventually, as well.

I thought it was all roads lead to Philadelphia? Whatever. I suppose all roads lead 'somewhere'

---

by Ian

> Harry wrote:
> Plus the advent of education for the masses. How many of us are "ruling class". At one time they would be the only allowed to read.
>
> Would we be anywhere without Judas?

Well, I think education for the masses can be traced back to Gutenberg. But that is an interesting story that people can research on their own.

The Judas story has its roots in Gnostic heresies.

---

by Ian

> Cassandra wrote:
> There have been many people who've influenced me greatly over the years. ..... I found a practicing group in Atlanta (about 60 miles away) and tried to have more or less regular contact with them. This didn't work too well. As it happens, I found the online group last summer.

If you don't mind me asking, was it the distance from the Atlanta group or the just the 'substance' of the group that didn't work?
Also, how has the online group differed from the Atlanta group?

---

by Ian

> Chuck wrote:
> As some may know, there is a Gurdjieff/Ouspensky group that puts bookmarks in Work books in bookstores to advertise their group. I happened upon one of these and contacted the local group. I ended up joining and attending meetings.
> Although this group is the subject of criticism, I will say that the students I worked with were sincere and knowledgeable.

I know several people whom I respect very much who managed to come out of that line of work.

---

by Ian

I must say I am quite overwhelmed by everyones candid posts about their past history in this thread. Everyone has a truly amazing story to tell. I seem to recall that there is an exercise where people are asked to write their biographies. Everyone seems to have made a good start here. I guess I will have to add mine to the mix...

by Ian

One of my earlieat memories is of looking up at the wide expansive panorama of the sky and wondering how all that can be seen in my little head.

I grew up in a small town with fields all around. I spent a lot of time in contact with nature, something which continues to this day. My father was a baptist minister and his wife was the church organist and choir director, which was small compensation for the career she could have made for herself had she not married. I was adopted as were my 2 brothers. I early became interested in art and all things electrical. I still sport a scar on my right hand from investigating the intricies of a running vacuum cleaner. I much preferred the solitary solice of a walk in the woods to the agressive games of football and baseball and hockey that my peers preferred. Although I did once gain the distinction of making the championship save as the goalie of our local hockey team.

My parents roots were Scottish and English. I spent many a summer bailing hay and shooting groundhogs. Throughout my early life I came in contact with many religious oriented people from different cultural and ethnic backgrounds. Some of them were a great inspiration to me. In spite of my strong religious upbringing, I was never able to fully embrace the simple faith in Jesus that my parents believed in.

My teenage years were spent building all kinds of electrical devices. I taught myself piano and guitar and was in a band for a while. When I turned 16, I bought a motorcycle and converted it into the first Chopper in town. This made me the brunt of many jealous youths and I quickly learned to defend myself. Also during my teenage years, I worked part time in a local hardware store, eventually becoming manager of the paint department. I also spent a lot of time at the local billiards parlour.

I failed twice in high school and had to repeat 2 years even though I was in the A class with all the high IQ kids. On the up side of it, I got to take all the Shop classes which greatly expanded my knowledge electro-mechanical things. I read tons of science fiction. During all this time, for some unexplained reason, I had a quote of William Blake over my desk - "To see a world in a grain of sand, a heaven in a wild flower, hold infinity in the palm of your hand, and eternity in an hour."

I went to college and got a Certificate as an Electronic Technician, something that was to bear me in good stead for the next 30 years.
At college I met a lady who was studying to be a teacher and that led me into studies of alternate forms of education. It was during this time that I also became aware of altered states of consciousness, culminating in an experience of cosmic consciousness, which changed my life forever. This experience drove me even farther from any acceptance of the faith in Christianity that my parents held. This led to an intensive search for methods of recapturing the experience. Then, someone turned me on to Gurdjieff and I have never looked back, unless to compare and contrast. Of course today there are many more paths available, and the Gurdjieff Work must be seen as one amongst many viable alternatives.

I then entered a period of intense artistic endeavour, trying to express my experiences, culminating in showing at several art shows. This came to nothing. My art was ignored. I realized that art is for the artist, not the viewer. I abandoned art. I then moved from my small town to the big city, Toronto, and got a job as an electronic technician. But I hadn't sold out.

I eventually hooked up with a Gurdjieff group for several years. That led to a years stint in England with Tony Blake, a protégé of Mr Bennett, and then back to Canada to meet up with Paul Beidler through the connections with my first group. I Worked with Paul for 18 years, travelling to Pennsylvania 4 times a year for Work Weekends, plus going to meetimgs in Toronto twice a week.

Paul died in late 1998. I ran a group in Toronto for about 2 years, then I came down with Rheumatoid Arthritis and had to take a year off work. As that was clearing up through proper medication, I met, quite unexpectedly, my future wife on an online esoteric forum on the internet. One thing led to another and we got married and I moved to England in December 2001. In 2004 I started this online group and attended the 9th All & Everything Conference. The main thrust of my work is now devoted to openly sharing my experiences with Paul Beidler with my online group and to promoting the All & Everything Conference as a forum where all lineages of the Work can openly share their ideas.

Work Program week beginning 7 April 2008

---

by Ian

Morning three-centered Pondering: What traits might characterize a Compassionate Person?

April Idiots Role: Spring is the time of year when our 'sap' starts to flow. Use some of this energy to sense your left ear while acting out a conscious Idiotic Role, such as exaggerating the unbecoming Traits that you observe in others. Transform the results of the Idiodic Role by chanting 3 times: It is nothing; I wish to be.

Compose a new audibly chanted prayer to be offered out loud in a three-centered and 10-boned state every mid-day, with an emphasis on Inner Help for transforming ones most persistent denying force.

Evening three-centered Pondering:: What Traits do I criticize in others that on close Observation I find in myself?

---

by Harry

Interestingly, while this week's idiot's exercise came to mind on numerous occassions, and while the chant is certainly easy to remember, I couldn't remember the chant.

Of course one of the times this happens is when I'm in the classroom. And I really can't chant outloud at those times. But my ear was burning.

---

by Dean

> What traits might characterize a Compassionate Person?

While pondering this question in a three centered state I thought that some traits that might characterize a compassionate person are empathy, external considering, and forgiveness. Caring about things and being somewhat sensitive to others beings, and also considering people and being conscientious to a certain degree. Considering how a person feels and also putting yourself in their shoes, and realizing that they were created in a lawful way and can't help their situation. Forgiveness on a certain level seems like it would be a form of compassion. Also not being selfish and seeing beyond the things that keep people separated and divided.

I played the role of someone who was hyper and buzzy when there was no need to be, so I talked fast and moved fast and observed myself and tried to provoke this feeling. Trying to hold my attention on my left ear was difficult at first because it's a pretty specific area, but I got used to it and could sense it quite clearly after awhile. I thought of hyperbole and exaggerating certain qualities I thought would create this impression, and tried to detach myself a bit. The fact that I was playing an idiots role seemed to make me more aware of the fact that I was only playing a role and made my aim more distinct and I was able to be a little more unidentified. I also forgot the chant while doing this exercise, I had my attention elsewhere and completely forgot about it, although I could have used at times. This was a good exercise, I felt I gained something from it and could see things from a new viewpoint that was different than usual.

> Evening three-centered Pondering:: What Traits do I criticize in others that on close Observation I find in myself?

Some traits I found criticizing were laziness, pride, and just egoism in general. These are things that I have observed in myself on countless occasions, and could not say that I was free from the influence of any one of these unbecoming traits. I felt somewhat hypocritical after observing these contradictions and thought of my own downfalls and how I could focus on these more in the future.

Work Program week beginning 14 April 2008

by Judy

A personal note:
Our April/May/June program looks at “Compassion”. This week's program is a guided Meditation on The Divine Compassion, from Dr. Bert Sharp, in his book, My End Is My Beginning.

Ideally this would be listened to as a recording. For this week, though, we may choose to read it through several times before meditating, or to take one or two of these profound ideas and allow them to develop over a ten to fifteen minute morning sitting. May I also remind that it is recommended to sense the body, and for the eyes to remain open during the meditation.

Meditation on the Divine Compassion

Sit in your usual meditation position and relax. Observe your breathing. As you become aware of the thoughts of the day intruding, turn back simply to watching your breathing. Your body is breathing for you. When settled in this way, begin the meditation.

Become conscious of the existence of the cells which form your planetary body; become conscious of how they freely consented to differentiate in order to go beyond themselves, their individuality, and become specialist cells, part of a particular organ of your body. Did they do this consciously or mechanically?

Go further and become conscious of how these individual organs have given up their individuality in order to relate to one another and so form the complex interactive assembly which is your planetary body. Remember that it is only because of such sacrifices on the part of the cells, the tissues formed from the cells and the organs formed from the tissues, that it has been possible for you to inhabit the body which you consider as your own.

Then go further and become conscious of you, the far in you, observing all this, you and your body, your body the result of the sacrifice of all these millions of individual cells. Then begin to realise that you have a responsibility for your body, for its organs, for each of its individual cells. For providing them with all their natural essential requirements. Observe this profound thought. Meditate upon it.

At this point you may experience a Divine Compassion coming with the feeling of responsibility, of compassion for all the living cells which make up your planetary body. Are you also able to sacrifice your individuality in order to become no longer a human being but an infinitely small cell in the totality of Humanity?

Hold as long as possible this feeling of the Divine Compassion flowing through you. What is it that is aware of it? Real I? Be aware of the very small, the very low, and at the same time of the very large, the very high, and that you, Real I, is the intermediate between the two, the whole assembly forming the Eternal Totality.

If you want more, then consider the following ‘either or’ of formatory thinking:
Is it that the “irresponsible” human fears God and so in the ultimate expects help and forgiveness from Him?

Or by contrast, does the “responsible” human know that he or she cannot know God who therefore may or may not exist, and as a result has to accept that it is all up to him or her, that he or she is responsible for the future of humanity and so must act in the interests of humanity and not of himself or herself? So to be a “responsible” human brings one face to face with the terror of the situation. That one is simply a tool for the use of the Divine. A tool that is not yet in proper order for its use and so must be worked upon by YOU so as to become in better order and so of more use to the Divine.

---

by Dean

This meditation has a truly humbling affect, as well as making one feel a bit fragile, although at the same time it also seemed to have an empowering affect by bringing in fresh conscious energy. Other sensations are hard to put into words, but in regards to having a responsibility for my body, my organs, and cells, this seemed to hit home and strike a true feeling of conscience as far as my inner world was concerned. Being aware of the very small, very low, and also the very large, and very high, while trying to maintain awareness of my Real I was quite difficult, but I sensed myself as a microbe within the macrocosmo to a degree that made me feel free of my false I, so I felt that I had succeeded at least a little bit in trying to make this contact.

> Is it that the “irresponsible” human fears God and so in the ultimate expects help and forgiveness from Him?

This question gave me some new thoughts that I hadn't considered before, I do believe people fear God because they fear the unknown, and the unknown is unfortunately their own being. I think that people automatically expect help and forgiveness because somewhere deep inside them they know they are weak in the eyes of the infinite.

Regards

Work Program week beginning 21 April 2008

---

by Ian

Morning Exercise: Use the I AM exercise that was indicated in the Program of 24 March 2008.

Daily Exercise: Inner considering and its companions Identification, Self-justification and Self-importance are behaviors that waste our vital energies. Could any benefit be gained for ourself and others if we took in our Impressions Objectively rather than Subjectively? That is, should our response to external events be weighed in respect of the needs of others (external considering) rather than in terms of our own self-importance, or our own "positive-public-profile"?

When any of these unbecoming Traits are manifested in daily life, the Seeker may evoke a feeling of Remorse and Sense the resulting reverberations in the torso while repeating silently "I Am". In the aftermath, Ponder: Do I have any "right" to judge the needs of others required for the construction and implimentation of their own spiritual life?

Evening Pondering: Is the realization of our Nothingness the basis of Real "I"?
Is Real "I" in quotation marks as illusory as being a "real man" in quotation marks?

---

by Harry

Interesting. I worked with this exact concept over the weekend before it was posted. That "postive-public-profile" has a big impact at times. One of the things I find is my mouth saying what is on my "mind", in quotation marks. Especially in the classroom.

There is remorse to this on a normal basis. This is my remorse. Were someone to challenge me on it, I probably wouldn't be remorseful. But when I find this palpable pain, I've also learned that this is energy that I can work with.

The I AM Now breathing is one way. I also use the 12 bones at the same time. To transform the energy. To use the energy rather than let it decompose into something else.

This is not an immediate thing, ever. Time and work come together. Transformation isn't an instant development.

---

by Cassandra

> Harry wrote:
> The I AM Now breathing is one way. I also use the 12 bones at the same time. To > transform the energy. To use the energy rather than let it decompose into something else.

Harry, can you be more specific on how you use the 12 bone with the I AM? Thanks

---

by Judy

Harry,

How interesting. Whilst not working specifically with the exact concept of "positive-public-profile", but rather with the remorse from my negativities, identifications in general, for the past few weeks I too have been working with breath/Holy Equation Prayer combined with the 10 bone exercise. Sometimes I use the "I Am" instead of the prayer. I began doing this chiefly during the morning sitting, but it has expanded to other parts of the day. There is something wonderfully emotional about working with the illuminated bones. It evokes a good quality work attitude somehow and makes any combined activities (such as some self-observation attempts) deeper. And I cannot do the bones exercises without being aware of the immanent mortality of the body and most of its emotions and thoughts. Identify at my peril.

I have had some experiences which needed checking out with a more experienced Gurdjieffan to make sure I wasn't "mixing things up" and keeping it an acceptable Gurdjieff practice. However, with a couple of simple cautions to be aware of (such as eyes open), it fits comfortably into my daily inner life. This road to taking responsibility for my own inner life moves along one step at a time. It is perhaps a road less travelled, and a long one at that. But what else makes more sense?

Regards,

---

by Karen

> When any of these unbecoming Traits are manifested in daily life, the Seeker may evoke a feeling of Remorse and Sense the resulting reverberations in the torso while repeating silently "I Am". In the aftermath, Ponder: Do I have any "right" to judge the needs of others required for the construction and implementation of their own spiritual life?

This ponder gave way to 'occasional' flashes of insight into Chapter 10 of B's Tales, "Why "Men" are Not Men" The word from the above ponder that strikes me as significant is required for the construction and implementation of their own spiritual life?

A something led me to read the following chapter from "Sufis: The People of the Path, Vol 1"

Chapter 13. Judge ye not

23 august 1977 am in Buddha Hall

Hasan of Basra relates:

’I had convinced myself that I was a man of humility and less than humble in my thoughts and conduct to others.

’Then one day I was standing on the bank of the river when I saw a man sitting there. Beside him was a woman and before them was a wine-flask.

’I thought,"if only I could reform this man and make him like I am instead of the degenerate creature which he is."’

’At that moment I saw a boat in the river beginning to sink. The other man at once threw himself into the water where seven people were struggling, and brought six of them safely to the bank.

’Then the man came up to me and said, ”Hasan, if you are a better man than me, in the name of God save that other man, the last remaining one.”

’I found that I could not even save one man, and he was drowned.

’Now this man said to me,” this woman here is my mother. This wine-flask has only water in it. This is how you judge, and this is what you are like.”

’I threw myself at his feet and cried out,” as you have saved six out of these seven in peril, save me from drowning in pride disguised as merit!”

’The stranger said,” I pray that God may fulfill your aim."’

JESUS says, ’Judge ye not.’ His statement is absolute, with no qualifications. It is categorical.

He does not say, ’Don’t judge wrongly,’ he simply says, ’Judge ye not.’ Don’t judge at all. He makes no distinction between right judgement and wrong judgement. His statement declares that all judgement is wrong. Judgement as such is wrong.

This is a tremendously powerful statement – and the same is the attitude of Sufism about life. A real man of God has no judgement. He can’t judge. It is impossible for him to judge.

Firstly, to judge you need to be an egoist. The ego is a must. Judgement is possible only if you are standing egocentrically.

If you have no ego left, who is going to judge?
And how? And in comparison to what?

The real man of God exists as a nothing. He is emptiness – what Buddha calls SHOONYATA. He is non-being. Inside, in him, there is no one except God. He is one with the all. He cannot make a distinction of 'I' and 'thou'.

He cannot stand against the 'thou' in any way. Because there is no 'I' left, there cannot be any 'thou'. He is one with all. With a thief he is a thief; with a saint he is a saint. He cannot stand against, he cannot even stand for – because to stand against or to stand for, you need an ego. That is a basic requirement. He cannot judge because he is not.

When Jesus says, 'Judge ye not' he is saying, 'please, disappear.' The judgement won't allow your ego to disappear, it will keep feeding it, will keep strengthening it. So those who judge become very, very egoistic. They are not the religious people, not the people of the path.

The second thing: to judge, you need criteria, rules, paradigms. Rules come from the past, rules come from history – and life always go on transcending history. History is where it once was, but it is no longer there. So all rule are inadequate. They belong to the dead past, they have nothing to say about the alive present.

Like Hasan, I too pray that God may fulfill my aim. May true remorse of conscience knock at my door and may the golden shield of the Work, through intentional suffering (tunneling my way out by confronting the truth in myself) and by conscious labours, offer an escape from this moon slavery

What a bitter sweet symphony.

---

by Harry

The 12 bones is described somewhere in here. It doesn't use I AM, I wish, I can; rather I use Holy Rejoicing, Holy Revolting, Holy Suffering, transubstantiate in me for my being. Amen.

Breathing. Flowing from right to left, down then up.

---

by Lawrick

Hey all,
I haven't posted on this forum for a while and for a number of reasons. Sometimes the Work,my life, and the resistance almost becomes unbearable. The Work can't be forced, and of late, that's what I've been doing. So I must step back, reload and remember that this Work is an acceptance, and must be approached with reverence and harmony.

So I',m back to doing the new exercise and redoing the old as my balance allows.

I almost always do the I Am experience in conjunction with breathing. The breathing seems to provide the fuel thats fills the bones. Adding a vibration to the sense of I Am almost seems to create a lingering depth to the body when I use it. It is quite powerful at times. Tangible.

The judgement exercise serves to remind me that I frequently judge manifestations as being the people themselves. So instead of saying, "that manifestation makes me feel something", it comes out as :He pisses me off, she is so ignorant, Jesus I dislike that person.

In times of lowered energy or when I'm not doing the exercises regularly I become very judgemental by way of not observing and stupidly slumbering.

So this exercise was a real wake up call coming at a very low point. It serves to remind me that I have been judging myself very negatively as well and must welcome the morning sun to reenergize my life again.

Good to be back,
Lawrick

---

by Lawrick

Hey all,
I haven't posted on this forum for a while and for a number of reasons. Sometimes the Work,my life, and the resistance almost becomes unbearable. The Work can't be forced, and of late, that's what I've been doing. So I must step back, reload and remember that this Work is an acceptance, and must be approached with reverence and harmony.

So I',m back to doing the new exercise and redoing the old as my balance allows.

I almost always do the I Am experience in conjunction with breathing. The breathing seems to provide the fuel thats fills the bones. Adding a vibration to the sense of I Am almost seems to create a lingering depth to the body when I use it. It is quite powerful at times. Tangible.

The judgement exercise serves to remind me that I frequently judge manifestations as being the people themselves. So instead of saying, "that manifestation makes me feel something", it comes out as :He pisses me off, she is so ignorant, Jesus I dislike that person.

In times of lowered energy or when I'm not doing the exercises regularly I become very judgemental by way of not observing and stupidly slumbering.

So this exercise was a real wake up call coming at a very low point. It serves to remind me that I have been judging myself very negatively as well and must welcome the morning sun to reenergize my life again.

Good to be back,
Lawrick

---

by Lawrick

Hey all,
I haven't posted on this forum for a while and for a number of reasons. Sometimes the Work,my life, and the resistance almost becomes unbearable. The Work can't be forced, and of late, that's what I've been doing. So I must step back, reload and remember that this Work is an acceptance, and must be approached with reverence and harmony.

So I',m back to doing the new exercise and redoing the old as my balance allows.

I almost always do the I Am experience in conjunction with breathing. The breathing seems to provide the fuel thats fills the bones. Adding a vibration to the sense of I Am almost seems to create a lingering depth to the body when I use it. It is quite powerful at times. Tangible.

The judgement exercise serves to remind me that I frequently judge manifestations as being the people themselves. So instead of saying, "that manifestation makes me feel something", it comes out as :He pisses me off, she is so ignorant, Jesus I dislike that person.

In times of lowered energy or when I'm not doing the exercises regularly I become very judgemental by way of not observing and stupidly slumbering.

So this exercise was a real wake up call coming at a very low point. It serves to remind me that I have been judging myself very negatively as well and must welcome the morning sun to reenergize my life again.

Good to be back,
Lawrick

---

by Dean

The I AM exercise was a good way to counterbalance those negative emotions that made their rounds and resurfaced if not observed. I found myself doing this on many occasions to reconcile denying forces that I caught, and it kept me on my toes to say the least. Evoking remorse in this way created momentum that was favorable as long as it was done somewhat regularly, which was usually the case if I was actually doing it sincerely. I found internal considering to be something that was sometimes a constant battle that occurred in many settings among different people. It opened my eyes to my own arrogance at times and my own self image that I would regularly try to preserve with my own subtle forms of pride and egoism.

I found that I probably wasn't completely ready to judge other's spiritual life, because I felt I fluctuated too much to be able to direct and guide someone in a conscious way. A part of me felt I was ready, but that was not necessarily an objective conclusion considering what I had observed in myself, and I felt it would be wise to be patient and wait until I had subdued certain unbecoming manifestations. This in itself brought about some remorse that I wasn't further along the way in order to better help my fellow man.

> Evening Pondering: Is the realization of our Nothingness the basis of Real "I"?
> Is Real "I" in quotation marks as illusory as being a "real man" in quotation marks?

I have felt on occasion this realization and whenever I have realized my nothingness I have always worked better than usual and have truly felt my "I" in a sustained way. It usually has occurred when I have suffered and came upon my own insignificance in relation to our Endlessness. I would have to say that this realization is the basis of Real "I" because we can then truly "die" and let go of ourselves to the extent required for renounciation. I wasn't sure about the second part of this question because I had always tied these two together in the past, but I would say that Real "I" in quotation marks is as illusory as being a "real man" in quotation marks and they are both connected, although I usually define being a real man as having will, while having Real "I" I usually connect with having a permanent sense of presence of our self. I really couldn't make the separation between the two, so my pondering was somewhat inconclusive.

Overall these efforts brought about some new ways of reconciling my weaknesses, as well as giving some stimulation to think along new pathways.

Regards

---

by Ian

> Judy wrote:
> I have had some experiences which needed checking out with a more experienced Gurdjieffan to make sure I wasn't "mixing things up" and keeping it an acceptable Gurdjieff practice. However, with a couple of simple cautions to be aware of (such as eyes open), it fits comfortably into my daily inner life. This road to taking responsibility for my own inner life moves along one step at a time. It is perhaps a road less travelled, and a long one at that. But what else makes more sense?
>
> Regards,

"This road to taking responsibility for my own inner life moves along one step at a time."

This is a road that we are all on. To the end....

We all have to get to a point where we take responsibility for our own inner life. And Teachers be damned! We are are own best Book.
But it sure helps along the way to have occaisional counsel with other fellow travellers...

My aim with these forums is to address both of those aspects.

Work Program week beginning 28 April 2008

by Judy

Choose a quiet place and allow twenty uninterrupted minutes at some time during the day.
Seat yourself in a meditative position – spine straight, eyes slightly open, facial muscles relaxed, body sensed.
Gently be aware of your breathing for several breaths and use this to collect into a calm, 3-centered state.
Observe yourself just sitting in this position. Say something like – "I am sitting here and something in me is seeing it."
Say the Holy Equation Prayer gently correlating with the breath, like this:

Breathe in. Breathe out while mentally saying “Holy Affirming”
Breathe in. Breathe out while mentally saying “Holy Denying”
Breathe in. Breathe out while mentally saying “Holy Reconciling”
Breathe in. Breathe out while mentally saying “Transubstantiate in me”
Breathe in. Breathe out while mentally saying “For my Being”

When this has become comfortable and effortless, we add the 10 bone illumination exercise to a double repetition of the above. Illuminate the bones by directing your attention into the marrow and visualizing a brilliant light emanating from the marrow of the each bone in turn:

Breathe in. Breathe out while mentally saying “Holy Affirming”, visualize illuminated lower right leg bones.
Breathe in. Breathe out while mentally saying “Holy Denying”, visualize illuminated upper right leg bones.
Breathe in. Breathe out while mentally saying “Holy Reconciling”, visualize illuminated pelvic bone.
Breathe in. Breathe out while mentally saying “Transubstantiate in me”, visualize illuminated upper left leg bone.
Breathe in. Breathe out while mentally saying “For my Being”, visualize illuminated lower left leg bones.

Breathe in. Breathe out while mentally saying “Holy Affirming”, visualize illuminated spine and skull.
Breathe in. Breathe out while mentally saying “Holy Denying”, visualize illuminated upper right arm bone.
Breathe in. Breathe out while mentally saying “Holy Reconciling”, visualize illuminated lower right arm bones.
Breathe in. Breathe out while mentally saying “Transubstantiate in me”, visualize illuminated upper left arm bone.
Breathe in. Breathe out while mentally saying “For my Being”, visualize illuminated lower left arm bones.

Repeat several times as comfortable. You are encouraged to experiment with this exercise. For example, the number of breaths for each step can be increased; the prayer may be intoned aloud; the breath may be directed into each bone in turn; attempt to sense the bones.

Conclude with a remembrance of those who have gone before.

The Seeker is encouraged to research what is presently known by the medical community about the structure and function of the bones and bone marrow.

---

by Lawrick

Hey all,

This exercise and its variations have always been a true resource for stopping the world and rendering a deep sense of being. This week I have used Judy's ideas along with others on site with increasingly stronger results.

My observations to date:

I have mixed the Holy Equation breathing with Mr. G's "special" vibration exercise which suggests we should sense a vibration in the solar plexus when we say the words "I Am". In attempting to create this vibration with the breath and then sending it to the head, spine, solar plexus, sex centre and the whole body it is my experience that this "vibration" has a sense of vivifying and creating an almost solid field around these body areas. Repeated vibrations seem to bring an increasing density as if I am creating another body , very strange, I wonder if others are having similar experiences.

The 10 bone illumination exercise was also quite effective but I struggled with creating a bright illumination in the bones. This used to be much easier at one time and I wonder if I have lost some precious focus. For example, I can create a rich blue color by invoking the Kahunas, I can see and sense it. But there's been less success with a bright illumination and admit to some disappointment as when the bones are illuminated there is an accompanying sense of lightness and joy.

Today combining several chants and after a period of time, (my coffee got cold), I found myself in a thick deep state of self remembering. Thick and deep because my body felt almost immobilized as if hypnotized. I could barely move and when I did move my hands, the movement was in slow motion presenting the opportunity to observe the gesture, the muscles, the movement, the hair on the hands, the scars and marks of my age. All this moving one hand from my lap to the table, It was very peaceful and surreal. I wonder if some exercises are a form of self hypnosis.

The rememberance of those who have gone before produces gratitude but also shame and remorse. Why is this?

Way to go Jude. Give yourself 5 stars for presenting a life keeper,

Be well,
Lawrick

Ps. I also did this while having my teeth cleaned at the dentist. Fastest least painful cleaning ever, Remarkable!

---

by Cassandra

I like this exercise because it makes me feel like I'm really getting at the heart of the work. I'm sure others are just as useful. Like during sittings, my thoughts wandered. Sometimes I had to struggle to get through one round of the affirmation without trailing off to something. Still, I felt sometimes filled with a subtle energy or power, maybe.

As for thinking of those who've gone before and bone marrow--I thought of my grandmother once, who chewed bones down to the marrow. When I was a small child, she would beckon me to her, and unknown to me, place chewed up bones in my hand. I was to put these in the trash. I don't think I enjoyed this too much. But for me this remembrance combined the 'gone before' reflection with bone marrow in a funny way.

---

by Cassandra

Fred,

Thanks for your very vivid posts. It gives me encouragement to keep at the I AM exercise and combine it with this one. Also, thanks to you Judy for providing the task.

Cassandra

---

by Lawrick

Cassandra,

Blessings on all who do this Work and share their experience. I approach the exercises, when I do them, with a sense of gratitude and humility in the sense that I cannot comprehend why I have been allowed to find this path. I expect no result nor reward. The prize is in the doing and sometimes "something" happens. Whatever it is, is good enough for now.
As jean Vaysse says, "the method cannot be forced". I think this is one of the keys.

Be well,
Lawrick

---

by Chuck

Hi All,

At this point in time I haven't been doing a daily sitting exercise. I realize it's vital to do, and this week's submission looks so good that I'm going to try and start with it for a daily sitting.

I did the exercise today and found it calming; also, the Holy Equation was remembered during the day several times, which prompted me to try and observe the workings of the Law of Three. I still need to work out some of the details, but am looking forward to tomorrow's sitting.

Concluding with a remembrance of those gone before is a profound ending, and an avenue that I'm just becoming aware of due to our reading of Hassein's encounter with it in Chapter 7 of BT.

Regards, Chuck

---

by Ian

> Lawrick wrote:
> Repeated vibrations seem to bring an increasing density as if I am creating another body , very strange, I wonder if others are having similar experiences.

Yes, I think that is the intent of this exercise. In fact all the exercises we do could be seen as promoting this result.

---

by Ian

> Lawrick wrote:
> The 10 bone illumination exercise was also quite effective but I struggled with creating a bright illumination in the bones.

Judy mentioned somewhere else about visualizing a flourescent tube.

---

by Ian

> Cassandra wrote:
> Like during sittings, my thoughts wandered. Sometimes I had to struggle to get through one round of the affirmation without trailing off to something. Still, I felt sometimes filled with a subtle energy or power, maybe.

Learning any new skill takes days and weeks and months of practice. Please don't feel discouraged. Keep up the good work.

Work Program week beginning 5 May 2008

---

by Ian

Whenever you get angry or impatient, count to 10 slowly while doing the 10 bone illumination exercise:
1. Lower right leg bone. 2. Upper right leg bone. 3. Pelvic bone. 4. Upper left leg bone. 5. Lower left leg bone. 6. Spinal column and skull. 7. Upper right arm bone. 8. Lower right arm bone. 9. Upper left arm bone. 10. Lower left arm bone.

At least once a day, perform a quiet meditation using the 10 bone illumination exercise.

---

by Dean

Hey everyone,

Doing the 10 bone illumination exercise almost always put me into a peaceful state, when I did it for a long time I sometimes felt a light, uplifting feeling that prevailed as long as I did the exercise. I sometimes altered visualizing different colors of the spectrum to mix it up a bit, and also added previous prayers that have been mentioned in connection with this exercise. It almost always stopped momentum from negative emotions such as anger and irritability, and was effective in stopping the stress caused by these manifestations. Sometimes while feeling and visualizing my bones I felt an almost painful feeling, because when I visualized my bones it made me see them or realize their existence more than usual, it sometimes made me cringe thinking of the bones turning in their sockets. That only happened at certain times though, and the majority of the time I only felt at peace and my presence was somewhat illuminated.

Regards

---

by Judy

Hi all,
Yes, anger and impatience don't hang around anywhere near the practice of the 10 bone illumination exercise. This is a great addition, a transformation really, of the more usual "counting to 10".
The illuminated bones exercise and many variations of it have been top of the Work agenda recently for me. I recall someone mentioning at some stage that he/she was having trouble with the actual illumination of the bone marrow/bones. My practice has vastly improved following a little time spent on this link;
https://homes.bio.psu.edu/faculty/strauss/anatomy/skel/skeletal.htm

After all, we need to know what we are visualizing. And check out the "strange" hands and feet. We are indeed marvelously made.

Another little trick I found along the way is to visualize each bone-shape as if it were a fluorescent light tube. This has the advantage of illumination coming from the central core (bone marrow), and gives a way of what I'll call "turning-on and off" if wished.
Then, once in a meditative state when time allowed, armed with a little knowledge and keeping an aid or two loosely in the mind, all sorts of little additions happened. One of these was the seeing of various other bones, such as ribs and the shoulder areas, at brief moments. These are probably not at all important, except that they added the emotions of anticipation and curiosity each day prior to the sitting. This helped motivation.

In the practice of this exercise, though, I must be vigilant. It is so likely to take me to a deliciously peaceful place and if this isn't what is sought (which is the vast majority of the time), then eyes slightly open and a lot of "sensing the bones" while keeping other senses open a little, is very important.
Which reminds me, a while ago Ian asked if we could sense the bones. Certainly not in the same way as sensing an arm or leg. Yet there is a definite different experience when attempted. It is a sort of heaviness in the particular limb being worked on, quite different from the warmth, expansion, tingling etc of sensing the surface areas. Maybe. Or maybe not.

So thanks to Mr Beidler for these bones exercises, which take the emphasis from the body-surface, remind us sharply of the mortality of the body, are effective on negative emotions, expand our daily views, and illumine us. And we see these bones. Thus we are more than these bones. And so it goes. Drop by drop of water on stone do we work on lessening identification with form.

---

by Judy

Hey Dean,

> Each life is a representative of God. Whoever can see the representative will see Him who is represented.(Gurdjieff)

This is lovely.

I recently came across one in similar vein from fourteenth century Persian poet and Sufi master Hafiz:
"I am a hole in a flute that the Christ's breath moves through. Listen to this music."

---

by Chuck

I had ample chance to use this week's exercise, because of some interactions with a person at my job. I didn't have the presence to use the techniques when events occurred, but have been able to apply them in the aftermath (which is still going on).

The situation is causing lots of 'I's' to pop up, which is giving opportunity for the 10-bone illumination exercise.

Regarding the 10-bone illumination exercise, I just saw reference to a book called The Body Electric by Dr. Robert Becker. He says that bones are piezoelectric - for example, a bending stress causes an electrical charge. Basically, bones contain both organic (callogen) and inorganic (apatite) material, which forms a kind of semiconductor. Doctors actually apply electricity to bones to help them heal. Apparently, if you run a current through bone, some of the energy is turned to light, at an infrared frequency. Although we can't see these frequencies, they appear as heat to us. We do in a sense actually have illuminated bones!

Regards, Chuck

---

by Lawrick

This week there was an observation of the workings of Heptaparaparshinokh . It's very common for me to, when first begining the weekly exercises, to seemingly invest a great deal of energy, intent into the exercise. Most of my "real" experiences seem to come during the early part of the week. As the week progresses however, I aware less and less and even when I awake the effort doesn't seem to engage my 3 centres and as a result of course nothing happens. In fact it is not uncommon to wake up knowing I should be working but actually not wanting to which always gives a half ass effort. I've noticed this many times in the past but from now on I'll try to become conscious of these intervals to observe, and perhaps provide an impetus to complete the circle as my intent will allow.

Strange, but it seems a large part of my well being is connected with doing the exercises. Early in the week I'm always happier, and later more anxious, more irritable. This seems to be a pattern. Just breathe!

This is fascinating Chuck:

> Regarding the 10-bone illumination exercise, I just saw reference to a book called The Body Electric by Dr. Robert Becker. He says that bones are piezoelectric - for example, a bending stress causes an electrical charge. Basically, bones contain both organic (callogen) and inorganic (apatite) material, which forms a kind of semiconductor. Doctors actually apply electricity to bones to help them heal. Apparently, if you run a current through bone, some of the energy is turned to light, at an infrared frequency. Although we can't see these frequencies, they appear as heat to us. We do in a sense actually have illuminated bones!

Food for thought and perhaps study.

And Judy thanks for sharing the impressions recieved in observing your cat. I was watching My neice's cat the other day and observed something similar.Such simple things from which we learn and grow.

Be well,
Lawrick

---

by Judy

Hi Chuck,
Sounds like a good book to look out for.
Poets have known (Walt Whitman's "I Sing the Body Electric" is an example).
It is good to see it backed up and explained scientifically.
We tend to sometimes forget just how new and constantly evolving medical science is.
In your example, piezoelectricity has only been recognized since around the end of the nineteenth century.

I came across some interesting modern science as well in a different area.
I was checking out as to which bones had bone marrow. When I was studying anatomy (no, not quite in the dark ages 😀) we were told bone marrow was found in the long bones only - as distinct from the other varieties; short, curved and flat.
Yet recent articles support spontaneous synthesis of immunoglobulin E from rib bone marrow in vitro.
Even more interesting is an article which infers bone marrow in the flat bones of the cranium - found at http://www.ingentaconnect.com/content/klu/neon/2003/00000064/00000003/05

It seems with the advent of the exponentially growing stem cell technologies, that there are lots of unexpected discoveries.
Older traditions than ours have placed much spiritual emphasis on the bones too. I am thinking here of the symbolic dances of the Australian aboriginies, for one.

Thanks for the reminder of the aspect of electricity Chuck. I daresay electromagnetism will slot in there somewhere as well.

Best wishes,

---

by Ian

> Dean wrote:
> ..., it sometimes made me cringe thinking of the bones turning in their sockets.

Yes, it is indeed sometimes 'icky' to imagine our insides. Overcoming this dislike of our 'icky-ness' might be a good exercise. Reall that there were Tantric exercises in which Yogis spent the night in graveyards meditating on decaying corpses.

---

by Ian

> Judy wrote:
> Which reminds me, a while ago Ian asked if we could sense the bones.

I posted about this in another thread - (Work Program week beginning 12 May 2008)

---

by Ian

> Chuck wrote:
> Regarding the 10-bone illumination exercise, I just saw reference to a book called The Body Electric by Dr. Robert Becker. He says that bones are piezoelectric - for example, a bending stress causes an electrical charge. Basically, bones contain both organic (callogen) and inorganic (apatite) material, which forms a kind of semiconductor. Doctors actually apply electricity to bones to help them heal. Apparently, if you run a current through bone, some of the energy is turned to light, at an infrared frequency. Although we can't see these frequencies, they appear as heat to us. We do in a sense actually have illuminated bones!
>
> Regards, Chuck

I have read that book, very good info. I made reference to the piezoelectric effect in another thread - (Work Program week beginning 12 May 2008)

---

by Ian

> Judy wrote:
> Poets have known (Walt Whitman's "I Sing the Body Electric" is an example)

Walt Whitman is great. Maurice Bucke, who wrote the famous book Cosmic Consciousness, was a great friend of Whitman. There is a good movie about the two of them called Beautiful Dreamers. Anyways, one of my favourite quotes is from Whitman - "Strong upon me the life that does not exhibit itself, yet contains all the rest..."

> I came across some interesting modern science as well in a different area.
> I was checking out as to which bones had bone marrow. When I was studying anatomy (no, not quite in the dark ages) we were told bone marrow was found in the long bones only - as distinct from the other varieties; short, curved and flat. Yet recent articles support spontaneous synthesis of immunoglobulin E from rib bone marrow in vitro.
> Even more interesting is an article which infers bone marrow in the flat bones of the cranium - found at
> http://www.ingentaconnect.com/content/klu/neon/2003/00000064/00000003/0513840
>
> It seems with the advent of the exponentially growing stem cell technologies, that there are lots of unexpected discoveries.
> Older traditions than ours have placed much spiritual emphasis on the bones too. I am thinking here of the symbolic dances of the Australian aboriginies, for one.
>
> Thanks for the reminder of the aspect of electricity Chuck. I daresay electromagnetism will slot in there somewhere as well.
>
> Best wishes,

Good research there. Recall that it is the immune system that maintains the integrity of our physical being against outside intruders.

Another interesting line of research is he connection between electromagnetism and consciousness.

---

by Chuck

The book mentioned above, "The Body Electric - Electromagnetism and the Foundation of Life" by Robert O. Becker has appeared on http://www.scribd.com.

There are also a number of Work books there, if you search for Gurdjieff, Ouspensky, Fourth Way, etc. These are all free, and are usually PDF or MS Word documents.

For example, here's a link to docs tagged 'Gurdjieff':
http://www.scribd.com/search?query=tags%3AGurdjieff&sortorder=views

Regards, Chuck

Work Program week beginning 12 May 2008

by Ian

Choose a quiet place and allow twenty uninterrupted minutes at some time during the day.
Seat yourself in a meditative position – spine straight, eyes slightly open, facial muscles relaxed, body sensed.
Gently be aware of your breathing for several breaths and use this to collect into a calm, 3-centered state.
Observe yourself just sitting in this position. Say something like – "I am sitting here and something in me is seeing it."
Say the Holy Equation Prayer gently correlating with the breath, like this:

Breathe in. Breathe out while mentally saying “Holy Affirming”
Breathe in. Breathe out while mentally saying “Holy Denying”
Breathe in. Breathe out while mentally saying “Holy Reconciling”
Breathe in. Breathe out while mentally saying “Transubstantiate in me”
Breathe in. Breathe out while mentally saying “For my Being”

When this has become comfortable and effortless, we add the 10 bone illumination exercise to a double repetition of the above. Illuminate the bones by directing your attention into the marrow and visualizing a brilliant light emanating from the marrow of the each bone in turn.

While breathing out, try to sense the flow of “fuel” (oxygen and other nutrients in the blood) from the chest and into the marrow of each of the bones in turn. One might imagine that the “fuel” is feeding the illumination from within the marrow of the bone.

Breathe in. Breathe out while mentally saying “Holy Affirming”, sense flow of “fuel” and visualize illuminated lower right leg bones.
Breathe in. Breathe out while mentally saying “Holy Denying”, sense flow of “fuel” and visualize illuminated upper right leg bone.
Breathe in. Breathe out while mentally saying “Holy Reconciling”, sense flow of “fuel” and visualize illuminated pelvic bone.
Breathe in. Breathe out while mentally saying “Transubstantiate in me”, sense flow of “fuel” and visualize illuminated upper left leg bone.
Breathe in. Breathe out while mentally saying “For my Being”, sense flow of “fuel” and visualize illuminated lower left leg bones.

Breathe in. Breathe out while mentally saying “Holy Affirming”, sense flow of “fuel” and visualize illuminated spine and skull.
Breathe in. Breathe out while mentally saying “Holy Denying”, sense flow of “fuel” and visualize illuminated upper right arm bone.
Breathe in. Breathe out while mentally saying “Holy Reconciling”, sense flow of “fuel” and visualize illuminated lower right arm bones.

Breathe in. Breathe out while mentally saying “Transubstantiate in me”, sense flow of “fuel” and visualize illuminated upper left arm bone.
Breathe in. Breathe out while mentally saying “For my Being”, sense flow of “fuel” and visualize illuminated lower left arm bones.

Conclude with a remembrance of those who have gone before.

---

by Judy

Hi Ian,
Some time ago you mentioned that "you have heard it said", I think was how you expressed it, that magnetic centre may reside in the bone marrow.

This interests me very much.
Would you be so kind as to either expand on that statement, or pass on any references please?

Regards,

---

by Dean

This was a difficult exercise to coordinate, it took me all week to get it down smoothly and with a certain rhythm and clarity. The preparation was important, putting myself in a three centered state and doing the Holy Equation Prayer made me calm and collected and ready for the second portion. When I did it successfully I was able to feel something flowing from my chest, almost like a pump that was filling my bone marrow with this fuel, which corresponded with my breath and hopefully my circulation. I felt this sensation more on the exhale and on the inhale I visualized the brilliant light emanating from each bone.

> One might imagine that the “fuel” is feeding the illumination from within the marrow of the bone.

This was the best way for me to visualize the illumination, that it was being fed by the "fuel" from my chest. It was a good way to realize the cause and effect of this exercise, the connection between the molecular "fuel" and the electronic light, and created a rhythm that made everything flow with a certain sense of harmony. It's hard to describe the impressions of the illumination, something to do with being uplifted and light, and somewhat spiritual and subtle. I forgot to conclude with a remembrance of those who have gone before though, which is something that I will have to add next time.

Regards

by Ian

> Dean wrote:
> I felt this sensation more on the exhale and on the inhale I visualized the brilliant light emanating from each bone.

That is the way I experience it also. Something to try and add in the space between the exhale and inhale is the feeling of Love in the heart region.

---

by Ian

> Judy wrote:
> Hi Ian,
> Some time ago you mentioned that "you have heard it said", I think was how you expressed it, that magnetic centre may reside in the bone marrow.
>
> This interests me very much.
> Would you be so kind as to either expand on that statement, or pass on any references please?

Bone marrow is the most protected part of our physical being. It is the source of our immune system. It is also the source of our red blood cells which carry oxygen to our cells. Our immune system is the arbitor of self and other. The immune system is the upholder of our Identity, vis a vis the external world.

Bones are primarily Calcium crystals. They have piezo electric properties which regulate bone growth. Bones, being primarily mineral, have no sensation. ie. there are no nerves that sense impressions in the bones. Pain from a broken bone comes from the surrounding tissue, not the bones themselves. Therefore, any attempts to 'sense' the bones will, or should, result in null experiences. All that should be experienced is an empty space where the bones are. At the core of our sensed Being are hollow spaces where the bones are. These hollow, empty spaces are the core of our Being. Inner most, we are truly nothing. Didn't G say we need to realize our nothingness?

What is special about this interior space of nothingness? It is a space that can entertain or contain any perception/sensation, whatever its qualities or attributes.

Work Program week beginning 19 May 2008

---

by Ian

Remember yourself at the beginning and end of the day.
Try to connect the beginning and end with a thread of remembrance...
Remember yourself during an argument.
Remember yourself when you get angry.
Remember yourself when you laugh.
Remember yourself while eating.
Remember yourself in the loo.
Remember yourself at the stop light.
Remember yourself during commercials.

---

by Dean

Hey all,

When remembering myself on these occasions, and also on other occasions, I tried to become aware of all three centers somewhat simultaneously, or at least I hopped back and forth in order to keep each center in check and aware. I realized that when I succeeded in bringing about a remembrance in a three centered state that this was perhaps a way to actually remember more of my life, and created stronger impressions than usual that I was able to recall later. Remembering myself sometimes created a varying multitude of emotions and sensations, my mind was usually occupied with observation or just taking in my present environment and many times brought about realizations that seemed to be etched in my consciousness or perhaps my subconsciousness. Remembering myself brought about a calming effect that was peaceful but also had energy, and also kept me detached and not identified with externals as much. It was helpful in stressful situations and also gave me a feeling of wholeness and being that was real and in the moment.

---

by Cassandra

Very nice exercise. This helped me to momentarily interrupt the constant identifications.

---

by Chuck

Attempting to connect the beginning and end of the day with Self-remembering was fruitful and led to some observations... As Ouspensky related, one characteristic of self-remembering is that moments of it stand out in memory more vividly, where normal moments tend to fade away. So, I gauged how effective the connection between beginning and end-of-day that way.

Also tried to connect previous end-of-day remembering to the next morning. This worked in well with the sunrise exercise from BT that I've been trying to do.

Also noticed that I have several parts of the day where my behavior and I's are relatively isolated from each other. On a weekday it revolves around work and home. These two environments are compartmentalized and I's seem to be isolated a fair amount from each other. So, I tried to bridge these two environments with self-remembering as well. One helpful device was to put something in my pocket that I'd discover "on the other side" and remember to remember.

By the way, I often have the thought to remember myself when in the loo, but usually then remember the quote "Always guard against such perceptions as may soil the purity of your brains," and so I don't know where to go from there.

Regards, Chuck

---

by Judy

Better late than never, folks.
I did most of the remembrance times for several days during the first week. I really like the totally contemporary feel of this exercise, and the one facet that has insisted on remaining is that of remembering myself during the commercials. It is perhaps just beginning to become a little mechanical - to the point where I'm as a side-effect recalling more of the commercials than the actual TV programs - so looks like it is time to move on to the current week's considerations of envy.
It was a good wake-up call, in that I previously hadn't been aware of just how much otherwise wasted time could be put to good use.
Tonight something in me realized just how passive the whole TV thing is and I turned it off without even considering it. Strange really. I just was tired of it. No, I won't throw the television out, just be more selective maybe. Time will tell.

Oh, I tried a couple of different "threads of remembrance" to connect the beginning of the day with the end. The one that resonated best was the thread of praise and thanksgiving using slight variations between morning and evening.

Best wishes,

Work Program week beginning 26 May 2008

---

by Harry

Work requires energy. Energy that we waste on a regular basis. Begin by observing your muscles. Particularly the muscles of the face. And your hands. Movements of the hands that are habitual. Tension in the legs. Extra tension in the voice.

Pick the one that you find yourself doing. And give yourself an internal stop when you observe yourself doing it. Let the tension drain away. Let the motions come to a stop. The saved energy will be available for more important Work.

Then share your observations here.

---

by Judy

Hi Harry,
This simple (but not easy) exercise is one I return to frequently. The hand movements used to be the ones which surprised me a lot. These wasteful little tensions seem to have almost completely settled when I'm quietly sitting, anyway. There are always little extra tensions in the facial muscles that aren't needed however. Enough repeated awareness will no doubt lessen them as well. I haven't worked as yet on tensions in the legs, but now that you mention them, I see that they are present.
This exercise looks like being a long-term work in progress.
Regards,

---

by Judy

Oh, I forgot to mention that observing tension in the voice is most interesting. I noticed that some of the time when I answer the mobile, I speak more loudly than is necessary. Also, I didn't think I ever raised my voice. Well, I do. Another imaginary picture destroyed. And the illusion of mostly speaking in a pleasant well-modulated tone just loud enough to be heard - well, that's sometimes just that, an illusion.
There is almost as much surprise here as there was when I first began to become aware of energy wastage in tiny movements of the hands.
This isn't the first time I've tried observing tone of voice either. The other times it didn't seem as noticeable.
I have no idea what that means. I'll simply continue for a while. It is tricky to observe this one without automatically "judging" it and then the tone changes, which tells me there is very low impartiality here yet.
Thanks Harry.

---

by Ian

Could you give some suggestions about the "more important Work." ?

Work Program week beginning 2 June 2008

---

by Ian

Daily Ponder: What do I envy and why do I want it?

Morning exercise: Ponder on: "All suffering begins with desire". Sense the Solar plexus while pondering.

Daily exercise 1: Identify sources of envy and attempt to admire them without desire.

Daily exercise 2: Question all impulses of envy that arise in you. What true benefit would they bring? Every time you sense an envious thought or feeling, repeat the affirmation "I desire nothing save the essential needs of my planetary body and the love of higher knowledge"

Daily exercise 3: Whenever you are envious of someone, repeat silently "It is nothing - I will Be. It is nonsense - I can Do. It recedes - I Am." while sensing your heart centre.

Evening recapitulation: Recall the days envies. Ponder "Does envy serve a cosmic purpose?"

---

by Dean

Hey all,

> Morning exercise: Ponder on: "All suffering begins with desire". Sense the Solar plexus while pondering.

This pondering exercise brought about quite a few different ideas that were sometimes subjective and sometimes objective, or so it seemed. I was caught between whether or not a conscious person would suffer on account of desires or if this was basically only a mechanical quality. We have certain lower needs that obviously have to be attended to in order to maintain a healthy equilibrium, so I wasn't sure if this statement was all across the boards, or if it only applied to those who have no conscious control over desires. Then again if one has control over desires it may mean that they have will rather than desire and then this seemingly contradictory train of thought could perhaps be reconciled. Sensing the solar plexus while pondering grounded me in my internal presence and created an emotional element that was a good addition to my weighing of ideas. I definitely got the impression that most of the suffering in the world is caused by desires not being sublimated, and that most people are always pursuing desires, a lot of times because they have been trained to do so and because of many forms of envy. The average person is always comparing their own "success" in relation to others, and are always trying to keep up with the rat race, which is basically based on envy.

More to come later perhaps...

---

by Dean

Back for another round of spiritual liquor...

This may sound like a flat out fib, but I can't say that I've been feeling envious of people recently, if anything I've been feeling pity and compassion for people's personal prisons. I've been on a self observation binge that also has given me some very clear interpretations of the world outside, and how people gauge things by what every one else does, rather than what they truly feel to be right. I read some things last night about how reason develops in people, and it seems that when people are in a passive state, they don't reason for themselves, all the answers are answered for them, so they don't question things or themselves. It seems like envy plays a very large role in how people conduct their lives and form their values, which are almost always shaped around the economy and the corporate plague. Although envy hasn't been the main sin for me lately, other unbecoming traits are making themselves visible and I realize now that lack of conscious love must be the cause of most people's emptiness, and that's probably why they are always looking to fulfill desires that are a part of their starving essence. Real conscious love neutralizes almost all negative qualities while it lasts, although it's probably one of the most difficult things to attain in life, love is maybe the most universal emotion, I've come to realize that real love is strength, joy, sorrow, and devotion all wrapped into one.

> Evening recapitulation: Recall the days envies. Ponder "Does envy serve a cosmic purpose?"

I believe all things serve a cosmic purpose, because everything serves the purpose of our creator. The laws of the Absolute are absolute, and not much is wasted in the universe. I'm of the opinion or conviction that negative energy does feed the moon, and the earth is like a sun in relation to the moon that radiates mechanical energy to keep the universe expanding. Suffering serves a purpose, and envy is an obvious form of unnecessary suffering that must be part of the whole process of energy exchange. It's a hard thing to reconcile sometimes, but it seems that everything from the most beautiful splendors on the earth, to the lowliest and most horrific occurances, serve a purpose in the belly of the beast, the reciprocal feeding of everything existing in the Megalocosmos.

Work Program week beginning 9 June 2008

---

by Judy

This week there is the suggestion of two simple tasks; one is a meditation and the second is a related pondering. There is a slightly different approach. It is for you to decide, perhaps at the end of the first read-through, whether you wish to commit to it, and, if so, how often you will do it; for example, daily, three times weekly, once, or perhaps not at all. Having decided this, you now undertake a small “payment” if you forget to do as planned. (Something that works for me is to give up the following day's tea and coffee.)

Mindfulness of Breathing Meditation:

(This is a preparatory step to observation of the breath as mindfulness for longer periods in daily life. It is said to help avoid any strain or alteration in the normal breathing.)

There are four little phases. Begin with one or two cycles of the first two, followed by stages three and four for several minutes each. Sit in the accustomed way, eyelids lowered somewhat, spine straight, breathing gently, sensing the body.
1. Counting (mentally) from one to ten at the end of each breath cycle.
Inhale, exhale, 1
Inhale, exhale 2
up to 10.
2.Counting from one to ten at the beginning of each breath.
1, inhale, exhale
2, inhale, exhale
up to 10.
3. Simply follow the normal breathing process for a little while – no counting.
4. Narrow the focus back to the breath (divide the attention between breathing and the awareness of the sightless gaze), this time paying attention to the parts of the body the breath touches as it enters and leaves. You will notice especially the nostrils and perhaps parts of the upper lip.

Continue for several minutes, then slowly raise the lowered eyelids, stretch the limbs for a few moments, and return to the day.

Pondering on Air as Compassion Itself:

The following is from John Bennett's “Talks on Beelzebub's Tales” P128.

“Air gives us a picture of limitless generosity, giving itself freely to all. Everything – large and small, necessary or destructive, good or bad – is given the same air to breathe. Air can be for us a representation of the limitless compassion by which everything is supported. In reality, air is that compassion; it has the qualities we ascribe to it not by virtue of our thinking but in a way far more concrete than we can imagine.

We are surrounded by spiritual qualities, but they do not belong to beings and certainly not to us people. They are part of the working that sustains this life.”

---

by Karen

I have made a decision to commit to this program once daily for the duration of the week. Payment: coffee (ouch)

So far, so good!

---

by Karen

Judy,

Really effective exercise here!

First couple of tries the exercise produced an extreme state of relaxation.

Results varied from falling asleep, entering a space filled with love and compassion, seeing the walls vibrate at a higher frequency, decompressing and relieving muscle aches and tension.

Also found that making the decision to do the program once a day assisted with keeping my commitment. For the most part I ran through the program more than once a day and the results varied, but to say the least assisted with draining much tension and stress.

As part of the exercise I observed myself incorporating the following:

On the in-breath I would breath in sounding "HA" and raise my tongue to the roof of my mouth. on the out-breath I would breath "HA" keeping my tongue raised and would send the breath through the entire body to reach every cell and expel the negative, stagnant energy out through the soles of my feet to the earth to be transformed into light and love.

Thanks Judy

Karen

---

by Dean

This exercise produced some good effects and was a great motivating factor for work. I tried to make an oath to do this twice before I ate lunch and dinner, so I felt I had to work for my essentials which was a positive thing. I find the breathing exercise combined with the sightless gaze to be an energizing experience, and like to do it in the morning sometimes to get the day started.

I had an experience earlier in the week when doing the breathing exercise that was quite invigorating. We've been having a lot of thunderstorms recently and the negatively charged ions in the air seemed to contain a lot of energy that I could definitely feel when I breathed. This made me think of the quality of different types of air because I have had these experiences before and they are always somewhat memorable. I looked up some info on negatively charged ions and found it somewhat interesting, here is a link.
http://www.negativeiongenerators.com/proofpositive.html
I also thought of the vast quantity of air and also how necessary and vital it is to everthing. Other ponderings gave me some thoughts on how everything is connected to this system known as the universe, and how things are reciprocal and tied together. Another thought I had was that this energy that flows through me isn't mine, it belongs to the cosmos and that I am a part of the whole of creation.

A few days ago I attended a concert where an older band from the 60's played, a band called The Animals. I found myself doing this exercise there while sitting and watching and listening. It created a pretty strong impression, the feeling of being in a large crowd was quite profound and the light's and music fused together to create some great vibrations. The sightless gaze was quite amazing in that setting, and brought about the sense of space quite a bit.

Thanks Judy

---

by Chuck

Seems like I'm always a week behind on the exercises.

I've been doing this exercise off-and-on since it was posted, but didn't really commit, so I'm now committing to the next 7-day period starting now. Incentive is coffee (I work in Seattle, so it's almost mandatory).

My main difficulty in doing this exercise has been to avoid other exercises from creeping in - immediately I Am and others want to be done.

Will report more as I go.

Regards,
Chuck

---

by Judy

Chuck wrote:

> My main difficulty in doing this exercise has been to avoid other exercises from creeping in - immediately I Am and others want to be done.

I found this too. Looks like work I s come in groups too.

I chose the line of thought that - okay, it may be all well and good that these other exercises want to be done, but what is happening here? Is not the mind simply working associatively to bring in these other suggestions? But I at the moment wish to do a mindfulness meditation, where I allow the mind to quieten down as much as possible. Therefore I just watched all the other usually assessed as "good" associations simply float past. In other words they were treated similarly to any other intruding thoughts.

The actual "work" is one of the few things I can "do", after all.
Thus if I wish to float along on the mental breeze and go with the other ideas which pop up, then this would somehow have to be "intended" beforehand.
Make sense?
How do others see it?

I notice you are naming it a "difficulty" Chuck. We're on the same page here.

---

by Judy

Dean wrote:

> I tried to make an oath to do this twice before I ate lunch and dinner, so I felt I had to work for my essentials which was a positive thing.

This reminds me of the very first exercise I was given which involved a "payment".
It was to do with observing all the senses' involvement as I took the first bite of food at breakfast, lunch and dinner.
If I forgot - even remembering on the second bite was classed as "forgetting", there was a payment of foregoing the next scheduled coffee-break.
The idea was to do for one week and score oneself out of 21.
Then repeat the exercise every six months or annually.
As this became "easy", one moved to a more difficult example.
(Don't ask me what that was because I didn't get to it so I don't know)

If anyone is interested, Ian may approve a version of the above for my contribution next month.
Let me know?

---

by Judy

Dean posted the link:

http://www.negativeiongenerators.com/proofpositive.html

Thanks Dean.
The material really emphasized for me just how little the nutrient properties of air have been explored.
We see amazing references to such things as the elevation of serotonin in the blood after exposure to fresh air, to name but one example.
So the blood responds chemically to increase in negative ions, which is electrical.
If it happens for serotonin, we'd suspect other neurotransmitters would be affected also.
This would open up a whole area of health and wellness and with current pollution levels, this will become more and more necessary.
So the old advice of "a sea-change" or "some mountain air" was excellent.
Today most mood manipulation for pathologies is done using pharmaceuticals of course.
Negative ionisers are looked at as "way out there".
Time and more research will tell.
Of course it would all happen quicker if air was generally accepted as food - in particular affecting emotional states.
Way to go, Mr G.
Science will get there eventually.

It occurred to me that the increase in joy of life which happened when I quit smoking may indeed have been more real and chemical than just the satisfaction of having stopped.
And I choose to live within sound of the surf. Yet I don't swim much. I just seem to thrive more living by the sea.

Lots of example spring to mind.
Have a read everyone?

---

by Judy

Karen wrote:

> As part of the exercise I observed myself incorporating the following:
>
> On the in-breath I would breath in sounding "HA" and raise my tongue to the roof of my mouth. on the out-breath I would breath "HA" keeping my tongue raised and would send the breath through the entire body to reach every cell and expel the negative, stagnant energy out through the soles of my feet to the earth to be transformed into light and love.

This is a nice little extra touch Karen which personalizes the meditation for you. Thank you for sharing the experience.
Thanks also to you and Dean who have been regular posters as always recently, while some of the rest of us have been away from the site for various reasons. To those that have, more will be given. (Parable of the talents, taken from Nicoll Book 4.)

---

by Chuck

Doing the exercise this morning went well. A feeling of 'sinking' set in which was conducive to relaxation. The switch from counting at the end to counting at the beginning was just enough mental work to maintain alertness.

Judy, thanks for the help with the I's wanting to do other exercises. This morning I did the exercise before reading your post, so will try tomorrow, setting it in my mind beforehand to let those thoughts pass with the others.

Pondering John Bennett's quote, the realization came that the air is complete - what we presumably don't use (carbon dioxide, for example), plants do use. It's all there, and works in a complementary fashion for life on Earth. The air is really a big factor in 'reciprocal maintenance' of living things, where our use of the gases is complementary to that of plants; we use what they produce and vice versa.

Touching the tongue to the roof of the mouth is advice frequently given to Tai Chi and Taoist yoga students. There are acupuncture meridians that that run up the spine and down the front of the body, forming a circuit called the "Microcosmic orbit." These pathways aren't normally connected, but touching the tongue to the roof of the mouth connects them and completes the circuit.

I'm off to read Dean's article on negative ion generators. Dean, didn't the Animals sing 'House of the Rising Sun?' It was one of my favorites when I was a kid. VERY young kid, I might add .

Regards, Chuck

---

by Chuck

Did the exercise this afternoon. I'm sure there's much benefit to doing first thing in the morning, especially an exercise like this which is a good basic start-up, so I'll try to make time in the morning.

Concentrated a bit today on Part 3 of the exercise, paying attention to the parts of the body the breath touches as it enters and leaves. Zeroed in on the nose for sensing the flow. This is where I had trouble being mindful, but I tried to let the obtrusive thoughts just flow by as Judy suggested. It'll take a lot of work - one tends to get irritated, but clearly takes a calm sense of purpose.

Dean, the link to the negative ion information was interesting. I think I remember reading that the feeling/smell after a thunderstorm is due to the negative ions generated?

Regards, Chuck

---

by Dean

Hey,

Negative ions are produced by thunderstorms although I'm not sure if it's from the electified atmosphere or rain that releases these ions after hitting the Earth, or both. Some people recommend having a fountain in your room while you sleep because of the ions produced from the water, I also heard that ionizing tents were utilized in the Olympics for runners and this was a way to increase energy levels. It's a great experience though when you can actually enjoy and appreciate something as simple as breathing, I suspect it would fall under the heading of the emotional part of the instinctive center.

The House of the Rising Sun is a great song by The Animals, it was originally a Bob Dylan song, but they redid it in an electric version. The singer is 67 years old but I was surprised to hear that his singing is just as good as it was back then, maybe even better, I guess it's never too late to rock and roll.

I would be all for seeing this exercise, or something similar again as a contribution next month, it has a lot force within it, not to mention the idea of payment which is crucial.

Regards

---

by Ian

> Chuck wrote:
> My main difficulty in doing this exercise has been to avoid other exercises from creeping in - immediately I Am and others want to be done.

Yes, sometimes, refusing to do certain exercises can be a great stimulus. It casn be a Work in itself.

---

by Ian

> Judy wrote:
> If anyone is interested, Ian may approve a version of the above for my contribution next month. Let me know?

Approved

---

by Ian

> Judy wrote:
> Negative ionisers are looked at as "way out there".
> Time and more research will tell.

I have a small one on my desk that I use from time to time.

---

by Chuck

Thanks, Ian.

Did a couple rounds of the exercise this morning early. Great way to start the day. Pondering the last part of the quote from John Bennett: "We are surrounded by spiritual qualities, but they do not belong to beings and certainly not to us people. They are part of the working that sustains this life" gave insight and served as a reminder of the duty to pay for our arising and existence.

Regards, Chuck

---

by Ian

> Chuck wrote:
> Touching the tongue to the roof of the mouth is advice frequently given to Tai Chi and Taoist yoga students. There are acupuncture meridians that that run up the spine and down the front of the body, forming a circuit called the "Microcosmic orbit." These pathways aren't normally connected, but touching the tongue to the roof of the mouth connects them and completes the circuit.

The tongue to the roof of the mouth comes from the Hindu yoga tradition, of which Taoist yoga is a derivative through Buddhist influences. The Microcosmic Orbit is a "beginners" exercise, or as Gurdjieff would say, a "soil preparing exercise". Mr Beidler studied Taoism with Charles Luk.
Here is a link - http://endlesssearch.co.uk/northeon7.htm

Charles Luk wrote two books about Taoism.

---

by Ian

> Dean wrote:
> I would be all for seeing this exercise, or something similar again as a contribution next month, it has a lot force within it, not to mention the idea of payment which is crucial.

Remember, all these exercises are just "suggestions" as to something that may be helpful for your inner journey. Some exercises you will only try once, and other exercises will become integral elements of your Work "repetoir". You will find certain exercises that Work for you. They are not necessarily the same exercises that will Work for someone else.

Find the exercises that resonate with you and practice them regularily, but also always be on the lookout for new exercises that will extend your efforts into greater depths or into new areas of Searching.

---

by Chuck

Did the Mindfulness exercise this morning on the bus on the way to work. Had to fight the general sleepiness that ensues in that environment, but was successful.

While pondering Bennett's quote, "everything... is given the same air to breathe..." (it's really true on the bus!), thought about the longevity of the air. Although it's renewed constantly by chemical processes/sunlight/ionization/etc., the constituent atoms must be billions of years old (as all are).

We're breathing air that's billions of years old.

Regards, Chuck

---

by Chuck

Ian wrote:

> The tongue to the roof of the mouth comes from the Hindu yoga tradition, of which Taoist yoga is a derivative through Buddhist influences. The Microcosmic Orbit is a "beginners" exercise, or as Gurdjieff would say, a "soil preparing exercise". Mr Beidler studied Taoism with Charles Luk.

Thanks for the information, Ian. This is very interesting. There seem to be a number of correspondences between Gurdjieff's Work and yoga/taoist practices. Another example is Gurdjieff's "arms out sideways" as reported by Bennett, which is very much like Chinese Zhan Zhuang ("standing like a stake"). G's descriptions of energy centers and flow is another.

Is there any more knowledge that ties the practices of Gurdjieff's Work and yoga/taoist ones together? Would you recommend any books by Mr. Luk?

Regards, Chuck

---

by Chuck

Just reporting in as I agreed to do for 7 days. Did the mindfulness exercise again and faced identification and daydreaming somewhat. Still plugging away; overall there's something really pure about this exercise.

Regards, Chuck

---

by Chuck

Did the mindfulness exercise this morning again on the bus.

This in the last day of the 7-day period I committed to, but I plan to keep it up, and have added it to my reminder list of things to do.

Thanks, Judy for this fundamentally important exercise.

Regards, Chuck

---

by Ian

> Chuck wrote:

> Ian wrote:
> Is there any more knowledge that ties the practices of Gurdjieff's Work and yoga/taoist ones together? Would you recommend any books by Mr. Luk?
>
> Regards, Chuck

The first question is one that would require a lot of research, but I'm sure correspondences could be made. remember that Tibet is between India and China and supposedly G was in Tibet.

You might find some leads here -

http://www.thepathofmyexperience.com/index.php?option=content&task=view&id=9&Itemid=28

http://www.thepathofmyexperience.com/index.php?option=content&task=view&id=31&Itemid=25

2 Books by Charles Luk -

Taoist Yoga: Alchemy & Immortality - http://www.amazon.com/Taoist-Yoga-Immortality-Charles-Luk/dp/0877280673

The Secrets of Chinese Meditation - http://www.amazon.com/Secrets-Chinese-Meditation-Self-Cultivation-Mahayana/dp/0877280665/ref=pd_bxgy_b_text_b

Work Program week beginning 16 June 2008

---

by Ian

Four Point Exercise (From Gurdjieff, in a Meeting, Thursday, July 13, 1944):

"When you self-remember, you have another state from the usual. It is necessary to separate these two states. For this there is an exercise, a whole series of exercises even. Here is the first: you do it, for example, seated, leaning comfortably installed in an arm-chair or on a couch. There is a spot where the arms are attached to the body, (region of the shoulders) and a spot where the legs are attached to the body, (hip-joint); feel and control these four spots all the time. All your attention must be concentrated there. Send everything else to the devil. When you say "I am" imagine that these four spots are like four pillars on which is supported your "I am". Focus your attention; not on the extremities nor to the interior of the body. All your concentration is fixed on these four places. Do this for your future real "me". To begin, learn to know this state; it is like a measure, a clue. You will self-remember when you can feel well these four places. Leave all the rest. Live life as before. This is your only exercise, but do it very seriously so that all of the most concentrated moments of your work be based on those spots. After, you shall have title to a real individuality. These things could only serve as a barrier between your individuality and your ex-functions. I say "ex" because you must have a new quality of functions. The whole world must have a new quality of functions - because of an abnormal life in the past. It is necessary to create a barrier. For you, it shall be the result of this exercise. When you feel and are conscious of this definite barrier, your ground shall be prepared for a new exercise; then you will be able to have a new interior, independent, and a new exterior, independent. You shall have a normal body and a normal psychism, without the abnormal ex-functions. This is solely for her and for no one else. Do not try to do it out of curiosity. It is a very dangerous thing."

---

by Judy

Saturday June 21st 2008.
Happy Solstice everyone!

I received some notes from an Australian astrologer friend this morning which remark on the solstices and equinoxes as being the four cosmological gates. This related somewhat to our Four Points exercise of this week, so here they are:

> Saturday 21st June 2008 our “Winter Solstice”
>
> This “Winter” Solstice can only be located in this area of the sky every 26,000 years letting us know that we are in extraordinary times shifting from one Great Galactic Year to the next. The Solstice and Equinox points represent the four > gates or four directions of the celestial medicine wheel and are activated by the Sun in a rhythmic seasonal cycle. Solstice literally means "stand still of the Sun" meaning the Sun rises and sets at the same place on the horizon for three days appearing to stand still. Many of our ancestors had an active and conscious relationship with these cycles and seasons, creating standing stone circles and other monuments to assist in tracking these timings for the purpose of capturing or maximizing the incoming energies activated during these seasonal shifts. Working with these seasonal gates strengthens our own relationship with the magical mysteries of the seasonal cycles between the Earth and the Sky and assists us in opening to receive the incoming energies

---

by Ian

In an imaginative way, the four quarters, or two soltstices and 2 equinoxes could be related to the four points in the exercise as extensions towards the cosmic extent of our being.

---

by Judy

This exercise has some unexpected effects.
I mean this in the way of what I'll call "stirring up the psyche".
It is effective in producing a self-remembering state quite a bit of the time. It also, over a period of five days or so, helped the dream-recall. Either that, or I've had more dreams. Several of these have been symbolic, one about taking communion in a synagogue ? and there have been various other everyday-life anomalies which point to it being a work dream. There have been daytime mental snapshots of a couple of Tarot cards and one of a dancing Jack of Hearts; this last had the shape of the exercise with a rectangular body moving around and bending and so forth and some of the illustrations from the Lewis Carroll books were other vivid associations.
I won't go on.

Anyway, with a view to heeding the warning given by Mr Gurdjieff, I went to the relevant pdf file to read it in a bit more context.
Yahne's question to Mr G. is interesting. She feels she is too much glued to her senses and doesn't have a strong psychic life.

There are certain times in life when I become way too exterior. I suppose "glued to the senses" is quite an accurate depiction, though I haven't thought of it like that. I usually think more along the lines of "being too busy" or "necessarily interacting with many people in a short time" and when things settle, I then realize that the Work hasn't been as active for that time. Yes, what could that be, other than being "glued to the senses"?

Thus, for now, I'm trying out this exercise for these specific times. It does indeed form a "barrier", as Mr Gurdjieff calls it, between the unconscious external organic functions and the state of self-remembering, and this is helping the quality of the attempts made when I am out and about with people. This needs all the help it can get, as I seem to fall asleep much more easily in those situations.

The addition of the "I Am" to the visualization of the four points acting as pillars to the "I Am" evokes a "sturdy" feeling and my imagined pillars haven't yet fixed their configuration and move around a bit.

I also used concentrating on the four points when passing a huge Cadbury's display in the supermarket and the greed transformed immediately. I'd been glued to taste sensations momentarily.

We've been motoring along in a few areas recently with consequent busy-ness - but if anyone else has been experimenting with this new exercise, please post whatever comments you may have.

Ian, thanks for approving the idea of next month's Work program contribution on the other thread. I'll type it up nearer the date.

Regards,

---

by Karen

I only tried this exercise for 2 days earlier in the week. The sensation/feeling I got when paying attention to the 4 points was the entire area from point to point (less the head, arms and legs) turned into a cylinder barrel, solid and sturdy like a tree. Its was grounding and assisted with outer distractions which fell by the way side.

Will have to put more effort into this exercise. This exercise seemed so simple but was exceptionally hard.

Question:

> This is solely for her and for no one else.
> Do not try to do it out of curiosity. It is a very dangerous thing.

Why is it a very dangerous thing and solely for her? and who is she (one of his students?)

---

by Dean

I also found this exercise difficult, when I was able to do it correctly I did get the sense of "I am" and a sense of support and feeling of the presence of my body. It did bring about some strong self remembering experiences and I felt the trunk of my body first, but later it often brought about an awareness of the whole of myself, a certain energy was produced that seemed to travel down the limbs and other parts of the body, sometimes the solar plexus region was also affected, but the sensation of these four points was where the primary sense of self was located.

I'm not sure why G says "It is a very dangerous thing," I was wondering about that as well. He is addressing an individual student, but I still don't see what danger there is in doing it. One reason may be that it could be something connected with that particular students type, and it is suited for her for some reason. Another thought I had was that it was a form of reverse-psychology, and he is actually trying to provoke curiosity in her. Other than that I don't have any idea.

Regards

---

by Chuck

I've been trying this exercise and it's not only profound, but the description by Gurdjieff adds extra 'material for thought.' As Judy and Karen remarked, a sturdy or solid feeling comes naturally with the exercise.

In thinking what Ian said about our bones here (Work Program week beginning 12 May 2008), I wonder about the electrical significance of our joints. G's four pillars must be the largest joints in our body. Considering the piezoelectric effect mentioned here (Work Program week beginning 5 May 2008), when we move, the stressing of our bones creates electricity. This flow of electricity would also create a magnetic field. If there's an electrical flow along the bone, what happens when it reaches the joints? Perhaps there is a differential created across the joint, or maybe a flow across it. Or, maybe cartilage and synovial fluid act as insulators, keeping the charge within each bone. At any rate, If there's any electromagnetic action at the joints, this exercise concentrates on the four largest such spots in the body.
Regards, Chuck

---

by Karen

This exercise required more of my attention and intention

So I meditated and pondered which took me on a journey of questions, layers and layers of questions, so wondrous this divine play we are a part of.

When focusing on the top of the shoulders and the solar plexus or region of the hips I no longer had a head, legs or arms. I was just a cylinder barrel of a sturdy feeling energy.

So without limbs or a head, without a physical body, how do I propel myself? Yet something was still thinking or making an observation, something was still seeing without a head.

Who am I beyond this body? This materialism? Where do I come from? Am I consciousness? Am I light? Am I limitless, currently with a limited point of view?

I have a body, which allows me this opportunity to experience in manifestation. I AM the Earth. I AM Life. I AM energy. I AM more.

What is this nothingness from where we come spinning out of?

What is a thought? Where does it come from?

What is matter? What is mind? What is consciousness? Can we ingest the entire universe in a mere breath?

Suppose this separateness is an illusion. Suppose we are all connected and are all one in the body of his endlessness. Every atom belonging to you would belong to me.

Sheds new light on Matthew 22:35
Then one of them, which was a lawyer, asked him a question, tempting him, and saying, 36 Master, which is the great commandment in the law?
37 Jesus said unto him, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind.
38 This is the first and great commandment.
39 And the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.
40 On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets.

If our common creator god is all seeing, all knowing, do each and every one of us provide our maker creator with a limited, but no lesser than perspective? Are (we, you, I) his many I's, (eyes)? His magnifying glass?

So vast and opens up another perspective, constellation, galaxy of ideas.

---

by Ian

> Dean wrote:
> I'm not sure why G says "It is a very dangerous thing," I was wondering about that as well. He is addressing an individual student, but I still don't see what danger there is in doing it.

I'm not sure why, either. I included that remark as it was part of the original quote.

If I thought it was in any way dangerous, I wouldn't have posted it as an exercise.
As I have said before, the exercises posted here are simply suggestions for Inner Work. If anyone feels unconfortable about any of the exercises, they do not have to try them.

---

by Ian

> Chuck wrote:
> In thinking what Ian said about our bones here (Work Program week beginning 12 May 2008), I wonder about the electrical significance of our joints. G's four pillars must be the largest joints in our body. Considering the piezoelectric effect mentioned here (Work Program week beginning 5 May 2008), when we move, the stressing of our bones creates electricity. This flow of electricity would also create a magnetic field. If there's an electrical flow along the bone, what happens when it reaches the joints? Perhaps there is a differential created across the joint, or maybe a flow across it. Or, maybe cartilage and synovial fluid act as insulators, keeping the charge within each bone. At any rate, If there's any electromagnetic action at the joints, this exercise concentrates on the four largest such spots in the body.
> Regards, Chuck

Interesting thoughts there Chuck.
What if the joints act like transistors and amplify the signal?
Of course for a transistor to work, there needs to be a third input.
If the two sides of the joint are Collector and Emmiter, could Mind be the Base, the controling input channel?

---

by Ian

> Karen wrote:
> What is matter? What is mind? What is consciousness? Can we ingest the entire universe in a mere breath?

Can we ingest the entire universe if we hold our breath?

In the Hindu Tradition, the ultimate Pranayama, or breathing exercise, is Kevala Kumbhaka, or the spontaneous cessation of the breath. When this occurs, the state of Dhyana, or sensory withdrawl, or Samadhi, can occur. Samadhi is union with the Divine.

> If our common creator god is all seeing, all knowing, do each and every one of us provide our maker creator with a limited, but no lesser than perspective? Are (we, you, I) his many I's, (eyes)? His magnifying glass?

Yes, I think that we are His his many I's, (eyes). I think this is what Gurdjieff was getting at in BT when he said -

""“When these higher parts of three-brained beings, who are perfected to the corresponding gradation of objective Reason, get there, they fulfill precisely that function of the Okaniaki or 'cells-of-the-head-brain,' for which function, as I have already said, our UNI-BEING COMMON FATHER ENDLESSNESS condescended at the creation of the now existing World, to decide to use for the future those coatings who obtain independent Individuality in the Tetartocosmoses, as an aid for Himself in the administration of the enlarging world." BT page 778.

---

by Chuck

Karen said:

> Can we ingest the entire universe in a mere breath?

Yes, and one of the galaxy of ideas this relates to is according to the principle of scale (Ouspensky, In Search of the Miraculous), one breath of ours equals the day/night of a smaller-scale universe ("large cells"), and the lifetime of a yet smaller one ("small cells"). And so above, as an impression to the Earth is 24 hours and its "breath" is the length of our lifetime. Dimensionality also plays a part:

> ... organic life must inevitably be taken in time. Existence in time is an extension along the fourth dimension. "Neither can the earth be regarded as a three-dimensional body. It would be three dimensional if it were stationary. Its motion around its axis makes man a five dimensional being, whereas its motion around the sun makes the earth itself four dimensional. The earth is not a sphere but a spiral encircling the sun, and the sun is not a sphere but a kind of spindle inside this spiral. -Ouspensky, In Search of the Miraculous

Regards, Chuck

by Judy

I just love the various conceptions of dimensionality. Ouspensky's "A New Model of the Universe" had me in thrall for a very long time. It is challenging and exciting to seriously look at ideas beyond my intellect. Sometimes I wonder if I could have grasped them more clearly when I was a teenager. I don't know.
In an attempt to visualise our star as a moving spindle, I looked up "sun's movement" and found -

> The Sun rotation period about its axis at Equator is 25 Earth days, and at poles is 35 Earth days. The Sun orbits the galaxy at about 220 km/s, taking nearly 220 000 000 years to complete one full orbit (galactic year). This is due to the huge size of our galaxy, and the position of the Sun on it.

(Oh, don't forget that the difference in time between rotation at the equator and rotation at the poles is called "differential rotation" and exists because our star is a huge globe of gas.)
Simple enough? Perhaps; yet putting the whole thing together is still an awe-inspiring exercise.

Chuck wrote:

> The earth is not a sphere but a spiral encircling the sun, and the sun is not a sphere but a kind of spindle inside this spiral. -Ouspensky, In Search of the Miraculous

Got it??
Bravo bravissimo!

---

by Chuck

Thanks, Judy for pointing out that the Sun has different rotation at center and equator. It's this kind of real-world fact that makes it more real to us as we ponder.

Awe-inspiring imagery from Rodney Collin about the 'body of the solar system':

> ...the whole Solar System is driving towards Vega at about 121/2 miles a second. The fact is that in 80 years the sun, drawing the whole radiation of its system behind it, drives forward about 30, 000 million miles into space. The diameter of Neptune's orbit is about 6, 000 million miles. So that the sphere of radiation, the fiery train, or the 'body' of our Solar System in 80 years is a figure about five times longer than its width, or about the proportion of an erect human figure. This is the > silhouette of our solar body.

> Let us remember that the 'moment of perception' of a comparable being looking down upon the Solar System is 80 years. There will then appear to this being an extraordinarily complex and beautiful figure. The planetary paths, drawn out into manifold spirals of various tensions and diameters, have now become a series of iridescent sheaths veiling the long white-hot thread of the sun, each shimmering with its own characteristic colour and sheen, the whole meshed throughout by a gossamer-fine web woven from the eccentric paths of innumerable asteroids and comets, glowing with some sense of living warmth and ringing with an incredibly subtle and harmonious music. -Rodney Collin, The Theory of Celestial Influence

He describes elsewhere how, if you take the paths of the planets around the sun over time as the whole system moves through space, the figure drawn out is a series of coils, a transformer.

Colin also points out that, since light we receive from the planets is almost totally reflected sunlight, the major influence we receive from the planets is magnetic.

Regards, Chuck

---

by Ian

Here's another estimate of our speed thru the universe -

"In the general sense, the absolute velocity of any object through space is not a meaningful question according to Einstein's special theory of relativity, which declares that there is no "preferred" inertial frame of reference in space with which to compare the Galaxy's motion. (Motion must always be specified with respect to another object.)

Astronomers believe the Milky Way is moving at approximately 600 km per second relative to the observed locations of other nearby galaxies. Most recent estimates range from 130 km/s to 1,000 km/s. If the Galaxy is moving at 600 km/s, Earth travels 51.84 million km per day, or more than 18.9 billion km per year, about 4.5 times its closest distance from Pluto. The Galaxy is thought to be moving towards the constellation Hydra, and may someday become a close-knit member of the Virgo cluster of galaxies." http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Milky_Way

On a lighter note - Monty Python's Galaxy Song ...
http://endlesssearch.co.uk/audio/galaxysong.swf

---

by Ian

> Chuck wrote:

> Colin also points out that, since light we receive from the planets is almost totally reflected sunlight, the major influence we receive from the planets is magnetic.

It is interesting to note that Venus has almost no magnetic field...
"... events in the history and evolution of the interior of Venus have left that planet with practically no intrinsic magnetic field. ..."
http://www-ssc.igpp.ucla.edu/personnel/russell/papers/venus_mag/
http://www.freerepublic.com/focus/f-chat/1975217/posts

The differential rotation of the sun is thought to play a part in the sun spot cycle and the reversal of the sun's magnetic field during each sun spot cycle. The differential rotation causes the magnetic field to wrap around itself and get all twisted up....

"... Although the details of sunspot generation are still somewhat a matter of research, it is quite clear that sunspots are the visible counterparts of magnetic flux tubes in the convective zone of the sun that get "wound up" by differential rotation. If the stress on the flux tubes reaches a certain limit, they curl up quite like a rubber band and puncture the sun's surface. At the puncture points convection is inhibited, the energy flux from the sun's interior decreases, and with it the surface temperature...."
http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sunspot

How do sunspots affect life on earth?

---

by Harry

Sunspots create solar storms if they are big enough. This baths the earth in magnetic influences. There are sunspot cycles that have an impact on all broadcasting. It is less noticable in today's world with a network of satellites aiding our broadcast system. But a solar storm can create static that is both visible and audible on earth through our radio, TV and even phone systems.

Does this impact other aspects of life on other? We do know that we can track some solar storms through tree rings. So there is an organic impact. Is that because of changes in weather? We're not really sure.

---

by Ian

Here is a picture of earth's magnetic envelope -

---

by Lawrick

Hey Ian,

This "magnetic envelope" has no doubt reminded you of the images we see as Angels. I've never percieved the Earth as a 3 dimensional radiation field exept as a compressed sphere. I can't imagine seeing it again in any other way as you present it here. Perhaps I needed another form of perception.
Thanks
Fred

Work Program week beginning 23 June 2008

---

by Ian

Cheroke Self Observation Exercise:

1. You need a notebook, large callendar or diary to keep track of your progress.

2. Pick a 10-to-20 minute time frame, any part of your normal day.

3. During this period, watch your every act/movement and your reactions to events. You are looking for anything you do without first thinking of doing it, subconscious actions, things you do automatically, without fore-thought.

Examples:
When you awake, how many times did you blink your eyes before you thought about blinking your eyes?
Which foot touched the floor first? If you stretch, what prompted it, did you actually THINK about it first?

The goal in this is to identify subconscious habits, from the smallest to the bigest, methodically, systematically during rather short periods of time.
Then, increase the length of the time period gradually, until you have observed yourself for one full day. Then, repeat it.

4. Jot down each habit you notice, and the time/date. Each time you do this, each habit (or routine action/reaction) will no longer be a subconscious matter. The more assertive and persistent you are at this process, the better/greater your results.

5. Check your log several times a day and read the entire contents aloud.
Each time you "do" anything previously logged, laugh at yourself and make a tiny change in each act/action but do not totally stop doing it, unless of course, you "dislike" the fact that you did it.

The premise is to reduce the "inventory" of subconsciously prompted acts/reactions by making them "conscious-acts" which you can stop doing by choice.

---

by Harry

I've done this from time to time without using a notebook. Probably because I just don't like taking notes. But also because I believe that as I observe I'm creating my own internal reference. An internal I needs to be created that can view habits without changing them.

The first thing that happens to me is that I begin to feel that the habit is a machine that is running me. That it is something that is using me for its mechanical purposes. I can't fight the machine. But I can watch it work, and strangely enough, just doing this often changes how the gears mech and something unexpected happens.

---

by Dean

This exercise was an eye opener, I realized just how automatic I was and could definitely relate to what Harry said about being run by the machine. I didn't feel I ran my machine, although I could observe it, I usually don't observe in this way, and usually don't write it down. I usually observe in the present moment and just record the various information coming in from outside. This observation was great in the sense that I could see what I was lacking, and I also saw in what direction I should go in order to move forward with my work. One thing I realized is that I don't set nearly enough conscious aims for myself, I realize now that I should always have short and long term aims in the front of my mind in order to gain more force and will.

The habits I wrote down were almost always recurring and I usually couldn't stop them even when I tried. I found the method of laughing to be good to alleviate my own frustration with my mechanical self. I felt almost a sense of paralysis because I realized just how mechanical I was, and felt I was always moving, feeling, and thinking without forethought. This exercise only lasted for a few days before I got sidetracked though, I'll have to work on it more but can be pleased with the fact that I felt I learned something from it that was extremely beneficial.

Regards

Work Program week beginning 30 June 2008

---

by Lift

Theme - Avoiding the Pleasures of Suffering

Our Work requires commitment - commitment to our Aim, commitment to sustained Work efforts to acheive our Aim, commitment to be honest with ourselves, commitment to serve Nature and Endlessness, commitment to Suffer Consciously.

Gurdjieff said something to the effect that the greatest Work we can do is to - "Bear the unpleasant... (manifestations of others...)"

The key words are - "Bear the unpleasant..."

We may wish to Ponder (whilst Sensing Svadistana Chakra - prostate or cervix) such questions as -

Do we use Suffering to enhance our Ego, our Self-importance?
Does "Bearing the unpleasant..." give us a sense of Moral Superiority?
Can we bear the unpleasant manifestations of our own behavior towards others whom we regard as behaving against our standards of behaviour?
What are the standards that we base our criticisms of other's behaviours on?
Do we indulge in behaviours or "I's" that manifest in - Righteous Indignation, Moral Superiority, Holier Than Thou, Take the Mote Out of Your Own Eye?
What pleasure do we gain from criticising others?
What pleasure do we gain from wallowing in self-pity?

Please also pay attention to this quarters Work guidlines from Northeon...
(Work Guidlines for Jul/Aug/Sep 2008 - Annoyances)

---

by Harry

This seems to me where real work begins. This is intentional suffering as opposed to unconscious suffering. And the biggest thing that happens is the choice.

Making the choice is often hard. We're addicted. I often consider de Sade as, perhaps, not to be taken as literally as some people in our modern somewhat perverted culture like to take him. Or maybe that's just Judy Collins ringing in my memory: "Poor old Marat".

---

by Cassandra

I often think of this and am aware of the contest I wage with others to see who's carrying the heavier burden. I'm still in the place where I want there to be points tallied for the one who's 'struggling' most. I think this is because I still see myself separate from others. But to perform best, at least in my case, is no real struggle in the sense of the Work because these endless contests keep me tied to unconsciousness.

---

by Judy

> Do we use Suffering to enhance our Ego, our Self-importance?
> Does "Bearing the unpleasant..." give us a sense of Moral Superiority?
> Can we bear the unpleasant manifestations of our own behavior towards others whom we regard as behaving against our standards of behaviour?
> What are the standards that we base our criticisms of other's behaviours on?
> Do we indulge in behaviours or "I's" that manifest in - Righteous Indignation, Moral Superiority, Holier Than Thou, Take the Mote Out of Your Own Eye?
> What pleasure do we gain from criticising others?
> What pleasure do we gain from wallowing in self-pity?

I've been checking out these questions during the week in various situations.
One of them (it will not be specified 🤔) really trod on one of my corns, as the saying goes.
And I'll need to observe this one quite a bit more to come to any conclusions.

Thanks Lift for such an excellent and practical exercise.

Cassandra, good to hear from you too.
Regards,

---

by Cassandra

Hi Judy,

I'm still here. I appreciate all the posts from everyone relating to both the weekly exercises and BT discussion.

Cassandra

---

by Dean

I would have to say yes to the majority of these questions, I find myself doing most of these things from time to time and they seemed to hit home for me, I realize that I feed my ego with my own smug thoughts and feelings from time to time. Then again this depends on whether I'm on a descending or ascending octave, if I am working sincerely and honestly I don't indulge in these behaviours as often, so it seems it is usually dependent upon my efforts to acutally look at my own reflection rather than pointing out the defects of others. I bear the unpleasant manifestations of others when I am less self serving and am in a state that is balanced, I don't bear the manifestations of others when I have neglected my work and have let myself go, so to speak. I suppose in some ways I still have to find the middle way, that sacred balance of equilibrium that is more eternally impartial.

Work Program week beginning 7 July 2008

---

by Ian

This week, try to have Compassion for your all of your Impressions.
Let your attention be ever vigilant at the gates of perception.
Let every impression pass without question.
Try to assimilate them without judging or catagorizing them.
Accept them for what they are in and of themselves.
Let them 'speak' for themselves and reveal themselves to you in their own time.
Savour your impressions. Linger over their subtle nuances.
Allow them to digest as deeply and finely as you can.

What center or centers do they resonate with?
Can you relax unresponsive centers to encourage three-centered assimilation?

---

by Karen

and so a year goes by and during this period of time from "there" to "here" I have been blessed with being part of the endless search group. thank you all. I am truly grateful. Uncle Fred, thanks for being at the café a year and a half ago. It was the best pull that I had been drawn to in over a decade and saved my life and gave me new life.

Last week something led me to The Inner Journey: The Awakening of Thought, Jeanne de Salzmann

For the first time some of this knowledge became understanding.

recognition of a lack, an incompleteness. To feel the need for real thought, free thought, active thought, whose sole aim and sole object is I…to rediscover I. (remorse of conscience) struggle against passivity of ordinary thought (intentional suffering, law of falling) without effort, thought falls back a sleep (conscious labours)

it is in my essence that I may be re-visited with the one who sees.

The inner look makes me responsible, but is also makes me free. Without this inner look I can only fall back into automatism, under the law of accident.

When self aware I feel the blessing of this look which comes down to embrace me. I become transparent to the light.

Blessed to have entered into this mystery.

∞
Karen

---

by Ian

> Karen wrote:
> I become transparent to the light.

That is a beautiful phrase... Glad you have found your time here helpful.

"In the unitive vision the identity of the individual with the universal is experienced, and it is perceived that this identity encompasses all being as an eternally valid fact. It has not come into being with the seer's attainment to the vision, but simply is. What comes into being, or more truly, is developed in the seer, is the seer's capacity to perceive the identity. In this context it seems meaningless to say that any individual man ever attains anything. The spirit raises its human vehicle out of its own being and, through this vehicle, achieves knowledge both of the qualities it has made manifest to itself and of the undifferentiated and unmanifest being within which all qualities inhere. Our life is its life; our awareness is its awareness; our desire to live, to experience, and to know, is its desire."
(Sri Madhava Ashish in Ginsburg, Seymour B., In Search of the Unitive Vision: Letters of Sri Madhava Ashish to an American Businessman, 1978-1997. Boca Raton: New Paradigm Books, 2001.)
from - http://endlesssearch.co.uk/philo_endlessness.htm

---

by Chuck

This week's exercise taught me a lot about receiving impressions (although there's a long way to go).

In trying to receive impressions more passively and let them 'speak for themselves,' I realized that I 'go out' with my eyes and look at things rather than letting the impressions come in. After all, the light does come into our eyes; we don't 'go out and get it,' but that's the what I observed was happening. I suspect it's quite common.

I wonder if this doesn't create a constant expenditure of energy, possibly even emitting something in 'looking' at things instead of letting them reflect themselves and reveal their nuances more deeply.

Regards, Chuck

---

by Dean

This exercise seemed to give me more of a connection with the external world, I can't say I was compassionate towards all my impressions, but the overall result gave me a more forgiving and conscientious outlook. I often did breathing exercises along with this exercise, and found that having compassion for my movemental, emotional, and intellectual impressions was something that gave me a sense of appreciation for my functions and the work they do.

> What center or centers do they resonate with?
> Can you relax unresponsive centers to encourage three-centered assimilation?

The impressions seemed to resonate with my instinctive center and emotional center quite a bit, but I would have to say that they resonated with all centers, just at different periods of time. Sometimes one center was more active than another, and sometimes they didn't resonate that much when I wasn't putting enough effort forward. I found that sometimes I could relax unresponsive centers quite easily, but other times I couldn't and it took a lot just to take in impressions consciously rather than passively. I notice that relaxing the moving center sometimes helps to calm everything so I can focus on things a bit better, and seems to allow me to absorb impressions without feeling as tense. I suppose this is related to the connection between centers, and also just the fact that making a basic effort sometimes creates a domino affect that can lean in the desired direction.

Regards

---

by Cassandra

> Ian wrote:
> Let your attention be ever vigilant at the gates of perception.

This one strikes me most--how to do this? How to resist stereotyping, if that's what this refers to. This is an excellent task for me--making the effort to encounter people things without preconceived ideas. This makes the Being Parkdolg Duty a practical exercise.

---

by Ian

> Cassandra wrote:
> This one strikes me most--how to do this?

Some of these exercises might be useful... Have a look at the Impartial Attention Exercises on this page - http://endlesssearch.co.uk/exercises_attention.htm

Work Program week beginning 14 July 2008

---

by Judy

This week we have an exercise in taking impressions coming from the external world consciously, specifically those sensory impressions conveyed to us by taking the first mouthful of food at each of our meals.

Take a few moments to collect to a three-centered state. There should ideally be an attitude of reverence and gratitude.

Observe as many sensory impressions as you can – for example, taste according to whether bitter sweet salty pungent aromatic etc, texture, temperature, any sounds, visual impressions before food enters mouth, the touch of the food on tongue teeth gums, note any odors or smells of the food. Of course this can be expanded upon as time and circumstances allow. Be creative.

The main thing is to observe and remember yourself during the process of imbibing the first mouthful of food from the 14 to 21 meals of the week.

Each time you forget to take the first mouthful consciously, there is a small payment to be made. This time you will not give up the next cup of coffee/tea, but rather will take it differently. That is, if usually white, it is to be taken black; if usually with sugar – no sugar. You may prefer to not have it at all, but that is not the point here.

Score yourself out of the total number of meals. Keep this in a workbook where it can be compared with in say, a year's time. And you may wish to share it here.

****

Pondering:

“People all think the world is outside them. But the world is inside you. The world is how you take it.”

and:

“Now the Work says that you can take external impressions coming from the external phenomenal world mechanically or consciously. It also says that unless you begin to take them consciously, you remain a machine driven by life.” (from Nicoll, pp1307 and 1308)

The idea behind this pondering is to consider a little more generally than our exercise permits, as to how we can take some of our regular impressions more consciously. Are we being driven by external life events all the time, or are we selecting those few we wish to respond to and separating (non-identifying) from the rest?

We need quite a repertoire of these regular happenings, in order to keep one or two conscious attempts happening regularly. So I'm suggesting you may wish to choose one to add to your daily work and to be altered when it becomes mechanical from repetition. It sounds just a tiny thing. Over time it may be most important.

Remember to sense the body and quiet the emotions while pondering.

The relevant Commentary “The External World and the Internal World” will provide further food for thought – Nicoll, pp1307-1308.

---

by Chuck

Yuck. That's the taste of coffee, black. I did pretty well last Monday until dinner time (first meal at home), and then I completely forgot about the exercise, so coffee on Tues was black. The week continued this way, with a generally improved remembering to do the exercise, but some digressions. Once I had the first bite in my mouth when I remembered!

This is a great exercise, and the "incentive" is very creative (diabolical). The exercises we've been having lately about eating and taking in impressions have emphasized how important our state is while ingesting the three being-foods. I've come a long way in this regard the past few weeks, but it only points out how far there is to go. I have a checklist of Work things to do each day, and I've added meals to it.

On the ponderings, I spent some time with “people all think the world is outside them. But the world is inside you. The world is how you take it.” At first, I didn't get "the world is how you take it," but after rereading Judy's comment about selecting those impressions to respond to and non-identifying with the rest, it became more clear.

Regards,
Chuck

---

by Chuck

Just a quick note - I read the Nicoll reference that Judy gave with this exercise just now. It expanded the subject quite a bit, and it's only a couple of pages long.

Regards, Chuck

---

by Lawrick

Excellent exercise Judy. Like Chuck, I took my morning coffee black two days in a row and that was enough for me. An unthought of benefit was a certain self observation while I was preparing my meals. One day it lasted for both the preparation and the dinner. It evolved to a prayer of Grace, and the breathing G. suggests after a meal. I couldn't get to sleep that night.

Another thing I must remind myself is that life is precious and the means to keep my physical body going is an enormous gift given the starvation that affects so much of our world. Quite humbling we we think about it.

Last Thursday I bought my neice Karen a delicious dinner in our favorite restaurant. (Sorry Karen)  I was aware enough to observe whether or not she would participate in the exercise. Alas it was not to be. After sampling her meal and telling me how delicious it was, her face grew a little red and she mentioned her forgetting the exercise. I thought, after one bite, she deserves a mulligan. So you see very well that the exercise in observation and remembering was quite effective for us.

So at lunch today I just dove into the trough forgetting everything until I caught myself again. Geez Louise) So perhaps this effort will also grow some legs in the future.

As to the ponder, I must admit that with rare exceptions, I still experience the world as something beyond myself. Ian's picture of the Earth and its magnetic field produced a very powerful and I believe life lasting image as Earth, the Angel. Did this come from within? I believe so. It was like recognizing the form of my Mother resplendantly dressed for a wedding. The need to balance was my thought form so perhaps I'm part way home.

Thanks again Jude,
Lawrick

---

by Dean

I did very poorly at this exercise for the first few days, I constantly found myself eating mechanically without much remembrance. As the week progressed however, I actually remembered beforehand to be grateful and appreciative and kept my attention alive while chewing. I definitely noticed that a lot of the meal experience is lost without actually being aware while eating. Being more aware brought many impressions that even seemed to last in my memory somewhat. When I failed to take in the full impression I would pause and breathe for a certain number of repititions, denying myself food until I gained my footing again. I also had the thought that I don't observe vibrations from taste nearly enough, and should make this a daily exercise so I'm grateful and not just eating unconsciously.

> “People all think the world is outside them. But the world is inside you. The world is how you take it.”

Pondering this is definitely a positive line of thought which can bring about some insights beyond the usual. The fact that all these varied impressions from outside can lead to conscious assimilation of impressions, is quite uplifting, just knowing that you don't have to be sunk in the myre of negativity is a plus in itself. Of course knowing and doing are two different things, but the idea that you don't have to react and can guide your attitudes down the right path is quite inspirational.

Thanks Judy

---

by Chuck

First of all, nice quote in your signature Dean.

Some "food for thought" - what do you folks think of this advice?

We should all eat more consciously, but also be aware of being in higher parts of centers when we do so. Something like this:

- If you're cooking, try to prepare food consciously. Gurdjieff often cooked for his students, and one wonders if he put some hanbledzoin in the food, besides all the red pepper.
- Serve your food using the best dinnerware, glasses and silverware you possess
- Dress appropriately for intake of first-being food, one of the more important activities of the day
- Sit up straight at the table
- Avoid reading miscellaneous bits of paper/mail/newspaper that are lying around. The lowest part of the intellectual center is behind this.
- Eat in the (more civilized) European manner, using knife and fork. Keep your fork in the left hand, tines facing down. At no time do the tines of your fork face upward. To eat small items like peas, you have to push them onto the back of the fork and smush them so they stay, or balance them there. The idea is to not bolt our food, but eat more deliberately and consciously. This will certainly do it!
- Try not to talk much, and speak quietly and deliberately when you do so.
- If there is more than one Work person present, one can be the appointed server so that the other(s) can concentrate on eating.
- The idea is to bring into play higher parts of the moving center (eating deliberately with controlled movements) and the intellectual center (assuming proper conversation or pondering), but we also need the emotional center. Try playing appropriate music from conscious artists before/during the meal or viewing high-level works of art before eating (keep a picture book of da Vinci's works/drawings, or poetry from Rilke around and view for a few minutes before/after eating). During the meal, ponder what went into creating the food/meal/table settings around you and feel the weight of supporting the maintenance of all.

Thanks for your input,
Chuck

Work Program week beginning 21 July 2008

---

by Ian

1. In moments when your patience wears thin, endure a little longer with a super effort comprising of a sub-vocal repetition of a phrase such as "All things must pass", combined with an inner-smile and while sensing your four limbs.

2. Observe your Inner Considering. Take a snapshot of posture, breathing, thoughts, sensations and emotions. Take the snapshot from the visualized point of view of being up in a tree looking down at yourself and the situation.

3. Each morning upon arising, pray without stretched, sensed arms :
Oh Endlessness, help me on the way ...
to enjoy the unenjoyable ...
to like the unlikable ...
to love the unlovable ...

4. Do the ten bone exercise each evening while pondering the question : Does our searching sustain His Endlessness?

5. Perform a Heptachord of Sensing before each meal:

Begin each item with a deep in breath. Perform each item during a long out breath.

1. Relax all three centers.
2. Sightless Gaze - one attends to ones total visual field as one diffuse, panoramic field of light, taking in everything without identifying or labelling the impressions as things or actions, good or bad, pleasant or unpleasant.
3. Soundless Sound - one attends to ones total aural field as one omnidirectional field of sound, taking in everything without identifying or labelling the impressions as things or actions, good or bad, pleasant or unpleasant.
4. Odourless Odour - one attends to all odours taking in every odour without identifying or labelling the impressions as things or actions, good or bad, pleasant or unpleasant.
5. Tasteless Taste - one attends to all taste impressions, taking in everything without identifying or labelling the impressions as things or actions, good or bad, pleasant or unpleasant.
6. Touchless Touch - one attends to all the sensations in the body, from the skin to the bone marrow, taking in all sensations without identifying or labelling the impressions as things or actions, good or bad, pleasant or unpleasant.
7. Breath in - an ascending octave of "AIEIOIUOA" is sounded on the out breath from base of spine to crown of head.

---

by Cassandra

> Ian wrote:
> 1. In moments when your patience wears thin, endure a little longer with a super effort comprising of a sub-vocal repetition of a phrase such as "All things must pass", combined with an inner-smile and while sensing your four limbs..

I had many chances to practice this task but could only collect myself well enough to do it 3 maybe 4 times. I often find I'm too caught up in form to do something like this effectively, like 'how many times should I repeat the phrase' and so on. I think this insight lets me know how bothered my lower selves are with anything that challenges usual habits. I encounter such strong resistance. My mind tells me this takes too much time.

> Ian wrote:
> 2. Observe your Inner Considering. Take a snapshot of posture, breathing, thoughts, sensations and emotions. Take the snapshot from the visualized point of view of being up in a tree looking down at yourself and the situation. .

Now, I've done this one some the last few days-acutally I forgot this specific task but was attempting it anyway in a more general way. I think often of internal considering and the acknowledgement I think I should have. I've thought about this more from a behavioral stance--smiling and attempting to encourage others in a simple way, rather than seeking something from others-attention, respect.

> Ian wrote:
> 3. Each morning upon arising, pray without stretched, sensed arms :
> Oh Endlessness, help me on the way ...
> to enjoy the unenjoyable ...
> to like the unlikable ...
> to love the unlovable ....

This was harder for me to really be sincere with because I realize how difficult the unenjoyable and unlikable can be. I had to ask myself each time if I meant what I was asking.

> Ian wrote:

> 4. Do the ten bone exercise each evening while pondering the question : Does our searching sustain His Endlessness?

I attempted this 3 times about but often drifted off to sleep before finishing.

> Ian wrote:
> Heptachord of Sensing before each meal:....

I did this one several times, but my efforts seemed to dissipate because I would go right into talking with others or typing at the computer while eating.

---

by Dean

> 2. Observe your Inner Considering. Take a snapshot of posture, breathing, thoughts, sensations and emotions. Take the snapshot from the visualized point of view of being up in a tree looking down at yourself and the situation.

This was an effective exercise to help with internal considering, I often times found myself being aware of my facial expression, emotional states and postures the most, although I was also sometimes aware of my sensations and thoughts as well. Visualizing the situation from above was something I've done before, actually just a few weeks ago I was doing this exercise quite regularly and always find that it gives an impression that gives some real perspective on the insignificance of the situation. Taking the snapshot of myself beforehand actually seemed to help the visualizing process and I think I visualized myself better and more accurately probably. I also felt less identified when doing this exercise, it usually gave that feeling almost instantly.

> 3. Each morning upon arising, pray without stretched, sensed arms :
> Oh Endlessness, help me on the way ...
> to enjoy the unenjoyable ...
> to like the unlikable ...
> to love the unlovable ...

Doing this upon arising is a great way to start the day, I often found myself doing it during the day too, it seems to resonate with me well when I really feel strong resistance to something. I many times feel a rising sense of happiness when I perform this prayer, it lifts me up when I'm feeling down and also gives more initiative and drive to struggle with my subjective likes and dislikes.

> 4. Do the ten bone exercise each evening while pondering the question : Does our searching sustain His Endlessness?

This was a difficult question to ponder, I thought that our searching does sustain something that is connected with His Endlessness and His aim. I thought that our search for conscious evolution is the aim of the universe in general, the universe also must evolve and basically has the same aim which is to develop and grow. With this thought in mind I came to the conclusion that we must sustain something on our level, if not knowledge in general to pass on to future generations, then perhaps something to do with cosmic substances used for a cosmic purpose. I don't necessarily think that we literally sustain our Endessness, just because Endlessness is infinite in relation to us, and we are many light years away, but who knows?, I certainly don't.

Regards

---

by Karen

"All things must pass"
This is very helpful in times of stress and trying moments. I visualize the four corners, turn myself into the cylinder barrel and send everything else to the devil. This assists with remembering. Beautiful! thank you

Ian wrote:

> 4. Odourless Odour - one attends to all odours taking in every odour without identifying or labelling the impressions as things or actions, good or bad, pleasant or unpleasant.

I had trouble with this one, especially while in the outhouse at the lake. I can't say that I succeeded with enjoy the unenjoyable in this instance.

So many impressions have been labeled for so long that it was a very difficult exercise to say the least.

Ian also writes:

> 7. Breath in - an ascending octave of "AIEIOIUOA" is sounded on the out breath from base of spine to crown of head.

On the Sunday before this post I was re-centering myself prior to waking for the day and AIEIOIUOA appeared as a picture in my mind's eye. A feeling of complete peace and grace washed over me.

I would like to know more about AIEIOIUOA so I can begin to understand it. Any suggestions?

---

by Chuck

Hi Karen,

The elusive AIEIOIUOA. There's not a lot of info, but here are a couple of references. In BT Chapter 17:

> (referring to AIEIOIUOA) "And this cosmic law is, that there proceeds within every arising large and small, when in direct touch with the emanations either of the Sun Absolute itself or of any other sun, what is called 'Remorse,' that is a process, when every part that has arisen from the results of any one Holy Source of the Sacred Triamazikamno, as it were, 'revolts,' and 'criticizes' the former unbecoming perceptions and the manifestations at the moment, of another part of its whole -a part obtained from the results of another Holy Source of the same fundamental sacred Cosmic Law of Triamazikamno.
> "And this sacred process 'Aieioiuoa' or 'Remorse' always proceeds with the 'Omnipresent-Active-Element-Okidanokh' also.

A bit clearer is this excerpt from Ian's talk on 'Neologisms in Beelzebub's Tales':

> "The motive force that drives us towards being-Partkdolg-duty comes from the promptings of our Conscience. Conscience is the one higher emotion that remains uncorrupted in the depths of our “unconscious” mind and that is available to us to retrieve and use for our evolution. One aspect of Conscience is Remorse of Conscience. The concept of Remorse is expressed by the Neologism AIEIOIUOA. AIEIOIUOA is mentioned 5 times in the Tales; Remorse is mentioned 33 times; Conscience is mentioned 92 times. The number of times these words are mentioned is indicative of the importance that Gurdjieff placed on this feeling."

> http://www.endlesssearch.co.uk/philo_neologism_talk_ae2008.htm

There's some more on that page about it also.

Finally, as a person with great visualization capability, you might find this writeup by Will Mesa interesting - concerning AIEIOIUOA/remorse and a certain picture of Gurdjieff http://www.gurdjieff-internet.com/article_details.php?ID=280&W=21

Regards,
Chuck

---

by Karen

Thank you Chuck

---

by Judy

Hi everyone,

> 4. Odourless Odour - one attends to all odours taking in every odour without identifying or labelling the impressions as things or actions, good or bad, pleasant or unpleasant.

I have observed some unexpected things while attempting this. I previously had little idea (if any) that my body even expresses its dislike of unpleasant odours by various manifestations. The two most notable were a slight wrinkling of the nose and, in one case, whilst walking on a city pavement, the whole body just automatically moved away from the smell. I mean, there was no intention to move away that I was aware of. The body just expressed its own version of "dislike" or "unpleasant".
I thus see that I'm ever so far from "odourless odour", in that the labelling is so fast that I haven't been able to intervene.
However, when I first began work with negative emotions, the main thing I was able to do was to stop expression of them by the body/form, so I'm doing a similar thing here and working on not expressing any negative sensory impression of odour.

Is this a reasonable way to go here?
Anyone else care to share their experience with this one?
Regards,

---

by Cassandra

Judy wrote:
Hi everyone,

> 4. Odourless Odour - one attends to all odours taking in every odour without identifying or labelling the impressions as things or actions, good or bad, pleasant or unpleasant....The body just expressed its own version of "dislike" or "unpleasant".
> I thus see that I'm ever so far from "odourless odour", in that the labelling is so fast that I haven't been able to intervene....However, when I first began work with negative emotions, the main thing I was able to do was to stop expression of them by the body/form.

Judy, I can relate to the automatic reaction to physical sensations. It's as though there are ready made labels or reactions to the weather for me. Right now it's very warm where I live, and most people are used to commenting on the heat and humidity. I said I wouldn't complain or make a negative remark about the heat. Just go with it, after all it is summer. I also find it interesting that you noticed negativity expressed by your body. I'm guessing you mean facial expressions, body posture. I will try noticing negativity in my body presentation as well.

Work Program week beginning 28 July 2008

---

by Harry

This is from the August issue of Esquire Magazine.
http://www.esquire.com/features/75-things-0808
It is from an article entitled "The 75 Things Every Man Should Do". It is presented to show that a real work exercise can be found in the most unusual place:

No. 48. Take a vow. Keep it.

Whatever you choose, it should be hard and it should be obvious. Give up watching sports for a year. Or give up drinking for three weeks. Celibacy for three months (or three days). Silence for three hours (then three weeks). Measure your own habits carefully; a good vow should put you in deep tension with them.

---

by Dean

The vow I chose to commit to was not eating fast food for the rest of the month, something I do on a fairly regular basis because it is convenient and easy. Although I usually order something light, I realize that America's conception of health is quite atrocious and I can't really justify gorging on it regularly. I remember hearing somewhere that salads from Mcdonalds are almost just as fattening as anything else on the menu, which makes sense if you take into account that they have cheese, dressing and usually chicken or something included. So now instead of being insincere and justifying this habit, I'll do things the hard way and go shopping for more nutritious alternatives. This will no doubt cause quite a bit of tension in me because my instinctive center is quite used to it, and because it's more convenient overall. Another vow I was thinking of is connected with my chief feature and promising myself that I will pray for remorse every time I observe this weakness within myself. Chief feature is a difficult thing to take on, and I think it can be related to intentional suffering which is something I inevitably avoid, although recently I've been succeeding a bit more at it. I suppose it's just a gradual chipping away at it until it is clearly revealed and reconciled, but it's a challenge and a struggle, not to say that it ever will be completely reconciled though.

We'll see  how it goes I suppose...

---

by Harry

Dean,

I think you'll find that you're building your will. As I said before, I fast twice a year as G explains in All and Everything. And initially it is interesting to have to pay attention that nothing

I eat has any cholesterol.

Remember to eat consciously whenever you can. It will help with the vow.

---

by Cassandra

I've been thinking about this one for a while. First, I decided my vow would be to give up processed sugar for 6 months or until the new year. That's actually something I had started before the work exercise was posted. I'm still committed to this, which is a challenge, but not really that difficult because I can get sugar in fruits. So, taking Harry's suggestion that the vow be something very difficult and after reading Dean's post about chief feature, I decided to vow not to day dream for a period. This is a big challenge for me because this habit has been entrenched so deeply since I was about 12 years old. The phrase 'forty days and forty nights' came across in something I read recently where this period was necessary for something to become fixed. I know this is just a symbol of some sort and am not expecting a fix after 40 days, but it's a useful guide for me. My vow is to not day dream for 40 days and nights. I've already day dreamed several times since taking the vow, but at least my vow helps me to bring more awareness to what I'm doing and provides the chance for me to connect again to my promise. My hope though is that I will be able to clear space enough for higher energies to impress upon my being.

---

by Harry

Cassandra,

About sugar: are you aware how many things it exists in? As a Type 2 diabetic, it was something I had to learn. Reading labels is something I got very used to. Through my own fasts. So looking for carbs became relatively easy.

Forty days is a great period. One ninth of a year?

---

by Cassandra

Harry,

I know sugar is contained in many processed foods. I've tried to limit eating those as well, just paying more attention to packaged foods and asking whether there's a 'real' food alternative.

The thing about building will through efforts like this is not real clear. I understand it on some level, but I have to be careful not to confuse will building with self-determination and ego enhancement--thinking (small) I's can achieve. Anybody have suggestions for reading? Thanks.

---

by Harry

If you haven't read Nicoll, then I'd suggest picking up the Commentaries. If there is one Work author who provides practical feedback on ideas Nicoll is that author. I'd put Commentaries at the top of any list after G and O.

---

by Judy

Hi Cassandra,
I second Harry's suggestion of the Commentaries. I read one most mornings. It sets an improved state for the day.
Kind regards,

---

by Cassandra

Thanks for the suggestions both Judy and Harry. I will check out Nicoll. But I was asking especially about any readings on building the will.

Cassandra

---

by Harry

Try All and Everything. In the neighborhood of pp. 1200. Also look at the relationship between Partkdolg Duty and Will. 485. There is more about 1020.

---

by Judy

Hi Cassandra,
There is a whole chapter devoted to techniques for strengthening the personal will in Roberto Assagioli's book Psychosynthesis. It is esoteric psychology, not Gurdjieffan as such, but has reminders of Alice Bailey's work and Theosophical thought. You may find it of interest as a stepping-stone.

Having said that, though, there is still much in Nicoll's Commentaries (and of course in all of Gurdjieff's own writings) which is a great help. And all the weekly exercises to build the Emotional Body (G's kesdjanian body) are in fact assisting whether we are aware of this or not. The main thing is to keep working daily. I do understand your desire for exact theory though. It can satisfy the curiosity and this sometimes assists a lot with the perseverence aspect of things.

Kind regards,

---

by Cassandra

Hi Judy and Harry,

With only a small amount of effort (thanks to Chuck's guide on navigating the site), I found Nicoll's commentaries and will start with those. Many thanks to you both.

Cassandra

Work Program week beginning 4 August 2008

---

by Ian

This weeks theme: All-Brains-Balanced-Being-Perception

The theme is a phrase that Gurdjieff used in Beelzebub's Tales to describe the state of a person with Being. Mr. Beidler described it like this : "We are "harmonized" when our three centers are coordinated in unison rather than "in chaos" when each center acts independantly of the others (our usual, normal, mechanical condition). We approach harmony when the three centers are each relaxed because then they are comfortably related to one another. In meditation we try to be as physically relaxed or loose as possible, to which is added a neutral emotional condition, to which is added a quiet mind (no thought). A goal is to do everything with the three centers harmoniously related."

Daily Pondering: Where is the Rememberer who harmonizes the three centers?

Daily exercise 1: Quiet meditation or sitting. Relax the three centers and watch the breath. Keep the eyes open and use the Sightless Gaze and Soundless Sound. Avoid focusing on objects within the visual and auditory fields. Quiet the mind. Repetition of a prayer, mantra, aphorism or affirmation may help to calm the mechanical chatter of an agitated mind.

Daily exercise 2: Whenever you are walking during the day, use the 12 Joint Exercise. At every 5th or 6th step, move your attention from joint to joint following the sequence below. While sensing each joint, repeat inwardly the corresponding word from the Holy Affirming Prayer. Silently Ponder the meaning of each word without expecting any answers. Try to maintain a neutral emotional state.

Sensing Sequence - Inner Prayer
---
1. Right wrist - Holy
2. Right elbow - Affirming
3. Right shoulder - Holy
4. Left hip - Denying
5. Left knee - Holy
6. Left ankle - Reconciling
7. Right ankle - Transubstantiate
8. Right knee - In
9. Right hip - Me
10. Left shoulder - For
11. Left elbow - My
12. Left wrist - Being

Daily exercise 3: Take a routine task (eg. washing dishes, making bed, dressing, cleaning) and perform it with great care, slowly and deliberately, being aware of the sensations of each motion. Evoke a Inner Smile while performing the task. Ponder - How can I make routine intentional?

Daily exercise 4: When a Corn has been popped, instead of avoiding the suffering by self-calming, transform it into a delectable treat by adding salt and butter while it is still warm, by - accepting the suffering as a required function of all life; realizing that the energy generated is food for the moon and for your being; sensing your shoulders and hips.

---

by Harry

I don't think a day goes by without my doing this sensing sequence. This helps me find inner quiet and balance. Especially when doing simple things like walking to class.

---

by Chuck

The 12-joint exercise was wonderful and provides another way to work with the skeletal system, something I'm realizing is of major importance.

I loved doing this exercise, although often would not make it all the way through without being distracted. Most joints were sensed readily, but the hips are more difficult for me. Touching the hip briefly seemed to help.

For Daily exercise #3, I took washing dishes since it falls into a small existing goal of handling dishes more intentionally. I tend to rush, try to carry too many at once from dishwasher to cabinet, move before completely grabbing a dish, etc. The result is that I break a lot of dishes. Moving more intentionally and forcing myself to slow down was good Work.

Regards, Chuck

---

by Dean

Hey there everyone,

> Quiet meditation or sitting. Relax the three centers and watch the breath. Keep the eyes open and use the Sightless Gaze and Soundless Sound. Avoid focusing on objects within the visual and auditory fields. Quiet the mind. Repetition of a prayer, mantra, aphorism or affirmation may help to calm the mechanical chatter of an agitated mind.

This balancing of the three centers is both relaxing and energizing, I've been quite busy lately so I had to resort to doing this exercise while working or doing other activities, although later in the week I found time for some quiet meditation and sitting. It definitely works while being active too, I found it a great way to combat stress that could arise from various hectic situations or environments. The sightless gaze seems to help train the peripheral vision and perception in general is opened up to a greater degree, the thing that helps this along for me recently is dividing my attention between myself looking and what I am looking at. For some reason or other I found it quite difficult to focus my attention without this, although generally I like to include it anyway because it makes a seperation between the external and internal that is quite distinct and leads to strong impressions of my presence. The soundless sound usually creates strange moments when I hear sound vibrations as just a stream of sound rather than a sound accompanied by a label or association. Listening to cars traveling along the highway was a sound that sticks in my consciousness for some reason, it sounded somewhat futuristic to me while I did this exercise. I used the phrase "It's all or nothing" to motivate myself and to remember to make super efforts, but overall I felt my efforts were lacking a bit this week and experienced some unnecessary suffering that could have been prevented if I hadn't neglected my work earlier on, some forms of zilnotrago along with some drinking that sent the ship off course for a length of time.

> Where is the Rememberer who harmonizes the three centers?

I felt the Rememberer was sometimes in my physical centers, the moving-instinctive center but also noticed my emotional center as well at different moments. Usually I started with relaxing the muscles and doing the sightless gaze and soundless sound, and the emotional Rememberer came later when a certain energy was acquired. Putting myself in a neutral emotional state was assisted with watching the breath, although I can't say my emotions were completely neutral.

The 12 joint exercise was new to me and it took part of a day to get it down, the day after I did it for much of the day while walking around at work and it gave great results. I was having some trouble with a descending octave that I mentioned earlier, and this exercise seemed like the only thing that I could concentrate on, perhaps because it was new to me and because I enjoy the 10 bone exercise as well. Anyway this exercise helped to lift me out of that pitiful state and bring me back to a state of clarity and a more positive attitude.

Thanks

Work Program week beginning 11 August 2008

---

by Ian

This weeks theme: Attachments

Begin the day by entering a deep state of detachment through meditation. Relax the physical, emotional and intellectual centers. Notice any sensations, feelings and thoughts that may disturb the relaxation and ask what attachments lie behind them.

During the morning, observe the physical center. What sensations are you attached to? What things are you physically attached to? What sensations do you have at the loss of your attachments? What sensations to my attachments serve? Sense the arms and legs.

During the afternoon, observe the intellectual center. What thoughts are you attached to? What ideas, things or people are you intellectually attached to? What thoughts do you have at the loss of your attachments? What opinions to my attachments serve? Sense the head and face.

During the evening, observe the emotional center. What emotional states are you attached to? What things or people are you emotionally attached to? What emotions do you feel at the loss of your attachments? What needs to my attachments serve? Sense the solar plexus and chest.

In the evening, after entering a state of all-brains-balanced-being-perception, Ponder: "How are my attachments related to my self-importance?"

---

by Dean

Beginning the day with the relaxation of the three centers put me into a calmer state than usual, most of the time the machine starts to think negatively about the day ahead, or begins to worry a bit, but this didn't allow for that since my attention was occupied with concentrating on the exercise. Also any nervous tension was neutralized, sometimes in the morning I wake up in a bad state, perhaps because I didn't get good quality sleep, or sometimes I think associations that flow in the form of dreams can cause a bad attitude towards things, although sometimes the opposite happens and I wake up in a good state as well. Various things that disturbed the relaxation were imagination often times connected with obligations or people, sometimes certain ideas and attitudes I have which may be somewhat true but are taken too far to an extreme. Also sights and sounds, and just the fact that I usually get out of bed without doing a meditation, so my moving center wanted to get up and go, most of the time I start off with observation or some elementary exercises to get the day started so their was some automatic attachments that acted as denying forces.

The first sensation I was connected to was the warm water of the shower which is usually quite pleasing and I could say that I was attached to it to a certain degree. When I got ready and went outside the surrounding landscape, especially the various colors of the sky was something that I was definitely attached to, I always like the hues that are on the horizon, especially in the morning and in the evening because they sometimes have a varied number of colors that are blended in the atmosphere. When driving I'm usually attached to the music I'm listening to, it differs according to my emotional and mental states, although it doesn't always correspond necessarily. Earlier in the week I listened to a lot of heavier music, but it mellowed out a bit later in the week, although I have a subwoofer system in my car and I like listening to music that has a lot of bass, partially because it sounds great, but also probably because of a certain attitude I have towards "lunatics," and I usually justify this by thinking that it is good to shock the lunatics once in awhile. Although at other times I listen to music that seems to reconcile this feeling and I find peace with those who haven't had the same influences I've had. I realized how much I was attached to music when my subwoofer started to cut out, I got a bit annoyed for a period of time but it blew over and I didn't let it send me on a downward spiral or anything. Sensing the arms and legs usually gives an impression that I'm a biped being with appendages for various purposes and reasons.

I'm intellectually attached to the system for the most part, some other philosophers also sometimes passed through my mind once in a while though. One idea that I was a bit attached to during the week was something I mentioned above, the ideas of Ouspensky about lunatics and tramps, and I connected this with the idea of the law of association. Sometimes my opinions seem only to serve my ego, I sometimes imagine myself having conversations about certain issues that I find to be injustices, but in general I catch myself and counteract it with some form of exercise. I don't have too many thoughts about losing these thoughts which serve as a denying force for me because I've observed the revolving wheel of these impressions too much in the past to have a big reaction to them.

I was definitely emotionally attached to people probably the most, sometimes it was just internal considering or feeling self pity or a false feeling of self worth and vanity etc. The people I was attached to included family, friends, my ex girlfriend, and the people I work with. Sometimes this was conscious love so I couldn't consider it attachment in the usual sense, but sometimes I felt some of the above mentioned unbecoming traits, sometimes while singing a sad song in my head which is quite comical in retrospect. These attachments really just served internal considering, sometimes writing up accounts against people, something Nicoll explains, but I don't let that get out of hand now that I have the knowledge.

My attachments are directly related to my self importance and feeling I'm worth something in relation to the sociological stage perhaps, kind of funny since I'm quite against the whole game of status based on mechanical morality. Although over the course of this summer I've been able to accept this a lot more than in the past. My attachments basically just serve my vanity and self love and other things connected with it, the dragon hasn't been slain and has perhaps grown in size, after all G says where there is much good there is much bad.

Kind regards

by Dean

One big attachment that I forgot to mention which is both intellectual and emotional is the forum, and the people on this site. I always find myself imagining what I'm going to post next, and also thinking of other's posts they've made. This isn't necessarily always a negative attachment but sometimes it gets out of hand and I have to center myself a bit. It makes sense since I've never met a person interested in G, and probably not a person in a higher state of consciousnes, unless I didn't know about it. I've met some people interested in the whole New Age trend and also meditation, but they're usually just identified with the imagery or some of the theoretical aspects of these subjects. I've also been somewhat attached to Alchemy, the Tarot, and the Kabbalah recently, but I connect it with the system and it only turns negative when I begin to 'wiseacre' too much, or begin to believe what others have to say on the subject which generally doesn't happen as much as it used to.

Be well my fellow friends and revolutionary evolutionists...

---

by Cassandra

Dean, sounds like you've gone really deep with this task. I found it hard to get past the mechanics of thinking about physical, emotional, and intellectual associations. The same things kept occuring each day. Maybe these are so large that they take up a big bunch of energy in each of these centers. I found that when I thought of a physical attachment, it morphed into an emotional one and maybe intellectual, too. For instance, an emotional attachment to someone also evoked physical attachments and then intellectual back and forth about the reasons and the good of it all. I didn't do the sensing part of the exercise well, mostly I forgot it.

But on another note, with building the Will. I've noticed changes in myself as far as not being compelled (so much) to express negative emotions and just generally being quieter, not insisting my opinion be heard. My ego very easily coops any "progress" I may accord myself. I tell myself "I'm doing, making progress," which is a delusion. The point is that that same small self is still hovering. Nothing has really changed.

Cassandra

---

by Dean

Yeah, I know what you mean Cassandra, the centers seem to be so closely connected and overlap so much that I also had that same impression when doing this exercise. I basically just tried not to overcomplicate things too much and basically thought in terms of positive and negative attachments and which center they would probably be ascribed to. Some of the attachments I mentioned could definitely fall under the category of another center as well, but sometimes this could also be a subcenter or a part of a center, like the emotional part of the instinctive center or the emotional part of the intellectual center etc. Attachments usually have an emotional element I think, but sometimes they could also be governed by the moving/mechanical subcenter as well, I had a song in my head for at least two days straight, I felt this was the outcome of a combination of emotional and moving/mechanical subcenters filling my intellectual center. It was helpful to just observe or do something that would fill the intellectual space with something else, since after awhile even something like having a song stuck in your head can drain energy slowly but surely.

Building will is a difficult thing, since in reality true will is one of the last things in the work, but starting off with small things and working your way up is probably the way to go as with most things. It sounds like you're already making progress, non expression of negative emotions is an important step and takes a certain amount of will. Some advice that has worked for me is first having a conscious aim and sometimes to help the accomplishing of an aim I pray, because it has a positive emotional effect, and will is basically a function of the emotional center, although prayer helps to steady the mind and keep it focused as well. Prayer is effort in all three centers, you can make your own or repeat one you've heard as well. If I don't follow through with my aim I then pray for forgiveness, and try to experience remorse for not holding true to my aim. I always find this as a helpful way to try to build will since it makes me feel obligated. Other than that I sometimes think along the lines of the yogis, monks and fakirs that are mentioned in ISOTM, how much will they must have in order to do what they do, or past saints that have made tremendous efforts to attain something consciously. Visualization is useful as well, sometimes visualizing yourself with a certain attitude or emotional state can help the process along, I sometimes visualize myself being extremely serious about my aim, or else very devoted, or very joyful and happy to be a good servant. Will requires the proper shocks that can bring about the reconciling force which is usually emotional, the combination of the intellect and emotional force can then overcome the negative effects of the mechanical/moving center.

Talk to ya later

---

by Cassandra

> Dean wrote:
> Prayer is effort in all three centers...

Prayer is a good thing to do; and if as you say, effort in all 3 centers, all the better. I can't say that I know what working from all 3 centers simultaneously is, but if prayer achieves this, I have something to latch onto.

---

by Karen

I lost my voice at the beginning of this week for 4 days and when I asked myself Why?, the message I got was that it was an experiment that would only last 3 days with the following:

"Purpose—listen more, talk less and grab those negative emotions before they pull you back to where you were before you were in the work".

This loss made me aware of how attached I was to the voice and everything that goes with it. How energy leaks by overuse without even knowing it. How useless rambling and small talk depletes energy and how much talk occurs throughout the course of a day.

Day 1 - Monday
I was excited by the opportunity to be silent and to observe the various manifestations in myself and others.

Day 2 - Tuesday
Some frustration and exhaustion set in by my inability to be understood by anyone. It was tiring to get a few words out in a mere whisper.

When I went to order chinese food the lady started to talk to me like I was deaf and was motioning sympathetically in an uncomfortable "what do I do fashion?" or was that just a reflection in the mirror?

A teller at the supermarket looked at me like I was rude because I never spoke but just handed her my bank and points card.

Day 3 & 4 - Wednesday, Thursday
I call in sick to rest my voice. Woe is me begins to set in. Thoughts like "don't they get it, I told them it strains me to speak, yet they continue to call and ask questions and demand of me" ohh self-love, vanity and pride and all kinds of other devils.

I observed my moving/instinctive centre making hand motions, facial expression, neck tilts and all kinds of things to try to get my message across. My hand went for a paper and a pen in frustration.

Intellectual centre - I caught myself giving weight to worry and uncertainty. Thoughts like "this isn't fun anymore, give me my voice back" or "how different life would be if I lost my voice permanently and how much would be forced to change"

The emotional centre - ran through a gamut of emotions
fatigue irritability impatience anxieties trust depression happiness annoyance sufficiency fears responsibility

peace
feelings of love for my son for not judging and being impartial.

I spend every evening centering myself, praying and being grateful and very thankful for all in my life (good, bad, indifferent).
Grateful for this opportunity to hop onboard and take this occasion to work.

As I drive to work I count my blessing for all that I am grateful for. The gift of gratitude is definitely one I had to be reminded of.

My voice comes back Thursday night that followed with a tidal wave of stuff being brought to the forefront to move through. The lunar eclipse was very powerful. Felt her pull all weekend. She ate well. Still trying to figure moon out??

Must push though
Karen

---

by Ian

> Karen wrote:
> The emotional centre - ran through a gamut of emotions
> fatigue
> irritability > impatience > anxieties
> trust > depression
> happiness
> annoyance > sufficiency
> fears > responsibility
> peace
> feelings of love for my son for not judging and being impartial.

Excellent observation.

Work Program week beginning 18 August 2008

---

by Ian

This weeks theme: Dread

Choose the most dreaded interpersonal situation that you could find yourself in and engineer your life to put yourself in that situation. (Note, this exercise does not apply to situations that involve personal physical danger or life threatening situations.)

Beforehand, choose an inner Work task, from your accumulated repertoire of exercises that engages your physical, emotional and intellectual centers, that you will perform when you finally succeed in putting yourself in your most dreaded interpersonal situation.

---

by Judy

This was unexpectedly fruitful so far as observation.
I didn't have to engineer situations. There were two already on the calendar, both of which I'd been trying to think of a valid way to avoid - without success. No, this is not usual; the exercise just presented itself during a most suitable week.

I noticed;
a. That I spent as much time dreading the engagements as the engagements took in themselves.
b. This wrong work of centers was quite blatant, in that there were in both cases several preparation actions I could have been doing instead of allowing the negative "dread" emotion to dominate, or I could simply have not considered at all until it was time to go.
c. There was absolutely nothing remotely useful or accurate gained from this negativity. It wasted time which could have been spent working.
d. Both occasions were enjoyable anyway and I was pleased to have made the effort to go. (I chose the 12 bones exercise to do at them when able).

So how silly is this?
I've suspected a slight avoidance of large crowded gatherings before, but not seen it so clearly in all its ridiculousness.
It still may be that I won't go to those where I have a choice and where it doesn't affect anybody else. Crowds and parties have never been sought out. However, I now have a sensible plan of action thanks to increased awareness, whenever I do attend these functions. There is a lot more work for me in this area.

Regards,

---

by Chuck

It took some careful thought to choose the proper situation for this exercise, but when the right one occurred, it was obvious. I needed to talk to my son about a personal issue. It had been put off for a while in hopes that it would "solve itself," but no such luck. We almost always get along well, but usually gloss over problems and pretend they don't exist.

Almost all of the trepidation happened before we talked... I had picked "remember yourself and observe" as the inner work task to do during the situation. The most learning came during observation of the preparation - what I was going to say, etc., and the usual "rehearsing" of the way the conversation might go.

The actual talk lasted about 30 seconds. Once I brought up the topic, I couldn't get a word in edgewise, but the fact that I did was the main point and hopefully had an effect. When I did talk, I observed that my voice sounded funny and I seemed kind of wooden as though I were over analyzing.

This was a great exercise and true learning experience.

Regards,
Chuck

---

by Cassandra

I knew right away one situation I could place myself in for this task. It was a brief exchange with an acquaintance. Our relationship has been up and down for a while. I initiated conversation and vowed to remember some body part. The exchange was 'forced friendly', and I felt anxious.

Another situation was uni-directional. I decided to try and bear what I perceived as unpleasant manifestations from speakers at a political convention of a party I do not support. This one was much harder to bear. I didn't say much through the speeches although I made whispered comments when I really didn't agree with someone (although no one else was in the room). I really did not bear it well. It was simply a matter of waiting for the speaker to finish, and then I let loose steam at my husband who had come to hear the end of the speech. I didn't want to not identify. In fact, I feel myself becoming more and more agitated at politics. I want my position validated. So this is a challenge for me.

Thanks for the valuable task.

Work Program week beginning 25 August 2008

by Judy

A Modest Exercise:
****
(Paraphrased from Chapter 7 of Jacob Needleman's book “Time and the Soul”)

“Here is something to try. It may or may not be helpful to everyone. Its sole purpose is to provide the mind with a quieter space within which we may find a first approach to the search for the Self. There are many such first approaches. I have found this modest exercise of help in verifying, actually witnessing, how the habit of worrying wastes the attention and therefore the time needed for finding one's inner life. Practiced with some degree of diligence and relaxation and with some advance guidance, it can also show us that there is in each of us a natural attraction of the attention toward another sense of time and the Self. This natural attraction toward the Self is an important part of that which our ordinary mind cannot comprehend.

One word of warning: it is only an exercise, an experiment, to try for a little while and then let go.”

(Note: the above paragraph is verbatim, including italics; the following is paraphrased for brevity.)

The author then discusses at some length the various powerful metaphysical ideas of which the exercise may bring reminders. These include ideas of recurrence, as developed by Plato, Nietsche, Ouspensky and in some Indian traditions, and destiny and fate as found in some Middle Eastern traditions and in Teutonic legend.

Jacob Needleman also cautions us against making the mistake of taking these ideas as counsels of passivity. ”They are not. This is a misunderstanding. The teachings of the ancient wisdom always call for an alert, active attention.”

(There is some elaboration of the apparent contradiction between these ideas and those of choice and free will, but I won't go into those here)

The exercise itself: (again verbatim)
****

“The exercise is simply this: during the day, as you enter into one or another situation of your life, try to look upon it in advance as having already happened. Look upon every detail as predetermined. Try sometime to treat your life like a script that has already been written, as a play in which you are only an actor rehearsing a part. You are to inhabit this role, this part. Try to regard the immediate future as already existing. You are like a tiny insect crawling up a tree.

The tree exists already, the roots, trunk, branches and leaves are all already there. What you call time is only your movement from the roots to the branches that are already there. The insect imagines that the branches and the leaves are appearing out of nonexistence, but it is not so. The branches and leaves are there waiting. Try to look at your life in this way – for a day, for an hour, even for a minute.

Forget about whether or not it is actually true that the future already exists. This is an exercise, nothing more, something to do with your thought, your attitude, your attention. Try it first with small, external things, the meal you prepare, say, or the telephone call you are about to make. Is the toast burned? It was already burned beforehand. Do you dial a wrong number and get an irritated stranger on the line? It had already happened before you “did” it and the stranger's reaction with it.

“In this most external stage of the exercise, there is an element of play and amusement, but along with the amusement one very soon finds something of quite another quality. It is best not to try immediately to give this new quality a name, but just to note that something is being liberated in a subtle and gentle way. It is best just to note, without naming, the possibility of a faint sense of welcoming, as though there are parts of one's self that are like parts of one's family, family that one has never known... Just note the sense of welcoming. That impression is the most important thing at this stage of the exercise, a welcoming that is calm and noted with a subtle sense of gladness.”

Pondering:
****

What is being given up in this exercise? And what, in consequence, is showing itself?

(Perhaps the above question is not to be answered, but only felt.)

Remember to sense the body and feel the emotions while pondering.

Note: This exercise has been developed further into second and third parts. The second part looks at the above in relation to one's own behaviour and the third looks at one's reactions to that behaviour.

I found that these were much more difficult and I needed every bit of the advance guidance given. This would be too long to add to the current program. If we wish, we could pursue these at another date.

One last quote though:
“When the wise speak of the mirage of time, they are speaking of the mirage of our self.”
The deeper meaning of the idea of destiny and recurrence invites us to fight against the fear of what is unknown, to both mind and emotions,and to search instead for a feeling that is beyond preference, beyond wanting or desiring or wishing or liking.

“Fight, Arjuna!”

---

by Dean

The impression I got from doing this exercise was that I was part of a play or movie that had been previously recorded and was just streaming by in a lawful way. The feeling that everything was predetermined was pretty profound, I had the feeling that nothing could be different and everything was just as it was meant to be. This also brought out a sense of peace and the idea that I shouldn't impose myself on things in quite the same way, just in the sense that I shouldn't expect things to be different or expect not to suffer, but to accept the lawful results of cosmic activity. The exercise also helped in situations that I took too seriously or worried about, the fact that it is already done or the thought that it was all predetermined seemed to wipe away anxiety and fear quickly, there was something that seemed final about it.

> What is being given up in this exercise? And what, in consequence, is showing itself?

I think the illusion of free will is given up, what is shown is our mechanical slavery to laws, and it shows itself because we are usually under the influence of our ego that likes to think that we are capable of will and not just a result of external forces.

Regards

---

by Karen

This exercise was immediate. As Dean mentioned it was like watching a movie that had already been filmed. Everything that was unfolding had already happened.

Everything appeared to move mechanically, slowly and almost backwards.

The ordinary mind was confused, and seemed to step aside so that something else could come in and observe. Very profound experience.

Each time I would intend to see things from this perspective I would snap there instantly.

It also illustrated how powerful Intent can be.

I would be interested in exploring the second and third parts of this exercise.

This was a really good exercise.

Thank you

---

by Harry

For me, the result is an exercise in being present. Internal talk gets turned off. Another step into the present. Without self talk.

Work Program week beginning 1 September 2008

---

by Ian

Once an hour, make an effort to return to the still-point in the centre of the whirlwind of thoughts, emotions and sensations.

When annoyances of thought, emotion or sensation draw us into identification, counter them with a conscious affirmation, a 'doing otherwise', such as, instead of trying to banish the annoyance immediately, dwell upon it, observe it, examine it, experience its energy deeply. Then send its energy into the earth and return to your still-point.

The Seeker has observed that much of their habitual inner dialogue consists of reviewing the past or rehearsing for the future. Has the Seeker observed a common trait or chief feature which characterises their internal dialogues?

---

by Dean

I usually used a variety of techniques in order to create a still-point experience and to stop the momentum that was pushing and pulling my centers towards various identifications. Sometimes I used the sightless gaze, accompanied with breathing or muscle relaxation, other times I tried to be aware of my posture and my emotional state, other times I invoked a prayer, although this usually creates momentum just in a different direction.

The second part of this exercise was something that was new to me because I usually observe things and keep them at that, without actually dwelling on certain things and tracing back why something occurs. This can be an educational experience if done right, it brought me to realize the cause and effect of things and the ways in which certain things come to be manifested.

I'm not sure what the common trait of my internal dialogues would be, it seemed to change according to my various states, although I'm sure there is one that coincides with my chief feature. I notice that while I'm observing there is a lot of internal dialogue but while I remember myself the opposite occurs and there is no dialogue, just silence and concentration. Anyway, these exercises were beneficial in various ways and I felt they brought some new methods for practice that will be helpful in the future.

Regards

---

by Karen

One of the annoyances I worked with was my husbands snoring. Previously my focus was on the annoyance and giving it strength. This exercise transformed the energy.

> dwell upon it, observe it, examine it, experience its energy deeply. Then send its energy into the earth and return to your still-point.

When he started snoring I saw myself get really annoyed. Thoughts like "how dare he rob me of sleep" ran thru my mind. Memories of my father snoring...

I wanted to give him a push or a kick to make him roll over and be quiet. (what I usually do ) The noise and habitual association that it was going to give me a restless sleep really irritated me. If it had a color it would be murky and dark. The sound grating on the nerves. My body moved to the edge of the bed.

So I experienced its energy by running all of that stuff observed thru my heart chakra and by sending all of the negative and stagnant energy to the plants and into the earth to be transformed into light and love. His snoring literally stopped.

May this work be transubstantiated in me for my being.

Gret exercise! Will continue to use this one as opportunities present themself or as I place my self in the line of opportunities.

Karen

---

by Cassandra

Karen,

I woke to my husband's snoring last night and couldn't go back to sleep until about 5am. Forty-five minutes later I had to wake the children for school. So, I took a day off from work to catch up on sleep. I wasn't really annoyed at him because the reasons for my restlessness lay mostly with me--anxiety about my children's well-being, etc.

But I tried to use the time to stay with the feelings and impressions, asking myself what am I so afraid of--reveal yourself to me, these big bad wolves. Holy affirming, Holy denying, Holy reconciling, transubstantiate in me for my being.

---

by Ian

Dear All,

There are many things to consider here, such as -

We all need a certain amount of sleep to function properly...
Yet we have to account for that sleep being disrupted by our partners snoring...
Some of us have the luxury of taking a day off of work to catch up on (very necessary) sleep...

So - there is no "pat" answer that the Work can offer in this situation.
This is something that we all have to Work out for ourselves.
This is an opportunity for us all to call upon our innate creativity to seek a solution to our oun particular situation.

Work Program week beginning 8 September 2008

---

by Ian

During the week, attempt one or more of the following:

- Walk through doorways backwards.
- Read a book upside down.
- Instead of laughing, sob.
- Go for conscious walk. Sense feet upon ground. Sense swing of arms. Sense rise and fall of chest. Sense air passing through nostrils. Sense impressions without naming them. Clear mind of habitual thoughts by using mantra or repetitive phrase.

---

by Dean

I decided to take up the task of walking through doorways backwards, the first attempts at this caused some reactions in myself that were a bit negative, worrying about what others would think and so on, probably being afraid of being anathematized by mechanical humanoids or something. Then again I reasoned that it obviously isn't something that is all that noticeable and I probably shouldn't really care about such small occurances. At first I did this a bit quickly and I didn't really put my whole presence into it, probably because of the already mentioned negative reactions, this morning however I did it much more slowly, almost in slow motion and I can say it disrupted my normal mechanical movements and created new impressions.

I also went on a conscious walk, I walked consciously for a bit during the week in various places, but today I decided I would actually go out of my way and take a walk on some bike paths on the outskirts of town. While walking I noticed the hard ground under my feet and noticed that I should probably be conscious of how I walk just so I wasn't as hard on my legs and ankles. The rise and fall of my breathing created a rhythm that corresponded with my motions, and I realized I don't pay attention to this movement of my breathing in this way normally. It was in a pretty scenic setting near a river, and the sounds of various wildlife could be heard as well as very clear and crisp visual impressions that almost seemed to blend together and create patterns of colors. It was a vivifying experience and I'm glad I went, by the end of it I noticed I had more energy and was walking in a much lighter and tactile way.

Regards

Work Program week beginning 15 September 2008

by Ian

Whenever you are annoyed, aggravated or angered by someone or something, count silently from 10 to 1 while sensing each finger, starting with left thumb, ending with right thumb. Centered within the resulting reconciled state, establish a sightless gaze by sensing your eyes as you open and close them 3 times slowly, each time widening your field of vision upon opening. During the first closing of your eyes, repeat - I wish; the second - I can; third - I am. Allow the resulting presence of I am to permeate all and everything.

Four Point Exercise - Gurdjieff (From a Meeting, Thursday, July 13, 1944):

"When you self-remember, you have another state from the usual. It is necessary to separate these two states. For this there is an exercise, a whole series of exercises even. Here is the first: you do it, for example, seated, leaning comfortably installed in an arm-chair or on a couch. There is a spot where the arms are attached to the body, (region of the shoulders) and a spot where the legs are attached to the body, (hip-joint); feel and control these four spots all the time. All your attention must be concentrated there. Send everything else to the devil. When you say "I am" imagine that these four spots are like four pillars on which is supported your "I am". Focus your attention; not on the extremities nor to the interior of the body. All your concentration is fixed on these four places. Do this for your future real "me". To begin, learn to know this state; it is like a measure, a clue. You will self-remember when you can feel well these four places. Leave all the rest. Live life as before. This is your only exercise, but do it very seriously so that all of the most concentrated moments of your work be based on those spots. After, you shall have title to a real individuality. These things could only serve as a barrier between your individuality and your ex-functions. I say "ex" because you must have a new quality of functions. The whole world must have a new quality of functions - because of an abnormal life in the past. It is necessary to create a barrier. For you, it shall be the result of this exercise. When you feel and are conscious of this definite barrier, your ground shall be prepared for a new exercise; then you will be able to have a new interior, independent, and a new exterior, independent. You shall have a normal body and a normal psychism, without the abnormal ex-functions. This is solely for her and for no one else. Do not try to do it out of curiosity. It is a very dangerous thing."

Addendum - To each of the four points, add a visualization of the Four Prophets: Moses, Buddha, Jesus, Mohammed. Ponder on the message that each of them brought to mankind.

Work Program week beginning 22 September 2008

by Harry

This exercise is designed to contact the "time body". When you find yourself in a situation that touches you to the core, separate by projecting backward. A twelve year projection often works well. A seven year projection can also work.

Try to see and feel yourself as you were twelve years ago. This will begin with some ordinary mind. Consider where you were physically. Consider the general emotional tone of that period. Consider your thought process for that point iOnce you have collected some of the ordinary memories, try to project your 'being' back to that time. See, think, feel, taste, hear.

This is imaginary, to begin with. Just as other aspects G describes begin as imaginary. But once you feel that period, try pulling yourself forward. Compare without judging. Is the person who was then the same now. Is the situation the same. What is different.

Then push forward the imagination for the same period of time. The creative imagination may not provide immediate results. But if done on resting, for example, may provide unforeseen results.

Work Program week beginning 29 September 2008

by Judy

3-brains-balanced-being-perception, and its requirement for every conscious initiative:

In a post of Friday September 12th, Ian shared from a Gurdjieff Meeting of Monday, December 29th, 1946. You may wish to re-read this in full. Here is an excerpt:

After some explanation as to the whereabouts of the three spheres (where the brains are) and description of the paths of flow, Mr Gurdjieff says:

“You take in air. In expiring, pay attention only to the process of flowing. Respiration becomes automatic. Only the inhaling is conscious. I repeat again: get used to this; when I say consciously, this means that all initiative comes from the three centers. In the beginning, in order to do it better, feel the site of the three spheres and mobilize, feel that everything comes from there. Train yourself. Then, if you ascertain that you work only with one or two centers, know that this is not consciousness. There is only real consciousness with the same intensity in three places.

For example, here is an exercise: I am - When you say "I" you feel the three centers. When you say "am", you feel also the three centers but differently. "I", it is as if something stood up. "Am", it is as if, in the three centers (places) something sat down. This is an original explanation.”

In particular, from Mr Gurdjieff, we have: “I repeat again: get used to this; when I say consciously, this means that all initiative comes from the three centers.”

When the visualization becomes comfortable, please add last week's Four Points Exercise with the four pillars of Moses, Buddha, Jesus and Mohamed at the quarter-portals of the inner consciousness, and allow consciousness to quietly observe itself in a free-flowing manner. Are there images? Ideas?

After settling in a sightless-gaze manner for a couple of minutes, ponder:

If my sun (psychologically) does not light or heat, what keeps me going in life? Where are my usual old light and heat coming from? Which center is being used instead of my intellect (sun)? Where do my satisfactions and motivations come from? What part of the organism? Ask yourself which center or centers is active, many times during the week. Perhaps there are times when my sun acts appropriately to give light and heat? What are some examples of these times?

Just observe. Live as you normally do. But when you wish to be conscious, remember it will not be real consciousness unless all three centers are involved.

Please share any results or ideas about your own mini-cosmos with our group.

---

by Cassandra

"It will not be real unless all three centers are involved."

There was a lot in this exercise. I spent some time early own thinking about the integration of 3 centers in an I AM breath sequence. Chapter 17 of BT describes the head, spine, and solar plexus as centers for the affirming/intellectual, denying/emotional, and reconciling/moving, respectively. Hmm...but when I focus on one, I lose the others, so I pictured these 3 parts as blinking neon lights or like Christmas lights that illuminate at the same time--this allowed me in some small way to receive something simultaneously, maybe it was just a feeling--the familiar feeling of exhilaration came that lasts a few seconds each time the centers are evoked.

I'm interested in how others tapped the 3 centers. My larger task is to really KNOW from experience how the 3 centers can combine in very, very ordinary life. I'm becoming more convinced that nothing 'outside' can heal--not next Friday, next holiday--but only a change in my being can mean anything lasting. I'm searching it seems in the dark for that realness.

---

by Dean

Working on the three centers in this way has brought about a lot of interesting results, and has helped me to control and concentrate energy better. The exercise for sensing the spine took some time to focus, to actually make contact and feel the sensation took some practice, but now I've perfected it a bit better and it is quite an exhilarating exercise. Visualizing and breath control helped, the sensation of energy traveling up and down the spine is invigorating and almost always brings energy in consistently. I make sure to pray that the results won't evaporate, and try to convince myself that my efforts weren't sufficient and that next time I'll try harder. The breathing exercise for the solar plexus definitely brings focus and control to the emotional center and observing is always useful and stops imagination. Some experiences during the week were almost too much, the energy gets to be difficult to handle, but it seems like it's always like that, and I think it may be a sign that I've made some progress perhaps.

The four point exercise brought stability to the physical center, images that came across were sometimes in the form of symbols, the ten commandments, Buddha meditating in a lotus position, and the cross. I'm not that familiar with the Mohameden religion that much, but I thought of his renounciation and service to God, and overall I had the idea that all religions in their original form were one, and many saints came to the same conclusions.

I think the centers that are being used when I'm passive and asleep are the moving parts of centers, and probably mainly the formatory part of the intellectual center. I think maybe the instinctive center keeps us going, and is giving us our usual mechanical energy that gets us through the day. I had some illuminating experiences during the week but they were overshadowed to a certain degree with the feeling that my work isn't enough, and that I need to break down certain barriers and become more unified.

Regards,
Dean

Work Program week beginning 6 October 2008

---

by Ian

The Seeker decides to deliberately face some of his Holy Denying Suffering I's with a conscious Holy Affirming Enduring Force in order to achieve Holy Reconciling for transubstantiation in him for his Being.

For this purpose he chooses the following already observed I's: the I's that suffer in the form of displeasure when someone is unpleasant to him; the I's that suffer in the form of dislike of certain types of people; the I's that suffer in the form of dissatisfaction with his surroundings, life style, friends, etc.; the I's that suffer in the form of disappointment when his friend, job, marriage, health, life do not turn out as expected; the I's that suffer in the form of disapproval of someone's actions, mannerisms, lifestyle, religion; the I's that suffer in the form of disagreement with someone's opinions and ideas; the I's that suffer in the form of dismay when something valued is given up; the I's that suffer in the form of desiring something unattainable.

To these Holy Denying I's he will present a Holy Affirming in the form of calm, objective, intentional enduring.

Early every morning he will perform the complete skeletal exercise, beginning with the twelve joints, the ten illuminated bones, culminating with the Holy Affirming prayer in the finger and the toe bones.

Each night in a prone posture before sleep he will repeat three times: 'Sources of divine rejoicings, revolts and sufferings, direct your actions upon us,' saying each of the twelve words while directing attention to each of the twelve joints.

---

by Lawrick

I've been working with this program on and off for several days now. The importance of actually reconciling many of the negative behaviors I actualize, is intimately tied to the duration and strength of my my Self Observation and Self Remembering. I continually forget this essential principal and I believe it important to bring it into the exercises frequently.

Layne, I have been using your idea of "remembering that I will soon forget" higher state and it brings a couple of observations;

1. A sense of remorse or sadness that keeps me out of the intellectualizationacring that identifies and ultimately dissolves the state.
2. From the above "remorse" I become far more aware of my emotional plexus, recognizing that, for me, this is very difficult to observe.

Using Layne's and Chuck's ideas, today I had some very long periods of awareness and an ability to return very quickly. The Tales were remarkably alive today.

Thanks to all,
Lawrick

---

by Dean

I'd have to say I did poorly at this exercise for most of the week, today was a good day though, and I was able to get beyond certain habits and see things from a more fresh perspective. Enduring the unpleasant manifestations of others is something that I kept in mind, and just trying to get past certain ideas or opinions that I was passionate about. I figured it would be best to direct my "passion" towards more useful activities and transform the energy and use it for the work. I did an exercise with impressions and "liking what it doesn't like," and just making an effort to affirm things rather than deny them, or acting like things around me should be different, which is probably an aspect of internal considering. This helped to endure various manifestations from "it," rather than I. I'll have to work on this more because it's something that saves energy and prevents unnecessary suffering, so I'll have to keep working along the guidelines for the next few months.

The skeletal exercises and prayer are great, and I did them a lot during the week, and will keep doing them because I've felt a great benefit from them.

Regards

---

by Judy

> The Seeker decides to deliberately face some of his Holy Denying Suffering I's with a conscious Holy Affirming Enduring Force in order to achieve Holy Reconciling for transubstantiation in him for his Being.

How well I endure has come to be the primary feed-back as to whether my life is more or less on track or not.
Over years, I have found this endurance capacity to vary widely. It depends upon even the basic aspects of life such as sleep, diet, amount of time alone, the reading of certain books (I'm thinking in particular of the daily readings I do, one of which is from Nicoll's Commentaries), even attendance to some group meetings, amount of service work in the community, contact and support of/from family - and a lot more as well. If I notice boredom, I must add an endeavour. If I'm hurrying so much that I'm stressed out, I look for an activity to possibly delete/resign from. If I don't make an effort to ascend, descent is inevitable. There is no standing still, it seems.

Usually the endurance is more of a normal ebb and flow in ordinary life and I mainly pick up on lack of it when a problem surfaces, so this week has been an opportunity to increase consciousness of the whole triadic endeavour of the Holy Equation.

Regards,

Work Program week beginning 13 October 2008

---

by Ian

We act out our life in the world each day. We perform rituals of social behaviour in order to play our roles in our family and worklife. Nothing that we do or say has any meaning or importance, unless we do it in the spirit of Being Partkdolg-Duty, for a greater good rather than selfish reasons. It is a tiny thing that makes all the difference. To carry out a task with gusto, to ones fullest ability, whether it be Work on self or work in the world, is to feel joy in the humblest task; this is only possible if we do it in the spirit of a higher abstract purpose - selfless service without expectation of reward.

During the week try to perform all tasks, whether they be Work on self or work in the world, with an attitude of abstract purpose kept in mind. Begin each task with a dedication to abstract service. Each task can be combined with an abstract attention to ones breath; ones sensations; ones impressions; ones emotions; ones thoughts; ones movements.

Inevitably many suffering I's will arise during your tasks. Use their appearance as an opportunity for engendering a divine impulse of conscience. To these Holy Denying I's he will present a Holy Affirming in the form of calm, objective, intentional enduring.

---

by Judy

How beautifully expressed is this:

> During the week try to perform all tasks, whether they be Work on self or work in the world, with an attitude of abstract purpose kept in mind. Begin each task with a dedication to abstract service. Each task can be combined with an abstract attention to ones breath; ones sensations; ones impressions; ones emotions; ones thoughts; ones movements.

The paradox is that it was yesterday a perfect prescription for deep joy.
I venture forth today in similar vein, expecting not even the joy, yet already it is there.

---

by Judy

> Being-Partkdolg-duty
> Orage said being-Partkdolg-duty is the word 'duty' in three different languages (C.S. Nott, Teachings of Gurdjieff). Internet searches found the following for "dolg": Old English, dolg: a wound, scar (Wiktionary). In Russian, dolg means 'long' or 'long time' (from here). Another source gave: Discharge, or pay off a debt; debt, duty, obligation. To summarize, dolg has the flavor of a duty or obligation to pay off a debt we've had for a long time.

There are several EndlessSearch pages that discuss being-Partkdolg-duty. As reported on this EndlessSearch page, being-Partkdolg-duty means Conscious Labors and Intentional Suffering. But further, it also includes the Five Obligonian Strivings and The Four Commandments (see the abovereferenced page).
June 20, 2008
Further discussion:
Thus Being Partkdolg Duty is not only Conscious labour and Intentional Suffering and the Strivings and the Four Commandments themselves, but the actual INTRODUCTION and EXERCISE of them in our every activity.
June 21, 2008
Further discussion:
Being-Partkdolg-duty seems to suggest the participation of something higher in ourselves.
Centres? Ideas? Consciousness? Individuality? Conscience? Will? And as well something essence-tial. A filter that negates the formatory apparatus and allows at least a brief look into the lasting-real! As it is, without BPD, new impressions simply "fall" to the nearest association or identification which were previously formed unconsciously. Suggestibility ad nauseum!
July 8, 2008

Thank you so much for your continuing and considerable work on this Glossary, Chuck.
Regards,

Work Program week beginning 20 October 2008

---

by Ian

Ponder (at the appropriate time): The former contents of our bowels, are not these materials more valuable than gold, as a raw material that is literally transformed into life? Gold is simply gold, but this!

During the day:

- Search for a glimpse of the significance behind repetitive compulsive strivings, attitudes, traits, roles, chief features.
- Meet desires with equanimity. Visualize them as grasshoppers hopping lightly onto the lotus pad of presence.
- Enjoy the joy of marveling at the splendor all around.
- Maintain Iamness by following every movement of the left arm.
- Observe the flow of emotions.
- Observe the flow of thoughts.
- Observe the flow of sensations.
- Observe the flow of breath.

---

by Judy

I chose the following to work with over the past week:

Maintain Iamness by following every movement of the left arm.
and
Search for a glimpse of the significance behind repetitive compulsive strivings, attitudes, traits, roles, chief features.

The first of these was surprisingly difficult; either that, or my concentration/awareness was below par this week. What kept happening was that the movements of the right arm kept intruding themselves as well as movements of the left arm. I had some success back and forth for about two minutes of Iamness in maintaining awareness of left arm movements only twice. Both of these happened early morning before daily activities were in full swing. I experimented with two exercises here; one where I mentally said the I am and observed, and one where I simply observed the movements of the left arm and took the word "Iamness" to mean that direct awareness of self-observation. Quality was improved by mentally saying the I am; less attention-wandering.
I'll try this again for a while.
It has been a good wake-up call for me to go back to basics in self-observation for a bit.

While searching for glimpses of significance, two connections appeared. The first was that these repetitive things were indeed the easy way to go, the line of least resistance, so to speak - less effort required. The second was the appearance of a very small and subtle sense of a mini-pleasure. I wouldn't refer to these feelings as "pleasant" as such, yet there were tiny "satisfactions" or "contentments" or "securities" in following usual and known pathways.

Regards,

---

by Dean

> - Enjoy the joy of marveling at the splendor all around.

This seems like it would be quite simple but many things seemed to divert my attention for some time, but I found focusing on non attachment to impressions while I was marveling at their splendor seemed to work well. It's strange how everything looks more bright and crisp when you actually make efforts to be more conscious, I enjoyed marveling at everything and tried to add an emotional element with breathing exercises.

> - Observe the flow of emotions.
> - Observe the flow of thoughts.
> - Observe the flow of sensations.
> - Observe the flow of breath.

Observing the various centers this week was productive, a lot of this centered around not being attached to certain impulses while affirming other more useful ones. It was basically an exercise in differentiating what was positive and affirming that attachment, and weeding out what was negative and wasn't an attachment to do with the work exercises. In this way the observing lead to seeing the conscious and mechanical impulses in the centers, while leading to exercises that were basically trying to sense the process of the emotions, thoughts, sensations, and breath and bring consciousness to those areas. Overall it went well, although throughout the week results varied and were in a constant state of change depending on the quality and amount of attention and energy.

Work Program week beginning 27 October 2008

---

by Ian

"When walking, the practitioner is aware, 'I am walking'; when standing, is aware, 'I am standing'; when sitting, is aware, 'I am sitting'; when lying down, is aware, 'I am lying down.' In whatever position one's body happens to be, one is aware of the position of the body. When one is going forward or backward, one applies one's full awareness to one's going forward or backward. When one looks in front or looks behind, bends down or stands up, one also applies full awareness to what one is doing. One applies full awareness to wearing the robe or carrying the alms bowl. When one eats or drinks, chews or savors the food, one applies full awareness to all this. When passing excrement or urinating, one applies full awareness to this. When one walks, stands, lies down, sleeps or wakes up, speaks or is silent, one shines his awareness on all this." So said the Buddha.

---

by Dean

One thing I definitely noticed when doing this exercise was that it very soon lead to me becoming aware of my overall disposition, attitude, and emotional state. This sensation brought about a sense of wholeness and being aware of the connections between the centers and how they influence one another. The idea of taking a mental photograph of oneself seemed to come about quite frequently, and the impression of myself viewing my state and being in the present moment. Another impression that came across was the strange impression that I felt larger, I figured this was because I felt the whole of my body occupying more space, and feeling the sensation that my body had weight. At first I had trouble putting my full awareness into this exercise, but after awhile I felt my attention rose to a level that brought energy in to help with concentration and awareness. Also becoming aware of the positions of the moving center encouraged me to relax my muscles and become more conscientious about how I moved about.

Regards,
Dean

Work Program week beginning 3 November 2008

---

by Judy

"Self-observation a la Gornahoor Harharkh"

This week there is suggested a simple experiment which contains a variation in our usual self-observation attempts. Please do at least once or twice daily and share any comments with the group.

When sitting at a table or desk - either eating, reading, computing - in other words, whenever just performing an everyday activity in that position, collect yourself into 3-brains-balanced-being-perception as preparation for some self-observation attempts.

Then, make the usual separation between Observing I and it, with this little variation:

Imagine that you (it) are sitting inside a glass room, and that your observing I is standing outside looking in through the glass. You are to observe movements, facial expressions, postures, and gestures. Keep things as pure and simple as possible. If you choose to do the experiment while eating, of course there will be extra sensory involvement to attend to.

Take some minutes to make several sincere attempts to observe yourself in that precise "now" moment; ideally, free from thoughts in the intellectual centre. Rather, the mental activity will be clear momentary awareness by direct perception. And remember impartiality is important. We just want to see ourselves as we are in that exact moment. So we have the usual requisite three components of - observation, impartiality and simultaneity.

At the end of your self-observation attempts each time, imagine observing I going into the glass room and rejoining your organism. Ask reverently that the energies be used for inner growth towards your full potential - by saying:

Holy Affirming
Holy Denying
Holy Reconciling
Transubstantiate in me for my Being.

---

by Dean

While doing this exercise I noticed it takes a lot of concentration and effort, the main thing that helped with imagining this observing I standing apart and looking in, was first the preliminary balancing and also trying to become aware of the whole of myself. So basically it came down to me first becoming aware of my general state, everything from my posture, emotional state, but not much thought, just the impression of myself looking out my two eyes, then transferring that information to my imagination or visual faculty. Other things I also took into account, like the clothes I was wearing and what I happened to be doing at the time. The glass room was something I usually added later after getting a good look at myself from afar. The general feeling or sensation I got from this exercise was a feeling of awareness, but different from my usual awareness, an awareness that was more detached and impartial.

The last part of the exercise was similar to a holy reunion that had an emotional aspect to it. That's really the only way that I can describe it and it was more of a feeling than a thought.

Thanks Judy

---

by Cassandra

This exercise was difficult to do. I tried looking at myself from 2 or 3 angles--as observing I looking down on my reclined body (doctor's office), looking at myself from the corner ceiling of a room. But each time I tried to observe me, it was hard to imagine my face even or what I was wearing. I didn't get to the glass house because that seemed to put too much in the way of observation. Thanks for the exercise.

---

by Lawrick

This was for me an excellent program for extending my awareness for longer periods od time.

Like Cassandra I also encountered problems focusing on myself so I started experimenting with a small inclusion of background objects to give a stronger impression of the glass bell. By the time i was ready to enter, my breathing was calm and regulated. My observation outward then became much like the sightless sound and gaze.

The truly remarkable feature of this exercise was that I could have small conversations with others, all the while keeping an awareness of myself. This was significant because I almost always identify when I begin to speak and lose my contact. In fact it seemed very strange to talk with another and wonder what was doing the talking. Fascinating! As well, I was able to bring this awareness up time and again while doing normal tasks.

There is something by the way of Hermetically Sealing included in this exercise. While I was observing or speaking I was able to stay calm for short periods of time by imagining I was within the "safe" confines of the glass bell which leads me to conclude that most of my normal conversations are probably undertaken in some state of hysteria.

I would like to expand on this exercise at a later time and include the objective of self awareness during small conversations.

Thanks Jude

Lawrick

Work Program week beginning 10 November 2008

by Chuck

This week we explore motion and stillness. For a minimum of ten minutes, perform the following exercise related by Rodney Collin:

"In discovering the enormous power of motor mechanicalness we discover a great secret. At a certain moment at the time of Ouspensky's death I felt, among many other experiences, that I was like a mechanical toy condemned to go on moving till the spring had run down. Then immobility, death. Moving centre seemed to me to be the root of our mechanicalness, and I realised that all beginning of consciousness depends upon a certain 'stop', as described in In Search of the Miraculous.

"At this same time I noticed one day that Ouspensky was showing us an exercise that would demonstrate this mechanical-ness, and give us the means of overcoming it. But he did the exercise without words or explanations; it was almost invisible.

"The exercise was as follows: One sits comfortably in a chair. Then for a definite time - say half an hour - one moves, slightly and naturally. But without stopping for a single moment. For example, one puts out one's right hand to take a cigarette, one lights it, crosses one's legs, rubs one's cheek, turns one's head, knocks the ash off the cigarette into the ashtray etc. etc. But all in slow but continuous movement.

"After half an hour of this one begins to realise the true nature of movement. And at the end, for a short time, one has the possibility of remaining completely still, without any movement at all. From this immobility further realisations can come."
(Rodney Collin, The Theory of Conscious Harmony, Aug 1, 1955)

While in motion, feel pity for those people who have ailments - physical or mental - that keep them from being able to move. Consider also those with spiritual ailments who are inhibited from advancing.

Now to explore stillness. Immediately after completing the above exercise, for 5-10 minutes, sit calmly in an erect position and quiet the mind. Breathe slowly and evenly. The key point is not to move - at all. Optionally, one may choose to also focus the gaze on a point at eye-height, without moving the eyes or blinking. During this part of the exercise, try not to direct the energy of the body, but sense how it ebbs and flows.

While in stillness, consider and feel for those in society who are addicted to or obliged to maintain constant physical and mental motion. Is our thinking different when still? Can we achieve this stillness while in motion?

One could practice this exercise in the workplace as well.

by Dean

This exercise with the moving center was very helpful this week, I seemed to have a lot of excess mechanical/moving energy and it seemed that this exercise released a certain amount of energy that would have been negative if I wasn't focusing on conscious movement. I did this at home and at work, but it was hard to do it for the half an hour period, although I think I succeeded a couple times. I'm not sure about the stillness exercise though, I don't think I did it quite as much as the moving exercise, but when I did stop for stillness I noticed a distinct change everytime that I would describe as a feeling of the separation of the moving center and the instinctive center. While moving the instictive center was passive but when still the moving center was passive, although sometimes I still took in impressions from the instinctive center while moving, and also noticed movement in the form of breathing and flowing energy while still. So this also helped in identifying the ebb and flow of the breath in conjunction with the emotions as well as using up energy from the moving center consciously.

I forgot to do part of this exercise though, and will have to add that next time, I'll definitely use this exercise again when I'm feeling the machine running me rather that I running the machine.

Thanks Chuck

---

by Judy

Chuck quoted:

> "In discovering the enormous power of motor mechanicalness we discover a great secret. At a certain moment at the time of Ouspensky's death I felt, among many other experiences, that I was like a mechanical toy condemned to go on moving till the spring had run down. Then immobility, death. Moving centre seemed to me to be the root of our mechanicalness, and I realised that all beginning of consciousness depends upon a certain 'stop', as described in In Search of the Miraculous.

Thanks Chuck for sharing this useful exercise. It has opened up many questions for me.
I couldn't help but notice how, when I slowed the conscious movments right down, just how "normal" it felt. This astonished me. I really felt - "Yes, I am mechanical like this for a lot of the time." I've said this before, but now had had it clearly demonstrated.

But is it just the moving centre's mechanicalness here?
I don't think so.
I experimented on different days and in differing circumstances with this, and came reluctantly to the definite conclusion that the body was also "emoting" in its own way. The feelings I had at the time were manifesting bodily in slight ways. It was impossible to miss this. Movements, muscle tensions, facial expressions - all the body language - changed of its own mechanical accord. The emotional centre was tied up with the body.

I also experimented with stillness after the periods of conscious movement. There was less movement.
However, I had better results of course when I used sensing, whether of just limbs or of body, instead of simply aiming for immobility.
So, perhaps the body needs something to do all the time? Just as random thoughts continue to a larger or lesser extent, is moving centre analogous to this - and emotional centre? We can still the mind, but not indefinitely - whilst alive. So, does sensing give the body something to do other than moving or manifesting feelings? I realise sensing is a mental directive but it also involves the whole body. Wait - isn't that the way the body is supposed to be involved? Under direction from the intellectual centre, I mean. Hmm. Very interesting.
Good exercise, Chuck.

Regards,

---

by Chuck

Thanks, Dean and Judy for your comments - obviously the results of real work. My conclusions so far from doing this exercise are that due to the requirement for constant movement, one's mind is often busy figuring out what to do next. I find that it ties up at least two centers: obviously the moving center, and the intellectual center in determining the next motion. Since emotional center activity is "expressed in the body" (is this a good way to put it?) as Judy suggests, there's the chance of getting three centers involved.

The other factor for me is that it's an interesting experiment for the moving center in and of itself. I found myself moving more smoothly and slowly than usual in a sort of T'ai Chi-like manner because it gives more time to determine the next motion.

On the stillness side, sitting/standing/kneeling in a static position with arms out was an exercise given by Gurdjieff. There is a Chinese martial arts version of this, called Zhan Zhuang ("standing like a tree"). In addition to the effect on the intellectual center, stillness exercises undoubtedly increase the capacity of the body to store energy.

It's definitely true Judy that the body needs something to do all the time - I remember a mention of this (Ouspensky?) where it is said we waste a lot of energy in extraneous movements.

Regards, Chuck

Work Program week beginning 17 November 2008

---

by Dean

The Master and the Servants

In the morning put yourself into a three centered state and after a short time prep your centers for the day ahead. Suggest to them that they must work for the aim of your inner master and must obey the aims that your master sets forth for them. Think of the fact that these centers have been with you your whole life and have grown and developed from an embryonic state.

During the day imagine your centers, moving-instinctive, emotional, and intellectual, as servants for your higher self, make sure each one is working and “pulling their load.” Some ideas for aims or exercises include relaxing muscles when they’re not in use, the sightless gaze and soundless sound, observing and identifying negative emotions, and self observation and pondering. You could also incorporate past exercises and identify which center is doing the work, or you can identify what center is being affected by various internal and external impressions.

If you feel your “servants” are doing a good job, reward them or thank them for their work. If they are not obedient then you should pose questions or criticize their unbecoming actions, you can also bring about a state of remorse or practice a form of intentional suffering.

During the day ask yourself: “Is the master in the household?” “Are the servants obeying their commands?”

---

by Ian

Hi All,

I don't know about the rest of you, but I found this weeks suggestions very encouraging.
The suggestions for the morning preparation were right on target.
The suggestions for during the day were also on target and spoke to the things that I need to look out for.
Repremanding my 'servants' was an exercise that had been neglected in recent history.
They were'nt exactly happy with being set in their place, but their subsequent behaviour was certainly acceptable.
A lesson well learned.

---

by Judy

Hi Dean,

I hadn't done this exercise for a very long time and found it brought quite a few "components" to the surface and thus able to be addressed. The personification of, in particular, Holy Denying I's, brought to mind the words from the Sunrise meditation in Beelzebub's Tales - "as if they were conscious" or "not as if they were conscious". This example made it quite clear to me how both versions suit perfectly, not being the direct contradiction that they appear to be when taken out of context.
The whole exercise indeed fitted well into our current three-monthly work on Components. After a few days practice, the following was added. It is directly from the Components programme.

> Each night in a prone posture before sleep he will repeat three times: 'Sources of divine rejoicings, revolts and sufferings, direct your actions upon us,' saying each of the twelve words while directing attention to each of the twelve joints.

Personifying the various I's somehow makes it simpler to talk with them and thus self-observation may be enhanced.
Thanks Dean.
Regards,

---

by Chuck

This exercise opened up a whole new area of work for me. Addressing the centers directly, adjusting their load, rewarding and/or criticizing them - I just didn't have the idea of working with them in this way.

What has been evident for some time to me is that the intellectual and moving centers are quite active, but the emotional center needs some work. I addressed it directly and reassured it that its work was necessary and valued.

I'm sure that many benefits will come as this technique is added to my Work repertoire.

Thanks, Dean.

Regards, Chuck

Work Program week beginning 24 November 2008

---

by Ian

While devoting 1/3 of your Attention to a quiet Intellectual center, 1/3 of your Attention to a neutral Emotional center, and 1/3 of your Attention to Sensing the presence of your planetary body and its breathing, be mindful of:

Monday - Being aware of one's disease as a challenge which moves you towards transformation and evolution.
Tuesday - Being aware of one's clinging to material possessions and money.
Wednesday - Being aware of one's identification with concepts about all and everything.
Thursday - Being aware of one's fear when chaos and doubt shows up within oneself.
Friday - Being aware of one's identification with thoughts and feelings.
Saturday - Being aware of one's fear to allow silence and emptiness.
Sunday - Being aware of one's death.

---

by Dean

I struggled with this exercise quite a bit until recently, the main feeling I got from it was a sense of balance and awareness of myself in my present environment. I find that I, or "it" rebels against the idea of having a neutral emotional center for various reasons, mainly because I'm used to trying to use emotions in everyday life for various reasons to project various impressions and get things done. The mindful exercises went fairly well, the strongest experience was on Sunday when I was aware of my own death, I was clinging to a certain emotion that I had on Saturday and it brought me to a state of being able to let go, and also realizing the impermanence of myself and everything else as well, it seemed to create an impression that will last in my memory.

Regards
Dean

---

by Ian

> Dean wrote:
> I find that I, or "it" rebels against the idea of having a neutral emotional center for various reasons, mainly because I'm used to trying to use emotions in everyday life for various reasons to project various impressions and get things done.

Well, Dean, this is a very interesting observation

In Gurdjieff's analogy of the horse, driver and carriage, the horse is the emotional center / motive force. The carriage and driver get nowhere without the horse.

I know in my life, that unless "I feel like it" I don't get much done. In other words, unless my horse is charged up and ready to go, I just sit back and veg out.

On the other hand , Gurdjieff states that the emotional center is the repository of the Third, or reconciling , force.

So the question is - what is the difference between being passive and being reconciled?

When I am at work and someone asks me to do something, I may not "feel" like it but I have to do it. My "horse" may not "feel" like it, but I have to do it. And I do it, even though I don't "feel" like it.

So "doing" things does not always depend on "feeling" like it. This is what Duty is. Doing what "it" does not feel like. Going against the flow; doing otherwise.

In other words - sometimes we have to be active and sometimes we have to be passive. Some spiritual traditions teach that we have to learn to be Passive all the time. Others teach that we have to be Active all the time. There is no "one size fits all" type of situation. This is a matter if spiritual discernment. Gurdjieff teaches that we can be active or passive depending on the situation, as we discern it, based on our level of objective reason. Embracing the Neutral force puts us in the position of being able to act in an Active or Passive manner depending on our objective understanding of the current situation.

The reconciling force partakes of both the the Active and Passive - it integrates them both and arises from them. As G says in BT - the higher blends with the lower to ACTUALIZE the middle, which becomes higher for the preceeding lower or lower for the succeeding higher.

If we move towards action or towards passivity from the centrally grounded point of view of the mid-course / reconciling force, then we always have a solid foundation from which to move towards manifestation, whether that manifestation is launched from the solid ground of action or whether it is rooted in the solid ground of passivity.

I think what we are seeing here is the difference between the lower and higher emotional centers. The lower emotional center manifests from it's likes and dislikes. The higher emotional center manifests from the reconciling force, which can be higher for the preceeding lower or lower for the succeeding higher. The higher emotional center does not "always need to be RIGHT"; sometimes it is quite advantageous to be "WRONG".

From the point of view of the reconciled higher emotional center, our horse can move forward or remain at rest /we can be active or passive, depending on our discernment / objective understanding of the situation at hand.

Everything goes in cycles - reconciling / reconciling / reconciling / reconciling / reconciling / reconciling ..., etc...

---

by Judy

Ian wrote:

> Embracing the Neutral force puts us in the position of being able to act in an Active or Passive manner depending on our objective understanding of the current situation.

When I read this, I thought of a cricketer standing in the outfield, relaxed yet evenly balanced on both legs, ready to leap left or right, depending on the direction the ball takes.

And the association continued through

> If we move towards action or towards passivity from the centrally grounded point of view of the mid-course / reconciling force, then we always have a solid foundation from which to move towards manifestation, whether that manifestation is launched from the solid ground of action or whether it is rooted in the solid ground of passivity.

where the words "centrally grounded" reinforced the mental images.

Then the theme was developed nicely, towards an even more interesting idea about "lower" and "higher" emotions - commenting with a wink about the sometimes advantages of being "wrong"/left, rather than "right". Well, yes, when the ball needs to be caught to the left - this advantage may even occur quite often... Having a bias by liking or disliking would seriously detract from efficiency.

> I think what we are seeing here is the difference between the lower and higher emotional centers. The lower emotional center manifests from it's likes and dislikes. The higher emotional center manifests from the reconciling force, which can be higher for the preceeding lower or lower for the succeeding higher. The higher emotional center does not "always need to be RIGHT"; sometimes it is quite advantageous to be "WRONG"

Thanks, Ian. I now have a useful metaphor (which my mind obviously leans easily toward) to remind me of the need to keep emotional neutrality in between any various required active or passive courses of action.

Regards,

Work Program week beginning 1 December 2008

---

by Harry

1. (Monday to Friday) To begin this way, try sometimes to see the opposite point of view to that which you hold. I do not mean that you are to discard your point of view but to include the opposite as well. This exercise demands first that you can clearly observe your opposite. Energy blocked up by the one-sidedness of our habitual consciousness is not allowed to flow into the opposite, which is kept out of consciousness. The sphere of our usual consciousness is thereby limited. It is narrowed, often ridiculously, and with this narrowness of consciousness I would specially connect the intractable thing in ourselves. If the opposite is genuinely and with effort included in consciousness the sphere of consciousness is greatly increased and a number of unpleasant features in us disappear. Our one-sidedness, which causes our over-sensitive reactions and also our totally wrong ways of self-valuation, is replaced by a broader, fuller consciousness. We can no longer insist we are right nor be cast down when proved to be wrong. We find it more difficult to be petty. In fact, we begin to escape from the prison of ourselves whose bars and gates result from our one-sidedness.
(From Nicoll, Volume V, page 1521)

2. (Friday to Sunday) Take 40 hours off. Period. Refuse to allow yourself to work. Start on a Friday after a meditation session. And do what "it will" for forty hours. Come back to a full, intense hour on Sunday. And report back to the group.

---

by Judy

This is being written before the second part of the exercise is undertaken - later today.

First of all, I read the wider context of the quote from Nicoll Volume V about increasing consciousness of oneself. This is my very favourite volume of the Commentaries. There is so much depth that possibilities for exploration seem endless. Thus I began very simply.

What is my current point of view?
Then I tried to see this at various times. The most revealing observations were the really simple ones.
I'll give an example:
On Tuesday afternoon, after a very busy work day, I took two small boys to their weekly cricket game after school. They are in the Under 9 team. I was sitting in the shade watching the training and it occurred to me to observe my current point of view to see what it was. I quickly realised that it was that I was tired and hot and looking forward to going home asap.
This led to further observation that my facial expression wasn't exactly "misery-guts" but neither was it totally equable and manifesting the enjoyment available.
And Judy's picture of herself is that she almost always looks alert and pleasant!
And here we are on a beautiful sunny afternoon and she has been caught out quite badly!

Okay. Well, let's see if I can see the opposite point of view. That is - not tired at all and content to live in and enjoy each moment.
With this attempt came the rush of liberating energy spoken of:

> This exercise demands first that you can clearly observe your opposite. Energy blocked up by the one-sidedness of our habitual consciousness is not allowed to flow into the opposite, which is kept out of consciousness. The sphere of our usual consciousness is thereby limited. It is narrowed, often ridiculously, and with this narrowness of consciousness I would specially connect the intractable thing in ourselves.

So much energy was released here; as if a dam had broken.

What I couldn't help doing at the time was simply to manifest this energy by going over to a couple of nearby cricket mums and joining in the conversation, patting the new border-collie pup and just enjoying the many beautiful moments offered. The expansion of consciousness allowed the enjoyment of these little ones, almost smaller than their cricket-pads and bats, scampering along the pitch and walking off the field to some applause - I mean, wonderful stuff which one wouldn't dream of missing. Yet, previously, I recall having the point of view that "Well, this isn't exactly riveting."
I did remember several times to say the Holy Equation prayer for transubstantiation for my being.

I'm wondering if this was the most appropriate action here.
I ask, Harry, because this will happen in various circumstances quite often, I think, and the quantity and quality of the energy released is substantial, so I wish to use it wisely.
Thank you so much for sharing this exercise.
Regards,

P.S. This "opposite point of view" observation thus is most effective for me in working with negativity, especially that sneaky negativity which may have otherwise gone unnoticed. And the beautiful thing about the release of energy is that one has some energy available for the proper Work of transforming the negativity or utilising the suffering, even if one may indeed be slightly depleted beforehand. In some way, there is a connection here to an accumulator or similar, permitting a small super-effort. But I digress.
Another interesting possibility is that similar work over time may indeed give evidence to build a case about "the intractable thing in oneself".

---

by Harry

I sort of stumbled into opposite point of view very early in my life, before I met the work. I got into an argument with someone I disliked. And realized that we were really saying the same thing. So I started saying the opposite. Something I totally didn't believe in. Lots of energy there.

The reading was brought to mind by dealing with a difficult student I currently have. I bright contrarian. (Something I've been described as quite often myself.) And I knew I had to work with the situation. Not for her benefit, but for mine. Because there were negative storms abrewing. I could feel the usual coming up. (We contrarians never like to lose. My grandpa taught me this. A great life lesson, but only if you live in the ordinary.)

I applied this reading to that situation. I didn't go over to her "side". I just let it in. And realized that there was nothing that I could do. I could see the machines working. Both hers and mine. And if I stopped my machine from working as usual, then I would save a mass of energy. How do I do this? Transubstantiate is one thing. As you described. Another is "not now, later". I don't know whether this came from G or O. But I say: "I don't have time for you know." to the mechanical 'i' that wants to exert itself. I don't want to go along right now. I'll give you something else later.

It's an amazing thing when you start to see these events as occuring, irregardless of you. Talking to the cricket moms can be pleasant. More pleasant than moping. It's funny, your incident calls to mind an incident when I was visiting a potential girl friend in Chicago. She had softball practice. And I was sitting in the park resenting being there on Saturn-day morning. Close to noon. And I just let it go. Enjoyed the sunny morning. And suddenly a little kid came up to me, tapped me on the shoulder and handed me a beer. My first thought was "why is this Black kid coming up to a stranger in the park". But he pointed to his father who was sitting several dozens of yards away, who smiled and waved his beer at me. Would never have happened had I stayed within my current snit. --Funny thing is that by the end of the day I walked out on the young woman I was visiting, despite my desires, and drove home, having seen her as very mechanical.--

How about that for associative stream of consciousness reply?

---

by Harry

The giving up Work is more difficult than I thought it would be. For part of the day it is easy. I do the same thing almost every day. I'm on line with my classes, etc. And I concentrate on that. But things like beginning the day. . .I begin the day by quiet meditation, greeting the Sun. And by cleansing my body. And Reading. Then trying to consciously eat. "Trying" being the key word on the last one. And these routines are hard to give up.

I come in here once I've eaten. Eating. That's another thing that didn't change. This is my fasting period. One of them. Doing my forty days and forty nights of Advent, as G describes. Totally vegan. So I'm working as soon as I go to the grocery, let alone eat.

---

by Karen

1st part
When I observed myself holding one point of view (say negative), I tried to move my way to the other side of the stick to attempt to see different perspectives. This brought about a feeling of indifference at times and an awareness that I could do nothing due to my reactive emotions and mechanicalness. I began to question what and where these thoughts and ideas came from. Trace them back to their root. Some were easy to trace, others slipped away and only gave me a glimpse.

The illusion of duality and the mass amounts of energy and force that could be produced presented itself. But how do we harness the energy that can be generated from this friction?

2nd part
I was successfully distracted from Friday to Sunday with holiday festivities filled with friends and family.

First think Monday morning I rose early to salute the warm sun with a ½ hour Tai Chi session and finished the evening embracing the cool moon.

---

by Harry

Harnessing the energy is something that happens. If you are working, then the energy goes to that inner I. To the Magnetic Center. The very act of separating from the expenditure of emotional energy unconsciously is the beginning of working, from my perspective.

Work Program week beginning 8 December 2008

---

by Ian

The Guest House
(Rumi)

This being human is a guest house.
Every morning a new arrival.

A joy, a depression, a meanness, some momentary awareness comes as an unexpected visitor.

Welcome and entertain them all.
Even if they are a crowd of sorrows, who violently sweep your house empty of its furniture, still, treat each guest honorably.

He may be clearing you out for some new delight.

The dark thought, the shame, the malice, meet them at the door laughing,
and invite them in.

Be grateful for whoever comes,
because each has been sent as a guide from beyond.

---

by Dean

This poem reminds me to appreciate the denying forces in life and to welcome friction so as to use this for my inner work. It brings me to realize that I have all of my past sufferings to be grateful for, for bringing me to the work and finding my potential soul as well as all future sufferings that will serve the same purpose.

Regards

---

by Harry

The Work Saying: Our Being Attracts Our Life seems to apply here. There are events that come to the door. Do we welcome the second force? Or do we welcome the opportunity? There's a section in Nicoll about changing what is the reconciling force, and doing this changes the second force.

Yes, sufferings are things we must learn from. But if we do learn from them we change our being. They will still "tempt" us. As Christ was tempted. And those events aren't always apparently negative.

---

by Cassandra

I've had this poem on a bulletin board at work, maybe a year or 2. I just heard some news that made me jealous and feeling left out. What's behind that? Invite the emotion it in for observation. What can it teach? Thanks for the reminder.

Work Program week beginning 15 December 2008

---

by Dean

Practice the sightless gaze and after a time become aware of the light entering into your eyes. While you are doing the sightless gaze imagine light entering your head and gathering in the area of the third eye chakra, sense this spot and imagine the light equalizing and balancing the two hemispheres of the brain.

Visualize a yin yang symbol encompassing the area of your navel. As you inhale visualize this symbol expanding to fill the circumference of the solar plexus. As you exhale imagine it shrinking back into the navel, visualize the symbol expanding and contracting with the rhythm of your breath. After you have done this begin to count with each breath, every time you lose your focus start over at one and begin counting again, try to gradually work your way up to more repetitions.

Breathe in through your nose and feel the air entering your head, visualize thunderclouds building and forming an atmosphere around your head on the inhalation. While you exhale imagine the atmosphere discharging a lightning bolt down the length of your spine, sense the energy flow down to the base of your spine, imagine this electricity connecting the realms of heaven and earth. Do this about seven times every hour during your waking state.

Ponder: Can I harness the energy from the “storm” and use it to my own advantage? Can I realize the purpose of struggle as well as contentment?

---

by Harry

This is very similar to the exercise described in the third series. Some modifications that I've made over the long time of doing that one.

I feel a circular motion. The inhallation corresponds with energy going up the spine to the top of the head center. This then transfers to the third eye center and flows down to the solar plexus. I don't feel that as an explosion as much as an opening up of a flower that radiates.

I see this as intellectual, higher intellectual and instinctive/moving. The emotional can be added. At least in my instincts there is an emotional opening as well, after the exhalation to the solar plexus, the heart, throat and sex open and radiate during the pause. This includes both the emotional/sexual and the higher emotional. The movement then goes back to the upflow from the next inhallation. The circle is completed.

This is a regular exercise on going to sleep, connecting to the higher centers. And upon awakening. I've also done it while walking.

I believe that part of this is the conscious eating of air. And, when done appropriately, also gets into the conscious eating of impressions.

---

by Dean

I definitely relate to what Harry wrote, I experienced quite a bit of the same things while doing these.

Earlier in the week I had a pretty strong experience with the solar plexus exercise in connection with conscience because of an idiotic mistake I made at work, it helped to bring about a conscious experience though, which was good and definitely served as a shock.

Using different symbols works well too as long as they are circular, the enneagram is one that I do once and awhile.

Regards

Work Program week beginning 22 December 2008

---

by Ian

Winter Solstice

Awake each morning as if you were entering the world for the first time, with a clean slate. An unfocused, sightless gaze and Soundless Sound might be found useful for merging with an inter-connected universe free of the habitual labeling and identifying processes of the organism.

During the week, set aside your habitual likes and dislikes. Instead, try to experience those things or events as if for the first time, with an innocence not tainted by preconceptions.

In the evening, Ponder on how the weeks exercises might nourish the growth of an inner-being embryo.
Ponder the above statement with regard to this statement from Beelzebub's Tales to His Grandson:

"...I learned that these sacred substances, 'abrustdonis' and 'helkdonis', are precisely those substances which enter into the formation and perfecting of the higher being-bodies of the three-brained beings - that is, the 'kesdjan body' and the 'body of the soul' - and that the separation of the sacred 'askokin' from the two other substances proceeds when beings, on whatever planet they may be, transmute these sacred substances in themselves for the forming and perfecting of their higher bodies, by means of conscious labor and intentional suffering...."

---

by Harry

I find it interesting that this is posted for this week. I have been thinking and working a bit on changing the ordinary way of doing things.

I went to get my hair cut the other day. (Not an event I do often, having grown up in the era of Hippies.) I was the first customer. And neither of the two employees seemed very pleased to see me. One was the white pretty girl chick and the other was a black employee. There was obviously some tension between them. Even though I'm known to have my own attitude, I find it distasteful when workers have an attitude.

For whatever reason, I decide to change my usual silent approach to the young Black woman who was cutting my hair. I chatted with her. She chatted reluctantly. Told her I didn't want the usual run a razor through my hair, but preferred a scissors cut. (Something these new hair cutters seem to disdain.) She reluctantly did it.

I continued to joke with her. Marked that the music was enough to drive me crazy, knowing full well that it had to be the choice of her coworker. Praised her on the job she did. Then gave her a 50% tip.

She almost walked me to the door.

I knew, somehow, I had changed her day. And could only remember "Externally consider always, internally consider never."

---

by Cassandra

Harry,

You should try growing an afro; i'm guessing that would be something different for you and the stylists.

Cassandra

---

by Dean

It's hard for me to look at things from a clean slate even with the sightless gaze and soundless sound, but when I ponder sincerely about my environment, the world and the universe in general, I can feel my formatory know-it-all attitude change to a feeling/sensation of not knowing anything because I can't be certain why this universe exists in the first place. So I see all these substances that make up matter and realize that this isn't just a computer that I'm sitting in front of but atoms that have been melded and molded to create a machine known as a computer. When pondering enough this leads to a clean slate experience because I no longer am sure why or what this is that we call life, I've read that all is connected to all and that everything serves the process of energy exchange but this only gives a certain sense of security and the big question remains. So this is definitely a profitable exercise and brings me to see things in a new light.

Harry's comments bring to mind certain past experiences, going to get my hair cut is usually similar, one funny thing that I thought of is the fact that hair is just strands of cells and people spend so much time trying to fashion these cells to look a certain way, seeing things for what they are also brings about this clean slate experience when I watch another biped being hovering over another pretensious persons hair cells being cut.

The quote from BT is something that helps me to transform suffering more and realize what my aim in the cosmic scheme is, this concept sits well with me at the moment and I can see things a bit more impartially.

Thanks Ian, the emphasis on questioning things has brought about a new sunrise

---

by Judy

Life presented me with many useful Work opportunities, many more than usual, over the past couple of weeks. In the process, however, I was away from home and staying with my daughter and her partner over Christmas, hence all daily impressions were different from the accustomed routine and some were indeed totally new. I was thus seeing things for the first time in actuality as well as psychologically. So the above exercise was greatly assisted by life in several ways.

There was -

> Awake each morning as if you were entering the world for the first time, with a clean slate. An unfocused, sightless gaze and Soundless Sound might be found useful for merging with an inter-connected universe free of the habitual labeling and identifying processes of the organism.

which I've already mentioned.

Then there was the fact that my daughter is expecting her first child quite soon and this wondrous phase of her life is new and full of wonder for us all. I couldn't help but relate to the wonder of my own "inner being embryo" in a different way.

I know the memories from this recent special time are stronger because of work attempts. I give praise and thanks for this. Many vivid experiences, so I'll briefly mention a few - a beautiful Christmas day with new family to meet, good company and much laughter and terrific food, flowers, drinks - the panorama of colours and the assault on the senses of the Cirque du Soleil, whose 2008 performance, "Dralion" was astonishing - the catching-up with my only sister at Noosa Heads and some true emotion at the reunion - my daughter insisting that I close my eyes and hold her hand as we walked across the marble floor of the new Queensland Art Gallery to stand before a stunning sculpture titled "In Bed" by Ron Muerk. I could go on and on.

Of course, now I'm taking a little time to digest it all and recuperate from the incessant activity and get back into the old routine of semi-solitude (as Harry mentions).
I hope everyone had a safe and enjoyable Christmas and New Year.
It is good to be back home with Elliecat. I left her to be fed by a neighbour this time and was a little concerned about that, but I needn't have worried. She ran away from me for an hour or so when I arrived home, but now won't leave me alone at all and seems very happy - funny little thing!
And it is especially good to be back on the site.
Fond regards to all,

---

by Cassandra

Judy, what a nice Christmas you describe. Christmas occurs during summer in your part of the world. That's an interesting contrast. All the best on the birth of your new grandchild.

Cassandra

---

by Ian

Hi Judy,

Thanks for that.

Work Program week beginning 29 December 2008

---

by Ian

Seekers may wish to list aspects of their life that they are strongly identified with thru self-love. This is to be undertaken with an eye towards the future when an irrevocable sacrifice will be required of every sincere seeker in order to make a space for greater being. The list may be taken into daily life to be appended. For each of the catagories indicated below list one or more of the aspects of yourself and your life that supports your self-love, e.g. - attitudes, beliefs, attachments, behaviors, roles.

ESSENCE :

PERSONALITY :

HOME-LIFE :

CAREER :

FOOD :

HABITS :

INTERESTS :

KNOWLEDGE :

With an eye towards the future when it becomes evident that sacrifice is the creative element in suffering and when the seeker sees that it is necessary to make an irrevocable sacrifice:

a) Ponder: Which of the above could be given up temporarily as a prepatory exercise in sacrifice?

b) Ponder: Which of the above could be irrevocably sacrificed in order to make room for a resplendence of a presence?

---

by Harry

ESSENCE : I'm not sure essence supports self love. I'm not sure of my essence unless I am working, and then I'm not sure I can put that into words.

PERSONALITY : My personality was formed greatly in the lower parts of intellectual center. I move toward "know it all" ism. To be right and to argue to the last breath.

HOME-LIFE : Home life has changed much over the years. Right now the only presence are two cats that my son left here when he move across country. Very little infringes on this domain. And I really don't seek out many relationships because I'm fairly satisfied with my semi-solitude.

CAREER : As a teacher I am the authority figure that is in control. But I am also the anti-establishment person. This is a strange role at times. And my personality enjoys students liking my classes. This is also my contact with other beings.

FOOD : I've been a food snob for a long time. I taught myself to cook what I couldn't afford to eat out. When I fast twice a year, this is in conflict at times. Though by now I am pretty used to fasting. It still creates a conflict when the routine becomes a routing. Which is funny, because when I'm not fasting I eat a very routine diet.

HABITS : I am a creature of habits. It is easier to do what is necessary when I follow habits. I enjoy getting up without an alarm. I have the habit of always being early. Learned in childhood. My days tend to be similar. I work better in the AM. And I like to have tasks over and done with before going on to the unnecessary. The animals also train me with their habits. I'm typing this on a new keyboard because I had to, wanted to replace my old computer. And the habit of the keys is irritating right now, because I had been typing on the old one for years.

INTERESTS : I enjoy film, TV, the like. If I can find the great film that I haven't seen it is wonderful. But I eat a lot of crap to find that one. Sometimes it is just pretty pictures. I'm also into electronic devices, magazines. I find it hard to read much of anything, anymore. I have The Widows of Eastwick sitting on my endtable for over a month now and have read a few pages.

KNOWLEDGE : I can fake it with the best of them. I have little desire to keep doing that. I teach courses I know fairly well, upside down and backwards. I'm a good Speech and Writing teacher. But I teach less knowledge than a skill. I've learned to distrust most knowledge that isn't tied to another center. As I live in an "intellectual center world" this can sometimes be a problem.

---

by Karen

ESSENCE : When essence pops up I become a happy, giddy little girl, vibrant and bursting at the seams with awe and wonder. It has also been near impossible to work while in essence as I am undisciplined and my attention is all over the place, just like a kid. (not sure if this state is in fact essence or what brings it about)

PERSONALITY : My personality is like a narrow entrance hall to the great room that is my true nature. With time and trust, I feel more comfortable revealing more. I'm guarded, reliable, consistent, respectable and enjoy making people laugh.

HOME-LIFE : mother, wife, daughter, sister, nurturer, role model, and if we are being honest and sincere (1/4 nag/bossy pants)

CAREER : f/t inside sales manager for a small catering company (no direct reports, no authority). I work with excel and quickbooks all day. Most external customer dealings are via telephone. This role has offered a great opportunity for self-observation and observation of others. Doing what it doesn't like has been a struggle.

Prior to this position I was in a role of authority in the corporate world chasing materialism. I was a workaholic. The busier I kept, the more I could avoid the gnawing in my gut. I was a miserable owner of many fine things, but the reality was everything owned me. I was attached and identified with my title, flashy sports car, clothing and uncomfortable shoe collection all the way down to the prestige of my house address being on "university avenue" (these ridiculous perceptions of success) I exhausted myself to sickness to be well thought of and wanted nothing more than to be viewed as a strong accomplished business women. Something always felt wrong about this whole facade. Not sure I'd compose it any other way, because it led me to the work.

FOOD : I have a soft spot for green tea and sushi and prefer salty, spicy foods over sweet.
I caught myself on new years eve judging the meal friends had prepared because it was all packaged, processed food that had been striped of all nutritional value.

HABITS : I like to be on time or early. I work better in the early am or late pm.
I bless my food silently before every meal. I make a request that the food be received and digested for my highest good and give thanks to everyone that contributed to the process that brought the meal to my table.

INTERESTS : spending time with my family, music, reading, reiki, reflexology, meditating, painting, taking 2 hour baths

KNOWLEDGE : very thirsty for knowledge, but in a new way from before. Before knowledge was power, bragging rights, a feeling of superiority. Knowledge secured my position in my careers and in life. Now its more of a journey of self-discovery and self-development. I'm coming to the realization that I know very little and am unsure of the validity of what I do know.

---

by Dean

ESSENCE : Many times when I reach a state I sometimes emanate too much and waste energy for various reasons, lately I've been focusing more on trying to be more balanced and neutral but it will take some time.

PERSONALITY :I'm attached to past concepts that I have picked up as well as sometimes playing an introverted role, although I'm not sure if that's from personality or essence, or both. I'm overly sincere at times and pretty regular with my activities and can keep my cool under stressful situations on some occasions especially at work where I usually take things in stride.

HOME-LIFE :I live with my parents and my brother and sister and we've always been very close, too much in some respects because I should probably strike out on my own soon. My family is somewhat philosophical in some ways, but I feel myself at odds with a lot of viewpoints now that I'm in the work but am still happy and content where I am at the moment.

CAREER :At work I'm basically just a honest hard working person but have a role as an authority to a degree that clashes with some of my past ideals, but not as much so any more. I work at a hotel as a supervisor for the housekeeping department and inspect rooms. This has always been a good experience for me and the other housekeepers and I have good relations, I've grown to learn a lot through playing the role of helping out and also making sure everything is done. It's also sometimes an experience of suffering together when we are very busy, like on New Years Day which is one of the worst days of the year for everyone because the rooms are trashed, but it's a good form of resistance for me to overcome for work.

FOOD :I started fasting last year and just got done with fasting recently and am going back to eating what I usually eat. I try to usually have a variety of foods and try to eat consciously as much as possible. I'm eating much lighter than I used to, and have slowly been acquiring better eating habits over the past few years.

HABITS :One habit I have is not having much small talk because I've always felt it wasn't important or wasn't what I wanted to think about, but have been working on this more because at other moments I really enjoy it, so it's somewhat subjective I think.

INTERESTS :Lately I took up Tai Chi and have also been doing Yoga regularly for a few years. I play the drums and my brother plays guitar as well as my dad who has a bass, we play together and record music once and awhile. I used to write poetry quite a bit but lately only here and there, other than that it's just work and family for the most part.

KNOWLEDGE :I have past ideas and knowledge that I still cling to, but slowly I feel them fading as time progresses. I used to use my knowledge to overcome suffering in the wrong way, which led me to wrong conceptions, but now since I study the work and don't dabble in other philosophies as much I feel my knowledge expanding and becoming more precise.

---

by Cassandra

The exercise isn't entirely clear, but it sounds like we're asked to think about how the ego shrouds each of the items below.

ESSENCE : I've often thought I had a sincere and honest innermost being and that this showed in all my close relationships. I am the good one, the deep, thoughtful person who listens intently to the hardships of others and does what is right. This self-anggrandizing attitude of omni-good seems to be the mask or role I play, in terms of the real me; and I get tricked into thinking this is me that others so readily see. What I often do is simply bear others' conversations, resenting, and judging them.

PERSONALITY : Again, self-love would have me believe my personality is honest, light and refreshing. Free from the shallowness I find around me.

HOME-LIFE : The self-sacrificing, hardworking mother, wife, role model who always knows what is best.

CAREER : Hardworking, smart, successful, clever professional. My attitude and behavior towards my colleagues is exemplary, yet light and easy-going. Everyone's confidant and 'special friend.'

FOOD : Let not processed, plastic-packaged foods pass my lips. I know what and how to eat, what to feed my children. Chinese medicine, acupuncture, whole foods. If only they followed my advice, eating habits, simplicity in eating and preparation, their lives and health would be as good as mine. At one point, I even thought food would impart higher consciousness.

HABITS : My ego tells me that simplicity is superior.

INTERESTS : Again, simplicity in being--simple walks (rather than the body wearing jogging/running that seems to appeal to most Americans), Work Ideas, books. Foreign films, limited exposure to mass media (because I judge most of it as growth inhibiting). My interests are better than the woman behind me in the grocery line who has a cart loaded with fats and sugars and easy entertainment.

KNOWLEDGE : My knowledge of world affairs, spirituality sets me apart from others.

In all these areas, I see self-love coopting those attitudes and behaviors that could bind me to others. But I have also been able to notice when these come up. There are so many opportunities. A trip to the grocery store always provides the opportunity to observe self-love and conceit. I have also noticed that simply smiling at a clerk makes the experience lighter.

---

by Anna

ESSENCE : This is a state that I am always finding elusive. When do I actually act from my essence, and when do I not. If it has to do with my real ‘I’, and if I am always grappling with so many Is, does that mean I do not have an essence?

PERSONALITY : My personality exhibits confidence, sureness, always knowing what needs to be done. It is a great asset in my career, making decisions that take things forward. But my personality is also my downside…at times behaving mechanically in domestic situations with my husband and daughter. It is as if I have a split personality.

HOME-LIFE: I am also a mother, wife of 24 years, daughter, sister, nurturer, employer. The line between my home-life and my working life is rather thin. Our offices are 2 minutes walk from our house, we work long hours, but we enjoy long walks too. At the moment, I wish I knew more how to approach my 17 year old daughter , I know she needs loads of love… and also discipline. I am aware that the type of education she receives can only develop her personality…and I (and her father) have the responsibility to help her develop her being/her essence. But I struggle here and we (me and her) clash often.

CAREER: I feel privileged in this area. I am doing what I dreamt of doing from a very young age, conducting environmental research in different countries. I run a small company together with my husband. Together with other partners in other countries we bid for tenders from the European Commission and are quite successful. Recently working with a wonderful coordinator who adds a lot of spiritual balance to the research work. Am also beginning to understand the rhythms of money flowing in and out and no longer worry about this.

FOOD : I try to buy fresh food and spent time cooking many late evenings a week. But I feel a great need to learn how to fast and have not yet found a way towards achieving this, as the 3 of us eating together in the evening is a time I do not want to miss out on. I also have a weakness for wine and drink every day..sometimes too much.

HABITS: At the moment trying hard to establish the habit of doing the early morning exercise, (relaxation and sensing), the rukus etc and some yoga even during even the “holidays”. I seem to lack the necessary ‘body’ discipline but consider this essential to develop ‘my being’.

INTERESTS : The culture of the countries we work in are great interests and I read a lot to understand also the cultural context we are working in not just the scientific. Very interested in archaeology and religions. Am also interested in the role and development of women and spent time even writing about this. These last 3 years made a conscious decision to learn more about the Fourth Way and returned to the books I read 25 years ago. Now I make it a point to periodically go to workshops in Italy and in UK, and learning/doing the Movements is an uplifting experience each time. Going to Italy next weekend, in spite of a looming work deadline. I organise a very small Gurdjieff reading group in Malta, although we read mostly Bennett and Nicoll. I wish this group will increase and I can regularly bring over a teacher.

KNOWLEDGE : I read voraciously, and buy books constantly. I try to learn languages, but never try hard enough so I never go beyond my Maltese and English, in spite of the money spent on these endeavours. Sometimes this ‘knowledge’ I accumulate I feel is at the expense of my ‘being’, and many times I am aware I am operating only from my intellectual centre.

---

by Harry

I find it interesting that so many here are strong career individuals. Just an observation.

Dealing with children is interesting. I gave my son the Work when he was about 10. Even given that the teenage years are interesting. Though having the Work as a shared interest can create common ground. That doesn't mean there still aren't small annoyances, that can be given up. He has been visiting for the holidays. Mostly because my mother is dying. . .not immediately. . .but has her third bout of cancer, and he wanted to spend time with her while he could. He turns dials on appliances. My breakfast didn't cook right this morning. He wanted to stop in last evening, well beyond my usual bed time. I made the time available, because I may not see him for a pretty good bit of time.

Fasting: I think of it as a necessity. It's relatively simply to start. Just eat no cholesterol. Any living being has cholesterol. So eat none. But it means reading labels and thinking. But, again, I am reminded of a question I was asked once: I'd picked up a hitchhiker and she saw All and Everything on the back seat. There was a local "guru" at the time who embraced G. "So how is it that you're supposed to be a vegan at certain times but can have a turkey dinner?" I couldn't answer her until I was fasting at Thanksgiving and it was easier to eat for my parents. Rather than call attention to "what I was doing". And quite frankly eating a bit of turkey wasn't tasty, and my light eating led to lots of questions about why I wasn't eating more.

This goes back to the friction. Friction is energy for work. Friction is one of the things produced by fasting, as well as a cleansing of the body.

What can I give up? Almost anything. I like diversion, though. There isn't energy for constant work. And I do find some interesting things in popular culture. TV shows like Life and Life on Mars and even Battlestar Gallactica provide food beyond the ordinary. I remember, always, that secrets are hidden and transmitted in those things which will be embraced by culture. Cards. Dice. Even some vices. I really saw this in a film called Lord Love a Duck, written by a Hollywood "hack" supposedly. But such subtle messages in this "divine" comedy.

---

by Ian

Hi All,

Interesting that there are 5 posts on this thread from one year ago.
It is good to see that some of what is posted here has a lasting value.
Thanks to all for your candid insights.

Work Program week beginning 5 January 2009

---

by Ian

Seven "Prayers" of Enlightenment

Mindfulness - During the day, try to stay rooted in the present moment by observing the body and its sensations, the mind and its thoughts flowing by, the emotional center and its feelings both positive and negative. Also be attentive to what is happening around you in your immediate environment.

Investigation - Choose a Work related subject and read what someone has written about it, then spend 5-10 minutes wordlessly Pondering on the chosen subject.

Energy - Several times during the day, stop to absorb the energy of impressions by using the Sightless Gaze and Soundless Sound.

Joy - Stop several times throughout the day and evoke an Inner Smile.

Relaxation - Try to keep the body relaxed by only using the muscles necessary for the task at hand. During inactive moments, allow the body to completely relax by giving way to the force of gravity.

Concentration - Choose an object and pay close attention to it for five minutes.

Equanimity - Amidst all your activities, try to stay centered in a Float of Being, unaffected by the whirlwind of activity proceeding around you that lures you into Identification and Inner Considering.

---

by Judy

Oh, these are a lovely and valid expansion of my usual meaning for "prayer".

I was struck by the appropriateness (for me) of the recent 3-month program, let alone this week's work exercise. This is because very recently, as much changes rapidly in outer ordinary life, I had noticed some inner confusion. In an attempt to address and inquire into this, I went back to the very core basics in the inner life. I just kept reducing and relaxing into this core of stillness, which included the "I Am" exercises, some "stop" exercises, daily self-observation and self-remembering attempts, one of Mr Beidler's Bones exercises and some very simple working with negativity. Anything complex or too theoretical was allowed to fall completely away. Then the outer whirlwind could rush about as it liked and I remained undisturbed, true to this "Centre within", so to speak. Anyway, to return to the subject of prayer, i noticed that the usual before-sleep prayers (Holy Equation and The Lord's Prayer plus one from childhood) continued in an absolutely natural way. These prayers have remained all along. One specific to the Gurdjieff Work has added itself and several of a more personal kind have not made it through the years of seeking, but otherwise this late evening routine remains similar to one encouraged in childhood.

I do not judge this either way at all. It simply is. When much fell away and the intellect had trouble being clear and interest was at a low level for a while, then the mentioned routines ensured some survival of the inner life.

There is much deep gratitude for this. Many times before in life, when outer changes and challenges (be they "good" or "bad") have descended in waves, I have fallen asleep completely while coping. Then, quite often, did not wake-up again for some time afterwards.

Regards,

Work Program week beginning 12 January 2009

---

by Dean

Exercise 1

Here's an exercise Mr.Gurdjieff gave some of his pupils.

"I wish give real Christmas present. Imagine Christ. Somewhere in space is." Mr.Gurdjieff forms an oval with both his hands. "Make contact. Not to center, but to outside, periphery. Draw from there, draw in, I. Settle in you, Am. Do every day. Wish to become Christ. Become. Be."

Exercise 2

Put yourself into a three centered state, try to sustain this state while you are going about your daily business. After you have become settled into this state begin the next part of the exercise.
While walking say to yourself I walk for Endlessness
While breathing say I breath for Endlessness
While feeling say I feel for Endlessness
While thinking say I think for Endlessness
While eating say I eat for Endlessness
Whatever you are doing add this mantra and become aware of your yourself.

Exercise 3

Whenever you observe yourself doing something automatically and without consciousness say to yourself, "Forgive it father for it knows not what it does." Try to counterbalance the mechanical action with a conscious effort of some sort, try to use your observations of holy denyings to provoke a holy affirming action and bring about reconciliation and remorse.

---

by Judy

I'm still in a bit of a flat psychological space where efforts are required more than usual. This too will pass!
This morning I tried the second of your suggested exercises, Dean, during the weekly shopping trip.

> Exercise 2
>
> Put yourself into a three centered state, try to sustain this state while you are going about your daily business. After you have become settled into this state begin the next part of the exercise.

While walking say to yourself I walk for Endlessness
While breathing say I breath for Endlessness
While feeling say I feel for Endlessness
While thinking say I think for Endlessness
While eating say I eat for Endlessness
Whatever you are doing add this mantra and become aware of your yourself.

I added various things I noticed I was doing, such as "I listen for Endlessness" and I am sensing for Endlessness."
The change of state was undeniable. I felt less alone, more alive, gratitude entered. This is definitely an improvement on a rather dry and flat earlier morning state.
I did a brief visualisation using the first exercise too. Why the periphery, I wonder. Easier to contact, perhaps?

I've been a member of our group since June 2005 and this past few weeks has been the quietest I remember. I cannot talk as I have been also very quiet. It is up to each of us to decide whether we want the immeasurable benefits that being in a group brings and then to act accordingly. Yes, sometimes it is a struggle. Like today. I really don't have much to share about the actual Work (as I haven't been doing enough of good quality to notice new things of interest), but I really want to say hello and to let you all know that you are important to me and I am so grateful for our little group of seekers, where one can share freely without harsh recriminations or judgment.
Nicoll reminds us that he who simply works along the first line of work will come to an impasse. Work along the second and third lines is essential and is what can carry one through those dry spells of less contact with the higher centres or forces. He even says that there is benefit for him who may have done little work on the first line, but who has done much for others and for the work itself. There is great hope here.

Warm regards,

---

by Harry

I agree with you Judy about the silence. I stop by first thing every morning.

I too have had little to say about this exercise. I work regularly. Trying for a centered state. Perhaps it is because the concept of Endlessness just doesn't work for me.

---

by Cassandra

Judy and Harry,

Perhaps the time of year has something to do with our non-response. I THINK about doing the work everyday and also feel some guilt at not getting on the site everyday as I used to at the beginning of my time here. But to the specific exercise you mention, I've done it in episodes and have experienced very briefly that detachment that I've found through other work exercises. I've not posted because I've been waiting for a more prolonged attempt at that week's exercises before sharing. That might not come, though. I've planned to go for an afternoon walk in the beautiful sunshine and try this one in particular. The Jesus imagery suggested is also one that I can relate to very much, but I'm not sure how to practice it. A few efforts haven't produced anything noticeable.

Harry, I use God instead of Endlessness, maybe for you that's difficult as well. No matter the term, the task presents a nice reminder of my only REAL purpose for doing anything. It challenges internal consideration and identification, which are nothing, but these are with me from the moment I wake until I sleep at night.

I was just in a whole foods store, and a woman checking out put her things a bit close to mine, not a real imposition--but I noticed and said "excuse me." She apologized for being too close and asked me to wait, she wanted to write something out for me. I joked and replied: "What is it, learn to share your space." She laughed. She wrote"A Salaam Alaikum." She said it was something she had just learned this morining.

Nice

p.s. a group of whirling dervishes are visiting Athens in a couple of weeks. our entire family, including the children will attend the event. i'm looking forward to it. to remember god always, while breathing, walking, sitting, dancing is a good thing.

Cassandra

Work Program week beginning 26 January 2009

---

by Ian

Counter the urge to disagree with an inner smile.
Respond to dislikes with inner silence. Sense your connection to the cosmos through gravity, air and impressions.
Relax 3 centers and Ponder: Are we designed to function in a maze of illusion where reality can only be imagined?

---

by Harry

I need to work more on this. Especially when I'm in the classroom. Post again later.

---

by Judy

I haven't noticed much disagreement so far - even an inner disagreement; which brings up the question, "Am I too agreeable or easily influenced?". The observing continues.

Sensing connection to the cosmos by gravity is something not tried before. There's been a bit of experimentation with various types of movements so far.
Does anyone more experienced in this particular sensing have any tips or techniques here please? Is there a way of sensing gravity-connection-to-cosmos when totally still, for example?
Whilst trying several things for this, though, I bacame quite aware of the balancing action of the vestibular apparatus. I seemed to sense movement of liquid in the ears. This, in its own way, is a kind of sensing the gravity connection. It senses what is up and where I am in space and adjusts so that I don't fall over when moving. What miracles we are! Modern medicine calls the sense of balance the sixth sense; the organ involved is the vestibular apparatus. I have only updated on this recently - "The Brain that Changes Itself" by Norman Doidge, so it is law-conformable that awareness of this sense has followed soon after. Again, as usual, the knowledge expressed as the actual work exercise increases understanding a little.

As to:

> Are we designed to function in a maze of illusion where reality can only be imagined?

Well, thank goodness, for sanity's sake, "reality" assumes different levels. I mean, if this computer wasn't somehow "real" to me, I'd be close to la-la-land. I need this level of reality for everyday living.

However, this is indeed a deep ponder, quite weighty, and a useful reminder of the larger reality.

I'm appreciating the two weeks timing suggested for our exercises at the moment as am really just beginning to inquire and dive a little deeper.
Regards,

---

by Harry

Gravity is one of those interesting observations. Perhaps we did something like this before, or perhaps it is the ice and snow that surrounds me. I can't walk without gravity. I can't stand up without gravity. But gravity pulls me down.

As to disagreeing, I think that much of this comes to personality types. As I said before, somehow I developed a contratian personality. Probably as self justification. Which means I find much to disagree with. Probably the greatest difficulty is to distinguish between normal thwarting of disagreement and a Work effort in that direction. Because we must hold our tongues on a regular basis in ordinary life.

I have been making Work efforts of late to be positive toward others. My largest difficulty with this is in the classroom. I am an instinctive teacher. And my instinct is to challenge. Like G I look for corns to step on. I teach Speech and Writing and we must break personality traits to foster success. Success for our students. They don't see that often. I don't disagree with students so much. But with the normal college faculty, where political correctness has become the disease of the day. I just read G's discussion of the condolences he received at Orage's death. I can't imagine how he would react to the politically correct atmosophere in which we live our daily lives.

Work Program week beginning 2 February 2009

---

by Ian

Inner considering and its companions Identification, Self-justification and Self-importance are behaviors that waste our vital energies. Could any benefit be gained for ourself and others if we took in our Impressions Objectively rather than Subjectively?

When any of these behaviors, unbecoming to a man without quotation marks, are noticed, the seeker may may evoke a feeling of Remorse whilst Sensing the spine and skull and repeating silently "It is nothing; I wish Be".

Ponder: Does a man without quotation marks need a Real "I" with with quotation marks?

---

by Harry

Oh, the evil self-justification. As I push the envelope in my daily life, I'm always falling a little aside the normally accepted mode. I know I've stepped over a line. But then I spend hours justifying how I will explain it to a superior. Or wondering what is going to happen. I know this is useless activity. I know it wastes energy. I can even feel the energy leaving me.

Of course that stepping over the line (Usually of politcal correctness) goes under last week's activities. And I work on that, too. Not as much as I should. Some i in me still loves to shock and offend. Only now I'm shocking and offending those who should be shocking and offending me.

But then comes the even greater waste. When will this come back to bight me? I've learned that if I work, if I go to I Am Now. . .I can divert this energy from being wasted. But doing that is an intentional struggle. Because the small i that wants to worry about the results just keeps going.

Work Program week beginning 9 February 2009

---

by Ian

Relish one discomfort each day.
Extoll the virtues of inconveniences.
Harbour secret thoughts of love towards adversaries.
Opine contrarily to your usual beliefs.

While relaxing 3 centers, Ponder: What lies beyond the veil of color, form, sound and sensation?

---

by Dean

One discomfort that came about today was when I was in the shower, the water ran cold and instead of trying to avoid the discomfort by leaving, I decided to use it as a chance to relish a discomfort. It went well for awhile but it soon got to me, although it seemed to create a feeling of being more impartial to a somewhat negative experience. Other discomforts that came along during the week were not as conscious overall and didn't have the same affect, my choice of trying to create a discomfort was usually somewhat subjective some of the time, and was probably not sufficient.

> While relaxing 3 centers, Ponder: What lies beyond the veil of color, form, sound and sensation?

I couldn't really come up with a comprehensable answer to this, and I didn't expect to, but the only thing I could really think of was that behind our usual reality and perception there is a void of non being. Other than a vacuum of empty space I really couldn't get an image of what lies behind the sensual world, so this question could only lead to more questions that could only give an approximate idea to this.

Regards

---

by Ian

> Dean wrote:
>
> > [illegible]

> While relaxing 3 centers, Ponder: What lies beyond the veil of color, form, sound and sensation?

I couldn't really come up with a comprehensable answer to this, and I didn't expect to, but the only thing I could really think of was that behind our usual reality and perception there is a void of non being. Other than a vacuum of empty space I really couldn't get an image of what lies behind the sensual world, so this question could only lead to more questions that could only give an approximate idea to this.

Regards

Well, of course this is a question that Philosophers have been asking for centuries... without a definitive answer.
What lies beyond the Veil of Illusion?
What is it that our eyes do not see?

---

by Cassandra

I'm not real good at small talk and tend to be shy in a room of people that I may have known for a long time. I get together about once a week to eat a meal with some people. This is uncomfortable sometimes because I want them to think well of me, but often don't know what to say to them. I decided to try and sit with the discomfort rather than 'go out and make friends.' It occured to me for a fraction of a second--why, I mean really why would I desire to be the object of someone's attention?

What's behind form and sensation--me, us, the unity--maybe.

---

by Judy

> Well, of course this is a question that Philosophers have been asking for centuries... without a definitive answer.
> What lies beyond the Veil of Illusion?
> What is it that our eyes do not see?

And it is still being asked and investigated today.

An idea I've come across recently suggests that what lies behind could perhaps be called "the self". (Cassandra, you touch on this with "me, us" I think.)
Then, to extend, just as to a physicist, God/Endlessness is the Cosmos, so then, to a spiritual seeker, God/Endlessness can be called "the self behind the Cosmos."

Regards,

Work Program week beginning 16 February 2009

---

by Dean

Sense your spine and skull and be aware of your thinking center as an apparatus for collecting impressions.

Whenever you feel angry or tense relax your abdomen, breathe, feel and visualize the movement of your diaphragm.

When you move breathe and feel the rhythm of your various movements.

Bring yourself to a three centered state and endure a form of intentional suffering, if you succeed in doing this add an inner smile as well.

Ponder: Can I be impartial towards external impressions?

---

by Judy

> Bring yourself to a three centered state and endure a form of intentional suffering, if you succeed in doing this add an inner smile as well.

I used this part of the exercise to intentionally play what I'll call "the waiting game" (waiting for my daughter's baby to be born; also waiting to find a suitable flatmate for this large house). Just naming this new perspective (as intentional suffering) worked very well indeed. Now I am "awaiting" with patience and grace and an inner smile.

Thanks Dean.
Regards,

---

by Cassandra

Judy,

Congratulations on the upcoming birth; or if it's already happened, on the birth.

May God's hand be on the little one now and always.

Cassandra

by Judy

Thank you Cassandra.
No, it hasn't happened yet. I'll keep you posted.
Best wishes,

---

by Lawrick

This has been a good work program for me as I cannot seem to sense my skull. I have no problem whatsoever sensing the physicalness of my spine and solar plexus and the other energies as well but when I try to sense my skull all I can apprehend is nothingness (no jokes please). I wonder why. Certainly I have paid far more attention to the other areas for some unknown reason. It must have appeared strange to an outside observer to see me whacking and tapping my skull to maintain some sense of it last week. Obviously more work in this area is required so thanks Dean.

The relaxation section dealing with the Abdomen was much more successful. It takes a few minutes and much attention to sense the aspiration process so here we have a "long" count to 10 and there's little conscious memory of stress and anger by then,

Sorry, but the ponder didn't go anywhere this week and I don't know why.

But all in all a very rewarding program for me this week. Merci Dean

Lawrick

Work Program week beginning 23 February 2009

---

by Harry

We are at the time of Spring Equinox, the period of preparation called Lent. This is one of the two times a year that G identified as the appropriate time to fast. That fasting essentially means abstaining from all foods that contain cholesterol. Anything that was ever alive. Or being a full vegan.

If you are up to it, become vegan until the Equinox, or Easter. For forty days and nights. And report here each week on what you notice and what progress you are making.

If you don't feel you are up to the commitment of a full fast, then follow the old Catholic Church Lenten Guidelines. Friday should be a day of total abstinence. On the other days of the week only one meal should contain any cholesterol. And the two additional meals should not equal the one single meal in size and volume.

If you are going totally vegan, realize that you will probably eat smaller meals and more often. Also pay attention to your source of protein. Whole grains become very important. The carbs that last a long time in your body. Also add nuts and the like, which are high in proteins.

---

by Chuck

Okay, I'm in. I'll follow the old Catholic church guidelines:

> Friday should be a day of total abstinence. On the other days of the week only one meal should contain any cholesterol. And the two additional meals should not equal the one single meal in size and volume.

After looking it up, looks like the fast would be until Holy Saturday (day after Good Friday), which would be April 11th.

Regards, Chuck

---

by Harry

Having done this for a while, it is interesting how things change. It's like my body is expecting the period to come. And G's discussion of the Holy Sturgeon is interesting. Because other things take on the same taste sensations. (I don't eat fish, period.) But veggies start taking on a different taste.

Wednesday I was eating out the Fridge. . .had a cheeseburger. And as much as I was looking forward to it, almost an illicit feast, it just didn't taste all that good. So psychology, hugh.
One of the biggest issues is to make sure I get enough protein. Fortunately soy products have flooded onto the market as being vegan (or pretending to be vegan) has become quite the fad. Makes it easier. Back in the old days had to make my own soy burgers from poweder.
My son eats a lot of protein shakes. I've never developed the taste. But says you have to be careful to get the good stuff. I have no idea what that means.
Here's to a salad a day keeping the cholesterol away.

---

by Judy

I'm not doing the vegan or vegetarian thing this Lent, but have begun the usual low fat/low sugar food intake - no sweets, junk food and so forth. I routinely do this during Lent and Advent for health. It has other advantages, such as the fact that weight stays around sixty kilos year in year out, which means no blood pressure or blood sugar problems - well, not to date anyway. I eat very little meat at any time and rely on almonds and cashews and whole grains plus skinny dairy for protein.

I agree how quickly one's taste alters to adapt to the food changes. Even after a couple of days, a carrot begins to taste great as a snack.

Cheers,

---

by Dean

I started fasting this Wednesday and am planning to try the forty day fast of being a temporary vegan. This is only the fourth time I've done it but have noticed that for some reason I enjoy it, maybe just becuase of the change in diet and taking in a different diet, I notice that I get sick of the same kinds of food and this may have something to do with it. I still take in quite a bit of processed foods but my vegetable and fruit diet increases which is a definite plus. I do seem to notice a difference in how I feel but am not sure exactly what this is and how to describe it. It may have do with digesting less course food and just a change in eating habits in general. I basically watch my protein and calcium levels and make sure I'm getting enough of those, because it's easy to neglect those without meat or milk.

Take care,
Dean

---

by Anna

I have never before done a fast...or a diet really for that matter....as I think my relationship with food in general is a healthy one....I eat plenty of fruit and veg....so last wednesday, first day of lent, I fasted....ate no solid food..etc...I still cooked for my family and sat down with them for dinner..but I realise that this would be difficult to sustain.....

why is there mention of not eating any living thing...so no cholesterol? Perhaps I should check my cholestol level for that matter.....when I was young....catholic background....my mother would cook fish on a friday....which was not special really as we ate fish frequently...but we were told as kids not to eat sweets during lent which was the difficult part.....so perhaps I join Judy here...and also try to choose (convenient) one day a week when I will eat little and no solids....

like Dean I also get tired of eating the same type of food...even though I eat fresh..almost everything.. and no junk food...and in actual fact on those occasions I find myself alone..I almost don't bother to eat..

having said all the above...I am preoccupied with food shopping and cooking even when my daughter is not at home...and my husband is happy really eating anything from the fridge....it's just a matter of upbringing....following in my mother's steps I guess.....

---

by Harry

The suggestion of eating nothing that was ever part of a living breathing being comes directly from G. He details this in All and Everything. He even talks about, I believe, the Russians, who eat the marvelous Sturgeon during Lent. The idea is that G says we really shouldn't be eating foods that are meats, eggs, milk, etc. But that the research done showed that it wasn't necessary to do this full time. But that there were certain times during the year that this could be done successfully. In fact he says that those who are totally vegan all the time are probably weak in their ordinary being.

Those periods of time were established in almost all ancient religions. They also correspond to Solstice and Equinox. There has also been studies done by modern scientists that show we receive different influences in the Spring due to the tilting of the Earth and the generation of solar winds.

If you study many of the early religions these periods of fast corresponded with phases of the moon.

There is also the possibility that the Catholic fast on Friday corresponds to a shock point in the development of the week. Especially if you consider Saturday as the sabbath.

Cholesterol is the only item that is found in living breathing beings that isn't found in other foods we eat. The only way we get cholesterol is by eating something from an animal. It doesn't come from any other food.

---

by Anna

thanks for that...I was reading yesterday about the 'honourable sturgeon' in BT. In actual fact it is the same here...we have several fancy breads that are for sale now as a speciality for lent....and when in Islamic countries I am many times perturbed when during Ramadam..I am sitting in meetings without a glass of water being offered... and then at night am expected to eat myself sick in lavish feasts..as soon as the sun goes down!

my question re the cholesterol is because some plants also contain cholesterol (or equivalent) albeit in smaller percentages.....and plants which are one brained beings ? are also 'alive' when 'nurtured' and growing in soil...

I am very interested to know the signifance of fasting in ancient religions especially if there is a cosmic/biochemical explanation to it...although from a discussion I had with my reading group this evening... is that this is something very personal, in the sense one has to know one's body well....although in general I think we all eat too much and eating less will do us good.....

---

by Harry

I know of no plant that contains cholesterol.

As to being personal, I'm not sure I'd agree. Yes your own efforts are personal. They are your own vows to yourself. But the timing of fasting, and the uniformity of it, spreads among most ancient religions. Of course the sources are all pretty much the same. Judaism, Christianity. Buddhism, of course, has already eliminated most of those foods. As you mention Ramadan. My best advice to studying that is to go to the oldest translation of the religious books. Not the King James version. Not the modern translations.

Burton's translation of the Arabian Nights is also interesting. Of course that is a ten or twelve volume encyclopedia.

---

by Ian

And Burton's translation of the Arabian Nights was considered extremely riske by the English establishment in Victorian times...
Not to mention his version of the Kama Sutra!

So, along with Mr G, we can set respectability aside with our engagement in this Work.

---

by Harry

The point of boredom has come. It comes early in a fast. I'm looking for other things to eat. But the variety goes away. Yes there is a lot of variety of fruits and grains and veggies. But there are withdrawl symptoms in giving up the ordinary diet.

And the cravings start like a pregnant woman. Dill pickles and olives. I've always wanted dill pickles and olives.

I used to eat a lot more snack foods during this time. But since I took carbs out of my diet there is little or no craving for the chips and like that I used to eat. They long ago stopped tasting good.

And hunger. Veggies go through the system very quickly. I usually don't feel hunger. But I feel hunger during this period.

---

by Cassandra

I decided to try and avoid red meat. I've only been doing this about a week. But chicken breasts are already becoming dull. I have had some red meat in spaghetti sauce. I've tried to add consciousness to this abstinance, but at this point it still seems like just a check list. Although I've noticed great resistance and on going yearnings for sweets.

---

by Harry

The cleansing has begun. Once the cholesterol leaves the system, then the body starts cleaning itself. Those fats and the like have a tendency to stay longer in the colon. Veggies, fruits, and grains move through much more quickly.

There is also a sense of being empty as being good. Not just in the intestines, but in the stomach. While hunger is there, the feeling of not being clogged is very good.

Yes, there are resistances that some others have mentioned. But this isn't just about the foods, but about building the ability "to do" a small thing for a short time.

---

by Cassandra

I just came back from a 2 day trip to north Florida. My traveling companion ate snacks and Burger King. I joined in with a Whopper and fries, pork skins, potato chips, cookies, and today prime rib. I reasoned that I had already started the slide so continued. Maybe I'll get back on the wagon this week.

Work Program week beginning 2 March 2009

by Ian

Begin everything with an "I am".

Accept and endure annoyances, anger, frustrations, by silently intoning 10 times with conscious breaths, "I am", while simultaneously sensing the 10 bones.

End everything with an "I am".

Work Program week beginning 9 March 2009

---

by Ian

Spend half an hour each day playing a Role, preferably with other people around.
Pick a Role that doesn't correspond to your Essence.

---

by Judy

This takes a deal of courage and a lot of energy, yet there is satisfaction and some added freedom in exploring mannerisms etc that are different from usual. Sense of humour is most necessary to retain too.

There was only one day when I managed to role-play for about a half hour; the other days were just five minutes here and there.
And there are degrees of commitment with this exercise too. I mean - as to what role is played.
My half hour trial involved some fairly bright and bouncy extrovert-like behaviour at a meeting. I recall in my career as a pharmacist that I used to be more of an extrovert because the job required it sometimes, so maybe this one was the easiest for me. The changed behaviour certainly didn't go unnoticed and I had to resist a couple of inner impulses to explain.
By "degrees of commitment", I'm alluding to the fact that I don't think I'd be comfortably able to act in various unpopular ways yet - such as anger or irritability and so on. I see that this isn't because I cannot act like that, but rather because I'd be concerned as to what others thought. This would be possible around others in the Work, but unwise outside perhaps. ?? Comments from those more used to this exercise please?

Anyway, it is illuminating just how much I do still care as to what others think of me, although I know it is a lot less than it used to be. I can rationalise this however I like but it wouldn't alter the fact of some self-consciousness and other types of pride showing here.

And I've just touched the surface of this one. I haven't investigated as to how this "acting as if" affects the psychology of the moment or any other deeper aspects, such as how to improve the evoking of emotions, to mention just one.

I'm haing a break today and tomorrow - acting opposite to essence is really tiring.
Which brings me to another point; role-playing may indeed be one of the ways for me to determine what is essence in me and what isn't.

Regards,

---

by Harry

This one tends to be a bit too easy. I play roles all the time. I once taught seven classes at one time so the only way I could make it through was to be a different person in each class. It probably helps to have been a theatre person.

But the best type of role playing is to take a role I don't need and to maintain that role with a particular setting. To be ultra-nice, for example, is the opposite of my personality. It's intriguing to see the different way people react.

There is much, I think, buried in Meetings about this, as well.

Work Program week beginning 16 March 2009

by Ian

Consciously relax the three brains to achieve their harmony, reaffirming the discovery that they are in harmony only when they are simultaneously in a relaxed condition.

Accept and value suffering as something to calmly endure without resentment. "Corns" are recognized as sources of divine suffering, the enduring of which may release latent supplies of energy.

Ponder: Is the marrow of the Seeker's bones perceived to be a fitting repository for the Seeker's gradual accumulation of Holy Reconciliations?

Work Program week beginning 23 March 2009

---

by Dean

The first exercise this week is to do with taking in more energy from external impressions and comes from ISOTM:

"It has been explained before that in ordinary conditions of life we do not remember ourselves; we do not remember, that is, we do not feel ourselves, are not aware of ourselves at the moment of a perception, of an emotion, of a thought or of an action. If a man understands this and tries to remember himself, every impression he receives while remembering himself will, so to speak, be doubled. In an ordinary psychic state I simply look at a street. But if I remember myself, I do not simply look at the street; I feel that I am looking, as though saying to myself: 'I am looking.' Instead of one impression of the street there are two impressions, one of the street and another of myself looking at it."

Work on doubling the impression and see if you notice any difference:

While breathing imagine that the air is feeding the cells of your body, be aware of the microcosmos within you and feel the flow of energy. Breathe into your head and be aware of the microcosmos of the headbrain. Do this ten times in the morning at various intervals. Breathe into the center of your abdomen and be aware of the microcosmos of your emotional life, endocrine cells and hormones etc. Do this ten times in the afternoon at various intervals. Breathe into the various groups of muscles in your body, in your limbs and in your torso and chest etc. Do this ten times in the evening at various intervals.

Pray to the seven cosmos in the morning, afternoon and the evening:

-Protocosmos
-Megalocosmos
-Macrocosmos
-Deuterocosmos
-Mesocosmos
-Tritocosmos
-Microcosmos

(These are the divisions in ISOTM but if you wish you can use any division of the cosmos that you prefer.)

Work Program week beginning 30 March 2009

---

by Ian

Seekers will embrace things tht make them suffer,such as - annoyabces at others foibles...
annoyances at their own foibles...
anger at others anger...
anger at their own anger...
discomfort at others disciomforts...
discomfort at their own discomforts...
Whenever these things are observed, Seekers will Sense their Bones and evoke a consideration that Joy is a fitting response to egoistic manifestations of superiority and one-up-man-ship.

---

by Lawrick

The work program suggesting joy as a substitute for negative behaviors has worked wonders for me these past few weeks. Since the new year, doing the work programs in general has been like pushing a mountain uphill. I've struggled and even ignored certain programs and wondered what was missing. Why had they suddenly become so difficult?

Until this program that enables me to reconcile my inner and external negativity with a simple feeling of joy. Just do! How strange that the joy arising from gratitude has been submerged in sleep for these months.
Gratitude for the light and manifestations of little children and the joy in knowing I am aware enough to sometimes experience that essence.
For my beautiful neice forming a new cosmic unit for me to hold. 😉😁😁😁
For the love of friends and relatives.
For the mystery that draws me to search and remain unsatisfied with answers.
For others sharing this need and their attempts to dig for amswers.
For a site and administrator that, notwithstanding the paucity of replies to work programs, continues to emanate and call me back to myself.

For the first time in months I am experiencing again the joy and mystery of life and knowing I am doing so!

So thank you again Ian for all you do so unselfishly. I take much joy in this as well.

Regards,
Fred

---

by Cassandra

I had a good chance to practice this at my son's Little League baseball game. I'm so identified with my children performing well--school work, extracurricular stuff--and I know this. He had 2 strike outs last Saturday, and I obsessed about this nearly all week. Suffered really. All rational counters about my attitude as self-absorbed, vain, petty only got bounced back with a 'but I love my children so much.' Thing is, I really want him to be better than the other 7&8 year-olds. Embarrassed to admit but true. So, I've prayed about this, including the Holy Reconciling prayer.

I appreciate the prompt to practice a hard look at these emotions. What blessing sits on the other side of these feelings. It takes courage to sit with or embrace the discomfort. Yes, joy is an appropriate response to the Ego.

Thanks, Ian

---

by Karen

This particular work program came at the opportune time. Thank you for posting Ian!

For the most part of 2009, something in me resisted the efforts of work. Self sabotage and sacrifice seemed to be a common theme when attempting to work. Each day the excuses built momentum to a point where life was working its way back to the active forefront, taking over what being I had. The odd time, I caught myself observing old ways and habits creeping back into my house. There was a lot of corn pushing going on. The smallest things began to irritate me. I became angry with others stupidity and angry that this 'thing' was slowly taking me over and infecting all of those around me. I had trouble separating these things to feel Joy. Cunning and crafty are these "I's"! What an incredible destructive force...scary to think that this was commonplace and went unnoticed prior to entering the work.

As of late I have been trying to observe and address emotions, feelings and thoughts as they arise, instead of the usual "run away and it may just go away" approach.

These experiences have been most liberating at times and horrifically uncomfortable at others.

I never really realized until this month that daily work efforts must be made and to always keep my aim in mind. It was also the first time I recognized the terrible war taking place in the world…this internal struggle. And that the only way out is by my own efforts. No one can work for me.

The joy is returning thanks to the momentum the 10 bone exercise brings. It also helps I'm past the 1st trimister of pregnancy and energy levels are increasing again.

---

by Anna

I don't know how it stands to revert back to a work programme of 30th March..but I read the above and I realise that I am not alone and it somehow helps. I organised a piano recital for Elan Sicroff.. of Gurdjieff's and de Hartmann's music in January and I was euphoric when he was here and his friend Sam Nassenblatt..they were both students of Bennett. I thought this would boost my inner work and the reading group, but somehow it had the opposite effect...I felt so inadequate after they left that my inner work almost disappeared. Then I was in Turkey for 2 weeks for (office) work, and I did have the privilege of experiencing twice a semazen ceremony of the Whirling Dervishes which made me also feel I am in the presence of something beyond my reach. Now these last 2 weeks I am trying very hard to make my March 21st..18 year.. old daughter to study for her entrance university exams and ended up in a power struggle...she wants to enjoy herself and me stressing the need for studying and hard work. I project my needs on to her and am I realise that I am more worried about MY image if she fails than what she really wants. I compare myself to her...I grew up in a large family where I had to help in the housework and baby sitting and school exams were..well..not so important....I was not a fantastic student myself but I read voraciously and was interested in everything..and passed exams...and whilst I was not so sure of myself...I lacked confidence.... she has all the confidence in the world and moves around with a sureness I realise I did not have at her age. I am angry all the time with her for not taking her studies seriously, in reality she is more clever than me..but I realise that with my insistence I am making everybody around me unhappy. And after all I turned out 'all right'..my close friend, her godmother keeps reminding me....so Yes, I need to go back to recognising the fact that my negative emotions have effected myself and my family and they do not help anyone, least of all me. In the last meeting of the reading group I took up Maurice Nicoll 'Commentary on Effort'..part 1, 2 and 3. There is a task described where one 'agrees to everything' for one hour each day as an excercise of non identifying and realised that I never managed this. My personality is too strong....however much I want to be moving on the vertical line of 'Being' I am travelling on the horizontal time line of my personality. And I am always thinking that the Denying force of people around me is stronger than mine. Of course now I know how wrong I am! I have started again with the 10 point excercise in the morning and it does 'ground' me, so I will continue with this excercise.

---

by Ian

> Anna wrote:
> I felt so inadequate after they left that my inner work almost disappeared. ...
> There is a task described where one 'agrees to everything' for one hour each day as an excercise of non identifying and realised that I never managed this.

Make the inadequacy your work - agree with it for one hour each day.

> My personality is too strong....however much I want to be moving on the vertical line of 'Being' I am travelling on the horizontal time line of my personality.

Being may be both the horizontal and the vertical - it may be the still point in the center where they cross.

---

by Cassandra

So, Anna these things with the children, identifying with them goes on it seems. I can relate to what you say about your daughter. Thank you for the reminder of the 10 bone exercise which I've been doing lately and also sometimes the Holy Affirming Prayer.

Karen, congratulations!!! Your uncle sort of spilled the beans in an earlier post. Yes, the work effort is always and everywhere. But, don't we get some help along the way. Christians call it grace, and I've heard Work people talk about assistance from higher energies--as result of individual effort. I don't know what the relationship is between guidance from higher energies and just plain hard work in the coating of higher bodies.

Work Program week beginning 6 April 2009

by Lift

Remorse and Music

Ponder: Which is better? To listen, now and then, to some Gurdjieff music that evokes a sense of non-specific moral remorse of conscience, or to feel real remorse in the moment, right after the offending actions that we should really be feeling remorse for?

What is the purpose of listening to music that mechanically manipulates and evokes the emotion of remorse of conscience after the fact? Should we not be self-aware enough to experience the remorse in the momemt, when our actions cause it?

It is akin to going to confession and relating to a priest all the bad things we have done, and to have him tell us that by saying these prayers, or doing X number of Hail Mary's, or listening to this or that Gurdjieff music, and thus feeling remorse about what we did in the moment, and several times removed from the event, that we can magically wipe the slate clean and go about our usual business, behaving just as badly as we did before, because next week we can go and feel bad again, in a brief guilt-session that placates all the remorse. This is so wrong. Work and effort towards self remembering should be directed to NOT making any action that causes us remorse in the first place. If we are unable to achieve that perfection in our lives (and none but a saint could claim that they can) then we must confine ourselves to attempting to observe our actions and feeling remorse in the moment, and there and then making amends for our actions, rather than being a coward and using our weekly listening to some Gurdjieff music or a visit to the confessional to prompt a feeling of remorse later, at a distance.

It is important that remorse be experienced in the moment of the event rather than later. Using music to evoke remorse after the fact is wrong because it is sanctioning people to be lazy and not make efforts to improve their behaviour continuously in the moment, because it gives a get out clause to feel remorse later in a compartmentalized and separate event at their weekly meeting or Sunday confessional, rather than related directly, in the moment, to a specific event.

Exercises for the week:

Exercise 1: Observe your actions closely, and anytime you behave in such a way as to offend others according your own interior moral code, generate a whole sensing of your body and then immediately make reparations to the offended party, rather than feeling remorse later or confessing to "God" as a substitute to doing what is right at the time.

Exercise 2: With full bodily sensing, listen to some Gurdjieff music and ignore the emotions that it evokes in you - rather, evoke a feeling of Love and Compassion for others and yourself.

by Lift

Oh dear! It looks as though spouse has recorded a rant I made earlier today and posted it without editing as a programme!
This I hope accounts for the repetition and vehemence inherent in the words I used.

Oh well

---

by Harry

Remorse is something that, I have come to believe, which results from developing a conscience. You begin to feel when you've done something that should generate remorse. Recently I had this experience. And on reflecting on the remorse I decided to intentionally experience it. To embrace the remorse. This as I meditated before falling to sleep. That night I had disturbing dream after disturbing dream. Different than those I used to experience. (Most dreams I have now are of a different tone than earlier in my life.) These were almost torturous dreams. And as I dreamt, I realized that this dreaming was the result of my embracing my remorse.

---

by Judy

The point is well-made that delayed reactions are not ideal. I have wondered about this from time to time. The delayed reactions are certainly an improvement on no remorse at all, though. So yes, a process of development would seem to be involved. I was thinking about this yesterday - pondering really. Then another clue came via the Daily Pondering software for today April 7th.

"Ponder: on past sleep during moments of Self-Remembering."

Regards,

---

by Lawrick

Regards Lift,

Men are assuredly diobolical. However, if such deviousness brings your experience to the site with more frequency, then I hope your spouse continues to post your rants. On the other hand, if you want greater accuracy you might wish to eliminate the middle man and post yourself. Hey, good idea.

Your post about remorse would have served me well last week when I humiliated a stranger and didn't reconcile the situation when the opportunity presented itself.

I dislike (loath-hate) telemarketers, advertising, etc. Advertising wakes us from sleep, Jumps out from our computers (my computer home page has 37 separate ads and business logos) stones you when your driving in your car, when you shop, phone, eat.

In Canada we have a National Do Not Call Registry to which I belong. There are exceptions for media surveys which allow Telemarkerters to couch themselves as businesses doing test surveys....well you get the picture. Advertising is particular insidious because it calls into question every judgement we have ever made and always contrasts it with a lie!

Last week I was solicited by the Nillson Ratings company who attempt to find out views on media and what we use. Needless to say I, in the coldest logical voice let the solicitor know that I was not some pawn to be used for their commercial purposes. It wasn't pleasant. Just before I hung up I detected a sound of hurt in the young solicitor's voice and I woke up. But not enough to reconcile my vanity and appologize for being such a prick. So for the rest of the night I suffered the gutless stupidity of merely harming an innocent only doing her job but suffered an greater remorse of not doing something about it as G. says, "On the spot." Because of this exercise I will stay much more alert in the future knowing I can ameliorate some folly by doing something about it when I can.
So thanks. We would like to hear more from you. For many of us the act of posting can be difficult.

Regards,
Fred

---

by Lift

> you might wish to eliminate the middle man and post yourself.

Hi Fred. I doubt that would serve this forum well. I am no Gurdjieffian and I follow a different path, that is why I post rarely.

What I and Ian wish for is for all members to post comments on the work programs regularly, which is what they commit to do when they sign up to this forum . So many fail to live up to their promise, and it is disheartening.

Here we are in Holy Week, and Christians around the world are indulging in excessive remorse, and self-flagellating for the same reason that others might listen to de Hartmann music. Let your aim be true, and be present to your actions. Feel remorse and make good your fault at the time, then there will be no need for wiping your slate clean with blood - yours or anybody elses.

---

by Ian

We don't always feel remorse in the moment.
Sometimes we do things that seem perfectly justified at the time, and we only realize later they were grounds for remorse.
It is a tall order to expect that we can always second guess our every action as a potential cause for future remorse.
But it is something that could help us attempt to remain more vigilant and on the lookoput for in our self-observation efforts.

Remorse is suffering and we avoid it like the plague. That's why we humans have developed so many means of self-calming.
They say that time heals all wounds, and I suppose that self-calming is a way to put off suffering remorse until it's sting is reduced.

---

by Cassandra

Thanks everyone for the thoughtful exchanges. Lift is right about it being each member's responsibility to post regularly. I need this reminder. Often, I feel isolated from a 'real' exhange of Work-like ideas, but do little to contribute to the exchange. So, in a way, maybe I feel some remorse in not rising up to task. But I don't want to go to self-pity either, just remember to participate.

Fred, I decided to take a solid stand with phone solicitors. I'm more often asked to donate to a charity. These solicitations make my bleeding heart bleed even more--March of Dimes, Children's Cancer Hospitals--but it does no one, either me (who's resenting the intrusion) or the other hopeful soliciter to sit even one minute listening to the spiel. I interrupt them with a solid 'No, I'm not contributing this year' and hang up. I try to do this consciously but not nastily. I know I feel better after hanging up--can't say about them. Also, my husband gives me less of a 'you sucker' look.

---

by Lawrick

Thanks for the advice Cassandra.  When I'm feeling particularly nasty I ask the telemarketer to hold for a minute while I attend to something.And of course I just leave them hanging on the line. Screw 'em. But I really did hurt that young lady who was simply doing her job when I could have either just said no or better yet apologized for it's subconscious behavior. I must necessarily separate the problem from the person and to do that of course, I must be awake.

Strong religious opinions Lift.  There are times during my darkest nights when that other Presence is my only anchor.Strange since I would never describe myself as religious in any sense. I agree that we should consider posting a necessary component of our exercises. Posting gathers the brains. (That's a Gurdjieffian term in case you are confused). And who decided one must be a Gurdjieffian, or Ouspenskian, or MacFarllian to post. I don't care whether you're involved in the Work. Common sense opinions are equally valuable.

Ian, thanks for posting Jose's paper. I agree that Mr. Gurdjieff glossed over much of the mysteries and allures of the Far East. It might be he was attempting to discredit the impossible "Arcana" that accompanies the "inner circle". Perhaps discourage those who would waste a lifetime searching fruitlessly. With G., who knows!

Regards,
Lawrick

---

by Harry

Why waste all the energy. I have a "supposed debt" that has been roaming around on a credit card I never had. A different "agency" calls me every month. They sell it off. Supposedly I have more debt on this mythical credit card than I ever had credit. But I just push the button on the phone. On. Off. If I'm sitting here at the computer there's a speaker phone right next to me. One second and it's over. No thought. I see the 866 number, or the city and bang bang.

As to remorse, most of mine comes in the classroom. I've somehow adopted that Gurdjieff rule of stepping on corns. Probably because I teach speech and one of the things I have to do is break them from the mask. But sometimes I push a corn with just a touch too much sarcasm.

This last event I described was interesting. A student wanted to have class outside. I suggested a goose would crap on me if I held class outside. And then said something a touch to personal to him. Strangest thing. When I went out to my car it had been crapped on about 20 times. The geese migrating through here must have heard me. Never happened before or since.

---

by Lawrick

Yes birds shit all over my car as well Harry.  Usually I don't know why. I wonder if those little buggers suffer remorse for their "fowl" deeds.

Lawrick

---

by Lawrick

> Lift wrote:
> you might wish to eliminate the middle man and post yourself.
> Hi Fred. I doubt that would serve this forum well. I am no Gurdjieffian and I follow a different path, that is why I post rarely.

But you see Lift, just how your input has inspired and energized the site. Other facets of perception can be equally important to growth.

If you belong, then surely it's incumbent upon you to post as well, is it not? Most of us are Gurdjieffian and something else or many other things. Others are something else sprinkled with a bit of G's salt. I hope you keep putting in your two cents or Bob, or Quid, or pence, or whatever the strange quaint English use for currency.

And Judy,Ian, thanks for the Wittman posts.

And Harry, after challenging your student, are your sure it was goose crap on your vehicle.? Of course there might be another message encripted within this story. And of course there might not.

Lawrick

Lawrick

---

by Lift

> But you see Lift, just how your input has inspired and energized the site. Other facets of perception can be equally important to growth.
> If you belong, then surely it's incumbent upon you to post as well, is it not? Most of us are Gurdjieffian and something else or many other things. Others are something else sprinkled with a bit of G's salt.

Touché, Fred  I am certainly something else, and my salt sprinkle is very light.

Work Program week beginning 13 April 2009

---

by Ian

Seekers may wish to observe their external behaviour from a point of view "above" and then add a simultaneous observing of their physical sensations, emotions and thoughts from within.

During moments of quiet throughout the day, Seekers may Ponder:

- Is there a necessary constant struggle between the processes of the functioning of our planetary body itself and the parallel functionings arising progressively from the coating and perfecting of the Kesdjan body?

- If so, what is the role of the ego, corns, chief features, traits, I's, essence, personality, suffering, in the process?

- Is there a proper role for ego?

---

by AlbertoB

During these days, some people near me, or in my acquaintance, suddenly died.
Among them, a famous philosophy professor in Padua university, Franco Volpi, perhaps the best Heidegger scholar in Italy. A man of spectacular cleverness and goodheartedness.
These deaths compel me to ponder on the old problem with the human destiny: in Nicoll terms, the dialetics between the Law of Chance and the Law of Destiny. More you rise in awareness, more you attract your destiny, as to say, the facts really necessary for your development.
Is this true? I don't know, but the idea is comforting.
It's, like other Work Ideas, an idea that stimulate many others. Ideas about the Kesdjan body that grows, little by little, during the best moments of our life.

---

by Cassandra

As a child, I sometimes heard the saying: "Lord don't move my mountain, but give me the strength to climb." Now, I understand the need for these mountains or corns as Ian refers to them. I struggle with an emotion, do battle with it, often forgetting that the third force (maybe the Holy Spirit) brings a reconciling energy. My task is to wait for this.

---

by Dean

> - Is there a necessary constant struggle between the processes of the functioning > of our planetary body itself and the parallel functionings arising progressively from the coating and perfecting of the Kesdjan body?

Can we create a Kesdjan body without 'disputekrialnian-friction?'

> - Is there a proper role for ego?

The ego is probably needed for survival to some degree, but it's difficult for me to visualize what the proper role of ego would be. G said to be a conscious egoist but it's much easier said than done at the moment.

Work Program week beginning 20 April 2009

by Ian

When in the thrall of doubt and uncertainty, there is an opportunity to see things in a new light. At such times, the Seeker might sit in a meditative pose and cultivate an inner state of all-brains-balanced-being-perception, including a sightless gaze.

Work Program week beginning 27 April 2009

---

by Ian

Get really angry and feel no regrets.

---

by Harry

OK. ? !

Can I assume that we're talking Christ throwing out the money changers?

Do I want to waste that much energy? After struggling so hard with such mechanical emotions?

Conscious anger? I used to do this with my son. Without regret. But he's 28 now. And I don't have that kind of interchange. As to students, can't really get angry with them. Mindless pea counters. . .do they really deserve my anger? Or my pity?

---

by Karen

I thought I would have trouble with the weekly exercise until an event presented itself that was hard to turn a blind eye to based on principle.

Stewing over possible scenarios and outcomes, silently, and with a close friend who provides constructive feedback, I went through all sorts of feelings and emotions.

Disappointment and disgust in others, anger for the injustice, sadness, bruised pride, happiness for seeing this type of situation in a new way from years prior, joy for not falling prey to 'victim' status, elated to see personal growth and responsibility and peace to find a balance, to reconcile the opposites and extend the light...

Work Program week beginning 4 May 2009

---

by Chuck

Reminders, small and large.

While ultimately this type of trick becomes familiar and sometimes ignored, in the meantime it's useful to have little reminders during the day.

* Wear a rubber band around your wrist. This will server as a reminder and also help with internal considering as you think that people may notice it.
* Observe your small habits and change them. For example, observe which sock or shoe you put on first. Change and start with the other shoe.
* Every time you go into the bathroom at home, splash water on your face. Every time. This is a time-honored waking method in some traditions (although it was sometimes a bucket of water over the head). When you open your eyes after toweling off your face, SEE.
* Leave yourself reminders for later. For example, when you take off bedroom slippers to get dressed in the morning, put one in an unusual place so that evening so you'll have a shock.
* Carry a pebble, rubber band, or other small object in your pocket.
* Switch your wallet or keys to another pocket or purse location.
* Wear your watch on the other wrist, or stop wearing it for a time.
* Use the timer in the Daily Ponder computer program (available on this site).

When reminded by one of these methods, take advantage of it. Otherwise, why are you doing it? Take a moment to be in the present, or to notice which I's were working, to remember your aim, or to reconnect with the body. Be thankful and inspired in the deep realization that we must piece together such moments to build ourselves.

All are encouraged to share reminder ideas.

---

by Lawrick

I found this week's Work Program very effective as a series of sequential reminding factors providing more awareness than I've felt in a while. Full of insights that together provided numerous personal observations highlighting my mechanicalness.

I've been told that I am always stongly oriented to one direction or another but this program certainly highlighted it.
I found out that I always put my right sock on first, the shorts, the slippers, the shoes as well. I always put on my watch before picking up my keys ????????? I'm always conscious of my right side before my left. I always drive on the right side of the road which is an excellent survival technique unless we are driving in England and other backward nations.

I always put my left arm in the shirt sleeve first, I use the left arm first for my jacket as well. I never open a door with my right hand, I part my hair on the left, (what's left of it). I always begin shaving the left side of my face. My politics almost always lean left which in my Texas leaning province is absurd almost to the point of being dangerous.

I wore this large black and yellow band in lieu of my watch this week and was continually amazed when I looked for the time only to find it was bedtime, Ah fair sleep. The waitress in my favorite bistro asked why I was wearing this garish rubber thing around my wrist. I looked at her and deadpanned that I personally enjoyed the feel of rubber against my skin and didn't everyone? And she took me for my word judging by the look in her eye. And I wonder how long my ego will go before needing to correct that embarassing impression.

The water closet face splashing technique worked wonderfully during the day. It was discontinued the first nite after numerous trips to the loo where splashing cold water on my face kept me awake for most of the night. Duh! Switching keys to new pockets also works like a charm, and actually provoked some anger.

So, an excellent program for waking and staying awake. Thanks Chuck.

Lawrick

Work Program week beginning 11 May 2009

---

by Harry

Two years ago, at my Uncle's funeral, one of his daughters-in-law said, at the last minute, "Anyone got a penny?" My cousin asked, "Why?" "We'll put it in the coffin with him, and then we'll remember him any time we see a penny on the ground." So I gave her a penny.

You'd be amazed how many pennies you see on the ground in two years.

So I modified this a bit. Every time I see a penny on the ground I remember my death. I still can't help but remember my uncle.

So take a penny out of your pocket. Make an oath to yourself as you throw it out the window, throw it out of the car, throw it somewhere else. Make an oath to yourself that every time you find a penny you will remember your own death.

---

by JohnS

A relevant episode of the Simpsons last night: Homer driving in his car, and the radio says "Live each day as if it were your last." Next minute Homer is sitting in the gutter, crying "I don't want to die - its not fair". Its funny, but someone's got the message in there.

---

by Cassandra

I think about my death often but am very afraid of the thought of not existing anymore. I think, how will it happen? Will I die before old age. I become indignant even thinking of life going on without me. But I don't like to dwell on death because it's my way of avoiding doing the best I can at the moment. Just more fantastic thinking. I know the purpose of the exercise is to get one to consider the relatively short amount of time on earth and to make good use of it in putting forth effort. In thinking about death, it has occurred to me that most of my adult life has been wonderful. For this I am very grateful, no matter if I have an early or late death.

---

by Lawrick

Harry,

Found my first penny last Sunday before a larger more valuable coin called a Loonie. A Loonie is a Canadian $1.00 coin which is worth about the same as a penny.

I have trouble visualizing or sensing my own death. When attempting to reconcile these emotions 3 experiences come to mind. Yes, the great benefit of aging. Many years ago I went white water rafting with friends. When the raft overturned I was caught in a whirlpool and dragged under to a churning sidewall which held me under. After panicking and struggling for some time, something resolved I was going to die, at which point I became light, relaxed and peaceful and began to pass out. The next thing I remember was alive floating in a quiet pool on the surface with no idea how I got there.

Another experience dealt with an allergic reaction my ex wife experienced which turned her face grey, her lips blue, and completely stopped her breathing. It is not possible to explain how hard I was praying while trying to revive her and my horror of having her tell me gently to let go and that the light was so beautiful . Not a chance lady!

Two years ago a friend came over to relate the last few moments his wife experienced while dying of cancer. Just before she died she asked her husband the identity of the tall black robed man who was standing, quietly waiting at the end of her hospital bed.. When my friend explained to his wife there was nobody in the room but the two of them, she pointed to this impossible stranger and said “but look, there he is”. My friend never saw this eidolon and still doesn’t understand.

So even though I’ve done this exercise before, it has been very difficult to fully engage my emotional centre. It’s my impression that “something” within still feels this sojourn will never end and that I am in some way Invulnerable. Bullet proof. But doing this last exercise made me realize at the same time, the terror of my being dissolving, of decomposing into the Cosmic soup. What if we were to possess some awareness of this process at the time and in that state and still be unable to slow or stop it. And I can’t imagine a more horrifying conclusion. Perhaps G. meant this when he asked us to keep our deaths always before us.

Good, if unsettling exercise Harry, Thanks.

Regards,
Fred

Work Program week beginning 18 May 2009

---

by Ian

When Seekers are beset by the automatic machinations of Kundabuffer:

- perform an instinctive dance of reconcilliation.
- repeat a prayer of reconcilliation.
- evoke an emotion of remorse.

---

by Cassandra

I was at a graduation party last night, and someone from my work was talking about someone who works there, how weird this person's behaviors are (He's Canadian by the way, Fred). I was very conscious of my participation in the conversastion. I realized how much I wanted to add to the criticism-and I did. This morning and even while the gossip was going, I felt the need to repent for my sins--missing the mark. I totally missed the mark on this one, but felt good doing it. I didn't evoke a feeling of remorse, but what helped to move me away from my ego position was just thinking: Was this person sitting around talking about me at the moment I gossiped about him? Probably not, so who's better off, him or me?

---

by Judy

I had a bit of fun with this earlier today, in spite of the working on negativity being very serious stuff. I was worrying about doing a financial report for some work I'm doing beccause it is not an area I'd choose to do. In other words, I don't look forward to doing it at all. "It" really dislikes this task. So of course the result of this little battle was procrastination.
I decided to take a lighter attitude.

I chose a kind of North American Indian rain dance as the little Reconciliation Dance.
Somehow I got really into it and there were whoops and other vocalisations. (Ellie the cat just stared quite regally all through this). Such fun.
I followed this with the Holy Equation Prayer.
Before the evocation of remorse, there was a glimpse of something brief but quite genuine - about how really silly and unnecessary it is to allow It s Holy Denyings to paralyse me like that.
What a waste of precious energy.
The report is done now - it reconciled as well...

Regards,

Work Program week beginning 25 May 2009

---

by Fred

Breathe for a minute or two.
Ponder -
What and why is friendship?
Is friendship within a group more or less?
Ponder on a triad of friendship. There are many. Can it be reduced?
What is typicality in these manifestations?
What role does friendship play in our lives?
Are we defined by our friendships or lack thereof?

Breathe for a minute or two.
Contemplate the significance of the ES site in your life.
Is your participation and input really necessary?

Your Work this week is to post in any forum regardless.

---

by Harry

I don't see this as a place for friendship. But I probably should put a caveat on that. Friendship is one of those Rimbaud or Dickenson type of things. Yes I have some friends. But when I go to the airport on Tuesday I will take a cab. I have a FaceBook page, but have exchanged maybe five messages with six people in six months. Two I've known for four decades. But the last time I saw either one of them was 10 years ago. But she does live 4000 miles away.

I email or talk with my son every week. I have another friend I talk with a couple of times a week.

So here, I find it beneficial to have contact with different personalities and different essences. This is the first site I go to each day. It is a reminder not so much for my own work, but that my view isn't the only view. And that others can be beneficial to all of us.

I feel I must participate in some things. Like this discussion forum. But it doesn't seem we have much "discussion". Even the BT section seems more a posting of individual views, rather than a discussion. I participate very little there, which I have explained before. I've walked through those books many times. Most recently walked through the third series again. And each venture brings new insights. I remember having a discussion group on All and Everything some 30 years ago. I thought it was great. But quickly became a psuedo teacher. I really don't know if any of those people still have anything to do with Work. It was a century ago in time and space.

---

by Judy

What is friendship?

It covers most forms of cooperative and mutually supportive behaviour between two or more people, taken in its broadest sense. There are many historical examples; Gilgamesh and Enkidu, Orestes and Pylades, David and Johathan, Rumi and Shams. Friendship, in fact, seems to embody the positive traits of relationship in general. It is very complex, requiring the highest values of each person, such as honesty, respect, courtesy, harmony through invariable disagreements, and wanting the best for each other's growth, even where this course may be quite uncomfortable or difficult. It also depends on the value each person gives to the relationship. In particular, true friendship will involve a time commitment. This too may not be the "easier, softer way". In brief, one must "be a friend" before one can "have a friend".

Friendship will mean different things to different people, quite apart from the fact that there are different types of friendships. I have come to value true friendship a lot more than I used to, as the years pass. There are usually similarities, or a common interest, in most. Here on Endless Search I have "Work friends". I see this as a most necessary place for friendship, in that I'm unable to sustain good quality Work alone at this stage. Thus, Endless Search site is a valued beneficial and significant Work Group for me.

To take Gurdjieff's three lines of Work, friendships here largely account for the second line input of mine currently. It goes without saying that both the first and third lines are involved here too.
This is a huge topic, Fred. I have felt tongue-tied, but a little input is better than none.

Oh, as to whether people are defined by their friends or lack thereof;
Yes and no.
As mentioned, one has to first be a friend to others; and then there are some typicalities who do not have friendship as a high priority perhaps.
Having said that, though, it is a reassuring first-meeting component to discover that a person has fine (or interesting) friends who value them.

Friends make the world warmer.
Best wishes to all.

---

by Judy

> Texts : Essays: First Series : FRIENDSHIP
> A selection of Ralph Waldo Emerson's writings for searching and browsing > Friendship
>
> from Essays: First Series (1841)

Ralph Waldo Emerson

A ruddy drop of manly blood
The surging sea outweighs,
The world uncertain comes and goes,
The lover rooted stays.
I fancied he was fled,
And, after many a year,
Glowed unexhausted kindliness
Like daily sunrise there.
My careful heart was free again, —
O friend, my bosom said,
Through thee alone the sky is arched,
Through thee the rose is red,
All things through thee take nobler form,
And look beyond the earth,
And is the mill-round of our fate
A sun-path in thy worth.
Me too thy nobleness has taught
To master my despair;
The fountains of my hidden life
Are through thy friendship fair.

ESSAY VI Friendship

We have a great deal more kindness than is ever spoken. Maugre all the selfishness that chills like east winds the world, the whole human family is bathed with an element of love like a fine ether. How many persons we meet in houses, whom we scarcely speak to, whom yet we honor, and who honor us! How many we see in the street, or sit with in church, whom, though silently, we warmly rejoice to be with! Read the language of these wandering eye-beams. The heart knoweth.

The effect of the indulgence of this human affection is a certain cordial exhilaration. In poetry, and in common speech, the emotions of benevolence and complacency which are felt towards others are likened to the material effects of fire; so swift, or much more swift, more active, more cheering, are these fine inward irradiations. From the highest degree of passionate love, to the lowest degree of good-will, they make the sweetness of life.

(Full text of this essay is at:
http://www.emersoncentral.com/friendship.htm

"A certain cordial exhilaration" is cited as an effect.
That too.
But not always. Sometimes the effect of honesty from a friend can be a rare true glimpse of oneself, perhaps not in the expected flattering light. This can be shocking, painful even, as it is recognised. And what a precious gift is this!

---

by Judy

During the resourcing on "Friendship", Thoreau too waxes eloquent, as does Paramahansa Yogananda.
But how definite and strong is heroic Walt!

> III. Notes Left Over
> 12. Friendship, (the Real Article)
>
> THOUGH Nature maintains, and must prevail, there will always be plenty of people, and good people, who cannot, or think they cannot, see anything in that last, wisest, most envelop'd of proverbs, "Friendship rules the World." Modern society, in its largest vein, is essentially intellectual, infidelistic—secretly admires, and depends most on, pure compulsion or science, its rule and sovereignty—is, in short, in "cultivated" quarters, deeply Napoleonic.
> 1
>
> "Friendship," said Bonaparte, in one of his lightning-flashes of candid garrulity, "Friendship is but a name. I love no one—not even my brothers; Joseph perhaps a little. Still, if I do love him, it is from habit, because he is the eldest of us. Duroc? Ay, him, if any one, I love in a sort—but why? He suits me; he is cool, undemonstrative, unfeeling—has no weak affections—never embraces any one—never weeps."
> 2
>
> I am not sure but the same analogy is to be applied, in cases, often seen, where, with an extra development and acuteness of the intellectual faculties, there is a mark'd absence of the spiritual, affectional, and sometimes, though more rarely, the highest æsthetic and moral elements of cognition.
> 3

Thanks, Fred, for this week's emphasis on the affectional quality. It is always balancing for this suspected "Man No 3".

Best wishes,

---

by Cassandra

I did ponder friendship. It's something that's often on my mind but not so explicitly. To be friends in the traditional way is to share lots of stuff, the weak and strong aspects of oneself. I resist sharing much about myself. I used to do it more when I was younger but then thought--people sort of categorize you as this or that and aren't that interested to start with. I don't know if I can sustain friendship for long because eventually one has to move beyong pleasantries. I find it hard to open up. But I'm okay with it.

This site is the only thing I have currently that connects me with Gurdjieff ideas, other than readings. The Atlanta group is too far away to attend regularly, plus they pause for summer break anyway. I've started to sit again in the mornings. Now that my children are out for summer, I don't feel so rushed in the mornings. Fairly regular checking of this site brings me back to my aim of self observation.

Thanks, Fred.

---

by Lawrick

Harry,

I came accross something by Emerson that reminds me of your post on friends.

> But the soul that ascendeth to worship the great God is plain and true; has no rose color; no fine friends; does not want admiration; dwells in the hour that is; in the earnest experience of the common day-by reason of the present moment.....

For what it's worth.
Fred

---

by Harry

Fred,

I totally agree with your post. Emerson, as well as others, like cummings had the same understanding. Though cummings remained life long friends with Morehouse, DosPossos, and others.

I think it is possible. I think our age moves us away from people.

Work Program week beginning 1 June 2009

---

by Ian

This weeks theme: Tolerance, Impartiality

Daily Pondering: That ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust.

Daily Exercise 1: Observe your intolerant reactions to the opinions and behaviour of others. Be aware of the sensations, feelings and thoughts associated with your intolerance. Then, while sensing your chest, Remorsefully Remember the Daily Pondering.

Daily Exercise 2: While walking, sense your feet and watch your breath. Remember the Daily Pondering.

Daily exercise 3: Before each meal, sense your hands, evoke a feeling of gratitude and say the following prayer: Oh Endlessness, Help me on the way - To enjoy the unenjoyable, To like the unlikeable, To love the unlovable.

Evening Recapitulation: Recall the days intolerances while in a relaxed, three centered state. Recall the sensations, feelings and thoughts associated with them. Ponder: "Does intolerance serve any function within the scheme of reciprocal maintenance?"

---

by Dean

It was difficult to remember the daily pondering at first, but when I could remember it it became useful in reconciling various ideas that didn't correspond with thinking in terms of a stick with two ends. It made me come to the realization that conflict is necessary and if their isn't conflict then I'm probably somewhat unconscious.

The second exercise seemed to help me become more aware of my movements, and I felt a bit more patient and my walking was more deliberate. Most of the time I did this without the daily pondering though, but later in the week I remembered to combine them at times.

The third exercise was effective and made me feel remorse to a degree, gratitude was there at times but it was difficult to evoke at will. The prayer was also a nice addition and helped to bring about the feeling of gratitude and remorse more.

Thanks Ian

---

by Lawrick

My experience with the weekly exercise was quite similar to that of Dean. The walking and pondering as to the equinamity of God's Laws was strangely neutral. Some periods of real Remorse were produced.

I found this pondering while walking to be very difficult and like Dean, had little success until the end of the week. Much more success phsyically as I was able to sense the 'Souls' of my feet for quite long periods after I had sat down. There was a sense that "something" had levened itself between my feet and the ground. A Doctor Scholl's foot cushion of sorts. But the sensation that remained on my foot was an excellent reminding factor.

As to the pondering of God's equinamity, I was reminded of the action of the great Laws where we are granted all possibilities to live our lives through personality, or to define our individuality on a road less travelled. But there was no answer as to why one takes the latter path and I was reminded how little choice was available once the less traveled path was recognized.

As to the reminding factors of intolerence, I was able to reconcile several of my judgements. The depth of reconciliation was definitely affected by the amount of available energy, which of couse shouldn't matter but never the less at this stage it does.

regards,
Lawrick

---

by Cassandra

I took a while for this exercise because it is a good one for me. Thought about the first part of the pondering: "that ye may be your father's children who is in heaven" or so that you may perceive rightly, come into alignment with what is real. The pondering reminded me that there are no points to be gained in the work. No matter how much sitting, reading, detached observation I do, there is no guarantee that I will become more aware or conscious of myself. There is a letting go, a come what may, that figures into work. Who's to say who is Holy.

---

by Judy

Cassandra wrote:

> There is a letting go, a come what may, that figures into work. Who's to say who is Holy.

Yes, Ican identify with this perception, Cassandra.
I have a set time to work each day. Sometimes I'll be sitting there and simply don't feel much connection. Rather than become negative, I stay with this "lack of conscious connection" calmly and accept the state. It seems necessary. I look at it as a form of voluntary suffering.

There is a time for effort and a time of letting go; a time to be active and a time to be receptive to whatever Higher Forces may bestow. All Praise for this Law of Grace.

Best wishes,

---

by Cassandra

> Judy wrote:
> Sometimes I'll be sitting there and simply don't feel much connection. Rather than become negative, I stay with this "lack of conscious connection" calmly and accept the state. It seems necessary. I look at it as a form of voluntary suffering.

Judy,

I met 'by chance' an Indian fellow recently who told me that the work of simply sitting or meditating can benefit others. He mentioned people coming to him when he was meditating in a nearby park and saying they appreciated his presence, that they felt a kind of lift when near him. I don't know, maybe they simply wanted to feel better, but it makes no difference really if there's something 'objective' there or the aim of the individual to perceive differently effected this feel better state.

Also, seems one of the first bits of advice about sitting or meditating is not to expect anything. I never thought of the seemingly empty periods of meditation as voluntary suffering. I suppose it is. Thanks for your reply, Judy.

Cassandra

Work Program week beginning 8 June 2009

---

by Ian

This weeks theme: Inner silence

While sensing your whole body image, guide your physical, emotional and intellectual centres into a state of inner quietitude.
Gentle attention to breathing may assist this effort.

When in states of emotional turmoil, try to redirect the energy towards a vigilance of inner quiet.

Daily Pondering: Are Attention and Inner Silence inversly proportional to Inner Considering and Kundabuffer?

---

by Judy

This week's theme of inner silence blends nicely into the morning meditation time which I've returned to after an absence.
I wasn't clear on "sensing the body image", and was mixing it up with "observing". This led to various experiments. I am currently sensing the right arm, while also attempting to be as "present" in the body as I can. This involves the awareness of how I am fragmented and not connected to that higher energy at the top of the head. It doesn't seem to work if I try to bring the energy down, but now and again there are brief moments which are different, if I just stay in front of the knowledge that I am unconnected. This somehow increases the wish to connect.

During the various experiments, I noticed something quite interesting. There was a distinct difference between sensation and "presence" in the fingers of the right hand. It was like - "it senses" (totally bodily), but "I feel". For a millisecond there was clear perception of difference. I mean, I've never thought that they were the same,any more than senation and "I Amness" are the same, but I don't remember having direct experience of the difference to do with the feeling aspect. It isn't easy to explain because I've lost it again. What has happened? Maybe I'm now back at the ordinary perceptual level. But, for that moment, an enhanced perception witnessed the difference.

I'm not sure here, but it seems like I can "sense" from the ordinary state, but a true feeling cannot be forced from the ordinary state. Rather, when some less dense hydrogens form some sort of relation with the body, then a feeling naturally arises. I've in any case read that somewhere as well. Again, it may not have made an impact at the time. Now I see it.

I'm tempted not to post this.

So often nothing seems to happen in meditation. And yet - the daily state is different when my meditative/sitting practice is regular. "It" doesn't wish to do it. What is noticed, however, is that I seem to be less confused about the real needs. Perhaps some of that energy does infuse the ordinary state. So often I live to suit the body. Why do I not more often live to suit the soul? Then every day meditation would be done.

Warm regards,

Work Program week beginning 15 June 2009

by Ian

This weeks theme: Inner silence

Walking meditation: Go for a short, slow walk. Sense the swing of arms and legs. Sense the still point at your centre of gravity.
Repeat the walk.

When in states of annoyance, allow the swirl of the annoyance to define an area of inner quiet at the center of the whirlwind.

Daily Pondering: Is suffering one of our most under utilized resources? How much time do we spend in unconscious suffering?

Work Program week beginning 22 June 2009

---

by Ian

This weeks theme: Truth/Belief

Ponder your beliefs and question if they are literally true.

Search for opinions expressing the opposite of your beliefs and consider if your opinions need re-evaluation.

Walking meditation: Go for a short, slow walk. Sense your in and out breath. Sense the still point at your centre of throat.

---

by Judy

During the past three weeks, I've been focussing on two things in the Work.
The first has been to try slight variations (eg; eyeslowered/eyes closed - soft Gurdjieff DeHartmann music in background or not - sitting on a chair or sitting on cushion, and so forth) of the morning sitting.
Thus the walking meditations of the past two weeks have worked in well.

> Walking meditation: Go for a short, slow walk. Sense your in and out breath. Sense the still point at your centre of throat.

The stillness around a swirling throat chakra was quite profound sometimes.

The second little adventures have been in dying to many small habits. One involved deleting all computer games. I tend to waste time on them when too tired or too lazy to do anything else. I'm listening to more classical music in these moments or going for a walk if possible.

Best wishes,

Work Program week beginning 29 June 2009

by Ian

Theme: The Seven Deadly Egotisms

Daily Pondering: Which of the seven deadly egotisms (Pride, Envy, Anger, Sloth, Avarice, Gluttony, Lust) is a characteristic of my chief feature?

Morning exercise: Perform the Sightless Gaze exercise and a whole body Sensing exercise. Repeat this exercise several times throughout the day.

Daily exercise 1: Throughout the week, whenever you observe one of the seven deadly egotisms arising, endure its emotional manifestation with an Inner Smile and sensed lips while repeating silently - I wish to Be.

Daily exercise 2: Each day choose one of the seven deadly egotisms and devise your own Affirmation to be performed while calmly enduring any manifestations of your chosen egotism during the day. The Affirmation may include a combination of a verbal formulation, a posture or gesture, a sensing exercise.

Daily exercise 3: With the daily egotism chosen above, Ponder - What is its source in human life? From which center(s) does it arise? Does it serve any purpose? While pondering, move your attention to each of the three centers in turn.

Eating exercise: Take a conscious breath between each mouthful of food during your evening meal.

Work Program week beginning 6 July 2009

by Lift

Theme: Stillness

Morning exercise: Greet the morning sun wordlessly with a sense of quiet gratitude for another day to sense the wonder of life through stillness.

Midday exercise: Find a place to sit where you are surrounded by the whirlwind of human activity. Visualize this activity as a pattern of energy spiraling into all your sense receptors. Absorb the energy on the in breath and sense it coursing through your body. During the out breath, try to sense a still point within you where all the energy converges and neutralizes.

Evening exercise: After your tasks of the day, find an outdoor space where you can be quiet and still for a while. Sit or stand in a comfortable position and become as motionless as a rock. Sense the motion of the air on your skin and allow your consciousness to flow outside your body and become one with the other forms of life in your vicinity. As your body becomes stilled, allow your mind to become quiet. Remain there for as long as you wish, but try for a minimum of 15 minutes. At the end of this time, Ponder, without expecting an answer, "Why is homo sapiens encumbered by self-importance?"

Work Program week beginning 13 July 2009

---

by Ian

Accept the inevitible; turn it to your advantage.
When things don't go they way you want or expect, accept the situation and affirm it with an inner smile, a conscious breath, a sensed physical presence, and a sightless gaze.
Then affirm the resulting reconciliation by remembering the death of yourself and of all creatures.

---

by Patricio

Hi,

First I want to say thanks to Ian to allow me to continue reading and studying this material now more than ever I need to understand: Who am I?

A few months ago I was diagnosed with cancer immediately I realized that all information gained in my life was futile to confront this new challenge.

I realize that I need new informations.

I think that I found here a very special information, but I need time to read and practice everything and I´m not sure if I have all the time, so I want to ask you:

1. How can I use the experience of a future death to accelerate my evolution? Is that possible?

2. How can I work to develop a kesdjan body?

TKS

Patricio

Work Program week beginning 20 July 2009

---

by Ian

Work Program week beginning 20 July 2009
Traid: Harry

This exercise was given by G at one of the meetings recorded in Transcripts of Meetings 1941-46.

Extend your arms from your shoulders, parallel to the ground. Fix your vision at a point in the distance. Divide your attention on the fingertips of both hands. Maintain this position.

In G's description he says hold it standing 25 minutes, sitting 25 minutes, and knelling 25 minutes.
I will only say that I can't come close to any of those.

---

by Chuck

A couple of things about this exercise are really interesting. It's basically the same as a Chinese exercise called Zhan Zhuang, "standing like a stake" (or tree, or post, etc.). I've been doing a form of this with arms curved in front like hugging a barrel for a while now. All I can manage is about 20 minutes - and holding the arms out as G. suggests would be even harder. The hardest part is that in the Chinese version, one bends the knees - that's the killer. By the end, one's legs are often shaking.

But G. adds dividing of the attention to the fingertips of each hand. So, one is practicing splitting the attention as well as the body. And, as you can imagine, the emotions also get involved after a few minutes as one is making lots of effort struggling and striving to keep going.

Fixing the eyes at a point in the distance is also very interesting. This may slow the flow of thoughts/I's. I've found that if you seriously don't let your eyes move at all, all kinds of interesting visual phenomena occur, like flashing between light/dark, etc.

Some time ago I read that this was one of G.'s exercises, but couldn't find anything specific, so I took to the Chinese version of the exercise. Bennett mentions it, but have been unable to find anything other than something like "30 minutes, arms out to the side." If anyone has more information or a more detailed description of this exercise as G. gave it, please post it!

Regards,
Chuck

---

by Harry

Chuck, it is in the Transcript of Meetings 41-46 which I mentioned. It is in the very first meeting.
He gives this as a means toward separating from your ordinary "i's". Frankly it works amazingly well at that. A centered state follows quickly.

---

by Chuck

Thanks, Harry. I'll try it as written by G. and see what happens.

Regards,
Chuck

---

by Ian

> Chuck wrote:
> Fixing the eyes at a point in the distance is also very interesting. This may slow the flow of thoughts/I's. I've found that if you seriously don't let your eyes move at all, all kinds of interesting visual phenomena occur, like flashing between light/dark, etc.Regards,
> Chuck

I stead of fixing the eyes, one might try softening into a Sightless Gaze or panoramic gaze.

Work Program week beginning 27 July 2009

by Ian

All the below should be accompanied by some kind of sensing and awareness of breath.

Monday & Tuesday: Ponder - Does a wise man asks questions and does a fool try to answer them?

During the week, stay on the question side of things. Whenever you feel certain of something, ask yourself if there might not be another answer or explanation or question.

Wednesday & Thursday: Ponder - Is the only certainty uncertainty?

During the week, stay on the question side of things. Whenever you feel certain of something, ask yourself if there might not be another answer or explanation or question.

Friday & Saturday: Ponder - Should every answer should lead to another question?

During the week, stay on the question side of things. Whenever you feel certain of something, ask yourself if there might not be another answer or explanation or question.

Sunday: Ponder - Considering that Life is not a Gift, then what is it?

Work Program week beginning 3 August 2009

by Ian

"We are "harmonized" when our three centers are coordinated in unison rather than "in chaos" when each center acts independantly of the others (our usual, normal, mechanical condition). We approach harmony when the three centers are each relaxed because then they are comfortably related to one another. In meditation we try to be as physically relaxed or loose as possible, to which is added a neutral emotional condition, to which is added a quiet mind (no thought). A goal is to do everything with the three centers harmoniously related." (Paul Beidler)

Daily Pondering: Where is the Rememberer who harmonizes the three centers?

Morning exercise: Quiet meditation or sitting. Relax the three centers and watch the breath. Keep the eyes open and use the Sightless Gaze. Avoid focusing on objects within the visual field. Quiet the mind.

Daily exercise: Whenever you are walking during the day, use the Sightless Gaze and the 12 Joint Exercise. At every 6th step, move your attention from joint to joint following the sequence below. While sensing each joint repeat inwardly the corresponding word from the Holy Affirming Prayer. Silently Ponder the meaning of each word without expecting any answers.

Sensing Sequence - Inner Prayer
---
1. Right wrist - Holy
2. Right elbow - Affirming
3. Right shoulder - Holy
4. Left hip - Denying
5. Left knee - Holy
6. Left ankle - Reconciling
7. Right ankle - Transubstantiate
8. Right knee - In
9. Right hip - Me
10. Left shoulder - For
11. Left elbow - My
12. Left wrist - Being

Eating exercise: Before eating, perform the Heptachord exercise. (see web site for instructions : http://www.endlesssearch.co.uk/exercises_eat.htm)
During meals, relax and eat very slowly, chewing the the food well. Attend to the textures, odours and tastes of the food. Sense the energy from the food spreading to all parts of the organism. Observe the change in your emotional state before and after eating.

by Harry

This is a key exercise. It is one that brings everything together. It is also very reflective of what I am reading in G's meetings. I've been doing this for a while now. It is also very good when in a state of conflict.

---

by Cassandra

I've done the 12 joint exercise in the past and am doing it presently when I remember to. In the past, I didn't switch joints on a count of 6 because it seemed too much effort to keep count of how many steps and sense the joint. My switching was random. But I tried it this time and got into a rhythm. I noticed how much concentration it took to do the six count and keep aware of joints.

Harry, which one of these exercises is key for you, and how are things brought together?

Cassandra

---

by Harry

The joint exercise, as you described it.

---

by Cassandra

Guess I'll have to have my own experience of this, but thanks for your reply.

Cassandra

---

by Ian

Please feel free to change the number of steps you take between each joint.
Alternatively, one could use a number of breaths between joints, or a number of heart beats.
The point is to choose some sort of regular interval as an indication of when to shift your attention to a new joint.

---

by Chuck

I'm puzzled why the joint exercises (at least this one) don't include the spine... seems like it would be the most important set of "joints" of all. Does anyone have insight on this?

Regards,
Chuck

by Harry

Chuck, I agree with you. I've always included the spine. And after that a full sensing of the entire body. This just comes naturally. Not habit, but a requirement that my being wants.

---

by Cassandra

Thanks Chuck, Harry, and Ian--I'll add a sensation of the spine and entire body.

Work Program week beginning 10 August 2009

---

by Ian

"We are "harmonized" when our three centers are coordinated in unison rather than "in chaos" when each center acts independantly of the others (our usual, normal, mechanical condition). We approach harmony when the three centers are each relaxed because then they are comfortably related to one another. In meditation we try to be as physically relaxed or loose as possible, to which is added a neutral emotional condition, to which is added a quiet mind (no thought). A goal is to do everything with the three centers harmoniously related." (Paul Beidler)

Daily Pondering: Could my belief in the existence of higher bodies just be egoism and its greedy desire for eternal existence masquerading as Faith?

Daily exercise: Whenever you are walking during the day, use the Sightless Gaze and the 12 Joint Exercise. At every "X"th* interval, move your attention from joint to joint following the sequence below. While sensing each joint repeat inwardly the corresponding word from the Holy Affirming Prayer. Silently Ponder the meaning of each word without expecting any answers.

Sensing Sequence - Inner Prayer
---
1. Right wrist - Holy
2. Right elbow - Affirming
3. Right shoulder - Holy
4. Left hip - Denying
5. Left knee - Holy
6. Left ankle - Reconciling
7. Right ankle - Transubstantiate
8. Right knee - In
9. Right hip - Me
10. Left shoulder - For
11. Left elbow - My
12. Left wrist - Being

* Note: the interval between each joint can be any regular interval that occurs in your life cycle - it could be an interval of every 6 or 9 or 13 steps as you walk; it could be every 6 or 12 or 18 breaths; it could be every 8 or 15 or 24 heartbeats, measured by your thumb on your wrist; it could be every time you eat a meal; it could be every time you get in your car; it could be every time you go to the toilet.

The operative task is for you to Remember to do the exercise at whatever interval you specify for yourself.

All these exercises are merely suggestions - you, as Seekers, are expected and encouraged to take them and adapt them and expand them to your own circumstances.

---

by Judy

Hi All,
I've just returned from a family holiday where we were out of contact with the internet. It is lovely to come home to the familiar 12-joint exercise, this time with variations. Talk more soon.
Regards,
Judy.

Work Program week beginning 17 August 2009

---

by Ian

All these exercises that are circulated each week are merely suggestions - you, as Seekers, are expected and encouraged to take them and adapt them and expand them to your own life circumstances, and then share them back with your fellow Seekers.

This Work is about Working in your own daily life circumstances and this task can be approached by adapting the exercises that are given as examples eack week. This Work cannot become "your own Work" until you have learned to construct your own daily Work programme. The exercises that are circulated each week are merely examples of what you can do. You are expected, and even required, to adapt and improvise upon these exercises for your own personal use. You are also expected to "pay" for these suggestions by sharing your adaptations with your co-seekers.

If Paul Beidler taught us anything through his implimentation of the Triad system, it was that we are each individually responsible for the direction, construction and implimentation of our own Inner Work. Ultimately and above all, we are not to rely on others completely and exclusively for the direction of our own Inner Work. We need to take an Active role in constructing our own Inner Work, and then in sharing that Work with others, even if only in the form of suggesting a personally developed or modified exercise for other Seekers to try.

The exercise this week is to develop, modify or adapt an exercise and share it with your fellow Seekers.

---

by Harry

OK. Each person who is an accepted member of this Online Work Group must take an oath to themself that they will log in here daily and make a post daily. They will respond to another post or start a new discussion of their own. If they can't keep that oath for a week they should resign formally to Ian.

---

by Harry

For today: I've been reading the transcripts of G's meetings. One aspect of this is a struggle for me. G spends much time talking about making your parents your God. He also discusses doing everything you can for your Mother. Intellectually I understand this. It's something I've discussed with my son, as he doesn't have a great relationship with his. It is difficult for me, because my mother is dying, but she is also a user. Someone who always wants more. I've decided that I will make her dying easier. But I also have to separate from the using without giving in to my own inertia.

by Judy

Hi Harry,

I had a similar situation with my mother, who died twenty-one years ago. We simply found it hard to get on well.
Yes, Gurdjieff emphasises love and obligation to parents very much.

Anyway, I don't have any solutions, but am happy to share what I did. I made myself available for helping with shopping and so on, more than usual. Then, when she was quite ill, some months before her death, I moved back into the family home to nurse her. Yes, it was very much a struggle and a difficult time. Prayer helped a lot.

Thank God I was somehow able to do that without negativity, as, in hindsight, our friction was mainly of the personalities; essences recognised the love, and wished to serve.

I pray for the well-being of the souls of my parents not so often as I should.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Harry

Thanks, Judy. Interestingly I had a strange dream last night of my ex-Wife dying without contact with her son.

As to continuing my oath:

There is an exercise G describes in his meetings transcript. Feel the full I Am in the Right Leg. Then in the Left leg. Then in the Right Arm and the Left Arm. Then in the trunk. Finally feel I am throughout the being.

This is similar to the twelve joint, only doing step by step with the four limbs and then the trunk. I Am resonating and Filling each part.

---

by Dean

The I am exercise is very effective and seems to bring about contact with the whole being. It seemed to create a sensation of the whole body as well as a stabilized emotional state.

I'll try to post more frequently as well and will try as suggested in this weeks work program to adapt the exercises to everyday life.

---

by Judy

The exercise I am trying this week involves emphasis on sensing too. It is from Ravi Ravindra's "Heart Without Measure" p23.

> Madame de Salzmann very much emphasised - as she has often done - the need for an integration of the mind and the body before one can be related to anything higher. She underscored the necessity of keeping a deep sensation in the body. She spoke about the exercise of sensing the limbs and saying "Lord, have mercy." Maybe Mr Gurdjieff brought it to the people of the West. You can say the words which touch you. This exercise can help.

I have been looking for ways to extend that feeling of "connection" which happens during some sittings, and which is quite nebulous. Each time I try to extend into everyday life, I lose it. Yet - there is hope. And yes, Dean, I agree that hope and effort are much intertwined. Thanks for that reminder from Orage.
I am doing mainly a walking meditation with the sensing of the limbs, followed by sensing of the trunk and whole being.

---

by Harry

Recognize those situations in life that aren't ordinary. Or, perhaps, are ordinary and can lead down a "slippery slope". It's not so much a matter of thinking but as feeling. When you feel the situation is out of the ordinary, or you feel the situation could become negative, then use that energy to do "I Am, I Wish, I Can." Or do the 12 joint exercise. This brings work experience to living. But you must realize that what you are doing is Work. It has nothing to do with life. You are using the events of life to remind you of the work.

You will also find that your life begins to change. But you can't anticipate or direct it.

---

by Cassandra

I've made a committment to do the 12 bone exercise on the walk back home from dropping my son at school. It's morning, and I feel fresh, as if I have another chance to 'make good' on the day. But often I slip into sentimental feelings rather than doing the harder task of working with the exercise. The words feel stiff and regimented, and I wonder what can this seemingly mechanical-feeling task do for me?

But I understand that it's a struggle at this point, and this friction is what can bring about something higher than sentimentality (a real waste of energy).

As for not posting regularly, often it's been the case that I haven't done the exercise, but more recently it's that I want to try one exercise for longer than 1 week, to get a deeper feel or practice of it. Thanks for the reminder Harry that work effects can't be controlled.

My husband and I've recently talked about linkages with ancestors and what that can mean for an individual living contemporarily. I pray for my children but rarely for my mother. My father died some years ago, and we never had a good relationship. Still, I owe my parents something more than I've given them, especially my mother.

---

by Dean

I sometimes seem to have the habit of mistaking sentimental feelings for something that is positive or leaning towards conscience, I noticed this today while attempting to work without making much progress. Some of these may be remnants from my past that may have formed before I was in the work and sometimes are difficult to identify. Sometimes bringing myself to a more neutral state seems to make them subside unless there is a lot of momentum behind them. I'll keep some of these exercises in mind to try to grapple with them further.

---

by JohnS

I made up a prayer in 1991, which has been a mainstay for me ever since (when I remember it, that is), and the structure of it is in the recommended -by-Gurdjieff triple style:
1st time: for the repose of the souls of your mother and father
2nd time: for the sake of my neighbour (those in the work)
3rd time: for my Self (true self)

My parents died 20 years ago, and once again, it was strained, though I sided more with my father. When I do the prayer, I am ALWAYS aware of a pressure to mention one particular parent first, before the other. The order changes a lot when I try to be 'fair', and sometimes through a particular sympathy at the time. All sorts of things surface - that I can watch - such as guilt, empathy (or lack), etc. Its a good prayer if I can get through this first prayer with a feeling of generosity.
Sometimes I do the 3-prayer three times, which gives me more of a chance to be genuine and perhaps more heartfelt by the last time through.

---

by Harry

Interesting prayer, John.

Along the same lines, my own father died when I was five. My step father was dying about four years ago in his early 90s. My son and I went to visit him in the hospital. He was at a point where he could not communicate. When we were ready to leave I laid my hand on his forehead and projected energy, projected the "prayer": "It's ok to leave go. We'll take care of what needs to be taken care of. Easy your self." My son, without speaking, did the same thing.

His eyes said he knew what we were saying. And they were surprised.

---

by Cassandra

> Harry wrote:
>
> There is an exercise G describes in his meetings transcript. Feel the full I Am in the Right Leg. Then in the Left leg. Then in the Right Arm and the Left Arm. Then in the trunk. Finally feel I am throughout the being.
>
> This is similar to the twelve joint, only doing step by step with the four limbs and then the trunk. I Am resonating and Filling each part.

Harry, can you provide the exact reference for the exercises. Thanks.

---

by Cassandra

> Dean wrote:
> I sometimes seem to have the habit of mistaking sentimental feelings for something that is positive or leaning towards conscience, I noticed this today while attempting to work without making much progress. Some of these may be remnants from my past that may have formed before I was in the work and sometimes are difficult to identify.

Dean,

I've often confused goodness or right doing with sentimentality, especially when I was younger. But now I can often detect the affectation that goes with this emotion.

Others are mentioning prayer, another topic I've been thinking about lately. How to do it and what it is. I've heard that it's useless to ask 'God' for favors e,ven for loved ones suffering from illness or whatever. Is prayer simply my good wishes, thoughts, or energy to another; or do I invoke a higher power?

I've also thought that prayer is like Madame de Salzmann's quote that Judy brought in--that is, to stay in the body or sense the body as much as possible. If one is able to be in the body more (through the many exercises suggested here, e.g.), can one then more of a conduit for the reconciling force so that whatever manifests (whether the cancer is healed or not) is better accepted by the praying or sensing person.

---

by Harry

Cassandra, the exercise I described is in Meetings 1941 to 1946. It's a relatively new publication, but for some reason is hard to get ahold of. I bought it through Albris.

---

by Karen

Cassandra wrote:

> Dean,
>
> Others are mentioning prayer, another topic I've been thinking about lately. How to do it and what it is. I've heard that it's useless to ask 'God' for favors e,ven for loved ones suffering from illness or whatever. Is prayer simply my good wishes, thoughts, or energy to another; or do I invoke a higher power?
>
> I've also thought that prayer is like Madame de Salzmann's quote that Judy brought in--that is, to stay in the body or sense the body as much as possible. If one is able to be in the body more (through the many exercises suggested here, e.g.), can one then more of a conduit for the reconciling force so that whatever manifests (whether the cancer is healed or not) is better accepted by the praying or sensing person.

Cassandra,

I have pondered prayer and how and why it may or may not work and the question is so vast. Intention and awareness seem to play a big part in prayer or any thought or action. Use of words seem to carry weight as well.

Not understanding how it all works and not having any answers to these questions, the last thing I'd want to do is hinder, enable (take on another responsibility) or impede on someone's experiences or development. With this awareness, when I pray for myself, others or the whole of creation, I always include that the prayer be for the person's highest good at this time and for the highest good of all souls. I also make sure I am grounded and in the body by means of the many exercises available before prayer or being a conduit/vessel to receive and share/transfer higher vibrations which appear to come from somewhere higher or from Above.

Karen

---

by Harry

Quoting Tom Rapp, Pearls Before Swine: "We are all prayers of action on our way to God."

---

by Judy

A reminder for myself, by way of a quote, after a week of Work of some intensity and daily posting:

> Madame de Salmann said to the group at lunchtime, "What do you serve? There is something in you - a higher energy - which is worthy of respect. Without this you serve only your pleasures. This is not to say that you should not look after the needs of the body or of the mind. Unless you respect and serve the finer energy in you - which is not you - work here has no purpose."
> (Ravi Ravindra's "Heart Without Measure" p10)

Best wishes to all,
Judy.

---

by Chuck

On Cassandra's discussion about prayer, I think Karen's advice is very good, to pray for our (or another person's) highest good rather than a specific outcome. Who knows what events are in store for us? There are many teaching stories about this - here's one:

> ‘A farmer lived in the days when fighting was going on between small kingdoms in China. This farmer had a son. His son, with the aid of the horse, was tilling a small field. One day the horse ran away. The neighbors came and said, 'It's a very bad thing. You have such bad luck.’ The farmer said, ‘Maybe.’ The next day the horse came back with half a dozen other wild horses. The neighbors came again and they said, ‘What tremendous luck.’ He said, ‘Maybe.’ On the third day the son, while riding a wild horse, fell and broke his leg. Again, the neighbors came and said what bad luck it was, and the farmer said, ‘Maybe.’ The next day the king's men came to recruit young farmers for the army. When they found this farmer's son with a broken leg they left him alone.'

One interesting idea about prayer... as an example, say one is praying that their son Johnny returns home safely from a dangerous trip. In one's emotions there is fear that something bad will happen to Johnny. One's body is experiencing stress, and one's mind is running through all the scenarios of what bad things could happen. In this scenario, what are we projecting? We're almost asking that something go wrong, with all three centers!

Instead of this, think that Johnny is already home safely (intellectual), project gratitude that he is safe (emotional), and feel at peace in our body. The feeling is that it's already happened and we're "surrounded" by the results. This info is supposedly from the Essenes.

Regards,
Chuck

---

by Cassandra

Everyone-Harry, Karen, Chuck--thanks very much for your responses on prayer. The centered approach suggested by Karen is one I've given thought to as well. One of the better times for prayer, for me, is after meditation, but I had forgotten the "highest good" inclusion. Also, Chuck your quote is familar. I've seen it in a children's book, which my kids thought was pretty clever--the wide angle. Also, the 'acting as if' approach to prayer--this is very compelling as well. I tried this recently on a trip to Ghana. I've become afraid to fly, since hearing about a large plane crash this summer. So I get on a 10 hour plane trip across the Atlantic, very nervousm, but outwardly I'm smiling. On the inside, I'm in continual prayer, visualizing a safe landding and a happy reunion with my children. This was about the only thing that brought any brief relief of the high anxiety.

---

by Ian

> Harry wrote:
> Cassandra, the exercise I described is in Meetings 1941 to 1946. It's a relatively new publication, but for some reason is hard to get ahold of. I bought it through Albris.

Harry, is this the book you refer to? ...

http://www.alibris.com/booksearch?qwork=10889681&matches=7&wquery=gurdjieff&cm_sp=works*listing*title

This book is published out of London UK. It sounds like it is a combination of 2 transcripts of Meetings that are circulating on the on the Net - eg. I have one PDF of Meetings 1941-1943, and another PDF of Meetings 1943-1946.

You can download them here...

http://endlesssearch.co.uk/books/Gurdjieff_5_meetings_1941_1943.pdf
http://endlesssearch.co.uk/books/Gurdjieff_eightmeetings_43_46.pdf
***
Harry, is this the exercise you refer to?...

Meeting, Thursday, July 13, 1944 -

At the moment when you are working, when you self-remember, you have another state from the usual. It is necessary to separate these two states. For this there is an exercise, a whole series of exercises even. Here is the first: you do it, for example, seated, leaning comfortably installed in an arm-chair or on a couch. There is a spot where the arms are attached to the body, (region of the shoulders) and a spot where the legs are attached to the body, (hip-joint); feel and control these four spots all the time. All your attention must be concentrated there. Send everything else to the devil. When you say "I am" imagine that these four spots are like four pillars on which is supported your "I am". Focus your attention; not on the extremities nor to the interior of the body. All your concentration is fixed on these four places. Do this for your future real "me". To begin, learn to know this state; it is like a measure, a clue. You will self-remember when you can feel well these four places. Leave all the rest. Live life as before. This is your only exercise, but do it very seriously so that all of the most concentrated moments of your work be based on those spots. After, you shall have title to a real individuality. These things could only serve as a barrier between your individuality and your ex-functions. I say "ex" because you must have a new quality of functions. The whole world must have a new quality of functions - because of an abnormal life in the past. It is necessary to create a barrier. For you, it shall be the result of this exercise. When you feel and are conscious of this definite barrier, your ground shall be prepared for a new exercise; then you will be able to have a new interior, independent, and a new exterior, independent. You shall have a normal body and a normal psychism, without the abnormal ex-functions. This is solely for her and for no one else. Do not try to do it out of curiosity. It is a very dangerous thing.
***

As G says - "For this there is an exercise, a whole series of exercises even."
As you reiterated, the 12 Joint exercise is similar. So is the 10 Bone exercise.
There is also an exercise called the 4 Prophets which was given here a while back.

---

by Cassandra

Thanks Ian. I've seen this before.

---

by Harry

Yes, that's the book Ian. But the exercise is a different one. I'll have too look through the links to let you know. It talks, as I described, about filling the legs, the arms etc. I thought of the 12 joint exercise when I read the one you quote.

---

by Harry

I went and looked at the links you provided. There are 33 meetings in the book. Some are the same.

---

by Ian

> Harry wrote:
> I went and looked at the links you provided. There are 33 meetings in the book. Some are the same.

I also have this, supposedly from Toomer - http://endlesssearch.co.uk/books/Gurdjieff_meetings_1941_1944_Toomer.pdf

and this - http://endlesssearch.co.uk/books/Gurdjieff_talks_1918_1924.pdf and this -

http://endlesssearch.co.uk/books/Gurdjieff_Meetings_1921_1922.pdf.pdf

Maybe all of them (these 2 plus previous 2) add up to 33 meetings total...

---

by Harry

Some of the Toomer are in there, but the other two are not. The tone of those is totally different. I recognize a couple of the Toomer from the book.

Work Program week beginning 24 August 2009

---

by Ian

(I am repeating last weeks exercise as it has generated a number of replies and I would like to keep the ball rolling.)

All these exercises that are circulated each week are merely suggestions - you, as Seekers, are expected and encouraged to take them and adapt them and expand them to your own life circumstances, and then share them back with your fellow Seekers.

This Work is about Working in your own daily life circumstances and this task can be approached by adapting the exercises that are given as examples eack week. This Work cannot become "your own Work" until you have learned to construct your own daily Work programme. The exercises that are circulated each week are merely examples of what you can do. You are expected, and even required, to adapt and improvise upon these exercises for your own personal use. You are also expected to "pay" for these suggestions by sharing your adaptations with your co-seekers.

If Paul Beidler taught us anything through his implimentation of the Triad system, it was that we are each individually responsible for the direction, construction and implimentation of our own Inner Work. Ultimately and above all, we are not to rely on others completely and exclusively for the direction of our own Inner Work. We need to take an Active role in constructing our own Inner Work, and then in sharing that Work with others, even if only in the form of suggesting a personally developed or modified exercise for other Seekers to try.

The exercise this week is to develop, modify or adapt an exercise and share it with your fellow Seekers.

---

by Judy

Not a lot to report today, except that I've added a weekly ponder to the daily work tasks.
I've written down on a piece of paper horizontally:

False Personality - Personality - Essence - Real I - God.

(This is from Nicoll p1267).
Nicoll reminds me that the only part of me which can get in touch with Real I is Essence.
He also says that when we are told to remember ourselves, it implies that we have forgotten ourselves, and this means, by implication, that there was a time when we did remember ourselves.
And that this forgetting is the reason why so much of Esotericism is so hard for us to understand. Also, that this is the main reason that everything is wrong with us and with other people in this life.

---

by Chuck

Ian said: the exercise this week is to develop, modify or adapt an exercise and share it with your fellow Seekers.

This exercise involves role-playing. "Externally, one should play a role in everything, this makes life easier. However, internally, we must be free of considering, we must cease reacting inside to everything that happens outside."

At some point during the next week, consciously play each of the following three roles:

- When talking to someone, pretend you don't understand what they're saying. Repeatedly ask for clarification, or say "do you mean..." and get it wrong. Continue this as long as possible while discussing that topic. Try not to externally consider and worry about what they think of you.
- Take the opposite side on a topic from what you would normally take. For example, if you dislike a public figure, defend them, giving reasons why they are worthwhile. Or, if you admire a person or a company, criticize them, giving a rationale for the criticism.
- Pretend that you're angry about something. Raise your voice and try to be convincing to whoever is there (and there should be someone) that you feel strongly about the situation. When finished, apologize for getting riled up.

While role-playing, keenly observe your state, noting how you feel emotionally and what sensations appear in the body.

Regards, Chuck

---

by Harry

I like taking the opposite side of the conversation. This is especially beneficial if you really firmly believe in one position. I did this instinctively, or drunkenly, once during my youth. Arguing with a guy who I didn't like but who had a certain position that I agreed with. I couldn't find myself agreeing with him, so I didn't. We went on for hours and eventually I convinced myself, but not him. There is a certain insight that I obtained that showed me how "whispy" my beliefs were.

---

by Judy

Chuck wrote:

> "Externally, one should play a role in everything, this makes life easier. However, internally, we must be free of considering, we must cease reacting inside to > everything that happens outside."

Hi Chuck,
This was a great reminder for me through a long and difficult day yesterday. Briefly, after a period of relative calm outside, a few surprises - one of which means I may have another house-move coming up; another involved a health problem for my son. I recalled what you wrote above and suddenly it seemed that there was a true anchor of strength available. I just had to choose to utilise it. The stable principle, something I could actually do, is of course the work itself.
Much appreciated.
Regards,
Judy.

---

by Harry

One I like to remember is: The only thing we have to sacrifice is our own suffering.

Work Program week beginning 31 August 2009

by Ian

Here are some exercises suggested by co-seekers in response to the two previous programs:

There is an exercise G describes in his meetings transcript: Feel the full I Am in the Right Leg. Then in the Left leg. Then in the Right Arm and the Left Arm. Then in the trunk. Finally feel I am throughout the being.

***

At some point during the next week, consciously play each of the following three roles:

1. When talking to someone, pretend you don't understand what they're saying. Repeatedly ask for clarification, or say "do you mean..." and get it wrong. Continue this as long as possible while discussing that topic. Try not to externally consider and worry about what they think of you.

2. Take the opposite side on a topic from what you would normally take. For example, if you dislike a public figure, defend them, giving reasons why they are worthwhile. Or, if you admire a person or a company, criticize them, giving a rationale for the criticism.

3. Pretend that you're angry about something. Raise your voice and try to be convincing to whoever is there (and there should be someone) that you feel strongly about the situation. When finished, apologize for getting riled up.

***

An exercise from Ravi Ravindra's "Heart Without Measure" (p23):
Madame de Salzmann ... underscored the necessity of keeping a deep sensation in the body. She spoke about the exercise of sensing the limbs and saying "Lord, have mercy." Maybe Mr Gurdjieff brought it to the people of the West. You can say the words which touch you.

Work Program week beginning 7 September 2009

---

by Ian

Morning exercise: Sit quietly in meditation. Relax the three centers. Deeply sense the planetary body and follow the breath using 3 or more 10 bone sequences. Then use a sightless gaze and soundless sound to absorb impressions without identifying, labeling or judging them.

During the day:
-Ponder on the significance behind repetitive compulsive strivings, attitudes, traits, roles, chief features.
-Meet desires and reactions with equanimity. Count from 10 to 1, then visualize the desire or reaction as a grasshopper hopping lightly onto a lotus pad of inner presence.
-Maintain Iamness by maintaining a sensing of the spine and skull.
-Remember your parents.
-Remember your death.

Evening exercise: Return to deep sensing of the planetary body and following the breath. Evoke a deep wish towards unified being. Repeat inwardly - with each exhale, "I wish to Be"; with each inhale, "All".

Work Program week beginning 14 September 2009

---

by Ian

The basics of the Work are to develop a 3 centered approach to everything...

In the morning, meditate or relax or ponder with divided awareness to your physical, emotional and intellectual centres.
Awareness of the physical includes Sensing - of a particular body part, or of a sequence of parts.
Awareness of the emotional includes receptivity to current emotional experience or to the Evoking of a particular emotional state.
Awareness of the intellectual includes watching your thoughts flow by, or of focusing on a particular thought or question by Pondering.
The receptive aspects of the above all boil down to relaxing the 3 centers in harmony.
The active aspects of the above all boil down to intentional evocation of sensations, emotions and thoughts.
Hopefully, the reconciliation of either of these active or passive efforts will reside in the "coating" of our so-called higher bodies, or to put it another way, in the strengthening of our Conscience and consciousness.

During our daily life, we must Work also, especially on the negative emotions we all experience, which usually relate to our egoism and self-importance. When we experience these, we shoulf try to bring intentional counter measures into play, to provide the "opposite", which will blend with the previous to yield the reconciling, which will result in the "coating" of our so-called higher bodies, or to put it another way, in the strengthening of our Conscience and consciousness. Many exercise of this type have been given before - consult your repertoir for appropriate exercises to suit the moment.

In the evening, one can re-capitulate or review the days efforts and re-affirm the 3 centeredness that was initiated in the morning, sounding a final DO which will lead to a new DO in the morning following....

....and so the octave rolls on.....

---

by Judy

Since last week, when "Transcripts" arrived,(thanks for speaking about this book, Harry, and sharing the exercise from the first Meeting), I've been persisting with that same hands-extended exercise during morning sittings.
I'm still falling short of 25 minutes at a time, though have noticed significant increase in time (14 minutes rather than about half that at the beginning) from adding parts of the Sunrise Meditation from Beelzebub's Tales, especially the part where it is suggested to speak to the various unconscious parts of the body "as if they were conscious", and so on from there. Mr Gurdjieff says this strengthens the centre controlled by the spinal cord. Interestingly, during the period it is practised, while dividing attention between the still point ahead and the arms extended, occasional dips into one of the meditative states yield lots of swirling red colours on the internal mental screen, even with eyes slightly open and focussed on the point. I particularly noticed this as it is rare for me to see red (no pun intended) - more often there will be deep indigo as the brain-wave rhythm slows and thoughts become easy to watch.

I included several parts from this week's exercise, of course. In particular there were added a three-centred state and as close to continual sensing of the whole body as I could manage to sustain.

This particular exercise is very effective in assisting the change from the ordinary state - (the one where ego feels it simply has too many more-important things to do than to just sit for half an hour) - to that other time state of the present, where I have all the time in the world, so to speak. And yes, as usual, it is the body which has to be convinced each time; the denying force. Holding arms extended may help to put it in its place.

Best wishes to everyone,
Judy.

P.S. I'm calling for ideas from anyone in our group, as to methods or tricks to extend the time of arms extended, further. Anyone interested in a little competition here?
J.

---

by Harry

Judy, I'm not sure that 25 minutes can be accomplished except by a fakir. Or an olympic athlete.

Interesting you get red meditation swirls.

Mine are usually green and purple. I've always taken that as the grape reference in much middle eastern literature.

---

by Chuck

Judy wrote:

>P.S. I'm calling for ideas from anyone in our group, as to methods or tricks to extend the time of arms extended, further.

Hi Judy - wonderful that you're working with this. Just got "Idiots in Paris," which describes Bennett's struggle with the exercise. I think part of it for him was the kneeling position, which caused his legs a lot of pain. I recall that G. recommended something like 25 minutes standing, 25 kneeling, 25 sitting. Pretty tough!

Been doing a version of this ex. for a while - In my experience, keys to extending the time are:

* Relax your arms. Depending on their position (how are you holding your arms?), sometimes you can find a position where mostly tendons are holding the arms up rather than muscles. One can even do the draining ex. to relax during the ex. I do 15-20 minutes every other night, but my arms are in a circle in front like holding a beach ball. This is probably an easier position. I also have skinny arms, haha.

* I'm sure you've been doing this, but one can try to 'enter' the pain felt in the arms. Eckhart Tolle said that if the mind starts to complain about being in physical pain, you have two levels of pain - psychological pain and physical pain. If one allows the pain to be there, it can help focus us on the present moment rather than the usual "how much time is left?" It may be possible to suffer consciously. Another way to put it: "offer your suffering to God."

* Challenge the pain with a mental attitude of "bring it on!" After all, the more it hurts, the more we benefit. Use the challenge as a way to bring in an emotional element.

Regards, Chuck

---

by Judy

Hi Harry,
Thanks for the encouraging feedback.
One thing I did notice when stopping the practice of this exercise - that is, when arms finally fall to my sides - is that I wasn't really certain that I intended to stop right at that moment. On reflection, the body just took over and stopped. What I mean is, psychologically, I know I had some way to go before reaching a limit. This demonstrated clearly that the body was in fact not obeying the intellectual centre, but rather doing its own thing and being the boss. This has made me wonder what other situations in life happen like this - quite a few, I think. Of course, common sense has to prevail; but somewhere in there I'd like to mentally give permission, if you know what I mean.

Your mention of the grape reference makes sense. Most interesting observation and one I hadn't thought of. As mentioned, this particular exercise is the first one where the colour red has appeared. The usual "indigo" I referred to is indeed almost exactly that deep purple seen in muscatel grapes. I haven't noticed the green so much. Two other frequent mental images at similar times are geometric figures and faces floating by. The sightless gaze minimises all of these pretty well for me.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Judy

Hi Chuck,
Thanks for great feedback and all the interesting suggestions. I can tell you have done a lot of work on this.

Yes, I've been holding arms straight out like a cross. I wasn't aware of other suggested positions. The beach ball one is definitely worth a try.

Oh yes, I recall Eckhart Tolle on the subject of pain management on an audio I have. Good one. I'll have a listen.

How are you finding "Idiots in Paris"? Any comments for our thread in "Work Books"?

I'll get back to you when I've tried these things for a while.

I have skinny arms too.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Judy

I experimented with arms as in holding a beach ball. Yes, time extends somewhat here. From this it is logical that perhaps it isn't the time duration which is of primary importance. Other aspects are revealing themselves as the exploration continues. For example, how the different sub-centres react (by little I's speaking up with various excuses and justifications) to the inevitable discomfort as the exercise finds my own limit each time, is quite informative. I am most often in a bit of a muddle when it comes to sub-centres. This exercise is a good experience of differentiating a couple of these comparatively clearly.

"I Am, I can, I wish" is useful here too.

The fact that I can observe this struggle between what I have intended and what various little lazy comfort-seeking I's tell me is interesting and satisfying. I suppose it is a little like a mini-way of a fakir. Still, it is useful and I'll add to regular repertoire.

There is another observation in regard to physical energy, but I have to verify yet. It could be imagination. I have to attempt at different times and stay open to the opposite side of the inquiry.

Regards to all,
Judy.

---

by Harry

Judy,
My meditative states often included images. There are almost always geometrical images. Usually everything becomes a green and then the purple is centered, eventually this has an "electrical discharge" in the center. That is when the images begin.

---

by Judy

Hi Harry,
I appreciate your sharing the above. What you more accurately refer to as "electrical discharge", I have always thought of as "bursts of light" and yes, just prior to the images. I have also experienced this inner flooding of light-bursts in dreams, though have no idea what that is about.
So there is a universal language of this state perhaps?
Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by Harry

I found descriptions in much of the Arabic literature. 1001 Nights. Rumi. Many of the poets. If you think of wine as being purple. . .even more.

---

by Judy

Most interesting, Harry.

I've taken the wine metaphor to apply more generally to the ecstasy of communion with God - becoming "drunk" with it, and so forth. Apparently the "cup" is the mind and the "cupbearer" is God, in Sufi symbolism.
However, I was ignoring the visual aspect, which is clearly seen in a line of the poem quoted below - "one viewing the wine's colour becomes a relater" and other references. The scent of flowers and fruit which are metaphors for gradual awakening are used by the Hindus too.

> The Wine of Rapture (from The Secret Rose Garden)
> by Mahmud Shabistari
> (1250? - 1340) Timeline
>
> Muslim / Sufi
> 13th Century

The wine, lit by a ray from his face, reveals the bubbles of form,
such as the material world and the soul-world,
which appear as veils to the saints.
Universal Reason seeing this is astounded,
Universal Soul is reduced to servitude.

Drink wine! for the bowl is the face of the Friend.
Drink wine! for the cup is his eye, drunken and flown with wine.
Drink wine! and be free from cold-heartedness,
for a drunkard is better than the self-satisfied.

The world is his tavern,
his wine-cup the heart of each atom;
reason is drunken, angels drunken, soul drunken,
air drunken, earth drunken, heaven drunken.

The sky, dizzy with the wine-fumes' aroma,
is staggering to and fro;
the angels, sipping pure wine from goblets,
pour down the dregs to the world.
From the scent of these dregs man rises to heaven.
Inebriated from the draft, the elements fall into water and fire.
Catching the reflection, the frail body becomes soul,
And the frozen soul by its heat
thaws and becomes living.
The creature world becomes giddy, forever straying from house and home.

One from the dregs' odor becomes a philosopher.
One viewing the wine's color becomes a relater.
One from half a draft becomes religious.
One from a bowlful becomes a lover.
Another swallows at one draught
goblet, tavern, cupbearer, and drunkards;
he swallows all, but still his mouth stays open.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Karen

Harry wrote:

> Judy,
> My meditative states often included images. There are almost always geometrical images. Usually everything becomes a green and then the purple is centered, eventually this has an "electrical discharge" in the center. That is when the images begin.

Interesting you and Judy mention geometrical images and light bursts. I've been documenting a recurring experience (about 6 times) that has arisen randomly since the beginning of my current pregnancy.

The first time it happened I had no idea what was going on as I'd never experienced anything like it before.

Each time either my left or right eye turned to a sightless gaze, almost blinding and had the feeling that something was trying to project through my eye, communicating with rapid moving light frequencies. First a small swirling pentagram or other geometrical shape like a dodecahedron would appear like a kaleidoscope of color with all of the colors of the ray, similar to a bubble. It would eventually pick up speed and expand, taking up more space, eventually filling the room with an aurora borealis like dance.

The experiences last around 3-10 minutes and always carry a soudless harmonious vibration, placing me in a state of gratitude and love for some time after. There appears to be no rhyme or reason as to when it occurs. It has happened at work a few times, while driving, at the cafe, and in a theatre while waiting for a movie.

Not sure if its a result of previous work efforts or what, where, why or how it appears?
Not sure If I'm seeing my own energy field or the little universe being created in my womb or something entirely different?

Wanted to share and see if anyone has had a similar experience or feedback.

Karen

Work Program week beginning 21 September 2009

by Ian

While in a relaxed 3 centered state, the Seeker will begin to prepare (or revise) a chart to represent his assumed lifespan, divided into seven segments with each already lived segment identified by its characteristic attribute and yet unlived segments identified by proposed attributes.

In the evening, the Seeker may Ponder in a relaxed 3 centered state, the life paths of various Remarkable People.

Work Program week beginning 28 September 2009

---

by Ian

Water - Every time you consume a beverage, sense its passage through your body. Send a wish and a prayer to all those on earth who are living in a spiritual drought and thirst for a more meaningful life.

Air - Every time you consume air, sense its passage through your body. Send a wish and a prayer to all those on earth who are living in a spiritual vacuum and wish for a more inspiring life.

Earth - Every time you consume food, sense its passage through your body. Send a wish and a prayer to all those on earth who are living in spiritual hunger and wish for a more nutritious life.

Fire - Every time you consume an impression, sense its passage through your body. Send a wish and a prayer to all those on earth who are living in sleep and wish for a more awakened life.

---

by Judy

How beautiful, how moving, is this - "meaningful, inspiring, nutritious, awakened" living! This evoked an emotion of gratitude. It wasn't just "thankfulness" - for all good things. It was a glimpse of true gratitude, which of course includes a wish and intention to repay.

Then I attempt to take this emotion with me into this four-part exercise of digestion of our various foods.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Lawrick

Yes Judy, a deeply compelling work program. My experience with the work this week was a deep sense of sadness when considering the plight of my fellow beings. It is difficult to imagine , to contemplate and sense, how many are so lost and impoverished in every way and that includes myself. Perhaps this emotion has arisen as a result of the work we are doing with Ashiata Sheimash. Perhaps because of inner growth but at times it's almost more than I can bear.

Lawrick

by Harry

The Terror of the Situation.

Work Program week beginning 5 October 2009

---

by Ian

The Seeker decides to deliberately face some of his Holy Denying Suffering I's with a conscious Holy Affirming Force in order to achieve Holy Reconciling for transubstantiation for Being. To these Holy Denying I's, suggested below, he will present a Holy Affirming Force, suggested below, in the form of calm, objective, intentional enduring.

For this purpose, the Seeker may choose from the following Suffering I's:

the I's that suffer in the form of displeasure when someone is unpleasant;
the I's that suffer in the form of dislike of certain types of people;
the I's that suffer in the form of dissatisfaction with surroundings, life style, friends, etc.;
the I's that suffer in the form of disappointment when friends, job, marriage, health, life do not turn out as expected;
the I's that suffer in the form of disapproval with someone's actions, mannerisms, lifestyle;
the I's that suffer in the form of disagreement with someone's opinions and ideas;
the I's that suffer in the form of dismay when something valued is given up;
the I's that suffer in the form of dispute when the Seeker is wrong and someone else is right;
the I's that suffer in the form of disrespect for someone who is more accomplished.

Possible Holy Affirming Forces to be used in response to the above situations:

Sense the right toe;
Sense the breath in the nostrils;
Sense the whole of the body;
Remember ones death;
Remember ones debt to those who went before;
Remember ones committment to Objectivity;
Feel Remorse;
Feel Compassion;
Feel Love.

Each night in bed before before sleep, the seeker will repeat three times: 'Sources of divine rejoicings, revolts and sufferings, direct your actions upon us,' saying each of the twelve words while directing attention to each of the twelve joints.

---

by Judy

> displeasure > dislike > dissatisfaction > disappointment > disapproval > disagreement > dismay > dispute > disrespect

These words prefixed with "dis" are a handy way to recall and name many Holy Denyings negativities. And lots more can be added, such as discomforts disturbances
dishonesties.....The list easily continues.

I've chosen being mindful of the breath to assist towards calm, intentional enduring.

Also, the sequence of the 12-joint exercise is simple if one imagines one's arms being held straight upwards. Then the body image is of the infinity symbol.

> Each night in bed before before sleep, the seeker will repeat three times: 'Sources of divine rejoicings, revolts and sufferings, direct your actions upon us,' saying each of the twelve words while directing attention to each of the twelve joints.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Judy

...disdain disconnection disease disunity distress disorder

Enough for the moment.
J.

---

by Lawrick

I'm pleased to announce that our group has a new member. Her name is Elle Marie and this new star machine was presented to the world yesteday by my neice, and our group member, Karen at 7:10 in the morning. Way to go precious neice. Uncle can't wait to return to the world next week and give you both a huge hug. 😁😁😁
Fred

---

by Ian

> Lawrick wrote:
> I'm pleased to announce that our group has a new member. Her name is Elle Marie and this new star machine was presented to the world yesteday by my neice, and our group member, Karen at 7:10 in the morning. Way to go precious neice. Uncle can't wait to return to the world next week and give you both a huge hug. 😁😁😁
> Fred

Congratulations to all involved... 😁😁😁😁

---

by Ian

Based on an exercise whereby one decides how to feel when faced with people and situations that are disagreeable:

Bey Disagreement
Herra Disappointment
Mijnheer Disapproval
Mister Dislike
Monsieur Dismay
Pak Displeasure
Pan Dispute
Señor Disrespect
Signore Dissatisfaction

---

by Judy

Congratulations, Karen and family, and a warm welcome to baby Elle Marie - love the name - and hearty congrats to you too, Great Uncle Fred!
Love,
Judy.

---

by Chuck

Congratulations Karen and Fred, and welcome Elle Marie!

Best Wishes,
Chuck

---

by Karen

Thank you all for the warm well wishes!

We are very grateful this precious little universe has entered our lives. She sparkles of purple light and fills the room with an energy that cannot be described by language but by experience alone. It's a beautiful thing.

Along with the holy affirming forces, many holy denyings have presented themselves. This weeks program will assist in neutralizing all the 'fun' I's that have come out to suffer in all sorts of forms. Thank you for the synchronicity.

Karen

---

by Cassandra

So many opportunities present themselves for this work. I'm giving this extra time.

Work Program week beginning 12 October 2009

---

by Ian

When faced with people and situations that evoke "Mister" dis - something (as listed below), play a three centered Role, such as the following:

Bey Disagreement - Sense left foot whilst evoking a neutral or non-emotional state. With the energy thus gained, Ponder: what is Disagreement whilst Sensing the right foot.

Herra Disappointment - Sense right foot whilst evoking a neutral or non-emotional state. With the energy thus gained, Ponder: what is Disappointment whilst Sensing the left foot.

Mijnheer Disapproval - Sense left hand whilst evoking a neutral or non-emotional state. With the energy thus gained, Ponder: what is Disapproval whilst Sensing the right hand.

Mister Dislike - Sense right hand whilst evoking a neutral or non-emotional state. With the energy thus gained, Ponder: what is Dislike whilst Sensing the the left hand.

Monsieur Dismay - Sense left leg whilst evoking a neutral or non-emotional state. With the energy thus gained, Ponder: what is Dismay whilst Sensing the right leg.

Pak Displeasure - Sense right leg whilst evoking a neutral or non-emotional state. With the energy thus gained, Ponder: what is Displeasure whilst Sensing the left leg.

Pan Dispute - Sense pelvis whilst evoking a neutral or non-emotional state. With the energy thus gained, Ponder: what is Dispute whilst Sensing the skull.

Señor Disrespect - Sense skull whilst evoking a neutral or non-emotional state. With the energy thus gained, Ponder: what is Disrespect whilst Sensing the pelvis Signore Dissatisfaction - Sense spine whilst evoking a neutral or non-emotional state. With the energy thus gained, Ponder: what is Dissatisfaction whilst Sensing the spine.

Work Program week beginning 19 October 2009

---

by Lift

Each day on arising, stand to face south and take three full breaths, mentally affirming I AM with each inhalation.

Throughout the day, aim to keep a continuous attention/sensation on the top of your head (Sahasrara chakra). Sense the connection between this place at the crown of your head and the collective conciousness of the universe.

Whenever you remember yourself, send a gift of love and gratitude to the universe through that connection.

---

by Harry

I do an exercise very similar to this every morning, but face the rising sun.

---

by Cassandra

I've attempted this on and off for a couple of weeks and noticed that after yoga I felt a stronger sensation there.

---

by Harry

Just a quick note. Is Sensation the goal?

---

by Cassandra

I guess there is no real goal, only the practice. Some years ago when I meditated, I would also feel a strong sensation at the top of my head. I felt pulled there. But in doing the exercise the last couple weeks, I usually didn't feel anything at all, just the struggle of trying to keep my attention there for more than one minute. Just had to keep coming back to it.

---

by Ian

Yes, much of this Work is quite mundane - chop wood, carry water, meditate every morning, count to 10 when angry...
If we can keep our attention on what we are doing, rather than drifting off into fantasies, then that is progress...

by Cassandra

Ian, I KNOW that is true because fantasy loving I's rebel strongly when I attempt the things you mention.

Work Program week beginning 26 October 2009

---

by Ian

All these exercises that are circulated each week are merely suggestions - you, as Seekers, are expected and encouraged to take them and adapt them and expand them to your own life circumstances, and then share them back with your fellow Seekers.

The exercise this week again is to develop, modify or adapt an exercise and share it with your fellow Seekers.

---

by Judy

I began working with this exercise during the last week in October. It is becoming a favourite separation (of 'I' and 'it') method.
It is straight from "Transcripts of Gurdjieff's Meetings 1941 - 1946", p64.

> Gurdjieff: I am going to give a little exercise. A very easy one. For example, when you're sitting in your armchair, get up and sit back down again alternately. Do it interiorly. Exteriorly, you remain seated as normal, while you do this exercise innerly. Move interiorly only.
> Aboulker: Must I have an interior sensation?
> Gurdjieff: Yes. You will even be able to do this exercise in the train or on the metro, but no one must be able to see anything exteriorly. You can do it from different sitting postures, but not while standing. One thing is requisite: it must always be possible to physically perform it. That is, you must always be in a position where you could easily do it. If you're lying down you won't be able to do it.

This exercise at first seems similar to visualisation/creative imagination, but has some differences, and a reason for the 'requisites' becomes clear. Doing some experimental exterior self-observation of the movements involved is also beneficial. Anyway, there is so much to find here. I am having fun with this one.
Comments of experiences most welcome.

Regards,
Judy.

Work Program week beginning 2 November 2009

---

by Ian

This weeks theme: Envy

Daily Ponder(to be performed whenever you "wake up" during the day): "What do I Envy or Covet and why do I want it?" Instructions on how to Ponder can be viewed at these links - http://endlesssearch.co.uk/exercises_pondering.htm

Morning exercise: Relax or quiet your 3 centers and try to bring them into a harmonious relationship where they are all working together to maintain quiet relaxation or inner silence. Gurdjieff called this "All-brains-balanced-being-perception". When you are relaxed and internally silent, Ponder this question - "All suffering begins with desire". As you Ponder, Sense the whole of your body. Link to basic Sensing exercise description here - http://endlesssearch.co.uk/exercises_sensing.htm#The_Basic_Sensing_Exercis

Daily exercise 1: During the course of the day, identify sources of Envy and attempt to intellectually understand them without emotional desire while Sensing your left foot.

Daily exercise 2: During the course of the day, question all impulses of covetous Envy that arise in you. Ponder - "What true benefit would they bring?" Every time you observe and feel such an Envious thought or feeling, repeat the following Affirmation while Sensing your right foot: "I desire nothing save the essential needs of my planetary body and the love of higher knowledge, and the love of my neighbour." Link to more detailed explanations of this exercise here -
http://endlesssearch.co.uk/philo_holy_equation.htm
http://endlesssearch.co.uk/exercises_holy_equation.htm

Daily exercise 3: During the course of the day, whenever you observe that you feel Envious of someone, repeat silently, "It is nothing - I will Be. It is nonsense - I can Do. It recedes - I Am", while Sensing your heart. Link to more detailed explanations of this exercise here -
http://endlesssearch.co.uk/philo_holy_equation.htm
http://endlesssearch.co.uk/exercises_holy_equation.htm

Eating exercise: Eat while giving full attention to taste impressions. After eating, spend a few minutes breathing consciously by Sensing the rise and fall of your chest.

Evening Recapitulation: After relaxing into a state of All-brains-balanced-being-perception, Sense both of your index fingers and Ponder: "In which situations did I become Envious?"

---

by Harry

I wonder how much envy is a young person's disease? I also wonder if it stems from fear. We think of envy as an unfulfilled desire. But is it really?

---

by Karen

Interesting point Harry.

> I wonder how much envy is a young person's disease? I also wonder if it stems from fear.

When observing my di-eases or negative emotions, many, if not all of them come from a place of fear. Fear of losing something, fear of not knowing, fear of looking stupid, fear of being hurt, fear of not having what I need etc.

There are the fears that others have implanted/instilled in me over the years, and the fears that I've manifested as a result of the many associations and impressions I've linked together from experiences.

When in a centered state fear seems to dissipate, entering into a place of unconditional love (for lack of a better word) But being centered does not last very long at this point.

> We think of envy as an unfulfilled desire. But is it really?

This is a very good question. If not an unfulfilled desire, then what is envy really?

Work Program week beginning 9 November 2009

---

by Ian

This weeks theme: Sloth

Daily Ponder (to be performed whenever you wake up during the day): What difficulties does Sloth bring to my life? What benefits? Instructions on how to Ponder can be viewed at this link - http://endlesssearch.co.uk/exercises_pondering.htm

Morning exercise: Get up 30 minutes before your customary rising time and perform some physical exercise beyond your usual morning routine, while Sensing your body in the following sequence of 12 joints. Link to exercise description here - http://endlesssearch.co.uk/exercises_sensing.htm#12_Joint_Exercise_

Daily exercise 1: Identify a task you routinely procrastinate over and Affirm it by doing it without delay while repeating inwardly - "I Wish, I Can, I Am.". Breathe slowly and deeply during the task, while Sensing your solar plexus.

Daily exercise 2: Choose a task to perform during your usual rest and recreation time. Choose something that brings you no intellectual or emotional gain. During the task, repeat inwardly - "It is nothing; I wish to Be.", as well as Sensing your throat.

Daily exercise 3: While performing a distasteful task, observe your emotional reactions to the task and label each emotion as it arises in you. Try to "Evoke" or feel the opposite emotion while Sensing your heart.

Eating exercise: Cook a more elaborate meal than usual. Counter any resistance to the extra work with this Affirmation: "Today I will be challenged to become what I intend.", while Sensing and Visualizing a radiantly illuminated spine and skull.

Evening Recapitulation: Ponder (without expecting a definitive Answer): "Did I become tired or energised by my extra efforts? Can I identify my habitual displacement activities (false doings employed to avoid real doing)?" As youi Ponder, Sense the whole of your body.

(Link to guidlines for the above Sensing exercises here - http://endlesssearch.co.uk/exercises_sensing.htm#The_Basic_Sensing_Exercis
)

Work Program week beginning 16 November 2009

---

by Ian

This weeks theme: Greed

Daily Ponder(to be performed whenever you wake up during the day): "What traits do I posess that betray emotional, physical or intellectual greed?"

Morning exercise: 20 minute silent sitting utilizing 10 for the 60 Bone Exercise and then 10 minutes for the Sightless Gaze. Link to 60 Bone Exercise description here - http://endlesssearch.co.uk/exercises_sensing.htm#60_Bone_Exercise_

The Sightless Gaze is as follows - One attends or directs ones Attention to ones total visual field as one diffuse, panoramic field of light and Impressions, taking in everything without identifying or labelling the impressions as things or actions, good or bad, pleasant or unpleasant. One merely absorbs the Impressions as food for the Highest Being Body.

Daily exercise 1: Walk down a street with expensive shops, Sensing your feet as your walk; when any desire to posess unecessary luxury goods on show in shop windows arises, Ponder: "What do I want, and what do I really need?"

Daily exercise 2: As you walk to and from your employment, Sense your feet, and Ponder: "How has Greed influenced my career choice?"

Daily exercise 3: During your work day, observe your relations with your collegues and whether your behaviour towards them is motivated by your personal Greed. If and when such Greed is noticed, Sense your spine, perform a Sightless Gaze and Ponder: "Am I a resource for something greater?"

Eating exercise: Serve yourself your usual food portion but eat only part of it. Throw away the part you don't eat. Observe your emotional reactions to food waste, while Sensing your stomach.

Evening Recapitulation: While Sensing your eyes and performing a Sightless Gaze, Ponder: "What did I Greedily over-indulge in today?"

---

by JohnS

In relation to the overall subject of this exercise -greed- there is a very observable trait which is currently hovering around my innards which fits this subject very well. It comes and goes, depending on things such as chance, opportunity, and - greatest of all- justification.
One of my main professions is recording music, which therefore involves the acquisition of relevant equipment. I have a complete studio setup, but I have had an overwhelming DESIRE and JUSTIFICATION to simplify and minimise the whole juggernaut. To this end, I have veered (both mentally and emotionally) towards the self-contained and minimalistic area of on-location recording, which involves the minimum (and best quality) equipment. In other words, trying to condense the whole setup into a couple of transportable boxes. I have achieved this. However, as I constantly observe, there is a constant desire to make this self-contained setup both better and better, quality-wise, and to try and cover all the other bases such as having a reliable backup system within it (a wonderful justification, this one, because it is so PRACTICAL!). The best pointer, in these stages (I'm in one right now) is justifying how to justify a new purchase. Currently I have been given a lifeline: here there is a tax incentive for buying capital equipment, in that you get a 50% tax refund on purchase, which runs out on Dec 31st. So practical! I have arrowed in to the piece of gear I "need", and I know full well that I haven't got enough work on the books to justify the purchase. But I have downloaded the specs, I have pictures of it from every angle, I am totally impressed with its capabilities, especially in the ways that it exactly meets my needs (except where it doesn't, which is where I say, either, well, for the price you wouldn't expect that, or, I can adapt to that deficiency, I didn't REALLY want that feature). But the overall nagging thing which I'm constantly aware of is - I CAN GET BY WITHOUT IT.

So, the circle turns: I am fully satisfied when working, and am fully tempted when idle, and I try to marry the two into one. And I see that it will go on forever. I can feel the difference between greed and need, but I am often powerless as to which one wins. The one measure of progress after the final result is whether the choice I made was actually a viable decision, or totally frivolous. At least these days, the latter choice makes me laugh like hell at what a chump I was, yet again.

---

by Lawrick

Ian,

Why must the 60 bone and sightless gaze be separate exercises, or was this the point? I began doing the exercises early in the morning and then again later. As usual, the Work left me in a calm and receptive state for a few hours after working with it. This receptive state proved more relaxed, less tense than my normal state of a continuing inner dialogue, and allowed me to view some situations in gestalt like perceptions. But mostly a greater sense of calm in situations proving a more negative reaction.

John writes;

> I can feel the difference between greed and need, but I am often powerless as to which one wins. The one measure of progress after the final result is whether the choice I made was actually a viable decision, or totally frivolous. At least these days, the latter choice makes me laugh like hell at what a chump I was, yet again

Amen brother! I've just moved and after downsizing a few months ago to make the next move more accomadating, I now find myself buying some of the very items I gave away, stupid little cheap things that make my new place more acceptable to visitors and friends but mostly to something in myself. And I've watched the inner war between good judgement, common sense, and my self love and vanity. And I would give the decision to my stupid need to purchase unecessary material goods, which provide nothing but a sop to my vanity. So much has been observed and weighed this week.

As to the ponder, I haven't been able to wrap my brains around intellectual greed. In one respect I perceive this as the intellectual centre capturing, imprisoning, and interrogating the bulk of my impressions without input from my senses or emotions. A sorry but true state of affairs. But external intellectual greed has been an elusive pondering. Any enlightenment out there?

Regards,
Lawrick

---

by Ian

> Lawrick wrote:
> Why must the 60 bone and sightless gaze be separate exercises, or was this the point?

Well, they weren't separate exercises, they were just part of A and B of one continuous morning exercise.
If you wish to do them simultaneously, then go ahead, as an added benefit you will save energy that way.

---

by Ian

> Lawrick wrote:
> As to the ponder, I haven't been able to wrap my brains around intellectual greed.

You have sooooo... many questions Fred.
Having questions is good...
It is the expecting or desiring the answers that is the greed
You need to discover and verify your own answers...

And verification cannot come from others...
It has to come from your own experience...

I don't have all the answers - think for yourself...

---

by Cassandra

Greed is a good thing to consider, both this idea and the prior one on envy. I see the 2 as one and the same, really. Envy/greed is something I think about constantly, having 'nice' things in the house or literally coveting my neighbor's house. Today is 'black Friday' in the US, the biggest shopping day before Christmas. Many stores have sales and it's custom to camp out in the wee hours of the morning to be the first in line for store stuff. I've no desire to do this, but I nevertheless want things. Today at the mall, I found myself resenting people who moved ahead of me in a store after my 11 year old daughter followed me out of the checkout line. I took out my resentment on her when in fact she was simply following me; I saw something else and wanted it, so I left the line. But I said to her, see what you've done; now we have to wait. I had to stand maybe 5-8 minutes behind a young woman with the work 'Pink' written across her butt. I had hateful thoughts about the mother/aunt/daughter trio.

I apologized to my daughter after paying for the things I purchased, but I was totally in the grip of something almost paralyzing, wanting and actually believing that the right dress would transform my mood. In other words, I'm looking for god in these things.

At the same time, I can also go in the opposite direction towards asceticism with the notion that if I deny myself material goods I can come closer to some truth. Not true.

Anyway, I could write volumes on this topic.

---

by Harry

This is the time of resistances. The next month is one when you need to "intentionally suffer". Because if you don't, you will accidentally suffer, as you describe. The events will occur.

Thanksgiving I arranged for the entire family to eat together. On the way home my car showed the dreaded "service engine soon" light. And my mind went to it. Churning. Later that evening, my son, who is staying with me for a while, was out and his car totally died. If I hadn't heard him come in, I would have taken mine for service early in the morning. Instead we had to wait together at some distant service station to have his towed.

We will be drawn to those events, or rather, they will be drawn to us. Magnetic attraction. Passivity works. But you have to determine what the event is. G has a discussion of this. When to be passive and when to be active.

---

by Cassandra

Harry,

Which one of G's works is this discussion in?

---

by Harry

You can find the discussion of Active and Passive a couple of places. It is discussed in All and Everything. But there it is under another subject. There is a summary, I believe, in Views from the Real World.

---

by JohnS

The active - passive subject is an interesting one, and one which often leads me to automatically try and self-observe. There are quite a few areas of life to which I am averse, one example being trying to commercially sell myself. When the occasions arise when I need to, when I raise the idea I can physically feel the resistance, usually in the form (or variation) of "it won't work, you're not that kind of person". If I discuss the procedures with a friend in order to get another perspective, I find I am suddenly bereft of expressive ideas: a verbal stumbling block arises. When I observe these resistances, but need to proceed anyway, I make the commercial decisons and do the procedures, such as advertising and informing. The result, I observe, is always the same: nothing, or next-to-nothing. This result, on the surface, is the same as if I had done nothing in the first place, just stayed passive and waited for things to come my way.
This brings me to the point of the horoscope: I had an extremely accurate one done about ten years ago, and it was a eureka moment: I was pointed to the influence of Saturn opposing every enterprise I undertake: this clarified so many strange events that have happened in the past - it gave light to the structure of events from the point of view of external influences, as well as personal prejudices and habits. It was emphasised to me, though, that the saturn influence was not fate a complis, but a resistance which had to be taken into account. This is the best passivity I can muster: knowing that there is an opposing force, and just observe it rather than try and overcome it. Saturn, I'd say, is just a little more experienced than I am!
Harry, its funny how passivity manifests in different areas: years ago, as part of my programme of trying to develop my physical side (underdeveloped compared with emotional & intellectual), I decided to service and maintain my cars. I learnt an awful lot, and gained a lot of insight into their quirks, and strong and weak points. This "active approach" has seen me without a breakdown in a decade. The only worry I have on the road now is, of course, pride.

---

by Ian

> John Summers wrote:
> The active - passive subject is an interesting one, and one which often leads me > to automatically try and self-observe. There are quite a few areas of life to which I am averse, one example being trying to commercially sell myself. When the occasions arise when I need to, when I raise the idea I can physically feel the resistance, usually in the form (or variation) of "it won't work, you're not that kind of person". If I discuss the procedures with a friend in order to get another perspective, I find I am suddenly bereft of expressive ideas: a verbal stumbling block arises. When I observe these resistances, but need to proceed anyway, I make the commercial decisons and do the procedures, such as advertising and informing. The result, I observe, is always the same: nothing, or next-to-nothing. This result, on the surface, is the same as if I had done nothing in the first place, just stayed passive and waited for things to come my way.

> This brings me to the point of the horoscope: I had an extremely accurate one done about ten years ago, and it was a eureka moment: I was pointed to the influence of Saturn opposing every enterprise I undertake: this clarified so many strange events that have happened in the past - it gave light to the structure of events from the point of view of external influences, as well as personal prejudices and habits. It was emphasised to me, though, that the saturn influence was not fate a complis, but a resistance which had to be taken into account. This is the best passivity I can muster: knowing that there is an opposing force, and just observe it rather than try and overcome it. Saturn, I'd say, is just a little more experienced than I am!
> Harry, its funny how passivity manifests in different areas: years ago, as part of my programme of trying to develop my physical side (underdeveloped compared with emotional & intellectual), I decided to service and maintain my cars. I learnt an awful lot, and gained a lot of insight into their quirks, and strong and weak points. This "active approach" has seen me without a breakdown in a decade. The only worry I have on the road now is, of course, pride.

I'm not convinced that one can "automatically try and self-observe"; it seems to me that this must be a consciously self-directed activity - but I could be wrong in this opinion!

Passivity comes when we allow our passive, denying side to be in control. When we make Active efforts to Work against our passivity we can gain many benefits. We must always Work against our passivity.

Regards
Ian

---

by JohnS

Ian;

I think the problem is my too-inaccurate definition of a term: my phrase actually meant what you stated. Its just that I use the term in the sense of the situation, when it arises, becoming an automatic reminder for self-observation.

John

---

by Ian

> John Summers wrote:
> Ian;
>
> I think the problem is my too-inaccurate definition of a term: my phrase actually meant what you stated. Its just that I use the term in the sense of the situation, when it arises, becoming an automatic reminder for self-observation.
>
> John

Hi John,

My Apologoes...
This brings up a good point - How we often missunderstand each other because of our own unique use of language.

G stated in In Search that we need a common language, but he completely changed his language in BT.
The language used in In Search is not the same as used in BT.

Work Program week beginning 23 November 2009

---

by Ian

This weeks Denying Force: Pride

Daily Pondering (to be performed whenever you wake up during the day): "Can I be free from Pride arising in my daily life?" Sense your elbows. Observe any emotions that arise.

Morning exercise: As you wake up in the morning, and before arising from bed, Sense your whole body while repeating silently the following Affirmation 3 times: "Today I will be aware of Pride manifesting itself in my Physical, Emotional and Intellectual centers."

Morning meditation: While performing a Sightless Gaze, progressivly relax your 3 centers into a state of All-brains-balanced-perception, and then perform the following 10 Bone Sensing exercise 3 times. Link to exercise description here - http://endlesssearch.co.uk/exercises_sensing.htm#10_Bone_Illumination_Exer

Daily exercise 1: Perform a menial task you would normally avoid due to Pride. This might include tasks in the workplace that are normally done by others or tasks which you consider beneath your station in life. Perform it willingly and with gusto, while Sensing your face. Observe any tension that arises physically, emotionally or intellectually. Dissipate the tension by draining it into the earth through Sensed feet.

Daily exercise 2: Whenever you observe Pride arising in your conciousness, Sense your body and remember that your death is inevitable. Repeat silently, "I wish, I can, I am," while Sensing your heart beating in your chest.

Daily exercise 3: Whenever you become bored with your current task, Ponder whether your Boredom is a result of Pride. Continue to work at the task for a further 15 minutes before taking a break. During that 15 minutes, Sense the air as it passes your nostrils.

Eating exercise: Before eating, attend to the smell sensations of your food while Sening the flow of air through your nostrils. Ponder the question: "How does Pride influence my dietary preferences?"

Evening Recapitulation: While performing a Sightless Gaze, Ponder - "During which episodes of Pride during the day did I become identified, and unable to perform the suggested affirmations/exercises?"

---

by Judy

The following jumped out:

> Daily exercise 3: Whenever you become bored with your current task, Ponder whether your Boredom is a result of Pride.

This has not occurred to me.
I am thinking in particular of various periods of waiting (for the school bus to arrive, for a doctor's appointment) when I may become restless (bored?).
Yes, this has hit the nail on the head methinks. Pride is a tricky defect for me and shows up where I least expect it. Underneath the restlessness lies an insidious false pride which somehow believes that its time could be better spent.

I'll be inquiring further into this one and using the sensing of the nostrils during these situations.

Also, John, thanks for sharing your thorough inquiry into greed last week. Yes, it is another sometimes very subtle companion. I agree with your comments on justifications too. How seemingly "correct" would it be to call your given example "the search for excellence", which undoubtedly it is sometimes. Yet I too know the difference in the feeling between greed and need. Where does one draw the line? Something useful for me has been enquiring into motives. This can be like peeling back the layers of an onion as well. For example, I usually have to reject the first few motives which come to mind. Perhaps I decide that I won't buy anything frivolous for myself, but will allow occasional purchases for others. But I have to watch this one as well, as it could so easily become mixed with "people-pleasing" whilst still indulging the unnecessary urge to purchase, often justified by the fact that the item is "so well priced - a bargain" and so on and so on. On the other side of the coin is the fact that often we can add joy to someone's life by simple giving, whether of a gift or a smile, or just spending time with them.
How to differentiate?
It takes vigilance and awareness of the inner taste of the action. Even then, I can be mistaken.

Regards,
Judy.

Work Program week beginning 30 November 2009

by Ian

This weeks theme: Anger

Daily Pondering: To be performed whenever you wake up during the day - Sense your heart and Ponder - "What lurks behind my anger?"

Morning exercise: Spend five or ten minutes outside in the open air Sensing your feet on the earth while doing a Sightless Gaze Exercise.

Daily exercise 1: While at your job, observe yourself during moments of Anger and take note of your postures, sensations, emotions and thoughts. Imagine that the other person is equally Angry with you. Sense your solar plexus and ask yourself - "Did my Anger arise from Ego or from Conscience?"

Daily exercise 2: After every meal, spend a few moments observing and sensing your breathing while Pondering - "Is Anger sometimes justified?"

Daily exercise 3: During your journey home from your job, whenever you feel Angry at someone or something, count from 10 to 1 while visualizing yourself radiating a brilliant light that illuminates your spine/skull. Then ask yourself - "What can I learn from this person/situation?"

Eating exercise: At each meal of the day, use the Heptachord Exercise before eating.

Evening Recapitulation: Recall the days Angers and the postures, sensations, emotions and thoughts associated with the Anger. While deeply Sensing your body, Ponder - "Was my Anger directed at myself or at a situation that was beyond my control?"

Work Program week beginning 7 December 2009

by Ian

This weeks theme: Gluttony

Daily Pondering: "What other 'things', besides food and drink and self-importance, might we consume in excessive amounts?"

Morning exercise: Have only water for breakfast. Drink it with a feeling of Gratitude. Notice the tastes and sensations as you drink, in your mouth and esophagus. Ponder the statement: "Man cannot live by bread alone."

Daily exercise 1: While at your job, observe your desire for the attention and recognition of co-workers. While sensing your face, Ponder: "Is the desire for the attention and recognition of others a form of Gluttony?"

Daily exercise 2: After a large lunch eaten with gusto, spend a few minutes Observing and Sensing your breathing while Pondering: "Why is Gluttony considered a sin?"

Daily exercise 3: Before eating dinner, say a prayer of thanks. While eating dinner, observe which foods you prefer to eat more of. Notice the tastes, smells and sensations of those foods. Ponder: "Why do I wish to eat more of those foods?"

Evening exercise: Repeat silently 7 times: "I Will, I Can, I Am.". Sense 'I Will' in your head; 'I Can' in your four limbs; and 'I Am' in your Torso (heart and abdomen).

Evening Recapitulation: Recall the days Gluttonys. Recall the Sensations and Emotions associated with them. Ponder: "Is Gluttony a substitute for a spiritual hunger?"

Work Program week beginning 14 December 2009

---

by Ian

This weeks theme: Lust

Daily Pondering: "Will alteration of a seeker's habitual Lustful behavior redirect the flow of force towards a calmness of Being?"

Morning exercise: Bring your self into a state of All-brains-balanced-being-perception by Sensing your whole body and observing the rise and fall of your breathing, while using an unfocused, panoramic Sightless Gaze.

Daily exercise: Whenever you experience Lust, observe the associated sensations, emotions and thoughts while repeating "It Lusts; I Am." Then repeat this phrase from Beelzebub's Tales - "Only he may enter here who enters into the position of the other results of my labors," while Sensing your whole body and Imagining yourself in the position of the other, until a state of inner calm is reached.

Afternoon exercise: Intone out loud 7 times, "I Will; I Can; I Am", while respectively Sensing your head, your four linmbs, and your torso.

Evening Recapitulation: Bring your self into a state of All-brains-balanced-being-perception. Recall the days Lusts and the days moments of Self-remembering. Recall the sensations, emotions and thoughts associated with them. Ponder: "Is Lust a substitute for a spiritual hunger?"

---

by Gururaj

Half the week was over when I have first joined the online work group and saw this week's exercise.Did attempt some of the exercises on two days.And then reading about the Holy Equation and the Law of three gave a better perspective for my experiences from the exercices.Here goes - Lust is a significant Denying manifestation for me.A pretty person passing by or visuals in the media showing a lot of flesh do grab the eye-balls.Internally there is a ,so to say ,blip on the radar.During the week I also observed fleeting 'anti-lust' moments - when a very unattractive person comes in the line of sight.This too is a 'disturbance' like lust.I would like to think,all the 'lusting' moments were too fleeting for me this week to bring any Affirmatory influence on them as suggested in the exercise.But the pondering has been a sort of weak ,off-line, Affirmatory effort.I see that "it" instinctively lusts and does'nt do so only when there are some other issues to be addressed like ,say,collaborating while doing some work at the office.Which brings one to the question whether lust is a substitute for a spiritual hunger.I experience it more as the 'lower' attraction versus the 'higher' spiritual hunger.There is an analogy to water in a reservoir used for power generation.The tendency of the water is to spill or leak away.It is dam-ed and directed to the turbines to create the finer energy of electricity.

Since this is my first post on joining the group,I thought it fit to also add here that I am grateful for the existence of such a group and also to Ian for taking me in.Glancing at the participation of various members over the years,I am somewhat awed by the experience and sagacity of the members and look forward to all your support in bringing me upto speed.

A few lines about myself - My name is M.Gururaj ,48 years old, male ,residing at Bangalore, India. I am married and have two very young kids(twins). An engineer by profession, I am employed with a power generation company.After first getting to read about Gurdjieff about 5 years ago, I have read “Beelzebub’s tales..” and “In search of the miraculous…” .Being born a Hindu ,our spiritual traditions are always around as part of life. But I could go beyond the rituals and get a glimpse of the Inner aspects when I first read ,many years ago ,the teachings of Ramana Maharshi. They made a great impact, but have not made much headway on that path. A few years ago ,I participated in workshops, was a volunteer and then a coach in an organisation working on experiencing our BEING ,as it is, and altering it to handle life goals very effectively.The intellectual grounding of these practices were not revealed and were not encouraged to be discussed.Later,I came across an article which said such programs are basically inspired by 4th Way precepts. Since then I have been reading about Gurdjieff and his work.

Gururaj

---

by Ian

> Gururaj wrote:
> Since this is my first post on joining the group,I thought it fit to also add here that I am grateful for the existence of such a group and also to Ian for taking me in.Glancing at the participation of various members over the years,I am somewhat awed by the experience and sagacity of the members and look forward to all your support in bringing me up to speed.

Hi Gururaj,

Welcome to the group. I hope you find it useful in your search for understanding. We are all here because we are searching, so if you have any questions, please feel free to ask. As you see from looking at past participation, there are many points of view on these subjects.

Regards

---

by Ian

> Gururaj wrote:
> ...During the week I also observed fleeting 'anti-lust' moments - when a very unattractive person comes in the line of sight.This too is a 'disturbance' like lust.I would like to think,all the 'lusting' moments were too fleeting for me this week to bring any Affirmatory influence on them as suggested in the exercise.

Good observation about lust/anti-lust. This view can be generalized to any desire/non-desire or like/dis-like in our human nature. We are attracted to some things and we reject other things. Sometimes we reject things that could actually be good for us, just as sometimes we like things that are bad for us.

In any case, these (habitual?, mechanical?) likes/dislikes can function for us as Denying forces to which we can apply conscious Affirming forces which will lead to Reconciling forces. This is the harnel-miatznel aspect of the law of three in action - or the Divine Equation as Paul Beidler called it. The Reconciling forces are what help build our understanding/higher bodies. Paraphrasing what you say below about the reservoir... affirming redirects (or takes advantage of) the flow of the denying to produce the reconciling (electricity).

> But the pondering has been a sort of weak ,off-line, Affirmatory effort.I see that "it" instinctively lusts and does'nt do so only when there are some other issues to be addressed like ,say,collaborating while doing some work at the office.Which brings one to the question whether lust is a substitute for a spiritual hunger.I experience it more as the 'lower' attraction versus the 'higher' spiritual hunger.There is an analogy to water in a reservoir used for power generation.The tendency of the water is to spill or leak away.It is dam-ed and directed to the turbines to create the finer energy of electricity.
> Gururaj

One thing to keep in mind is that Affirming has to be of equal force to the Denying. A small Denying only requires a small Affirming effort; a large Denying requires a large Affirming effort. Something to Ponder: What happens to the generated Reconciling force if Affirming and Denying are not equal?

Regards,

Work Program week beginning 21 December 2009

by Ian

This weeks theme: Doubt and Certainty

As Paul Beidler used to say, "Stay on the question side of things." Having answers tends to bring questioning to an close; we have our answers and we don't look further. This limits our search, especially if we have come to a wrong conclusion. Retaining an open mind allows use consider new information and modify our understanding. Passive belief, without active searching, inquiring, questioning and pondering, may increase our mechanicicality by forming fixed or crystallized ideas, predjudices, and opinions.

If we adopt an attitude where we see all our conclusions as tentative and provisional, pending new information, then we have an opportunity to remain open to further insights and to entertain different perspectives. Being certain that we are right and have nothing more to learn is a sure fire way to cut ourselves off from any real progress towards Being.

http://www.scientificamerican.com/article.cfm?id=the-certainty-bias

***

Daily Pondering: "Will an reversal of a Seeker's habitual Doubts and Certainties redirect the flow of inner life towards a calmness of Being?"

Morning exercise: Bring your self into a state of All-brains-balanced-being-perception (self-remembering) by Sensing your whole body and observing the rise and fall of your breathing, while using an unfocused, panoramic Sightless Gaze.

Exercises to use throughout the day:
1. Go against what IT wants - IT wants certainty; IT wants answers; IT wants confirmation - using some of the following exercises:
a) Deliberately playing Devil's Advocate regarding a burning issue of the day when conversing with friends or co-workers.
b) Deliberately construct arguments to disprove some of your own strongly held beliefs.
c) Deliberately answer all questions by saying, "I don't know."

2. The Work practice of Pondering helps to cultivate this attitude of remaining on the question side of things. Find 7 times during the day to Ponder in silence, with body sensing and breath awareness, for 5 minutes.
Ponder one of 2 types of questions:
1. Ponder an unanswered question that you may have that relates to the Work.
2. Ponder whether something that you are certain about in the Work might be wrong.
Hold the question in mind without expecting an answer. Regard the question as a sort of silent, unspoken mantra. Answers will come. The mind will churn them out like an organ grinder - that is the function of the mind, to produce thoughts, so let it alone to do its job. Let the answers go and return to inner silence. Get used to the uncertainty, the unknowing, the silence. Affirm the question, not the answer. Embrace the uncertainty of not knowing; of not having an answer.

Afternoon exercise: Take a deep breath into your solar plexus and Sense it there. Then as you exhale, Intone out loud, "I Doubt; I Can; I Am", while respectively Sensing your head, your four limbs, and your torso. Repeat 7 times.

Evening Recapitulation: Bring your self into a state of All-brains-balanced-being-perception. Recall the days Doubts and Certainties and the days moments of Self-remembering. Recall the sensations, emotions and thoughts associated with them. Ponder: "Are my Certainties a form of spiritual self-calming?"

---

by JohnS

Ian;

I have printed out this posting of yours for two reasons: firstly because it seems to contain several mantras which to me are extremely relevant awareness reminders and which will benefit my consciousness immensely if I am diligent to them (I've decided to keep the page in my wallet, so I can just be aware of its presence), and secondly because of the circumstance which led me to the posting: I was reading Nicoll's "Living Time", which was discussing reality as levels of scale (as in Erigena, Augustine, Plato), and that - according to Plato - we normally associate our second level of perception (pistis, some knowledge by experience, facts and opinions formed) as the highest level of mind - and we get stuck there. "Belief, and the perception of shadows, are not the waking reality". As I read this, I had the overwhelming urge to dial up the work site, also because this urge emphasised a necessity of collaboration being an essential part of moving forward (now I realise that "moving forward" is the wrong idea for this: "moving forward" is looking for eventual truth in time, "moving upward" is what you and Nicoll are talking about: vertical scale, living in the world above fact and opinion).
As an adjunct to this, I seem not to notice on the site any "Christmas Greetings" from anyone. Apart from the real significance of the time of year, this is surely step one in this set of exercises.

Thankyou

---

by JohnS

Ian;

Several days later, and after the Christmas social milieu, and I have "failed"in my mission in one sense: I have been often aware of the missives I was entrusted with by promise, ie the devil's advocate role. I was often aware (sometimes almost constantly) of the times to use it, but my courage failed every time, due, I observed, to the triple-excuse method hovering at the time: not wanting to hurt anyone, not wanting to put myself in an awkward light, and not deeming it appropriate. All this is lack of courage, not discrimination. The positive part of it, though, was that I was able to observe my failings, which engendered a depression, which I was most easily able to observe, and this included a very great feeling of "standing apart", in the objective sense. Afterwards, I had a large sense of wonder at the way in which we pass our lives, and what -EVENTUALLY - I myself am going to do about it.

The other lesson I seemed to have learnt is that exercises such as this weeks' cannot be adopted instantly, merely from enthusiasm. This is definitely a Long Lesson, though I seem also to be aware of the opposite danger of the enthusiastic approach: the file-it-away-as-important method, which I may forget to act upon, because tucking it away safely is secuity enough.

---

by Ian

> John Summers wrote:
> Ian;
>
> Several days later, and after the Christmas social milieu, and I have "failed"in my mission in one sense: I have been often aware of the missives I was entrusted with by promise, ie the devil's advocate role. I was often aware (sometimes almost constantly) of the times to use it, but my courage failed every time, due, I observed, to the triple-excuse method hovering at the time: not wanting to hurt anyone, not wanting to put myself in an awkward light, and not deeming it appropriate. All this is lack of courage, not discrimination. The positive part of it, though, was that I was able to observe my failings, which engendered a depression, which I was most easily able to observe, and this included a very great feeling of "standing apart", in the objective sense. Afterwards, I had a large sense of wonder at the way in which we pass our lives, and what -EVENTUALLY - I myself am going to do about it.
> The other lesson I seemed to have learnt is that exercises such as this weeks' cannot be adopted instantly, merely from enthusiasm. This is definitely a Long Lesson, though I seem also to be aware of the opposite danger of the enthusiastic approach: the file-it-away-as-important method, which I may forget to act upon, because tucking it away safely is secuity enough.

Dear John,

I understand your reluctance (or whatever you may call it) to engage this exercise. As I have stated previously, not all exercises presented here are expected to be performed when they are posted - they may 'saved' for future use. Some of these exercise are 'seeds' to be planted for future harvesting. Sometimes the ground has to be prepared beforehand. We all have an inner garden and sometimes this garden needs to be prepared for the seeds that we will eventually plant in it. (a corollary to this is that the existence of these 'seeds' [exercises] does not need to be kept 'secret" - in fact fore-knowledge can be very beneficial in prepating the ground.)

Merry Christmas to you and yours...

---

by Cassandra

> Ian wrote:
> 2. Ponder whether something that you are certain about in the Work might be wrong.
>
> Ponder: "Are my Certainties a form of spiritual self-calming?"

This task came easy because I have doubts about the validity of the work but hold to G's advice to test these ideas. So, I made an effort to doubt Mr. G. and all that he said about achieving consciousness. Write him off as a charlatan. And this is good for me because I don't want to honor Gurdjieff. Even if I prove to myself that some work idea is valid, I must resist deifying G., as seems to be the tendency sometimes in relation to teachers. One group that I've been associated with celebrates G.'s birthday, which comes soon after Christmas, I think. When asked if I wanted to join in, I said no because I'd just done Christmas.

This exercise was also unsettling because I've come to believe in the efficacy of positive affirmation, a positive response to the world rather than a negative one. This turned all that around. Yes, my need for answers and certainty are a form of self-calming. I need something unwavering to believe; I can only assume that these tasks are designed to open one to the possibility that there is SOMETHING behind belief and the emotions or thoughts associated with belief, something more profound that can be experienced only by letting go of smaller things.

---

by Cassandra

> John Summers wrote:
> Ian;
>
> I have printed out this posting of yours for two reasons: firstly because it seems to contain several mantras which to me are extremely relevant awareness reminders

and which will benefit my consciousness immensely if I am diligent to them (I've decided to keep the page in my wallet, so I can just be aware of its presence), and secondly because of the circumstance which led me to the posting: I was reading Nicoll's "Living Time", which was discussing reality as levels of scale (as in Erigena, Augustine, Plato), and that - according to Plato - we normally associate our second level of perception (pistis, some knowledge by experience, facts and opinions formed) as the highest level of mind - and we get stuck there. "Belief, and the perception of shadows, are not the waking reality". As I read this, I had the overwhelming urge to dial up the work site, also because this urge emphasised a necessity of collaboration being an essential part of moving forward (now I realise that "moving forward" is the wrong idea for this: "moving forward" is looking for eventual truth in time, "moving upward" is what you and Nicoll are talking about: vertical scale, living in the world above fact and opinion).
As an adjunct to this, I seem not to notice on the site any "Christmas Greetings" from anyone. Apart from the real significance of the time of year, this is surely step one in this set of exercises.

Thankyou

John, the moving foward vs. moving upward is a nice observation. At year's end, we often take inventory to see 'how far we've come' in business, relationshipss, the Work. But as you point out, it is the vertical that's the key, above mind, emotion, and physicality.

---

by Gururaj

Ian :
In response to John ,when you replied "sometimes this garden needs to be prepared for the seeds that we will eventually plant in it " ,I wonder whether an application of this is to just do the work exercise for the week and the relevant "insight" could come later.Maybe this thought could be an Affirming influence when at times one sees a particular exercise to be not as easily 'workable' as others.
On just a few occassions when I attempted the 'doubt' exercise,once it was to search for an answer to what it means "to pay back quickly" in Work terms.Answers have still to be found including a need to have more clarity on the question itself.
In the context of what John observes about "moving up " versus "moving forward" ,I would like to share here a question which arose in me the previous week when certain life situations found me in a negative state of being.Is the purpose of engaging in Work to be focussed on personal "calming" or an alert acceptance of whatever is.I guess,and have still to discover ,that moving 'forward' in being in equanamity involves moving 'above' my reactionary states.

---

by JohnS

Gururaj;

"moving 'forward' in being in equanamity involves moving 'above' my reactionary states"

I would agree with this in principle, as it tries to be the result of an observation instead of a reaction. Nicoll at this time was also giving details on a more practical level of "moving upward", in that he was talking about methods of literally raising your core vibrations to a higher level (one of which involved controlling or objectifying emotions, which is what you have stated to have done); one of the effects of these raising of vibrations is a different view of time, expanding from the linear to the extra-dimensional, and eventually getting to the levels of things such as Gurdjieff's talking of being able to change the past - literally. he takes it one step at a time, though, in order that each step makes rational sense rather than diverting into pure theory. This seems to be the general path you are experiencing at times.

---

by JohnS

As a progress report on this general subject: I have gone as far as I should go, intellectually, regarding this envisioning of further dimensions and the possibilities of moving up to a higher viewpoint. Now, observation of this searching has led to the world of feeling: if nothing, sense-wise, is as it seems, due to our view of the universe being limited to 3 dimensions, ie a cross-section only, then what are our real emotions? Obviously a three-dimensional emotion (ex. love of beauty, love of body, etc) is false. The only true love, as Gurdjieff states, is love of consciousness, which is reciprocated with the same. What does this high statement really mean?? I can see, intellectually, how a vision (or glimpse) of higher dimension could make emotions less personal and more expansive, but this, conventionally, seems to have to be grasped intellectually before the emotion comes. But is not the right emotion supposed to be the affirming factor, and afterwards verified by the intellect? This is the reverse of the usual procedure: logical breakthrough, followed by emotional affirmation.
Well, the intellectual breakthrough is "hanging there" at the moment, and the emotional factor is asking to be heard. But it is stubborn, so stubborn, not through fear, but, I guess, coated by habit. Maybe (most likely) I have never experience true emotion, so I am too satisfied with small, normal, comfortable answers. The traditional "letting go of everything into the void" is the method, I suppose, but that still feels, at this stage, like an intellectual exercise. So sad.

---

by Ian

> Cassandra wrote:
> ...One group that I've been associated with celebrates G.'s birthday, which comes soon after Christmas, I think. When asked if I wanted to join in, I said no because I'd just done Christmas.

> This exercise was also unsettling because I've come to believe in the efficacy of positive affirmation, a positive response to the world rather than a negative one. This turned all that around. Yes, my need for answers and certainty are a form of self-calming. I need something unwavering to believe; I can only assume that these tasks are designed to open one to the possibility that there is SOMETHING behind belief and the emotions or thoughts associated with belief, something more profound that can be experienced only by letting go of smaller things.

The tasks are sign posts left behind by previous seekers. They may or may not show you something. Some might show more than others. One can have hope or positive attitude or even tentative belief that that there is some usefulness to be gained from them.

Letting go of everything might be a way forward, or up.

---

by Ian

> Gururaj wrote:
> Ian :
> In response to John ,when you replied "sometimes this garden needs to be prepared for the seeds that we will eventually plant in it " ,I wonder whether an application of this is to just do the work exercise for the week and the relevant "insight" could come later.Maybe this thought could be an Affirming influence when at times one sees a particular exercise to be not as easily 'workable' as others.

Yes. Results are not always immediate.

> Gururaj wrote:
> On just a few occassions when I attempted the 'doubt' exercise,once it was to search for an answer to what it means "to pay back quickly" in Work terms.Answers have still to be found including a need to have more clarity on the question itself.

Could pay back imply that something was received?

> Gururaj wrote:
> In the context of what John observes about "moving up " versus "moving forward" ,I would like to share here a question which arose in me the previous week when certain life situations found me in a negative state of being.Is the purpose of engaging in Work to be focussed on personal "calming" or an alert acceptance of whatever is.I guess,and have still to discover ,that moving 'forward' in being in equanamity involves moving 'above' my reactionary states.

Work is more focused on an alert acceptance of whatever is. Gurdjieff warned against self "calming", which is different than not expressing negative emotions.
Negative emotions have a function - they are to be transformed by intentional exercises, which, according to the theory, creates 'higher understanding' or degrees of reason, and 'higher substances' which coat the higher bodies.

We also need to work on balancing the centers, developing concentration, attention and will.

---

by Ian

> John Summers wrote:
> The traditional "letting go of everything into the void" is the method, I suppose, but that still feels, at this stage, like an intellectual exercise. So sad.

Letting go of everything includes the grasping 'self'. Throwing the baby out with the bathwater.

---

by JohnS

"Gurdjieff warned against self "calming", which is different than not expressing negative emotions.
Negative emotions have a function - they are to be transformed by intentional exercises, which, according to the theory, creates 'higher understanding' or degrees of reason, and 'higher substances' which coat the higher bodies.

We also need to work on balancing the centers, developing concentration, attention and will."

Here is Gurdjieff's specific warning against small, personal emotions and habits. Thankyou.
I agreed with the statement above on transforming negative emotions, but it being in the realm of theory, I didn't want to connect with it at this stage. However, your statement on balancing the centres was parallel to something that struck me in Nicoll: the whole secret (which he elaborates in detail) of transforming emotions is memory. But, as Ouspensky stresses, only a special kind of memory. Nicoll shows that history is still alive, not disappeared into that undefined thing we call "the past", and that the only way mankind can evolve is to change the past, because we cannot evolve while carrying round with us this "history of crime", as Ouspensky puts it. But this change can only be done with this special kind of memory, which necessitates concentration, attention and will. This must transform emotions, as these factors will never change unless you are emotionally committed to them.

So perhaps I can see one large slice of what emotions are "for": they are a particular energy that gives us the impetus to evolve, and all we have to do (!) is remember this.

---

by Harry

John, I think you answered something for yourself. It feels like an intellectual exercise.
As I read your post, that's what I "feel". Intellectual exercise. I say that because I'm much the same, or started much the same.
I think those drawn to O are drawn to the intellectual side of the work.
Have you meditated?
Can you meditate while walking somewhere with purpose?
Can you cook a meal in a meditative state?

Tom Rapp, of Pearls Before Swine, expressed it this way: "We are all prayers of action on our way to God." Be a prayer of action, and you will transform not just emotions, but your life.

And try reading some of the opposite side. Rodney Collin is very much, especially in his later work, very emotional.

---

by Ian

> Harry wrote:
> "We are all prayers of action on our way to God."

Fabulous statement. Pure gold. Thanks, Harry.

---

by JohnS

Harry;
Thanks for the perspective.
I think what I was trying to get at was that I stopped that intellectual exercise at that point, and switched over to it as an emotional exercise. For the past week now, I have been watching (sorry, "feeling") the present moment slip constantly into the "past", which gives me the feeling of an actual physical buildup of my life behind me as I go from moment to moment. This has the result of me pulling myself up constantly for the responsibilty of my actions, of what I'm leaving behind me. Especially with something like impatience, I suddenly realise that "that action has cost the world something in relation to my contribution to its striving for wellbeing, and I can't take it back now." It feels equivalent to me, in a smaller way, to your Tom Rapp quote.

Yes, I can meditate in action, though I wouldn't call it done particularly well. So far, this current exercise is the most fortuitous entry into the meditative door I've had for some time.
I read a lot of Rodney Collin, in fact I've even put his Mexican epitaph to music. I also am aware of how important the emotional perspective is to me, and I constantly try to keep its level up by reading and re-reading Ischa Schwaller de Lubitz and some sufi textbooks, all of which concentrate on the Way of the Heart as the road to consciousness.

---

by Ian

> John Summers wrote:
> ... I have been watching (sorry, "feeling") the present moment slip constantly into the "past", which gives me the feeling of an actual physical buildup of my life behind me as I go from moment to moment. This has the result of me pulling myself up constantly for the responsibilty of my actions, of what I'm leaving behind me. Especially with something like impatience, I suddenly realise that "that action has cost the world something in relation to my contribution to its striving for wellbeing, and I can't take it back now."
> ...
> Yes, I can meditate in action, though I wouldn't call it done particularly well. ...all of which concentrate on the Way of the Heart as the road to consciousness.

Hi John,

What you leave behind you in Time is a result of your actions. How much of that you can change, I don't know (a la Gurdjieff and changing the past).
What I do know is that we can change our attitudes about what we have done and about what others have done in the past.
Maybe G meant that we can change our attitudes/judgements about the past. Certainly we can't change the actual events.
In any case we only have the present moment to Work within. Actions that we take Now determine both our past and future.
Be mindfull of every step you take....prepare for yourself a good future and a good past by the actions you take Now.

That is what is so beautiful about Harry's statement - "We are all prayers of action on our way to God."

Make everything you do acceptable to "God" (or whatever is Ultimate in your personal universe.).

Or to put it another way - have no regrets.
Regrets are the painful things about the past.
When G talks about changing the past, he is talking about changing regrets.

Which of course all comes down to his comments about Conscience.

I agree with Harry when he asks how much meditation or 'morning preparation' do you do...
But there is also a whole realm of this Work (reparing the past / cancelling regrets) that lies outside that practice; but that practice also helps us to develop the strength to do that kind of Work.

Regards
Ian

---

by Judy

Ian wrote:

> Or to put it another way - have no regrets.
> Regrets are the painful things about the past.
> When G talks about changing the past, he is talking about changing regrets

The Gurdjieff work isn't the only place where we are told this. It is most interesting.
How can one live a full life for a long time and have no "regrets"?

Now it makes more sense when the etymology is looked at:

> regret
> "to remember with distress or longing," c.1300, from O.Fr. regreter "long after, bewail, lament someone's death," from re-, intensive prefix + -greter, possibly from Frankish (cf. O.E. grætan "to weep;" O.N. grata "to weep, groan"), from P.Gmc. *gretan "weep." Replaced O.E. ofþyncan, from of- "off, away," here denoting opposition + þyncan "seem, seem fit" (as in methinks). The noun is first recorded 1533. Regretfully incorrectly in place of regrettably is attested from 1976.

in that I have some understanding and grasp of the fact that we are working to detach/eliminate longing and desire.

Yet, we are told to "repent" and surely an important part of a developing conscience is to be sorry for past sins or crimes. Etymology of this word:

> repent
> late 13c., "to feel regret for sins or crimes," from O.Fr. repentir (11c.), from re-, intensive prefix, + V.L. *penitire "to regret," from L. poenitire "make sorry," from poena (see penal). The distinction between regret (q.v.) and repent is made in many modern languages, but the differentiation is not present in older periods. Repentance is recorded from c.1300, from O.Fr. repentance (12c.).

I'm wondering if you, Ian, or anyone else here would be so kind as to offer any additional clarifying comments please?
Thanks for all the great posts for this week's exercise. I've been following with interest.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Harry

A quote, Judy:

LEONARD COHEN LYRICS

"The Future"

Give me back my broken night my mirrored room, my secret life
it's lonely here,
there's no one left to torture
Give me absolute control
over every living soul
And lie beside me, baby,
that's an order!
Give me crack and anal sex
Take the only tree that's left and stuff it up the hole in your culture
Give me back the Berlin wall
give me Stalin and St Paul
I've seen the future, brother:

it is murder.

Things are going to slide, slide in all directions
Won't be nothing
Nothing you can measure anymore
The blizzard, the blizzard of the world has crossed the threshold and it has overturned
the order of the soul
When they said REPENT REPENT
I wonder what they meant
When they said REPENT REPENT
I wonder what they meant
When they said REPENT REPENT
I wonder what they meant

You don't know me from the wind you never will, you never did I'm the little jew who wrote the Bible
I've seen the nations rise and fall
I've heard their stories, heard them all but love's the only engine of survival
Your servant here, he has been told to say it clear, to say it cold:
It's over, it ain't going any further
And now the wheels of heaven stop you feel the devil's riding crop
Get ready for the future:
it is murder

Things are going to slide ...

There'll be the breaking of the ancient western code
Your private life will suddenly explode
There'll be phantoms
There'll be fires on the road and the white man dancing You'll see a woman hanging upside down her features covered by her fallen gown and all the lousy little poets coming round tryin' to sound like Charlie Manson and the white man dancin'

Give me back the Berlin wall
Give me Stalin and St Paul
Give me Christ or give me Hiroshima
Destroy another fetus now
We don't like children anyhow
I've seen the future, baby:
it is murder

Things are going to slide ...

When they said REPENT REPENT ...

---

by Ian

> Judy wrote:
> Ian wrote:
>
> > Or to put it another way - have no regrets.
> > Regrets are the painful things about the past.
> > When G talks about changing the past, he is talking about changing regrets
>
> The Gurdjieff work isn't the only place where we are told this. It is most interesting.
> How can one live a full life for a long time and have no "regrets"?
> I'm wondering if you, Ian, or anyone else here would be so kind as to offer any additional clarifying comments please?
> Thanks for all the great posts for this week's exercise. I've been following with interest.
>
> Regards,
> Judy.

Hi Judy,

No, it's not the only place and, no, I don't think anyone can live a full life without regrets. (I haven't) Regrets (and sorrow and loss and guilt and thoughtlessness and ...) are some of our greatest teachers.

Regrets are sufferings... and are some of our greatest teachers!
But don't wallow in it. Take what you need and leave the rest...

---

by Ian

> Harry wrote:
> A quote, Judy:
>
> LEONARD COHEN LYRICS
>
> "The Future"
> ...
> Give me absolute control
> over every living soul
> And lie beside me, baby,
> that's an order!
> ...
>
> When they said REPENT REPENT ...

Thanks for posting that Harry.
Just happens to be one of my favourite songs, and it expresses many things I have trouble expressing....

Such as - the dangers and temptations that face people when entering a position of power, either in politics, business, the Work, or any other spiritual tradition, to use their position to exercise control over other people.

Another example of Gurdjieff's image-form language....

---

by Harry

Actually I think that listening to that refrain helped me get a bit of a grasp on "repent".

---

by Chuck

Nicoll says some interesting things about this. He says that the word in the Bible translated as repent (metanoia) means to think in a new way. So, "unless a man repent..." becomes unless a man thinks in a new way, he cannot gain the Kingdom of Heaven.

Ian said:

> Maybe G meant that we can change our attitudes/judgements about the past.
> Certainly we can't change the actual events.
> In any case we only have the present moment to Work within.

Thinking in a new way, and some say the phrase Kingdom of Heaven in the Bible stands for the present moment.

Judy's find that 'repent' and 'regret' had similar meanings in the old days is remarkable. Will have to research. It seems that today, 'repent' has an additional action component beyond regret: a change of mind that results in a change of action (to the extent that we can 'do' anything).

Regards,
Chuck

---

by Judy

Another comment on "having no regrets".

Twelve-step programmes say that the state of grace of having no regrets is promised, if the Steps are worked through thoroughly. This of course involves a thorough written moral inventory being worked on, followed by confession to both a Higher Power and to another trusted person, followed by literally making amends to the best of one's ability - prayer and meditation and daily spot inventories done after all that; admitting promptly when one is wrong - and last but not least, service to others on a daily basis is undertaken.
Then, if this is done, there is the statement -
"We will not regret the past, nor wish to shut the door on it" - as well as other promises.
So there is this ideal state, one of having no regrets, which is attainable as a state of grace and is the expected reward of a virtuous life.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by JohnS

Hi, Chuck;

The way I understand Nicoll's understanding of the past is that you CAN actually change it, because it has not disappeared, it is in this present moment, but it has to be able to be viewed from either a 5-dimensional point ("eternity") or 6-dimensional ("all possibilities", or unity). I know this sounds merely theoretical (though the theory makes eminent sense), but as I mentioned in an earlier post, I have (and can, now) "felt" the past as a solid force, if I am aware enough of the present moment and how it is seemingly "travelling through space". Obviously, you have to be 5-dimension-capable to be able to "do", ie change anything, and it has always impressed me how Rodney Collin describes Ouspensky's last weeks, and how he struggled greatly to change EVERYTHING, and start from a new point, ie from another dimension, outside of ordinary time, and how Rodney believed that he actually achieved this through his pushing his body through such extra suffering, and his insistence to forget absolutely eveything - meaning preconceived ideas- and begin from scratch.

The future, as we see it, also gives me a view of the life as a whole, includung the past, which is now: I am aware how some of my traits have shaped my life, and will subsequently affect my future. I am more aware of my shortcomings than my positive qualities, because its easier to see the factors in you that are hindering your future "perfect happiness". Therefore, if I can feel that my present state will affect my future state (which future is now), then vis a vis for the past.

I have to go now, and get on with my life -oops, there it goes, slipping away again, I must step backwards and fix up that bit before I travel to the right ,and forward

---

by JohnS

And Judy, I omitted to mention that the view of prayer and repentance you posted is what strikes me as exactly the method of clearing the air, and clearing the life. I have a couple of special prayers myself, but this one is pretty precious

Thanks

---

by Judy

Regarding "changing the past";

I enjoyed your description of those adventures into dimensionality, John. Mine are more limited, and consist of momentary glimpses into non-linear time. Most of these indeed occurred when I was reading Ouspensky's A New Model of the Universe and Tertium Organum, where struggling with the theory indeed caused a few momentary changes in the time-sense.

However, leaving that to one side, there is another perspective on this.

Whilst I'm unsure of the actuality of changing the past, it is indeed possible to change my reality of the past, and I do this not infrequently.
This happens when observation of a particular state (for example, confusion) is seen during self-observation. It then occurs to me that this is not an unfamiliar state; that indeed there have been many times, in quite different outer circumstances, when the inner picture has been similar. Usually then I'm reminded of some of those past situations and outer circumstances. In this way, the past changes for me, in that connections have been made and I now have a slightly more complete memory of these times; something has been uncovered and I see it.

I suppose it is a kind of memory in hindsight brought about by work in the present. It is something similar to an unusual odour bringing back memory of other times that it has been present.

Regards to All,
Judy.

---

by Chuck

On changing the past:

In Nicoll and Ouspensky's work, seems like the possibility of changing the past depends on recurrence. If you're coming 'round again, maybe something you do (with sufficient intensity) will make a difference next time.

From another perspective, the past and the future don't exist at all except as thoughts in our minds. The present is all there is, and the model we were all brought up with (that the present is a moving split-second of time that slides from past into future) may not be the best. T.S. Eliot describes where and what the present is as well as any:

> At the still point of the turning world. Neither flesh nor fleshless; Neither from nor towards; at the still point, there the dance is, But neither arrest nor movement. And do not call it fixity, Where past and future are gathered. Neither movement from nor towards, Neither ascent nor decline. Except for the point, the still point, there would be no dance, and there is only the dance. I can only say, there we have been: but I cannot say where. And I cannot say, how long, for that is to place it in time.

A bit hard to intellectually understand... which is of course, the point.

About our thoughts that form what we call past and future:
* The past - the thought that creates the 'past' depends on memory. A study was conducted pertaining to an important and dramatic event (the assassination of John F. Kennedy). The subjects were people who vividly remembered what they were doing when it occurred, and whose whereabouts at the time were verifiable. After their actual location was checked, how many had correctly remembered? As I recall (haha), about 50%.

* The future - which of us can predict it? Thinking we know even a few seconds ahead is folly. The future is just another thought in our mind.

It's been said that almost all of our thoughts are about the past or future. It's certainly true for me. Barring a small amount of reminiscing and planning, think of all the wasted energy.

C. S. Lewis: "the present is the point at which time touches eternity."

Good discussion everyone.

Regards,
Chuck

---

by Harry

Perhaps the past we have to change, first, is the one we carry around with us. We have false memories that we live with. We have lied to ourselves about so many things, that we continue reliving those lives in our memories. What happens to us if we change those memories to reality?

---

by Ian

Can anyone undo the past of their postings here?

(My backup file says - No.)

---

by JohnS

Chuck;

Thanks for the analysis. Always struggling with "the dance".

Just a note on your comment about connecting changing the past through recurrence: Ouspensky related recurrence with the 5th dimension, ie Eternity, but he also posited the 6th dimension, Unity, which, philosophically only for us mere mortals, relieves the pessimism and possible depression of the dimension below it, the eternal coming back and repeating.
Have you read Collin's "Theory of Eternal Recurrence?" His description (explained in ever-expanding steps, of course, as he always does) gives a wonderful insight into the life as a circle - related to his description in "Theory of Celestial Influences" - and how, at death, there is a "gap" then a further circle formed in the emotional and electronic worlds which form a figure-8 or eternity symbol, as the life enters the physical plane again from the opposite direction. What happens in the "top circle" is - as Gurdjieff explained - completely dependent on the state at death, the point of passing over. He relates accurately what happens in the top circle to Plato's Myth of Er, and he adds the time durations he worked out in "Celestial Influences" to make an extremely plausible emotional / intellectual case for the accuracy of this viewpoint. He strengthens it by describing and illustrating the equivalent viewpoints in other cultures throughout history: Egyptian, Buddhist, Russian Orthodox, etc.

Our time in the electronic world (if we meet the condition of consciousness of even being able to enter it) is about 8 seconds, if I recall, and about 40 seconds for the emotional world. These times relate to the "whole life flashing before your eyes" situation, and fill in the small time gap between death and rebirth.
State of consciousness at death also determines how much memory (if any) of the higher worlds can be retained. This memory is the key to development, but most of us drink the waters of Lethe.

---

by Chuck

Thanks, John for the info. I read "Celestial Influence" years ago, but not Eternal Recurrence. Perhaps it's time to become reacquainted with Rodney Collin's work.

Ian, Harry, Judy, John - what a wonderful thread, have learned a lot and have a lot to ponder. Trying to stay on the question side of things.

Regards,
Chuck

Work Program week beginning 28 December 2009

by Ian

This weeks theme: Birth

We have discovered through the use of previous programmes not only an interconnection with great nature but also a connection to the Being of All and Everything, which includes a connection to past people, places and events in our lives. We discovered a sense of obligation to play our Role in the evolution of the living universe which was accompanied by the distress of recognizing ourselves as captive organisms devoured by a living system of reciprocal maintenance. We propose to continue the investigation of our responsibilities within a living universe by:

1. each morning preparing to greet the day's allotment of suffering and joy with equanimity, that we may better hear the voice of conscience. We may prepare for this Role by entering a state of All-brains-balanced-being perseption, or Self-remembering, which involves a deep awareness of our physical, emotional and mental selves and includes a concominant awareness of our sensations, emotions and thoughts without clinging to them.

2. each day, with relaxed awareness of breathing and full body Sensing, Pondering: What effects might the influences of conscious labor and intentional suffering have on the functioning of an interconnected universe?

3. each day, when gripped by the lawful physical, emotional and intellectual tensions and stresses of life, apply relaxed awareness of breathing and full body Sensing while Pondering: Why relaxation of three centers is necessary in this Work.

4. each evening, when recapitulating or reflecting on the days tribulations, with relaxed awareness of breathing and full body Sensing, Pondering: How does self observation contribute to the growth of Being?

5. sensing that the living universe may have to do with more than organic life forms, Seekers will explore and Ponder their connection to a living universe through such things as: art, culture, law, philosophy, politics, religion, science.

6. perceiving the suffering arising from our connection to a living universe and suspecting that creative enduring of that suffering may enhance Conscience.
To this everyday suffering Seekers will apply the "Heptachord of Suffering" exercise to their daily encounters with suffering.
For example, starting from :

1. the citing an awareness of a personal holy denying suffering, followed by
2. a holy affirming of the energy spent in the suffering, resulting in

3. a holy reconciled "impartiality", making it possible to
4. curb the suffering's manifestation, then diverting the energy saved
5. to the expression of a companion chacteristic such as joy, followed by
6. a savouring of a transubstantiated comprehension between the suffering and its companion, leading to
7. a coating on an inner-being embryo often surfacing as intellectual deprivation.

7. each week, in order to promote the Role of a reverant Seeker of the universes' interconnectedness, the Seeker will compose a Prayer of Gratitude to be offered to the endless source each evening, accompanied by a full body Sensing. (Please share your prayer with other Seekers.)

---

by Gururaj

I printed out the exercise and stuck it right at eye level in my work cubicle where ,of late ,am slogging away 11 to 12 hours a day.Yet did not remain 'awake' as persistently as required.However would like to share one instance of snapping out of a morbid train of worries just as I was going off to sleep late one night last week.The saving thought was remembering an,I believe , Gurdjieff statement that the best opportunity for Work efforts is at the worst of times.I then reminded myself that the Aim at that hour is to sleep and not brood.The much needed sleep came soon after.

Regarding a prayer of gratitude ,here's one which I came across a long time ago which appealed to me because of it's impersonal / global / 'believable' nature -
" That which giveth sustenance to the universe and to ourselves,from which all doth proceed and unto which all must return-that thou art.In the golden vase of thine earthly body may the pure light of the spiritual sun shine forth That thou mayest know the truth and do thy whole duty on the journey back to the sacred seat".

---

by Ian

> Gururaj wrote:
> Regarding a prayer of gratitude ,here's one which I came across a long time ago which appealed to me because of it's impersonal / global / 'believable' nature -
> " That which giveth sustenance to the universe and to ourselves,from which all doth proceed and unto which all must return-that thou art.In the golden vase of thine earthly body may the pure light of the spiritual sun shine forth That thou mayest know the truth and do thy whole duty on the journey back to the sacred seat".

That is a really wonderful quote - do you know the source?

---

by Gururaj

No Ian , the source is not known to me.But it appears to be a transliteration of the sacred Gayathri Mantra of ancient Hindu tradition.

---

by Chuck

Looks like one source of that verse is here: http://www.phx-ult-lodge.org/eternal__verities.htm. It's number 236.

Regards,
Chuck

---

by Judy

Chuck, thanks for this reference - what a treasure-trove!
Regards,
Judy.

---

by Lift

I teach mantra yoga, including the practise of the Gayatri.
Its funny that Ian should ask for the source, when he himself chants the Gayatri, as part of my regular mantra group 😄

THE GAYATRI MANTRA

Oṁ Bhūr Bhuvaḥ Svaḥ
Tat savitur vareñyam
Bhargo devasya dīmahi
Dhiyo yo naḥ prachodayāt...Oṁ.

"We contemplate that Light of Supreme Consciousness, that our minds may merge as One with it; leading us from sickness and suffering into immortal Light."

Yet, it is not suprising, because I have been taught, and I in my turn teach, that grammatical translations are of little value. Sanskrit is a vastly subtle language and every Pundit, Guru, and Yogi will have their own interpretations.

One must practise and correctly intone the mantra, in order to experience its true inner meaning, which will then reveal itself to your heart and soul. The sound and the vibration it causes will teach you far more than any words. Involving the intellect in precise translations, and the meaning of each syllable of every word, will only take you further from that which should be your goal.

Om Shanti

---

by Judy

Lift wrote:

> Involving the intellect in precise translations, and the meaning of each syllable of every word, will only take you further from that which should be your goal.

Yes, sometimes this can also be applicable to parts of Beelzebub's Tales, for example, and many other "eternal verities"; and not losing sight of this brings light to many single words of some depth - repent is a recent one we've mentioned. True, both methods are useful sometimes. In playing a piece of music, I was taught to learn and master the technique and meanings (eg; appogiatura) in order to forget them in the playing.

Yes, Gururaj, it is a beautiful quote.
Good to hear from you too, Lift.
Regards,
Judy.

---

by Lift

Judy wrote

> in order to forget them in the playing

Thats an interesting concept, and one that would resonate in my mantra group.
One regular member observed, that she had to stop looking at the word sheet, and just 'trust to her self' to chant correctly, and other people agreed. The mind is a terrible obstacle at times, even though it can be a useful instrument in certain circumstances. We have to know when to use our intellect and when to drop it. It is only a tool, yet it too easily assumes command. We must within our daily sadhana (spritiual practise) make some exercise that de-thrones the intellectual ego, because it is a terrible master.

Work Program week beginning 4 January 2010

by Ian

This weeks theme: New Horizons

Seasoned Seekers will be prepared to endure with equanimity the sacrifices and deprivations required for a prolonged voyage across the tumultuous seas of life towards the calm shore of Being.

With Conscience as their compass, Seekers will prepare a fit and hearty vessel for the rough seas ahead by sacrificing the use of a favorite stimulant for the following week. whenever magnetic anomalies affect the accuracy of their compass, conscientious Seekers will remember their responsibility towards their small portion cargo of Great Being by raising their Sightless Gaze towards the sun and murmuring silently to themselves, "It is nothing - I will be, it is nonsense - I can do, it recedes - I am", whilst maintaining a solid and all encompassing awareness of their 'ship of bones', that is, their physical body.

Each morning before embarking on the sea of life, Seekers will weigh their anchors, set their sails and calibrate their instruments of navigation to their present position by relaxing in an All-brains-balanced three-centered way and asking with measured breath "Who am I?" while visualizing an illuminated cargo radiating throughout their vessel.

When traversing calm open seas, the All-brains-balanced-seeker may replenish their vessels' energy stores by opening wide their vessels'port-holes and hatches of sensation and employing a Soundless Sound and Sightless Gaze to collect the energy of impressions.

When navigating narrow, treacherous straits, alert seekers will 'sound' their way past the shoals and reefs of pride, arrogance, bossiness and self-justification by taking a deep breath and intoning three times "po-do-bo-li-zo-va-ny", while Sightlessly Gazing and Sensing their 'ship of bones'.

Once committed to a prolonged voyage, Seekers must avoid the mirages of false harbors in the lands of knowing, judging and concluding. Keeping a question always on their bow, Seekers will attempt to pierce the veils of illusion on their voyage towards reality by asking, each time that they are so tempted by the safe harbours of knowing, judging and concluding, "What has been overlooked? Could I be wrong?", while attending to an abiding presence of consciousness with full 'ship of bones' Sensing.

Occasionally, sails billowed by the ill winds of negative emotion, the vessel is driven off it's course. Not to worry - the accomplished mariner has learned how to sail against the winds of egoism, inconvenience, euphoria, anger and disappointment. The order goes out: all hands on deck; the sails are trimmed, the rudder is set and apparent adversity is put to advantage by a conscious Arrirmation to adopt an intentional posture combined with an Illuminated 'ship of bones' Sensing, and a Sightless Gaze of the horizon.

While braving the vicissitudes of the icebergs, hurricanes, tornados and tidal waves of envy, jealousy, lust and greed the weathered Seeker will batten the hatches in order to calmly endure the turmoil while maintaining a calm exterior and directing the energy thus saved into a well conceived, calm, centered counter-image of Being combined with an awareness of their breath.

Whenever an unruly crew threatens mutiny and the compromise of the integrity of their course through the miraculous seas of life by neglecting their responsibilities, sleeping during their watch or stepping out of line, the uncompromising Seeker will administer the punishment of visualizing their decaying corpse being devoured by ravenous sharks, whilst Sensing their 'ship of bones'.

Each evening after sunset, Seekers will maintain their course towards Being by setting their astrolabes on the constellations of faith, hope, love and compassion by Pondering, in a relaxed All-brains-balanced manner: "Is faith more than belief; is hope more than expectation; is love more than tenderness; is compassion more than empathy?"

Each night as Seekers prepare to drop their anchor and renew their strength for the day ahead, they will visualize their flotsam and jetsam of egoism, hate, revenge, anticipated pleasures and rooted beliefs, as detritus sinking to the bottom of the sea, to be transformed by bottom feeders whose unseen planetary function within an interconnected universe attests to the panoramic brilliance of an Omnipresence, which we may learn to sense through the practices of All-brains-balanced-being-perception.

***

Links to exercises mentioned:
http://endlesssearch.co.uk/exercises_sensing.htm
http://endlesssearch.co.uk/exercises_attention.htm
http://endlesssearch.co.uk/exercises_pondering.htm
http://endlesssearch.co.uk/exercises_impressions.htm
http://endlesssearch.co.uk/exercises_repetition.htm

---

by Judy

Hello All,
I haven't begun the above yet - will do so today. Meantime, I've been working on the following which I read at What is the Work, so thought I'd paste a copy here.

> Ruth wrote:
>
> Each week we can try to work on an attitude that we have, not because the attitude is right or wrong but as an external line of work –a focus that gives shocks and material -to work on being present inwardly.

My name is Judith. I am a member of Ian's Endless Search online Work group, which has been invaluable and provided sustenance and suitable work conditions for almost five years for me. However, I look at the suggested weekly exercises here at What is the Work, and sometimes add one to the daily routine. I added the above.

I chose to wait for an attitude to appear in the usual routine. It didn't take long. I had an appointment and in choosing what to wear, the choice was partly determined by the attitude of "I don't iron". Yes, it leapt out at me. So in doing some conscious ironing, being mindful and in the moment and sensing the body and in particular the hands, some real experience occurred. The senses were bombarded with different textures, smells, temperatures, visual satisfactions of going from rough to smooth, auditory hisses of steam, following right through to a little bonus of the small task well done.

This external line of work led to some observation and inquiry into that particular attitude later. It is embarrassing to admit that it was traced back to egoic pride, amongst other obvious aspects such as my organism telling me that it didn't like to iron. In spite of the fact that each day I use some means - whether a prayer for all sentient beings or similar - of reducing the ego, reducing myself in size, so to speak, as my efforts have to be accompanied by some true humility; yes, in spite of this, that attitude had progressed to affecting action and has done so without my considering it properly, for a long time.

Thanks, Ruth. There were indeed shocks, and much material provided for further inner work.
Regards,
Judith.

Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by Cassandra

I've managed to do some of these exercises the past couple of weeks. I've given up sweets (cakes, cookies, candy, etc.) for a while, probably until around Easter, despite being tempted by two birthday cakes recently. But the giving up of sweets is as much tied to ego as anything. I'd like to weigh 125 lbs, fashionably thin. So maybe I should go on a slovenly spree where I gain weight and look bad for a while, just to see how my ego deals with that. But I'm sure I won't.

On a more positive note, I have noticed some changes in my being SOMETIMES. I feel/sense a greater acceptance of my many Is and am less intimidated by other personalities. I have more confidence in facing mildly unpleasant situations; concerned a bit less with taking the seat of honor (less internal considering).

Work Program week beginning 11 January 2010

---

by Harry

This weeks theme: The following is from the Path of the Kwajagan as reported by Bennett in Making a New World.

1. Be present at every breath. Do not let your attention wander for the duration of a single breath. Remember yourself always and in all situations

2. Keep your intention before you at every step you take. You wish for freedom and you must never forget it.

3. Your journey is toward your homeland. Remember that you are traveling from the World of Appearances to the World of Reality.

4. Solitude in the crowd. In all your outward activity remain inwardly free. Learn not to identify yourself with anything whatsoever.

5. Remember your Friend, i.e., God. Let the prayer of your tongue be the prayer of your heart.

6. Return to God. No aim but to attain Reality.

7. Struggle with all alien thoughts. Keep your mind on what you are doing, whether outwardly or inwardly.

8. Be constantly aware of the quality of the Divine Presence. Become used to recognizing the presence of God in your heart.

---

by Gururaj

"Be present at every breath. Do not let your attention wander for the duration of a single breath. Remember yourself always and in all situations"
The elusiveness of getting a "taste" of this (novice that I am) set me off on, first a search in the archives of our group ,and then a Google search of the phrase "self remembering"- mainly to read about how seekers have wrestled with this and to get some pointers for making the right effort.The only prior idea about this for me was from reading Ouspensky's experience in "The search...".From this week's brief 'Googling' ,the next useful pointer I got was Mme Ouspensky qouting Gurdjieff's statement that the characteristic of true self-remembering is experiencing ourself objectively simultaneously with the objects and persons around us in that moment.Eventually my pondering on this aspect has suggested a possible "posture" - Instead of dividing attention to the 'inner' and 'outer' can I always consider everything as the 'outer' including my feelings,thoughts and sensations - since they are as 'watchable' as the so-called outer world .Holding this for a very short while appeared to be effective in non-identifying.But I better keep at it "always and in all situations" before sharing anything really worthwhile.Would surely welcome the insights/experiences of others in this community.

---

by Harry

Short moments are all you should expect early on. Even later, at every breath is a long term on the horizon goal. Energy is a big part of this. You indicate you read O. He deals much with the energy that is needed to Work.

---

by Ian

> Gururaj wrote:
> "Be present at every breath. Do not let your attention wander for the duration of a single breath. Remember yourself always and in all situations"
> The elusiveness of getting a "taste" of this (novice that I am) set me off on, first a search in the archives of our group ,and then a Google search of the phrase "self remembering"- mainly to read about how seekers have wrestled with this and to get some pointers for making the right effort.The only prior idea about this for me was from reading Ouspensky's experience in "The search...".From this week's brief 'Googling' ,the next useful pointer I got was Mme Ouspensky qouting Gurdjieff's statement that the characteristic of true self-remembering is experiencing ourself objectively simultaneously with the objects and persons around us in that moment.Eventually my pondering on this aspect has suggested a possible "posture" - Instead of dividing attention to the 'inner' and 'outer' can I always consider everything as the 'outer' including my feelings,thoughts and sensations - since they are as 'watchable' as the so-called outer world .Holding this for a very short while appeared to be effective in non-identifying.But I better keep at it "always and in all situations" before sharing anything really worthwhile.Would surely welcome the insights/experiences of others in this community.

Another angle on this - you might want to look into Tantra Nyasa. This resonances to what we call Sensing in the Work. Sensing is the bedrock of self-remembering.

Work Program week beginning 18 January 2010

---

by Ian

When walking down the street, add a little swagger to your walk.

When conversing with people, move your head from side to side and gesticulate with your hands to emphasise your opinion.

When eating, use your fingers instead of forks, spoons or knives.

When breathing, breath a little deeper into your solar plexus and prolong your outbreath with a prayer or mantra.

When paying for goods in a store, spill your money all over the counter. Appologize profusly to the clerk.

When driving your car, wait a few seconds before proceeding forward from a green light.

When interacting with authority figures (eg. boss; wife; store clerk; government official; etc.) argue over a trivial point.

Arrive at your job late. If questioned, make up an outlandish excuse.

Wear a piece of clothing you would never normally wear.

Shave your head or grow a beard.

Every night before sleep, ever mindful of the Merciless Heropass and Mister Death, ask: "What can I give up - the absence of which will serve as a constant reminder to remember myself - while groping through the veil of illusion and false Roles behind which I am otherwise destined to remain?"

---

by Gururaj

> Ian wrote:
> Shave your head or grow a beard.
> Every night before sleep, ever mindful of the Merciless Heropass and Mister Death, ask: "What can I give up - the absence of which will serve as a > constant reminder to remember myself - while groping through the veil of illusion and false Roles behind which I am otherwise destined to remain?"

"Off with the moustache" was my decision a few days ago and after a few moments' hesitation ,during the morning shave routine,it was gone .On day one thereafter, I was expecting comments on the new look and had 'considered' some replies before-hand.About a day or two later,i more often had to remember that I had a new appearance when folks commented about it.But there were many moments (of self-love) when I wondered looking at the mirror wheteher this suited me better or when someone said that I am smarter.Self-love it will be,I reckon, if I get attached to this new appearance.All-in-all , a jolt to get some glimpses of inner workings.

Work Program week beginning 25 January 2010

---

by Ian

Theory of Celestial Love

Monday - Ponder: Is helping to bear the suffering of Endlessness and act of love?
Tuesday - Ponder: Can you bestow as much love as you receive from Endlessness on other people?
Wednesday - Ponder: Is the love between man and Endlessness balanced by reciprocal maintenance?
Thursday - Ponder: Is love subject to Newton's 3rd law of motion, which states that for every action their is an equal and opposite reaction?

Friday - Ponder: Is love subject to the Second Law of Thermodynamics?

Practice each of the 5 Ponderings 3 times each day, morning, noon and evening. Each time, enter a state of All-brains-balanced-being-perception, coupled with full body sensing, an awarness of breathing, and a Sightless Gaze and Soundless Sound.

On Saturday and Sunday, go for a 15 minute walk and use the 12 Joint Exercise.

---

by Gururaj

"Monday - Ponder: Is helping to bear the suffering of Endlessness and act of love?"
Feeling takes you forward a little way ;will, much more but without love it becomes a chore;action from feeling and will fused by love for the Work for its own sake seems more aligned to Endlessness' purpose,thereby reducing the suffering of Endlessness ? It made me question what truly are my motivations for Working.

"Tuesday - Ponder: Can you bestow as much love as you receive from Endlessness on other people?"
To some human extent,provided the "usual I " is out of the way.

"Wednesday - Ponder: Is the love between man and Endlessness balanced by reciprocal maintenance?"
When I am not at ease,disease sets in.When I harm others,retribution follows or suffering spreads with its consequences.Are these not manifestations of reciprocal maintenance.

"Thursday - Ponder: Is love subject to Newton's 3rd law of motion, which states that for every action their is an equal and opposite reaction? "
Love usually begets love

Friday - Ponder: Is love subject to the Second Law of Thermodynamics?
That is,eventually the same energy/being prevails in all everywhere ? I trust the Endlessness is an infinite source and will not dissipate.So its upto man to either evolve ,if the luxury of time is available,or perish.

"On Saturday and Sunday, go for a 15 minute walk and use the 12 Joint Exercise"
I wonder whether it was just the walk or the 12 joint attention(done for the first time) or both,a nagging ,sort of water-logged sensation in my right ear is considerably better, reversing a worsening trend.

Work Program week beginning 1 February 2010

---

by Ian

In the morning, sit quietly for 10 minutes. Sense your spine and skull and be aware of your thinking center as an apparatus for labeling and identifying the impressions collected by your various senses. Resist the tendancy of the intellectual center to label and identify impressions - merely observe the stream of impressions.

Throughout the day, continue to merely observe the stream of impressions.

Whenever you feel angry or tense, intentionally endure the suffering by relaxing your abdomen. As you breathe, sense and visualize the movement of your diaphragm.

At mid-day, bring yourself to a three centered state and evoke an inner smile as well.

Evening Pondering: Can I be impartial towards external impressions?

---

by Harry

Challenge:

If this forum means anything to readers, answer something, an impression, a description of your attempt, even disagreement if you have good reason, within two days.

---

by Karen

> Resist the tendancy of the intellectual center to label and identify impressions - merely observe the stream of impressions.

Merely observe the stream. Ok this is literally impossible at this time, and truely shows how tangled I am in the web of associations.

Every impression, and every word has a vibration that carries with it an association based on my experiences. Amazing how everything receives a label.

However, I did notice the intellectual center in a moment of confusion (or was it the intellectual center). I glanced over at something quickly while shoveling snow and thought it was a dead mouse. I reacted immediately. Body jumped back, muscles tensed, heart racing, stomach knotted...only to look again and see that it was a small pile of dried up leaves. And even if it had been a mouse, what was all the panic about anyway (that tangled web)

Thanks for the prompt Harry. I still need a push start to get my ass in gear (aweful, but true)

---

by Alistair

Been reading lots of the posts on BT from when the group began
Having read it twice including the second read aloud and now about to start Chapter 34 for the 3rd time the Sufi saying comes to mind
To some people I have come a long way to others I haven't done anything at all
When does the analysis of Chapter 29 begin?
You've all made some fantastic contributions thank you so much
Harry's right, davai

Yes Karen the Law of Association indeed the first to be mentioned in BT is incredibly powerful Take comfort that at least you can sometimes recognise it's existence

---

by Ian

> Karen wrote:
>
> > Merely observe the stream. Ok this is literally impossible at this time, and truely shows how tangled I am in the web of associations.
> >
> > Every impression, and every word has a vibration that carries with it an association based on my experiences. Amazing how everything receives a label.

I think/feel that it is important to at least acknowledge the possibility of merely observing the "labeling" function of the intellect, and realize that is what it is doing automatically, rather than trying forcefully to circimvent that function.

Regards
Ian

---

by Ian

>

> Alistair wrote:
> When does the analysis of Chapter 29 begin?

Fred is working on that as we speak. He should have some real gems for us to consider soon....

Regards
Ian

---

by Judy

Ian wrote:

> In the morning, sit quietly for 10 minutes. Sense your spine and skull and be aware of your thinking center as an apparatus for labeling and identifying the impressions collected by your various senses. Resist the tendancy of the intellectual center to label and identify impressions - merely observe the stream of impressions.

I am currently working on sensing exercises, after being given an expanded view of them through reading Jean Vaysse's "Toward Awakening" again. I'll post a short quote from it below, after a couple of comments.

Firstly: there have been moments when the associative labelling has ceased while doing the above exercise. Of course it begins again. However, what I have noticed is a kind of fear and confusion during these times. It feels as if I am disappearing into "vagueness". Then I see much justification by the intellectual centre, such as "Of course you don't want to not use labels - you know the memory works by labels mostly - so without labels you'll have no memory of this by this means - so why would you want to proceed?" - and so on and so on.
I am hoping for some comments on this state, as understanding it may assist going through it. At least I do see it quite clearly now.

Secondly: Harry, you are absolutely correct. We are so far apart physically, that to help each other, posting even the smallest comment or impression can serve the purpose. It lets the others know that at least we are working on the exercise. Thanks for the reminder.

Here's a quote from Jean Vaysse which helped clarify my sensing exercises and actually is leading to my being able to use any strong sensory change in the body during the day as a reminder to self-remember. I am being woken up more frequently than if waiting just for the intellect to do this. I guess it is a bit like a rubber band on the wrist or a stone in the shoe, only more general. Sensing the hands in particular works very well.

pp149-150 "Toward Awakening".
"If we wish to study the body - or at least to begin with - its moving function, its movement - we must, first of all, be related to it. What relates us to the body is the sensation we have of it - the inner perception of my physical being, the physical sensation of myself. But sensation has an even greater importance because, if our aim is simply to develop a stable presence in ourselves, the sensation of our physical being is an inherent part of this. It is the most concrete and easily controlled part.
We always have some sensation of our body; otherwise, our postures could not be maintained, our movements would be made haphazardly, or not at all. But we are not conscious of this sensation, we are unaware of it, except in extreme situations when an unusual effort is required or when something suddenly goes badly or goes wrong. The rest of the time we forget about it. In order to know and observe ourselves and to study our body, and later to support our work, we need to have this sensation. This demand calls for a new relationship to come into existence for me:
I - conscious of - my sensation.
Actually, much more than just a new connection is involved. Really, a new situation arises within us in this effort and, undoubtedly, this is what is most important, but we do not yet have enough actual experience to speak of it."

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Lift

> Harry wrote:
> If this forum means anything to readers, answer something, an impression, a description of your attempt, even disagreement if you have good reason, within two days.

Those forum members who come and drink from the well, but do nothing to replenish its waters, have no understanding of the Law of Reciprocal Maintenance.

They may believe that they do no harm by passively lurking. In fact they diminish not only this group, but themselves, by making no effort to post regularly. If they continue to post nothing, they will be rewarded for their inaction by the well running dry.

Om Shanti
Lift

---

by Harry

Karen,

The stream is what you are caught up in. This is a step of separation. It might be considered a first step. Realize that it isn't you. It Is Not. You. Things will flow. You can watch the water go by. That doesn't mean you won't get wet. But it means you will not drown.

---

by Harry

Another thing that can help is to try to find the Work in other sources of life. See what you can see in film. The Matrix, for example. Or read some author who is beyond the ordinary. Don DeLillo just published a new novel. Omega Point. Or listen to Rolling Stones lyrics and try to figure out how Mick and Keith were enlightened sometime in their life.

Leonard Cohen just received a lifetime acheivement award. Not sure if it was at the Grammys. But try to find how my different sources in ordinary life he has touched with his insights of Zen.

---

by Karen

Ian Wrote:

> I think/feel that it is important to at least acknowledge the possibility of merely observing the "labeling" function of the intellect, and realize that is what it is doing automatically, rather than trying forcefully to circimvent that function.

Good point Ian. I think I was jumping the gun on wording of my post. In quiet moments of meditation, the stream of thoughts, feelings, emotions, and sensations surface and I become more aware of their existence as each pass through me one after another. To merely observe the stream is possible. To do anything about it, like you said, to try and forcefully circumvent that function...well.

When in a centered state, I just acknowledge the flow and let it float on by like clouds. But how often do I actually acheive this!

Harry Wrote:

> The stream is what you are caught up in. This is a step of separation. It might be considered a first step. Realize that it isn't you. It Is Not. You. Things will flow. You can watch the water go by. That doesn't mean you won't get wet. But it means you will not drown.

Thank you for this reminder. When asleep it’s easy to forget this.

---

by Judy

Harry, I really like this metaphor:

> The stream is what you are caught up in. This is a step of separation. It might be considered a first step. Realize that it isn't you. It Is Not. You. Things will flow. You can watch the water go by. That doesn't mean you won't get wet. But it means you will not drown.

In yesterday's sitting, I watched the fear happening and quietly let it flow by. Then there was quite an extended "to-ing and fro-ing" into and out of presence.
I have experienced this before, but it has usually been facilitated by, for example, an Eckhart Tolle tape or similar (there is a most effective one called "Voluntary and Involuntary Portals into Presence"). These sensing exercises are enabling me to go there under my own steam, so to speak, whenever I wish and place attention correctly. As the quality of the sensing improves, so the suitable situations and outside sets of circumstances increase.
Ironically, a preliminary step involved the renaming of "vagueness" (what the intellectual centre seemed to be afraid of) to "presence".

And Lift, thank you for the reciprocal maintenance reminder. Yes indeed.

In addition, this opportunity to post is precious; for me, having to write clarifies my own thoughts considerably, and puts more good orderly direction into practice. The reading and writing goes back and forth with actual experience for progress to be made. The Work is a vast interconnected whole. Thus another menber's questions will improve and clarify my own questions. This week - thanks, Karen and Harry.

Regards to all,
Judy.

---

by Harry

Judy,

There is also a step when you begin to see, or more correctly, sense events happening. Sense that they are flowing around you. And pulling you toward them. It's important to remember that if it is bigger than you it is impossible to resist. But you can become not involved. Like Dorthy who rode the tornado to OZ.

---

by Lawrick

I agree Harry. This most important of the ES Forums must be the first consideration of the group. For the past 6 weeks I've personally almost ignored it.
A New Year, time for a new start…..again.

> Ian wrote:
> In the morning, sit quietly for 10 minutes. Sense your spine and skull and be aware of your thinking center as an apparatus for labeling and identifying the impressions collected by your various senses. Resist the tendancy of the intellectual center to label and identify impressions - merely observe the stream of impressions

The calm that accompanies this exercise also allows some examination of the internal dialogue "pop-ups" which provide a window into some of the anxieties lurking behind the "screen". I must discipline a student tomorrow….I need to spend more time with my niece and husband……an outrageous power bill. I watch them pass. I am aware of the general being peace that frequently comes along with the exercises.
I am also aware of a dynamic aura of life that surrounds and fills my environment. Life shimmers. Really!

I know that I have not been "here" for many weeks and feel remorse for my lack of effort.

> Ian wrote:
> Whenever you feel angry or tense, intentionally endure the suffering by relaxing your abdomen. As you breathe, sense and visualize the movement of your diaphragm.

I was visiting my niece a few weeks ago where she pointed out that my demeanour had shifted into an observably negative state, something that I have diligently worked against in my time with the forum. So I became ill and complacent, and within a few weeks the old habits emerged with all their negative consequences. I also observed while in this state, that my being in existence had weakened and left me with a real sense of emptiness, loss of purpose, and a loss of passion and joy for my life. Fuethermore I was surprised to see just how violent, murderous, my reactions were even to the less irritating impressions. I well know that though the exercises can be difficult in both beginning and maintenance, they also bring a greater awareness of my life and the surrounding conditions.

So why would does it always take the easy path of least resistance, ignorance and complacency.

I don’t know. I do know I’m capable of changing the situation and will attempt to be more responsible in this forum. I wonder if the others have further comment regarding the situation.

Lawrick

---

by Lawrick

Alistair,

If you have not received a notice, Chapter 29 is now on the air. Reading ahead is good but, the idea is to move on chapter by chapter for the time being. I've been negligent in not posting sooner.

Lawrick

---

by Karen

Harry wrote:

> There is also a step when you begin to see, or more correctly, sense events happening. Sense that they are flowing around you. And pulling you toward them.

I often feel this invisible tug, most frequently with my son and my mother. Almost like a game of go fish.They cast their line or throw the net and wait to reel in their catch.

I am able to dodge the little things now...for the most part. Sometimes I play along and simply observe, but often get caught in the 'net'.

Since entering the work, I've been graced with an increasing ability to sense one's true intentions and see more than before. The magnification has increased. Picking up on a person's thoughts, how they are feeling, emotionally and physically. Sometimes even feeling their physical pain in my body. This has been an eye opener and can be exhausting and confusing at times. A burden and a gift. Does this have something to do with the Teskooano?

---

by Judy

Harry wrote:

>

> There is also a step when you begin to see, or more correctly, sense events happening. Sense that they are flowing around you. And pulling you toward them. It's important to remember that if it is bigger than you it is impossible to resist. But you can become not involved. Like Dorthy who rode the tornado to OZ.

Ah - this actually happens quite regularly, Harry. Thanks for helping me to join some dots.

I notice it very often when I am around children. I refer to it as "that moment of choice". For example, yesterday a friend and I were chatting and having coffee. She has three children aged 2, 8 and 10. It was 36 degrees Celcius outside, so we were sheltering in the air-conditioned living room. After an hour or so, the noise became simply too loud. Then came my "moment of choice"  . I could either become negative or detach/separate, work out a suitable plan (ride the tornado like Dorothy), staying calm and pleasantly positive with perhaps a little humour to help things along. Kate (friend) and I exchanged wry glances amid the din and said sweetly that we would all go in the car now (going to "crisis-couselling" was a little insider adult joke). We both knew their lack of concentration after a long time in a confined space was "too big to resist", I suppose. Anyway, we all adjourned to a local shopping mall for a while. Although negativity around children isn't an option as they could become fearful if their adults aren't seen to be coping, there is still that "moment of choice" as to one's own action/reaction. Much loss of energy is prevented in detaching from negative Is, as always.

Judy.

---

by Judy

Postscript to the above;
I probably should mention, just to tie up some loose ends, that the above post connects to an earlier comment about utilising any assaults on the senses to remind me to wake up and work!

Go into presence, remember myself, just be in the body, sense the hands and so on.

As "Ruth" says so beautifully this week on What is the Work site -
To Be - in my life.

I'll add her bonus wprk suggestions here, as there is provision for sharing or twittering even....

> Work without Expectations in an unknown land.
>
> At the beginning I believe that the work is going to improve my image (= what I imagine) -that is, my standing in the eyes of others, and lessen what I suffer from the mistakes made “in my name” because of my state of sleep, which become increasingly painful as I have more flickering moments of awakening.
> But -harm was never my intention!

Is there any way I can put right the faults? Why not?
Something fundamental is lacking.
Disappointment seems to be unavoidable. In fact it can feed me.
Even if I'm not among others when I work, my search for direction brings me into my body, its sensations and impressions, -the only reliable ground where I can return with attention and begin to know that something of real life is present.
To Be -in my life.

When I conclude the silent preparing exercise every morning can I foresee any difficult situations in my day and resolve to accept what will happen at those moments while maintaining the sensation of the energy present in my vertebral column?
No expectations but to explore an unknown land...

In this way, second by second, I might be contributing to the evolving processes that transform our solar system, not just taking away their energy.

"Ruth"

Truly, as Lawrick mentions, life does indeed shimmer sometimes, and conditions and assistance race toward you from everywhere.

J.

---

by Harry

It is interesting to see so called normal reactions. My son and I have been dealing with my mother dying. She has had an inoperable cancer for over a year now. But in the last two months it has begun to impact her living more than before. She has become more child like in these months. And I don't mean "be like unto little children". But she has become like a little child in a negative way. My son is actually better at dealing with her than I am. As the "so called administrator" I'm the one who has to deal with the ordinary life things. And be direct.

I also know much more history than he does. She will often call now and ask if he is here. (He's living with me for the time being.)

One of the most interesting things is to see the sine curve in her life. Thursday she had a very good day. So I've come to expect the next day will be horrible. True enough she called in the late afternoon, during a snow storm, "I just feel horrible." And she let herself go with that feeling and made herself feel horribler. She has medication for this anxiety, but almost refuses to take it unless conjoled into taking it. My son spent a half hour talking her into taking the pill that would make her feel a little better.

Later he called her back. "I just decided to bull my way through it," she told him. He asked if she'd taken the pill. Yes she had. But that hadn't made a difference. It was that she decided she wasn't going to feel bad.

I have a friend who has to make a decision about pulling the plug on his mother. He has said this to me over and over "Whoever designed the exist strategy screwed up royally."

I never tell him my answer. That it is us who have screwed up royally. We haven't prepared for our own exit strategies. I hope someone reminds me in the not too distant future when I face that same exit.

---

by Alistair

Evening Pondering: Can I be impartial towards external impressions?
Every workgroup post is an external impression received?
It’s not so easy to read Harry’s last post without feeling some sympathy for all the characters
That’s not impartial?
So at the moment if the workgroup posts are external impressions and the feeling of sympathy is not impartial then simply based on Harry’s last post my answer to the evening pondering must be, no.

---

by JohnS

This outsider sympathy thing is truly difficult. Gurdjieff seemed to have no mercy for the feeling of pity, calling it basically a rejoicing by the ego that its someone else suffering and not me. For an ordinary surprisingly-uncompassionate person like myself, I find it hard to be non-objective in tragic times, except when I'm really pushed and involved, because its the one time I believe myself to have objectivity, but I'm also astounded at what may seem to be my hard-heartedness. Not to other people, but I'm surprised at myself.
I have two friends at the moment: one just dead and another suffering badly. I feel guilty at not feeling more grief, because I know that a truly-directed depth of feeling can actually help the soul in trouble. But I don't trust the intention of my grief.

Regarding the evening pondering: I had a damn good battle last night with the deadline of live vs awareness, trying to feel how there MUST be a way for lifesaving awareness to hang around more permanently. Awareness lost, as usual, when I decided to sleep on it -again the coward's way out.

---

by Alistair

In Search of the Miraculous, Chapter 1
G called the man weak because he considered others
''considering' that attitude which creates inner slavery, inner dependence'

I need to view Harry's predicament more impatially
If I was Harry it would be more difficult to no have no consideration for my mother
Must we abstain from any emotional feeling toward our closest friends & family regardless of their predicament?

A quotation here from the Hadith Chapter 7, the words of the Prophet.
The signs of misfortune lie in four conditions: eyes that have never experienced tears, a heart that is cruel and hard, long chains of desires that never end, and wishing for an extremely prolonged life.

Eyes would only experience tears as a result of considering?
How else?

---

by AlbertoB

About the stream of impressions: during this week I could feel several times the urge and the stimulus of the physical body like an "external stimulus" not belonging to me, as to say, coming from another centre. It was impossible to feel tha same about "motive" impressions.

About pondering: nothing similar to impartiality, too difficult, but this pondering could be some kind of negative force in a future triad.

---

by Ian

> Alistair wrote:
> Eyes would only experience tears as a result of considering?
> How else?

Alister, I think I hear where you are coming from, or hear the point you are trying to make... correct me if wrong...

On one hand this Work asks us to be impartial (does that mean cold and calculating?).
On the other hand , this Work asks us to be more emotional.

You ask - "Must we abstain from any emotional feeling toward our closest friends & family regardless of their predicament?"

No, I don't think so. I think it would be a "sin" not to.

As far as I have been able to determine, Gurdjieff cared a lot about his family and friends, and was extremely "warm" towards them.

The Pondering about being impartial towards impressions was directed more towards general day-to-day impressions, outside the scope of personal relationships or Work exchanges. Thank you for pointing out my impreciseness.

---

by Gururaj

The well of the ES online group is deep ,with participation stretching back at-least 5 years with Ian's indefatigable maintenance.
Right now its brimming thanks to Harry's 'Challenge'.Hey,is'nt this my intellectual centre doing its thing ?But I must acknowledge the contribution of all especially to this exercise thereby bringing almost the same value as a live meeting.
On all days,except one,after reading the exercise,I did the morning part of the exercise.During the day,the discovery made was that ,the inputs from the 5 senses were just that (inputs) but the chief mischief maker was the interpreter,the mind/emotion complex which left me wet many a time and deeply drowned too,a few times(nice metaphor ,Harry).Thank Endlessness,the 'me' surfaces somehow,all the more so because of Work participation.
Like Lawrick,I do face the anguish of not being awake more often.An affirmation which helped me somewhat this week was to consider that being a Work warrior or a devoted seeker is my topmost priority in life and not the usual way of life involvement.Let everything else be subordinate to this.
Thanks,Judy for referring to TA by Jean Vaysse.I mentioned to an Essence friend in the city where I live (do you refer to a fellow seeker like that ?) that I would like to read that book and quite fortuitously it is available to me now.
Guru

---

by Alistair

> Ian wrote:
>
> > Alistair wrote:
> > Eyes would only experience tears as a result of considering?
> > How else?
>
> Alister, I think I hear where you are coming from, or hear the point you are trying to make... correct me if wrong...
>
> On one hand this Work asks us to be impartial (does that mean cold and calculating?).
> On the other hand , this Work asks us to be more emotional.

You ask - "Must we abstain from any emotional feeling toward our closest friends & family regardless of their predicament?"

No, I don't think so. I think it would be a "sin" not to.

As far as I have been able to determine, Gurdjieff cared a lot about his family and friends, and was extremely "warm" towards them.

The Pondering about being impartial towards impressions was directed more towards general day-to-day impressions, outside the scope of personal relationships or Work exchanges.
Thank you for pointing out my impreciseness.

Ian I think you may have been quite correct initially not at all imprecise as it may well highlight the following

Does this draw our attention to the right work of centres. Emotional feeling as opposed to intellectual consideration. Consideration is the work of the intellectual centre?
This is maybe where my hard-heart finds difficulty, doesn't feel sympathy/empathy with the emotional centre but the mind is conditioned to believe that one should feel sympathy for another in difficulty therefore the thinking centre operates when it shouldn't.
Now there is the wish to ask is there something that can be done specifically to work on this ISOTM Chapter 1 'man's chief delusion is his conviction that he can do. all people want to do the first question people ask it what they are to do.....nobody can do anything
Is it simply an achievement to be conscious of the wrong working of centres?

---

by Cassandra

In recent months, I've found it more difficult not to identify. I became irritated last week with someone talking on a cell phone while driving and not signaling before she moved in front of me; I rode up besider her and shouted "hang up the phone," and bothered again yesterday at the grocery store when the bagger asked "is plastic okay?" Seems everyone should know plastic isn't good for the environment.

In both cases, I labelled and identified completely. But I often feel that I'm the lone voice of conscious (I know that's arrogant), but I've been trying this exercise for at least 2 weeks and have learned something about intentional suffering and taking the seat NOT of honor.

Thanks for all your postings.

Work Program week beginning 8 February 2010

---

by Ian

During the day, imagine that you are a conduit or conductor of energy between the earth and sky - hell and heaven. Try to sense the current of energy up and down your body. Pondeer: Are there a positive and negative poles between earth and sky?

When lying in bed, morning and evening, imagine that you are a magnet. Try and sense your alignment between the earth and sky.

As you breathe, try to sense a concurrent breathing through the pores of your skin.

Use your opposite hand for a day.

Think opposite thoughts for a day.

Feel opposite emotions for a day.

---

by Harry

Let's keep the momentum going. Lets not let the Work Group be deflected.

Observation about breathing: G's discussion of three foods seemed astounding years ago. But implicitly correct. My mother has problems with breathing due to her disease. I've noticed sitting with her, that when she doesn't breath well, then her mental acuity suffers. She gets confused and can't really bring her mind together. About a month ago the local hospice delivered an oxygen machine. No one asked for it. She didn't want it. But now she uses it, not as much to fully get her breath as to feed her brain. She would never define it like that.

As to the other part of Ian's breathing through the pores. If you've done the sweating exercises that are described in many of the books, sat in a sauna or a sweat house, you begin to understand this well. My son has been home for a bit, as I've explained. And he almost daily sweats out his body. The bathroom wall paper doesn't like it. But I remember doing the same thing when I was his age.

---

by Karen

> During the day, imagine that you are a conduit or conductor of energy between the earth and sky - hell and heaven. Try to sense the current of energy up and down your body.

When sensing the journey of the breath through the body from the head down, it experiences a blockage or tension just below the lungs. It feels as though the breath stops in the chest.

So I tried reversing the breath and drawing it up from the earth through the soles of my feet. It was able to move more fluidily through the body, up the legs, into the abdomen, into the lungs, up into the head and down the arms and out of the hands. Eventually there was no effort or visualization required and the breath just breathes you. A connection with a different level of being occurs.

Why the difference in flow, I don't know?
Does the earth have a different charge than the sky or its atmosphere?

---

by Harry

If you are feeling the air in your lungs, then move it first up to the head. Then down to the solor plexus. By there you should have a full exhalation. Then start a new inhallation that starts traveling up your spine to the head. Then exhale. Travel down through the heart back to the solar plexus to the sex organs and repeat the circle.

---

by Judy

> Use your opposite hand for a day.

Today I am working with the above.
Gross motor skills such as opening a door with my left hand, are proceeding quite smoothly, although I have to say the amount of vigilence required is phenomenal, just to accurately follow what the hands are up to, as they sometimes seem to have a life of their own - much harder than following the breath for a long time, for example. It remains to be seen if I have sufficient energy to sustain this for a whole day. This should not be a surprise, and yet it is.

Fine motor skills simply too frustrating. For example, I moved the computer mouse to the left side. This was fine until I was under time constraints, and I switched it back to the right side to get things done.

> During the day, imagine that you are a conduit or conductor of energy between the earth and sky - hell and heaven. Try to sense the current of energy up and down your body. Pondeer: Are there a positive and negative poles between earth > and sky?

>
> When lying in bed, morning and evening, imagine that you are a magnet. Try and sense your alignment between the earth and sky.

With the above, I seem to sense better movement in the body when I am standing or at least sitting upright. Energy seems to enter at the top of the head and move downwards quite well. When lying down, the energy seems weaker and still wants to enter through the top of the head and move down through the skull and spine.
However, I am used to visualising this in the morning sittings, so perhaps this has influenced.

Thanks for mentioning that breath circuit, Harry. I do something very similar, except that I imagine the energy as "air" only as far as the lungs, then after that I imagine it as being carried by the bloodstream.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Harry

I used to work with a person who had a left handed mouse. When I had to do some kind of maintanence or help out in her office the mouse was a real impediment. I could switch it to my right hand, but then the buttons were wrong. (Probably means nothing to Mac user who only has one button.)

But we can train most things. I remember students being amazed that I could read their work upside down as I walked through the classroom.

As someone raised under the old rules of courtesy, I had some fun times a couple of decades ago. My instinct was to walk next to the curb when walking with a woman. And always opening doors. I still open doors, instinctively, even for my female students.

---

by Lawrick

> Ian wrote:
> During the day, imagine that you are a conduit or conductor of energy between the earth and sky - hell and heaven. Try to sense the current of energy up and down your body. Pondeer: Are there a positive and negative poles between earth and sky?

Having no success with this particular segment of the program. Sitting, standing, reclining in bed, early morning, or night, try as I might I'm unable to sense or imagine any positive negative flow of energy.

As you breathe, try to sense a concurrent breathing through the pores of your skin.

Little success with this as well until it was determined that the intent was interfering with the result. So I started using last weeks spine skull sensing exercise which puts me in a state of calm receptivity. I then began breathing using Harry's suggested method with limited results. Better results were obtained when I created a circuit brain breathing(Holy Affirming) backbone(Holy Denying) solar plexus(Holy Reconciling) package(transubstatiate in me) heart(For my Being). As well, I use the blue electrical energy surrounding the body(Kirlian Photography) to breathe color in and out of the body. The results gave me a sense of separation from the body object, a sense that it was a carriage taking me here and there observing. Impatially observing. When I think about it, the state was more like a dream than reality. Strange no?

> Ian wrote:
> Use your opposite hand for a day.

I'm so right side orientated that during my University application, the psychologist actually mentioned this condition as something to be observed and needed to be worked on. Using the mouse in my left hand usually results in my 2 1/2 laptop battery wearing down before the completion of two or 3 sentences.  Drinking coffee in this way results in a change of shirts and so on.  Which of course is a clear indication that I should be doing more of this work.

regards,
Lawrick

Having no success with this particular segment of the program. Sitiing, standing, reclining, in bed early morning, or night, try asw I might I'm unable to sense or imagine any positive negative flow of energy.

---

by Karen

I tried using my chopsticks with my left hand to eat my chicken rice bowl yesterday. Chopsticks require time and patience at the best of times, never mind trying to use the opposite hand to operate them.

It started off well. I was reading the new posts on the site while eating. When I was done reading, I instinctively wanted to eat faster, more efficiently (?#@!), and found myself transferring the sticks to my right hand. The process continued until I was finished.

Ironically, earlier in the day, out of the blue, my husband commented on how structured he is and how the things he does throughout the day are soooo automatic. When he does something differently, ouside of his usual program, it feels uncomfortable and he wants to revert back to his usual way.

Funny you mention taking the curb side of the sidewalk Harry. I was brought up the same way. A child or woman always takes the inside of the walk, furthest away from the "dangerous road and vehicles going by" When walking with my son, I sometimes catch myself telling him to move to my other side.

---

by Alistair

Inevitably there would be at least one more of us who learned which side of the pavement, as they say in the UK, to walk on. My memory recalls this originates to protect womens frocks from splashes  Opening doors Harry is something we should do for others whenever we can, it's an easy and simple way to love your neighbour, don't stop doing it Harry, I won't, just make sure you always do it consciously
Link to BT, & coincidence that my partner wants to visit the Russian banya, almost a sauna in the next few days. It's important not to discard indiscriminately believing we are making progress. Some politeness is simply sycophancy but there are differences between artificial politeness, courtesy & common kindness

Left hand work is not so unusual for me. Five years ago reading Wilson's Prometheus Rising which was incidentally the book where the name Gurdjieff first appeared in front of my nose, Wilson stated Crowley insisted that all his pupils could write competently with both hands. Interestingly at the end of each chapter in PR there are a set of exercises, but curiously at end of that particular chapter there was no exercise to use your opposite hand, that was my cue. I can still remember writing with my left hand for the first time and almost immediately feeling something shift a feeling of euphoria. For some weeks I practised everyday to the extent that I could write quite legibly but not as fast with my left hand. As Harry rightly says with more practice that would have happenned too.

The opposite hand exercise woke me and warmed me when collecting water from the village spring on Tue am when the temp was below freezing, usually I support the base of the 10litre bottle with my right hand but this week I switched. It did make me more alert.

Breathing from earth to sky, sky to earth also able to feel but with the air quality in the Crimea Mountains anything air related should have a better chance of success than most places on our troubled planet.

Keep forgetting to be a magnet in bed

---

by Alistair

almost forgot this morning such beauty significant temperature increase feels like winter here is over halfway to the spring drawing big belly breath lungfulls in through the top of my head down to the souls, woops, soles of my feet then up through the soles and out thru the hole at the top of my head i glance up and there are seven small birds flying overhead from sw to ne thanks be

---

by Gururaj

The opposite hand exercise was applied to perform the morning ablutions (brushing teeth,bathing) and the intention persisted upto the initial hour at the office(using the mouse,etc).But the awareness vanished deeper into the day.I have decided to stick to the teeth brushing part till some proficiency is gained.Yes ,as Judy observed,the gross movements are easy but the intricate ones either take more time or are not done well.And during those actions requiring finer moves i caught my (natural) right hand being all tensed up ,almost as though saying,hey! let me show you how its done properly.  and I had to bring the consciouness to relax it.In India,by the way,left hand use is frowned upon for certain activities and many natural lefties get skilled in using both hands.
The opposite emotion (or is it thought) was applied to consider/feel positive whenever I was faced with what i percieved as a problem and which instinctively,for me ,brings on a heaviness of being.This exercise did release more energy to handle the issues with lightness.Maybe I should have brought this attitude to the "body as conductor" exercise,because it somehow did not resonate with me and so did not attempt it beyond a few moments in the morning.

---

by Harry

Alistair,

We sometimes forget. G said conscious labors.

That is distinct and separate from

Intentional suffering.

Sometimes they can be both. But the more we can do consciously, or attempted consciously. . .I teach online. So I type a lot. And am instinctively fast, having been self taught. But it's strange that I at times must try to bring all three centers to my typing. Feeling my fingers as they hit the keyboard right now, each finger. And then realize that words are flowing from my brain down my arms to those fingers transmitting hopefully meaning. And an emotional sensation opening from the heart.

---

by Judy

Yesterday:

> Feel opposite emotions for a day.

What I decided to do for this part of the exercise was to evoke conscious love as often as I could towards people I would more usually be indifferent to.
This led to a surprisingly emotionally-rich day. Having this inner aim quite noticeably led to a more positive interaction with a couple of acquaintances.

I try various tricks to "change" the emotions, but they are of course faster than the intellectual centre speed, so I have to transform in hindsight.
However, I have found that beginning the day with an aim for the emotional centre to "love consciously" helps a great deal in evening out the many ups and downs of any associative emotions so often on the surface.

I have from time to time been working from our 3-month suggested program "Love", so this dovetails with that nicely. I think it is Bennett who talks somewhere about this daily aim for the emotions.

Judy.

Work Program week beginning 15 February 2010

---

by Ian

Whenever you experience a Holy Denying Suffering such as anger, fear, jealousy, hatred, annoyance, exasperation, depression, boredom, resentment, etc., bring that feeling of suffering into your solar plexus on the in-breath; and on the out-breath, let the fire of that suffering warm your heart, transforming it into a blazing sun, whose heat and light are carried by your out-breath into the marrow of your bones, illuminating and filling you with a joy that passes all understanding.

Discuss your suffering with a loved one. Be prepared to transform (as with the formula indicated above) your feelings resentment when they cease to indulge your Tales of Suffering and Self-Justification.

Ponder: Can we lessen the suffering of His/Her Endlessness by returning to Source the joy and ecstacy and thanks we generate when we Intentionally Suffer?

---

by Harry

We spent Sunday with my Mother. She was in a total hallucination. Seeing both her dead son and her dead husband. The wires in her brain had somehow been crossed.

I knew it was going to be bad because the home had called me. So I went in working. Much of the time I was trying to let impressions come to me. To determine what could be done for her. My son comforted her. Later my brother came. He started showing old slides.

This is an interesting part. I was seeing twenty, thirty, forty year old images. I was seeing images of people like both of my grandfathers. And they didn't jive with my memories. I could see the frailty of my paternal grandfather. Something I have never thought of him as. And I could see the impact of years of alcoholism on my maternal grandfather. I saw myself as a high school jock who somehow transformed into a college hippie.

I thought of O's life pictures. I had worked with that some. But even these ordinary pictures were like that if taken not just as something my stepfather took with his ever present camera.

The day was draining. But then that evening I kept seeing the images of the slide show in my mind. And could see how my mother might have taken such images as a different reality.

She called yesterday morning. (We couldn't get there because the second half of a snow storm hit.) "I know I was all mixed up yesterday. I know they weren't there. But I don't know how that happened. Maybe I should go to a doctor."

Could I have transformed more of these energies? I'm not sure. This was a five to six hour experience and my Work energy was quickly fading. My administrative secretary was taking over. I knew it was taking over, but it had to.

---

by Judy

There were many experiences of Holy Denying Sufferings nearby this week for me to work on; and that's the thing, isn't it? To remember to work on these as they happen, rather than allowing any of them to slide insidiously into the "poor me s"!
To just keep on walking, one foot after the other, enduring calmly and intentionally, requires strengt and awareness and vigilence.
I love the exercise of illuminating the bones and will keep it going for a while.

Harry, I am moved by your recent posts. I moved in with my mother for her last nine weeks and am reminded of that difficult time. Memories of much reconciliation during that period now often warm and console when I think of her. Strange how much closeness was possible, as she and I had had quite a turbulent relationship through life.

Regards to all,
Judy.

---

by Harry

Interesting, Judy. I wish my sister could do the same.

While it isn't part of the work: This past week was a good week for Mom. She actually started going down to dinner and was elected Mardi Gras Queen by the Home. (It's assisted living apartments.)

You're right. Denying is there for whatever you choose. It is seeing the three forces together that is difficult at times. There's an entire discussion of electricity in Beelzebub. And in a sense that is a discussion of what happens when the third force isn't present.

---

by Dean

This exercise was easy for me to forget at times although it was helpful in moments when I was more touchy than usual. The hard part was doing the bone exercise at the same time as visualizing the sun, the pondering exercise made me question whether or not I was intentionally sufferring or suffering mechanically and whether or not I was truly experiencing joy, ecstacy or thanks.

> You're right. Denying is there for whatever you choose. It is seeing the three > forces together that is difficult at times. There's an entire discussion of electricity in Beelzebub. And in a sense that is a discussion of what happens when the third force isn't present.

Does the third force manifest itself as higher energies that become present when we struggle with our affirming and denying forces?

---

by Judy

Harry wrote:

> Denying is there for whatever you choose. It is seeing the three forces together that is difficult at times

Yes - and when things are being created, there will be a third force there somewhere. If I don't choose to make it a Work force, which reconciles up, then for sure it will be a life action which may reconcile down...
I may not be expressing this clearly.
It is refreshing to see "conscious labour" and "intentional suffering" as actions on this small scale, rather than as high ideals which are often some psychological distance away.

Recently, I've been studying Bennett's example (the hand, the knife, and the cutting action) of triamazikamno (found in "Talks" in the Cosmology section). This has really helped in seeing third force - a large leap in understanding, for which I'm grateful. Gurdjieff says we are third force blind a lot of the time. Bennett's explanations are allowing some light in.
It is hard to see reconciling force, I think, because we are often in it as an action. Is this an approximate example of what you are saying, Harry?
Bennett goes on to talk about this harnelmiatznel or blending as being "the action of life" which happens as third force when the spiritual world is blended with the material world, and he even suggests that this is what life is for, both individually and collectively. Big statement!

Anyway, it is quite a difficult topic. A little progress is being made.
As to seeing all three forces regularly, thanks for the suggestion. I'll attempt this several times daily for a while. This inderstanding comes and goes. When I'm tired, I can lose it. However, I catch it again the next morning. There may be some higher hydrogens involved?
I have to say these aha rewards are just great for increasing motivation. I'm remembering to restrict fidgety energy quite often, to conserve work energy.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Judy

Dean wrote:

> Does the third force manifest itself as higher energies that become present when we struggle with our affirming and denying forces?

I'm going to have a go at answering your question, Dean.

So, here goes.
Ye-es - sort of; but the higher energies are not from somewhere "out there", somewhere in the ether. It is rather that, you affirm (I wish), from the highest in you. If this affirming force is greater than the denying force (which is the negativity of whatever sort in the psychology in this case), then your own action of observing this bodily negativity with self-awareness (this is your correct self-observation/self-remembering for example, the actual struggling) - actually is the reconciling force here. Therefore, the energies of the actual actions of a Work-attempt are the reconciling force, and the resultant state will be somewhere higher than the state of negativity, according to the definition of triamazikamno. (higher acting on lower to actualise the middle etc).

Good to hear from you, Dean.
Regards,
Judy.

---

by Harry

There is a point, I believe in Beelzebub, where G says that the proper way to deal with any "question" is either active or passive depending upon the situation. My own reaction ultimately came to be to Work during such important situations and the appropriate third force occurs to me. At a certain point you begin to become active in the triad when you absolutely see that it is the way that must be done. And you usually do it reluctantly. (I.e. it is not your instinct to be active in that situation, but you know you must.)

---

by Judy

Harry wrote;

> There is a point, I believe in Beelzebub, where G says that the proper way to deal with any "question" is either active or passive depending upon the situation. My own reaction ultimately came to be to Work during such important situations and the appropriate third force occurs to me. At a certain point you begin to become > active in the triad when you absolutely see that it is the way that must be done. And you usually do it reluctantly. (I.e. it is not your instinct to be active in that situation, but you know you must.)

Would an example of this be =

My first reaction was that something clicked and I wanted to pursue further, Then there was confusion between the terms active passive and neutralising. I decided to Work. My instinct was to follow the breath (passive neutralising for the confusion), but I knew somehow that the more appropriate choice would be to re-read the post and keep working through it (active neutralising for the confusion). This was totally against inclination this morning, yet I knew that without a little intellectual resolution, I'd be glassily dreaming about triads all day in my outside work.

So this "pushing through further" has given me some clarification - by example. Plus this post now is a kind of little step forward, as I know you'll be kind enough to correct if necessary.
So our posts of our experiences are sometimes third force? Active third force usually - going a little further into a topic.

---

by Harry

I did the exact same thing you describe this morning. Needed some advice and picked a Nicoll essay at random and found myself losing attention throughout. Took me four tries to finish with comprehension, and it was only a two page essay. As I did the fourth attempt I realized that I had had similar problems with the same passage in the past.

---

by Dean

Thanks for the material, there is much to ponder on here. I'll try to apply some of this to my observations of myself during the day. Reasoning in terms of the Harnel miatznel seems to help, but there is a lot of confusion when trying to actually see this in action, especially when I'm lacking proper self observation.

Dean

---

by Judy

Harry,
Each of your comments has opened up further fields of investigation and has been most helpful. I'm keeping the momentum going and seeing third force all around now. Looking for the three forces involved every so often regularly will consolidate , I think. Thank you so much.

Dean,
pp45-48 in "Talks on Beelzebub's Tales" were key for me. The understanding of the three forces will help the self-observation process. It, at its highest, is also creative. One thing will help the other.

Judy.

---

by Gururaj

The work program for this week made me first to look up as to what exactly is the solar plexus.Read that physiologically it is the grouping of nerve cells in the "pit of the stomach" controlling the digestive functions.In yogic tradition the 3rd Chakra from the Base ,called the Manipura Chakra is said to be located in the Solar plexus. Psychologically,this is known as the seat of emotions.
The practice of the task itself was very sporadic,especially when it was most needed.As a result I was mostly "reconciling down" that week.
 .

Work Program week beginning 22 February 2010

---

by Ian

Practice the Sightless Gaze as often as you can during the day.

Ponder: Is it possible to distinguish a true impression from imagination or fantasy? Is it possible to experience a pure impression, unaffected by our beliefs?

---

by Judy

Ian wrote:

> Ponder: Is it possible to distinguish a true impression from imagination or fantasy? Is it possible to experience a pure impression, unaffected by our beliefs?

Isn't it these "true impressions" we are seeking in the practice of self-observation? Impartial, simultaneous "seeing" by direct perception?
So, speaking about my own experiences, it is most apparent that attempts vary a lot in quality; certainly I don't achieve one hundred percent impartiality, let alone simultaneity of high degree; yet with practice over time, I know there is improvement.
Sometimes, too, there is a gift of a true impression. These gifts give confidence and a measuring-scale of sorts. And something in me "knows" and distinguishes the difference.
This is one aspect of the pondering.

External impressions are another question. The sightless gaze occasionally acts as a portal into presence, and this increases the chances, but again for me it seems to be a matter of degree.

By the way, folks, from Sunday I'll b e away from the computer for twelve days. Then I'll be back!
Judy.

---

by Harry

I'm a little hesitant about the word impression. Because that seems more on the totally physical level.

Can we know when we know when we encounter The Truth? We feel it, have an emotion, and probably invoke a higher intellectual level.

I knew when I started reading G that this was different, a truth that I hadn't encountered before. I had encountered other truth. And had built up a bit of Arnold's Golden Touchstone. (Deputy Steward?) Sightless gaze has a tendency to quiet the secretary; and allow other centers to perceive. Perhaps that's a better word. Perceptions, rather than impression. Because it combine the viewer and the viewed with a channel.

We are changing channels when we practice The Sightless Gaze, meditation, Tai Chi etc.

---

by JohnS

I can't remember where the quote is from but..

"Truth is emotional knowledge"

This ties in with Harry's view, although its still a matter, as said, of distinguishing true emotion from imagined.
My own ability to do this is poor, if I look back at past mistakes, and recognise the deep traits that are still present and could make me commit them again .. in the name of Truth.

---

by Ian

The "essence" so to speak, of the Sightless Gaze is to be impartial in our perception of impressions, or our impression of perceptions.
But how can we know we are being truly impartial?
This may be where the value of Pondering comes in.... to look at, evaluate, something from all sides and still refrain from a final and definitive judgement on it....
.... on allowing for future information and insights not available in the present, that may change our evaluation....

Paul Beidler once sauid to me - Nothing lasts forever...

Maybe our judgements and opinions and evaluations never last forever...
maybe there is always eventually an alternative point of view?

Why crystallize? Why not stay fluid? Keep on truckin'?
"Without trucks you have nothing" (bumper sticker I saw on a truck this morning on the way to work)

---

by Ian

> Ian wrote:

The "essence" so to speak, of the Sightless Gaze is to be impartial in our perception of impressions, or our impression of perceptions.
But how can we know we are being truly impartial?
This may be where the value of Pondering comes in.... to look at, evaluate, something from all sides and still refrain from a final and definitive judgement on it....
.... on allowing for future information and insights not available in the present, that may change our evaluation....

Paul Beidler once sauid to me - Nothing lasts forever...

Maybe our judgements and opinions and evaluations never last forever...
maybe there is always eventually an alternative point of view?

Why crystallize? Why not stay fluid? Keep on truckin'? Always a new road to follow....
"Without trucks you have nothing" (bumper sticker I saw on a 16 wheeler this morning on the way to work)

---

by Gururaj

Today ,was stuck at a traffic junction with a lot of vehicles all around.Nothing had moved for a long time.I switched off the ignition and waited.Looking around saw on a bike nearby ,a couple with 2 small kids.On the pillion a woman cradled,apparently, her baby daughter about 1 1/2 years old.The beauty and innocence of the child was captivating.The child was holding her attention on one person after another in the vehicles nearby who were smiling or gesturing to her.The mother,maybe used to this sort of attention,was not very curious about the onlookers though she was aware of her baby's actions.
Wonder whether I missed a "true" impression in all this because of my "partiality".Would being aware of my attention simultaneously have been the reconciling force here ?I need to affirm and get on more with the exercise to have a better chance to get some experiences ,hopefully of a truer and non-personal level.

---

by Harry

Children can be a different source. Try animals. If you have a pet try that. Or go to a zoo and perceive something there. I had an experience with a caged tiger once.

---

by Lawrick

The sightless gaze is one of the most valuable tools available for "centering" myself. It is always accompanied by a calm quiet breathing pattern, and the dispersal of tension. This tension always resides in my upper back and neck. It is discomforting to think that I carry around this Monkey night and day. Another valuable characteristic is its pure simplicity. In fact, one might call it a doorway to pondering. A valuable exerecise and one I use frequently.

As to;

> Ian wrote:
> Is it possible to experience a pure impression, unaffected by our beliefs?

The idea of approaching light speed jumped into my consciousness while pondering this. Some say impossible,for what is faster than light..... Yet is light the only metric available. Perhaps all we can do is try.

Lawrick

---

by Alistair

Sightless gaze is something that for some reason comes quite naturally to me. It's happened since as long as my memory serves me. That said more often than not it's simply a factor in day dreaming, a flow of associated thoughts.

Today during a walk around the village there was time to pause for a few moments sat on a rock. The particular rock overlooked the village from the south west. It was also possible to see several kilometres in each direction along the valley and the higher mountains in the distance. Oh Joy.
Having settled on the rock, a dry rock, drier than the ground which has dried much in the last few days but not enough to sit on comfortably, it was time to ponder impressions.

The first impression was the abundance of natural impressions, ah there, already stated an abundance, no impartiality, then laughter. Isn't impartiality impossible if one is subject to the Law of Association?

Ponder is a funny concept in itself? Would it not be the intellectual centre that ponders? Does ponder not increase the tendency to intellectualise feeling?
Check the meaning of ponder, to think about something carefully says my New Oxford English Dictionary. So to ponder is unquestionably only work on the thinking centre?

True impression or pure impression can only be felt?
It's so difficult to continue this without others adding, poking, inspiring; etc

True or pure would depend on which of the sins/egos are strongest?
Although breathing sweet clean air shouldn't solicit the judgement/impression the air is sweet and clean? So what is that pride for the air in my locale? So I waste thought energy reinforcing with myself that the air is beautifully fresh compared to most of say the rest of Europe or what the majority of people breathe.

If there were true or pure impressions they would be felt and couldn’t be intellectualised into words, like asking the definition of love?

True impression, the shortcoming of an online workgroup as opposed to a group gathering 😁
An online workgroup, Intentional suffering, not to be missed 😁 oh joy 😁

Work Program week beginning 1 March 2010

---

by Ian

The following, received February 2010, is the result of a 2 year Pondering by a first time attendee of the A&E Conference 2008:

"Gist of it :
People live in dreams
both, the future and the past they are living not in real but a world, like a dream its good to learn from past its good to have some dreams but, to be real you need to constate, sense and feel right now
when the life is real."

We are all overwhelmed by the Work (or whatever you may name it, depending on your background) when we first make contact with it or when we first realize that there is such a thing, and that we have to DO something to make it "live" in our lives. Sorting out what that is is often a life-long journey of self-discovery, with many ups and downs. The things that help us in the beginning are not always the things that help us as we near the end, if there is such a thing.

This weeks Work is to provide feedback to fellow Co-seekers about what you think, feel and sense have been the most important aspects, ideas or practices of the Work that you have found helpful at different stages of your life.

This communication with Co-seekers could best be communicated while in a Sightlessly Gazed and Consciously Breathed, three centered state of Constating, Sensing and Feeling.

---

by Harry

The first big idea was multiple i's. This combined with something that had already been introduced by people like Jung and cummings. Personality versus Essence. But multiple i's and multiple centers changed the way I thought about Harry. And introduced the idea that there could be something which controlled these "impulses".

The three centers came next. The idea of a three brained being, and other brained beings, put a lot of perspective on life, the World, etc. It also allowed the observation of what was "working" in me at a given time. And trying to bring these into harmony probably resonated with my hippie era life.

The Cosmology became very important intellectually. When I first picked up O the cover of the book said "the answer to every question in your life". And it really was. At that time. Until I found All and Everything. (Ordinary education having taught me to ultimately find the source of the source.)

This is all tilling the ground, so to speak. At a certain point I came to the realization that if I wanted something to change I had to try to "Do" something. These Work attempts were elementary. Simple tasks. (Once I'd gotten over the urge to transform into that caped Magician that Nicoll talks about.) --throughout that first period, too, there was a sampling of everything else out their from Crowley to Blatavasky to various pupils of various other teachers--(Even the Beast had something to teach the ordinary, if only to find what needed to be dismissed. By the way, this was, perhaps, the first time that a touchstone came into play. I knew G's feeling. And The Beast was frightening. Castenada was frightening, too. Both, I think, because they were wisacering with things they didn't fully understand.)

Simple work attempts. Walk around the block. Meditate. Draining. (Well that one probably came later, because it's not so simple.) Remember myself when I walked through a door way. Feel the doorway. Walk the power walk. Eyes on the horizon. Arms in motion, synched with legs. Perceptions coming.

These small attempts at observation led to some presencience. Which was both exhilerating and frightening. A lesson there. ; I didn't really want to know the future. But If I attempted what I needed to attempt, if I was a good householder, then I would have flashes when I needed them. Do what it doesn't want to do.

There was then an understanding, elementary, of three forces, and the seven cycles. That remains incomplete. But as I see things coming together I begin to see that there is a great big life around me. Much bigger than I am. And mostly I am swept away into it. (Like watching for the tidal wave to hit Hawaii when my informed mind knew it was silly.) Seeing that events occur. Not to me. It didn't storm to ruin my little birthday party. But that events wash towards me, and sometimes over me, and sometimes engulf me. That these events are the things of life.

Balance.

Somewhere along there is presenting the Work to others. With my own son this was easier. It was there, and I was an answerer. But to others I don't know I have to be careful. I learned early on not to cast Pearls Before Swine. I don't think, for example, I every mentioned the Work to any student I had in an ordinary classroom. At first I wanted to share this with everyone I met. But learned that the Work is diluted and the person's possibilities are altered if not presented with preparation.

Even here I find myself taking care. My perception may not be someone elses. And even if I'm 99.99% certain about something I need to take care not to impose my world on someone else's world. Because while we "know" each other in a different way, we don't really "know" each other at all.

---

by Cassandra

I noticed just yesterday or the day before that I feel calm(er) in stressful situations since beginning the work. I have realized that I don't feel such a victim of context anymore--intimidated by intellectuals, people with money, etc. I can simply be nice, but most importantly, be conscious that I'm being nice, in order to get through the evening better. This is powerful for me.

I like what Harry says about doing the simple things--going for a walk and sensing the body. I just came in from a walk, a semi conscious one.

But I realize there are many things I'm still afraid of, like an upcoming oversees trip by plane. A fear of flying developed just last year. A friend suggested anti-anxiety medication. I want to take this easier way out, but it's not the way of consciousness.

---

by andreadandolo

Hello, Im new in this on line work group, but Im feeling yust as I found a new family!
I agree with what Cassandra said about the fears. I still have moments when an anxiety arises, and I have not idea of the reasons she arises. I can't see the meaning. It just happens. And I just try to observe: impartially, without judgement. But is not simple, and in those moments, I have the opportunity to understand how many Im far from my emotions, feelings, thougts. I realize that Im just at the beginning.
I just walk, sit and try to observe myself. sensing my body and the glimpses of ariseing sensations and see what happens.

---

by Harry

If there is a single fear it is certainly something that can be a prompting for Work. But make sure that it is that type of fear. I spent years with Generalized Anxiety Disorder. Grin and bear it disease, I call it. This is an actual chemical imballance. Only a competent professional can diagnose it.

Beyond that fear is part of life. Observe how often we are programmed with fear. How many television commercials sell fear. Insurance. Mouth Wash. Deodorant. Credit. Fear and anger are two of the easiest emotions (or non-emotions) to arouse. So manipulators do it all of the time.

Also realize that some feelings of apprehension are good. We are complex machines. And we are receiving signals all of the time. I felt strange a couple of weeks ago when I picked up a bottle of Pepsi. No reason. I do this a couple of times a day. But I had apprehension over this one. And then I noticed two things: the color of the cap was different than every other one in the cupboard. And when I opened it there was no tamper proof seal.

I have no idea if it was really contaminated. Just took it back to the store the next day.

---

by AlbertoB

Key points of the Work that fascinated me.

1. The pessimistic mood. The universe is not fortuitous, but the role of man isn't very important.
The way to liberation is narrow.

2. The multiple I's. I felt this as a powerful explanation for many facts in everyday life. In my life in particular.

3. The self-remembering. Another very powerful idea, far better that any meditation technique I know. All the vision of man in sleeping state, with only few moments of true consciousness is true in deep.

4. The theory of intentional suffering. This is the more radical statement of the Work, of huge importance, for philosophical and thelogical reasons too complex d to detail here. For example, it was for me the only key to try to explain the story of Jesus Christ.
Generally speaking, the Work gives the only understandig of christian religion that I accept. Nothing in catholic theology stands at the same level.

---

by Cassandra

I don't have generalized anxiety. I'm brave about doing new things and being pretty low key.

But I understand the Work to say that there is no loving god watching our every move and watching that we don't go in harm's way. Rather, we are at the service and disposal, I guess, of an impersonal universe which has certain needs at different times. A need for bloodshed on a massive scale and there is war, things like this. This is unsettling.

But there is also a rhythm or energy that can help one. How to tap into this is what I want from the Work.

---

by andreadandolo

Self- remembering is an appropriate radical tool to see my limitations and the loss of will in general. An example: In the morning I decide to remember myself during the day, and half an hour later I wake up in a bar while drinking a coffe, understanding I can't remember wath way I chose to come there.

Pondering is also a technique that fascinate me and I often practice: pondering on an argument, concept, situation or so, opens new channels of uderstanding, new connections of thinking, new ways to understand life.
Another very interesting concept for me is doing actions using all three centers at the same time: physical, emotional, intellectual. Very useful approach to any integral action.

---

by Lawrick

From the time I was young I came to the realization that something was not “quite right” with life. I recall being at an adult Christmas Party, all alcohol, all the time, and having a definite impression that people were “not themselves” that many seemed to be lying, deceitful. The impression was very clear. What evolved from this experience was an obsession not to be “normal” whatever that was.

In high school I was the rebel without a clue. I was suspended 12 times “challenging” the conformity of the machine. I was so sure of myself.

The first Workbook I encountered was Beelzebub’s Tales. Reading BT unto its conclusion was my first experience in real Work. I was stunned that an idea, however poorly understood, could tie my stomach in knots and impact something much deeper, more visceral. My entire word was flipped upside down in sensing how little I knew. I was taken by several things:

The Tales were the greatest treatise on the folly of War ever written! My point of view still hasn’t changed.

That there was a reality beyond my madness, and that it might be possible to find a door.

That like myself, nobody seemed to understand anything in depth, that this was simply the "condition" of the “normal” state of things. A state of madness.
That I was no different from all the other sheep. Sleepwalking.

Most of all the was realization that I was 3 people continually being pulled uncontrollably by the events surrounding my life and that I was helpless to do a thing about it. That my decisions in this state were all subject to change under other conditions. My first work impression was helplessness.

The subsequent confusion lead to the loss of my job and played a significant role in my divorce.

I spent many, many years drifting in and out of the Work reading everything I could get my hands on, Bennett, Speeth, Nott, but neither joining a group, nor participating in the exercises.

At some point in time I realized that before any positive change could be made, I first must work to change the many negative behaviours responsible for this self created mess. I have missed so much.

The first exercises were simple attempts to prolong my consciousness in the moment. To discover the I Am. To recognize moments of awakening for what they were. To try and centre my Self. All met with different levels of success.

At some point came the realization that the method couldn't be taken alone: it was in fact All and Everything, and offered a possible explanation for all and everything. This was the pivotal realization of my adult years.

I've never been a joiner. In retrospect, this predisposition has had far more negative than positive results.

Certainly a major change occurred after joining the ES site. The exercises, the communication of higher ideas shared with others, the answers to questions long considered, shared ideals and respect in finding others with similar perspectives and goals, and so on.

I was and still am taken by the integrity of the ES membership.

An appreciation of the collective effort to understand the deeper ideas in the Tales.

A discovery that participating in the weekly exercises has made such a positive change in my impressions, my impartiality, my fears, anxiety and anger, my ability to face uncomfortable situations.

Here was the idea that with enough work I might finally overcome the negative behaviours which for so long had misguided my existence.

So I sit and type….. conscious of my breathing and of something else that surrounds my inner and outer life. Something larger and cleaner and worthy of effort.

Lawrick

---

by andreadandolo

The first time I met something about the Fourth Way' s Work on one self, was in 1997 reading a book of Louis Pauwels "Monsieur Gurdjieff". Even if this book painted a not very good portrait of the Caucasian teacher, I found there one thing that I realized I had been observed since I was a child. As a child (in particulary 10- 14 years old) I had moments when I was very exited in some situations (or at least i think that I was exited, because it was an emotive feeling), and in those moments I realized that I was "really here", "really now", as if since a moment before I was in a "trance- like state". in those moments, all things seemed so real, plastic, and I had a feeling of being aware - even sensing - of all sounds, objects, people surrounding me. Some moments later, as I tried to analyzeing that experience, all this disappeared, and I returned in the world of my fantasies. So, when I read this book, it was obvious for me that men can be more conscious that they usually are. This was my first approach to some basic concepts of the Work.

---

by Harry

Lawrick,

A little Tom Petty never hurt anyone.

I agree with the anti-war treatise. Of course we have to take it inside and see the internal wars we experience "from Mars".

Harry

---

by Alistair

The first impression received from this week's 'work' was Ian is trying to help the newcomers to the forum. Whether an accurate impression or not most if not all of my I's are grateful. Second impression, rather than contribute, better just observe the replies of the longer standing forum members. Or were they both the Law of Association. At the physical level aren't impressions associations?

Lacking the will simply to observe those more experienced in 'the work' than me & driven by my mad mechanical ego that always wishes to express an opinion my reference is to what could be termed a key moment during my first read of In Search of the Miraculous. For quite a few years many of my I's were greedy consumers of the works of Frank Zappa, nothing like a good sneer. At the beginning of Chapter 15, In Search, the Law of Association prompted a sneer in me as G stated ... the vast majority of people who call themselves Christians have no right whatever to do so. What a chord that struck. I was severely punished as a child when my parents discovered me skiving Sunday School. They always maintained it was the lying they hated, fair enough. For years I described myself as athiest/agnostic, some kind of non-believer.

There was an immediate wish to further verify G's comment but where. For some reason my mind was able to recall some vague memory of the term Sermon on the Mount. Well indeed judge not but after a quick read it was quite obvious how accurate G's remarks were. Much more importantly most of my I's especially the more dependable ones could see instantly that here was something very real that should be with me until the end.

Harry, pearls to swine indeed. The joy in simple things each moment in life; think not of the morrow, the evil of today is sufficient thereof. It's all here, every eventuality in life is covered at the same time living it every day is not so easy, as we all know that's why we're in this group

For your interest the text breaks in half very neatly to provide two equal sections that fill the desktop. The second section commences with the Lord’s Prayer. I typed the text then converted it to a bmp.

As G said we all want the best teachers

---

by Harry

Alistair,

The Mothers of Invention.

There are lots of influences that lead us to some form of magnetic center. And that draws us to other things. One of my favorite memories was of a local FM Radio station that used to play what was then called Album Rock between 10 and Midnight on a show called Jelly Pudding. One night, the DJ, who called himself Michael Xanadu, announced: "Frank Zappa is on Johnny Carson right now. Those of you who don't watch are silly."

The era from 66 or so on through the mid70s was one of those times G describes when growth is possible. And more available.

A hippie couple had rented out the basement of a local bookstore. . .one of the oldest in town. Not only did they stuck things like The Free Press, they stocked all of G, O, and other books like the poetry volume "All Gods Must Learn to Kill". That's where I found O and much much more. It was an adventure to just go down stairs and see what was new. (So old that all financial transactions were still done through pneumatic tubes.)

Ordinary memories. But I guess my point is that sneers aren't necessarily sneers. I used to pretend to go to Mass and go sit at a bend in the Ohio River that allowed no view of civilization. I sat there and meditated for an hour on Sunday mornings. My parents were happy. And I had a better experience.

---

by Gururaj

What I think - After being a fairly long term participant in a "just work on being" oriented workshop ,I discovered Gurdjieff and the Work about 6 years ago.The most "oh yeah ! so true" teaching for me was about the distinction between Knowledge and Being and the necessity of their "feeding each other" growth spiral.Having experienced both extremes earlier,the glimmer of a "taste" of this balance has been the most valuable insight from the Work.

What I feel - Oh, there's so much of concepts to read about,mull over and try to hold on to - all of them at once !Quite overwhelming and most of them unverifiable by me ,as I am now.Where does one start,what does one focus on,what are the basics ? All quite off-putting.

What I sense- Little by little ,a less reactive state of being.But a very long way to go in.

---

by Karen

> This weeks Work is to provide feedback to fellow Co-seekers about what you think, feel and sense have been the most important aspects, ideas or practices of the Work that you have found helpful at different stages of your life.

Buddhist teacher Pema Chodron summaries an idea/practice that I have found most helping in applying at this stage of my life. Her words seem to parrell the work in many ways.

She states that we spend our lives avoiding the situations that help us grow. Until entering the work, this was exactly what I was doing and still do when asleep.

Dodging discomfort and uncertainty seems to be humankinds favorite sport.

But fleeing from suffering only increases it.

It's when we stay with uncertainty and discomfort without trying to fix it that we connect with our own innate joy, wisdom and love. When you're feeling sad, anxious, frightened or enraged, instead of turning to whatever you usually use to ease the edginess of the moment (tv, drinking, smoking, shopping, drugs - "self-calming")-----DON'T DO A THING!

If you sit with those feelings and sensations and get to know them instead of acting them out or medicating them or covering them up, if you stay with yourself, transformation is going to occur.

If you want happiness, you need the ability to stay with what's happening to see clearly what you do that causes your own misery. You start where you are, and you train in sticking with uneasiness you feel when you don't grasp for something.

There is a certain amount of pain that is inevitable in life, but we can work with the suffering by stopping the momentum of shenpa--how we get hooked.

Pose a series of questions when a surge of negative emotions want to send you running for the escape hatch. (What just happened to provoke the anger or fear? What feelings did it bring up? What habits do you use to move away from the rawness of this feeling you don't want to feel? ---Yelling? Weeping? Berating yourself?) Then put all strategy aside and just be with what's there.

Not condoning, not condeming, just observing.

If you're willing to stay with your neurosis—not act it out, not repress it, not fix it— then your own wisdom guide will come forth. If you stay and discover the things in yourself that you've always run from, you begin to have some tenderness for your own situation.

Eventually the tenderness you feel for yourself can extend to all of humanity

It takes a lot of courage to just keep working with yourself...

The practice of staying present doesn't banish fear but somehow looking it right in the face and feeling it completely is what allows it to pass and take its natural course

Thank you for this program. I am grateful and thankful to have found this group and the work

Be the light
Karen

---

by Ian

> andreadandolo wrote:
> The first time I met something about the Fourth Way' s Work on one self, was in 1997 reading a book of Louis Pauwels "Monsieur Gurdjieff". Even if this book painted a not very good portrait of the Caucasian teacher, I found there one thing that I realized I had been observed since I was a child. As a child (in particulary 10- 14 years old) I had moments when I was very exited in some situations (or at least i think that I was exited, because it was an emotive feeling), and in those moments I realized that I was "really here", "really now", as if since a moment before I was in a "trance- like state". in those moments, all things seemed so real, plastic, and I had a feeling of being aware - even sensing - of all sounds, objects, people surrounding me. Some moments later, as I tried to analyzeing that experience, all this disappeared, and I returned in the world of my fantasies. So, when I read this book, it was obvious for me that men can be more conscious that they usually are. This was my first approach to some basic concepts of the Work.

Dear Andrea,

Welcome to the forums, and sorry that you have not been officially welcomed sooner.
Many of us have had experiences with states of consciousness and techniques for acheiving them that sound similar to the Gurdjieff Work.
One needs to examine and evaluate the Aims or intentions behind these exercises.
Just because they sound similar that does not mean that the Aim is the same.

Work Program week beginning 8 March 2010

---

by Ian

Theme: Abstract Purpose

We act out our business in the world each day. We perform rituals of social behaviour in order to play our roles in our family or worklife. Nothing that we do or say has any meaning or importance, unless we do it in the right spirit, for a greater good rather than selfish reasons. It is a tiny thing that makes all the difference. To carry out a task with gusto, to ones fullest ability, whether it be Work on self or work in the world, is to feel joy in the humblest task; this is only possible if we do it in the spirit of a higher abstract purpose - selfless service without expectation of reward.

During the week try to perform all tasks, whether they be Work on self or work in the world, with abstract purpose in mind. This may be coupled with an abstract attention to ones breath; ones sensations; ones impressions; ones emotions.

The payment for periods of joy, compassion, love, reverance, or awe shall be to evoke an abstract humility grounded in an abstract harmony of three centers.

Ponder: What is the alure of abstract purpose?

---

by JohnS

Before reading this post, yesterday I was watching a 'science' programme on TV, the subject of which was "What is Happiness". They surveyed many people, via multiple-choice questionnaires, and published their conclusions. Then I watched a panel Q&A programme, where it came to audience asking their own questions and panel giving their totally predictable answers, which because of their individual bias gave no sense of completion to the questioner. These events gave me a deep sense of the futility of lives (mine included) trying to fulfil themselves individually, while totally disconnected from humanity as a whole - even the generous souls among them. We are all hanging on blindly to our set views, and not sensing the whole, which Ian is asking us to do.
Enough repetition of this experience will hopefully push me out of my individual prison and into the whole of humanity - which it did for several brief moments, then off, then on again.
I saw, but did not conquer.

---

by Harry

This is not meant to be sarcastic.

What's happiness got to do with it?

---

by Gururaj

This is not meant to be an argument or fixed opinion,just an exploration of my life experiences in the context of this week's task.

Happiness seems to be the crux of the matter here.

Case 1 - No emotions - The routine tasks done mechanically ,where one has no particular emotions in play .

Case 2 - Unhappiness - Some of the not so routine tasks,I approach more as a burden to be gotten over with.

Case 3 - Happiness/ personal - Tasks done purely for personal /ego satisfaction (like gossip,or actions done with specific reward expectations)

In all the above situations I see a scope to bring an 'aliveness'/ a different sensibility with this week's task,including not postponing things.

Case 4 - Happiness / impersonal - Tasks done with an aim of quality/excellence enduring/ignoring discomfort and,at-least while doing them,not having any reward expectation from the world around.However I wonder when or in what continuum of awareness such tasks can become "identification" traps .

---

by andreadandolo

Ian, I don't understand fully the correct meaning of Abstract Purpose. Can you please explain me better the concept, if possible with a practical example, so that I do not misunderstand the work program of the week?
Thank you!

---

by Ian

> andreadandolo wrote:
> Ian, I don't understand fully the correct meaning of Abstract Purpose. Can you please explain me better the concept, if possible with a practical example, so that I do not misunderstand the work program of the week?
> Thank you!

An Abstract Purpose is a non-selfish intent to all your actions. An Abstract Purpose is an act of service to others or the universe without expectation for personal reward. An Abstract Purpose is an intention without a personal aim. An Abstract Purpose would be to love everyone. A concrete purpose would be to love one particular person. The 5 being obligolnian strivings are abstract purposes. How we make them concrete in each unique situation is making them intospecific purposes, but there must be no expectation of personal reward or merit or superiority, or else it becomes a personal, self-serving purpose.

An Abstract Purpose is a general Aim - such as to be more conscious of our body. A specific purpose is to be conscious of my body as I wash the dishes this Tuesday evening.
None of this has anything to do with personal merit or superiority or attainment as a spiritual being.

It has more to do with fullfilling of your duty as a manifestation or particle of Endlessness.

In the Abstract we are all part of Endlessness - in the particular, it is hard to love your neighbour as part of Endlessness when they ... (substitute whatever action you dislike) ...

All our practice starts from the Abstract and move towards the Particular...

Does that help?

Regards
Ian

---

by Alistair

Impartiality

---

by andreadandolo

Yes, that help. Thank you, Ian!

All the best,

Andrea

---

by Harry

To answer Ian's last question:

There are at least two types of abstract purpose. As a periodic academic, they live in an abstract world. Ivory tower dreams. Sort of like growing your hair to try to get down. And the only thing it really serves is for someone else to climb up.

Then there is an objective, impartial abstract. Because it isn't part of our "ordinary" life. It is beyond our ordinary life.

The appeal of the first is a superiority complex. And an ability not to interact in life. To create your own little world. Psychopathy.

I'm not sure that the second has an appeal. Because Work is the only path to it. And Work is Work. A job well done might include some satisfaction. But then we must combine the Rolling Stones "Satisfaction" with Cohen's line "If they ever do get to the moon it won't be the on they're after."

---

by JohnS

Including "satisfaction" is an interesting one when involved with the Work: there may be the subtle ego satisfaction of having done something "well", or seeing it come out approximately the way it was intended, but there is also a parallel feeling, connected with being involved with an action or process that is involved with being on the right path. This must be the emotional involvement we need to be motivated to work, so it must always be there.
I guess the further work involves distinguishing between the two.
Happiness is momentary, not a permanent goal, and could also be defined as the presence of this right-path emotion.
Of course we know the danger of holding on to our Right Path to the exclusion of all others - Harry's "psychopath"- but that's another story.

---

by andreadandolo

Frankly, I found it very difficult to understand and implement the purpose of the week. How to act without a real connection, abstractly? Although Ian explained to me clearly about the meaning of abstract and Harry has specified certain additional aspects of the theme, the concept was strictly conceptual. I could understand this intellectually , but difficult or almost impossible to put into practice. Since one hour before... I was drinking a coffee with my friend and the bartender asked to him "How are you?" My friend replied "I'm happy." The bartender: "Why and for what reason?" and my friend replied: "For the simple fact of being happy." Then I "Felt" - I saw directly in practice how to act with a purpose abstract, or at least something very similar ....
Greetings!

---

by Gururaj

Further pondering and some life experiences this week makes me appreciate Harry's rhetorical question " what's happiness got to do with it" and also John's distinctions between 'satisfaction arising from success in an endeavour' and the 'emotion which motivates us to Work'. Thanks too to Ian for the clarification.

Drinking ,for example can make somebody experience happiness to the point of addiction. When better sense prevails there is more satisfaction in not being allured.
Expanding this to other life activities ,one sees by and by that an unconscious approach of 'avoiding unhappiness - pursuing happiness' from a personal perspective is not very appropriate both for the individual and the world.Then,it seems to me, the sensitivity to the abstract and the undertaking of practices ,like Work, is seen as a more appropriate way of living. Is it an allure of the Abstract in case of the Type 1 Harry talks about and is it a Love of the Abstract for the Type 2 ? And ,from another angle,is the Allure(if one may call it that way) for the Abstract kept alive by insights/joy/satisfaction got while on the path ?

Work Program week beginning 15 March 2010

---

by Lift

Theme: Divine Love

Morning meditation: sit quitely for 15 -30 minutes, with your mind free of all thoughts. Invoke a feeling of the flow of divine love that passes between all living things. Feel a charge of this love build up within your heart as you sit meditating.

During the day, bestow a little of your charge of divine love to all people, animals, plants and other living creatures that you encounter.

In the evening, sit again and sense your heart center. Invoke divine love within your heart centre. Keep an awareness of the quality of love within you. Offer this love to Endlessness.

Ponder - What is divine love?

---

by andreadandolo

In the morning meditation sitting quitely I had some problems freeing my mind of all thoughts. It happens every morning: too much thought. Then Invoked a flow of divine love and feeling it trough myself, I remembered the pondering of the week: "What is Divine Love". The answer, through associations that became without interludes was a passage at the end of the Dante' s Divine Commedy, where the Poet, after the Prayer of St. Bernard to the Virgin, discovers the Vision of God and the unity of the universe in God and the revelation of the mysteries of the Trinity (in the Fourt Way the Law of Three) and the Incarnation (the assuming a human form by the Spiritual Being, the Divine):
"...Here vigour fail'd the tow'ring fantasy:
But yet the will roll'd onward, like a wheel
In even motion, by the Love impell'd,
That moves the sun in heav'n and all the stars."
Like in front of an unsolvable koan, these poetic verses discoveres what one can only feel, but not explain in word, over our physical limitations prevented by the laws before which we are slaves of our mechanicity. I don' t know objectively what' s the Divine Love- and how do I know, when I have a merely perception of what can be a true Love, but I feel that this was a real and productive insight.
Thank you to Ian and all the members of this group, for all the support in the Work!
Andrea

---

by Harry

This is a very strange response. But having just read the quoted quatrain from Dante, I can only say that this is a description of a number of major arcana of the Tarot deck.

---

by andreadandolo

Correct, but that's not all. How studious of medieval Italian literature, I can say that the journey of Dante in the "Three Worlds" in the Middle Ages was already seen as a spiritual journey toward the Light (God), helped by Virgil (the Reason), a then Beatrice (the Wisdom or "Sophya"). When Dante reaches the end of the journey and recognizes the "Divine Love", is left speechless (because he can not explain this mystical experience or enlightenment, which can only be tested in first person) and spells out the last phrases of the poem as a commentary, which I consider one of the deepest in Italian mystic literature. Just as a clarification on what I wrote above. This forum is also made to share personal insights about the "Work", and this an insight.
All the best, Harry, I esteem and really appreciate your comments and insights!

---

by Karen

Lift,

This was a beautiful practice. It has taken a while to respond as I've been experimenting and working week over week with this exercise.

> During the day, bestow a little of your charge of divine love to all people, animals, plants and other living creatures that you encounter.

I pictured seeing everyone (including myself) as light beings that had forgotten our heritage, forgotten who we are and why we are here. Sending light and love to others seemed to activate something deep within people. A reminder to wake up, even if only for a second. A certain grace presented itself—an energy of absolute unconditional love. Something inside people recongized. Our house plants responded by sprucing up and becoming more vibrant. Our cat has become more friendly and wants to spend more time cuddling. (recognizing many variables play into these experiments - approaching all without expectation or outcome)

> In the evening, sit again and sense your heart center. Invoke divine love within your heart centre. Keep an awareness of the quality of love within you. Offer this love to Endlessness

Expressing a Love both unconditional and deeply committed and focussed in intention, a Love honoring both the Cosmic and the Individual aspects of connection and communion on Planet Earth.

Pulsations of light come from somewhere when invoking divine love within the heart centre. Not sure if I'm using the energy or if the energy is using me...or both?

I practiced sending and sharing this love outwards as far as one can image. The home, surrounding communities, friends, family. Across the provinces, to all countries, through all bodies of water, wrapping the entire planet and moving outwards to higher worlds then offering this love to his endlessness in gratitude.

This was a powerful exercise that I've incorporated as part of my daily being.

Thank you
Karen

---

by Lift

Dear Karen

> Pulsations of light come from somewhere when invoking divine love within the heart centre. Not sure if I'm using the energy or if the energy is using me...or both?

This is as it should be. My teacher calls these energetic pulsations 'lightrons'. Visualise sending the lightrons from your heart to the world, or Endlessness, or a particular destination of choice.

> This was a powerful exercise that I've incorporated as part of my daily being.

I consider it to be an essential exercise. Repeat it as often as you can.

Lift

---

by Karen

> This is as it should be. My teacher calls these energetic pulsations 'lightrons'. Visualise sending the lightrons from your heart to the world, or Endlessness, or a particular destination of choice.

The harmonic frequency of the earth and the entire solar system appears to be rising, creating a beautiful shift - an awaking...remembering for those who are aware and ready to embrace this higher frequency.

To view the planet as a living, breathing, developing being has changed my perspective in many ways.

I've been receiving the message that our planet requires asistance to sustain herself and has been undergoing many shifts (tectonic plates shifting- earthquakes etc). That each of us needs to take responsibility and transmute our own negative vibrations to light, opposed to sending it to the planet to transform.

> I consider it to be an essential exercise. Repeat it as often as you can.

I agree. If I have any purpose on the planet right now, I'm being called to work on myself, to grow and evolve and graceously receive the pulsations and codes of light to share with all.

Thank you again for this reminder
Karen

---

by Harry

Read some ancient Arabic poetry. References abound to grapes, green, and lightning. All of which are descriptions of the meditation process; or the sightless gaze, in the terms we're using here.

Work Program week beginning 22 March 2010

---

by Judy

Theme: Meditation linking Chakras and the Enneagram

This week we have a meditation to be done as the morning or evening sitting. The idea overall is to link the energy chakras with the enneagram in the manner explained in the paper "Chakras and the Enneagram", to be found on http://www.doremishock.com. (Lee Van Laer; NY Foundation)
Thus it is recommended that you first of all have a look at this article, especially pp22-26, and glance at all diagrams for clarification. Please also note the caveats of testing and personal verification.

This exercise is to aid the development emotional center in particular.

The following is a much-simplified version, which may serve as an introduction to the full "Meditation on the 6 Gifts" for anyone interested. As such, it only involves the first sequential number of the enneagram, 142857, and does not at this stage progress through the multiplications beginning with 285714 etc, I suggest an approximate sitting time of fifteen to twenty minutes.
If anyone wishes to experiment with all the multiplications, expect forty minutes at least. From my own recent experience, it also helps to write down all the multiplications on a piece of paper which you may wish to glance at quite a bit in the beginning.

Legend:
Do Crown chakra
Re Root Chakra 1
Mi Belly Chakra 2
Fa Solar plexus chakra 4
Sol Heart/Lung chakra 5
La Throat chakra 7
Si Third Eye 8

Sit in comfortable position with spine straight as usual.
Relax as much as possible using a favorite method.
Remember to sense the whole body prior to beginning.
Begin with the Holy Affirming Prayer (or one of your own choice).

Part 1: (working with the human energy-flow 142857)

1 - Focus the attention on the root chakra, intoning "one" on inward breath. Here one seeks the fullest possible sensation possible in the root chakra at the very base of the spine.
4 - Allow the attention to move upward to the solar plexus, intoning "four" on outward breath. In doing so, see what relationship exists between the solar plexus and the root.

2 - Allow the attention to move to the belly, intoning “two” on outward breath.
8 - Move the attention to the third eye, intoning “eight.”
5 - Move the attention to the middle of the chest, that is, the heart and lungs, intoning “five.”
7 - Move the attention to the throat and back of the neck, intoning “seven.”

Part 2: (being receptive and open to possibility of the gift of Higher Energy)

Visualize Divine Love energy flowing into the Crown Chakra and moving down the spine and then up the front of the body.
To close, spend a couple of minutes quietly attempting to be aware of any energy-flows in the body.

---

by Lawrick

Judy,

I sense something important in this exercise and if the group agrees, would like to continue for another week, If not I would appreciate doing something else along similar lines.

Still confused as to the breathing sequence which was left “conveniently” unfinished, Does anyone know for sure? Harry, Ian?

Is the sequence;
Root- 1 in breath
Solar plexus- 4 out breath
Belly-2 out breath
Third Eye- in breath
Heart- in breath, out breath???
Throat- in breath, out breath???

And what of the multiples? Do they follow the 142857 sequence or the perimeter 124578. Anyway would appreciate other views.

Leaving the procedure open might be an invitation to experiment which is fine but might require more time.

So far my efforts have produced a sense of swirling spiraling energy. I sense that this spiral may be one of the keys. It is also interesting to note that colorwise, the Ennegram spirals through the primary colors then descends to produce the secondary. Red to yellow to orange, indigo to green to blue.

The meditation itself has already produced a state of deep almost hypnotic relaxation which conflicts with my ability to sense my total body. Like many others it can be very difficult at first so I hope we might spend another week with it.

The descending Devine Love seems to move down the backbone but where it crosses to the front of the body is unclear and where and how it moves from there is also murky. Has anyone realize results from this.

The reading from Laer's link is most interesting and offers several possible insights into the Triamazikamno, and should be a compulsory read whether the exercise is attempted or not. And Judy, bless Thine precocious being for coming up with this.

Lawrick

---

by Harry

The process I've come to through practice is:

Inhale top of head. (I)

Exhale down and out solar plexus. (am)

Pause. Activate throat heart sex. (I wish)

Inhale from sex up the spine to Head. (I can.)

Begin exhale by moving to third eye, repeating the sequence.

---

by Judy

Fred,
Sounds like you are really into it!
Thanks for the questions.
Yes, I see clarification could help; so I've emailed Lee van Laer for that this morning. Of course I'll post when I hear.

Meanwhile, experimentation so far has personally led me to feeling quite comfortable with intoning on the in breath only for the first number of each enneagram: thus intone on inhalation for 1, then intone on exhalation for 42857; then, next enneagram (428571), I intone on the in breath only for the number 4 – and then intone on exhalation for 28571, and so on through all the multiplicatrions.

I'll be keeping this one for a while too. At the moment, it seems to effectively give all three centres something to "do"; thus the current morning sittings are easily extending in time and I'm looking forward to them more than usual. It may take a little while for any automaticity to set in, due to the complexity. This is a plus for me. I like his last comment - "Give it some years."

As to colours and swirls, not so much. From the very first, however, there is much of that indigo colour I get in other meditations; sometimes I watch this for a brief time, though try to keep the attention focussed on the enneagrams, or have to start again.

Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by AlbertoB

This exercise seems very powerful, i felt some kind of "hypnotic state from the beginning.
I tried with one inhale and two exhale, now i will try with a unique exhale. But i have another doubt: Part 2 begins at the end of each cycle of the enneagram or, like part 1 with the relaxing prayer, after many cycles? A careful reading of the Van Laer paper doesn't help me.

Thanks to all.

---

by Judy

Hi Alberto,

The Part 2 bit is my suggestion. I do it once at the very end, after all the enneagram multiplications. However, the main thing is to end up with an exercise which works for you, so please experiment as you wish.
I am glad you are finding the overall idea of interest.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by andreadandolo

Thank you Judy for this powerful exercise. It gives to me new perspectives to understand the importance and versatility of the interpretation and practical use of the Enneagram once one understands its symbolic dynamics

---

by Ian

> Judy wrote:
> However, the main thing is to end up with an exercise which works for you, so please experiment as you wish.

> Regards,
> Judy.

As with all exercises presented here, they are presented in a "shot gun" approach - that is, you have to pick and choose and experiment to find something that resonates with you.

This particular exercise of placing the chakras on the enneagram is a grey area of the Wortk, as this is not something that comes directly from Gurdjieff.

Bennett had a chakra exercise which went something like this -

Sense the root chakra (muladhara)
Breathe in and out of this area 3 or 7 times.
Sense the sex chakra (svadhisthana)
Breathe in and out of this area 3 or 7 times.
Sense the solar plexus chakra(manipura)
Breathe in and out of this area 3 or 7 times.
Sense the heart chakra (anahata)
Breathe in and out of this area 3 or 7 times.
Sense the throat chakra (vishuddha)
Breathe in and out of this area 3 or 7 times.
Sense the third eye chakra (Ajna)
Breathe in and out of this area 3 or 7 times.
Sense the crown chakra (Sahasrara)
Breathe in and out of this area 3 or 7 times.

(start with 3 and work up to 7)

In the Hindu teaching there is also a root sound or Bija Mantra that should be intoned on the out breath for each chakra.
The vibrations of each of the Bija Mantras resonates with each chakra. Bennetts exercise did not include the Bijas.
The Bija mantra for the Crown Chakra is OM

Feel free to experiment...

There is another thing to remember in all of this type of energy work -

None of these types of exercises can produce lasting permanent changes without Inner Work of other kinds.
These energy exercises may open up or soften your chakras, but other types of Work are required as well once the chakras are opened to change.
For instance, there is the 5 Obligolnian Strivings and the bearing of the unpleasant manifestations of others and putting ones self in the shoes of others and External Considering and Work on the unpleasant manifestations of the organ Kundabuffer (Egoism). Much hard Work with Intentional Suffering and Remorse is required to brings these things into operation in the various centers or chakras.

Many, if not most, of the exercises presented in this group address these other kinds of Work.

---

by Gururaj

My experience from even an intermittent practice of the exercise is that some "reconciling up" happens.The article "Chakras and the Enneagram" was also hugely informative (Thanks a lot ,Judy ,for this) .The diagram of the two energy flows (human and divine) alongwith the role of the first and second conscious shocks,I understand, pictorially depicts what Ian has cautioned about and I quote "These energy exercises may open up or soften your chakras, but other types of Work are required as well once the chakras are opened to change" .
Gururaj

---

by Dean

The exercise helped to become more acquainted with the enneagram and helped to experience the law of seven in a different way rather than just being intellectual. Another thing that was interesting was seperating the higher and lower chakras into the upper and lower stories, this brought about some insights into the structure and groupings of different functions. As Gururaj said this was a very informative article and opened up some new possibilities.

Thanks

---

by Ian

> Gururaj wrote:
> My experience from even an intermittent practice of the exercise is that some "reconciling up" happens.The article "Chakras and the Enneagram" was also hugely informative (Thanks a lot ,Judy ,for this) .The diagram of the two energy flows (human and divine) alongwith the role of the first and second conscious shocks,I understand, pictorially depicts what Ian has cautioned about and I quote "These energy exercises may open up or soften your chakras, but other types of Work are required as well once the chakras are opened to change" .
> Gururaj

There is a line of thinking in the Work that takes Ouspensky's Food Diagram as Gospel Truth, and by implication the Enneagram of the Chakras, but I have serious reservations about this, especially the idea that the Emotional Center is the Reconcilling Force.

Impressions are taken in by the Instinctive Center and much pre-processing takes place in the nerve nodes of the eye itself. Then the information is then passed on to the Emotional Center before it reaches the Intellectual Center. The Emotional Center generally makes an evaluation of the information and initiates an emotional response to it based on past experience before the Intellectual Center gets a chance to respond and modify the response.

One of the "tricks" in the Work is to develop a "Deputy Steward" and eventually a "Real I" to modify the automatic responses of the Emotional Center. This is what lies behind Gurdjieff's advice that we should not express negative emotions.

It seems to me that the Intellectual Center, or a certain specially developed part of it, is the Reconciling center of our reactions to life. In particular, it is the pre-frontal lobes that are known scientifically to mediate our Ethical and Moral and Altruistic responses to the dilemas of life. It may be one of these "higher" or more evolutionarily developed parts of our neo-cortex or Intellectual Center which can dampen down and modify our automatic, mechanical emotional responses to lifes events.

Reconciling is an active, self-initiated process. With enough practice, it may even become automatic; as if from our unconscious.

It is one thing to take in impressions impartially; it is another thing to respond to them appropriately.

This is where Work on the 5 Oblogolnian Strivings and the bearing of the unpleasant manifestations of others and putting ones self in the shoes of others and of External Considering and of Work on bearing the unpleasant manifestations of the organ Kundabuffer (Egoism) comes in.

"It is not our abilities that tell us what we truly are ... it is our choices. " - Albus Dumbledore

---

by JohnS

After doing this meditation regularly, I have come across several 'traits' that are constant and, so far, unchanged in resonance:
On the good side, I am finding that chakras 5 and 8 are the most responsive to this energy flow: 8 feels constantly ready to open further, and 5 always has a hugely expanding quality.
Regarding areas needing development, I cannot feel the presence of the throat chakra at all, so there is obviously some work to do here.
Regarding the sensing of the chakra mpositions: I had some difficulty putting a location to the plexus chakra, but if I switched briefly to the I Am head-plexus meditation, I could find it easily, and this was translatable to the current exercise.
An excellent practise, this, and it feels like it will be of large benefit

Thankyou all

Work Program week beginning 29 March 2010

---

by Judy

Note: There have been requests to continue this programme up for another week. As such, Part 2 has been changed slightly

Theme: Meditation linking Chakras and the Enneagram

This week we have a meditation to be done as the morning or evening sitting. The idea overall is to link the energy chakras with the enneagram in the manner explained in the paper "Chakras and the Enneagram", to be found on http://www.doremishock.com. (Lee Van Laer; NY Foundation)
Thus it is recommended that you first of all have a look at this article, especially pp22-26, and glance at all diagrams for clarification. Please also note the caveats of testing and personal verification.

This exercise is to aid the development emotional center in particular.

The following is a much-simplified version, which may serve as an introduction to the full "Meditation on the 6 Gifts" for anyone interested. As such, it only involves the first sequential number of the enneagram, 142857, and does not at this stage progress through the multiplications beginning with 285714 etc, I suggest an approximate sitting time of fifteen to twenty minutes.
If anyone wishes to experiment with all the multiplications, expect forty minutes at least. From my own recent experience, it also helps to write down all the multiplications on a piece of paper which you may wish to glance at quite a bit in the beginning.

Legend:
Do Crown chakra
Re Root Chakra 1
Mi Belly Chakra 2
Fa Solar plexus chakra 4
Sol Heart/Lung chakra 5
La Throat chakra 7
Si Third Eye 8

Sit in comfortable position with spine straight as usual.
Relax as much as possible using a favorite method.
Remember to sense the whole body prior to beginning.
Begin with the Holy Affirming Prayer (or one of your own choice).

Part 1: (working with the human energy-flow 142857)

1 - Focus the attention on the root chakra, intoning “one” on inward breath. Here one seeks the fullest possible sensation possible in the root chakra at the very base of the spine.
4 - Allow the attention to move upward to the solar plexus, intoning “four” on outward breath. In doing so, see what relationship exists between the solar plexus and the root.
2 - Allow the attention to move to the belly, intoning “two” on outward breath.
8 - Move the attention to the third eye, intoning “eight.”
5 - Move the attention to the middle of the chest, that is, the heart and lungs, intoning “five.”
7 - Move the attention to the throat and back of the neck, intoning “seven.”

Part 2: (being receptive and open to possibility of the gift of Higher Energy)

Visualize Divine Love energy flowing out in all directions from your Heart Chakra. Where this energy goes is not of your concern and isn beyond your control. The sower sows the seed; the seed falls where it will.

---

by Judy

No news from the author of the exercise connecting chakras with the enneagram. It works quite well for me with the intonation on the inward breath only for the first numeral of each enneagram - as mentioned last week - and intonations on outward breath for the other five numerals.

Ian wrote:

> Visualize Divine Love energy flowing out in all directions from your Heart Chakra. Where this energy goes is not of your concern and isn beyond your control. The sower sows the seed; the seed falls where it will.

This is lovely, and at Easter, too.
Easter blessings to all.
Regards,
Judy.

Work Program week beginning 5 April 2010

---

by Ian

Bennett Chakra Exercise (Modified):

(start with 3 and work up to 7 breaths)

Sense the root chakra (muladhara)
Breathe in and out of this area 3 or 7 times.
When breathing out, intone or chant: A-A-A-... etc 3-7 times.

Sense the sex chakra (svadhisthana)
Breathe in and out of this area 3 or 7 times.
When breathing out, intone or chant: I-I-I-... etc 3-7 times.

Sense the solar plexus chakra(manipura)
Breathe in and out of this area 3 or 7 times.
When breathing out, intone or chant: E-E-E-... etc 3-7 times.

Sense the heart chakra (anahata)
Breathe in and out of this area 3 or 7 times.
When breathing out, intone or chant: iO-iO-iO-... etc 3-7 times.

Sense the throat chakra (vishuddha)
Breathe in and out of this area 3 or 7 times.
When breathing out, intone or chant: I-I-I-... etc 3-7 times.

Sense the third eye chakra (Ajna)
Breathe in and out of this area 3 or 7 times.
When breathing out, intone or chant: uO-uO-uO-... etc 3-7 times.

Sense the crown chakra (Sahasrara)
Breathe in and out of this area 3 or 7 times.
When breathing out, intone or chant: A-A-A-... etc 3-7 times.

The phrase: AIEIOIUOA is taken from Gurdjieff's book Beelzebub's Tales. It represents symbolically the sound of Remorse.
Unfortunalely the AIEIOIUOA and the 9 points of the enneagram do not line up nicely with the Law of 7 (and by analogy, with the chakras); thus the condensation of 2 of the letters with 2 of the shocks (iO and uO). This "anomaly" shows up some of the difficulties of reconciling Gurdjieff's system with other spiritual systems. This is why it is stressed here that we need to experiment and find what exercises work for us as individuals and not force everything into fixed formulas.

Work Program week beginning 12 April 2010

---

by Karen

Note: Feel free to replace 'anger' with any other emotion to make this practice your own.

Today, my anger is about …….
Pause, Breathe Deeply, and Feel/Sense the Movement of the 'anger' in your body as you sit quietly.

Today, in feeling my anger, I realize that I am missing out on the opportunity to feel …….
Pause, Breathe Deeply, and Look around with a Sightless Gaze at your surroundings as you sit quietly.

Today, I realize that beyond my anger, I also feel …….
Pause, Breathe Deeply, and Listen with a Soundless Sound to your surroundings as you sit quietly.

Today, I realize that I can support myself and my anger better, by realizing that my anger is connected to my feeling of …….
Pause, Breathe Deeply, and Feel/Sense the Movement in your body as you sit quietly.

Today, I realize that what I would like to feel in the place of anger is …….
Pause, Breathe Deeply, and Look around with a Sightless Gaze at your surroundings as you sit quietly.

Today, I realize that feeling peace and calm is a wonderful experience.
Pause, Breathe Deeply, and Listen with a Soundless Sound to your surroundings as you sit quietly.

Today, I realize that I can breathe in anger, and breathe out compassion and love.
Pause, Breathe Deeply In AND Out, and Feel/Sense the Movement in your body as you sit quietly.

Today, I know that I can face my anger again tomorrow, with courage and compassion.
Pause, Breathe Deeply, and Feel/Sense the Movement in your body as you sit quietly.

Today, I can rest in the grace of the world and be free.
Pause, Breathe Deeply, and Feel/Sense the Movement in your body as you sit quietly.

---

by Judy

This exercise arrived on the site just in time for this morning's sitting.

I substituted "negativity" for "anger".
Apart from the peace and calm generated, the experience has provided some material for me to work with. It indeed provided quite an effective method for observing my mechanical emotions - you know, the ones not often noticed at all, as I go along unaware of them as a backdrop and restricting influence on everything.

First one spotted was worry (nothing in particular, simply an unnecessary generalised niggling about lots of things). I had assumed this was all in my head. Not so. I watched this undercurrent affecting both heart and throat centres in a sort of tighening tensing way. It made my voice different too. Perhaps chakras were noticed more easily owing to recent work.

The exercise also gives acouple of additional methods to my usual ones for working on negativity.
For example:

> Today, I realize that I can breathe in anger, and breathe out compassion and love.

When on this step, some involuntary visualisation happened. I was walking into one of the Pyramids. Outside there was a large pool of quicksand, and I dropped the tight bundle of worry into it and walked on without it.

Also much appreciated are several steps which suggest ways of deepening the main inquiry - for example -

> Today, in feeling my anger, I realize that I am missing out on the opportunity to feel …….

and -

> Today, I realize that beyond my anger, I also feel …….

More inquiring to do.
Thanks for this one, Karen.

Work Program week beginning 19 April 2010

---

by Ian

Joseph Campbell Chakra Exercise:

(start with 3 breaths and work up to 7 breaths)

1. Start by Sensing the area of the heart and build up an emotional charge of Divine Love in the heart chakra (anahata).
Breathe in and out of this area 3 times.

2. Sense the solar plexus chakra (manipura).
Breathe in and out of this area 3 times.
As you breathe, move the energy from the heart chakra into the solar plexus chakra.

3. Sense the throat chakra (vishuddha).
Breathe in and out of this area 3 times.
As you breathe, move the energy from the solar plexus chakra into the throat chakra.

4. Sense the sex chakra (svadhisthana).
Breathe in and out of this area 3 times.
As you breathe, move the energy from the throat chakra into the sex chakra.

5. Sense the third eye chakra (Ajna).
Breathe in and out of this area 3 times.
As you breathe, move the energy from the sex chakra into the third eye chakra.

6. Sense the root chakra (muladhara).
Breathe in and out of this area 3 times.
As you breathe, move the energy from the third eye chakra into the root chakra.

7. Sense the crown chakra (Sahasrara).
Breathe in and out of this area 3 times.
As you breathe, move the energy from the root chakra up the spine into the crown chakra.

8. Sense the crown chakra (Sahasrara).
Breathe in and out of this area 3 times, radiating the Divine Love that originally came from the heart chakra.

Work Program week beginning 26 April 2010

---

by Judy

Paraphrased from Seymour B. Ginsburg's Gurdjieff Unveiled, pp113-114:

For this week the exercise is the self-observation of “wiseacring”. This term appears numerous times throughout Beelzebub's Tales to His Grandson. It is a form of lying in which we pretend to know more than we actually know. The dictionary calls a “wiseacre”, one who represents himself or herself to be well-informed or clever, a know-it-all or smart-aleck.

This exercise has two parts:

Self-observe when we wiseacre to another person. Observe this form of lying in ourselves. Self-observe our emotions when someone else wiseacres to us.

As always in the moment of self-observation, use the tool of “attention” to divide the attention so as to include the sensation/experience of self in the moment. Use attention to sensation of part or all of the body as the primary tool for this purpose.

The method of self-observation and resulting self-consciousness may be expressed as follows:

Observe an object. The object can be an external object like a candle or it can be an internal object like an emotional state: i.e. Anxiety, fear, internal considering, desire, pride, vanity, etc. See the object. See what is seeing the object. Drop away the object. What is left is that you are seeing or observing what is seeing the object. In other words, you are aware of being aware. This is true self-remembering or self-awareness, avoiding the trap of illusory self-remembering.

There is a subtle distinction between true self-remembering and illusory self-remembering. True self-remembering requires not only being aware of ourselves in our attention and at the same time including the internal or external object. It also means that we must be aware of being aware of ourselves in the moment. This requires a kind of “backing-out” as we do in meditation. To re-quote this method using Thomas Merton's attempt at description: “A door opens in the center of our being and we seem to go through it into immense depths.” This is rather like an infinite regression within as we “back” further out, ever more detached from the personality. The theory behind the benefit of a group undertaking such an exercise is that the group supplies a kind of “will” that as individuals we assume that we have, but in actuality we do not have.

(end of paraphrasing)

Note to all:

The final sentence explains it quite clearly. This Work is impossible to sustain alone for most of us. That is why we are in a group.
If you have read thus far, then I request that you at least post to that effect. If you commit to the exercise, in addition, please post a comment within two or three days of reading. Even if you do no more, this will be helping those who wish to work daily.

---

by Karen

> The theory behind the benefit of a group undertaking such an exercise is that the group supplies a kind of “will” that as individuals we assume that we have, but in actuality we do not have.
>
> (end of paraphrasing)
>
> Note to all:
>
> The final sentence explains it quite clearly. This Work is impossible to sustain alone for most of us. That is why we are in a group.
> If you have read thus far, then I request that you at least post to that effect. If you commit to the exercise, in addition, please post a comment within two or three days of reading. Even if you do no more, this will be helping those who wish to work daily.

When we gather as a group with an aligned intention to work, does this create third force? Harry, is this why you said a while back in a post that the weekly work exercises were so important?

I will join in the powers of intentionality. Judy, thank you for your ongoing efforts to create weekly programs.

Karen

---

by Ian

We can increase or enhance or strengthen the force of our intentionality by Working together.
We must each individually Work towards a place of Being where we can eventually do this on our own.
A Work group is only an intermediate step; an apprenticeship.
Whatever our place in the Work, remember that whatever you do or share may well be of great help to others, whether you know of it or not.

by Lawrick

An experience I wish to share.

I leave my home with a copy of Judy's weekly work program in my hand.

Sense what is seeing the object.
Drop away the object.

I observe the passing Elm trees as I drive to my local bistro for my morning coffee. Above, a sea sky threatening rain but withholding from the Earth and the Elm. Rain dammit! The spring has come a month early and the snow which would normally moisturizes the Earth for spring planting has already evaporated leaving the ground tinder dry. ``Get on with it`` something in me demands.
Mustn't mess with the Elemental Water I think.

I observe myself slowly driving, watching the trees, and drop the trees. A calm peace becomes. I am here! Something quietly watching. You've been absent much too long my friend, myself.

The café' is standing quiet, grey, and subdued like the weather. I pour myself a coffee, sit down, and set down Judy's work program. I begin to read and in an instant the blessed Consciousness floods back. I observe my left hand, my thumb, index and ring fingers lightly holding down the paper. The pen in my right hand is hovering and ready. How did the pen get there I wonder. All is in stillness.

Both hands in suspension above the page framed by the charcoal grey counter top.

Somewhere within, in a calm silent place, something watches. I sense my breath, the indigo nerves radiating through my body. I sense my weight on the chair, and my body as one. How strange! All is calm, quiet, peaceful. Yet serious, purposeful. I try to Work.

I try to drop the paper page but it's contrasting whiteness claims my vision. There is depth and type boldness moving in and out of my field as I observe simply. A word moves; a sentence or line stands out, everything is in motion.

I try to make a note heavy and far away from the paper. My hand does not want to move. How strange. This Consciousness is definitely in my head this time, yet seems light years away. But not so far away. Present, just vast and infinite. I am a speck so insignificant that I cant move my hand. Ha! But I do somehow although I don't know why. I write the word Pineal so lightly in such tiny letters that I can barely read it. Why pineal. Why write at all. Idiot!

All the while, my inner thief tries to create tension in my feet, my neck, my arms, everywhere in the body. This time I'm able to breath away all friction. The pineal gland begins its rotation, a sensation I feel actually moving my hair although I can't say anything really moves. It lets me know its involved. I have a strong sense of this area.

Timeless, calm, humbling, beautiful, grateful.

The attractive waitress comes by to say hi. She's been working another job in a punk bar at night. Her hair is cut in a Mohawk, blonde roots and pink edging. The rest of her head is shaved highlighting the perfect gold earings.
Her eyebrows are pink as well. She wears red leather army boots. When I was growing up one of our insults was to tell someone their "mother wore army boots!" Now army boots are in fashion. How life changes.

A belt of chromed .30 caliber machine gun bullets circumnavigates her hips pushed way down to accentuate. A fitting symbol for all the danger lurking down there I surmise. Her blouse is cut so low I think good cough would pop those babies out. Yet so strange is this mood that little sexuality is involved.

She's an artist. She studies at the University here. I mention that I saw a sculpture by Thomas More on the Antiques Road Show the other night. The statue was a 7 inch cast bronze thing that had been hand worked by the artist. The piece is called "Body with a Half Head" or something like that. I think of Harry and smile. And I smile because the owner tells the appraiser that he's never been able to figure out which is front and which is rear. "Easy, commands the appraiser, " More always signed his sculpture on the back!" I think again of Harry and Ian and the group and wade deliciously through this wonderful inner smile as I ponder, " What if More changed his habits somewhere through his career and nobody found out.`` Heh, heh, heh!

As Ian writes from Life of Brian,

"You're all individuals!"
The crowd roars, " We're all individuals"!
"I'm not" a voice pipes up.

I'm reminded of a friend discussing the idea of the "Tird in the Plaza." When I asked what it was, I was told that when any new large and pleasing to the contemporary eyes, building is constructed, at some point a giant wood, steel, or ceramic bird swoops down to deposit this large Tird in the Plaza to commemorate this event. And there is rusts till eternity. Smart lady.

The waitress leaves and I return to the exercise to find nothing has changed. There's been a conversation, delicious distractions, but I haven't been distracted, Blessed Joy! I`m still here.

Eventually of course I lose it trying to keep it and I can not get it back. But what a gift form beyond and for so long.

And I think of our Aussi group member from down under, the one with the red hair and shoes, and extend a silent thanks for her program.

What a morning!

Lawrick

---

by JohnS

"And I think of our Aussi group member from down under, the one with the red hair and shoes, and extend a silent thanks for her program."

Amen! What a change in awareness this programme (proper English spelling!) has rendered. It is so focussing, so constant, and so powerful. All thanks, Judy.
And what a wonderful posting from our Canadian stalwart! Before I read this, I was musing on Ian's posting, and vacillating between the effectiveness of the force of a flesh-and-blood group and that of a hovering online community. Fred solved the dichotomy by this wonderfully detailed and emotionally direct posting.
My experience is in reverse: I had a similar level of awareness way back in 1972 (one of very many in that year), and Fred's detail has reminded me that, contrary to what I worried about in my last Beelzebub post -the gap between imagination and real knowledge - this knowledge was already actually there, complete, so many years ago, so that the difference between then and now is only the stripping away of the shell to what was always there. Its not a gradual accumulation, it is (as Nicoll puts it) an upwards ascension, the path of the Vertical Man.
Thank you all.

---

by Judy

Mr Sy Ginsburg is the one to thank.

His "Gurdjieff Unveiled" is a multi-faceted shining little gem - and so practical.
What I like in particular about this exercise is the way it increases the liklihood of real self-remembering at the end of each self-observation attempt. And if used in seeing an outside object, then the self-remembering is effective. Mr Ginsburg achieves this with succinct clear language which is easily followed.
I see from an Amazon email that he has a new book out. That's one for the next order.
Best wishes to all,
Judy.

---

by Ian

> Judy wrote:
> Mr Sy Ginsburg is the one to thank.

Sy is one of the 3 original convenors of the A&E Conference, and it is a priveledge to know him.

Sy's books:

Gurdjieff Unveiled - one of the best books I've read on the Work and how to run a group...
http://www.amazon.com/Gurdjieff-unveiled-overview-introduction-teaching/dp/1904998011

Haven't read this yet but this is his new one...
The Masters Speak: An American Businessman Encounters Ashish and Gurdjieff - http://www.amazon.com/Masters-Speak-Businessman-Encounters-Gurdjieff/dp/0835608824/ref=pd_rhf_p_t_2

In Search of the Unitive Vision: Letters of Sri Madhava Ashish to an American Businessman - http://www.amazon.com/Search-Unitive-Vision-Businessman-1978-1997/dp/1892138050/ref=sr_1_1?ie=UTF8&s=books&qid=1272666543&sr=1-1

Sy helped get this published in 2007; thin but dense and highly recommend, especially for those into dreams...
An Open Window: Dream as Everyman's Guide to the Spirit - http://www.amazon.com/s/ref=nb_sb_noss?url=search-alias%3Dstripbooks&field-keywords=9780143100232

"In the unitive vision the identity of the individual with the universal is experienced, and it is perceived that this identity encompasses all being as an eternally valid fact. It has not come into being with the seer's attainment to the vision, but simply is. What comes into being, or more truly, is developed in the seer, is the seer's capacity to perceive the identity. In this context it seems meaningless to say that any individual man ever attains anything. The spirit raises its human vehicle out of its own being and, through this vehicle, achieves knowledge both of the qualities it has made manifest to itself and of the undifferentiated and unmanifest being within which all qualities inhere. Our life is its life; our awareness is its awareness; our desire to live, to experience, and to know, is its desire." --- (Sri Madhava Ashish in Ginsburg, Seymour B., In Search of the Unitive Vision: Letters of Sri Madhava Ashish to an American Businessman, 1978-1997. Boca Raton: New Paradigm Books, 2001.)

---

by AlbertoB

I read the A&E 2002 conference by Seymour Ginsburg "The High Commission etc.".
This essay clearified a very important trouble i had with the Beelzebub Tales, how to understand the apparently ridiculous demi-gods or archangels who fill the book.

Now, i'm sure that "Gurdjieff unveiled" is a great book, but unfortunately i'm trying to read Jane Heap, she is extraordinary, but very difficult for me. About this week's program, is very stimulating, but (again) very difficult.
I'm afraid it will increase my guiltiness with the Work.
Anyway, thanks Judy.

---

by Harry

Remember the first purpose of All and Everything. To destroy mercilessly everything that you thought was true. Or untrue, for that matter. We must leave go of our fantasies. And much of what we taught is like a flat earth.

---

by Ian

> Harry wrote:
> Remember the first purpose of All and Everything. To destroy mercilessly everything that you thought was true. Or untrue, for that matter. We must leave go of our fantasies. And much of what we taught is like a flat earth.

Much of what we were taught is a negatively curved earth...

---

by JohnS

The most revealing aspect of this amazing exercise is the intensity of focus available, together with the ease it seems to give to a long meditation time.
I was party today to a very enlightening variation: it was based on my constant need to boost my emotional life, as I have always been deficient in this area due to my intellectual /analytical bias. I initiated a meditation using only solar plexus position 4, using the name of someone to whom I feel intense gratitude. As soon as this process was underway (name at position 4 on the inbreath, no thought except observation on the outbreath), I noticed the participation of position 8 as an observer and mediator (mediating things such as imagination and emotional involvement). and the constancy and focus was able to be continued for an hour.
Then a variation happened which I don't want to analyse: I dozed off for a minute, and when I recovered I automatically took it up again, but suddenly, in this new incarnation, position 4 had been replaced by 7, again with 8 supervising. This continued for about 20 minutes, after which I started getting a distinct echo on the name on the inbreath. This seemed to be some kind of message to stop there.
It feels like a powerful focussing tool, and something which has a lasting effect in certain areas, more and more so as it is explored.

---

by Gururaj

Strong waves of life have kept me away from the harbour of this Work group and neither have I have been expert enough to dive down and make headway to stay connected . (Any 'wiseacring' going on here ?)
So when I read only today the exercise for the week beginning 26th of April, there is a feeling of remorse. So much value has been available to me from the active group members and it behoves upon me to strive to do my bit.
I commit myself to the exercise and shall share my experience soon.
The reading of the exercise and an initial attempt gives rise to one point of perplexity – if self-remembering is to be simultaneously aware of the observer while observing/including the observed how can we 'drop' what is observed ? Maybe 'dropping' implies non-identification alone
Gururaj

---

by Judy

Gururaj wrote:

> The reading of the exercise and an initial attempt gives rise to one point of perplexity – if self-remembering is to be simultaneously aware of the observer while observing/including the observed how can we 'drop' what is observed ? Maybe 'dropping' implies non-identification alone

This is an interesting question you have asked.

Essentially, I think it involves a change in the direction of the attention.
I also played with this question in various ways. For example, when viewing an object in the outside world, I experimented by closing the eyes to achieve the "dropping". Of course that's cheating, but served the purpose of illustrating just how effective this "dropping" could become.

Anyone else care to add comments, thoughts, ideas on this?

---

by Judy

John wrote:

> The most revealing aspect of this amazing exercise is the intensity of focus available, together with the ease it seems to give to a long meditation time.

John, I noticed this as well - quite markedly - with the Enneagram/chakras exercise. Useful.

Interesting that you comment on your "intellectual bias". Your work on emotional development must be effective. 😎

---

by Gururaj

One instance of 'wiseacring' was 'captured' this week just after occurence.On being unexpectedly invited for lunch in a traditional religious place where a certain attire is expected of men,and which I was not possessing then,I nevertheless moved in to the serving hall.One of the servers questioned me in such a way which made me think that he is doubting my 'eligibility' for partaking food there. So when the plate was laid and the time came to start eating,I went thru' the motions of a certain ritual which is traditionally done at the beginning (and which i do not normally follow ,since I have not sought and understood its inner significance) more to demonstrate to the doubting Thomas that i belonged to the place.Thanks to the task,could identify this 'wiseacring' action arising from an ego gratification emotion.

As regards the divided attention (self-remembering) by dropping the object ,this has proved quite elusive.I was able to better sense self,momentarily, with the sightless gaze 'method' than with this approach.I brought in the thought that 'I' am aware instead of just being aware .Still no real taste beyond a fleeting detached experience.Thanks Judith,for the suggestion.An analogous situation (to closing the eyes) was my past experience of becoming conscious of my feelings when any blackout suddenly interrupted my engrossed viewing of a program on TV. Will be continuing to wrestle with this key experiencing.
Gururaj

Work Program week beginning 3 May 2010

---

by Ian

The current 3 month theme is based on Mr Beidler's text called "Sacrifice".

One of the things we are asked to consider sacrificing is our beliefs in various spiritual teachings.
The various teachings that we are asked to consider giving up include all ideas advanced as spiritual teachings by, such as...

What things that Gurdjieff taught could we consider giving up?
What thihgs that Jesus taught could we consider giving up?
What things that Moses taught that we could consider giving up?
What things that Mohammed tauht that we could consider giving up?
What things that the Bhagavad Gita taught that we could consider giving up?
What things that Buddha taught that we could consider giving up?

In the Seekers wish to open their channel to conscience, the Seeker will try to avoid identification with those objects upon which their senses tend to focus.
As a searching priest, the Seeker will pray each morning and night that they may deserve help in their work from those Higher Powers whose existence depends upon the vibrations released by the sufferings and sacrifices of humanity.
The Seeker will attempt to give up belief in one strongly held spiritual teaching this week.
Whilst doing so, the Seeker will strongly Sense their Solar Plexus.

---

by Alistair

Dear Ian & the group

Please accept my apology for disappearing from the online group. If nothing else a 44 day odyssey that began on March 11th and included attendance at the All & Everything Conference has demonstrated to me how little self discipline is present in me where self work is concerned.

During the journey there was no remorse experienced for failing to contribute to the online workgroup. It was possible to continue some personal routine practices. On returning home there was also little or no remorse for the first few days but now some pangs are upon me.

This is so difficult to write because I feel there is nothing to say, nothing we have is our own and has all been said before. If we seek we will receive exactly what is commensurate with our capacity for understanding. It seems that just the notion to seek for higher consciousness is suffering in itself given the magnitude of this search for the miraculous.

If it can be deemed an exercise and I question my own capacity to suggest an exercise for others it would be a constant exercise to question in ourselves the honesty and sincerity in all our thoughts and deeds. The difficulty here being our understanding of honesty & sincerity.

Having left my place of relative solitude, where due to my inability to engage locals in small talk verbal communication is limited to my partner who speaks English, it appears that the task of self work is more difficult in our modern noisy microwave world. Most human activities tend to be more profitable in quiet peaceful environments. Idries Shah writes in Learning How to Learn, ‘many Sufis insisted on solitude and anonymity, refusing to associate with people. Gurdjieff did of course state that his teaching was quite suitable for application in ‘everyday’ life. However in recent years outer form has surely changed to the extent that there are more buffer inducements than ever. So it seems for me at least that peace and tranquillity are a benefit in self work and that despite my isolated geographic location that makes it at this time impossible to participate in a group physically the online alternative is the appropriate stimulus and having today finally made some effort after my ‘holiday’ will endeavour to participate in a way that is useful to the group.

My father who was undoubtedly an obyvatel used to comment on the need to always bear in mind first principles. Idries Shah writes again in Learning How to Learn, ‘people can learn from groups and meetings only to the extent to which they have overcome the four traps which Sheikh Abdullah Ansari of Herat stresses
Ingratitude in good fortune
Impatience in ill fortune
Discontent with their lot
Hesitation in serving their fellows

Awareness of these must be a constant exercise?
The trickiest of these, the third perhaps; seeking in any sense implies discontent to some extent?
On the other hand would this be fair justification in giving up belief in this part of Sheikh Ansari’s spiritual teaching for this week at least?
Alistair

---

by Gururaj

Welcome back (online),Alistair :
It was good to hear from you .Quite appropriately Ian had mentioned 2 weeks ago that "Whatever our place in the Work, remember that whatever you do or share may well be of great help to others,whether you know of it or not."

Regarding Sheikh Abdullah Ansari of Herat's observation that 'Discontent with their lot" is a hindrance for a seeker from getting value from a group , I reckon maybe he was pointing to something which can be gleaned in your own feelings "On returning home there was also little or no remorse for the first few days but now some pangs are upon me".(And ,presumably,the resultant post from you,is a positive reconciliation)

From my own experience, my feelings of not being able to give (or,rarely,get) value vis-a-vis the group is a sort of discontent which I hope will be countered by an intention to participate actively.
Your comment, i understand, leans more towards discontent with oneself vis-a-vis one's own spiritual 'progress'.Yes, this is quite an issue for me being in the midst of a whirl of handling a lot of commitments simultaneously.But,I guess, if the Work reminders were not there from the Group,I would have been totally asleep.
Gururaj

---

by Judy

Regarding the words of Ansari of Herat --

> Discontent with their lot

Seekers certainly need what I'll term "a divine discontent", and one of the Strivings concerns "having everything necessary for the planetary body" - which of course implies by omission a line being drawn between the 'necessary' and the simply 'wished-for'.

I headed to the favourite etymology site, where it turns out that the word "discontent" originated in the 15th century. So perhaps the conundrum is one of translation?
The earlier words of equivalence may well have differentiated between spiritual and material 'discontent'.

Most interesting information, folks.
Regards,
Judy.

---

by Ian

> Alistair wrote:
> Dear Ian & the group
>
> Please accept my apology for disappearing from the online group. If nothing else a 44 day odyssey that began on March 11th and included attendance at the All & Everything Conference has demonstrated to me how little self discipline is present in me where self work is concerned.

I too was at the conference and was thus absent from the Group for two weeks.

> During the journey there was no remorse experienced for failing to contribute to the online workgroup. It was possible to continue some personal routine practices. On returning home there was also little or no remorse for the first few days but now some pangs are upon me.

There are times when I don't post a weekly exercise for the Group until a Tuesday, and I feel remorse over that.

> This is so difficult to write because I feel there is nothing to say, nothing we have is our own and has all been said before. If we seek we will receive exactly what is commensurate with our capacity for understanding. It seems that just the notion to seek for higher consciousness is suffering in itself given the magnitude of this search for the miraculous.

As Harry said here - (Work Program week beginning 26 April 2010)
"Remember the first purpose of All and Everything. To destroy mercilessly everything that you thought was true. Or untrue, for that matter. We must leave go of our fantasies. And much of what we taught is like a flat earth."

> If it can be deemed an exercise and I question my own capacity to suggest an exercise for others it would be a constant exercise to question in ourselves the honesty and sincerity in all our thoughts and deeds. The difficulty here being our understanding of honesty & sincerity.

The questions you pose below could be the basis of a very good Work programme.... please work them up into a weekly programme for us all...

> My father who was undoubtedly an obyvatel used to comment on the need to always bear in mind first principles. Idries Shah writes again in Learning How to Learn, ‘people can learn from groups and meetings only to the extent to which they have overcome the four traps which Sheikh Abdullah Ansari of Herat stresses
> Ingratitude in good fortune
> Impatience in ill fortune

Discontent with their lot
Hesitation in serving their fellows

Awareness of these must be a constant exercise?
The trickiest of these, the third perhaps; seeking in any sense implies discontent to some extent?
On the other hand would this be fair justification in giving up belief in this part of Sheikh Ansari’s spiritual teaching for this week at least?
Alistair

Work Program week beginning 10 May 2010

---

by James

The exercise suggested is to be aware of entering and exiting doorways. To enter and exit through a door, using the right foot first. When going to the bathroom, to use the left foot when entering and the right foot when leaving. Attention also being given to the opening and closing of doors, using the correct amount of force.

Each time one enters or exits a door, Sense the feet doing the walking, and also Ponder on the idea of Reciprocal Maintenance.

---

by Gururaj

An apparently simple and do-able task.But the experience has been somewhat like the results of the recent elections to the UK parliament.
I remembered the task at the time of going thru' doors only as often as the Lib.Dem. found favour with the voters,realised I had missed the opportunity just after crossing doors as often as the Labour vote share and ,finally ,was quite unaware of having moved thru' doors, more often than not,similar to the Conservative vote share.

So ,from what I understand about Reciprocal Maintenance,whether this predominance of mechanicalness means that ,as i am now,the Downward ray of Creation is stronger and the contribution due to conscious reciprocation ,back up the chain, is weaker ?

Would welcome some pointers on how the sensing of Reciprocal Maintenance in one is experienced arising from this task.
Gururaj

---

by Harry

Don't judge. Just do. If you remember just after you walked through the door, then observe yourself at that moment. Yes, it can be a shock to realize how mechanical we are. But that's the first step. If you don't see the fault do you ever want to correct it. Until you have an I that can see these events, it can't grow.

---

by Alistair

Thanks Harry, that saved me grinding out my mill of nonsense

Work Program week beginning 17 May 2010

by Gururaj

Being conscious of and intentionally using our faculty of SPEAKING to others.

Throughout the day, while speaking, be aware of the quality of your speech – its articulation, intonation, rate at which the words come out, intensity or volume, fluency and so on.

Observe how it varies with emotions, situations and person(s) with whom the conversation is occuring.

Also be aware of the physicality of the facial muscles and vocal chords being used.

In at-least one situation every day of the week experiment with expressing with a different and intentional quality in a state of all-brains-balanced-being perception.

Work Program week beginning 24 May 2010

---

by Alister

To what extent have I/we/you overcome the four traps to be avoided as stressed by Sheikh Abdullah Ansari of Herat.

Ingratitude in good fortune.
Impatience in ill fortune.
Discontent with your lot.
Hesitation in serving your fellows.

Memorise these.

Ponder your sincerity in avoiding them.

Do you avoid them sincerely feeling with your whole mass?
Do you avoid them because you think or feel you should?

Which is most difficult for you & why?
Provide an example of this for the group.

---

by Ian

Whenever you experience ---

Ingratitude in good fortune. --- Sense your legs. Ponder: Why do I feel ingratitude?

Impatience in ill fortune. --- Sense your sex. Ponder: Why do I feel impatience?

Discontent with your lot. ---Sense your heart. Ponder: Why do I feel discontented?

Hesitation in serving your fellows. --- Sense your head. Ponder: Why do I hesitate?

---

by Judy

I suspect that I may be ungrateful much more often than I'm aware of. How does this feeling manifest? What cunning kind of negativity is unappreciativeness? How much harm does it cause me? How much hurt to others?
Shaespeare finds it important:

> "Blow, blow, thou winter wind,"

"Thou art not so unkind"
"As man's ingratitude:"
"Because thou art not seen,"
"Although thy breath be rude" [William Shakespeare As You Like It]
"Time hath, my lord, a wallet at his back,"
"Wherein he puts alms for oblivion,"
"A great-sized monster of ingratitudes:"
"Those scraps are good deeds past: which are devoured"
"As fast as they are made, forgot as soon"
"As done" [William Shakespeare Troilus and Cressida]

I'm doing a small gartitude list each morning - just five different things each day.

The fourth trap - hesitation in serving - also needs increased awareness and inquiry.

Thanks, Alistair.
Judy.

---

by Judy

Inquiry into these four traps continues to be enlightening.
I see why they are called "traps"!
I began the task expecting to be free of at least a couple of these. It turns out, with very little inquiry (using observing/listening to inner talking), that they are all present. Sure some of them are indirect and don't appear as the name suggests - for example, ingratitude may appear as a sneaky inner grumbling as to 'why is it still so humid and hot when it is supposed to be late Autumn' (instead of gratitude for the sunshine), and similar.

As to the "why" - well, so far it seems to be mostly coming down to a rather poor state in the particular moment, forgetting to be present, forgetting to be as conscious as I go about everyday tasks.
I am trying out a couple of different methods here. So far, maintaining awareness of an inner smile is working quite well.

---

by Lawrick

Another excellent work program. I apologize for not replying to the previous.

One of my chief negative features is impatience. It has been one of the banes and curses of my existence. My patience, or lack of same, is a certain indicator of the state of my Being.

Yesterday while driving home from work I was required to wait at a traffic light for several minutes. At the end of this wait something in me had been worked into a fury. So strong was this stupidity that it was extremely difficult to neutralize. I think the state of my energy plays a significant part in my ability to recognize and neutralize these manifestations, so completely useless to one's Being. The only exception of course, would be as a reminding factor.

Several years ago I read a quote by some great Sufi master whose name I have since forgotten. The quote reads ' gratitude is half the path to Grace", or something similar. It appears that this program might deal with some of those other necessities pertinent to the path of Wisdom.

This "hesitation in serving your fellows" is also another weakness. Partially because of my "hermetic" nature. Partially because of the gnawing contempt I hold for certain portions, positions of society. Regardless, I will further contemplate and perhaps find myself closer to the roots of the problem.

Good joke about the neutron Karen.
So, an electron walks into a bar and asks the bartender for a drink.
He asks the bartender how much.
The bartender replies, ……

Lawrick

---

by Ian

Impatience is a form of suffering , just as is sorrow, remorse, depression, anxiety, fear, anger, boredom, indecision, doubt, anguish, grief, internal considering, low self esteem, self hate, feeling worthless, despair, shame, hopelessness, ...

To all of these sufferings we can add a Sensing and a Pondering of the opposite.

---

by Cassandra

Not being satisfied with my Lot came up most often for me. It is an ongoing, recurring theme that touches everything from relationships to a kitchen remodeling. So, how do I respond to these sufferings? Most of the time I don't want to, but I do sometimes say out loud what my error, my 'sin' is, and I know that the attainment of that won't ever suffice. After even some minor efforts at Work, I sometimes feel like I have added something to my being. It is like a Lightness or a lessening of what I think Fred described as gnawing resentment about positions others hold although I still am having trouble with Tea Partiers (see what I mean).

---

by Harry

Cassandra,

Ordinary suffering, like the kitchen, can only be sacrificed. It is ordinary. It is automatic. By not indulging in it, you sacrifice it. Separate from it. Believe me, that is, in and of itself, a totally different kind of suffering.

---

by Gururaj

Pondering on the four pitfalls ,I can see how a sporadic situation which I do'nt like makes me impatient and when bad situations persist ,I lapse into discontent.A lot of energy is wasted (Internal consideration running riot) .Regarding being grateful to and serving fellow-men ,I reckon I am a 'good samaritan'  generally and one enjoys doing a good turn.However the same alacrity is not there in expressing these traits as in getting upset with the unfairness of others.
Harry's suggestion seems quite apt and I shall certainly attempt to discover (what appears quite mystifying to me now) the very different quality of suffering arising from sacrificing automatic suffering.This fits in nicely with the present 3-month program.
Just the other day,expressed anger at the neighbour when he put an obstacle in my parking lot(his window panes opening out into my space) despite my previous remonstartion with him not to do so.During the morning meditation I gave up the feelings of anger .The next day ,sure enough the obstacle stared me in the face again.Calmly ,I closed the window and parked the car .Have also sent a message to him to redesign the window.
Thanks ,Alistair,for making me aware of an area I need to work a lot with much sincerity.
Gururaj

---

by Cassandra

Thanks Harry and Gururaj for your input. Harry, I will try your suggestion to sacrifice ordinary suffering.

---

by Alistair

Since first reading ‘Ansari’s Four Traps’ I have felt that there was something deeply profound in their avoidance. It did not surprise me to note Judi’s comment that they are all present, hence the profundity of Ansari’s challenge.
My feeling is that this all stems from our lack of sincerity or put another way our inability to feel with all our being. It seems that the majority of us are dominated by our thinking centre that pushes us to intellectualise rather than feel. The longer this continues the more difficult it becomes to free ourselves of the dominance of the thinking centre.
The challenge of spotting a failure to avoid one of the traps could be as easy as pick a number between 1&100 given the timescale of a week.
My most chronic discontent springs from the constant irritation I feel from my partner’s son who does little or nothing to help around the house and shows little respect for his mother. Perhaps it is a cultural difference, coming from Presbyterian Scotland with its emphasis on the protestant work ethic and respect for others as opposed to Eastern Europe where it seems mothers pamper & indulge sons regardless of their sons attitude.

The most important conclusion must be not to be impatient in my perceived ill fortune.

Work Program week beginning 31 May 2010

by Judy

Self-observation of internal considering: from Seymour B. Ginsburg's “In Search of the Unitive Vision” p52. (paraphrased).

“In my initial group, as in successive groups, most of the weekly tasks were tasks of self-observation – in particular, observation of our identification of our negative states. The theory was that the act of self-observation helped in itself to free us from identification with what was being observed. A typical task, for example, might entail observation one's own irritation, anger, or rage, using, typically, a modality that Gurdjieff called 'internal considering'. I might observe my worrying about what people think of me, or my being hurt over not being given the recognition that I consider I deserve. I might observe my reactions when I go to the supermarket, fill up my cart, go to the checkout counter, and then am forced to wait for various reasons. I might think 'How dare they interfere with my precious time! I'm not being given the proper valuation', and so on.

The task of self-observation of internal considering which I now need to carry out consists of my self-observing what is gong on within me, taking note of the extent to which I am identified with my irritation and self-righteousness. I would have to see and realize that what was going on at the checkout counter was merely an affront to my personality, which sees itself as real and important, though it is neither.

Another example – the obverse – might be for me to observe the worries I have when I appear before an audience of any sort, worries that might run the gamut of: Am I dressed right? Do I sound right? Will they think what I have to say is stupid? To the extent that I can observe myself in the act of having these worries, I can gain control over them and in that sense become free of them.”

Please report back with an example. If you forget to self-observe at the time of the negativity, please notice the felling in hindsight and report this.

Weekly ponder: from “George Adie, a Gurdjieff Pupil in Australia”, p270.

My Present State.

The essence of action is simplicity
The essence of simplicity is harmony
The essence of harmony is wholeness
The essence of wholeness is unity.
To live and fulfill our obligations
I have to seek them,
I have to know them,

I have to accept them.
I have to be present.
What is my duty?
To be, and to do.
Life is successive,
So what is to come?
Let it be fulfilled now -
As the duty of my present state.

Remember to Sense your body and observe your emotions while Pondering.

---

by Harry

What I have observed mostly, of late, has been a periodic depression that has come with the passing of my mother. It is not so much that my mother is gone. We did all that we could for her. But it is a depression of facing the act of dying. And noticing the immediate and profound difference between her physical self the day before she died and the day she was dying. Like a different being was there. But my own depression comes more from being the eldest now. That I am next. (That is not a conscious thought.) And that I don't want to try to just fill my remaining time.

---

by Cassandra

Harry,

When older people in my family have died, I've felt as if buffers had been removed from around me. I wasn't especially close to some of these people; nevertheless, they'd always been there, and they helped contribute to my outward identity--as a granddaughter (favorite), niece, etc. The Work would ask me, who are you without them? But still, there's something, I think, sacred in the mother-child relationship that doesn't pass away easily.

---

by Alistair

The first part of tonight’s tale is on the subject of an electric cooker, to be precise a two-ring utility stove. My partner and I have been in a stand-off for many months as to whether we should buy one for use during the summer months when it is hot and lighting the wood burning stove can make the house feel uncomfortable. We do have a highly versatile outdoor cooking system brought as a gift from the USA that also burns wood. The wood burning is cited by my partner as good reason for buying the electric appliance that will theoretically save money. My contention from our experience last year is that properly chopped the wood can create a fast hot fire then be left to die and after all the wood is there anyway. Enough, on Thursday I decided when in the city of Simferopol to appease my partner and bought the cheapest variant of the two-ring stove. Well you’ve guessed it when I arrived home I was met with a tirade of abuse about the inadequacy of this particular model which is still sitting unpacked in its box four days later.

My immediate feeling was to either throw it against the wall or jump on it. As it was I managed enough restraint to say or do nothing at all. Am I learning? Everything in the universe is material so just to avoid outward expression is hardly good enough when there was so much burning inside. The struggle against the expression of unpleasant emotion is relatively easy outwardly but inwardly quite a different matter.
You can imagine the following morning in 35 degrees of heat, sweat running off me while digging a well in our garden, having hardly spoken for 24 hours my partner told me that the diameter of the well was too wide. That time I cracked and having thrown my shovel to the ground began attacking the hard packed clay with a pickaxe and lots of anger and hatred.
I used to explode more regularly now I'm not sure whether it's simply a feeling of hopelessness that prevents it more often.
My apologies to you all for appearing to use the group as a marriage/partnership guidance council but these do seem to be the clearest examples available.
Would it be too frank to say that had I read Beelzebub's Tales earlier I might well have avoided the relationship completely, there again don't we receive what we can use at the appropriate moment.
Agh, the terror of the situation again and as I reach the end of this post am left pondering whether it's sincerity or the need for attention that's driving the carriage tonight
Wishing you all a profitable week ahead
Alistair

---

by Gururaj

"Please report back with an example. If you forget to self-observe at the time of the negativity, please notice the felling in hindsight and report this. "

As of now self-observing in the states of negativity is a state yet to be sensed consistently especially when big waves come crashing in like during my running battles with the boss at work whom I perceive to be not sensitive and appreciative enough to the extra efforts I put in and instead gives simplistic advice/commands.The balance is gone,the responses are in-appropriate and my discontent with my lot gets re-inforced.
During an interaction with him last week,In hindsight I recollect that the body was tense,the tone was higher ,the gestures were more rapid and the thought pattern was reactive rather than well-reasoned.Somehow,this time, he listened without himself getting triggered by me and we concluded amicably.

We ,in this group (or me ,in any case) need to re-visit this exercise (and its variants thereof) often ,is my suggestion.

One approach which occured to me to be relevant from the Work concepts , is having a pre-visioned AIM for each role in our various mundane life situations and bringing all centres to be in alignment to this Aim by and by.Bringing simplicity to the simple things of life.Could Any weekly task be fashioned out of this ?
Gururaj

by Judy

Gururaj wrote:

> One approach which occured to me to be relevant from the Work concepts , is having a pre-visioned AIM for each role in our various mundane life situations and bringing all centres to be in alignment to this Aim by and by.Bringing simplicity to the simple things of life.Could Any weekly task be fashioned out of this ?

Yes - many weekly tasks are fashioned on this idea.
One that works for me is to have the overall aim of "being present to the fact that I exist" - "I Am". Of course much of the Work centres on this; the self-remembering, self-observation, and so on. One method I really like for the simple tasks of everyday life is being "mindful" of what I happen to be doing, and doing the task for its own sake - borrowed a little from Buddhist Thich Nhat Hanh's "The Miracle of Mindfulness" in the beginning. And of course as many activities as one can manage should be "three-centered".
For example, when washing dishes, collect oneself into a three-centered state and mentally say;
"I am washing the dishes" and do not wash them for any reason other than to wash the dishes. This way the separation so necessary for self-observation can happen; thus "i" can observe "Judy" washing the dishes. By observing the action of washing the dishes, I am aware of my own existence - "I Am". Life is real, as Mr Gurdjieff says, only then, when I Am.
Good observation here, Gururaj. Why not take it one step further and fashion an exercise for your next suggested weekly Work programme submitted to Ian?

Also, noticing negativity in hindsight is quite usual for the earlier stages of self-observation. This is because the old life method is that one "becomes the negativity itself", and it takes quite a long time of daily self-observing attempts before the observation happens simultaneously. In hindsight was how it began for me too. And I easily slip into that when I forget to remain present. In hindsight is a good start.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Cassandra

I have two examples of discomfort noticed when at a professional meeting. The first was upon entering a large, hotel banquet room and having to enter a buffet line, find a seat, and eat alone while many around me seemed to be either eating or chatting with someone. I really dislike these times when I seem alone and pitiable. But there I was and hungry as well, so I ate the food off the nice dinnerware without looking up much of the time. Mostly I felt embarrassed as if everyone knew how awful I felt. Still, the event was bearable, and I when I'd finished, I simply left the plate at the table and went to join my family in our hotel room.

The second was when I had to give a presentation at this event. I'm always nervous talking in front of people, and I'd rehearsed my talk for 2 weeks or so but still felt nervous. This is where I draw on courage from the Work and really feel the suffering, both conscious and unconscious. My thoughts run the gamut from--'I'm not as smart as others here' to 'I'll be humiliated with a question from the audience I can't answer.' But I stay and give my talk. After about 20 minutes it's over, and I feel light and tall.

Work Program week beginning 7 June 2010

---

by Ian

Daily Ponder: What do I covet and why do I want it?

Morning exercise: Ponder on "All suffering begins with desire". Sense the Solar plexus while pondering.

Daily exercise 1: Identify sources of envy and attempt to admire them without desire.

Daily exercise 2: Question all impulses of covetous envy that arise in you. What true benefit would they bring?
Every time you sense an envious thought or feeling, repeat the affirmation "I desire nothing save the essential needs of my planetary body and the love of higher knowledge"

Daily exercise 3: Whenever you are envious of someone, repeat silently "It is nothing - I will Be. It is nonsense - I can Do. It recedes - I Am." while sensing your heart.

Eating exercise: Eat with full attention to sound impressions. After eating, spend a few minutes breathing consciously.

Evening recapitulation: Recall the days envies. Ponder "Does envy serve a cosmic purpose?"

---

by Gururaj

The thought processes arising from reading the weekly task led me to explore whether any difference is there between jealousy and envy .Discovered this is in Wikipedia
"The word "jealousy" is frequently used to describe what is more properly envy, fixation on what someone else has. Envy and jealousy are distinct in their object (Goldie, 2000, p. 221). Jealousy concerns something one has and is afraid of losing, while envy concerns something one does not have and either he wants to acquire (nonmalicious envy) or he wants the other(s) not to have (malicious envy) (Parrot, 2001, p. 309)."
Recollections from the past reveal to me how i have been (and often still am) envious of acheivements of others which I could potentially have also accomplished but did not - better career growth,a house in a calm and green neighbourhood within the city,a natural yet appropriate response to life situations, and so on.Some envious thoughts are more illogical like envying the,in my opinion,more aesthetic features/appearance of others.
Most of the time these automatisms have caused only suffering (and a tendency to more readily resent/hate the person being envied if they were not friendly enough to me )
Is envy of any benefit - Rarely,the feeling has been converted to an attitude of admiration and learning from the other which has resulted in acheiving a benefit for oneself.
The cosmic benefit - I can only guess now that this can come about only if envy is transcended .To do my part ,I need to get on with the doing/being part of Ian's exercise the rest of the week and see what happens.

Gururaj

---

by Harry

Is it from G or somewhere else:

The real sin of envy is to be resentful of the success of our friends.

---

by Ian

Maybe jeaously is personal and evny is impersonal?

---

by Judy

I am working with this more than was planned. I read through and, as I'm concentrating on something else at the moment, decided to simply add -

> Every time you sense an envious thought or feeling, repeat the affirmation "I desire nothing save the essential needs of my planetary body and the love of higher knowledge" to the mental background for the week.

However, it seems most effective.

Gururaj quoted:

> "The word "jealousy" is frequently used to describe what is more properly envy, fixation on what someone else has. Envy and jealousy are distinct in their object (Goldie, 2000, p. 221). Jealousy concerns something one has and is afraid of losing, while envy concerns something one does not have and either he wants to acquire (nonmalicious envy) or he wants the other(s) not to have (malicious envy) (Parrot, 2001, p. 309)."

This is most useful and I agree with it. I've pondered the Commentaries on this topic too. I think Nicoll mainly uses the word "envy" to refer to what the above calls "malicious envy". Perhaps modern usage for 'nonmalicious envy' leans more toward the words "desire" or "covetousness". Nicoll talks of the malice as being a feature of envy (as Harry mentions), whereas fear is more often noticed in jealousy. There is however, quite a deal of cross-over in modern usage.

---

by Cassandra

I have attempted to sit with this many times since this was posted. What I noticed was the number of times this emotion arose, from the most unlikely interactions.

Work Program week beginning 14 June 2010

---

by Gururaj

The exercise is one of bringing diffused attention (mindfulness) while performing an activity with a clear aim.

Restrict yourself to tasks which are precise, concrete and clearly defined or remind yourself as to what is the AIM for the usual functions at hand instead of performing them as a routine. If the activity is interacting with another person, then be clear what is your role/responsibility/aim for the relationship.

While performing the activity be focussed on the aim and be in a state of mindfulness including an awareness of ‘I am mindful’, including an awarenwess (sensing) of the physical self, and an awareness of emotional activity.

Get the experience in at-least (a) one intellectual activity and (b) one physical activity performed alone and (c) one relationship situation involving others.

Some pointers to what is Mindfulness from various sources:

“Coming into mindfulness is really like "waking up." P.D. Ouspensky, who learned this experience from G. I. Gurdjieff, likened it to "coming to." It is like waking up out of a trance--that is, "waking up" out of the ordinary state of human consciousness that we are all so used to and know about every day. Mindfulness is like suddenly gaining "presence of mind" out of distraction. This "waking up" is … like a light coming on. One's five ordinary senses immediately become vivified and sharpened. One sees things much more acutely than ordinary, and one hears more sharply and clearly. Also, one smells and tastes much more acutely than is ordinary, and one feels with one's sense of touch in a clarified and focused manner. One becomes experientially in touch with the world around them and within.” (http://www.mindfulnessclasses.com)

“Mindfulness meditation is …. a process of paying attention to your ongoing experience, whatever it may be at the moment. If you have a pain in your knee and that happens to be prominent in your awareness right now, you pay attention to that — not trying to concentrate, but simply noticing it and letting it be there. You don't try to make it different. You don't try to hold onto it. You just notice it as fully as you can, including what is going through your mind about it.” (http://www.youmeworks.com/zen.html)

“The first function of mindfulness is to recognize what is there, positive or negative.
The second function of mindfulness is to embrace it and to get deeply in touch with it. If it is a positive thing like a blue sky or the beautiful face of a child, that becomes something very nourishing, very healing for us. And if it is something negative, like hatred or fear, we should be able to embrace it and bring relief to it.

The third function of mindfulness is to help us look deeply into the nature of what is there; in this case, fear or anger. The nature of something means the root of that something: how this fear has been created; how this anger has manifested. Look deeply into the nature of our fear and our anger in order to see their true nature. When we understand, when we have insight into the nature of our fear and our anger, that insight will help transform our fear, our anger into positive energies." (Thich Nhat Hanh as quoted in http://www.explorefaith.org/tnh/tnh_pm.html)

---

by Judy

Gururaj wrote;

> Look deeply into the nature of our fear and our anger in order to see their true nature. When we understand, when we have insight into the nature of our fear and our anger, that insight will help transform our fear, our anger into positive energies." (Thich Nhat Hanh as quoted in http://www.explorefaith.org/tnh/tnh_pm.html)

I had a couple of instances this week, while working with this exercise, of seeing how, in particular, my sense of separateness contributes to lots of negativities, including doubts and anxieties. Embracing them to look at their roots is a most compassionate course of action toward myself.

Thanks for this, Gururaj. It worked in well with the current reading of Sy Ginsburg's "In Search of the Unitive Vision." I also enjoyed the TNH website you made available.

---

by Karen

> The third function of mindfulness is to help us look deeply into the nature of what is there; in this case, fear or anger. The nature of something means the root of that something: how this fear has been created; how this anger has manifested. Look deeply into the nature of our fear and our anger in order to see their true nature. When we understand, when we have insight into the nature of our fear and our anger, that insight will help transform our fear, our anger into positive energies." (Thich Nhat Hanh as quoted in http://www.explorefaith.org/tnh/tnh_pm.html)

For the past few months I have been working on the concept of fear and how it manifests in our bodies and immobilizes us. Fear appears to have many causes but seems to boil down to the ego's fear of annihilation. So I've been watching and witnessing any kind of defensiveness within myself and asking the question "What am I defending?"

I have been letting my fears and the reflection of others be my teacher and am discovering there is nothing wrong with the dark side of my being because it is part of my human reality and the duality. This approach has assisted in recognizing habitual patterns, be it the archetypal "Victim" or "Martyr" which are often on the stage.

This has been difficult because judgment and lack of impartiality keeps me locked in the programs that loop and keep re-playing their disharmonious tune. The task of truly being impartial and non-judgmental is a huge exercise unto itself. How we beat ourselves and others up is terrifying.

I've noticed more so than ever that the system is thick with fear and control programs that run rampant. Media (TV, newspapers, magazines) beauty products, safety products, food, and like Harry mentioned in one of his posts insurance, and even deodorant...All clogging up our operating systems, scattering our energy in all different directions and keeping us catatonic—all removing us from our very nature of divine essence :: pure light.

Judy writes:

> I had a couple of instances this week, while working with this exercise, of seeing how, in particular, my sense of separateness contributes to lots of negativities, including doubts and anxieties. Embracing them to look at their roots is a most compassionate course of action toward myself.

Thank you for this insight and reminding factor.

Thank you for this exercise Gururaj.

---

by Harry

From my own experiences, I've come to the conclusion that most of my fears have been fears of not living up to the image I have of myself. Which I already know is distorted by the mirrors I'm looking in.

Our culture is indeed one of simple emotional evocation. And almost every simple emotion to bring forward is negative. I don't want to jump to the opposite. Like the people who think every soccer team needs a trophy and every kid gets applause. But we need to filter out so much that is imprinted upon us.

And I think on of the things that is important about the Work is that it allows us to begin to work with our own subconscious. Something that Marketers and Teachers and Parents and Film Makers have filled with the Void for way too long. We begin to see what is really there.

That rose petals smell nice, but if you bathed in them you become obnoxious very quickly.

Work Program week beginning 21 June 2010

---

by Ian

When you find yourself in a situation where your Ego is about to react, respond with Sensing your head and repeating, "AIEIOIUOA".
When you find yourself in a situation where you are Angry, respond with Sensing your abdomen and repeating, "It is nothing, I Am".
When you find yourself in a situation where you are Depessed, respond with Sensing your Heart and repeating, "It is nothing, I Wish to Be".
When you find yourself in a situation where you are Flattered, respond with Sensing your feet and repeating, "It is nothing, I Am ".
When you find yourself in a situation where you are asked to do something you don't normally do, respond with Sensing your arms and repeating, "It is nothing, I can Do".

---

by Harry

I'm posting this here, though it really isn't a response to this exercise; I don't think it belongs in public.

I've been reading Rodney Collin for the last couple of weeks. I'm beginning to think that Remembering Yourself is something to be taken literally. That it is crucial not just to this life but that we develop a memory that passes through death and an facility to be able to use that memory once we have passed through Death. More importantly, if we are reborn, to develop a facility to take the knowledge and understanding we've gained either to another level or to bring it back with use through rebirth.

We have no memory to carry with us unless we have actual, developed photographs in this lifetime. Death will take us to a level where we are at least functioning on the level of the earth. So there is a single lifetime memory that we are developing.

---

by Judy

Harry - most interesting.

Along similar lines, and from p 235 "In Search of the Unitive Vision" which I read about half-an-hour after reading your post, Sy Ginsburg writes:

> Mesmerised as I was by 'Beelzebub's Tales to His Grandson', I wondered if Beelzebub's six descents to Earth over a period of several thousand years did not represent a sort of super-self-remembering on the part of G. of six of his former lifetimes.

I have no certain waking memory of past tives; there are intuitions and leanings towards and so on, nut no proof per se. However, I have had two vivid dreams of what I believe to have been past lives. The dreams occurred in 1977 and 1979 and are still clear and bright and emotionally charged. They felt like my own past lives, but in the dream state, I suppose they could have come up from the collective unconscious and thus, maybe were just as easily somebody else's past lives. Against that likelihood, though, is the fact that they were recurring.

I think life-to-life memory could indeed be an important aspect of self-remembering.
Thank you for sharing this. I hadn't thought of it in that connection, but it is most rational and feels totally right. Certainly, Maurice Nicoll places considerable emphasis on developing the life-photographs; also Willem Nyland.

Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by Judy

Oh, I forgot to mention...
This perspective on self-remembering, also on self-observation, effectively makes each of these important aims in its own right - rather than viewing them as techniques to be practised for any other purpose.
Somehow this is great motivation.
I not only have to utilise them to 'know myself'; I also have to 'memorize myself', to use modern idiom, from at least the state of self-awareness.

---

by Alistair

Several years ago I became aware of ACG, Astrocartography, a strand of astrology brought to attention during the mid 70’s by a California based astrologer, Jim Lewis.
Using a computer programme it is possible to imprint four lines for each of the planets in our solar system onto a map of planet earth which in turn reveals the strength of these planets in specific geographic locations. There are also intersections or parans where a mixture of planetary energy manifests.

According to Jim Lewis’ standard ACG interpretation manual at the point where Mercury and Pluto lines intersect there is an increased awareness of one’s own Akashic record. One of my Mercury Pluto parans occurs in the Black Sea off the north coast of Turkey close enough to my present location to provide a mild influence. I am quite convinced that during my time in Crimea I have become aware of certain past lives, not in great detail but what you might say enough to provide some help in understanding certain character manifestations.

One feeling I’ve had is that as a result of our constant preoccupation with reciprocal destruction it is almost unavoidable that any reincarnated beings on our planet have not at some stage been involved in some cruel and despicable acts that are deeply lodged in our psyche. Karen recently commented on our incessant behaviour pattern of, if not physically at least psychologically abusing ourselves and others.

Optimistically are we reaching the point where we have come full circle and gradually mankind is attempting to reach out for a more harmonious existence. One could be forgiven for choking on that thought simply by taking a cursory glance at any current affairs website. On the other hand taking our group as a small example certainly at no time in the last 5000 years as far as we believe have relatively common people from distant points on planet earth attempted to assist each other in raising consciousness.

Work Program week beginning 28 June 2010

---

by Judy

The following is from p101 of Seymour Ginsburg's “In Search of the Unitive Vision” - Letters of Sri Madhava Asish to an American Businessman 1978 – 1996, and deals with an exercise in constructive imagination.
Quote:
S.G. “I had a tendency to not really believe in the reality of the hidden levels of being that, through the teaching of certain exercises, we were attempting to evoke in our students. Ashish never failed to call me to account on this. One of these exercises was called 'constructive imagination'. It consists of imagining a physical experience in order to help oneself perceive an actual physical experience that was going on without one's noticing it. The exercise was based on an exercise of Gurdjieff in which the pupil says, for example, 'I am, I can, I wish,' constructively imagining a vibration in the chest while he or she is doing so. The idea, according to Gurdjieff,was that a more highly developed being would actually experience the vibration. So, if you imagined the vibration, you could eventually bring an actual vibration into the experience because the vibration was there in the first place but going unnoticed. This would inevitably bring about the raising of your level of being to correspond with the actuality of experiencing the vibration.” End quote.

Do this simple exercise several times daily for this week.
Share your findings with the group.

Further commentary (a continuation of the above) between Sy Ginsburg and Madhava Asish, with a couple of sub-exercises:
Quote:
S.G. “I had written to Ashish about the exercise in these terms: 'By saying repeatedly either inwardly and/or outwardly, things like “I am, I wish, I can”, even if I really am not, cannot, or wish not, a certain result can nevertheless be obtained. It has to do with the susceptibility of the machine (i.e., the asleep human being) to be fooled by suggestion. In this way, one can bring the declaration of ”I am, I can, I wish,” into a reality.' Asish responded:
A: Why do you have to give everything a negative twist? The machine is not “fooled by suggestion.” I have taught you a method by which your limited awareness is extended to include an actually existing fact in sensible experience. Similarly, “I am, I can, I wish” affirms a fact of which you are not currently aware. The boot is on the other foot. Social conditioning has fooled you into limiting awareness. How can you overcome doubt if you think like this? (July 21, 1987). Some years before, Ashish has said much the same thing: “If you chew your food too well, your digestion does not work properly. In dealing with these occult, subtle matters, a degree of credulity is needed.
In the subtle realm the power of imagination is effective: Imagine to yourself that you can feel the subtle breath, and after a time, you will find that you are aware of an actual breath that is not imaginary. If you constantly call it “just some imagination”, it cannot grow to a reality. He had later added: “Feel (imagine) the thrill of the energy being transmuted by and coursing through your body. Or, if you prefer the term, will it to move up and through your body. Real will is not intellectual effort. It's more like holding a concentrated feeling. Do it for aim, and you will be able to stop your ego from usurping your power for its own petty purposes. One begins by imagining things. This increases one's awareness of the thing by bringing one's attention to it. Suppose a friend loses something. He describes it and asks you to help him look for it. Even though your mental image doesn't exactly tally, it helps you recognize it when you find it. It is like it, though probably not the same. You show it for confirmation. In this case, the reply is that you are on the right track."

End quote.

Weekly Ponder:
"Real will is not intellectual effort. It's more like holding a concentrated feeling."
How can I effectively evoke real will?
Remember to sense your body and observe you emotions while pondering.

---

by Judy

Well, this exercise is going well, isn't it!
Is anyone doing anything?

---

by Harry

Judy,

I regularly do I am I wish I can. And deal with imagination, both good and bad, on a regular basis. The hidden levels of things come open with so many different exercises. But what it really takes is memory. I think that this type of imagination, of experiencing the vibrations is also part of taking a photograph. And that we have to start examining our photographs. Those we've taken consciously, and those we've taken unconsciously throughout our lives.

---

by Judy

Harry wrote:

> But what it really takes is memory. I think that this type of imagination, of experiencing the vibrations is also part of taking a photograph. And that we have to start examining our photographs. Those we've taken consciously, and those we've taken unconsciously throughout our lives.

And isn't it interesting, that, although short-term memory is easily lost through injury or illness or maybe even the aging process, neuroscientists have found that long-term memory is not able to be totally lost while the organism still functions. They postulate that this is because whereas short-term memory has definite storage areas in the brain (mainly cortex and hippocampus), long-term memory is a more diffuse pattern involving many parts of the brain. Thus specific injury cannot totally destroy it. This has been a great mystery to me - still is. It certainly hints towards a much more important role for long-term memory. In addition, there is an hypothesis (from Mr Nyland, if my memory serves me - no pun intended), that the work of making actions conscious, in fact has something to do with enabling that "work" to be transferred to the long-term memory.

As to constructive imagination, it is proven that the effects on the organism's ability to achieve are almost as effective as an actual "practice-run". We envisage first, for a higher success rate in actuality.

---

by Alistair

I apologise for failing to contribute to the group work during the last few weeks. My excuse is the physical drain on me having undertaken to dig an artesian well at this moment single-handed in temperatures normally exceeding thirty degrees. I started with a 2.5m diameter hole that has enabled me to create a ledge at 1.8m where I can throw the earth from the main shaft and re-shovel it to ground level. This is hard on my body in its 50th year, bobbincandelnost unravelling fast? The deepest section is now 5m. The local diviner that identified the prime spot to excavate believed that water should be reached somewhere between 5-6m.

For four weeks now excluding Sundays and a two day journey to Moldova to receive the necessary passport stamp that enables me to remain in Ukraine for another 90 days, every day has been fully occupied with pick-axing, shovelling then dragging the earth on a steel tray across the garden to a tipping point consequently by night time my old tired body just wants to wash, eat and sleep.

Unfortunately this post has been facilitated by a rather painful muscle strain somewhere inside the left central torso; a muscle I didn't know existed until last weekend. For the first few days of this week I've confined myself to a few light chores but there has been little improvement so today it's complete rest from physical effort and some catching up with communications.

The injury was of course largely attributable to impatience and greed. Rather than pause excavation in the main hole while I lowered the transit ledge from 1.8 – 2.5m I continued on to 5m which necessitated throwing the, what is now a mixture of silt and gravel, just over a metre above my head.

Enough whining as it seems from the general lack of posts recently that most of the group are also digging a well and thankfully as yet haven't fallen into the traps of impatience or greed thereby allowing their excavation to continue.

A definite impression formed is that of the usefulness of a supportive group of people. Given what I have achieved with the well in four weeks it's obvious that just with two or three others the job would most likely be completed with the consequent creation of much positive energy.

Facing a more demanding task such as the raising of consciousness alone would, as Ouspensky quotes Mr Gurdjieff be almost impossible.

Rest and relaxation are difficult. Simply sitting in the shade watching the splendour of great nature, sky, mountains, forest, birds, animals, insects etc is a great pleasure but the eye is always searching for the next wee job and domestic titivation, the need to occupy idle hands; in the most simple sense of being just to sit quietly is not easy. I struggle with this every Sunday when for several years now I deliberately attempt to rest from daily labours but how often ideas and plans for the following week invade the mind; now to find myself with several 'Sundays' in a row, ouch; ingratitude in good fortune and the curse of my inbred Scottish Presbyterian work ethic.

As the digging began the first exercise to become obscured by Crimea clay was the exercise on envy. When I read this exercise I felt that there was actually very little I envy. There are certain things or situations that would please me to have simply because at times they would be useful; an appropriate motor vehicle for instance, but not because others have them so in some senses it was easy to lose momentum with the exercise programme. On reflection however I do sense a feeling of envy of those who interact well with others and question my isolation in a foreign land with no friends, visitors or social interaction and why in my 50th year do I find myself attempting the work of a twenty year old scraping in the earth at the lowest point of human endeavour in a world surrounded by satellites and technology that has completely passed me by. How do I reconcile this? I can't or am I indeed hasnamuss and this is my trial?

Back tracking now to the exercise for the week of June 14th on mindfulness although the reply posts were few each provided much insight. Is the last sentence of the previous paragraph simply irrational fear and anger? The flip side in the well project is of course the possibility of achieving something that will provide others in the future with something of genuine value and that is what I try to be mindful of during the work. What that then evokes is the question of whether that motivation is sincere or am I simply satisfying my present need for water and feeding my ego in that I can say I dug a well for others.

Harry's comment regarding not living up to the image I have of myself strikes a chord. The question here might be why would I want to return to essence that appears to be one of anger, panic and agitation as I have observed when faced by situations when I had no pre-prepared buffers.

On a lighter note I had to laugh at the Harry's final comment on bathing. One thing I've discovered during this dig is that as Mr Gurdjieff states, the need for a regular sauna is absolutely essential to clean certain pores. Also interesting at that time was when my partner and her son returned from the forest with bundles of lavender, indeed quite pleasant for a time but unquestionably obnoxious very quickly.

Having re-highlighted Harry's reference to the obnoxious nature of excess it immediately occurred to me that this post might be reaching the point of excess, I will however risk proceeding to Ian's sensing exercise. I can recall quickly reading this, not really grasping the exercise fully but noticing most of all the sensing response to anger most probably because anger seems to be a major weakness of mine.

So it was the cause of great remorse for me when on the following Saturday I erupted like a volcano at my partner's son when he failed to orderly stack water bottles. I had felt it coming all day but simply lost all mindfulness as the day went on. The fact that I had laboured hard for a full day while the boy as per usual procrastinated or evaded the simplest light tasks requested by his mother was unimportant, my loss of self-control deservedly cause inner torment and remorse for several days, the blot accrued for anger stated in the Proverbs of Solomon may not yet be wiped clean.

You might well imagine, no pun intended that burdened with remorse I was not well prepared to digest Judy's exercise in constructive imagination. It seems from the general response that I was not alone. Hidden levels of being? Not sure I've ever doubted it. I didn't find much time for this exercise as I tried to recover in the hole. Unfortunately the week ended as stated earlier with physical injury due to impatience and ultimately greed which proved yet again to be the mother of incapacity.

---

by Gururaj

Well,Judy,I have made some attempts - couple of times every day,saying inwardly, "I wish,I can ,I am" .No "developments" ,Insights as yet.If the aim of the exercise was ,to begin with,imagine a vibration and by and by ,sense it actually,the imagination and feeling was lacking.It may help to get some pointers to this exercise in Work literature (to get the 'Knowledge' to assist in the 'Being' experience) .

Yes,true feeling seems to be vital for Work efforts.One is largely powered by reactionary energy,desires or habitual responses which are not useful here.Maybe Bhakti (devotion for the divine) is needed to multiply the effects of dry intellectual efforts.The other day when reading about an incident in the Buddha's life (when he returns to his kingdom in mendicant attire and his father the king is furious) i cried unabashedly ,just as I had ,many years ago, on reading the same scene in Edwin Arnold's epic poem "Light of Asia" .It was a sort of cleansing experience and a state of heightened inner perception was there for another 24 hours.
But how is the feeling evoked and sustained on one's own steam ?I recollect another exercise in a "self-development" workshop ,long ago,when each participant outrageously emoted some nonsense rhymes with actions.Subsequently it was experienced that at will ,one could summon up an enthusiasm or heightened emotion not arising from or for any cause.Maybe I need to re-visit that.

Distractions keeping me from participating, of late, have not been as spectacular as Alistair's (Best wishes ,Alistair , for a bountiful well.Do share the final outcome).
Apart from more hours at the office ,what has also pulled me down has been the despondency arising out of situations at the office where I had opportunities to sacrifice and experience something different in my relations with the boss.But the usual I s had their destructive way.

By the way,in the context of well- digging efforts,I wish to share about an exercise I took up one day recently at a farm to clear a large patch of land of a weed.It took about 5 hours of hard work with bare hands in the hot sun resulting in a sore body and bruised hands for 2 days hence.The Aim was to experience the Law of Seven - correct me if I am wrong - by seeing how an aim proceeds to its conclusion.The body's resistance and the mind's wavering (given a major boost when my partner at the farm asked me not to bother since he was planning to get it done by a machine) were somehow overcome.I wonder still , how the law can be observed.Read Ouspensky yesterday in "CONSCIENCE : The search for truth " ,saying (Pg.46) " The Law of seven you can speak about when you find two intervals in an octave" Gururaj

Work Program week beginning 5 July 2010

---

by Ian

Each morning this week, imagine that you are a conscious being who has acquired their own "I". Live each day accordingly as you imagine that a conscious being might behave in every situation.

Three or more times each day this week, perform the AIEIOIUOA exercise in the following manner:
Intone the following letters of aieioiuoa, silently or out loud as circumstances permit.
Begin each intonation with a deep breath to the solar plexus.
Pay special attention to visualizing the illumination in each bone.
Sense the vibration of the sound of each letter in the respective bone.

Intone A while Sensing the upper right arm bone illuminated
Intone I while Sensing the lower right arm bone illuminated
Intone E while Sensing the upper left leg bone illuminated
Intone I while Sensing the lower left leg bone illuminated
Intone O while Sensing the lower right leg bone illuminated
Intone I while Sensing the upper right leg bone illuminated
Intone U while Sensig the lower left arm bone illuminated
Intone O while Sensing the upper left arm bone illuminated
Intone A while Sensing the spine and skull bones illuminated

At the end of the exercise, evoke an emotion of Remorse for not Working more diligent;y for Being.

Work Program week beginning 12 July 2010

---

by Ian

From: The Blooming of a Lotus, by Thich Nhat Hanh. ISBN: 9780807012376

Aware of my body, I breathe in;
Smiling to my body, I breathe out.

Aware of the element earth in me, I breathe in;
Smiling to the element earth in me, I breathe out.

Aware of the element water in me, I breathe in;
Smiling to the element water in me, I breathe out.

Aware of the element fire in me, I breathe in;
Smiling to the element fire in me, I breathe out.

Aware of the element air in me, I breathe in;
Smiling to the element air in me, I breathe out.

Aware of the element space in me, I breathe in;
Smiling to the element space in me, I breathe out.

Aware of the element consciousness in me, I breathe in;
Smiling to the element consciousness in me, I breathe out.

---

by Karen

There is a beautiful exercise I've been working with in a similar fashion using a powerful Egyptian Chant that I found in a book titled "The Hathor Material, by Tom Kenyon," that resonated and would like to share as part of this weeks program.

This is a very powerful practice. You chant the mantra "EL-KA-LEEM-OM" no less than 4 times and always in groups of 4.

EL is earth.
KA is fire.
LEEM is water.
OM is space or air.

These 4 constitute a vibrational continuum. It is possible to chant the sounds of these elements and enter the archetypal reality in which they exist. It is as if these sounds open the door of perception and allow you to move in to the resonant field of consciousness where the archetypal reality of the elements is alive. Indeed, entering into that realm and staying there for a while enables you to shift consciousness and perception in such a way that you sense the profundity of the physical world and also its place within the continuum of consciousness.

pg 137.
Your body is a sacred temple, for it is where heaven and Earth conjoin. Your life is a gift born from the Four Elements. Without them, the Universe would not exist. They respond to your love. Send them your gratitude and receive their message. Creation speaks to you through them with every breath you take, and with every beat of your heart. Be still and listen.

EL KA LEEM OM

In my experience so far, it feels like the body comes alive with millions of swirling spheres that perform a lively dance. The cells in my elbow appear to be just as conscious as the cells in my big toe...a wonderful unfolding experience

Work Program week beginning 19 July 2010

---

by Ian

Each morning, prepare to greet the day's allotment of suffering and joy with equanimity by slowly chanting "aieioiuoa" seven times and sensing the reverberations throughout the body.

Perceiving the suffering arising from our connection to a living universe, and suspecting that creative enduring of suffering may enhance conscience, we will apply the heptachord of suffering to our daily encounters with suffering. For example, starting from :

1. observing and naming a personal holy denying suffering, followed by
2. a holy affirming of the energy spent in the suffering, resulting in
3. a holy reconciled "impartiality", making it possible to
4. curb the suffering's manifestation, then diverting the energy saved
5. to the expression of a companion chacteristic such as joy, followed by
6. a savouring of a transubstantiated comprehension between the suffering and its companion, leading to
7. a coating on an inner-being embryo often surfacing as a calm, quite inner state.

Each evening, in order to promote the role of a reverant seeker of the universes' interconnectedness, the seeker will compose a prayer of gratitude and praise to be offered seven times to the endless source while in a state of three centered relaxation.

---

by Gururaj

One of the denying sufferings experienced is the despondency arising from not being able to non-identify at all.While exploring for Sufi exercises ,the other day, this part in an article about the "11 principles ..." in the GoldenSufi.Org website gave a different perspective, a more effective affirmatory force for me .

“Beloved , you and your approval are my purpose and desire.” This attitude will rid one of impure thoughts and distractions. It relates to the path of absorption. One Sufi was concerned that he was not sincere, and was ashamed. So his sheikh took him to a Sufi who was on the path of absorption, and this sheikh told him that absorption, not hair-splitting, would free him from his problem. The wayfarer realized that in his worry about his dishonesty and shame, his wants and needs, he had been focused on himself, separating himself from his Beloved."

Not for my own sake ,but for a higher force ,let me recover balance quickly - and do justice to this week's task.
Gururaj

---

by Judy

The 'Heptachord of Suffering' from Mr Beidler is a regular exercise for me. It seems I ought to know it by heart - and yet not quite.
This week, since returning from my daughter's busy household, with all its noise and bustle and laughter and tears of an active toddler. some of my 'i s' had this strange perception that they were lonely. It didn't take any time at all to convince them that this quiet life with its inner focus is what is truly needed.
The resulting impartiality has overtones of joy.

The chanting of the aieioiuoa seven times each morning evokes remorse.
It occurred to me during the process that the site has been very quiet, and I wondered if there are others out there who would be truly affected by deep remorse, should our wonderful ES site just fade away from a lack of interested participation. Surely prevention is a better way...

---

by Harry

Just out of curiosity. Do you pronounce it one vowel at a time or do you use some pairs?

---

by Judy

Hi Harry,

I've tried both methods. The preference is to chant each of the nine sounds singly, on the one long exhalation, on the same note, letting the sound fade at the end as the breath runs out.
Emphases have ended up being on the a e o u a and, listening to myself, these accented letters may even last a little bit longer as well.
I experiment with different pitch and tone and loudness and speed sometimes.

What is your favourite method?
This one is effective, don't you think? There is a lot of resonance and opening up of centres.
Regards,
Judy.

---

by Harry

Frankly, it seems intellectual to me. I'm up against a wall a bit in naming forces. Because I don't recognize the forces by names. And the concept of remorse was opened up to me differently by that name of all vowels. I'm not sure that reconciled is impartial. Each force has three energies. Or nine combinations if you follow O.

---

by Gururaj

1.Folks on other parts of the globe may be interested to know that an exclamation " Ai Ai Ai yyo ! " is a commonly used expression in some parts of Southern India to convey emotional hand-wringing ,dismay, surprise or even (conventional)remorse ,sometimes accompanied by slapping one's own forehead.When I first came across Aieioiuoa in Work , the similarity was striking.

2.In my practice for the week,the intonation was 4 sounds ,ai ei oi uoa, alongwith exhalation after a deep breath.Remorse not experienced ,just a sort of calming.

3. It was a Eureka moment towards the later past of last week ,when I for once at-least attended to the task .On becoming aware of a denying emotion (a heaviness triggered by a perceived inappropriate behaviour of a colleague) ,I considered being impartial to it.The thought ,by itself was not effective.So,I said to myself "It will subside.I am" .Almost immediately,the heaviness vanished and was replaced with a quiet joy.It works ! felt I ,but also thought how this could become a part of Being instead of a technique (doing).
Gururaj

---

by Judy

Gururaj wrote:

> Folks on other parts of the globe may be interested to know that an exclamation " Ai Ai Ai yyo ! " is a commonly used expression in some parts of Southern India to convey emotional hand-wringing ,dismay, surprise or even (conventional)remorse ,sometimes accompanied by slapping one's own forehead.When I first came across Aieioiuoa in Work , the similarity was striking.

How very interesting.
I can use this as a light reminding factor.
Thanks for sharing.

And isn't it satisfying when one begins to watch the negativity as it happens?
Regarding:

> It works ! felt I ,but also thought how this could become a part of Being instead of a technique (doing).

It is one step at a time without "buts" or expectations. If it is something I can consciously "do" for long enough, often enough - eventually it will become a part of me, true? So I persevere.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Harry

Gururaj,

How interesting. Though there seems a lawful inexactitude. No doubt G knew this. But his third vowel combination is oy, as in toil. Hmm.

---

by Karen

Gururaj wrote:

> 1.Folks on other parts of the globe may be interested to know that an exclamation " Ai Ai Ai yyo ! " is a commonly used expression in some parts of Southern India to convey emotional hand-wringing ,dismay, surprise or even (conventional)remorse ,sometimes accompanied by slapping one's own forehead.When I first came across Aieioiuoa in Work , the similarity was striking.

Gururaj,
This exclamation "Ai Ai Ai yyo!" was used by my Baba (Ukrainian grandma from my mothers side) frequently as she waved her hands about at Gido, or as she more commonly referred to him as "starrrey"- translates to old man.

---

by Alistair

They spell it aye, but there are few words more used by the indigenous Scots
Its just been confirmed that after 10 years away from Bonnie its still my preferred affirmative
A guid weekend to all
Aye

Work Program week beginning 26 July 2010

---

by Judy

This week there is suggested a reading exercise – reading three times, in the way of Mr Gurdjieff's instructions for studying Beelzebub's Tales to His Grandson. It is taken directly from our Endless Search website, from the page on Self Observation...
http://endlesssearch.co.uk/exercises_selfobserve.htm

"You will see that in life you get back exactly what you put in. Your life is the mirror of what you are, it is your image. You are passive, blind, demanding. You take all, you accept all, without ever feeling indebted. Your attitude towards the world and toward life is the attitude of one who has the right to demand and take. Of one who doesn't need to pay for gain. You believe that all things are due to you, only because it's you! All your blindness is there. It doesn't catch your attention. It is however what, in you, separates a world from another...You have no measure to measure yourself up. You live only between 'I like it' and 'I don't like it'. Which means that you have appreciation only for yourself. You do not allow for anything above you - theoretically or logically maybe, but not in reality. This is why you are demanding and keep on thinking that everything should be cheap, and you can afford to pay for anything you want. You don't recognize anything above yourself or outside yourself or inside yourself. This is why. I repeat, you have no measure and live only to satisfy your whims...Yes your 'self appreciation' makes you blind! It is the biggest obstacle to a new life. One has to be able to pass this obstacle, this threshold, before one can go further. It is the test that separates the 'chaff' from the 'wheat' in people. No matter how intelligent, how endowed, how brilliant a man is, if he doesn't change his opinion about himself, he will be lost for inner development, for the work based on self knowledge, for a real evolution. He will stay as he is all his life...The first demand, the first condition, the first test for he who wants to work on himself is to change his appreciation of himself. He cannot just imagine, or simply believe or think, but actually see things in himself that he did not see before, really see them. Never will his opinion about himself change as long as he will not see inside himself. And in order to see, he has to learn to see: it is the first initiation of man into self knowledge...Before anything else, he has to know what to look for. Once he knows it, he has to make efforts, focus his attention, look constantly, with tenacity. By maintaining his attention on it, by not forgetting about looking, one day he may see. If he sees once, he can see a second time, and if this is repeated he cannot ignore seeing. This is the state to look for in our observation; it is from this that the true desire, the desire to evolve, will be born; from cold we're becoming hot, vibrating; we will be deeply touched by our reality...Today we have only the illusion of what we are. We overestimate ourselves. We do not respect ourselves. To respect myself, I have to have recognized in me a part which is higher than the other parts and to which I show respect by the attitude I have towards it. In this way I will respect myself. And my relationships with others will be ruled by the same respect...We have to understand that all other measuring units, talent, erudition, culture, genius, are changing units, units of detail. The only true measure, never changing, objective, the only real one, is the measure of inner vision. "I" see - "I" see myself - and you have measured. With a higher, real part, you have measured a lower one, also real. And this measure, defining by itself the respective roles of each part, will bring you to self respect. But you will see it is not easy. And it is not a bargain. One has to pay a lot...For the bad payers, the lazy, the losers, no chance. One must pay, pay a lot, pay immediately and pay in advance. Pay from oneself. With sincere efforts, whole heartedly, without expectations. The more you will be willing to pay without reticence, without cheating, without falsity, the more you will receive. And in order to avoid paying cash. Because you have to pay with all the gratuitous theories, all the deeply rooted convictions, all the prejudice, all conventions, all "I like it" and "I don't like it". Without bargaining, honestly, not just make believe. Trying to see while using fake money...Try for a moment to accept the idea that you are not what you think you are, that you over estimate yourself, therefore that you lie to yourself. That you lie to yourself always, every moment, all day long, your whole life. That the lie rules you to the extent that you cannot control it anymore. You are its victim. You lie everywhere. Your relationships with others, lies. the education you're giving, your petty conventions, lies. Your learning, lies. Your theories, your art, lies. Your social life, your family life, all lies. And what you think of yourself, lies too. But you don't stop from what you're doing or from what you're saying, because you believe in you. You have to stop inside and observe...Observe without prejudice. While accepting for a time this idea of lies. And if you observe in this manner, paying of yourself, without self-pity, by giving all your false riches for one moment of reality, maybe someday you'll see all of a sudden something you never saw in you before. You will see you are someone else from what you thought you are. You will see that you are two. One that is not, but takes the place and plays the other's role. And the one that is, but so weak, so inconsistent, that just brought forth it disappears immediately. It cannot stand the lies. The smallest lie kills it. It doesn't fight, it does not resist, it is vanquished in advance. Learn to look until you have observed the difference between your two natures, until you have seen the lies, the imposter in you. When you will see your two natures, that day, in you, the truth will be born."

(GI Gurdjieff, September 1941, from Question de Gurdjieff by Albin Michel)

---

by Lawrick

AIEIOIUOA

The horns blew at Jericho and the “walls came tumbling down”. And “Open Sesame” opened the doors to the treasure and secret cave. So what is accomplished chanting aieioiuoa, and how is it done? And Why?

Is there a specific vibration or rhythmic chant to unlocking this door I wonder.

For whatever reason, I pronounce this mantra using hard vowel sounds for everything but the last letter and I don’t know why except in consideration of a lingering memory of the Sacred Alleluia or Halleluiah. I’m certainly interested in knowing how others of our group approach this exercise and their reasoning behind their choice. I use both, aieioiuoa and Halleluiah. The church version seemed to evoke a deeper sense of the Sacred, adds humility, gratitude and brings something higher into the equation although I don’t know if using both together is an extension or bastardization of the exercise. Is there a proper way of doing this and what might it sound like.

The Latin languages pronounce the English A like ah and the English E like A and so on. In Australia the name Fred is pronounced Freed, red is reed and only God knows how the word read might come out. When one takes into account the linguistic Tower of Babel in our world (not to mention the innumerable dialects) one wonders what the world sound might be if the aieioiuoa were chanted in unison. What walls would fall.

If one vocalization does exist perhaps its to be found in the Ancient Greek, Coptic or Armenian. Could anyone provide a version of how the aieioiuoa might sound in the Ancient Greek?

Perhaps the measure of the exercise lays in some rhythmic harmonic. Harry asks if any vowels are pronounced together. The first three couplets seem to possess the characteristic when chanted fast enough. What it means I have no idea.

For myself I continue to use both aieioiuoa and Halleluiah. I believe Mr. G. stated that almost everything was to be found in Halleluiah if pronounced correctly. Ah but correctly……. There's the rub.
My daily prayer may change but it's always an extension of the prayer
LORD HAVE MERCY!

And thanks to Gururaj for pointing out that our prayers have little significance without an inclusive sense of the Absolute.

Lord have Mercy!
Freed (Australian Pronounciation)

---

by Judy

Lawrick wrote:

> In Australia the name Fred is pronounced Freed, red is reed and only God knows how the word read might come out.

No it isn't, dear heart!
In N.Z. Fred is pronounced "Frd" - no vowels much at all, as in "fsh nd chps", but here in Ozland, we have it exactly right -

Very good to hear from you.
Regards,

Judy.

---

by Lawrick

Judy writes;

> Lawrick wrote:
> In Australia the name Fred is pronounced Freed, red is reed and only God knows how the word read might come out.
>
> No it isn't, dear heart!
> In N.Z. Fred is pronounced "Frd" - no vowels much at all, as in "fsh nd chps", but here in Ozland, we have it exactly right

-

I beg to differ.....

I had and Aussi friend who always pronounced my name Freed. Even worse, the Aussi's can't pronounce the "O" vowel as found in the word oak or boat. Instead, something like a simple OK (Oak Kay) gushes from the Aussi lips as (aye kay) and you know it. Clean the platypus droppings from thine ear Jooodiiieee.

Freed!

---

by Judy

I am doing this reading exercise for the first time as well. It is a rather severe wake-up call from Mr G. Is anyone else finding that? I've spotted some differences between what I say and what I'm thinking to myself; two instances already, in fact; so I'll choose these daily social interactions with others to concentrate on this week. This exercise fits in quite well with Chapter 31, the part about sincerity. How sincere am I really? There can be self-deception at many levels.

Of course, as well as the reading, it is intended that everyone who commits to the above exercise will try to apply the theory to his/her daily life in some way. Oh, and report here on any findings.

And Fred - I thought you spoke 'tongue-in-cheek'; my mistake.
Of course everyone has an accent of some sort to everyone else.

Regards,

Judy.

---

by Harry

Fred,

From my own understanding, whether it helps or not. The remorse word is all vowels. This is particularly important in Arabic and similar languages because the vowels give a word meaning. The consonants can be the same, but the vowels change the meaning. (Don't know if this applies to English words like bank, bunk, bonk, etc.) So remorse adds a new level of meaning.

There's also the aspect of not really listening to vowels. We don't.

I worked on pronouncing this while reading BT. I saw the three i's initially. But then also saw the dipthongs. i. i. oye. ooh. oh. ah.

Not saying that is correct. I think it is a word of pause. Remorse is a pause. Ponder.

Have you listened to Leonard Cohen's version of Hallelujah? If not, do a quick search on You Tube for your fellow Canadian and Hallelujan. Listen to the words. He also has a song which I think I've quoted elsewhere defining "repent", which fits with remorse.

---

by Alistair

Beelzebub’s Tales to His Grandson first came into my possession in mid September last year. On 26th December the 2nd read was completed after which it was possible to resist a few ingrained habit patterns with more ease than had previously been perceived.

Having completed a 3rd read of Book 1 by mid January for some reason a yawn was released as Book 2 was being opened, prophetic indeed, as it was only two weeks ago during a day trip to Kiev enabled by two hot 17 hour overnight train journeys that it was finally possible to complete the 3rd read from Chapter 37, France. Having just completed Chapter 38, Religion and felt the deep remorse from Judas it came as a great joy to witness the most wonderful orange crescent moon rising on the port side as we left the southern Ukrainian city of Kherson. Eight years earlier long before awareness of a certain Mr Gurdjieff, having owned a beautiful leather bound copy of the Three Musketeers for over thirty years I finally read the closing chapters in Paris on exactly the same day of the year as it was when completing Beelzebub’s Tales Book 2 for the 3rd time, this year the 221st anniversary of Bastille Day, another revolution started.

Surely the main bombardment of the journey, Heptaparaparshinok one of many shocks delivered by our cloven footed friend. AIEIOIUOA, how many rrr’s in remorse when a Scotsman speaks this word with feeling?

The pronunciation question for AIEIOIUOA has of course been a perplexing matter since stumbling along blindly dwarfed by Hassein. In fact it's only this week thanks to Frrred that I am now able to connect the expression? to dear Johann Sebastian Bach's old No.1 Hit.
Did you guess that it was easier for me to make that Bach wisecrack than look up the correct spelling? Never forgotten was the day, maybe even the first day at school and the feeling of deflation when having already learnt the alphabet A as in ate, B as in bee, C as in see, our teacher informed us that from that moment there was only one way and it was A as in apple, but stop, this A sound is not such a familiar sound to a North American, take the word apricot, quite a different sound between Chicago and The Queen's English Book 1. Initially the word apricot came to mind but from previous experience the North American A for apple is less harsh than A for apricot. B was the same as in Burns, C as in cart, D as in dove.

That gives
A as in apple with mouth open oval top to bottom not stretched wide like apricots in Chicago. Do we hold for three or seven, holding for three is hard and fairly tightens the solar plexus by the time A arrives again. Full belly breath required and most comfortable note
I as in India
E as in egg
I repeat
O as in Orage
I repeat
U as in umbrella
O repeat
A repeat
???????

Thank you Frrred for helping me home in on AIEIOIUOA.

Mgurrru thanks for introducing the possibility that nit picking about our own sincerity might be wasting precious time.

Judi, what a fine text on vigilance

Love to y'awl

---

by Lawrick

Using a model of pronounciation of the aieioiuoa in the manner of Alistair, I would appreciate seeing how others of our group might pronounce the aieioiuoa.

I pronounce the aieioiuoa as follows,
A as in ache
I as in eye
E as in each

I eye
O as in oak, boat
I eye
U as in you
O oak
A as in ahh, Hallelujah

Harry mentions that it is useful as a Stop and that the vowels may contain or change the meaning That is fascinating Harry. It may be why the Ancient Egyptian language vanished, that is, because we have little knowledge of their vowel pronounciation. The more we discuss this series of vowels the more I lean on the "remorse" as a doorway.

Halleluleah, is very powerful. Almost disturbing. I listen again to the Cohen version and 'goosebumps' appear on the outside of my forearms and front outside of my calves. Why there I notice, and why goosebumps at all. The more I hear Cohen, the more I am convinced he is a living objective work of art. And all this coming from one who doesn't particularly enjoy his vocals. Yet these vocals mixed with his enlightened lyrics produce an extraordinary sensation in me. Hallelujah, and perhaps one day, the aieioiuoa, the sacred Hallelujah produces a djartklom, a sense of epiphany which is not necessarily either good or bad, just a jump shift of consciousness, a separation from life. Heard in a choir, Hallelujah almost always produces tears. And it just occured to me that these tears must be some sense of remorse. Fascinating. There is also a sense of Grace in this word. I really cant express this. Be interested in our resident composer(Johns) view. Comments appreciated.

Love to hear about your adventures Alistair. There is a sense of wonder in your writing. And speaking of wonder, I wonder why your first read of BT came to you so late. For me, BT was the very first word I had on the work and left me Fued up for many years. Yawl Alistair, which Georgia is closer to you.

Blessings,

Frreeeedd

---

by James

Fred (pronounced Freed) is Swedish for peace.

---

by Harry

Fred, I may have posted this before, but one of the most moving expressions I have experiences is Antony singing Cohen's If it be Your Will on the Tribute Album. Here is a You Tube link:

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Elv3eABiHWg&feature=related

---

by Judy

Thanks, Harry.
Antony + Cohen; it doesn't get much better than that!
Here are the lyrics -

"If It Be Your Will"

If it be your will
That I speak no more
And my voice be still
As it was before
I will speak no more
I shall abide until
I am spoken for
If it be your will
If it be your will
That a voice be true
From this broken hill
I will sing to you
From this broken hill
All your praises they shall ring
If it be your will
To let me sing
From this broken hill
All your praises they shall ring
If it be your will
To let me sing

If it be your will
If there is a choice
Let the rivers fill
Let the hills rejoice
Let your mercy spill
On all these burning hearts in hell
If it be your will
To make us well

And draw us near
And bind us tight
All your children here
In their rags of light
In our rags of light

All dressed to kill
And end this night
If it be your will

If it be your will.

---

by Gururaj

The impassioned exhortation of this week's exercise is pointing to some transforming,precious discovery to be made in ourselves.I feel it deserves a continued attention and would like to propose the same task be carried on for another week with sharing of insights.(It is also a fact that ,I have not paid enough for it this week )

Pondering about it brought up these questions for me - 1."You don't recognize anything above yourself or outside yourself..." Even if this calls for a broadened vision without self-centeredness,is'nt it still true that whatever it is to be recognised above/outside ourselves has to be felt/perceived inside us ?

2."Before anything else, he has to know what to look for." But what is it which has to be sought out ? If it is - a "part (in me) which is higher than the other parts" and again "you'll see all of a sudden something you never saw in you before." - what are the characteristics/manifestations to look for ? Will we just know when it happens while paying sincerely with sacrifices of the indulgences of (false) personality ?

3.On the one hand "you have appreciation only for yourself." and again "We overestimate ourselves." But yet "We do not respect ourselves." Is'nt this quite an apparent contradiction to be resolved ?
Gururaj

---

by Cassandra

This reading, done only twice and with much impatience, nevertheless is like a mirror that at first showed me how much I want to be recognized for being virtuous. And more recently, how I insist on myself. Not at all like Paul's letter to the Corithians saying that charity does not insist on itself--"I want that"--which, at middle school orientation translated into "I want the 'best' teachers for my child," nevermind the rules everyone else has to abide by. I owe someone an apology.

---

by Gururaj

Thanks to Harry, Fred and Judy's posts ,I got curious,and discovered Anthony's rendition of "if it be your will" and then Leonard Cohen's Hallelujah [originating from Hallelu Yahweh in Hebrew meaning "praise be (expressed with great feeling) to the Creator] and then on to Jeff Buckley's version of it and finally to the story of David and Bathsheba.All very moving even for a person alien to that background.
Would like to share some thoughts related to the reading exercise -
Just as there is pure, fundamental science and applied science there is pure spirituality and applied spirituality.
The fundamental scientist just keeps exploring and discovering aspects and principles of the objects of nature in an impersonal way.
Similarly, the seeker aims to observe his being internally and in relation to the world outside and discover the laws and the ‘suchness’ of life. This seeking ,though in and through himself is still impersonal as, quite early in the search the seeker believes or intuitively senses the inner world’s operations are not about any particular individual. The principles discovered in the inner realm are applicable for every human as well.
Applied spirituality like applied science,however, is the usage of the laws discovered on the spiritual path to solve personal issues in the conventional world.
And what a novice seeker, like me, needs to ascertain in himself is, is he just an ‘applied’ spiritualist. Are his motivations just an advanced form of narcissism ? Is he mainly a player in the conventional world (with identification largely intact) and just a dabbler in the matter of the spirit ? Is he not ruthless enough, or focussed enough or sacrificing enough to be a truly objective and sensitive discoverer ?
I am optimistic that this is not spoken from a 'broken hill' but an unformed one. Hallelujah !
Gururaj

---

by Cassandra

Gururaj,

I can relate to your concerns about sincerity, as I find it easy to lapse into sentimentality when I consider God or Jesus Christ, for instance. But reading some of Maurice Nicol has helped to challenge my views of a sentimental Christ and a sentimental Work. I believe that whenever I would fall into sentimentality regarding the Work or the world's ordinary workings, it is simply another way that the ego would coopt or take over my work efforts.

---

by Lawrick

Excellent post Gururaj.

It just occurred to me that the Islamic invocation "Allahu Akbar" has both a familiar expression and similar meaning to Hallelujah.

And draw us near
And bind us tight

All your children here
In their rags of light.....

My heart resonates to these almost perfect expressions.
Lawrick

Work Program week beginning 2 August 2010

by Ian

There are many ways to pronounce AIEIOIUOA, and Gurdjieff himself never gave a definitive pronounciation, as far as I am aware.
Thus, we are at liberty to pronounce it for ourselvews as we see best for our own purposes,

This week, internally chant AIEIOIUOA in whatever way suits you and chant it in correlation to a sequential Sensing of various body parts.

Ponder on the meaning of this series of vowels and ask yourself - " Does this indicate something that I should be able to experience the real meaning of within myself?"

Work Program week beginning 9 August 2010

---

by Ian

Begin the day by entering a deep state of detachment through meditation. Relax the physical, emotional and intellectual centers. Notice any sensations, feelings and thoughts that may disturb the relaxation and ask what attachments lie behind them.

During the morning, observe the physical center. What sensations are you attached to? What things are you physically attached to? What sensations do you have at the loss of your attachments? What sensations to my attachments serve? Sense the arms and legs.

During the afternoon, observe the intellectual center. What thoughts are you attached to? What ideas, things or people are you intellectually attached to? What thoughts do you have at the loss of your attachments? What opinions to my attachments serve? Sense the head and face.

During the evening, observe the emotional center. What emotional states are you attached to? What things or people are you emotionally attached to? What emotions do you feel at the loss of your attachments? What needs to my attachments serve? Sense the solar plexus and chest.

In the evening, after entering a state of all-brains-balanced-being-perception, Ponder: "How are my attachments related to my self-importance?"

---

by Judy

What a comprehensive and intensive program for this week!

The observations and enquiries are very fruitful. It is quite alarming just how many attachments are there to be noticed, when the enquiry is broken down into pieces like this. Impartiality is slowly improving after the many small surprises of the first couple of days.
I am attempting work on one centre daily, rather than the three suggested. I seem to require the extra time to look behind even the smallest, for example, attachments of the physical body - to its cup of coffee first thing, then its morning hot shower - and its undeniable reactions if even the routine of these simple pleasures is altered in any way. So now I am experimenting with changing its routine and 'over-ruling' its confusion and grumbles with -
"It is nothing; I wish to be."

Enquiring a bit further, I see that my idea of "order" depends heavily on routine and expectations being met. So this 'ordered life' of mine is easily thrown into disorder, just with simple changes. And, as Madame de Salzmann says, in her new book "The Reality of Being", I am not IN the disorder - rather I AM the disorder.'

So this first part of the suggested program was continued into the afternoon and evening. I admit to the physical body being attached to reading on the bed for an hour some afternoons. It calls it its 'quiet time' and doesn't like to miss it, unless the work routines preclude, as they do on three of the week-days. So obviously, it doesn't need this rest, as such. So, while doing this program, I'm replacing with standing and hosing the garden for an hour instead. The taste sensation is quite attached to 'sweet'. There are soooo many things.
As Gururaj asks - "How serious am I about the spiritual path?"
Well, intellect and emotions are very serious indeed - yet the body tells me not serious enough.

Ian, I'll be doing this one center at a time - so request a repeat of this for at least another week.
How does everyone else feel about this?
Thanks for sharing this diamond with all of us.

---

by Ian

> Judy wrote:
> What a comprehensive and intensive program for this week!
> ...
>
> Ian, I'll be doing this one center at a time - so request a repeat of this for at least another week.
> How does everyone else feel about this?
> Thanks for sharing this diamond with all of us.

Hi Judy,

Thanks for the feedback!
I have re-worked/expanded this program into 4 sections and will be presenting them over the next 4 weeks.

Work Program week beginning 16 August 2010

---

by Ian

Ponder: How can I reconcile my horizontal desires with my higher aspirations?

Review exercises received during your time in the Work for possible sources of assistance.

---

by JohnS

Apologies for my absence, but once again the time cost of making a living has been overwhelming, again!

The term 'horizontal aspirations' automatically engenders in me its antidote lying at ninety degrees to such a plane, and an automatic striving to replace the former with the latter. When I have these long, constant work pressures in my 'horizontal life', I inevitably go back to Nicoll's "Living Time', and, less often, Collin's "Theory of Recurrence'. There are sentences and paragraphs of Nicoll's book that I read over and over, which reiterate that you need to be able to think of time in a different way in order to be able to live life vertically, and this view automatically takes the importance and focus away from the horizontal time line and everything that goes with it.

"But we cut this life down to a little point - the present moment - which determines our weal and woe. Tomorrow is still one's life, and we cannot escape from our life. All my life, I must say, IS. Let the reader note the feelings that begin to arise with this summoning up of life apart from this present moment of existence and the false distinction between today and tomorrow"

The reason for reading and re-reading such passages is to experience the force of my ego trying to negate this reasoning -slipping back into yesterday, today and tomorrow, and specifically the constant urge to escape from today into tomorrow.
I must repeat to myself that the only way I can convince myself that horizontal aspirations don't exist is to see them from the greater and circular point of view. The theory is easy, the practise is a horizontal aspiration!

---

by Gururaj

Yes,John,higher aspirations do become 'horizontal' . My experience has been that even being fully in the moment and not caught in time can be a horizontal action when I am completely identified with the situation.Only a state of awareness brings about an activation of a vertical dimension and a realisation/experiencing of vertical aspirations,momentarily.
Today ,on starting the day as suggested by Ian in the 9th August exercise,the self-awareness and ,alongwith this the ability not to be swayed by 'horizontal desires' persisted for a couple of hours only.

Maybe the multiple breaks for prayers thru' the day in conventional religious practices served as a reminder to get the balance back again.
The process seems to be analogous to getting a good fire going.First we need to stay warm and dry (by being in touch with the Work,fellow seekers and masters) and then repeatedly attempt to generate the friction(doing the exercises sincerely,paying for it with the fuel of our will and feeling) till the flame comes on.
Gururaj

---

by Gururaj

Methinks,I was getting too far ahead of myself there.Even to get warm and dry, a lot of wetness has to be removed.To become 'dead' wood literally,it appears many things in me need to die first.

---

by Judy

Ian wrote:

> Ponder: How can I reconcile my horizontal desires with my higher aspirations?

Thinking geometrically of a reconciliation takes us directly to the point where the two lines meet in the symbol of the cross; this point represents the present moment, the only time where one has a possibility of entering the vertical time of eternity as described by Ouspensky, Nicoll, Collin and many others.

The weekly exercise "The Cross Exercise" on What is the Work at Ning.com this week may be of interest to some here. (I see some of us are members, if only occasionally). It asks us to remember that we must serve something. At night, when horizontal and totally asleep, we serve earth and moon. During the day, when vertical, and only partly asleep, can we serve something higher? There is a possibility. This physical remembrance can also be extended to emotional and mental realms, I think, but the physical awareness is quite poignant. Everyone gets up and everyone goes to sleep. They are two good remembrance points.

John, I love Nicoll's 'Living Time' also. It has some excellent theory of going into the present moment. Another favourite help method I use is to listen to a recording of Eckhart Tolle's - "Voluntary and Involuntary Portals into Presence". This really engages the emotions and can bring glimpses towards oneness. Thich Nath Hanh books or recordings are also invaluable. Someties the closest I can get to that awareness of the present is by usung his Mindfulness techniques. They extend a better state for a while, though not as pure an awareness as those rare moments which occur in life, sometimes involuntarily, sometimes by Work effort.

Regards, Judy.

Work Program week beginning 23 August 2010

---

by Ian

Begin the day by entering a deep state of detachment through an All-Brains-Balanced-Being-Perception. Use the rhythm of your breathing to relax the physical, emotional and intellectual centers. Use a Sightless Gaze to take in Impressions impartially. Notice any sensations, feelings and thoughts that may disturb the relaxation and ask what attachments lie behind them.

During the day, observe and Sense the Physical center as a unified whole. Ponder: What sensations are you attached to? What sensations do you crave? What things are you physically attached to? What sensations do you ignore? What sensations do you have at the loss of your attachments? What sensations do your physical attachments serve?

In the evening, enter again a state of All-Brains-Balanced-Being-Perception. Ponder: "How are my physical attachments related to my self-importance?"

---

by Gururaj

A perception in me that the physical attachments are very minor (or not obvious) compared to the attachments of the feeling and thinking centres ,has led to a lack of sincerity in exploring this week's task.The early morning large dose of green tea and the mid-afternoon cofee or tea - mainly to counter grogginess - are a regular attachment.I rationalise that they are even good for health ,but must admit that there is a craving for the mild mood alteration due to the beverages.Am resolving ,at least now to stay off them for a while and see what happens.
The other attachment is to have a nap in the afternoon on holidays ,again with the thought that it is beneficial and refreshing.This is another automatism to be managed differently.
When the body is not in balance due to a headache or fever or mouth ulcers ,I avoid medicines as far as possible and trust the natural healing process .However there is a lack of ease on the feeling front till health is regained.
Regards to all
Gururaj

---

by Judy

Gururaj wrote:

> A perception in me that the physical attachments are very minor (or not obvious) compared to the attachments of the feeling and thinking centres

This was my perception too, until I did this recent exercise from Ian. And I was pleased with that earlier perception too! I mean, is it not more seemly to be a more thinking and feeling person than a physical/moving centre one? Funny the ideas and little snobberies one has - hidden away in the unconscious as a part of "the shadow". And how interesting to see these things. They are not necessarily good or bad of course. What is interesting is that I was mostly unaware of their existence.
To give an example; I pat and play with my little grey cat often. It is enjoyable and good for both of us, I think. What I didn't realise is how much the sensation of her smooth fur appeals to tactile sense, as well as being very calming and anti-stress. And I'm not necessarily looking to change this. It is simply an added awareness. Yes, there is an attachment.
And throughout the day there are many more. I miss them when they are not there, but function okay. The heaviest attachments - one might even call them addictions - have been dealt with and abandoned long ago - at least the obvious ones.  And in hindsight, staying away from alcohol and cigarettes are two of my better decisions. There was restricted freedom in both cases. I suppose I liked both of those habits a little more than was ideal.

Ian asks:

> What sensations do your physical attachments serve?

I haven't quite come to grips with this question so far. Overall, the answer seems to be connected with the sensation of comfort, one way or another. But this takes the question almost into emotional centre area; to what one likes or dislikes, so am not sure if I'm seeing this one clearly.

---

by Gururaj

Nike encourages "Just do it" .In many other (denying) situations the opposite is more appropriate - "just do'nt do it". Broke years' of habit this week by not imbibing even a single cup of coffee/tea .Though it felt lousy at times,discovered that could survive and even sensed a better quality of sleep.(Now,on the other hand,I need to watch out against an 'enlightened' attachment to good health practices )
Seems that the physical attachments are relatively easier to go against and give rise to a feeling of encouragement to take on the tougher attachments of the other centers.
Regards to all,
Gururaj

Work Program week beginning 30 August 2010

---

by Ian

Begin the day by entering a deep state of detachment through an All-Brains-Balanced-Being-Perception. Use the rhythm of your breathing to relax the physical, emotional and intellectual centers. Use a Sightless Gaze to take in Impressions impartially. Notice any sensations, feelings and thoughts that may disturb the relaxation and ask what attachments lie behind them.

During the day, observe the Intellectual center and the Sense the Physical center, both as a unified whole. What thoughts are you attached to? What thoughts do you crave? What ideas, things or people are you intellectually attached to? What thoughts do you ignore? What thoughts do you have at the loss of your attachments? What opinions do my intellectual attachments serve?

In the evening, enter again a state of All-Brains-Balanced-Being-Perception. Ponder: "How are my intellectual attachments related to my self-importance?"

---

by Gururaj

Intellectual attachments,for me, have been tricky to get the right perspective. How can the ordinary mind watch itself .Have not been able to get neither the objectivity in attention nor the willingness to try something different yet.

Would like to share a reading from Ramana Maharshi's answer to a seeker about the Mind wherein, my mind, finds many parallels to the Work, though more radical .(By the way RM has been a unique instance of a saintly human who is regarded to have first experienced a higher reality at a very young age (in his teens) and then ,when he read spiritual literature later to clarify doubts of seekers, he found his experience described in them)

Question – While there are different modifications of the internal organ ,Viz., Reflection, Intellect, memory, egoity, how can it be said that the 'destruction' of the mind alone is release ?
Answer – In the books explaining the nature of the mind ,it is thus stated ," The mind is formed by the concretion of the subtle portion of the food we eat.It grows with the passions such as attachment and aversion,desire and anger.Being the aggregate of mind,intellect,memory and egoity,it receives the collective singular name 'mind'.The characteristics that it bears are thinking,determining,etc.Since it is an object of consciousness(the self) ,it is what is seen,inert.Even though inert,it appears as if conscious because of association with consciousness(like a red-hot iron ball) .It is limited ,non-eternal,partite and changing like wax,gold,candle,etc.It is of the nature of all elements (of phenomenal existence) .Its locus is the heart-lotus,even as the loci of the sense of sight,etc. are the eyes,etc..It is the adjunct of the individual soul.Thinking of an object it transforms itself into a mode ,and along with knowledge that is in the brain,it flows through the five sense-channels,gets joined to the objects by the brain(that is associated with knowledge) and thus knows and experiences objects and gains satisfaction.That substance is the mind.” Even as one and the same person is called by different names according to the different functions he performs,so also one and the same mind is called by different names : mind,intellect,memory and egoity – and not because of any real difference.The mind itself is of the form of all,i.e. soul,God and world.When it becomes of the form of the self through knowledge ,there is release,which is of the nature of Brahman.This is the teaching.

(Source – Self Enquiry / VicharaSangraham of Bhagavan Sri Ramana Maharshi)
Regards to all,
Gururaj

Work Program week beginning 6 September 2010

---

by Ian

Begin the day by entering a deep state of detachment through an All-Brains-Balanced-Being-Perception. Use the rhythm of your breathing to relax the physical, emotional and intellectual centers. Use a Sightless Gaze to take in Impressions impartially. Notice any sensations, feelings and thoughts that may disturb the relaxation and ask what attachments lie behind them.

During the day, observe the Emotional center and the Sense the Physical center, both as a unified whole. What emotional states are you attached to? What emotions do you crave? What things or people are you emotionally attached to? What emotions do you ignore? What emotions do you feel at the loss of your attachments? What needs do my emotional attachments serve? What objective conditions do my emotional states serve?

In the evening, enter again a state of All-Brains-Balanced-Being-Perception. Ponder: "How are my emotional attachments related to my self-importance?"

---

by Gururaj

Staying awake late into the night,i mull about my response for the week's task.The thoughts go like ," I have mainly experiences recalled in hindsight.What value to the group shall I provide with no authenticity ?" (An intellectual centre interpretation)The resultant emotions are a mix of guilt and fear of a (imagined) negative perception by the group if I still go ahead and make a post- further resulting in a loss of energy and a negative self-image.Maybe the payback for being in this dreary state is a strange way of being in comfort. Okay,am taking a plunge anyway and submitting this post.The resultant emotion at the loss of attachment to my gloom is a sense of satisfaction ,a gathering of energy for Work.(Do pardon me my trespasses ,anyway)

"What emotional states are you attached to? " - Getting depressed readily on occurence of (perceived) unfavourable events - usually related to opinions/actions of others inimical to my self-esteem/sense of right and wrong or when faced with challenges which I perceive as needing tough efforts to overcome.

" What emotions do you crave? " - As I have grown older and given up largely on "exciting" pursuits ,the need for not getting negative emotions itself is a major craving.

"What things or people are you emotionally attached to? "- Positive attachment - Situations ,persons not upsetting my "applecart" . Avoidance attachment - The reverse

"What emotions do you ignore?" - That's a subtle aspect needing finer attention.

"What objective conditions do my emotional states serve?" - The question is not quite clear.Does it need us to recognise what is the real outcome of different emotional states ?

Ponder: "How are my emotional attachments related to my self-importance?" Why just self-importance ,self-definition ,to a large extent is "charged" by my emotions.The sails need a huge amount of adroit handling.G help me !

Regards to all
Gururaj

Work Program week beginning 13 September 2010

by Ian

Begin the day by entering a deep state of detachment through an All-Brains-Balanced-Being-Perception. Use the rhythm of your breathing to relax the physical, emotional and intellectual centers. Use a Sightless Gaze to take in Impressions impartially. Notice any sensations, feelings and thoughts that may disturb the relaxation and ask what attachments lie behind them.

During the day, observe the Intellectual, Emotional centers and the Sense the Physical center, all three as a unified whole. What 3-centered states are you attached to? What 3-centered states do you crave? What things or people are you attached to in all 3 centers? What 3-centered states do you ignore? What 3-centered states do you feel at the loss of your attachments? What needs do my 3-centered states serve? What objective conditions do my 3-centered states serve?

In the evening, enter again a state of All-Brains-Balanced-Being-Perception. Ponder: "How are my 3-centered attachments related to my self-importance?"

Work Program week beginning 20 September 2010

---

by Ian

Begin the day by entering a deep state of detachment through an All-Brains-Balanced-Being-Perception. Use the rhythm of your breathing to relax the physical, emotional and intellectual centers. Use a Sightless Gaze to take in Impressions impartially. Notice any sensations, feelings and thoughts that may disturb the relaxation and ponder on what identifications may lie behind them.

During the day, sense the swing of your arms as you walk.

When you observe inner considering in yourself, observe your breathing for 10 breaths. Then transform your collected state by chanting 10 times - It is nothing; I am.

In the evening, sense your feet on the ground and Howl at the full moon.

---

by Ian

Just got in from sensing my feet whilst howling at the (almost) full moon.
Nothing spectacular to report, other than a bit of inner considering about the neighbours.
But that didn't stop me from doing it.

---

by Cassandra

Ian,

Why the howling?

---

by Harry

Cassandra, why not?

---

by Ian

> Cassandra wrote:
> Ian,
>
> Why the howling?

Ah, the Howling...

This is an old exercise fro Northeon Forest.

Howling at the moon.

Just let your emotions rip... send all your negativity to the moon...

---

by Cassandra

Maybe I'll try it one of these months.

Work Program week beginning 27 September 2010

---

by Ian

Ponder, every day, in a 3 centered manner : What is gained by some form of conscious affirmation applied to such handy mechanical impulses as sociable remarks, gossiping, complaining, friendliness, etc?

When you observe such behavior as - sociable remarks, gossiping, complaining, friendliness, - you may add such forms of conscious affirmations to these activities as has been suggested before in these programmes.

---

by Judy

Just a comment.
Yesterday at a monthly office meeting, which had become overheated, I made the remark to a colleague that what she was saying was 'inappropriate'. As I said this word, the weekly exercise came rapidly to mind and I was able to bring more consciousness to the exchange and diffuse the heat somewhat.
This was useful in a very practical way.

---

by Harry

Very practical at that point, Judy. But of more value if you could have recognized it before saying it. And then deciding whether to say it or not. Not censoring yourself. Just using the energy for your own growth.

---

by Ian

> Judy wrote:
> Just a comment.
> Yesterday at a monthly office meeting, which had become overheated, I made the remark to a colleague that what she was saying was 'inappropriate'. As I said this word, the weekly exercise came rapidly to mind and I was able to bring more consciousness to the exchange and diffuse the heat somewhat.
> This was useful in a very practical way.

One has to consider - Is remorse of conscience a positive emotion or a negative emotion?

Were you feeling remorseful over what you said (after your initial feeling of self-justification)?

Was your "remark" internal considering or external considering?

Was your "diffusion" internal considering or external considering?

Was your "diffusion" a Work effort or an effort to "self-calm" (which of course removes any possibility of Work)?

I have been in similar situations and those are questions I ask myself...

Our actions; our reactions; our motives; and our efforts are not always clear cut.

Gurdjieff was renouned for going ballistic with his students.
One could ask - If he was such a highly developed person, why did he get so angry?

In response, one could say - He was using that anger for transformative purposes.

Which of course is what we are asked to Do in this Work - 2nd conscious shock - transforming our negative emotions into positive emotions...

Work Program week beginning 4 October 2010

---

by Lift

Daily three-centered Pondering: "Will I Work on myself today? If not today, when?"

Every morning at sunrise, visualize a Sacrificial Fire. Upon this Sacred Fire, immolate your weaknesses, your egotism, and your spiritual apathy. Visualize the flames rising up as they consume your offerings. As your weaknesses are consumed, Sense your feet; as your egotism is consumed, Sense your heart; as your spiritual apathy is consumed, Sense the crown of your head. When the smoke and flames subside, Sense the whole of your Being.

During the day, compose a Haiku (a 17-syllable verse form consisting of three metrical units of 5, 7, and 5) to be Chanted in a three-centered state every evening, with an emphasis on help for transforming ones most persistent denying forces. (Please post your Haiku to the Group.)

---

by Gururaj

Haiku a mystery
With no Net connection
On remote peaks

(Was I.But now)

Back in city
Some Googling behind me a little wiser

(Am i.)

Thanks ,LIFT, for some new experiences.

Attempted the visualisation on three days.Not yet vivid or smooth-flowing enough,maybe because of the intervening thoughts about searching for specific weaknesses and ego manifestations to put in the fire.

Here's a Haiku from me - (fellow seeker's,do be indulgent with this infant step)

WAVES ROLL IN TOSSED ABOUT,OH MASTERS, HELP ME TO BE

With regards to all,
Gururaj

---

by Ian

Blackbirds intone transparent forest
they are my mantra.

---

by Ian

Have you had a transcendant or numinous or mystical experience before?

If so, the Zen dictum that you can never step in the same river twice should be noted and contemplated.

Higher consciousness is first and foremost a realization - a level of objective consciousness as Gurdjieff would say - and as such, a realization - an Ah-Ha moment - can never be repeated in all it's splendour and glory - you can only step in the river once...
After the initial realization, it becomes everyday life - cutting wood; drawing water...

---

by Lift

Dear Gururaj

Thank you for responding. I LOVE the Haiku you wrote.
If only this group would participate more.....
Lift

Work Program week beginning 11 October 2010

---

by Ian

Few replies
Time to reprise
Last weeks progamme...

---

by Harry

I'm in here every day. Honestly I feel that energy has to be developed. A couple of times I have tried to generate energy. But feel the strong need for the group to develop energy. Perhaps we could start with everyone indicating why they don't reply. Many of us have been here for years. And there used to be regular discussion. Now it seems that one or two solo voices sing a few notes every other month. Is it time for Ian to just shut it down?

---

by Gururaj

Maybe shaped by many past experiments and experiences,right now in life,I see a lot of value in the 4th Way precepts and also feel the necessity to practice them.

Still ,there have been brief situations when I was not posting to the Online Work group as often as required.

Sometimes there was a thought that I have not practiced and have nothing of value to share

Sometimes there was a thought about whether what I want to express is of the right 'quality' for the esteemed group
Sometimes I was staying in places with no or very poor 'Net access.
Rarely I had an internal consideration that the group was not responding to some post of mine.
More often I felt dejected at being so busy/in total identification/asleep in day-to-day life that the feeling of 'unworthiness' took away the energy.

But all the above have been material to work on myself - aided by the support of Ian and participation of many group members.

The ES flame
Lightens everyone's path with our fuel

---

by Judy

I'm in here each morning too. I agree, Harry, that this is an energy that needs to be developed.

What happens in a face-to-face group when attendance dwindles? In my experience, it is a decision made by the few who still attend as to whether to continue or not. Does this apply to an online group? Perhaps somewhat. But is it fair or even reasonable for Ian to present weekly exercises when there are so few responses? Are we regulars pursuing our own path? If there is no increase, would it make more sense to just keep the discussion group and have, for example, an exercise from time to time? Just a thought that it could be useful to know what the group's regular contributors think? For me, sometimes I do the suggested exercise and othertimes not. I post when I do it. Yes, it is not so easy without more group momentum and egregore, but undoubtedly still easier than attempting to work totally alone, which I find almost impossible to sustain. Thus this ES site is important to me, even with few responses. There is much goodwill and a degree of openmindedness and non-judgementality which I haven't found elsewhere.

So, Gururaj and Harry - (where have you gone lately, Karen, John, Alistair and sorry if I've neglected to mention by name any others this applies to) - how do you feel in this instance? I ask, because I've recently accepted that the others may not change and post more regularly, however much we ask or suggest - for no doubt many varied reasons. Of course new members may join, or old ones return - who knows? But for now, there are just a few of us here, so instead of appealing to the silent majority, what does the involved minority want? Regardless, it will depend on what Ian thinks; but perhaps he would like to know where we are comiing from?

Best wishes to all,
Judy.

---

by Ian

> Harry wrote:
> I'm in here every day. Honestly I feel that energy has to be developed. A couple of times I have tried to generate energy. But feel the strong need for the group to develop energy. Perhaps we could start with everyone indicating why they don't reply. Many of us have been here for years. And there used to be regular discussion. Now it seems that one or two solo voices sing a few notes every other month. Is it time for Ian to just shut it down?

Dear All,

I know that there are people here who have been participants over ther 7 years that this online group experiment has been in existence.

> Is it time for Ian to just shut it down?

I have been seriously considering/pondering this posibility.
Has this experiment run its course?
Has it proved useful or a failure?
Has it lived up to my expectations ?
Especially this expectation - "It is hoped and expected that all participants in this venture will eventually, after an appropriate probationary period, become members of an online Triad and contribute suggested exercises to the weekly Work Program."

The failure to fully implement this aspect of this online group can be partly blamed on my lack of initiative to consistantly demand this from Group Members and partly on the relutance of Members to comply and submit exercises on their own initiative.

So, if anyone has failed in this enterprise, it is me, for not pushing you all to make super efforrts...

---

by Ian

> Judy wrote:
> I'm in here each morning too. I agree, Harry, that this is an energy that needs to be developed.
>
> What happens in a face-to-face group when attendance dwindles? In my experience, it is a decision made by the few who still attend as to whether to continue or not. Does this apply to an online group? Perhaps somewhat. But is it fair or even reasonable for Ian to present weekly exercises when there are so few responses? Are we regulars pursuing our own path?

What happenas in a face to face group? -

As you say - " it is a decision made by the few who still attend as to whether to continue or not. "

I have benn in situations where both decisions were adopted.
It depends on the committtment of the members and what they want to accomplish and whae they have already accomplished.

As the instigator of this Group, I don't feel that I have accomplished my Aims.
On the other hand, I wonder if that is possible.

My main Aim was - " It is hoped and expected that all participants in this venture will eventually, after an appropriate probationary period, become members of an online Triad and contribute suggested exercises to the weekly Work Program."

The whole point of this Group was to train people to leaern how to make their own Exercises. And contribute those exercises on a regular basis to help other Seekers.

My feeling right now is that I have failed, in as much as I wanted to get members to contribute, and they have not done so.

---

by Cassandra

I THINK about the work everyday and justify not posting with the rationalization that I need simpler exercises. So I've thought of going back to Sy Ginsberg's Gurdjieff Unveiled.

This week I'll try to remember/sense a body part each time I have a meal.

---

by Gururaj

Some thoughts in response to Judy's query .

I would very much like the On-line forum to continue .Though there maybe other methods of Work,I have found this OLG very useful to (attempt to) stay Awake.The benefit has been proportional to the involvement.

But yes, participation of members is essential.Is there a minimum number for sustenance ? Maybe half- a- dozen ? If this minimum participation is not forth-coming ,can we consider (apart from stopping) a hibernation option ?The ES site ,presumambly, will still be available to Netizens and if the quorum develops the re-activation could be done.

Right now,what is in my circle of influence is to respond to Ian's Aim of exercise contribution by members.

By the way,a request to Ian to clarify this - I had understood "becoming part of an on-line Triad" to mean that a member will be grouped with 2 others and this team will create exercises.But why is in individual also called as a Triad ? (When one's name is announced with the contributed exercise).Is it that one is always at every instant the resultant of Triamazikamno ?

Regards to all
Gururaj

---

by AlbertoB

Well, i think there is nothing wrong with this experiment.
The Work is a living thing, and the way it goes now may be different from that of one century ago.
At this moment, i have not the possibility to work with a group here in my town, in Italy.
But, thanks to the super-effors of Ian, i can (theoretically) share my efforts with other people on the same path. Why my contributions are so rare? Mainly for ignorance. The Work is wide and difficult, good books to read are many, and require the few hours in the night that remain free from world duties, the concepts to handle seem very complicated. Reading the contributions to the site, i have the sensation that other members are clearly more advanced of me in the Gurdjieff Work. I have no good contributions for the site.
Many simple questions, perhaps...

On the exercises: i have great difficulties to change exercise every week. To be honest, the only exercise that i do often is the classical exercise that Mr.G gave on Life is real": attention on breathing and then try to push something from the head down to the solar plexus. It's the only exercise that gives me something real.
This first conscious shock creates the Fa24 hydrogen, it's correct?

In conclusion, i think that my speed is too slow for a group of so high level, perhaps Ian has to create a sub-group at a low frequency of vibration. I could accomodate easily in it.
But i hope that the site will not be closed and in the future, thanks to my fellows, perhaps i will enjoy the pleasures of intentional suffering ...

---

by Gururaj

Hi Alberto:
Thanks for your vote for continuation of THE experiment !

May I welcome you to "enjoy the pleasures" of intentional suffering right now and not postpone it to the future.I too entertained considerations of comparision with other seekers in this group.But the affirming influence has been to keep the focus on the weekly task ,attempt to do it and see if there is any difference/movement for the better from whatever is my present level.

Would like to share the following gem which is there in a seeker's notings of Orage-conducted meetings (link given by Ian somewhere in the OLG).My words are in brackets at two places. - "With the end defined ,happiness thus depends on the effort to rise.And complete happiness results from the maximium progress towards the aim.In using the term "complete" happiness ,think of a row of pots,from one pint to one gallon size.If they are all filled to the brim,each one experiences the sensation of fullness, although they contain different quantities.That is,we are not comparing happiness with happiness,but completeness with completeness.At present we are half,or quarter or less full.As we move up the scale(our own individual scale) of any one of our three pots(centres),we experience more or less fullness."

So ,no point in comparing with others,is the sense I get from the above paragraph.

The second aspect you mentioned of the vastness/profoundness of 4th Way literature and the challenge of comprehending all of it soon enough ,was also ,and is still,a very daunting experience for me.But what has helped is to explore mainly about those parts which are related to the weekly task/quarterly program at hand or the BT chapter being discussed.

Another aspect is that,my ease of understanding and expression in English means I have one less barrier in posting.In fact,I need to curb any tendency to chatter.
Someone else,could be you too, may have experienced more ,but have a resistance about posting it.So ,the intentional suffering needed there is to wrestle with that denying force.

With best regards,
Gururaj

---

by Karen

Gururaj wrote:

> Sometimes there was a thought that I have not practiced and have nothing of value to share
> Sometimes there was a thought about whether what I want to express is of the right 'quality' for the esteemed group
> Rarely I had an internal consideration that the group was not responding to some post of mine.
> More often I felt dejected at being so busy/in total identification/asleep in day-to-day life that the feeling of 'unworthiness' took away the energy.

In my opinion, I think you speak to how many of us have felt and were not bold enough to share. But I will just speak for myself.

What stops me from posting? fear, worry of appearing absurd or outlandish, of being ridiculed for not having thought my post thru, looked upon as stupid or not expressing 'right quality'. How silly really. But the programming/associations are thick. I recall the 'Education' system I was put through. Praised for what was deemed as right and punished or made a fool for error or failure. If you were to raise your hand, you best be sure you had the correct answer or else you may just find yourself in the corner wearing a pointy black hat with the white letters D-U-N-C-E written on it. Its no wonder one moves about so cautiously.

But ultimately, how does one grow by giving way to ones fears and lack?

---

by Karen

Thank you for your honesty Gururaj

---

by Ian

> Cassandra wrote:
> I THINK about the work everyday and justify not posting with the rationalization that I need simpler exercises. So I've thought of going back to Sy Ginsberg's Gurdjieff Unveiled.

Sy is a great guy!
That is one of the best (if not the best and most practical) Gurdjieff books I have seen.
You will not go wrong by going back to it (in my limited opinion, of course).
I highly recommend it...

---

by AlbertoB

Gururaj,

thanks for your hints.
If i have well understood your answer, you suggest to consider the reluctance to post like a big denying force. Then, my duty would be to balance this big denying force with an affirmation, to create something new in me (with the Work as reconciling force?). Alas, the law of three is on the top of my ponderings, but for the moment i have only collected many analog concept in western or western religion or philosophies (Hegel) but it 's not for me a truth that i feel with all the centers.
But this would be an occasion for focusing all my attention on the Work. In many ways, it is just so. I'm constantly trying to understand the forces wrestling in the world in the light of the 4th Way. In the psychological domain, the explicative power of the Work is outstanding. On the biological plane it's more difficult to see the links, but it's a fascinating pondering. I will try to post something on it.

Regards, Alberto

Work Program week beginning 18 October 2010

---

by Ian

Students are lazy
They stay all alone
They don't share programmes composed all on their own...

This weeks exercise is for all those who have never composed and shared a Programme with other Seekers.

Please make an effort and share something with your co-seekers...

---

by Cassandra

I've been thinking of this quite a lot: facing rather than avoiding situations where internal considering rises. I believe that a woman whom I come into contact with every week or so doesn't like me and avoids eye contact with me.

Why should I care. I've often had vengeful feelings towards her or I try to ignore her presence. Rather than this, I will neither seek nor avoid her presence. If I encounter her, I will smile inwardly and bless her. If I don't see her but she comes to mind, I will do the same.

I challenge others to also offer blessings in cases of internal considering.

---

by JohnS

Very timely: guilt is a wonderful thing, especially when it appears before you simultaneously in print, then immediately afterwards in real life.

I'm planning a trip in December, and a friend challenged me today to reveal that I will be spending the New Year at the remotest location I could find (yes), alone (yes), would have a fantastic experience (yes), and keep it to myself (yes).
I use the excuse of meditation on isolation and simplicity, but I think a turning point away from retrospection is sorely due, if others see it in me so easily.
I will waste this precious experience by keeping it too private.
It is selfish not to make the effort to share.

I realise that, so far in this post, I still haven't shared anything.

---

by Harry

A couple of responses: Casandra. Remain neutral. Also use the woman as a mirror. What in her is in you. Recognize that. And your attitude will change. She won't become your friend, but she will become your reminder.

John, the remotest location I can find is my everyday life. I don't have to go there. I'm here. And it is a fantastic experience. Until I need someone. Like a sudden bout of arthritis. But you're probably too young for that.

Harry

---

by Cassandra

Thanks, Harry. I guess I can remain neutral and bless her at the same time.

---

by Harry

Ian,

I was pondering on this as I was laid up with some arthritis pain. I think what we're missing, to some extent, is the outer circle. We need those people who just are getting interested. Those "introductees" if you wish. Previously Reijo's advertising in all kinds of places provided that. But I think that's something that doesn't get met anymore.

---

by Judy

Harry wrote:

> I think what we're missing, to some extent, is the outer circle. We need those people who just are getting interested. Those "introductees" if you wish.

I've come to the same conclusion, Harry, and am in total agreement. From experience in a twelve step group locally, it is quite obvious that newcomers are the absolute lifeblood of the group. Their enthusiasm and questions vivify the whole group and help everyone to grow. And these exchanges contribute to both the information and emotional energy overall.

John wrote:

> I realise that, so far in this post, I still haven't shared anything.

Are you sure about that, John? Information and direct relation to Gurdjieff work is only one aspect of things. To explain a little where I'm coming from with this comment; fairly recently I've begun attending the meetings of the local Theosophical Society, though previously hadn't felt the need. They are a fairly small group of diverse people, though all pursuing their own paths, which come under some general aspect of Theosophy. (There's no local Gurdjieff group). Anyway, they've been meeting for several decades, with only minimum new input, which is pretty amazing.

oops - just lost a long post. For the moment, I'll post this bit.

Cassandra - you too. And you have spoken briefly about two very good possibilities for exercises.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Judy

To finish what I was saying before the page expired - briefly;

Anyway, they've been meeting for several decades, with only minimum new input, which is pretty amazing. One of their techniques does indeed seem to be to make everyone a teacher, much as Ian is aiming to do. Most of the members have considerable life and seeker experience of some sort, and he/she is encouraged to share this. For example, at the end of my very first meeting I was invited to speak about my own experience with the Gurdjieff Work over the years. This was a bit daunting but went ok and certainly achieved any aim there may have been to involve and integrate me into the group.

Perhaps members could share about what they are currently reading?
Experiments with other traditions?
New insights from daily practice of sitting?

In other words, they share themselves; their energies; Being, if you like.

Looking at membership, I notice we have had several new people join this year. Are we looking after them? At least welcoming them? I know I've been remiss.

Gururaj' suggestion of a hibernation period also has some merit, though is not my first choice, which, of course, is to continue.

And Cassandra asks for simpler exercises and mentions a couple she has been doing. This suggestion may also be a popular one.

At least there is now an open discussion.

Regards to all,
Judy.

---

by James

Hello,
A good idea Judy, to share what one is reading and experiencing with the sittings and exercises, I am a member of the Berlin Movements group and much attention is given here to sensing exercises. The reality of the body and its observable manifestations is a solid base for work. Here is one of the exercises: while sitting, sense the right arm for seven breaths (while attempting to feel that the right arm is also “breathing”) next to sense and “breathe” with the spine for three breaths, then sensing and breathing with the right leg for seven breaths then back to the spine for three breaths and so on ,the left leg(7) , spine(3), left arm(7), spine(3) and then back to the right arm for seven breaths, back to the spine for SEVEN breaths. Continue this sequence again starting with the right leg, and so on. The final sequence begins with the left arm.
As to what books Judy, at the present time I am reading Perspectives of Beelzebubs Tales by Keith A. Buzzell ,which is a beautiful Work recommended to me by a teacher met at a Movements seminar here in Berlin last month, which gives much “food “to ponder on about the Enneagramatical structure of the Tales. Ive only read the first few chapters, and have already been helped with my personal work.
What you said about being neutral Harry, was a good and timely reminder to me. I have been attempting an exercise in which when I meet people, acquaintances, friends and strangers, I try not using the usual well trodden phrases and behavior, but to sense them as unknowable, while observing ones own physical and emotional reactions. Its a little easier with strangers and seemingly impossible (for me) with family and friends.
Im away from the web for a while now as a sojourn on an Island beckons…
Good Luck to you all
James

---

by Cassandra

I started M. Nicoll's Living Time. My biggest challenge is believing in something other than what I can perceive with 5 senses. Living Time helps to challenge this resistance in me.

---

by Karen

Ian wrote:

> Please make an effort and share something with your co-seekers...

This exercise has proven effective for me. It's simple and easy to do. If it resonates for you, I would be interested in learning of your experiences.

BREATHING OUT FEAR

Take three long, slow, deep breaths.

With each exhalation, imagine that your consciousness gets

larger and larger until it fills the room.

Take three more long, slow, deep breaths.

With each exhalation, imagine that your body gets larger and larger until it fills the room.

Take three more long, slow, deep breaths.

With each exhalation, imagine that you can see the spaces in between the particles of matter of your expanded body.

Now, see the vapors of fear as they approach you.

Calmly observe them as they move past you and through the spaces between your expanded form.

Do not attach to the fear. Simply allow it to flow through you.

FOCUS ON WHAT YOU WANT
NOT ON WHAT YOU FEAR.

When fear is no longer your enemy,

you can more easily accept the love that constantly emanates from the place “in-between” fear and love.

In this manner you can begin to remember that ALL separation is an illusion.

---

by Karen

Judy writes:

> Perhaps members could share about what they are currently reading?

I am currently re-reading The Theory of Eternal Life by Rodney Collin (1st read was in 2007) and a short read by Samual Aun Weor - Magnus Opus.

Harry wrote in response to Cassandra's post:

> A couple of responses: Casandra. Remain neutral. Also use the woman as a mirror. What in her is in you. Recognize that. And your attitude will change. She won't become your friend, but she will become your reminder.

I have found that being impartial and non-judgemental with ourselves and others can be a very difficult task. As an excerise, I like to visualize my face upon everyone's face I meet throughout the course of a day. I get to see many I's in all kinds of roles on the stage! Like Harry mentioned, "What is in her is in you." Seeing everyone as a reflection of self has been a helpful reminding factor. It has also assisted in storing energy opposed to squandering it on wasteful gossip, toxic thoughts and ill-emotions.

---

by Harry

Karen,

Another thing you can do is apply the unfocused gaze when "seeing" another person. You will start to see different people. Watch them for a second more than usual, even if it feels embarassing. And you'll catch people changing faces. Don't respond to this. Just observe it.

If someone rubs you to the raw, just see them. Or focus on something you don't normally "see". Take a look at someone's hands, for example.

---

by Judy

Something I use for fear:

> (from Joseph Azize's book "George Adie - A Gurdjieff pupil in Australia.)
>
> Relaxation is the Key (13th January 1955)

I AM.

I record. I try and constate my immediate position. I try to comprehend deeply. I try to be. I am in touch with my real life. I wish for a coating to my life, that I may be relatively independent. I am alone.

I protect my inner sanctuary, protect it from suggestibility and the fear of others - and this way, I am more connected with others.

Relaxation is the key.

Relaxation is the key to the absence of FEAR. All negative emotions, and pain itself, are based upon or depend upon tensions. Relaxation transforms negative emotions. Relax, and remain apart.

Let my belly fall. Practice this continually with breathing. Relax the stomach all the time. Recall how you were poised, your posture, openness you experienced before G., after coffee, after music - posture relaxed attentive.

The essential need is to recreate myself by WILL each day. I must have an aim, and this aim is to acquire will. I must have the being work, the essential living process of relaxation - division of attention - breathing. If this alchemical process is not maintained, the light in me goes out. I must struggle really hard, and relate those efforts to my work . I awakened my energy, it passed to my head, but I relaxed, and it amplified, filled the column from base to head, fulfilling my presence, between movement and grace.

If the process takes place in disquiet, then it gives exterior results.

If the process takes place in semi-quiet, then mixed results, inner and outer.

But if in the inner quiet, then only, results which bring immediate contact with inner life.

Inner Life.

The direct link between all negative emotions and the bodily tensions, both conscious and unconscious, continues to amaze me.

What a joyous week here in our group! Thanks to all. Now let's see if we can continue.
I Am, I wish, I can.

by JohnS

I have had llimited internet access for the past week (nice to be granted study leave at the age of 61!), and to come back to this thread is a great discovery. Thankyou to all for these illuminations, especially Judy's detailed analyses, which always reveal both great effort and wisdom. And Harry does the same, but in one sentence.
Cassandra, the two books you are reading are constant references for me: I go back to them constantly for the very reasons you mention: extending away from the normal view, and trying to stay out there.

I bought a book yesterday by Pierre Bonnasse - a friend of Rene Daumal - called The Magic Language of the Fourth Way. This is another crass title, chosen by the publisher, I think, as was Search for the Miraculous, and the original title was Who is Speaking? It is a haunting book (for me) on analysing Gurdjieff's insistence on a special, precise language, and why it is so important. It emphasises that the most important factor of a speaker is the state of being of the talker, and that he must also be able to assess the state of being of the recipient in order to communicate anything that is not superficial. I know this sounds like basic Gurdjieff teaching, but the detail expounded is enervating, and the insight is profound. And it pushes for the urgency of using the Right Word at the Right Time, with the Right Thought behind it.

---

by Harry

John,

As someone who has immersed first in G's writing, certain words have a different meaning to me that their "translations" that have been used. Triamazikamno (doubt I spelt that correctly, though I hear it correctly) Heptaparaparshinokh. Partkdolg Duty.

There are others. But I think there is a magic in it. A real magic. Not the word itself, but G investing it with meaning. Which is one by reading it over and over again, three times. And hearing it. Etc. Just like OM starts to take on a certain meaning.

To Everyone in Everything: can we keep it up? To G's birthday, at least?

Harry

---

by Ian

> Cassandra wrote:
> I've been thinking of this quite a lot: facing rather than avoiding situations where internal considering rises. I believe that a woman whom I come into contact with every week or so doesn't like me and avoids eye contact with me.

> Why should I care. I've often had vengeful feelings towards her or I try to ignore her presence. Rather than this, I will neither seek nor avoid her presence. If I encounter her, I will smile inwardly and bless her. If I don't see her but she comes to mind, I will do the same.
>
> I challenge others to also offer blessings in cases of internal considering.

Can you write a Haiku or poem about this?

---

by Ian

> John Summers wrote:
> Very timely: guilt is a wonderful thing, especially when it appears before you simultaneously in print, then immediately afterwards in real life.
>
> I'm planning a trip in December, and a friend challenged me today to reveal that I will be spending the New Year at the remotest location I could find (yes), alone (yes), would have a fantastic experience (yes), and keep it to myself (yes).
> I use the excuse of meditation on isolation and simplicity, but I think a turning point away from retrospection is sorely due, if others see it in me so easily.
> I will waste this precious experience by keeping it too private.
> It is selfish not to make the effort to share.
>
> I realise that, so far in this post, I still haven't shared anything.

Could you compose a Haiku or poem about it?

---

by Ian

> Judy wrote:
> oops - just lost a long post. For the moment, I'll post this bit.
> Judy.

As an aside - I have lost too many long replies due to timeouts. To circumvent that, I tend to compose my replies in Notepad (or some other kind text editor if not using MS Windows) and then copy and paste them into my replies here.

---

by Ian

> Harry wrote:
> Ian,
>
> I was pondering on this as I was laid up with some arthritis pain. I think what we're missing, to some extent, is the outer circle. We need those people who just are getting interested. Those "introductees" if you wish. Previously Reijo's advertising in all kinds of places provided that. But I think that's something that doesn't get met anymore.

If anybody wants to advertise next years All and Everything Conference, they are free to do so...
http://www.aandeconference.org/

---

by Ian

[quote="Harry"]Ian,

I was pondering on this as I was laid up with some arthritis pain. [quote]

Ouch! Hope you are feeling better now. I have RA, so know how painful that can be.

---

by Ian

> James wrote:
> Hello,
> A good idea Judy, to share what one is reading and experiencing with the sittings and exercises, I am a member of the Berlin Movements group and much attention is given here to sensing exercises. The reality of the body and its observable manifestations is a solid base for work. Here is one of the exercises: while sitting, sense the right arm for seven breaths (while attempting to feel that the right arm is also “breathing”) next to sense and “breathe” with the spine for three breaths, then sensing and breathing with the right leg for seven breaths then back to the spine for three breaths and so on ,the left leg(7) , spine(3), left arm(7), spine(3) and then back to the right arm for seven breaths, back to the spine for SEVEN > breaths. Continue this sequence again starting with the right leg, and so on. The final sequence begins with the left arm.

> Good Luck to you all
> James

Hi James,

Great exercise, maybe you could work that up and present it here as a weekly Work programme?

---

by Ian

> Karen wrote:
> Ian wrote:
>
> > Please make an effort and share something with your co-seekers...
>
> This exercise has proven effective for me. It's simple and easy to do. If it resonates for you, I would be interested in learning of your experiences.
>
> BREATHING OUT FEAR
>
> Take three long, slow, deep breaths.
>
> With each exhalation, imagine that your consciousness gets
>
> larger and larger until it fills the room.
>
> Take three more long, slow, deep breaths.
>
> With each exhalation, imagine that your body gets larger and
>
> larger until it fills the room.
>
> Take three more long, slow, deep breaths.
>
> With each exhalation, imagine that you can see the spaces in between the particles of matter of your expanded body.

Now, see the vapors of fear as they approach you.

Calmly observe them as they move past you and through the

spaces between your expanded form.

Do not attach to the fear. Simply allow it to flow through you.

FOCUS ON WHAT YOU WANT
NOT ON WHAT YOU FEAR.

When fear is no longer your enemy,

you can more easily accept the love that constantly emanates from the place “in-between” fear and love.

In this manner you can begin to remember that ALL separation is an illusion.

Hi Karen,

Great exercise. Could you present it as a Weekly Work Exercise here ?

Maybe you and James could work together to combine aspects of each of your exercises into one "sensing and breating" exercise to present here?

---

by Ian

Judy wrote:
Perhaps members could share about what they are currently reading?
Experiments with other traditions?
New insights from daily practice of sitting?

In other words, they share themselves; their energies; Being, if you like.

Well, I have not read many printed books lately because I spend a lot of time reading on the internet insead.

(The last print book I read was - Panpsychism in the West, David Skrbina, isbn - 9780260195225)
On the internet, I read such things as - quantum physics, astro physics/cosmology, conscious studies, neurology, psychopharmocology, parapsychology, NDE, UFO, computer programming, yoga, nutrition, philosophy, egyptology, archaeology, electronics, alternate energy, robotics, architecture, art, photography, digital imaging .

Experiments with other traditions? -

Well, much of the Gurdjieff Work can be found in other Traditions.
One thing that isn't well known or practiced in the Work is Mantra Yoga.
I have had a lot of exposure to this tradition and I can say that I think that it would be a valuable adjunct to the Work, as it involves breath/sound/sensing.

New insights from daily practice of sitting?

You can never step in the same river twice.

You can only have an AH-HA moment once.
After that once, it is only daily life.
You can only be Enlightened once.
After that once, it is simply the way it is.

---

by Cassandra

> Karen wrote:
> I have found that being impartial and non-judgemental with ourselves and others can be a very difficult task. As an excerise, I like to visualize my face upon everyone's face I meet throughout the course of a day. I get to see many I's in all kinds of roles on the stage! Like Harry mentioned, "What is in her is in you." Seeing everyone as a reflection of self has been a helpful reminding factor. It has also assisted in storing energy opposed to squandering it on wasteful gossip, toxic thoughts and ill-emotions.

One of my exercises for the week is to take the position of others I encounter. So this is helpful, Karen. Thanks. Also, thanks for the Breathing Out Fear meditation. I will try it, as fear and longing are often the two poles of my life.

---

by Cassandra

Ian wrote:

> Cassandra wrote:
> I've been thinking of this quite a lot: facing rather than avoiding situations where internal considering rises. I believe that a woman whom I come into contact with every week or so doesn't like me and avoids eye contact with me.
>
> Why should I care. I've often had vengeful feelings towards her or I try to ignore her presence. Rather than this, I will neither seek nor avoid her presence. If I encounter her, I will smile inwardly and bless her. If I don't see her but she comes to mind, I will do the same.
>
> I challenge others to also offer blessings in cases of internal considering.

Can you write a Haiku or poem about this?

Thanks to my fellow
Being for reflecting right
My fear and longing

I'm sure I envy the person for her stature in our small society--money, recognition for being associated with local power structures. My wounded ego goes back to grade school when children split into A, B, C, etc. groups. I want to be in hers, but I recognize that she responds to a different kind of energy than what I emit.

I can live with it.

---

by Harry

See I'd have gone to Fear and Loathing in honor of Hunter S. Thompson. But that's probably an age thing.

---

by JohnS

I dreamed a dream within a dream;
The dream was this:
that seven years would pass before I'd find the seven years I'd dreamed had passed

I'd yet to leave behind

---

by Judy

Ian wrote:

> You can only have an AH-HA moment once.
> After that once, it is only daily life.
> You can only be Enlightened once.
> After that once, it is simply the way it is.

I look at this quite differently, Ian. I have many ah-ha moments; to be sure they are each unique. I call each moment of good-quality self-consciousness a sort of aha moment and look for them in good self-observation daily. Of course there are long periods of being asleep in between.

Perhaps we are using the word 'enlightened' differently too. I didn't think there were many cases of sustained enlightenment (it is said Ramana Maharshi is one), but rather that the glimpswes of unity or unitive vision are indeed mostly few and far between.
Do you see where I am coming from?

Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by Karen

> Harry wrote:
> Karen,
> Another thing you can do is apply the unfocused gaze when "seeing" another person. You will start to see different people. Watch them for a second more than usual, even if it feels embarassing. And you'll catch people changing faces. Don't respond to this. Just observe it.
>
> If someone rubs you to the raw, just see them. Or focus on something you don't normally "see". Take a look at someone's hands, for example.

Lao-Tzu wrote something similar, "Just remain in the center, watching. And then forget that you are there."

We first seem to become absorbed BY what we see, then become absorbed IN what we see...

Thank you for this approach Harry

---

by Ian

> Judy wrote:
> Ian wrote:
>
> > You can only have an AH-HA moment once.
> > After that once, it is only daily life.
> > You can only be Enlightened once.
> > After that once, it is simply the way it is.
>
> I look at this quite differently, Ian. I have many ah-ha moments; to be sure they are each unique. I call each moment of good-quality self-consciousness a sort of aha moment and look for them in good self-observation daily. Of course there are long periods of being asleep in between.
>
> Perhaps we are using the word 'enlightened' differently too. I didn't think there were many cases of sustained enlightenment (it is said Ramana Maharshi is one), but rather that the glimpswes of unity or unitive vision are indeed mostly few and far between.
> Do you see where I am coming from?
>
> Best wishes,
> Judy.

Yes, I think I see where you are coming from.

I am using 'enlightened' in terms of the glimpses of unity or unitive vision.
In that sense, there will be an initial "revelation" or Ah-Ha moment. That cannot be repeated.
Any subsequent Ah-Ha's will relate to finer understanding of the initial one.

There is a Zen quote - You can only step in the same river once.

---

by JohnS

I think I can relate to the distinctions.

My one defining moment was, stuck in a traffic jam, glancing out the window and seeing a tree on a hill. That is the moment I have been trying to recreate as fully ever since.
It happened around a very emotional time, and I also believed for a long time that a couple of other events were equivalent then, but when I'm honest about them I know I had a clear message given to me in my head: 'Don't take this event personally - don't possess it - or you will taint it with your personal emotions. Just leave it alone and move on"
I consciously said No to these messages, because I wanted to be involved as much as possible, and paid the price.
But the tree remains the pure moment.

---

by Harry

John,

I'd go back and find one of the early exercises that Ian gave. Walk with the sightless gaze focused on the horizon. Let your attention flow through the twelve points in the body. If you focus you mind on the intonation at each joint, you will be preparing your organism.

Ah Ha has been taken into the everyday world just as De Je Vu (Or however you spell it) has.

We aren't moving toward a result. We're moving. And we begin to see things coming toward us. And, ah ha, we can also begin to choose not to go with some of those. The world becomes a different place.

Harry

---

by Cassandra

> Harry wrote:
> John,
>
> I'd go back and find one of the early exercises that Ian gave. Walk with the sightless gaze focused on the horizon. Let your attention flow through the twelve points in the body. If you focus you mind on the intonation at each joint, you will be preparing your organism.
>
> Ah Ha has been taken into the everyday world just as De Je Vu (Or however you spell it) has.
>
> We aren't moving toward a result. We're moving. And we begin to see things coming toward us. And, ah ha, we can also begin to choose not to go with some of those. The world becomes a different place.

> Harry

Last year I'd do the twelve joint exercise while repeating the Holy Affirming, Holy Denying, etc. It always felt awkward, cold, emotionless. Maybe this is because it was in such contrast to the warm, fuzzy conversations and day dreams I like.

I'll begin again because I want to SEE and so desire to have the world become a different place.

Thank you Harry.

---

by AlbertoB

> Judy wrote:
> Perhaps members could share about what they are currently reading?

Excellent idea, Judy. So it's more easy to share the search.
Currently i'm reading (and re-reading) the small book by Lee van Laer at his site Doremishock on chakras and the Enneagram.
http://doremishock.com/documents/ChakrasAndTheEnneagram.pdf.

There are some ideas in this book that are absolutely new for me. For example the connection between suffering and "to allow" the higher to enter in us. I recommend you this book.
There is an exercise in the book that seems to be appreciated by the members some months ago. It was Judy to propose it perhaps.
In this time i'm trying to do it with the correct breathing, and i feel (i believe to feel) some emprovement in my mood.
Another Work read is "Jane Heap/Notes". The intensity and concentration of these sayings are frightening.

"Purgatory is to understand more than you can do" .

---

by Ian

[quote="Cassandra] Last year I'd do the twelve joint exercise while repeating the Holy Affirming, Holy Denying, etc. It always felt awkward, cold, emotionless. Maybe this is because it was in such contrast to the warm, fuzzy conversations and day dreams I like.

I'll begin again because I want to SEE and so desire to have the world become a different place.

Thank you Harry.[/quote]

The 12 joint exercise is more of an exercise to develop your dispassionate objectivity, attention, concentration and Sensing - it is not meant to meant to be a warm fuzzy exercise.

It is also a useful exercise to use intentionally in response to negative emotions.

The Driver needs to learn how to control the Horse and not let it run rein.

---

by Judy

Well, there is certainly some serious reading going on in the group.

I'm currently reading between Jeanne de Salzmannn's "Reality of Being" and Joseph Azize's book "George Adie - a Gurdjieff pupil in Australia".

Also recently begun a course by ttc in audio lectures - "Philosophy of Mind - Brains, Consciousness and Thinking Machines", which is most enjoyable, and some of it can be applied to work practices. For example, one particular lecture 'Mind in the World' focusses on the improving of effective logical and rational thinking ability by using various environmental 'extensions of the mental process, such as pen and paper (shopping lists to aid memory, posts to the ES forums to clear the brain of as much basic thinking as possible in order to effectively improve the pondering process for the more difficult topics - and so on). Of course, we all do this all the time with mathematics amd serious study, and I knew that posting usually clarifies other ideas for me, but I hadn't heard it expressed in quite this way. The section on robotics is really fascinating too.

Yes, Alberto, there was indeed quite some interest a while back in Mr Van Leer's chakra exercise. It is an interesting paper. Good to hear from you.

And Steve - welcome to the group. We look forward to hearing from you soon. Do feel free to ask questions if you have queries. There's a depth of knowledge and experience within the group. Someone will always give an added perspective.

Best wishes to everyone,
Judy.

---

by Cassandra

[quote="Ian"]The 12 joint exercise is more of an exercise to develop your dispassionate objectivity, attention, concentration and Sensing - it is not meant to meant to be a warm fuzzy exercise.

I know. That's why personality dislikes it. I find that early mornings I have a choice to attempt Work or trod the well worn but dead end path. There is such resistance. Still, work attempts this week have centered on putting myself in the place of someone I encounter. I'm still trying to figure out how best to do this.

---

by Harry

Judy, I've been reading Jeanne de Salzmannn's "Reality of Being" since it was mentioned here. I wonder how others are responding to it. I know she was a major player in G's life, work. But I'm finding the book less inspiring than many of the others I've read. I still read an exercise a day. But find the voice missing me.

Just a reminder about reading. If people are reading other works and haven't read Beelzebub 3 times please focus there. The book really is "All and Everything". But seems to have lost some attention in our discussion area for it. Likewise Meetings is a work to focus on. And if you haven't seen the movie it's available on DVD and came with one of the other books I ordered free. Well made by someone who really cared about Work.

If you've done the main readings, G and O, then Nicoll and Collin provide much insight. Nicoll being a student of Jung's put together thousands of pages of commentaries. And Collin probably has the most emotional approach to Work.

But All and Everything first and foremost. Until the language is ingrained in your being.

Work Program week beginning 25 October 2010

---

by Gururaj

Awareness of digestion of the foods for each centre - Throughtout the week be aware of the foods/inputs/contents of the Planetary body 'stomach'; Intellectual body 'stomach' and Emotional body 'stomach'.

The respective foods being - physical food; impressions/ideas and air.

Maintain an appropriate psychological posture (attitude) towards this Aim.

Ponder at the end of the day, in an all-brains-balanced-being-state, as to -
1. How much of the contents (especially of the 2nd and 3rd stomachs) were intentional and how much were due to reactions/automatisms.
2. What was the resultant health of each centre. Was there a sense of satisfaction?
3. Regarding the foods for the Emotional 'stomach' - Are feelings/emotions the results or can they, to some extent, also be chosen as inputs ?

If any group member desires some more background knowledge related to the task, one source is given below available in a public domain.
(Refer to pages 6 to 11 of the pdf file)
http://www.archive.org/details/OrageGurdjieffMeetingNotes

---

by Ian

> 3. Regarding the foods for the Emotional 'stomach' - Are feelings/emotions the results or can they, to some extent, also be chosen as inputs ?

Good question.

It all depends on the situation.

Depending on the context / situation, emotions/feelings can be a result or they can be chosen.

In a real life situations where events unfold in real time, emotions are most often evoked by association.
In theose cases, the emotional parts of the brain process the incoming information and automatically generate emotions.

We can simply identify with those emotions, or, after the fact, after the initial rush of emotion, we can choose to recognize they are based on associations from our past and do something else with them. This is where self-observation and the 2nd conscious shock come into play.

If we are listening to music, we can sometimes choose what emotions we experience by listening to certain types of music.
In the case of music, we can deliberately alter our emotions by listening to the appropriate type of music.

In life, we can deliberately put ourselves in certain situations where predictable emotions will be evoked.

---

by Judy

Gururaj,
Thanks for that most interesting link. The Meetings Notes are crystal clear (in their presentation,not necessarily in their meaning)

I'm in to attempt this exercise.
I'll read pp7-11 after reading your exercise through a couple of times.

Orage is listed as having more than 230 publications, including books on Nietzsche, and Love as a Psychological Exercise, plus many others I was unaware of - no mean feat. Daly-King's "The Oragean Version" remains a favourite exercise book, although it is heady stuff and I take only in small doses.

I wonder if this is our first exercise directly from Orage? Maybe.

Cheers,
Judy.

---

by Judy

Studying the digestion of the second and third being-foods in their respective stomachs -

This is quite complex, as there is reciprocity and overlap; plus, the very nature of the exercise means that a degree of self-consciousness is needed to do it.
(using Orage's working definition here of consciousness being the awareness of images and therefore self-consciousness is consciousness plus the awareness of the organism perceiving.)

First question's answer is indeed the very obvious first thing to be noticed – that apart from the daily sitting, the amount of intentionality in this regard is not high.

It would be hard not to notice the direct link between the breathing and the emotions; and it can proceed in either direction; stressed organism = shallow rapid breaths; relaxed organism = deeper slower breaths of a different type.
Time and again this week there has been seen a need to relax; so much so, that I've been using an old and quick method most of the time. I'll mention it in case others find it useful. It consists of sitting on a bed and taking three sharp in-breaths and then one long and full exhalation to be done as one flops back limp on to the bed. It gives a reasonable general relaxation when time is limited.

Re question 2; feeling of satisfaction ? Maybe. Certainly an enlivening of the organism. Yes – a sense of fullness when what remains from the in-breath is sent around the body.

Early days yet. I'm experimenting a bit with the third question. Yes, depends on the situation. Ian covered this in his post and Harry points out that we now have choices as to appropriate reception of things. This becomes more and more true as the work continues.

And we do see a different world out there. This stands to reason from the very definition of consciousness as awareness of images used by O. here.
So as consciousness changes, our reception of images changes ipso facto.
Which relates us nicely to the current discussion from last week about ah ha moments, trees (John, interestingly, I have a pure tree moment as well way back there) – sorry, I digress – and not stepping into the same river twice and so forth.
And this brings me back to the point I was trying to make in that discussion, which is that, although it is difficult to talk of these things, I basically know when I have done good daily work. How? There will have been some brief changes in consciousness; and these are known, just as I know the difference between sleeping and waking, so do I know when there has been some self-consciousness.

Lastly, thanks for the suggestion to use Office or Notepad, Ian. This post would have timed out for sure otherwise.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Gururaj

When I first read the meeting notes,as Judy remarked,the presentation was crystal clear.There was a sense of satisfaction in digesting the new ideas resulting in some increase in self-awareness.

But the continued "doing" of the task has been frustratingly ineffective.The attentive posture vanished when life situations hijacked the emotional centre and the resultant disturbance took one farther away.

There is a mention in the Notes - an invalid stomach needs an invalid diet.Was this task too strong for my present constitution, I wonder.

Regards to all,
Gururaj

---

by Cassandra

This is a timely exercise for me, given that I have made some changes in my diet recently. A Chinese medicine evaluation revealed that I have 'damp heat' (excessive) in my physical body. A remedy is to eat an 8 grain soup for breakfast and do other things which don't involve meat. I like meat very much, but my problem seems to be a life long excess of meat consumption.

My senses rebel. I do not look forward to meals of mung and adzuki beans and brown rice although these are excellent foods.

I ask: how might my other bodies respond to less meat consumption?

"How much of the contents (especially of the 2nd and 3rd stomachs) were intentional and how much were due to reactions/automatisms."

While taking a walk the other day, I realized how automatic was my reaction when I saw a woman I know, who was some distance away watering plants. Immediately I went into an imaginary conversation with her and also began criticizing her character. So this impression produced an involuntary response.

But generally I'm refreshed after a walk--fresh air and sunshine, but soon this energy gets dissipated in imagination. These are useful observations for me. Thanks for the exercise Gururaj.

Work Program week beginning 1 November 2010

---

by james

While sitting, sense the right arm for 7 breaths (while attempting to feel that the right arm is also “breathing”). Next to sense and “breathe” with the spine for three breaths, then sensing and breathing with the right leg for seven breaths then back to the spine for three breaths and so on ,the left leg(7) , spine(3), left arm(7), spine(3) and then back to the right arm for 7 breaths, back to the spine for 7 breaths. Continue this sequence again starting with the right leg, and so on. The final sequence begins with the left arm. Use the unfocused sightless gaze throughout the exercise.

---

by Judy

I used this as main daily practice for four days.

I had to add some variations/tricks to be able to do so effectively.

I ended up with saying inwardly - "Left arm is breathing in (one). Left arm is breathing out (one). Left arm is breathing in (two) - etc, up to seven. Then - "Spine is breathing in (one) etc, up to three --- and continue this process for the entire sequence.
This way, not only was the sensing good quality, but the sequences were clear and organised. It turned out to be simple, once organised; right arm, right leg, left leg, left arm; and going back to the spine in between each change of limb.
With the above wording, there were many instances where my 'sense of self' seemed to be in the relevant limb, too, which was interesting.
Sometimes, unsought flashes of illuminated bones washed across the mental screen - associations in the Work memory from some of Ian's earlier exercises perhaps?
Physical posture was a lying-down-on-my-back one.
Psychological posture was one of reverence.

Thanks, James.

---

by Steve

I found this exercise very intersting.
First thing I noticed was that I started interfering with my normal breathing tempo by adding the counts to 7, so rather than counting seven breaths it was more like i was breathing to the count. It also highlighted that I have a fairly good connection by sensation to my limbs and front, but not so good a connection to the area around my spine. After 5 days of practice half way through a round there seemed for a moment to to an inner connection between head and thorax but immediately imagination kicked in and everything got lost in looking and thinking, so maybe what I sensed was the beginning of imagining.

I see on the forum that exercises are done for a week, is there any value in carrying them on longer as I feel I would like to explore this exercise longer to possible get more in touch with my back area.

---

by Gururaj

Looked up this task a bit late in the week and have done it on the last three days.Found it easier than others as it was a 'standalone' task not calling for awareness while involved in other daily actions.And when I did attempt it while on the move ,in non-sitting situations,the continuity or the count was not maintained.But experienced a momentary lightness and detachment from identification.

Welcome,Steve.
I guess ,if anyone wishes ,they can continue to explore tasks beyond the first week.I still often do the Chakra/enneagram breathing exercise - a task from many weeks ago.
Gururaj

---

by Cassandra

I was made more aware of my body but with all exercises like this, I experienced resistance. The mind wants to imagine instead. I often lost count but would come back to the task.

Work Program week beginning 8 November 2010

---

by Karen

This exercise has proven effective for me. It's simple and easy to do. If it resonates for you, I would be interested in learning of your experiences.

BREATHING OUT FEAR

Take three long, slow, deep breaths.
With each exhalation, imagine that your consciousness gets larger and larger until it fills the room.

Take three more long, slow, deep breaths.
With each exhalation, imagine that your body gets larger and larger until it fills the room.

Take three more long, slow, deep breaths.
With each exhalation, imagine that you can see the spaces in between the particles of matter of your expanded body.

Now, see the vapors of fear as they approach you.
Calmly observe them as they move past you and through the spaces between your expanded form.

Do not attach to the fear. Simply allow it to flow through you.

FOCUS ON WHAT YOU WANT NOT ON WHAT YOU FEAR.

When fear is no longer your enemy,

you can more easily accept the love that constantly emanates from the place “in-between” fear and love.

In this manner you can begin to remember that ALL separation is an illusion.

---

by Gururaj

Thanks ,Karen ,for this opportunity to continue with this visualisation exercise.

When it was first shared by you a few posts ago,I had experimented with it briefly and had added a few variations of
1.imagining that I am out in the bright sun

2.visualising a huge expansion of the physical body which releases particles of negative emotions which get vapourised by the sun
3.Visualising more inert/solid tendencies to be trickling downwards as dark matter and coalescing into balls in my hands.
4.This matter is then thrown into a sacrificial fire in front (this part taken from an exercise contributed by Lift)
5.I come back to normal size ,thoroughly cleansed and light.

"Focus on what you want ,Not on what you fear"(or resist, as well ?) - a very wise phrase which ,to me ,is another way of saying - be with your Aim and not in Identification.
I need very much to get a taste of this.Thanks for providing a worthy Aim for the week.
Gururaj

---

by Karen

> Gururaj wrote:
> Thanks ,Karen ,for this opportunity to continue with this visualisation exercise.
>
> When it was first shared by you a few posts ago,I had experimented with it briefly and had added a few variations of
> 1.imagining that I am out in the bright sun
> 2.visualising a huge expansion of the physical body which releases particles of negative emotions which get vapourised by the sun
> 3.Visualising more inert/solid tendencies to be trickling downwards as dark matter and coalescing into balls in my hands.
> 4.This matter is then thrown into a sacrificial fire in front (this part taken from an exercise contributed by Lift)
> 5.I come back to normal size ,thoroughly cleansed and light.
>
> "Focus on what you want ,Not on what you fear"(or resist, as well ?) - a very wise phrase which ,to me ,is another way of saying - be with your Aim and not in Identification.
> I need very much to get a taste of this.Thanks for providing a worthy Aim for the week.
> Gururaj

Your additions to this exercise are very helpful visualizations Gururaj. Be with you Aim and not in Identification. Well said.

Experiments working with the energy of the sun have been a powerful way to transmute negative emotions and low level vibrations that no longer serve the highest good of the whole here and now.

The other statement or intent I've added as part of the opening for this exercise and all other exercises or meditations I work on is:

"May all negative emotions and experiences be transmuted and all systems, bodies and all levels of my being transit and enter a balanced harmonic relationship through all time / space / dimensions / matter and particulates, here and NOW"

This statement continues to evolve and expand as I delve deeper within and without to address the whole.

Thank you for posting
Karen

---

by Harry

There is a description, used by O, I think, that describes self observation as imagining the Sun observing you as you walk through life. I've used this on a number of occassions. And used to combine it with the 12 joint/bone exercise.

Work Program week beginning 15 November 2010

---

by Ian

When your opinions are discounted by others, give up the argument.
When your likes or dislikes are discounted by others, do not press your point.
When your beliefs are dis-believed by others, smile graciously.

Include a full body Sensing and an awareness of your breath with all of the above.

---

by Gururaj

[quote="Ian"]
When your opinions are discounted by others, give up the argument.
When your likes or dislikes are discounted by others, do not press your point.
When your beliefs are dis-believed by others, smile graciously.
[quote]

Due to recent events narrated below,I hope I can appreciate the value of Ian's exercise and look forward to smile graciously .

The events of the last few days had left me quite shaken and stirred .Today ,in a state of relative balance, I sat down and read the pages 39 and 40 from The Reality Of Being by Jeanne de Salzmann with the sub-title The awareness of “being here”.

As I pondered over Madame de Salzmann’s words, the profound knowledge in them complemented the ‘being’ experiences which I had had recently. What I also mean is that if life had not shaken me the way it had , I would not have appreciated the depth of what she was pointing at so gently.

The first two paragraphs “hit” me , so to say, and more so , these particular sentences which were – “I am always on the surface ,turned toward the outside in order to take something or to defend myself. Yet perhaps there is another another attitude, another disposition, in which I have nothing to take, I have only to receive.”

A few days ago I was on tour to a part of the Himalayas where a hydro-electric power project is underway on one of the chief tributaries of the Ganga. The colleagues in my team were very congenial, the customer gave excellent logistics support, the official work went very well ,the flight disruptions in both directions were quickly resolved ,the scenery and weather was great ,had a ceremonial dip in the very cold Ganga at Rishikesh and finally ,to top it all, had a thrilling river-rafting experience with the satisfaction of negotiating a few rapids . Throughout , I was basically “turned toward the outside in order to take something “ as Madame de Salzmann says.

On return to the office today discovered that the bonus paid out to me for the previous year, though generous in itself, was comparatively less than some peers. This ,coupled with the fact of having slogged a lot at work last year and an already existing perception of being treated unfairly in the past , I automatically went into a depression reaction. Did not confront the bosses , but walked out sharply on time very uncharacteristically. The hurt persisted at home. In this situation, here I was defending myself, nurturing my ego.

Later,after a brief walk on an errand ,somehow the pain had eased when I sat down to read the chapter.
(Is what follows, the reconciling force ?) Further into the reading ,as I pondered over it ,this was very inspiring, insightful - " We take consciousness as an object of observation. But we cannot see consciousness. It is consciousness that sees and that knows. I realize this if I experience it as coming from behind my body or from above. There is no observer ,there is a knowing. Yet if I experience consciousness as in my body, it seems that the "I" is the body and the consciousness an attribute of the body. I begin to feel what it means to be true, that is, the moment when my thought knows itself as it is and my feeling knows itself as it is . ….I have to learn to concentrate my attention toward this centre and stay here".

Regards to all,
Gururaj

---

by Cassandra

Gururaj,

Thank you for this example and the question of whether you experienced a reconciling force afterwards. I've had similar experiences with a hurt and then a softening.

---

by JohnS

It is a constantly observable fact that all excuses are justifications, as noted above, and top of the list is a lack of time to visit this forum. I could say that my current workload is insane. I could tell you what my daily work hours are, but that is displaying another reason for another excuse. Comparing my work hours to those of somebody 200 years ago should sober me up, but I can justify that one, too, or any other invented comparison.
When I think of the outstanding amount, diversity and quality of REAL WORK that some polymaths of the past achieved - Leonardo, Kircher, Bach, Humbolt (how can someone have the time to be a qualified scientist and a qualified doctor and a concert violinist, plus explorer plus botanist plus author plus artist/draughtsman, plus plus??) through their focus, concentration and dedication, then some perspective starts to make me ashamed of my ego even existing, wasting my time and my life like this.
True, one reason why I haven't posted is a lack of sufficient time-space for focussing on the most important of subjects such as this, though that comes down in the end to internal priority, too.

And the cure is known, of course, as stated above...so simple, and so appealing, but so elusive when life cycles get a grip.
So here begins another attempt....

---

by Karen

> When your likes or dislikes are discounted by others, do not press your point.

Went to costco for groceries with the family. Part way thru, caught myself commenting and pressing my point about various food products and suddenly remembered this part of this weeks program. Many instances presented themselves.

For the remainder of the trip I attempted to refrain from verbalizing.

Observations:

Instead of remarking - I would just casually grab things and put them in the cart.

The body would lunge towards certain isles (fruit, seafood and vegetables) while avoiding others (dairy, processed food section, candy)

It felt like something inside of me quickly reorganized (change of centres??) to 'work with and around' this aim.

Bringing awareness to the aim of 'refrain from verbalizing' seemed to create a 'holding zone, so to speak' for the point I was about to express. Energetically, it felt as though it didn't travel the route it would normally take.

What takes place energetically when we do not press a point? What changes or transforms?

---

by Judy

> When your opinions are discounted by others, give up the argument.
> When your likes or dislikes are discounted by others, do not press your point.
> When your beliefs are dis-believed by others, smile graciously.

I'm currently revisiting Dostoevsky's "The Idiot". The protagonist, Prince Myshkin, is portrayed as clearly having the quoted qualities in abundance. It is said that the author was trying to bring to life a portrait of a truly good person, a saint, in fact. Dostoevsky is supposed to have said that to him the so-called "miracles" of Jesus weren't important. The real miracle is the incarnation itself.

On a personal level, I've had much experience with all three situations above
They are works in progress.
Sometimes the smile is more gracious than others.

---

by Judy

Karen,
At a basic level - talking wastes much energy. Energy saved can be diverted to awareness, as you experienced so interestingly. Not speaking unnecessarily is a first measure for me when work-quality doesn't seem up to scratch. I think it is similar for several of us here. (thinking here of John's and Harry's recent mention of "remotest place" and what a "fantastic experience" is to be had there..)

Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by Ian

> Karen wrote:
> What takes place energetically when we do not press a point? What changes or transforms?

Good questions.
"What takes place energetically when we do not press a point? "
or, the paraphrase -
What takes place energetically when we do not press a mechanical reaction?

Resisting or restraining a mechanical reactions is the first part of the equation (not expressing negative emotions as Ouspensky said), but unless we do something else with the energy, it will just build up and eventually come out in a stronger mechanical reaction.

What we need to do is supply an alternative route or activity or intentional action or affirmation to dissipate or utilize the restrained energy.
We can do this by using conscious, pre-meditated actions such as - reciting a mantra; sensing the body in various ways; evoking an alternate emotion; or various combinations of all three.
Many exercises of this type have been offered here over the years.

If we can do one of those alternatives, then something may change or transform or transubstantiate.

Not that this is easy or always immediately effective - we need to work at it for a long time - and even then we will get caught up sometimes with mechanical reactions we never recognized in our selves before. So - this type of work - work on ego - is ongoing lifelong task.

Other types of work, such as being one with all, are much easier in many ways. The trap is to think that is all that is necessary.
Work on ego is much harder than people think and is probably a life long task.

We can come early in life to the oneness - but totally eradicating ego is probably impossible - still it is the most important work on oneself, but it is an endless task and your efforts must be unrelenting.

---

by Karen

Ian writes:

> Other types of work, such as being one with all, are much easier in many ways. The trap is to think that is all that is necessary.
>
> Work on ego is much harder than people think and is probably a life long task.
>
> We can come early in life to the oneness - but totally eradicating ego is probably impossible - still it is the most important work on oneself, but it is an endless task and your efforts must be unrelenting.

Your post sparked a reminder of Rumi's quote “Your task is not to seek for love, but merely to seek and find all the barriers within yourself that you have built against it.”

---

by Judy

Ian wrote:

> Other types of work, such as being one with all, are much easier in many ways. The trap is to think that is all that is necessary.

Sri Madhava Asish, in his book "Man, Son of Man", talks extensively about this. He says it is relatively simple to go from focus on the physical body to focus on spirit/unitive vision. What is difficult, and absolutely essential (as G. teaches too) is to deal with, and understand, all the areas in between; that is, the psychology, the ego, the beginnings and growth of the body Kesdjan and Mental body, and the large and much more difficult areas of fogginess in the realms which are closer to us now than pure Spirit, that is the etheric, the shadowy, the emotional realms - and so forth and so on. Asish asserts that this is an area often minimised by some popular teachers, but that Gurdjieff has it right. We have to develop step by step. And of course we will find the areas closer to us more difficult, exactly because we can know more of the nature of them, thus the obstacles. Isn't it harder to love the neighbour next door than the starving child across the world?

(clumsiness of expression is mine, not Asish's).
J.

---

by Ian

> Judy wrote:
> Ian wrote:
>
> > Other types of work, such as being one with all, are much easier in many ways. The trap is to think that is all that is necessary.
>
> Sri Madhava Asish, in his book "Man, Son of Man", talks extensively about this. He says it is relatively simple to go from focus on the physical body to focus on spirit/unitive vision. What is difficult, and absolutely essential (as G. teaches too) is to deal with, and understand, all the areas in between; that is, the psychology, the ego, the beginnings and growth of the body Kesdjan and Mental body, and the large and much more difficult areas of fogginess in the realms which are closer to us now than pure Spirit, that is the etheric, the shadowy, the emotional realms - and so forth and so on. Asish asserts that this is an area often minimised by some popular teachers, but that Gurdjieff has it right. We have to develop step by step. And of course we will find the areas closer to us more difficult, exactly because we can know more of the nature of them, thus the obstacles. Isn't it harder to love the neighbour next door than the starving child across the world?
>
> (clumsiness of expression is mine, not Asish's).
> J.

Thanks for that Judy - there is indeed a lot of intermediate Work.
In fact, most of our lives can be spent (wasted?) cutting through to intermediate stuff.

I must say, that in all the comments from various people above, that there were very many great posts in this thread.
Karen, Cassandra and Gururaj - thank you for all your pertinent observations - I can resonate with them all based on previous personal experience...
Love you all...

---

by Ian

> Gururaj wrote:
>
> > Ian wrote:
> > When your opinions are discounted by others, give up the argument.
> > When your likes or dislikes are discounted by others, do not press your point.
> > When your beliefs are dis-believed by others, smile graciously.
> >
> > > Due to recent events narrated below,I hope I can appreciate the value of Ian's exercise and look forward to smile graciously .
> > >
> > > The events of the last few days had left me quite shaken and stirred .Today ,in a state of relative balance, I sat down and read the pages 39 and 40 from The Reality Of Being by Jeanne de Salzmann with the sub-title The awareness of “being here”.
> > >
> > > (CONTENT SNIPPED FOR BREVITY)
> > >
> > > Regards to all,
> > > Gururaj

Excellent post - I saw all my own ego traps in everything you said...
It's really tough to get through isn't it?

I guess this is why they call it WORK?

Work Program week beginning 22 November 2010

---

by Gururaj

This week, take a Vow - to change or alter a certain mechanical behaviour in a specific way or to perform a certain exercise at regular intervals designed to interfere with your mechanical routine.

Try to include mental/emotional/physical aspects to the Vow. In other words, make it a 3 centered experience.

Each seeker shares any vow or vows they have undertaken to watch their mechanicalness and also share the experience.

---

by Gururaj

Searching for a mechanical manifestation to work upon,one feature came on the radar,so to say, and am exploring it

- the thoughts always fleeting thru' the mind arising with no conscious intention.

Very initial findings are that a broadening of awareness like full-body sensing tends to minimise the static .

The resulting feeling is a sort of freeing up ,a conservation of energy.

---

by Cassandra

Where I live in the US South, the middle class culture is mostly polite. At the surface, we are welcoming and warm. It's required almost to say something nice about our fellows in a public discussion. I've thought of just not doing this if presented with the situation.

But inwardly, I spend much of my time day dreaming, which takes a lot of energy. I will try to replace this with 23 Psalm.

Today is Thanksgiving in the US. I am so grateful for this forum and the ideas others have shared with me over the past 3 years.

---

by Judy

I chose to sense the feet and the hands whenever inner talking was observed.

Sensing is becoming more and more a favourite method for returning to presence.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Ian

> Cassandra wrote:
> Where I live in the US South, the middle class culture is mostly polite. At the surface, we are welcoming and warm. It's required almost to say something nice about our fellows in a public discussion.

This sounds just like English culture here in the UK.

---

by Ian

> Cassandra wrote:
> Today is Thanksgiving in the US. I am so grateful for this forum and the ideas others have shared with me over the past 3 years.

Why do they call it Black Friday?

---

by Ian

> Cassandra wrote:
> But inwardly, I spend much of my time day dreaming, which takes a lot of energy. I will try to replace this with 23 Psalm.
>
> I am so grateful for this forum and the ideas others have shared with me over the past 3 years.

After all my years in the Work, I also still spend a lot of my time day dreaming!

Cassandra, I think everyone here has great reciprocal respect for what you have shared with us over the last 3 years.
You are a gem with many bright facets. Thank you for everything you have contributed.

---

by Cassandra

Ian,

Black Friday, the day after Thanksgiving is the official start of the Christmas shopping season and is considered the biggest shopping day of the year. I think Black Friday refers to a firm's balance sheet. To be in "the black" means that the firm is profitable, but being in the red means a deficit. Retailers use consumer spending on this day as an indicator of how profitable the Christmas buying season will be.

It is a time, however, when the worst of human emotion and behavior has been displayed. There have been fights, injuries and even a trampling last year of a Wal-Mart employee who was run over by a mob rushing into the store to take advantage of the deep discounts offered.

---

by Harry

Yes. Buy your big screen TV for $200. We have three per store. First come first served.

I'm glad you gave the Black distinction. I knew that most retailers depend upon the holiday season to make profits, some doing as much as 40% of their business in the last six weeks of the year, but never thought of the ledger connotation. Probably because I long ago stopped using red in my spreadsheets.

Work Program week beginning 29 November 2010

---

by Ian

While walking, practice the sightless gaze and sense the center of gravity in the solar plexus.

When in the grip of a negative emotion such as anger or resentment, instead of manifesting outwardly, count to ten while sensing the turmoil in your solar plexus. and heart.

When in the grip of a negative emotion such as annoyance or depression, express gratitude by adopting an intentional yet unusual posture and repeating silently -

Oh Endlessness,
Help me on the way -
To enjoy the unenjoyable,
To like the unlikeable,
To love the unlovable.

End each day with a hearty laugh sensed in all areas of the body.

---

by James

Great exercise..finding here that it stops internal chatter,judging and preconcieved notions about others,enjoying the laughing too, which comes from deep within,a different taste.

---

by Ian

Hi James,

This is very serious Work - but we also need to laugh at ourselves...

---

by Ian

Dear Group,

We have had many exercises suggested over the last few years.
We need to use these exercises in our daily life.
Here is a Day Planner for Exercises.

Please use whatever exercises you have learned in this daily exercise planner -

---

by Alistair

Hello again to the workgroup
For some unknown reason my posts will not transmit to the site
This is another test

---

by Ian

> Alistair wrote:
> Hello again to the workgroup
> For some unknown reason my posts will not transmit to the site
> This is another test

Message received here - any more comments?

Work Program week beginning 6 December 2010

by Ian

Begin each day by entering a deep state of relaxation, detachment and inner silence through an All-Brains-Balanced-Being-Perception. Use the rhythm of your breathing to relax the physical, emotional and intellectual centers. Use a Sightless Gaze to take in impressions impartially. Be aware of the sensations throughout your body. Notice any sensations, feelings and thoughts that may disturb your relaxation and ponder on what inner considerings may lie behind them.

During the day, whenever you observe inner considering, try to redirect its underlying emotional energy towards an effort to enter a state of All-Brains-Balanced-Being-Perception. Finally, when you have entered a state of All-Brains-Balanced-Being-Perception, Ponder this question: Is inner silence inversly proportional to inner considering?

Work Program week beginning 13 December 2010

---

by Ian

Begin and end each day by entering a deep state of relaxation, detachment and inner silence through an All-Brains-Balanced-Being-Perception. Use the rhythm of your breathing to relax the physical, emotional and intellectual centers. Use a Sightless Gaze to take in impressions impartially and without identification. Be aware of the sensations throughout your whole body. Notice any sensations, feelings and thoughts that may disturb your relaxation and ponder on what inner considerings, anxieties, worries, fears, angers may lie behind them.

The poem IF by Rudyard Kipling suggests a few exercises:

"Or being hated, don't give way to hating" - During the week, if someone displays hatred (or anger, unpleasantness or criticism) towards you, experience and observe your emotional reactions but do not act outwardly on them. Instead, use the energy to perform an inner work task such as observing your breathing, sensing your arms and legs and spine, counting from 10 to 1, trying to put yourself in the others "shoes", repeating inwardly a phrase such as "It is nothing; I wish to be".

"If you can wait and not be tired by waiting" - During the week, if you are delayed in traffic, commuting, or in a check-out lane, experience and observe your emotional reactions but do not act outwardly on them. Instead, remain outwardly calm and use the anxious energy to perform an inner work task such as observing your breathing, sensing your arms and legs and spine, counting from 10 to 1, trying to put yourself in the others "shoes", repeating inwardly a phrase such as "It is nothing; I wish to be".

"If you can think - and not make thoughts your aim" - During the week, if you notice yourself lost in thoughts or daydreams, experience and observe the emotions and underlying intentions that caused them. Bring some of your attentional energy to observing your breathing and sensing your arms and legs and spine, while also bringing into awareness the sight and sounds around you. Evoke a feeling of gratitude for the functions of language and thought and the understanding that they may bring us when used intentionally.

Try to use the above examples to formulate more exercises based on the poem.

IF

by Rudyard Kipling

IF you can keep your head when all about you
Are losing theirs and blaming it on you,
If you can trust yourself when all men doubt you,

But make allowance for their doubting too;
If you can wait and not be tired by waiting,
Or being lied about, don't deal in lies,
Or being hated, don't give way to hating,
And yet don't look too good, nor talk too wise:

If you can dream - and not make dreams your master;
If you can think - and not make thoughts your aim;
If you can meet with Triumph and Disaster
And treat those two impostors just the same;
If you can bear to hear the truth you've spoken
Twisted by knaves to make a trap for fools,
Or watch the things you gave your life to, broken,
And stoop and build 'em up with worn-out tools:

If you can make one heap of all your winnings
And risk it on one turn of pitch-and-toss,
And lose, and start again at your beginnings
And never breathe a word about your loss;
If you can force your heart and nerve and sinew
To serve your turn long after they are gone,
And so hold on when there is nothing in you Except the Will which says to them: 'Hold on!'

If you can talk with crowds and keep your virtue,
Or walk with Kings - nor lose the common touch,
if neither foes nor loving friends can hurt you,
If all men count with you, but none too much;
If you can fill the unforgiving minute
With sixty seconds' worth of distance run,
Yours is the Earth and everything that's in it,
And - which is more - you'll be a Man, my son!

---

by Judy

Coincidence/synchronicity?

Rudyard Kipling wrote:

> If you can dream - and not make dreams your master;

I have recently been intentionally detaching from some very vivid dreams; not because they weren't valid, but because they were becoming quite a distraction.

Dream interpretation is so seductive. I wonder if it was this lack of balance regarding dreams that Gurdjieff seems to have warned about?
Sometimes that middle path is elusive and must be re-found.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Gururaj

> Ian wrote:
> "If you can think - and not make thoughts your aim" - During the week, if you notice yourself lost in thoughts or daydreams, experience and observe the emotions and underlying intentions that caused them. Bring some of your attentional energy to observing your breathing and sensing your arms and legs and spine, while also bringing into awareness the sight and sounds around you. Evoke a feeling of gratitude for the functions of language and thought and the understanding that they may bring us when used intentionally.

Once ,during a sitting, observed the flitting about of thoughts going on with no real focus triggered by a complaining emotion.They subsided soon enough when the attention was shifted to sensing the body starting at one extremity.This gave a taste of a different presence.Just observing without thoughts - was this an operation of the real I or a Work I , I wonder.(another thought)

Elsewhere in this site , in another recent thread , Ian has mentioned about not taking oneself seriously.(More accurately,the 'personality' of oneself,I presume).The examples in Kipling's poem suggest the same.But how does one transform ongoingly that irreverence of our usual self to a reverence/discovery of our true self.Where does the passion for this "WILL to Hold On" come from.Most of my actions are driven by motivations coming from the usual personallity ,and Work efforts remain secondary.

Rudyard Kipling ,by the way , is noted for a statement attributed to him - " The East is East and the West is West and never the twain shall meet " .It is ironical that his stirring poem is source for an exercise in a work group inspired by the precepts of Gurdjieff.

Gururaj

---

by Steve

> "If you can think - and not make thoughts your aim" - During the week, if you notice yourself lost in thoughts or daydreams, experience and observe the

> emotions and underlying intentions that caused them

Fascinating! I, for the first time, realised that I was inventing or supporting a false representation of myself and false ideas about myself through fleeting and subtle imaginings. I paid attention to imaginations where I myself appeared in my pictures.

Example Deciding to gather logs for the stove - I just pictured the log basket/log store and decided when I would do it - there was no image of me.
Versus Cooking for friends: Did I really imagine myself chopping an onion like a chef and that being noticed ??? quite funny but at the same time embarrasing to see that indeed that that was true. Fascinating stuff!
I have made no headway towards taking myslef less seriously I suspect the root deficiency that leads to me doing that is pretty well hidden. Hopefully it will gradually be discovered

Thanks for this exercise.

edited to add this observation.
I suspect this is a side benefit of following a daily exercise program that practices attention to presence and breath: In the last week I have found that many times during the day my attention has been quite automatically drawn to the awareness of my breath, as if I am being breathed.
Thanks for this exercise.

---

by Ian

Dear Gururaj and Steve,

Yoou both asked very pointed questions relating to how to distinguish between false personaliy and real self/essence.

This is a delicate area. Real self will have nothing in it pertaining to self aggrandizement. Certainly there is a point in the Work where we have to stand up and offer our services to other Seekers.
But in "Life" with our family and job collegues we do not need to do that. Wer simply need to be ourselves.
Mybe in all areas of life, we simply need to be ourselves?

Which of course begs the question - what is our real selves?

Work Program week beginning 20 December 2010

---

by Ian

Begin and end each day by entering a deep state of relaxation, detachment and inner silence through an All-Brains-Balanced-Being-Perception. Use the rhythm of your breathing to relax the physical, emotional and intellectual centers. Use a Sightless Gaze to take in impressions impartially and without identification. Be aware of the sensations throughout your whole body. Notice any sensations, feelings and thoughts that may disturb your relaxation and Ponder on what inner considerings, anxieties, worries, fears, angers may lie behind them.

Every 15 minutes throughout the day, try to consciously remember yourself for 15 seconds by using a technique such as - becoming aware of your whole body Sensation, taking three long, slow breaths and becoming aware of the panoramic kaleidoscope of light entering your eyes using a Sightless Gaze.

Visualization can help us to anticipate and plan courses of action or sequences of procedures that need to be performed in order to accomplish certain tasks. For instance, visualize performing a routine, everyday task such as washing the dishes, putting on shoes, turning on lights, etc., and then observe your performance to see if your visualization corresponded to the reality of actually doing the tasks. Try this at least 3 times a day.

Eating exercise: Take a conscious breath between each mouthful of food during your evening meal.

Seekers have begun to suspect that when they allow their eyes to focus on any object, they are identified with that object, so they decide to practice the Sightless Gaze at least three times a day.

Is identification another obstruction on the road to conscience? Begin to listen to sounds without hearing any of them in particular. (Soundless Sound exercise)

The Seeker has begun to recognize that sacrifice may be a conscious participation in the cosmic principle of reciprocal maintenance, so...

Decide to sacrifice unnecessary speech, thereby also eliminating some of the obstacles to spiritual progress.

Try to sacrifice your desire to be considered superior or smart by doing something daily that makes others consider you foolish or stupid.

---

by Karen

> Try to sacrifice your desire to be considered superior or smart by doing something daily that makes others consider you foolish or stupid.

The other day I went to an appointment in brightly colored polar fleece pj's with hair undone and no makeup.

Was a good exercise to observe the manifestations of vanity and pride which surfaced, as well as others reactions to seeing me this way, their comments, and body language.

---

by Harry

Karen, superior and smart are a different thing. I say this because it's one I've struggled with much of my life. My Mother was a teacher. I had to excel. And she had reason. I would have been happy playing sports. But as the TV commercials say, a good mind is a terrible thing to waste. But it's just as bad to waste a good emotion or a good physical sensation. But what I got rewarded for was intellect. And then I went in the opposite direction. To emotion. And faculty criticised me for this. Because education is supposed to be cerebral. But I taught Speech and that's as much and emotional and physical experience as it is mental.

I was with an old friend a few months back. And she was well made up. And was lip glossing all the time. And I wondered why. Because we were old friends. And we were alone together in the car, driving.

There's a song lyric I always loved:

Oh for just an hour
Oh for just a day
To be cute cute cute
In a stupid ass way

Jacques Brel

---

by Alistair

Dear Ian & the workgroup
Apology for not being in contact either personally or though a work group contribution.
Of course there are several excuses that can be made.
Perhaps the most significant that for a few months for some unknown reason I have experienced great difficulty accessing the site

It's 6am in Ukraine on the morning of December 25th, just another day here of no special significance

A year ago when out walking and similarly today there was/is a feeling that planet earth is quieter, there is less disturbance in the air than usual
Of course there are far fewer motor vehicles moving and far fewer people moving and far fewer machines machining
Maybe it's in part awareness of this that affects my feelings, regardless the planet does seem more peaceful today

This weeks exercise has a couple of elements of relative ease
Sacrificing unecessary speech is not so difficult if you live in a place where your language skills are limited to necessiting as opposed to idle chit chat.
It's now 9 years since a series of accidents led me to Ukraine, the last six in the quiet and solitude of the Crimea Mountains where I'm sure the second being food is as fine as anywhere on planet earth. You may consider me lazy not to have mastered the local language, Abram Yelov wouldn't be impressed , at times some of my I's would agree. There are other I's that feel it's no bad thing not to be able to 'chat'. We do all talk too much, 'Let your communication be yea yea or nay nay, for more than that cometh of evil' was allegedly part of the teaching of he whose birth is largely celebrated on planet earth today. My problem is that it's only occurred accidentally not by choice, nevertheless during the last few years it feels as though there has been a benefit in reduced talking. There have also been a few victims of overspeak when after a long spell of not talking much I come into contact with an English native speaker

Another point to note is my relationship with Zhenya. Zhenya is a local who has assisted me with many jobs over the last six years. We can't converse well but can converse well enough to have some time ago recognised that perhaps this was the strength of our great friendship.

The last element of the exercise appears to be one of the easiest of the year or any year
Being considered foolish or stupid by others must be one of the most prolific occurences in daily life but the exercise requires that we do this consciously rather than mechanically. The difficulty as I see it is doing something stupid that doesn't cause serious damage. For instance it would be stupid and foolish if I burned the goose later today but that would be a waste. So i've just decided that whenever possible today I shall stand on one leg, not of course if there is the risk of personal injury

Well, the post is written without knowing whether it can actually be delivered to the site. I sincerely hope technology is favourable today, perhaps the greatly reduced web traffic at this moment might be a benefit.

---

by Gururaj

> Ian wrote:
> Every 15 minutes throughout the day, try to consciously remember yourself for 15 seconds by using a technique such as - becoming aware of your whole body

> Sensation, taking three long, slow breaths and becoming aware of the panoramic kaleidoscope of light entering your eyes using a Sightless Gaze.

'Woke' up very rarely thru' the week to really attempt this task.Found that when some alertness is there one can maintain the expanded awareness longer than 15 seconds .But more often the 15 minute intervals just went by un-noticed.This made me explore using reminders from my mobile phone as an external cue.But it does not have that sort of repetititive alarming facility.

Since this ,in my opinion , is an excellent 'wake up ' exercise ,will keep trying.
Regards to all
Gururaj

Work Program week beginning 27 December 2010

by Ian

Begin and end each day by entering a deep state of relaxation, detachment and inner silence through an All-Brains-Balanced-Being-Perception. Use the rhythm of your breathing to relax the physical, emotional and intellectual centers. Use a Sightless Gaze to take in impressions impartially and without identification. Be aware of the sensations throughout your whole body. Notice any sensations, feelings and thoughts that may disturb your relaxation and Ponder on what inner considerings, anxieties, worries, fears, angers may lie behind them.

***

Gurdjieff I AM Exercise

"When a normal man, that is, a man who already has his real I, his will, and all the other properties of a real man, pronounces aloud or to himself the words "I am", then there always proceeds in him, in his, as it is called, "solar plexus", a so to say "reverberation", that is, something like a vibration, a feeling, or something of the sort. This kind of reverberation can proceed also in other parts of his body in general, but only on the condition that, when pronouncing these words, his attention is intentionally concentrated on them. If the ordinary man, not having as yet in himself data for the natural reverberation but knowing of the existence of this fact, will, with conscious striving for the formation in himself of the genuine data which should be in the common presence of a real man, correctly and frequently pronounce these same and for him as yet empty words, and will imagine that this same reverberation proceeds in him, he may thereby ultimately through frequent repetition gradually acquire in himself a so to say theoretical "beginning" for the possibility of a real practical forming in himself of these data.

He who is exercising himself with this must at the beginning, when pronouncing the words "I am", imagine that this same reverberation is already proceeding in his solar plexus." (Life is real only then when I AM, p134).

I AM Exercise from a handwritten note given by Mr G in 1939

"Breathe in - "I". Breathe out - "am". With all three parts do. Not just mind. Feeling and body also. Make strong! Not easy thing.

When breathe out, imagine part of air stays in and flows to corresponding place.

I take the word 'corresponding', to mean, with successive breaths, the Head, the Spine, the Solar Plexus, the Sex Centre and the Whole Body.

Where flow, how flow, that's its business. Only feel that part remains.

Before beginning exercise say: "I wish to keep this substance for myself".

Without this conscious and voluntary labour on your part nothing at all will be coated. All in time will evaporate.

Just this small property in blood makes possible very big result if done with conscious labour. Without this, one month you must work for such result.

When doing, must be careful not to change exterior. It is inner thing. No one need know. Outside keep same exterior. Inside you do.

Not hold breath. Just breathe in and out. Of course, to change thinking will take time. Automatically breath will adjust.

To be able to do exercise not lopsidedly you must put whole attention on it.

To arouse feeling, interest and attention, for cooperation you must think following before beginning: "I am now about to begin this exercise. With full attention I will draw in my breath, saying "I" and sensing the whole of myself. I wish very much to do this in order that I may digest air."

To arouse body to cooperate, take corresponding posture. Inner tension of forces. Mobilise your centres for working together for this aim.

In breathing, imagine something flows, like when inhaling cigarette.

I am now about to begin this exercise, which I have been fortunate enough to learn from Mr. Gurdjieff, and which will enable me with the aid of conscious labour, to coat higher bodies in myself from active elements in the air I breathe."

***

---

by Judy

I've recently returned from spending Christmas with family down south. Many parts of the state (Queensland) I live in are in disaster mode, owing to severe floods. This, plus the additional traffic for the holidays, made travelling slow and quite exhausting.
Thus, how special it is to return to find the following very favourite exercise suggested for this week:

> Gurdjieff I AM Exercise

> "When a normal man, that is, a man who already has his real I, his will, and all the other properties of a real man, pronounces aloud or to himself the words "I am", then there always proceeds in him, in his, as it is called, "solar plexus", a so to say "reverberation", that is, something like a vibration, a feeling, or something of the sort. This kind of reverberation can proceed also in other parts of his body in general, but only on the condition that, when pronouncing these words, his attention is intentionally concentrated on them. If the ordinary man, not having as yet in himself data for the natural reverberation but knowing of the existence of this fact, will, with conscious striving for the formation in himself of the genuine data which should be in the common presence of a real man, correctly and frequently pronounce these same and for him as yet empty words, and will imagine that this same reverberation proceeds in him, he may thereby ultimately through frequent repetition gradually acquire in himself a so to say theoretical "beginning" for the possibility of a real practical forming in himself of these data.
>
> He who is exercising himself with this must at the beginning, when pronouncing the words "I am", imagine that this same reverberation is already proceeding in his solar plexus." (Life is real only then when I AM, p134).

I admit to not doing any intensive work while away.
Reading this brought a wave of fresh and energising feeling and I instinctively breathed a very deep breath and relaxed in gratitude for my many blessings.

Then, a little further down, MR Gurdjieff says:

> To arouse feeling, interest and attention, for cooperation you must think following before beginning: "I am now about to begin this exercise. With full attention I will draw in my breath, saying "I" and sensing the whole of myself. I wish very much to do this in order that I may digest air."

I'm paying close attention to this gem, especially until back solidly into normal working state.

AND - Greg, how heart-warming to see you back on the site. You've been missed. Welcome, welcome indeed. Already your posts are most thought-provoking and intriguing. Really good to hear from you!

Best wishes for health and prosperity and much Work well done to all, during the coming year 2011.
Judy.

by Gururaj

> Judy wrote:
> Best wishes for health and prosperity and much Work well done to all, during the coming year 2011.

Welcome back and many thanks for the wishes,Judy - especially the latter part for intensifying Work efforts through the year ahead .

What resonated most for me on pondering about this task is how appropriate it is to feel "I am" alongwith the most fundamental sign of life - breathing - thereby acknowledging and (attempting to) be conscious of a universal I and not just the "my" I.

Wishing a fulfilling 2011 to all here,
Gururaj

---

by Greg

A Happy 2011 to Everyone on Endless Search!

I am slowly regaining my Work "sea legs" within this context and it will take some time for me to post again here. Serious illnesses within the family (which are largely my sole responsibilty) and a restored-on-a-different-foundation dancing life in NYC on the weekends will preclude the intensity of commitment I once had here. But change is a good thing for everyone.

I must say it has been a gratifying thing to read through all the postings that have been placed on this site --- I have learned so much, particularly from the work exerted on the text of BT. The site has truely begun to manifest a Work-garden.

AND "thank you" Judy, for your sentiments --- it is a lovely thing to again "hear" your voice. I am still reachable at the same email, if you feel so inclined.

All best wishes to All in the coming year!

love,
Greg

---

by Harry

I think that it is important that Ian posted the next exercise as one of relaxtion. Because relaxtion is crucial to this breathing exercise as well. It is crucial to relax the physical body while doing the breathing exercise. One of the chief ways is to become aware of the tensions in your face. Relax your face as you are breathing. This can be done even if you're walking. So it doesn't impose any other restrictions.

Interestingly while doing the breathing exercise the other evening I had a distinct impression, and by that I mean one that is a physical impression, that our personality is like a carapace. It is something that we need to live in life, but we will eventually discard it. It is also something that we can take off and put on.

There could well be an analogy to our bodies here.

Work Program week beginning 3 January 2011

---

by Ian

Morning Exercise -

Begin and end each day by entering a deep state of relaxation, detachment and inner silence through an All-Brains-Balanced-Being-Perception. Use the rhythm of your breathing to relax the physical, emotional and intellectual centers. Use a Sightless Gaze to take in impressions impartially and without identification. Be aware of the sensations throughout your whole body. Notice any sensations, feelings and thoughts that may disturb your relaxation and Ponder on what inner considerings, anxieties, worries, fears, angers, negative emotions or unfortunate consequences of the organ Kundabuffer may lie behind them.

***

Evening Recapitulation -

Bring your self into a relaxed, three centered state of All-brains-balanced-being-perception. Recall the days inner considerings, anxieties, worries, fears, angers, negative emotions or unfortunate consequences of the organ Kundabuffer and the days moments of Self-remembering. Recall the sensations, emotions and thoughts associated with them. Ponder: "Is Wish the mother of Will?"

***

Yearly Recapitulation -

Spend some time every day for the next week to take stock of 2010. Be brutally honest with yourself when you ask:

How did you fail and what did you learn in the process?
How did you succeed and how can you replicate what worked for you?
What were the psychological or practical hurdles that got in your way?

It is important to write this down on paper rather than just thinking it over. This gets you involved physically, emotionally and intellectually with the exercise and leaves you with notes to compare with at this time next year. Make 2 lists:

What Worked -

What exercises "worked" for you in your personal Work this year? What were your successes - your moments of Self-remembering, understanding and insight? List your successes and try to identify the factors and exercises and mind-set that facilitated your success.

What didn't Work -

What efforts did not "work" this year? What were your failures? Where did you fall short of your Aims? What Exercises did you not "like"? Why? Were you avoiding something painful that you didn't wish to examine or practice?

***

Yearly Wishes and Aims for 2011 -

Make a 3rd list of Wishes and Aims that you instinctively feel are necessary for your physical, emotional, mental and spiritual evolution.

Set out a series of exercises and practices that might help you accomplish your objectives.

Make a Vow to Work sincerely towards your objectives.

---

by Cassandra

Yearly recapitulation:

To begin, I looked back over each week's exercise for the year and counted the times I did one. Looks like I participated about 25% of the time. I guess my failure would be lack of active participation, and this points to a lack of committment. Hurdles would be simply lethargy, sloth, not wanting to work.

The exercises that worked best for me were ones involving the recognition of emotions or different mental states and then a prompt to try to redirect negative emotions into more positive states--for example, when you feel anger, jealousy, etc., count backwards or sense a body part. This work forces me to struggle with unpleasantness when it arises--something I often try to avoid.

I can't yet relate to exercises that ask for intonation of specific sounds or non-sensical syllables. I must say I don't like these.

One practical goal for the year is for me to continue to put myself in uncomfortable social settings. Each Wednesday, we eat an evening meal where everyone tends to segregate by class, age, mostly. We tend to sit with the same people. I don't like this setup, but rather than not go, I'll make attempts to simply go and maybe conversate with people I would normally try to avoid or who would normally avoid me.

I will also try harder to push past my reluctance to post on the site

Thanks, Ian.

by Ian

> Cassandra wrote:
> Yearly recapitulation:
>
> To begin, I looked back over each week's exercise for the year and counted the times I did one. Looks like I participated about 25% of the time. I guess my failure would be lack of active participation, and this points to a lack of committment. Hurdles would be simply lethargy, sloth, not wanting to work.
>
> > Mr Beidler used to say that if we could spend a third of our day working, we were doing good. So 25% seems like an excellent effort to me.
>
> The exercises that worked best for me were ones involving the recognition of emotions or different mental states and then a prompt to try to redirect negative emotions into more positive states--for example, when you feel anger, jealousy, etc., count backwards or sense a body part. This work forces me to struggle with unpleasantness when it arises--something I often try to avoid.
>
> I can't yet relate to exercises that ask for intonation of specific sounds or non-sensical syllables. I must say I don't like these.
>
> > One of the reason so many different types of exercises are given here is to make allowances for different personal preferences.
> > Seekers are encouraged to experiment with the various exercises and find the ones that resonate with them.
> > Mr Beidler called this the "shotgun" approach - many exercises are given and only some of them will hit the mark for you personally.
> > Another aspect of this is to Ponder why you prefer sensing over sounds, for example.
>
> One practical goal for the year is for me to continue to put myself in uncomfortable social settings. Each Wednesday, we eat an evening meal where everyone tends to segregate by class, age, mostly. We tend to sit with the same people. I don't like this setup, but rather than not go, I'll make attempts to simply go and maybe conversate with people I would normally try to avoid or who would normally avoid me.

I will also try harder to push past my reluctance to post on the site

> This Work is like weight training - every once and a while we have to add a little more weight and push ourselves a little harder.
> Of course we also have to recognize our limits and not over do it too soon. Don't bite off more than you can chew.

Thanks, Ian.

---

by Gururaj

2010 began with a masterfully eloquent clarion call by Ian (4th Jan weekly work program) for undertaking a “prolonged voyage across the tumultuous seas of life towards the calm shore of Being”.

The very next week Hroeder’s contribution was to “Be present at every breath……..Remember that you are travelling from the World of Appearances to the World of Reality”.

Having just got on board at that time ,I could hardly appreciate the trickiness of the voyage and the sense of the final aim.

After travelling for almost 13 months, now when I re-read them, I can see in me what one is up against and the aim of “discovering the world of reality” – is largely still an article of faith with no abiding ‘taste’ of it.

The exercises which ‘worked’ were mainly those to be done in time set aside from life interactions and daily chores. But the Work efforts required to done in the flow of action were very minimal. Especially when the ‘waves’ were strong or non-existent or as the day progressed, I became mechanical and un-aware. Maybe ,I have unconsciously considered Work as a luxury to be attended to after ‘urgent’ matters are handled or the ‘personality’ is calmed.

So the shift to be brought about in 2011 is to be PRESENT all the time. And then doing something against the grain.

There is a deep gratitude for Ian,Judy and the rest of the on-line community for all the exercise contributions and posts. Alistair had wondered in one of his posts whether any time in the past a group of persons across the globe had collaborated like this ‘in raising consciousness’. Surely the ES experiment is a different, wonderful use of the ‘net , often used to be in a virtual, unreal world.

(By the way, I have been able to make this post after scanning all the exercises for 2010 mainly because of being restricted to home due to an ankle fracture)

Gururaj

Work Program week beginning 10 January 2011

---

by Ian

When confronted with an opposing opinion, go against the organisms urge to disagree.

Ponder on the law of three - What in us is a denying force? What in us is an affirming force? What in us is a reconcilling force?

Try to observe the working of the law of three in everyday events.

Try to observe the working of the law of three in our perceptions.

Whenever you are walking during the day, use the 12 Joint Exercise. At every 7th step, move your attention to the next joint given in the sequence below. While sensing each joint repeat inwardly the corresponding word from the Holy Affirming Prayer. Silently Ponder the meaning of each word without expecting any answers.

12 Joint Sensing Sequence + Inner Prayer
---
1. Right wrist - Holy
2. Right elbow - Affirming
3. Right shoulder - Holy
4. Left hip - Denying
5. Left knee - Holy
6. Left ankle - Reconciling
7. Right ankle - Transubstantiate
8. Right knee - In
9. Right hip - Me
10. Left shoulder - For
11. Left elbow - My
12. Left wrist - Being

---

by Judy

> Try to observe the working of the law of three in everyday events.

Right now;

Affirming force - fingers and keyboard keys

Denying force - virtual paper of this message box
Reconciling force - the actual "typing/writing"

OR

Affirming - moving fingers
Denying - keys of keyboard
Reconciloing - the actual moving of the keys.

This second one is clearer. This would then involve another triad to include the computer screen.
The first example seems like mixing triads to me.
Though, if consider the keyboard/computer screen as a modern extension of pen and paper, then I'd favour the first example. That way, keyboard and computer simply considered as a "tool". Yes, I'll go with that first one, I think.

Comments most welcome.

---

by Judy

> Try to observe the working of the law of three in our perceptions.

Affirming force: "I"
Denying force: "me"
Reconciling force: the observing (the Work itself)

The fourth consideration, the Result, would be the actual post itself in the first example, and an objective (well, as impartial as possible) fact about, or mini-photo of, the organism, in the second. There may also be increased awareness/self-consciousness in the second example.

---

by Cassandra

Judy, thanks for your very practical examples. I'd not been thinking about ordinary living as containing ripe instances of the Law of 3. Now, it's clearer to me that my attempting the Holy equation exercise also suggested relates to the Law of 3.

affirming=walking denying=thoughts of this is stupid, searching desperately for something important to report reconciling=finishing the exercise with nothing to report

---

by Steve

I still have confusion over the law of three in everyday life.

A current situation:

I have a friend going through a difficult time. I wish to support them.

Seems to me there are multiple possible triads here depending on how I look at the situation.

I could see that my friends situation/needs/requests could be 'denying' as they elicit a response and my choice to respond could be seen as action of an affirming force. The reconciling force might be the results of new understandings that come from exchanges?

Alternatively if I have a 'need to help' then does that shift me into the place of the 'denying force' ?
Will this dynamic change moment to moment depending on what is happening at any point within the exchange just as in a converation when one switches from speaker to listener?

Another possibility I see is that at times a request is conveyed.
This request contains information which I can evaluate using mind and emotions and act according to my capabilities , using three brains , the sources of Affirming force Reconciling force and Denying force in Beelzebubs Tales.

When thinking about the realtion between body, mind and emotion I become confused. For example, take a situation where emotions rule the head. Does that mean that the sources of our own reconciling force can be active in a situation and the source of our own affirming becomes passive? I am confusing inner and outer triads which should be treated quite separately?
When I look at the possibilites of the emotional centre I can see that it can experience anger / sadness / fear / joy - a whole host of experiences which do not alway seem to me to be carriers of a reconciling force.

---

by Harry

Steve,

Start with your premise. You can't help your friend. You might be able to see the plus and minus in his situation. But that's the outside perspective. If you are trying to help yourself, you do that by neutralizing. Don't go with the plus or minus.

I know it sounds hard to say you can't help your friend. You can provide support. You can provide insight. But your friend has to help self.

---

by Steve

> Harry wrote:
> Steve,
>
> Start with your premise. You can't help your friend. You might be able to see the plus and minus in his situation. But that's the outside perspective. If you are trying to help yourself, you do that by neutralizing. Don't go with the plus or minus.
>
> I know it sounds hard to say you can't help your friend. You can provide support. You can provide insight. But your friend has to help self.

Thanks Harry

Yes, I am aware that I can't 'help' my friend I can see that.

Re
If you are trying to help yourself, you do that by neutralizing. Don't go with the plus or minus.

I think I am seeing that more and more - is that sitting in between, bearing sufferings but not identifying?

---

by Judy

Cassandra wrote:

> affirming=walking
> denying=thoughts of this is stupid, searching desperately for something important to report > reconciling=finishing the exercise with nothing to report

Cassandra,
Remember that something "new" will be manifested if reconciling force has entered; "the higher acts on the lower to actualise the middle" as is said in Beelzebub's Tales. Gurdjieff said we are often third force blind. It is "the Holy Ghost" part of the equation.
So, if, in your above example, the "finishing the exercise with nothing to report" was a new emotional state, for example, which resulted from the exercise, then maybe look at that as being the "result", and the reconciling force would likely be the "working of the exercise itself". (I find it helpful to refer back to John Bennett's clear example of the hand plus knife cutting the loaf of bread; where the third force is the cutting itself, and the result is the slice of bread.)

Good to hear from you.
Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by Cassandra

Judy,

Yes, I see that the doing is the result, the ordinariness that is often just the effort expended. I keep wanting to feel different, but that again is appetite. Thank you.

Work Program week beginning 17 January 2011

---

by Ian

At least once a day, perform a quiet meditation or sitting. Relax the three centers and watch the breath. Keep the eyes open and use the Sightless Gaze.

Whenever you get angry or impatient, count to 10 while Sensing deeply the following 10 bones:

1. Lower right leg bone.
2. Upper right leg bone.
3. Pelvic bone.
4. Upper left leg bone.
5. Lower left leg bone.
6. Spinal column and skull.
7. Upper right arm bone.
8. Lower right arm bone.
9. Upper left arm bone.
10. Lower left arm bone.

Imagine/visualise that the bones are illuminated from within with a light-float of being.

Whenever you are happy, recall a time when you were sad. Reside in the mid-course of a 3 centered state of being.

Whenever you are sad, recall a time when you were happy. Reside in the mid-course of a 3 centered state of being.

End your day by evoking an attitude of gratitude to all that exists.

---

by Cassandra

I haven't been able to connect well with the sightless gaze so I end up shutting my eyes. I'm able to better connect with familiar sensations which I take to mean some kind of coating may be happening. I don't know, but as I've mentioned before, I don't seem to be able to 'advance' from this point. Maybe if I worked more on the unfamiliar and uncomfortable sightless gaze, my experience would grow.

---

by Gururaj

My perspective and approach to the sightless gaze is as follows-

It would be an already experienced thing for all of us that even with eyes wide open,when we are engrossed in some other activity ,like conversing on the mobile,the mind is not registering the sensations reaching the eye.So there is a taste of this state ,though caused automatically.

Now when we are not in 'engrossed' situations if we consciously choose to not register any specific things in the visual field and just remain unfocussed , then the sightless gaze is experienced.Our attention ,quite naturally , includes our body and maybe also our thoughts.

This skill is a useful one in order to approach a meditative state even when one is active with eyes open and not needing to closely watch something.

Experienced seekers could correct / improve upon this.

Gururaj

Work Program week beginning 24 January 2011

---

by Ian

This weeks theme: Attention and Concentration

Daily Pondering: What distracts my attention?

Daily Exercises:

1. Sit and gaze without focus on anything in particular, in whatever environment you find yourself in.

2. Count backwards from 100 to 1 by steps of 2. Repeat as often as possible.

3. As one breaths, count the exhalations from 1 to 10. Repeat as many times as you can.

4. Sense your left hand continuously. When you loose your attention, switch to the right hand.

5. As you walk, place your attention in the solar plexus.

6. As you eat first being food, count the number of times you chew each mouthful of food.

7. Sit and gaze at a candle. For a count of 10 breaths, visualize the light of the flame in your left shoulder. Continue with the following sequence - left elbow, left wrist, right wrist, right elbow, right shoulder, left hip, left knee, left ankle, right ankle, right knee, right hip.

---

by Steve

It has taken me until today to realise why I felt so much resistance to the counting part of this exercise.

I have made excuses 'I can't do it - it's interfering with my thinking out the step of computer programming code I am writing (day job)
I have limited it to 'the shower' in the morning. And it has only just struck me today, I have been working on 'not hurrying', that doesn't mean doing things slowly, but doing things without the mental/emotional hurry attitude and I have only just noticed that I have not been applying this attitude towards the counting and as such the counting exercise has just revealed a way that I hurry that was previously hidden. And I have found that if I stay present and count backwards without hurry it actually helps to centre me.

Thank you for the exercise.

---

by Pablo

Hello;
Last week I worked with the exercise number one. I did it one time a day, choosing one situation in my daily life. In most of the cases, I did it in the metro, a place which is typically used for wandering, a sanctuary of passive thinking. In general, it was a very useful exercise since it shows my lack of concentration, and the habit of lucubration in common situations like that. However, there were two specific occasions in which some interesting things happened, something out of the routine of the exercise with its permanent struggle.
The first one was in the metro. I divided my attention sensing my body and using the open gaze without focus on anything. Sometimes I directed my attention to the contents of my mind, and eventually if there were feelings but always with the open gaze. The first thing I noted was that my attention tended to go with women, particularly attractive ones. I could see the walls of the tunnel as the metro moved forward, noting the different lights activated when the doors were opened and the movement of diverse objects at the same time including people.
However, the most beautiful experience was after these observations, a state of calmness or a degree of silence... I have to mention that was impossible to reach such a state at will in the following days in the metro.
The second occasion was in the waiting room of the gynecologist of my girlfriend. I was alone with "metropolitan" magazines as the only material for entertain, so I said "why not here?". After some minutes, with inner considering feelings in view of the possibility that someone discovered me being present! (there were noises of doors, steps, conversations), the wall I had in front of me seemed to change the patterns of the shapes of its forms. Originally, it was formed by little holes, which looked like points as I gazed at them without focusing. The first impression I had was that the points were forming lines escaping towards the lateral sides (left and right). Then it seemed to form triangle patterns, and at the end a further configuration emerged consisting in diagonal lines. There was no experience of silence this time, but at least it was a new way of perceiving and experience that specific moment and the object in front of me. The points in the wall were the same, there was nothing magical or supernatural, but I witnessed the plasticity of our machine of perception remembered later some of the Gestaldt principles. I think it has to do with that...
The last two days were hard to me for remembering myself and my purpose of applying the open gaze. Resistance was strong, as a manifestation of laziness to act, which is normal in the scale.
Thank you for these exercises

---

by Greg

Dear Pablo,
Thank you for the detail of your reporting. The recounting of your perceptions of the waiting room wall are affirmative of experiences I have had with sightless gaze. We don't really 'see', do we?
You said:

> The first thing I noted was that my attention tended to go with women, particularly attractive ones.

Was there anything beyond your normal mechanical responses to "women" and "particularly attractive ones' that you would care to go into further? Was there an "energy" that you perceived through sightless gaze that helped you understand something deeper about "women" and "particularly attractive ones"? Were you aware which centres were supporting/being activated by these attentions?
Talk about what you can, if you feel like doing it.

Best wishes,
Greg

---

by Pablo

> Greg wrote:
> Dear Pablo,
> Thank you for the detail of your reporting. The recounting of your perceptions of the waiting room wall are affirmative of experiences I have had with sightless gaze. We don't really 'see', do we?
> You said:
>
> > The first thing I noted was that my attention tended to go with women, particularly attractive ones.
>
> Was there anything beyond your normal mechanical responses to "women" and "particularly attractive ones' that you would care to go into further? Was there an "energy" that you perceived through sightless gaze that helped you understand something deeper about "women" and "particularly attractive ones"? Were you aware which centres were supporting/being activated by these attentions?
> Talk about what you can, if you feel like doing it.
>
> Best wishes,
> Greg

Hello Greg;

Thank you for your suggestions and advices.
What do you mean by "something beyond a normal mechanical response" in this case to women? can you give me some examples of possible indicators of this phenomenon? The only thing I can tell you (if it's in some degree linked with what you say) is that also one day during last week, I'm almost sure wasn't that day of the experience, in few occasions I tried to see women in a different way beyond the dual categories of pretty-ugly, attractive non attractive, with no sexual background as the usual known "taste". But it was put in practice another day, I remember one woman in front of me in the metro who was the object of this practice... The magnetism or compulsion to look at woman is an issue that I'm trying to work from some time. I know there are cultural, sociological, biological and biographical causes of this mechanism... So we could say that I was aware of this phenomenon, even before last week during my inner work.

The topic of sexual energy is a very complicated one, I know even gurdjieff groups have exercises regarding this subject but there is a sort of secrecy about it... it seems an advance matter, isn't it? It becomes more complicated when you ask me to relate the manifestations of sexuality according to the three centers model of the fourth way.
I would like to understand more about this matter so I ask you, even to the other members of the group (specially Ian), to guide me in the topic of sexual energy and its connection with the three centers. How to recognize when the emotional or intellectual center is using or working with sexual energy? can you mention some exercises in this regard?

Regards

---

by Greg

Hi Pablo.

You've pretty much answered my question and I think you're doing just fine ---- I wouldn't complicate your point of observation any further.
When I am secure in sightless gaze and I, for instance, look at a painting I've always considered "beautiful" that viewpoint starts to see things which just "are". At that point I have to ask myself why I previously had to slap a definition of "beautiful" on it. Was it conforming to a standard of Beauty constructed by myself and/or the culture I live in? Was I trying to freeze and thereby control an element in the painting that was beyond my understanding? Was I trying to avoid the painting altogether and dismiss it altogether by refering to it as "Beautiful"? Where in my psychological terrain (centers) are my responses coming from? Did my gut, heart, or brain decide on that definition and with what "coloration, if any from another center? But, you are already heading in this direction as your response indicates.
I wouldn't worry about specific exercises, advanced or otherwise.
Thanks for the honesty of your response. Keep asking those deeper questions you've put forth for yourself.

Greg

---

by Pablo

> Greg wrote:
> Hi Pablo.
>
> You've pretty much answered my question and I think you're doing just fine ---- I wouldn't complicate your point of observation any further.
> When I am secure in sightless gaze and I, for instance, look at a painting I've always considered "beautiful" that viewpoint starts to see things which just "are". At that point I have to ask myself why I previously had to slap a definition of "beautiful" on it. Was it conforming to a standard of Beauty constructed by myself and/or the culture I live in? Was I trying to freeze and thereby control an element in the painting that was beyond my understanding? Was I trying to avoid the painting altogether and dismiss it altogether by refering to it as "Beautiful"? Where in my psychological terrain (centers) are my responses coming from? Did my gut, heart, or brain decide on that definition and with what "coloration, if any from another center?
> But, you are already heading in this direction as your response indicates.
> I wouldn't worry about specific exercises, advanced or otherwise.
> Thanks for the honesty of your response. Keep asking those deeper questions you've put forth for yourself.
>
> Greg

Dear Greg;

Thank you for your help again.
Do not hesitate to complicate my points of view if by this we mean helping me to improve the levels of understanding and comprehension.
Regards

Pablo

---

by Greg

Dear Pablo,

Your earnestness and sincerity need simple means for now. Continue and maintain as much detachment as you can about what you are observing.
You have my thoughts towards you "in support".

Best wishes,
Greg

---

by Gururaj

Here's an extract from P D Ouspensky's "Talk's with a Devil" .I understood it as bringing a distinction between the two types of connection - Attraction with inner-disturbance (centers unbalanced ?) and love.

(The devil says ..)In our relations with people sex plays a large part; moreover, most people are much more easily influenced when it is employed."

"Somehow I completely fail to understand you," I (The author) said. "Earlier you said that you cannot see people experiencing emotions of love. And now you say that the easiest way for you to influence people is from that direction. Which is the truth?"

"Both," said the Devil, not in the least put out. "The emotions of sex disgust and alienate us when they give rise to so-called romantic moods in people. Herein lies the main evil. We spare no strength to fight it, but we can do nothing. These romantic moods surround a person like a wall and we lose him completely until the romance is over. Worse still, of course, is the connection of sex with the mystical: that much talked about sense of the miraculous, and feelings of immortality. These sensations take people completely away from us and make them inaccessible to our influence. On the other hand, the same emotion of sex can be beneficent from our point of view:

when it is connected with even the slightest feeling of aversion, with a sense of guilt and shame, with furtiveness and a sense of wrongdoing, that is just what we need.

You see, the same emotion in one man can manifest itself differently in others. It can be for us or against us. It is only those who have the capacity for romance or romantic moods, or who experience 'wonder' in the sensation of sex [the Devil pronounced these words with scarcely disguised irritation], who are completely inaccessible to us. But fortunately this happens very rarely. The majority of people, men and women, regard such things very realistically,without any romantic ideas. And it is very easy for us to deal with such people."

Wishing discoveries to all,
Gururaj

---

by Cassandra

I have been working with this exercise for some weeks, or at least attempting to. I'm especially attracted to the task of feeling the hands continuously. I relate it to the edict to 'pray without ceasing' or to be in the body always. I have had very strong resistance to feeling my hands, but I keep trying.

Work Program week beginning 31 January 2011

---

by Ian

It occurs to me to have the 5 Being Obligolnian strivings as a framework for Work efforts and exercises.

Each of them by itself is a mission statement for an individual and can be seperately explored .At the same time it could be considered that they need not be striven for one after the other .One can be doing all of them together , although not in the same activity.

Maybe by working simultaneously on all of them ,the 'rapid perfecting' could be assisted first in the seeker herself/himself.

So the task would be to reflect where are we on each striving and attempt to move ahead on the scale this week.

and share the experience [That should take care of Striving 5]

I am open to suggestions for making the above more specific/suitable,if you feel so.

---

by Judy

> "All the beings of this planet then began to work in order to have in their consciousness this Divine function of genuine conscience, and for this purpose, as everywhere in the Universe, they transubstantiated in themselves what are called the 'being-obligolnian-strivings' which consist of the following five, namely:
>
> "The first striving: to have in their ordinary being-existence everything satisfying and really necessary for their planetary body.
>
> "The second striving: to have a constant and unflagging instinctive need for self-perfection in the sense of being.
>
> "The third: the conscious striving to know ever more and more about the laws of World-creation and World-maintenance.
>
> "The fourth: the striving from the beginning of their existence to pay for their arising and their individuality as quickly as possible, in order afterward to be free to lighten as much as possible the Sorrow of our COMMON FATHER.

"And the fifth: the striving always to assist the most rapid perfecting of other beings, both those similar to oneself and those of other forms, up to the degree of the sacred 'Martfotai,' that is, up to the degree of self-individuality.

(G.I. Gurdjieff -‘Beelzebub’s Tales to His Grandson’, p. 385-386)
BTTHG original 1950 edition.pdf

(First task for me was to re-acquaint with the Strivings.)

---

by Pablo

First of all, I want to say that this site is like a "mind of gold" for seekers!!! I'm very pleased for this discovery and for participating in it.
Honestly, I need more help to have a real comprehension regarding the topic of this week... I can only have an intellectual, superficial understanding about The Five Being-Obligolnian-Strivings, and even more how to apply them through specific actions. Here I can see my lack of consciousness development, but is my desire to grow up and awaken.
The fourth and fifth striving are the most difficult and abstract for me... can somebody give me a simple definition or a brief explanation about them and examples of what exercise can I do?
How to evaluate these two dimensions in oneself?
How it's possible working simultaneously on all of them? is there any example of someone who already did it?

---

by Gururaj

Welcome,Pablo
The tone of your post seems to indicate a fine collaboration between the feeling and mind centres .

I started reading,so-called,4th Way literature a few years ago,but (reckon) I have been practicing only for just more than a year,mainly thanks to participation in and support of this On-line group.

Would like to share my two bits worth of (mostly intellectual) understanding of the 5 strivings and its application to my situation.
Hopefully it will help me summon some will and feeling to Work.

1 The first striving: "to have in their ordinary being-existence everything satisfying and really necessary for their planetary body"
would mean that the base is made steady,the foundation is kept strong in terms of fulfilling basic life needs all the time.
This may also imply that if anyone wishes to 'Work' they must have basic success in conventional work resulting in having proper sustenance for the body - according to individual capacity/outlook.(Note that a mendicant monk may feel perfectly satisfied with whatever alms come his way).

Speaking of me ,this week,i intend to explore what feels unsatisfied for my body and whether I am wasting time and energy for any un-necessary pursuits,aspirations,ambitions,etc. which can be diverted to precious inner-work. I often feel shortage of time to read,ponder,meditate.But are my priorities OK ?

2.The second striving: "to have a constant and unflagging instinctive need for self-perfection in the sense of being."
If one is unhappy,dissatisfied,having life-questions,etc in whatever way about life but resigned to it then there will be no motivation to find answers.Or again if one is totally immersed ,unquestioning about life then where is the 'need' for Work.

In me I need to see and watch out whether I slacken Work efforts on occasions when either life is 'Roses' or fully thorns.Moreover,I need to in fact,welcome discomforts and troubles as opportunities for self-exploration.

3.The third: "the conscious striving to know ever more and more about the laws of World-creation and World-maintenance."
Having embarked on the voyage , it will certainly help to have some guidance,some framework in order to make significant progress.
If human life is subject to any Universal Laws then it follows naturally for a seeker to read,be open to get coached and verify them to the extent possible.
In the context of Gurdjieff's precepts,I need to be clear(intellectually,to begin with) of at-least those laws which I can verify with my present Being.

4.The fourth: "the striving from the beginning of their existence to pay for their arising and their individuality as quickly as possible, in order afterward to be free to lighten as much as possible the Sorrow of our COMMON FATHER."
My interpretation of this is that ,automatically one (and most humans) operate in the "me","mine" mode resulting,one way or another,in individual and societal suffering.The more quickly we learn to be aware and transcend our automatisms,the sooner we shall Be (naturally)appropriate for universal good - not as a moral stand.
So many of the exercises on ES are aimed for 'taming' individuality.Let me strive to do some justice to them - without postponing.

5.The fifth: "the striving always to assist the most rapid perfecting of Other beings, both those similar to oneself and those of other forms, up to the degree of the sacred 'Martfotai,' that is, up to the degree of self-individuality."

I might appear to 'wiseacre' if I attempt to interpret this one.And help.."those of other forms" as well ? Truly beyond my understanding.

However ,just a point to ponder - As I said earlier, as we are, we behave instinctively selfishly (and inner-considered).This is still not distinct to me, but if we take a conscious stand to be committed to other's transformation (in the Being aspect) does this assist me as well as the other ?

Regarding simultaneous action on at-least 1 to 4, I see that even though I may be aiming for a 4th striving result in various exercises,it can be effective only if strivings 1,2 and 3 are internalised or happening at the same time.
Gururaj

---

by AlbertoB

I'm on the third step of this Jacob's ladder. No doubt. Few hopes to go up. The fact is, that this third step is so hugely large to explore, that all my time goes on in the exploration. And, to be honest, i understand clearly the law of reciprocal feeding with my intellectual centre, but not with the other two. I'm not ready to help our Common Father. Not yet.
About the fifth striving, a good method to give help to others would be to explain some current facts of life in terms of the Fourth Way. But is always easy ? And am i able to do this ?

---

by Pablo

> Gururaj wrote:
> Welcome,Pablo
> The tone of your post seems to indicate a fine collaboration between the feeling and mind centres .
>
> I started reading,so-called,4th Way literature a few years ago,but (reckon) I have been practicing only for just more than > a year,mainly thanks to participation in and support of this On-line group.
>
> Would like to share my two bits worth of (mostly intellectual) understanding of the 5 strivings and its application to my situation.
> Hopefully it will help me summon some will and feeling to Work.
>
> 1 The first striving: "to have in their ordinary being-existence everything satisfying and really necessary for their planetary body"
> would mean that the base is made steady,the foundation is kept strong in terms of fulfilling basic life needs all the time.
> This may also imply that if anyone wishes to 'Work' they must have basic success in conventional work resulting in having proper sustenance for the body - according to individual capacity/outlook.(Note that a mendicant monk may feel perfectly satisfied with whatever alms come his way).

Speaking of me ,this week,i intend to explore what feels unsatisfied for my body and whether I am wasting time and energy for any un-necessary pursuits,aspirations,ambitions,etc. which can be diverted to precious inner-work.
I often feel shortage of time to read,ponder,meditate.But are my priorities OK ?

2.The second striving: "to have a constant and unflagging instinctive need for self-perfection in the sense of being."
If one is unhappy,dissatisfied,having life-questions,etc in whatever way about life but resigned to it then there will be no motivation
to find answers.Or again if one is totally immersed ,unquestioning about life then where is the 'need' for Work.

In me I need to see and watch out whether I slacken Work efforts on occasions when either life is 'Roses' or fully thorns.Moreover,I need to in fact,welcome discomforts and troubles as opportunities for self-exploration.

3.The third: "the conscious striving to know ever more and more about the laws of World-creation and World-maintenance."
Having embarked on the voyage , it will certainly help to have some guidance,some framework in order to make significant progress.
If human life is subject to any Universal Laws then it follows naturally for a seeker to read,be open to get coached and verify them to the extent possible.
In the context of Gurdjieff's precepts,I need to be clear(intellectually,to begin with) of at-least those laws which I can verify with my present Being.

4.The fourth: "the striving from the beginning of their existence to pay for their arising and their individuality as quickly as possible, in order afterward to be free to lighten as much as possible the Sorrow of our COMMON FATHER."
My interpretation of this is that ,automatically one (and most humans) operate in the "me","mine" mode resulting,one way or another,in individual and societal suffering.The more quickly we learn to be aware and transcend our automatisms,the sooner we shall Be (naturally)appropriate for universal good - not as a moral stand.
So many of the exercises on ES are aimed for 'taming' individuality.Let me strive to do some justice to them - without postponing.

5.The fifth: "the striving always to assist the most rapid perfecting of Other beings, both those similar to oneself and those of other forms, up to the degree of the sacred 'Martfotai,' that is, up to the degree of self-individuality."
I might appear to 'wiseacre' if I attempt to interpret this one.And help.."those of other forms" as well ? Truly beyond my understanding.

However ,just a point to ponder - As I said earlier, as we are, we behave instinctively selfishly (and inner-considered).This is still not distinct to me, but if we take a conscious stand to be committed to other's transformation (in the Being aspect) does this assist me as well as the other ?

Regarding simultaneous action on at-least 1 to 4, I see that even though I may be aiming for a 4th striving result in various exercises,it can be effective only if strivings 1,2 and 3 are internalised or happening at the same time.
Gururaj

Dear Gururaj;
Thank you very much for your help "seek-mate"... it's very kind of you.
It was really helpful for me reading your advises and explanations. I need to ponder more on them, above all the fourth and fifth.
I must confess this topic create resistance inside of me, aversion... surely it's because I can't really understand deeply its meaning, or there is someone inside who doesn't like it...
Regards, and thank you again

Work Program week beginning 7 February 2011

---

by Ian

While walking, sense each foot as it touches the ground.

Everyday, consider the opposite of a deeply held belief.

Make a list of all your "little I's".

Make a list of all the Roles you play in your life.

Make a list of all your sufferings.

Ponder - What prevents me from seeing the points of view of others? What prevents me from putting myself in their shoes?

---

by Harry

An interesting experience of growing older is the shedding of roles that have to be played. When my Mother died last Spring I no longer had to play a certain role. I was now the family elder. And this had little to do with my service to her, but to maintaining the role for the other people who fed information to her. Maintaining that role for her benefit. I continue teaching online, but no longer walk into a classroom. So I don't have to play that role any longer, either. Fortunately my son and I have evolved a semi-human contact which transcends father-son as he has grown older. As I shed these skins on side effect is that I find myself being more human with ordinary individuals that I meet in passing each day.

---

by Judy

I'm just doing this one, as often as I can, all week;
"While walking, sense each foot as it touches the ground."

I chose this as it fits nicely with another exercise being done this week.
viz:

> Every person moves in a different way, walks in a different way. If a Buddha walks he is tremendously grounded. His legs are almost like the roots of a tree. He is in deep contact with the earth. He is nourished by the earth, the earth is nourished by him. There is a continuous transfer of energy.
> Ordinarily people are uprooted trees. They walk as if they are uprooted; they don't have roots in the earth, they are not grounded. You try sometimes. Just > stand with naked feet on the earth or on the sand on a beach and just feel that your legs are like roots and that they are reaching deep into the earth. And start swaying with the wind like a tree. Forget that you are a man, think of yourself as a tree, and soon you will see something transpiring between you and the earth. It may take a little time because you have forgotten the language but one day you will see something is transpiring. Something is given by the earth to the feet and you are also returning, responding. And the day it happens you will start walking in a totally new way -- rooted, solid, not fragile, not sad, more alive, full of energy. You will be less tired and your footsteps will have a different quality.

>
> From “Talks on Zen” p47

This was chosen as some solidity, strength, grounding, toughness was needed after the cyclone. I also find it very energising.

Harry, I agree with you about the dropping of some roles with age. Some of these, the professional ones in particular, may have been necessary at the time. I don't know. Yet it is easily observed now that they were not "me" at all.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Alistair

A week off tobacco has increased my confidence to participate rather than lurk

Cassandra commented that she perhaps participates in 25% of the exercises.

My participation is much less.

What is most important is realising that the weekly exercises are the most valuable part of participation on this site

The question of roles seems to have struck a chord this week. Nowadays there are fewer roles in my life. Living the life of a poor mountain peasant doesn’t require many different acts.

I’ve recently chosen to remove my Facebook profile which is a few roles less. This is perhaps one of the reasons that many people don’t contribute continuously, because there are people, their ‘friends’ that they deal with using different I’s and ‘I’ am one of these people. So it’s difficult to post a comment that can be accepted without misunderstanding by all my acquaintances.
That said, what is there to say to anyone now? Unless communicating with another seeker and even that has its limitations.

Lie and be shallow, isn't this an exercise, purpose? Appearing to 'normal' people that we're 'normal 😉
We were joking the other night about the role of next Egyptian dictator; we laughed when imagining the worldwide reaction if in his opening speech he began recommend that the Egyptian people attempt to bring their three brains into balance 😀

One role that hasn't disappeared is also a suffering and a challenge to see others points of view.
This concerns my relationship with the 14 year old son of my 'partner'.

Having been brought up in Protestant culture where hard work was respected and admired I have come to expect this from others.
However here we have a young boy who has never had a father or any male influence in his life and has been indulged by a single mother, grandmother and aunties all his life to the point where he will now not even run an errand 100m to the local shop.
Any chores he does do are after considerable pleading from his mother, a disproportionate amount of energy being spent to persuade his participation.
Of course the boy is simply a product of his upbringing which those 'responsible' are reluctant to accept despite their own frequent displeasure concerning his behaviour.

From my own point of view it all reminds me of the words of Mr Gurdjieff in In Search of the Miraculous that the action of one I at one moment can sow the ground for a long period in a way that the proceeding I's find extremely difficult to deal with. Too often I find myself asking why I'm here and what I'm doing but extricating myself is far less easy than it was entering.

During some digging this weekend I came across the following definition in the glossary at www.gnosticteachings.org a website brought to my attention by Judy some time ago, thanks again

Cognizance
"To state that "this is good" or "that is evil" is an easy matter, yet to have cognizance of good and evil is very difficult. Likewise, to state that 2 + 2 is 4 is very easy, yet to have cognizance that 2 + 2 is 4 is a matter that pertains to Gods.
"The drunkard knows that drinking alcohol is wrong, yet the drunkard does not have cognizance that drinking alcohol is wrong. If the consciousness of the drunkard became cognizant that drinking alcohol is wrong, then he would prefer that a millstone be hung about his neck and that he be drowned in the depth of the sea than continue in the vice of alcoholism.
"Our consciousness awakens by means of more elevated levels of the Being and life. Thus, knowledge that does not become cognizance is worthless. Millions of spiritualist students study our books, yet the intellectual knowledge of the written truths alone is worthless, because having cognizance of these truths is what is important. Thousands of spiritualist students believe they have cognizance of the truths they have read; wretched beings… they are mistaken…
"Only the great Masters of Major Mysteries have cognizance of those truths.

"Students of spiritualist schools are parroting chatterers who repeat what they read, that is all. Therefore, what is important is the awakening of the consciousness, because the intellect is just a function of the animal soul, yet the consciousness is a function of God."

---

by Gururaj

Yes,Alistair ,cognizance ,as you have quoted it ,seems to indicate that the seeker has seen the truth so clearly that his being is aligned with it.From the foothills for me,this seems a long way to go.I wonder how those 'higher levels of consciousness and being' are touched.

Anyway,a little climbing (hope) I have done today while pondering over my "I"s ,Roles,Beliefs and sufferings as part of the task.It was somewhat liberating to see the patterns even if while just pondering 'off-line'.

Roles are many in family,work-place,society including as a participant in this OLG on ES.
But I see that many "I"s interfere in the appropriate performance of these roles.For example my role to be a caring son to my mother is marred by my "get irritated I' when I find she has not taken a prescribed medicine.
My role as a executive involving interacting very sanely with the senior management is corrupted by an 'I' which instinctively has some anxiety while interacting with authority figures.

Beliefs in me seem to be a series of 'should be' ,'should'nt be' ideas which are not so obvious.I am not considering here beliefs like a faith in the 4th way precepts(subject to verification) but more ingrained automatic approaches to handling life situations.For example I have a strong belief that I must be first demonstrating in my being/work whatever it is I expect my subordinates to demonstrate.But I have seen many bosses who have no such 'limitation' in their approach and they may well be more effective. Another belief I have is that it is more important to produce something of high quality than delivering it within the time expected by the users.

Suffering ,of the automatic kind, ultimately seems to be arising in me from the mismatch between expectation and actual reality tinged with a self-reproach on whether I have been in some way responsible for the unsatisfactory situation.

I have no problem in putting myself in others shoes as long as he or she is not kicking me

Now let me strive for some 'cognizance' of all this inner-considering.

Regards to all
Gururaj

---

by Alistair

Gururaj a steep hill indeed

Your mention of hope associated me to the inscription on the remaining tablet of Ashiata Shiemash

" 'Faith', 'Love', 'Hope'
Faith of consciousness is freedom
Faith of feeling is weakness
Faith of body is stupidity

Love of consciousness evokes the same in response
Love of feeling evokes the opposite
Love of body depends only on type and polarity

Hope of consciousness is strength
Hope of feeling is slavery
Hope of body is disease

May all seekers draw strength from Hope of consciousness always Amen

Work Program week beginning 14 February 2011

---

by Ian

To assist the birth of an inner being embryo, try to receive all impressions impartially.

To assist the birth of an inner being embryo, try to abide with all brains balanced.

To assist the birth of an inner being embryo, try to eliminate unnecessary tensions.

---

by Gururaj

My vow is to ,with a prayer-like attitude of a priest, receive impressions thru' all senses,like rain falling softly on the body ,and be - totally relaxed in body,

neutral in emotions

and with minimal/essential thoughts

in all situations this week.

Gururaj

---

by Alistair

The Cave Sura lesson of Khidr to Moses maybe the classic example of this weeks exercise
It certainly highlights how difficult impartiality can be http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Khidr

---

by Alistair

http://khidr.org/parable-of-blessing.htm

---

by Pablo

Hello:

This week I tried to work on the three premises suggested with the following adaptations. Regarding the first of them, firstly I had to read and gather information about the concept of "impressions" for the fourth way since I read about it long time ago. Summing up, the way I understood this concept is by mean of the idea of "raw material" coming into the mind principally through the five senses. Ones in the mind it is organized and encoded in concepts and labels which have the particularity of being dichotomical (good-bad, big-small, etc). We could say the result of this process is the transformation of the raw material in a final product that one might call connotation, interpretation, meaning, sense, value (+-), perception... Also a thought or word can trigger other connotations and serve as a stimulus for further mental elaborations, but maybe we can understand this simple word we hear as first of all mere sound entering to our auditory system... hence a combination of a set of impressions give rise to vast systems of meaning called belief, ideology, attitudes, and so on. The problem is the mechanism of identification (key concept of G. system) which create the attachment to the impressions and its results. The implications of these operations and the combination of all elements such as the 5 senses signals, thought, emotions, immagination, memory is so vast that is better if we try to write a paper on it. This is my interpretation about the notion mentioned before, so if you think this is wrong or incomplete please tell me. I spent the first 3 or 4 days of the week trying to understand it in order to apply some exercises and specific action later on. Thus I chose an old exercise founded in this site consisting in: Before each meal

1. Relax all three centers.
2. Attend to the visual impressions of the food.
3. Attend to the smell of the food.
4. Attend to the taste of the food by taking a small sample into the mouth.
5. Attend to the sounds accompanying the meal situation.
6. Attend to the touch and sensations of the body.
7. Intone the phrase from Beelzebub's Tales - aieioiuoa.

Eat in silence. After eating, be aware of your breathing for a few minutes

In addition I tried working on impressions about women, something I've been performing from some weeks ago although frankly I found difficult to carry out it since I realize my attempt is merely mental, of low quality. I'll keep working on it...

Relating to the second premise of this week program, I worked on the exercise of the sightless gaze in public environments. The new scenario where I applied it was in a park near my house, I sat down on a bench for 15 minutes to put a limit to the action. I did it one time in my living room as well, again for 15 minutes. Usually I use 15 minutes as measure for everything, for sittings as well...

Concerning the topic of relaxing tensions in the body, I chose 2 simple tasks. The first one was to sit down in front of the computer keeping the back straight for 15 minutes every day, and the second one consisted in making delicate movements or using the less force as possible while cooking mainly when cutting onions and vegetables. At the same time I tried to keep my abdomen relaxed. This was particularly difficult, I forgot often the aim.

Work Program week beginning 21 February 2011

---

by Ian

Rejoice in natural influences - such as the twinkle of stars, a breath of wind, a wetness of rain, a ray of sun - with a warmth of attention in the heart.

Rejoice in our egoistic foibles, which provide us with reminders of our sleep, with a warmth of compassion in our heart.

Rejoice in our consciousness, our small portion of Endlessness, with a warmth of love in our heart.

---

by Gururaj

As winter faded out fast in my part of the globe ,which is in the tropics,the weather was inching to the warmer side .Suddenly a few days ago it rained.
The scent of the rain-soaked earth and the cool breeze made me rejoice,but thanks to the task of the week,the "warmth of attention in the heart" brought in another dimension of awareness.

But till now, "rejoicing in our egoistic foibles " has been an elusive experience.Automatic suffering and 'sleep' has been my lot.

As I ponder now ,it seems that "rejoicing in our consciousness,our small portion of endlessness..." and "rejoicing in our egoistic foibles " seem to be linked.

When I see my small kids do something silly and get into trouble,i observe fondly ,with a "warmth of compassion" in my heart .My (superior ?)adult consciousness tells me they will eventually learn.

Similarly with my faith in my true consciousness (strengthened by rejoicing in it ?) maybe I ought to become more able to rejoice in my current 'sleep-induced' egoistic foibles rather than just suffering automatically.

So,hey,my usual 'being',here I come with my new (intellectual) knowledge to experience something else.

Regards to all,
Gururaj

Work Program week beginning 28 Febraury 2011

---

by Dean

Exercise 1

Here's an exercise Mr.Gurdjieff gave some of his pupils.

"I wish give real Christmas present. Imagine Christ. Somewhere in space is." Mr.Gurdjieff forms an oval with both his hands. "Make contact. Not to center, but to outside, periphery. Draw from there, draw in, I. Settle in you, Am. Do every day. Wish to become Christ. Become. Be."

Exercise 2

Put yourself into a three centered state, try to sustain this state while you are going about your daily business. After you have become settled into this state begin the next part of the exercise.
While walking say to yourself I walk for Endlessness
While breathing say I breath for Endlessness
While feeling say I feel for Endlessness
While thinking say I think for Endlessness
While eating say I eat for Endlessness
Whatever you are doing add this mantra and become aware of your yourself.

Exercise 3

Whenever you observe yourself doing something automatically and without consciousness say to yourself, "Forgive it father for it knows not what it does." Try to counterbalance the mechanical action with a conscious effort of some sort, try to use your observations of holy denyings to provoke a holy affirming action and bring about reconciliation and remorse.

---

by Alistair

"The miracles of our God have been worked since the first day when the universe was created; they take place every day and at every moment.
Whosoever seeth them not is deprived of one of the fairest gifts of life.

http://reluctant-messenger.com/issa2.htm

---

by Gururaj

Thanks,Dean,for the wonderful exercise which evokes a feeling or is more effective if done with a sustained feeling.

Alistair,the "Issa" odyssey was profound and moving.I then explored the associated links and read the opposing and supporting literature as to whether Christ really spent early years in India and Tibet.

Pondering on the quarrels and disputations of mankind,I wondered how any sane person cannot but see that the fundamental truths are the same for every creature and that the prophets and saints never created religions in the first place and somehow the followers eventually did ,holding on to the peel and forsaking the pursuit of the fruit itself.

That led me to turn the spotlight on myself - What in me is preventing to BE on the Way of Issa - and became acutely aware of my individuality and ego as the prime cause of my suffering and any suffering I cause to others.
For quite some moments hence,there was no thinking to corrupt the deep feeling of remorse.

---

by Judy

I found myself doing these pure and beautiful exercises with a heightened gratitude to Mr Gurdjieff - the Teacher of Dance.
The first one, in particular, resonated so deeply that even in my dreams I looked towards the clouds; just checking, just checking...

Thanks, Dean, for putting these exercises together for us.
What poignant reminders of the Master's vast Love and dedication to Truth.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Greg

Dear Dean,

Great Lent and the Fast of St. Theodore began here a little short of 2 hours ago. Your exercise will be excellent accompaniment from the words of the man whose teachings and leads helped revivify a teaching which had long fallen into the dustbins of disinterest and ennui. Great Lent is, as a result of his proddings, a period of extended Joy for me. I look forward to it especially even as its current has begun to cut out a subterrenean stream throughout the year.

Too bad, as Lee van Laer reports, that even behind the fortressed walls of the Foundation that Gurdjieff's very special articulations have now been rendered obsolete and replaced by completely new sets of exercises. As if such things could be replaced. Some things, although they can and may encourage further embellishments and elucidations, if they can and should, quite simply need to be left as they are. The Beauty expressed here is evidence enough of that. How deeply lovely it is. How much we need that original food in our emotionally bankrupt times.

And my seed thought for myself this Lent will be from the Man himself, untouched by someone else ,thank you!:

"Two thing are endless, the stupidity of man and the mercy of the Heavenly Father"

All Best Wishes to Everyone no matter what is or isn't your persuasion --- it is, in the preparation for Spring, a special time for receiving and transforming energy.

And that is plenty of Good.

love,
Greg

Work Program week beginning 7 March 2011

---

by Ian

Spend half an hour each day playing a Role, preferably with other people around. Pick a Role that doesn't correspond to your Essence.

Walk mindfully to and from your daily employment. Continuously scan body Sensations from head-to-toe and then toe-to-head. End with a full Sensing of the presence of I Amness.

---

by Judy

> Walk mindfully to and from your daily employment. Continuously scan body Sensations from head-to-toe and then toe-to-head. End with a full Sensing of the presence of I Amness.

This is interesting and new for me - the continuous scanning of sensations while walking, I'm referring to. It began rather jerkily with random thoughts/inner comments intervening. I practised for a couple of days scanning head to toe and toe to head while simply sitting. This was better with a lot more flow and some intricacies observed. I've re-added the walking; quality improves with practice, as usual. I'll stay with this exercise for a while longer. It showed very clearly just how far from a meditative or three-centred state I was in my usual walking state - that's 'walking' not 'waking', though that of course also applies a lot of the time.

---

by Pablo

I used to speak in the good times, why not in the bad times... I feel a complete collapse, negativeness and rejection of working on my self. The only thing I do is reading the posts, absolutely passive attitude. Now I withdraw all my troops, the enemy is so powerful... But I still want the change.
Thank you for the exercises and for the comments

---

by Judy

Pablo writes:

> I used to spoke in the good times, why not in the bad times... I feel a complete collapse, negativeness and rejection of working on my self. The only thing I do is > reading the posts, absolutely passive attitude. Now I withdraw all my troops, the enemy is so powerful... But I still want the change.

> Thank you for the exercises and for the commentsPablo

Yes, the affirming wish has to be greater than the denying negativity for work to happen.
This is not uncommon, Pablo. You are not alone here. I certainly go through these times, though less often than I used to.
There are undoubtedly many methods of dealing with them.

I usually go right back to basics. If I find myself 'worrying' about not being able to work, then I restrict work efforts to a particular time of the day - for example, between eight and eight-thirty in the morning. I just live life the rest of the time. Sometimes this works, when I'll just do the 'I Am' exercise or a simple sensing exercise walking and picking up say, pebbles, and sensing their touch against my hand.
When even this doesn't revive the flagging spirit, which has happened a couple of times, I've reverted to "Lord have mercy!" or the Holy Affirming prayer; also spend more time in service to others, even if passive. For example, sit in vigil and send compassion and love to the people in Japan, at the moment.
Don't forget to nurture and have compassion for yourself too.

Request to everyone:
Please share any experiences you have of going through these 'dark nights of the soul'. We all have them.

And Pablo, thanks for the honesty in sharing this.
Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by Judy

Oh - and most important for me is that I consciously accept that I am suffering for my limitations.
Accept the suffering as joyously as possible.
As G. says;
"Without the struggle, there is nothing."
In acceptance there is often transformation.

---

by Judy

Another addition;
Thinking back, often wish has been strengthened, and interest rekindled, by reading/studying a selected work book. I had forgotten how often a new order from amazon.com was a prelude to a productive work interval.

J.

---

by Pablo

Dear Judy:

Your words help me a lot... they give me inspiration and comprehension, so I'm very grateful for your advise. I feel there is wisdom, experienced knowledge in them.
I'll try your suggestions this week...
Thank you again

---

by Gururaj

> Judy wrote:
> Another addition;
> Thinking back, often wish has been strengthened, and interest rekindled, by reading/studying a selected work book. I had forgotten how often a new order from amazon.com was a prelude to a productive work interval.
> J.

Yes,this has been for me the best trigger (a reconciling force contributor ?) for getting back to Work efforts.

---

by Pablo

Hello:

Can you give me please at least three examples of playing roles??? I do not have comprehension on this subject. The problem is finding "minor" roles, not the "biggest" ones such as father, husband, protestant, religious, conservative... I would like to understand and detect the micro roles I play in my daily life, but nothing comes to my mind... I can't see... please make me reflect in function of your experiences.
Thank you

---

by Judy

Pablo,

Role-playing comes under the 'intentional suffering' group of exercises. There is a useful introduction page here on our site:

http://www.endlesssearch.co.uk/exercises_roleplay.htm

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Pablo

> Judy wrote:
> Pablo,
>
> Role-playing comes under the 'intentional suffering' group of exercises. There is a useful introduction page here on our site:
>
> http://www.endlesssearch.co.uk/exercises_roleplay.htm
>
> Regards,
> Judy.

Excellent!!!! that's what I needed... it shed light on the issue. Thanks Judy.
Today while walking and speaking with a friend, he begun telling me his intentions about join a choir. Suddenly he argued upon solfege techniques putting emphasis on it as a musical skill... it triggered in me my mechanical aversion on all conservatory stuff, given that for my machine the most valuable thing in music is to feel and improvisation... it was the jazz-rock character versus the classical one... I thought maybe these could be a good example, or even one can create the rol of the "agreer" and the "disagreer"... anyhow, I spoke very nice words about this matter, and felt energy better between us... my friend really believes in that, why not to be happy to? it's also a powerful and usefull tool...
So much to inquire about role playing...
question:

I quote the explanation in http://www.endlesssearch.co.uk/exercises_roleplay.htm :
"Prepare Affirmations to use during the Role playing that will encourage you to continue with the Role at those times when you feel yourself being overwhelmed by the demands of the Role and want to beat a hasty retreat."

What is the issue of utilization of affirmations? can you give me examples? how to build them and use it properly?

Thanks

---

by Greg

Pablo asks:

> What is the issue of utilization of affirmations? can you give me examples? how to build them and use it properly?

Just keep inwardly talking yourself through the role as you are doing it so you don't slip up in the <illusion>. You are acting just like going out on a stage to perform a role. Make sure it is a role which you can resonably do as this is your first time. As time goes on you will gain greater mastery and this will require greater challenges. But for now, keep it relatively simple, and try, in the middle of it to observe outward reactions towards you and your inward feelings
Good luck, and for the first time out: Have Fun!

Greg

PS
Ian requests:

> Pick a Role that doesn't correspond to your Essence

Do the opposite of what your astrological sun sign describes what you do --- if you are a studious Sagittarian philosopher, be a non-intense, flake Gemini Super-model.

---

by Greg

Fred:
I know you're around. I <smell> you while you're lurking.
Whattsup, Bro?
Read some of your postings from the past when I cut outta here.
YOU UNDERSTAND NOTHING ABOUT ME and I NEVER APOLOGIZE.
Just thought I'd let ya know.
I'm too self-responsible these days.
The World is Crackin' Buddy --- Time to get your Lazy Ass in Here!
Love ya bunches,
GREGGIE

---

by Pablo

Good one...

by Greg

Just have loads and loads of fun, Pablo.
You are young (29 from your biographical details).
You are being given permission to get away with something. When you get older this is harder to do because you are less flexible psychologically IF you haven't been practicing this over the long term.
Role playing should be a CONSTANT EXERCISE in your Work-informed life. It is just as important as the more spiritual scientific exercises like breathing and illuminating bones. If you are smart, if you are wise, if you are sly,sly,sly ---- conscious role playing will eventually become one of Your Very Best Friends. It's absolutely expansive.
I promise!!!

---

by Pablo

> Greg wrote:
> Just have loads and loads of fun, Pablo.
> You are young (29 from your biographical details).
> You are being given permission to get away with something. When you get older this is harder to do because you are less flexible psychologically IF you haven't been practicing this over the long term.
> Role playing should be a CONSTANT EXERCISE in your Work-informed life. It is just as important as the more spiritual scientific exercises like breathing and illuminating bones. If you are smart, if you are wise, if you are sly,sly,sly ---- conscious role playing will eventually become one of Your Very Best Friends. It's absolutely expansive.
> I promise!!!
>

Dear Greggy and Greg:

I will tell you by mean of the best way available in my mind to tell you how your words helped me to comprehend this matter:
.....,,,,.,.,.....!!!

speaking with my mother I choose to convey the same idea (with the same words and grammar) from 3 different kind of emotions, better still with two (anger-indignation, submission) and the neutral one. I put to consideration of other seekers the usefulness to begin decomposing a macro rol (ex: mother, Italian, liberal, gangster...) into its components and patterns of behaviour (the "particles" of "matter", in this case we could say emotions, thought and words, body attitude etcetera) trying to reach the whole role. It could be a good method to learn this art... In my example, I do not care about the macro label of some role, I played picking up some random emotions... then you can increase the level of complexity of a role adding other features such as body movements, degrees of tension of muscles, face expressions, and so on. Think about how a puritan could react to a sudden conversation about techniques on (playing rol non politically correct?) clitoral stimulation?? maybe if you some day are involved in a conversation about sex, you can play the rol of a puritan Quaker of the seventeenth century... or be a feminist grassroot movement activist... incredible!! beginning from basics could help to do something... It works in my case, maybe you need to find your own method (if you are an amateur like me). It's only an idea to share with you.
ahhhhhhhh and something important to add I think: do it with PRESENCE, with no identification... even more difficult.

THANK YOU VERY MUCH Greg

---

by Lawrick

Greg writes;

Quote Greg WHERE'S FRED?
by Greg » Wed Mar 16, 2011 3:18 pm

Fred:
I know you're around. I <smell> you while you're lurking.
Whattsup, Bro?
Read some of your postings from the past when I cut outta here.
YOU UNDERSTAND NOTHING ABOUT ME and I NEVER APOLOGIZE.
Just thought I'd let ya know.
I'm too self-responsible these days.
The World is Crackin' Buddy --- Time to get your Lazy Ass in Here

I NEVER APOLOGIZE.....

Might make a good work program for you.

Freed

---

by Alistair

Proverbs 4;7
Wisdom is the principal thing; therefore get wisdom; and with all thy getting get understanding (cognizance?)

Let's all make this weekend a time to pray for our wisdom

May the Lord have mercy on us
Alistair

---

by Judy

Food for pondering:

Gurdjieff's Aphorisms

1. Like what "it" does not like.
2. The highest that a man can attain is to be able to do.
3. The worse the conditions of life the more productive the work, always provided you remember the work.
4. Remember yourself always and everywhere.
5. Remember you come here having already understood the necessity of struggling with yourself—only with yourself. Therefore thank everyone who gives you the opportunity.
6. Here we can only direct and create conditions, but not help.
7. Know that this house can be useful only to those who have recognized their nothingness and who believe in the possibility of changing.
8. If you already know it is bad and do it, you commit a sin difficult to redress.
9. The chief means of happiness in this life is the ability to consider externally always, internally never.
10. Do not love art with your feelings.
11. A true sign of a good man is if he loves his father and mother.
12. Judge others by yourself and you will rarely be mistaken.
13. Only help him who is not an idler.
14. Respect every religion.
15. I love him who loves work.
16. We can only strive to be able to be Christians.
17. Don't judge a man by the tales of others.
18. Consider what people think of you—not what they say.
19. Take the understanding of the East and the knowledge of the West—and then seek.
20. Only he who can take care of what belongs to others may have his own.
21. Only conscious suffering has any sense.
22. It is better to be temporarily an egoist than never to be just.
23. Practice love first on animals, they are more sensitive.
24. By teaching others you will learn yourself.
25. Remember that here work is not for work's sake but is only a means.
26. Only he can be just who is able to put himself in the position of others.

27. If you have not by nature a critical mind your staying here is useless.
28. He who has freed himself of the disease of “tomorrow” has a chance to attain what he came here for.
29. Blessed is he who has a soul, blessed is he who has none, but woe and grief to him who has it in embryo.
30. Rest comes not from the quantity but from the quality of sleep.
31. Sleep little without regret.
32. The energy spent on active inner work is then and there transformed into a fresh supply, but that spent on passive work is lost for ever.
33. One of the best means for arousing the wish to work on yourself is to realize that you may die at any moment. But first you must learn how to keep it in mind.
34. Conscious love evokes the same in response. Emotional love evokes the opposite. Physical love depends on type and polarity.
35. Conscious faith is freedom. Emotional faith is slavery. Mechanical faith is foolishness.
36. Hope, when bold, is strength. Hope, with doubt, is cowardice. Hope, with fear, is weakness.
37. Man is given a definite number of experiences—economizing them, he prolongs his life.
38. Here there are neither Russians nor English, Jews nor Christians, but only those who pursue one aim—to be able to be.

Best wishes to all,
Judy.

---

by Pablo

Hi seekers;

I apologise for all my mistakes... I'm just trying to find the way to grow up... this is my decision, I'm ready to pay the price... try, without fear this is my intention... many different tendencies appear right now, my will is to remain with you... I want to lear, try, and try... my message is positive for you, we must try... ego is always here, in this very moment... I apologise, I want to lear from you, every point of view, every path... the jail is ever present... Break the mind, concepts, words, logic, yes brother that is wisdom something that is out of reach right now for me... My intention is to grow up.. let's try seekers!!!
I apologise...
My best wishes for you

---

by Ian

That might make a great work programme for all of us...

> Lawrick wrote:

Greg writes;

Quote Greg WHERE'S FRED?
by Greg » Wed Mar 16, 2011 3:18 pm

Fred:
I know you're around. I <smell> you while you're lurking.
Whattsup, Bro?
Read some of your postings from the past when I cut outta here.
YOU UNDERSTAND NOTHING ABOUT ME and I NEVER APOLOGIZE.
Just thought I'd let ya know.
I'm too self-responsible these days.
The World is Crackin' Buddy --- Time to get your Lazy Ass in Here

I NEVER APOLOGIZE.....

Might make a good work program for you.

Freed

Work Program week beginning 14 March 2011

---

by Ian

In order to assist the birth of an inner being embryo, we must try to engage all three centres at the same time in an affirmative effort towards a pre-defined goal.

This goal may be an exercise, a state of consciousness, an emotional state, an intellectual realization, a state of bodily sensing, a posture, a three centerted integration, or some such result...

In the beginning, these efforts may be simple, and somewhat easy; but as we progress in the Work - and as the embryo grows towards maturity - these tasks become more complicated or intense or more frequent, at least for a time until we can master them. (There will be a time when we have mastered these exercises and these efforts become second nature - but in the mean-time we have to make daily efforts with them, however small, and this requires repeating the same exercises over and over again, as aftyen as possible.)

So... let us repeat last weeks exercise again -

Spend half an hour each day playing a Role, preferably with other people around. Pick a Role that doesn't correspond to your Essence.

Walk mindfully to and from your daily employment. Continuously scan body Sensations from head-to-toe and then toe-to-head. End with a full Sensing of the presence of I Amness.

---

by Greg

What an interesting exercise this turned out to be! And it became more interesting once the decision was made to extend it for another week.

Role-playing is the work I do to (barely) pay the bills as the educational upgrade of energy, and development of conscience provided by dance, and other arts education is demeaningly seen as “woman’s work” and will never pay the bills. (Stupidly, I never “went” for technical training unsullied by a corresponding lack of responsibility for what it was I was doing --- I was unfortunately raised to be concerned about a “Greater Good” which as you get older you realize is, well, a pipe-dream . . . Oh well, tant pis for me.

Back to the point, my decision to play a drunk going on a bender perfectly mirrored the professional work I was doing the same week for the medical students. After clearing with those who needed to be informed --- boss, parents I take care of, friends ---of my “experiment” I proceeded with the manifestation. The additional week’s extension provided me with enough time to develop the case further and work it deeper into my marrow. I went to work with dirty clothes reeking of stale beer, soaked as they had been in a home sink. I wore run down old shoes with stinking socks. I did not bathe for a week and a half, I did not brush my teeth. The first week I exhibited a continuous depressive and unkempt persona with a mildly belligerent emotional tone. The second week allowed me to intensify all that. Never actually drinking because 1) I don't actually drink and 2) because I wanted to maintain "awareness" of the comings and goings responding to my alcoholic's mask. The day after St. Patrick's I situated myself in Columbus Circle at the SE corner of Central Park facing the Hugo Boss store which now sits on the exact site of Child's Restaurant (where the man himself conducted his office de bureau back in the Oragean days). I inwardly called on G. as I opened a container filled with prepared "vomit" (green food colored dried oatmeal) and slyly took a mouthful which I allowed to pour down the front of me while emptying the rest on the pavement in front. I sat there for the next three hours with an inebriated grin on my face oblivious to the pottage on my chin and down the front of me cooking to a crust in the intensifying heat from the sun. I was the recipient of glares, derisive and judgmental comments, head-shaking, one well-aimed spit and a well-intentioned shake by the shoulders from a passing "homie". My inner eye conjured up this long-haunting-me image http://www.wga.hu/art/a/angelico/09/cells/07_chris.jpg (Fra Angelico; Mocking of Christ). There ran through my a brain a plentitude of new, and very personal meanings all of them far-removed from the specific ecclesiastical symbolism.

Many rich experiences came from the two weeks of all of this. New insights, some of them directly related to the role-play at hand some of them indirectly related. All worth while and situations I will never forget. Body scanning revealed an accumulation of psychic leaden energy lining the pit-edge of my solar plexus. Dance class on both Saturday's was hell and people around me registered "concern".

The presiding feelings of this two week period experience included "worthlessness" "not being able To Do", and their progeny, overiding "Vulnerability".
The most troubling realization was related closer to home and was uncomfortably brought into higher emotional relief :

A few week's back, one of our group members (Judy) was experiencing a terrorizing form of helpnesses in the face of recent nearly apocalyptic manifestations of Mother Nature. Other than a few cursory, and maybe sincere --- as in Ordinary Sincerity, ie "Work worthless" ---- "we-feel-for-yous", no one including my very own self, bothered to remind and/or exercise her through a Work solution to remove her from her situation of "drowning". The Terror of the Situation within the agency of this group remained a terror. We did nothing to aid her in rendering it TRANSFORMATIVE.

Greg

---

by Greg

What an interesting exercise this turned out to be! And it became more interesting once the decision was made to extend it for another week.

Role-playing is the work I do to (barely) pay the bills as the educational upgrade of energy, and development of conscience provided by dance, and other arts education is demeaningly seen as “woman’s work” and will never pay the bills. (Stupidly, I never “went” for technical training unsullied by a corresponding lack of responsibility for what it was I was doing --- I was unfortunately raised to be concerned about a “Greater Good” which as you get older you realize is, well, a pipe-dream . . . Oh well, tant pis for me.

Back to the point, my decision to play a drunk going on a bender perfectly mirrored the professional work I was doing the same week for the medical students. After clearing with those who needed to be informed --- boss, parents I take care of, friends ---of my “experiment” I proceeded with the manifestation. The additional week’s extension provided me with enough time to develop the case further and work it deeper into my marrow. I went to work with dirty clothes reeking of stale beer, soaked as they had been in a home sink. I wore run down old shoes with stinking socks. I did not bathe for a week and a half, I did not brush my teeth. The first week I exhibited a continuous depressive and unkempt persona with a mildly belligerent emotional tone. The second week allowed me to intensify all that. Never actually drinking because 1) I don’t actually drink and 2) because I wanted to maintain “awareness” of the comings and goings responding to my alcoholic’s mask. The day after St. Patrick’s I situated myself in Columbus Circle at the SE corner of Central Park facing the Hugo Boss store which now sits on the exact site of Child’s Restaurant (where the man himself conducted his office de bureau back in the Oragean days). I inwardly called on G. as I opened a container filled with prepared “vomit” (green food colored dried oatmeal) and slyly took a mouthful which I allowed to pour down the front of me while emptying the rest on the pavement in front. I sat there for the next three hours with an inebriated grin on my face oblivious to the pottage on my chin and down the front of me cooking to a crust in the intensifying heat from the sun. I was the recipient of glares, derisive and judgmental comments, head-shaking, one well-aimed spit and a well-intentioned shake by the shoulders from a passing “homie”. My inner eye conjured up this long-haunting-me image http://www.wga.hu/art/a/angelico/09/cells/07_chris.jpg (Fra Angelico; Mocking of Christ). There ran through my a brain a plentitude of new, and very personal meanings all of them far-removed from the specific ecclesiastical symbolism.

Many rich experiences came from the two weeks of all of this. New insights, some of them directly related to the role-play at hand some of them indirectly related. All worth while and situations I will never forget. Body scanning revealed an accumulation of psychic leaden energy lining the pit-edge of my solar plexus. Dance class on both Saturday's was hell and people around me registered "concern".

The presiding feelings of this two week period experience included "worthlessness" “not being able To Do”, and their progeny, overiding “Vulnerability”.
The most troubling realization was related closer to home and was uncomfortably brought into higher emotional relief :

A few week’s back, one of our group members (Judy) was experiencing a terrorizing form of helpnesses in the face of recent nearly apocalyptic manifestations of Mother Nature. Other than a few cursory, and maybe sincere --- as in Ordinary Sincerity, ie “Work worthless” ---- "we-feel-for-yous", no one including my very own self, bothered to remind and/or exercise her through a Work solution to remove her from her situation of “drowning”. The Terror of the Situation within the agency of this group remained a terror. We did nothing to aid her in rendering it TRANSFORMATIVE.

Greg

---

by Greg

Acting is an over-riding exercise for me in the Work probably because of natural abilities in that arena.

Nearly 15 years ago, I was in a quandry, a "fix", in my life ---- I was stuck and couldn't budge. A situation presented itself to me in the form of an organization that had the strong possibility of offering me A KEY to ESCAPE MY CIRCUMSTANCES. There was no way shape or form that I had what it took to join this organization. So, we were the organization and myself facing each other.

After two weeks PONDERING, I realized that is I simply started small (ON THE APPROPRIATE-to-my-circumstances- SCALE) I could build a PERSONA to eventually enter that organization. There were two CONDITIONS which were absolutely to be maintained:
1) DO NO HARM
2) BREAK NO LAWS
To make a long story short, THROUGH ACTING I eventually entered that organization, became a member, became a well-respected leader and after twelve years left graciously after my aim (MOVING UP AND OUT A STEP) had been met. They got my equally met service. And none of them was hurt and none of them was any the wiser.

Greg

---

by Gururaj

> Greg wrote:
> The presiding feelings of this two week period experience included "worthlessness" “not being able To Do”, and their progeny, overiding “Vulnerability”.

The above part of your post,Greg , was perplexing to me.Having moved yourself to 'perform' the 'drunk' role so thoroughly ,why the feelings of "not being able to do" ?

In fact, I have somewhat similar feelings at the end of these two weeks (well-deservedly )at not having been able to move an inch from my set patterns of 'being' with people around - despite the relief felt when Ian gave another week's time.

Maybe over the years ,being more of an internally considering guy, I do not have enough data (observations of different ways demonstrated by others in similar situations) to role play .But more likely it is the fear of appearing silly and/or the inability to have an outer manifestation quite at variance with my inner state.

Lord have mercy.
Gururaj

---

by Ian

Dear All,

Please remember that when you signed up to these Forums, you agreed to certain constraints, namely -

Code of Conduct

This is a Moderated Discussion Forum and all posts that contravene the following Code of Conduct guidelines will be deleted. Repeated offenders risk the termination of their account.
Please post at least once a month.
Please try to bear the unpleasant manifestations of other Members.
Please be considerate and never belittle, hurt or unduly criticize other Members.
Do not stir up trouble by posting something that is deliberately provocative, offensive, spiteful, slanderous, hateful, threatening, or vulgar.

I would remind to take these above guidelines into consideration when replying to the Forums.

In other words, please refrain from stepping on others Corns.
If you feel your Corns have been stepped on, please try to bear the unpleasant manifestations of others.

In the future could we all please be a bit more more circumspect in what we say or imply to others.

Regards
Ian

Work Program week beginning 21 March 2011

---

by Ian

Consciously relax the three brains to achieve their harmony, reaffirming the discovery that they are in harmony only when they are simultaneously in a relaxed condition.

Accept and value suffering as something to calmly endure without resentment. "Corns" are recognized as sources of divine suffering, the enduring of which may release latent supplies of energy.

Ponder: Is the marrow of the Seeker's bones perceived to be a fitting repository for the Seeker's gradual accumulation of Holy Reconciliations?

---

by Lift

> they are in harmony only when they are simultaneously in a relaxed condition

When I read the above, the phrase sprang to mind - "to be perfect under perfect circumstances, is to be a paper warrior"
So one should strive to be in harmony under ANY circumstances, relaxed under ALL circumstances.

Lift

---

by Greg

The most interesting thing about the two week acted drunk experience was how I was able to sustain calm and 3 centered balanced presence while ACTING inebrieation while ACTING beligerance while ACTING depression while RECEIVING displeasure, judgement, and spit. FEAR OF JUDGEMENT, VULNERABILITY, and REJECTION were met with the reminding practices of SENSING/VISUALISING the placement of pelvis, head, spine.
The Jesus in the Fra Angelico remains centered.
So did I.

Greg

---

by Ian

Dear All,

Please remember that when you signed up to these Forums, you agreed to certain constraints, namely -

Code of Conduct

This is a Moderated Discussion Forum and all posts that contravene the following Code of Conduct guidelines will be deleted. Repeated offenders risk the termination of their account.
Please post at least once a month.
Please try to bear the unpleasant manifestations of other Members.
Please be considerate and never belittle, hurt or unduly criticize other Members.
Do not stir up trouble by posting something that is deliberately provocative, offensive, spiteful, slanderous, hateful, threatening, or vulgar.

I would remind to take these above guidelines into consideration when replying to the Forums.

In other words, please refrain from stepping on others Corns.
If you feel your Corns have been stepped on, please try to bear the unpleasant manifestations of others.

In the future could we all please be a bit more more circumspect in what we say or imply to others.

Regards
Ian

---

by Harry

I pose this as a question for pondering. Do we relax the centers? Or do we tune them some they can work together?

---

by Karen

> Harry wrote:
> I pose this as a question for pondering. Do we relax the centers? Or do we tune them some they can work together?

These are 2 very good questions Harry...

Work Program week beginning 28 March 2011

---

by Ian

Three times during the day sit quietly in meditation. Relax the three centers. Watch the breath. Use a sightless gaze and soundless sound to absorb impressions without identifying, labeling or judging them. Allow the impressions to collect in the marrow of the bones.

As you walk during the day, visualize the energy collected in the marrow. Ponder - "What is the source of my desire for answers, opinions and judgements?"

When you encounter the unpleasant manifestations of others during the day, try to absorb the impressions without identifying, labeling or judging them. Visualize the impressions collecting in the marrow of the bones.

When you react mechanically with anger, resentment, boredom or hopelessness, try to absorb the impressions without identifying, labeling or judging them. Visualize the impressions collecting in the marrow of the bones.

Evening exercise: While deeply sensing your body, Ponder, without expecting an answer, "Are questions more valuable to a seeker than answers?"

---

by Alistair

Mortify therefore, your members which are upon the earth; fornication, uncleanness, inordinate affection, evil, concupiscence and covetousness, which is idolatry. For which things' sake, the wrath of God cometh on the children of disobedience, in which ye also walked, for some time, when ye lived in them, but now ye also put off all these: anger, wrath, malice, blasphemy, filthy communication out of you mouth. Lie not one to another, seeing that ye have put off the old man with his deeds and have put on the new man, which is renewed with knowledge after the image of him, that created him. Where there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free, but Christ is all and in all. Put on therefore as the elect of God, holy and beloved, bowels of mercies, kindness, humbleness of mind, meekness, long suffering, forbearing one another and forgiving one another. If any man have a quarrel against any, even as Christ forgave you, so also do ye. And above all these things, put on charity which is the bond of perfectness.

---

by Harry

There's one little point in that quote, Alistair, that makes it really meaningful. After listing deadly sins the quote adds " which is idolatry ". Quite an insight for only these three words.

---

by Alistair

Apology for not crediting the quotation
Colossians 3, 5-14

---

by Alistair

“Among a thousand who seek me, one finds me. Among a thousand who find me, one follows me. And among a thousand who follow me, one is mine.” - Bhagavad-Gita

1 in 1,000,000,000?
Please check my arithmetic

Work Program week beginning 4 April 2011

---

by Ian

Daily Pondering: What is my Work aim?

Morning exercise: Sit quietly in meditation. Relax the three centers. Watch the breath. Use a sightless gaze and soundless sound to absorb impressions without identifying, labeling or judging them. Allow the impressions to collect in the marrow of the bones.

Walking exercise 1: Take time to go for a 15 minute walk. While walking, Sense your feet and Ponder - "I have good leather to sell for those who wish to make shoes." (Gurdjieff)

Visualization exercise 3: Visualize yourself having attained your aim. Whenever you encounter others during the day, try to manifest towards them as you would if you had attained your aim.

Evening recapitulation: What did I do today to further my progress towards my aim?

---

by Steve

Hi Ian

I have dificulty with this part 'Allow the impressions to collect in the marrow of the bones.'

I cant 'sense' it therefore have no experience of it happening.

If I 'visualise' it then act of visualisation removes me from sightless gaze and my experience becomes 'internal cinema' behind sightless gaze.

In a situation where I dont have the sensitivity or the practice to direct the above can the 'suggestion' that this intention is underway be used or is there more danger of self delusion involved in using suggestion?

---

by Harry

Steve,

Imagine. The key part is to maintain impressions while establishing a "meditative state". Ie, don't "think" just let things flow in. And as they flow in direct them to the bones. This isn't so much of a sensation as it is a perception. Try to see the difference between percetion and sensation.

The idea is Imagination directed is beneficial. We don't know of a higher center except with our minds. But we imagine it, and give it energy and it will eventually grow open to us.

---

by Steve

Thanks Harry, that was helpful.

Steve

---

by Gururaj

> Ian wrote:
> Allow the impressions to collect in the marrow of the bones.

This is somewhat similar to the exercise of imagining the flow of breathing thru' a limb of the body ,even while the actual breathing is happening in its usual place.
My experience has been that this is a more 'perceivable' imagination than ,say, visualising some image in the mind's eye. Moreover , the physical impressions (sight,sound,taste and touch) are all basically based on contact with the body and one can imagine that they proceed deeper into the body and penetrate the bones.
This 'absorption by the marrow' task aided in sensing the whole body.(whenever I could remember,that is)

[/quote]Sense your feet and Ponder - "I have good leather to sell for those who wish to make shoes." (Gurdjieff)[/quote]

A bit perplexing ."Gurdjieff can say that.How can I ? " was my thought.To get some sense,tried to generalise it as "I have good raw material for those who wish to make a useful product out of it " . Can it be that ,life as we experience it is a good raw material for our transformation - provided "we wish" to see it as such ?

The pondering on the Work Aim and evening recap. of results is a good focussing task.

Thanks to the contributor.
Guru

---

by Judy

Gururaj,
From Maurice Nicoll's Comentaries p856

THE PSYCHOLOGICAL MEANING OF FOOT
On one occasion it was said by Mr. Ouspensky that he had leather to sell for those who wish to make shoes for themselves. There are two kinds of shoes. The first shoes are made by life in us. We learn to behave in certain ways, to think that these people are right and those people are wrong, we imbibe ingrained attitudes through imitation according to our social position, and all the rest of it. Some of these shoes are made more by the mother and some more by the father. When you see a person walking in his father's shoes or perhaps in his mother's shoes, you understand that that person is not awake yet. All this has reference to the feet and we have to think to-night about the meaning of the feet esoterically. Life-shoes wear out sometimes and on the other hand sometimes they remain permanent. A person who has never questioned his acquired life-attitudes, his buffers, his prejudices, and so on, will perhaps have permanent shoes, made by the action of life on him. At the same time it is possible for a person to come to the point in which his or her shoes get worn out. Now the shoes are that with which we walk on the Earth. Esoterically speaking, our feet are where we touch external life and the shoes that cover our feet represent the attitudes and prejudices and opinions that we meet life with. When the Work says it has leather to sell to make shoes it means of course to make new shoes so that we can walk in life in a different way. The foot, psychologically speaking, is the most external part of us, the part of us that meets with life.

I just love this quote about buying leather to make shoes. I've over the years had any dreams about various different types of "new shoes" which are needed to be bought. his quote obviously touches the subconscious quite well.

Nicoll goes on fro the above to talk about the first conscious shock and a lot of other interesting stuff, if of interest to you.
There are searchable pdf files available (1996) which I find really useful. If you don't have them, Gururaj, email me if you wish.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Judy

Postscript:

Please excuse more typos than usual The "m" on laptop keyboard is presently unreliable.
J.

---

by Gururaj

The words " leather for sale" implies that one has to pay, and in full, for the benefit.It is not available gratis.

And then,the shoes have still to be fashioned next with our own further efforts.

End of week ,I still have no new leather.The payment was insufficient.

Thanks ,Judy.Shall contact for any specific title.

Regards to all
Gururaj

---

by Harry

Leather doesn't come with a week's effort.

---

by Gururaj

nor with a weak effort !

---

by Karen

> Ian wrote:
> Daily Pondering: What is my Work aim?

To know thyself first, this is my aim, then all will be well—all else will follow...Blessed is the man/woman who finds the creator inside, anywhere, in any circumstance, to any degree—for I believe that this is what changes the vibration of the planet.

> What did I do today to further my progress towards my aim?

worked on "open mindedness" to rise above duality. Active listenening to others despite opposing views.

Work Program week beginning 11 April 2011

---

by Ian

See clearly that a large component of life is a series of Outer Events associated with an Inner State.

Observe with fresh eyes,as though for the first time, both the event and your inner state (including the body's condition).

Choose to observe in different types of situations a relationship, a daily task (like travelling to work) and random events.

Just observe and collect data objectively.

Later one could try to do something consciously differently or just not react mechanically.

Just observe and collect data objectively.

Later one could try to do something consciously differently or just not react mechanically.

---

by Gururaj

One 'discovery' has been that a lot of time , and quite a bit of the contents of , the inner states are not triggered by outer events but rather by one's own plans ,desires,worries and so on.

Of late it's been quite an all fronts.Trust everyone is fine.
Gururaj

---

by Cassandra

I observe that there is quite a lot of internal considering, oftentimes the need to be recognized or thanked for my good deeds. I am still feeling some resentment from not being invited to a wedding. I'm not that familiar with the newlyweds, but I still feel snubbed.

---

by Steve

I had an interesting situation with an friend where by decision to help gradually slid towards internal considering due to 'requirements' which were completely unconscious to me , in fact before the internal considering arose I would have stupidly bet a large sum of money that I had no requirements regarding that person

I was able to catch the inner grumbling and had a realisation that my friend would not have acted the way they did had they not been 'suffering' in some way and their actions were their way of seeking relief. I then spent a few days pondering whether my 'realisation which turned me back towards external considering' was not just a form of self calming when I chanced to re-read this section which is from ISOTM
P153
He begins by deciding not to consider and afterwards blames other people for not considering him. This is an example of how external considering passes into internal considering. But if a man really remembers himself he understands that another man is a machine just as he is himself. And then he will enter into his position, he will put himself in his place, and he will be really able to understand and feel what another man feels and thinks. If he can do this, his work becomes easier for him. But if he approaches a man with his own requirements nothing except new internal considering can ever be obtained from it.

In retrospect it seems to me that my 'requirements' came from an uneducated selfish or undeveloped place and perhaps my understanding that my friend was suffering was using one centre to educate part of another ? The experience has certainly lead to some thinking about the difference between when my explanations are a form of justification for self calming and when they are genuine attempts to stand in another place in order to understand them.

---

by Gururaj

Hi Steve,considering (no pun intended 😀) that you caught your "inner grumbling" would indicate ,I think, that it was a shift more towards self-remembering than self-calming.
Some thoughts arising on pondering over your sharing : - Is intention to help another itself an expectation which will mar the outcome ?
If everybody around us is a friend or foe or 'no relationship' person (or the same person occurs as being all these in different situations) then are'nt relationships more a reflection of us ? Is that why self-remebering the key for true empathy ?
Gururaj

---

by Gururaj

PS :
It has also been my rare experience that ,if a person is blunt with me , but he or she comes across as being non-reactive in that interaction , then somehow their response is more valuable to me than if they were just polite or simply hostile.

---

by Alistair

Accept the ignorance of others and spare them yours
Spare from them from your substance and do not expect any of theirs

Do to me what is worthy of thee; not what is worthy of me

---

by Steve

> Gururaj wrote:
> Hi Steve,considering (no pun intended) that you caught your "inner grumbling" would indicate ,I think, that it was a shift more towards self-remembering than self-calming.
> Some thoughts arising on pondering over your sharing : - Is intention to help another itself an expectation which will mar the outcome ?
> If everybody around us is a friend or foe or 'no relationship' person (or the same person occurs as being all these in different situations) then are'nt relationships more a reflection of us ? Is that why self-remebering the key for true empathy ?
> Gururaj

Hi Gururaj
Thanks for your comments.
I was caught in a confusion after noticing the grumbling that amounts to 'Am I explaining/excusing the others behaviour to calm and remove grumbling/conflict from myself or am I doing it to externally consider?
I also started to wonder where it ends - forgiving everyone (as if that is a bad thing).
Everything can be explained away:
The shopkeepers rudeness - perhaps they are having a bad day.
My neighbours rascist attitudes - poor upbringing entrneshed attitudes.
the man who stole from me - needs money / poor unbringing.
X did Y because, like me they are mechanical.

And i begin to see that the model of right/wrong and justice as presented by society if fully accepted can be a become source of intolerance in myself.
From ISOTM
Everything that displeases such a man seems to him to be unjust, illegal, wrong and illogical. At the point of departure for his judgment is always that these things can and should be changed. "Injustice' is one of the words in which very often considering hides itself. When a man has convinced himself that he is indignant with some injustice, then for him to stop considering would mean 'reconciling himself to injustice'.

But I also am afraid that there might be a danger of Polyanna ism - everything is as it should be - if I run too far with it.
So for the moment I am left to ponder :
Does external consideration only apply to the person in front of me at this moment?
Do I apply it more universally that it might become a seed for a wider compassion?

Are there traps where I am using it to escape from unpleasantness?

---

by Judy

Steve,
One can 'over-think' the Work.
I find it useful, on becoming aware of confusion, to remember my aim before the confusion. In this case it would be to externally consider. Then bring everything back to self; achieve a three-centred state of balance and begin again.
For example, as soon as I become aware that inner talking is labelling the shopkeeper as "rude", I need to remember that any time I am offended, it is the beginning of internal considering and that this is the exact opposite of my aim in this situation.

Coincidentally, I read that same page in ISOTM recently too. Should you wish to pursue commentary on considering, try Nicoll pp253 - 301 for the knowledge.
But for some understanding of how one can short-cut this process and simply come back to oneself when doubts/confusion assail, then there is a passage from Joseph Azize's book "George Adie - a Gurdjieff pupil in Australia" which may assist. I'll post it a little later today as a separate post.
Of course we love the intellectual meanderings, but essentially the task is to continue to work.

Thanks to Guru and Cassandra as well for this interesting discussion.
Easter blessings to all.
Judy.

---

by Judy

I posted the quote from George Adie in the Discussion Forum.

Cheers,
J.

---

by JohnS

Not having posted for a while because I have been constantly 'considering ' that I have far too much work to do, I managed to get someone in to help me one day this week, and I was amazed at how he sailed through 'my work' because he had no inbuilt bias on how difficult it might be; which led me to considering how difficult I make everything else - as well as my work - which eventually fills up my whole day, from start to finish.
What I really have had a glimpse of is how much my procrastination is equal to or greater than those I accuse: I'd say mine is greater because I also feel to be the victim, and that adds that ittle bit more, and constantly.

Objectifying these situations is the only way out of them, and I see at this point how far distat is true objectification..but...that's just procrastinating.
I've got no time to write any more, I must go off and start objectifying

John

---

by Steve

Judy
Thank you for the relevant pages in Nichols commentaries and for G Adies quotes in the other thread, most helpful.

And Alaister thank you fo the quote/maxim , who is it by?

Work Program week beginning 18 April 2011

by Ian

Three times during the day sit quietly in meditation. Relax the three centers. Watch the breath. Use a sightless gaze and soundless sound to absorb impressions without identifying, labeling or judging them. Allow the impressions to collect in the marrow of the bones.

As you walk during the day, visualize the energy collected in the marrow. Ponder - "What is the source of my desire for answers, opinions and judgements?"

When you encounter the unpleasant manifestations of others during the day, try to absorb the impressions without identifying, labeling or judging them. Visualize the impressions collecting in the marrow of the bones.

When you react mechanically with anger, resentment, boredom or hopelessness, try to absorb the impressions without identifying, labeling or judging them. Visualize the impressions collecting in the marrow of the bones.

Evening exercise: While deeply sensing your body, Ponder, without expecting an answer, "Are questions more valuable to a seeker than answers?"

Work Program week beginning 2 May 2011

---

by Ian

The Seeker has realized that they have to be themselves. They have realized that they cannot live their life according to the dictates of others. Seekers cannot let their self-image be determined by Inner-Considering the opinions of others.

The Outcome of this is that Seekers have to stand up for their Conscience.

During the next month, when your conscience is called into question by others, stand up for what you believe.

Of course, it is helpful to remember that not all we believe is true.

---

by Gururaj

A fine appreciation will be needed for determining the purity of my 'conscience' .

My posts will be rare ,if at all, for a few days as I am in a place with a very patchy 'net access.

Regards to all,
Gururaj

---

by Karen

Ian wrote:

> The Seeker has realized that they have to be themselves.They have realized that they cannot live their life according to the dictates of others. Seekers cannot let their self-image be determined by Inner-Considering the opinions of others.

Beautiful Ian. Thank you for sharing this message. It resonates deeply and has created deep reflection.

The Seeker has realized that they have to be themselves. THIS for me is the place where heaven can occur in a new way. This for me is freedom from thinking there is a 'right' or 'best' way, because if I am following the dictates of others I am seeking to be something different from what I am. I am seeing myself as inferior, and this dictate or idea of truth as superior...and we are on this journey together where we are exploring being individuated creators, unifying the divine and human. Grounding divinity here, in this life, on this planet!

We already contain everything that we need inside of us. We don't have to look outside of ourselves...Where I wish to go is to the freedom. Letting go of the path that got me here. This unified, complete freedom to come back into contact with that, having chosen to come out of contact with it. To become separate from this light (freedom) within.

> Of course, it is helpful to remember that not all we believe is true.

I have my own personal truth, my own feeling of truth. But my truths and beliefs are certainly not aligned with everyone else's nor are they the absolute truth.

It takes courage to come to this space of awakening, because for many it's the letting go of what we have learned, it is not learning more, it is unlearning, to come back to source within.
It is a beautiful thing to share, share experiences so that anyone who resonates can come and draw from that, and draw from the unique perspective and bring it into themselves. Not to take it and copy it, but to birth it inside themselves as something unique there.

What I write about is what worked(s) for me, what birthed freedom and love with inside me. But that may not be what it is for you. For many it may be, for other not. I am letting go of of this feeling of wanting to convert people or preach to my way of thinking. This alone is freeing. Awakening to the allowance, allowing everyone else to BE what they want to be. That's freedom. To let go of that NEED to change anyone else. That is a journey of change on its own.

Work Program week beginning 9 May 2011

---

by Ian

The Seeker has realized that they have to be themselves. They have realized that they cannot live their life according to the dictates of others.

Seekers must learn to formulate their own Inner Work Programmes. One of the Aims of this line of Work as developed by Mr Beidler was to teach us to be able to create our own Inner Work Programmes.

The "Outcome" of this is that Seekers have to begin to create and share their own Inner Work Programmes with their Co-Seekers.

Exercise - During the next year, all Seekers are invited to create and share their own Inner Work Programmes with their fellow Seekers.

---

by Ian

> Ian wrote:
> The Seeker has realized that they have to be themselves. They have realized that they cannot live their life according to the dictates of others.
>
> Seekers must learn to formulate their own Inner Work Programmes. One of the Aims of this line of Work as developed by Mr Beidler was to teach us to be able to create our own Inner Work Programmes.
>
> The "Outcome" of this is that Seekers have to begin to create and share their own Inner Work Programmes with their Co-Seekers.
>
> Exercise - During the next year, all Seekers are invited to create and share their own Inner Work Programmes with their fellow Seekers.

Dear Endless Search Seekers,

What this Programme means to you all will vary.

On the other hand, what I am implying by this programme is that all future Weekly Work Programmes will have to be submitted you.

I will not be submitting any more Weekly Programmes for the next year!

If this Forum is to continue, then you will all have to arrange amongst yourselves a schedule for submitting Weekly Work Programmes.
(It is easy - just click the NewTopic* button in the Online Work Group Forum...)

I have spent 7 years here trying to convey to you the skill of creating your own Inner Work Programme and now it is time for you to put this into practice.
You have many resources - the EndlessSearch website with all its info; these forums with 7 years of past weekly programmes; all the books you have read; all the groups you have been involved with.

Regards

---

by Judy

I'd like to be involved with this.

As Ian says, we have a wealth of information plus more than 300 weekly work programmes to draw from.
Initial thoughts are to use this year as a kind of review process. I mean to perhaps choose favourite programmes from past years, with maybe a little personal addition or slant, making sure to address the various categories of Work from time to time. This may make it simpler for more members here to be actively involved too. I've been here for six years as of June 4th, and wish to at least continue mentally/spiritually along the teaching line of Mr Paul Beidler, as presented by Ian for the whole seven years. What a major octave, Ian!

So how to begin?
Who else is interested here? How many of us are there around which to organise a schedule?
What other 'initial thoughts' are out there?
I may perhaps from time to time wish to include some work along lines of Nicoll's Commentaries, or from "Gurdjieff Unveiled" by Sy Ginsburg.

There will be some questions of course and some details to work out, but first perhaps we need expressions of interest. I'm happy to share my gmail address with all here, if that helps.

Thanks, Ian, for providing this opportunity.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Alistair

Yes Judy

Thank you Ian

---

by Harry

Judy I can certainly participate, but I think we need to think about how to expand the circle. There has been a distinct lack of interest outside of three or four members.

---

by Gabriel

To All Seekers members of this group:

Greetings. My name is Gabriel and I have recently (yesterday to be exact) become a member of the group thanks to the cordial invitation of Ian.

So I logged in here yesterday but just looking to become familiar with the protocols and some of the current topics of discussion. I need to strike a balance between my needs for information about what is going on here (I mean tactically, as strategically we are all geared to advance in the way of the work as presented by Mr. Gurdjieff and his main proponents, and actually begin doing things that advance group work following the existing methodology and/or style.

You see, I have the notion that both individual and work group can advance one's spiritual goals. I also think that individual work alone (except in a monastic setting) is not as productive as the one performed in small groups.

Also, alone, there is a tendency to stay too long performing the same set of exercises. This tendency tends to decrease their efficacy.

Well, I look forward to working with you towards the realization of our goals for growth of consciousness.

Gabriel

PS = I tend to be a tad ceremonial in my initial communications. However, I am easy going and like to work with other seekers.

---

by Gururaj

Yes , Judy , I shall participate.

If ,say, 5 persons indicate their willingness to contribute exercises ,then could it be decided that each person's turn will come once in 5 weeks ?
Or do we keep submitting to a pool of exercises maintained by one senior member(at her or his eMail ID) who will then select and release for each weekly program ?

Regarding areas of interest - am reminded of the story of 5 blind men feeling up an elephant and describing it differently.The Work may occur uniquely to each of us,especially novitiates. Or one may have a good overall perspective but would still need to work at a time on particular aspects.

Speaking for myself ,I would like right now to get deeper clarity / taste of the 'basics' rather than exploring (superficially) all over the place .
And in matters of practice I need to work on being present /conscious as life unfolds thru' the day,not just during a morning meditation sitting.

Regards to all,
Gururaj

---

by Gabriel

To All Seekers On-Line Group

I will be happy to work with any of you in developing work programs. Please contact me here through a post or at any of these two email addresses:
Gabriel

---

by Judy

Guru wrote:

> If ,say, 5 persons indicate their willingness to contribute exercises ,then could it be decided that each person's turn will come once in 5 weeks ?
> Or do we keep submitting to a pool of exercises maintained by one senior member(at her or his eMail ID) who will then select and release for each weekly program ?

I prefer the first option. That way we can get started and when others wish to join in, it is a simple matter to extend the schedule. Why not take a vote here? I'm happy to abide by majority wishes.
Does anyone have something suitable for this coming Monday? Or any takers for a repeat of a favourite program from the archives? Or any other ideas? Most of us have been here for a while. How about you, Gabriel? Welcome! Have you been in the work for a while?

Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by JohnS

I am definitely in. And, at this stage, I would prefer the first approach.
I used to be in a house co-operative, where each household had their turn to get up at 3am and go to the fruit & vegetable market. It a) made you appreciate the food more, b) created a bond with the other houses, and c) encouraged you to canvass new members so that your midnight shift came less often.
In the interests of c) especially, I think we should invite Ian to take a turn, not as a moderator, but as a part of the circle he himself has created. Either that, or take an unofficial role as editor / debunker.
The other connected matter with c) is what is stated as a RULE that no-one can move on until he puts another in his place. I have never managed to do this, thus my static position in the work.

My email:

And...its almost Sunday already! Antipodeans have the disadvantage of being 8 to 12 hours ahead of the North, with deadlines like this

---

by JohnS

Minutes after my last post, I open a book by Pierre Bonnasse and find a quote by Daumal on the Holy Affirming, Holy Negation and Holy Reconciliation:

These are, symbolically, the three conditions for clear discourse: it presupposes
"a speaker who knows what he wishes to say, a listener in a state of wakefulness, and a language common to both."

---

by Gabriel

I believe it was Judy that asked if I can contribute some exercises now, and how long I have been in the Work.

I think that I can provide a couple of exercises that I have not performed in a while but which - have provided excellent results. I will have two along similar lines tomorrow. In response to your question about my time in the Work: I became a member of Mr. Willem Nyland's group in the late 1960s. I was in all city meetings (New York City and the Bronx) for four years or so. Then, my professional situation changed necessitating that I either travel or relocate for work, internationally or in the USA (but long distances)f. I would work with the group every time that I returned to NYC which was rather frequently. This went on until Mr. Nyland's death in 1975, I believe. Several health problems in the mid 2000s affected the intensity and frequency of my exercises. Currently, I am enjoying relatively good health.

Thank you for asking.

Gabriel

---

by Ian

> Gabriel wrote:
> To All Seekers members of this group:
>
> Greetings. My name is Gabriel and I have recently (yesterday to be exact) become a member of the group thanks to the cordial invitation of Ian.
>
> So I logged in here yesterday but just looking to become familiar with the protocols and some of the current topics of discussion. I need to strike a balance between my needs for information about what is going on here (I mean tactically, as strategically we are all geared to advance in the way of the work as presented by Mr. Gurdjieff and his main proponents, and actually begin doing things that advance group work following the existing methodology and/or style.
>
> You see, I have the notion that both individual and work group can advance one's spiritual goals. I also think that individual work alone (except in a monastic setting) is not as productive as the one performed in small groups.
>
> Also, alone, there is a tendency to stay too long performing the same set of exercises. This tendency tends to decrease their efficacy.
>
> Well, I look forward to working with you towards the realization of our goals for growth of consciousness.
>
> Gabriel
>
> PS = I tend to be a tad ceremonial in my initial communications. However, I am easy going and like to work with other seekers.

Dear Gabriel and fellow Seekers,

I would like to welcome Gabriel to the group. He has joined at a pivotal time in the evolution/growth/history of this group.
Gabriel's view of what this group is and how it functions will be different that what has gone before this time.

I hope you all can work together to develop something new for yourselves.

As Judy says above, there are 364 past weekly exercise programmes to draw upon, covering the last 7 years of this group.
These exercises cover the range of the Work as I know it. It is now time for the rest of you to add to this body of exercises.
As Gabriel says - "there is a tendency to stay too long performing the same set of exercises."

When you post a new Programme, please stick to the new topic heading of - "Work Program week beginning dd mmm yy" (eg Work Program week beginning 16 May 2011).

If Seekers wish, they may include their names as authors of the programmes.

There are now 20 registered users on this group, not all of them currently active. Seekers may also consider forming Triads amongst themselves in order to collaboratively author a weekly programme. This is how Paul Beidler had us take charge of the weekly meetings; it is how I would now like you all to take charge of the weekly meetings here online in this forum
You can read more about Triads here - http://endlesssearch.co.uk/northeon5.htm

I will continue to forward our/your weekly programmes to the Northeon email list.

I will also start a new Forum Topic wherein I post the weekly programmes that I receive from the Northeon email list. These will give you a different perspective on this line of Work.

Regards

---

by Gabriel

Ian, thanks for your comments.

Concerning exercises:

1) I currently perform several exercises that I copied some time ago from the Work Exercises listed in the web site Endlesssearch.home (Ian's). I do not keep a strict order of perfomance (i.e. sequencing) except for the last two or three mentioned next. In a summary fashion these exercises are the following: "The filling from the toes", "Sixty Bone Exercise jointly with Holy Prayer", "Bone Illumination", "Joint Exercise (while walking in place)", "Bone Breathing," "I Am" resonating in the three centers, and "I Will, I Can, I am."

Ian has been instrumental in helping me out with some of these exercises by providing answers to my questions concerning detailed points of execution.
Sometimes I add other exercises in the areas of meditation, visualization (etc) mostly from the same web site.

2) When these exercises are completed, I always do Mr. Gurdjieff's "Special Attention Exercise" (unsure whether the name is correct) version that begins with the words: "Fifteen Minutes relax. Break tempo of ordinary life before doing exercise." It is my favorite, and I always thank Mr. Gurdjieff's memory for having left this exercise for everyone, but particularly for people like me still learning, trying to sail over the perturbations of life like when the sea becomes violent and the boat draws water.

In case I am confusing anyone, this exercise aims at sourcing and using the extraordinary substances from breathing, and from the brain center (the substance that is produced by the flow of associations) to coat the inner higher bodies.

During the introductory comments, Mr. Gurdjieff clearly suggests that certain thoughts, sensations, and aspirations should be self-provoked to improve the chances of performing the exercise with some measure of success!

I want to add that these comments by Mr. Gurdjieff (aimed at activating the three main centers and place them in equilibrium with each other) are the same type of approach to the three center condition that I was told to use in the exercise that I alude to in the next paragraph. I practiced it very intensely years ago. I felt that - sometimes - I had extraordinary results. Currently, I perform it with less frequency because I think it needs very strict conditions of solitude, concentration, and perseverance that are not achievable every day at will!

In order not to make this post excessively long, I will defer for tomorrow the description of this other exercise.

I look forward to browsing through previous posts of Work Programs to prepare "packages" for practicing.

Thanks,

Gabriel

---

by Judy

(Post from Northeon thread repeated here in case activity on other threads in the Online Work Forum may have been missed - I often miss these cross-thread posts)

As there's mention both here in this new Northeon thread as well as in our April/May/June "Outcomes" suggested exercises, of various visualisations, how about we spend some time on these this week? Ok with everybody?
Replies could be posted in the three-monthly thread, which will give us a start there then as well.

The discussion around new schedules and so forth is coming along well and could be up and running by next week, if we wish. Any more volunteers to add to the schedule? There are several people who have been consistent contributors here and much value to all of us over some years - you know who you are - that I'm hoping will join our current list; in addition a couple of newer members who may be considering joining the list. Don't forget you can choose to repeat a favourite exercise from the archives as a weekly programme too.

Best wishes fellow seekers,
Judy.

---

by Judy

So far we have six members signing up to contribute suggested work programmes.
Tonight I'll write the names on six pieces of paper and then draw them out of a hat and suggest that we begin in this 'democratic' order. This will thus give us a schedule for the next six weeks, which can easily be extended when others join, as they will, with the first submission date being the coming Sunday or Monday.

Does this meet with everyone's approval?

Cassandra and Karen - where are you? Be nice to have you here. Don't forget you can submit a repeat favourite programme from the archives if you prefer. I'd welcome a bit of female support here.
By the way, Ian will continue to post the three-monthly programmes for us, so there is an overall theme plus some backup work for us to consider. Thanks Ian.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Karen

> Cassandra and Karen - where are you? Be nice to have you here. Don't forget you can submit a repeat favourite programme from the archives if you prefer. I'd welcome a bit of female support here.

Hi Judy,

I am here.

My contribution to the submission of program exercises has been lobsided. I think I've put forward only 1 or 2 programs since I joined.

Count me in.

In Gratitude,
Karen

---

by Judy

Here's the order in which our names were drawn out;

Guru
Harry
Alistair
Judy
Gabriel
Karen
John

This gives us a seven-week tentative schedule, with week 1 (Guru) beginning this Sunday May 22nd, and going through week by week until week 7 (John) on July 3rd.

Shall we give this a go?

Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by Gabriel

Dear Seekers:

I give you an exercise here that I said I was going to share with you. In the past, I have had interesting results that I attribute to its practice. However, I have not performed it as much as I would like to because of the need to find the conditions that it requires: time (about an hour or more), privacy, silence, and absence of any distracting factors (e.g. extreme temperatures, concerns about something else, illness, etc.)

1- It was my choice to perform a few minutes of meditation (20-25) prior to the start of the exercise. The type of meditation that I practiced (I still do) was one that allowed me to reach a point where I could achieve: freedom of unwanted thoughts, deep and slow breathing, and physical relaxation. In my opinion, the meditation facilitated the proper execution of the exercise. The idea of the meditation prior to the exercise was my own. No one from the group had suggested it. If you do not want to meditate, for whatever reason, at least stay silent a few minutes, relaxing, without placing your thoughts deliberatedly in things that have nothing to do with the exercise.

2- The exercise must be practiced alone, of course. It is more convenient to do it in a room or another internal area of the house (or apartment or warehouse or basement, etc) with the least decorations, appliances, furniture, things such as pictures hanging from the walls, or any other distracting objects. Whenever I could do it in a place such as a corridor, aisle, or a large -not used- room I felt that the results were more effective.

3- You will start with some introspection. You are aware that the exercise that follows is very important for the growth of your soul. Your soul needs to become progressively stronger to the point that it will survive the death of the body with full clarity and free of negative influences. You say to yourself that the exercise about to start consists of three distinct important parts: 1) It will be led by your mind that knows the mechanics of the exercise very well, that is determined and decisive, and that will ensure that the rest of you does the exercise properly. Then, you address your body (talk mentally at your body as if it were a separate entity), and you tell it that it has to comply with the instructions that will come from the mind, and do what the mind tells it faithfully and error free. You pause for a few minutes (less than five) and induce the emotion of great satisfaction by thinking on the major spiritual advancement that you can achieve at this time with the correct execution of the instructions! As soon as you provoke in your self a posiive emotion that you can actually feel, you proceed to start the second phase of the exercise. If you fail to feel any emotion (rather unusual), you should try to restart again until you do feel the emotion. If you still do not, then leave it for another day. Some conditions are not right!

Some people do it right fron the first time, others as capable and dedicated, need several repetitions.

4- Here comes the practice that has to be iterated several times until you sense that you are doing the exercise correctly, with ease, and fulfillment. It may take you several attempts to be successful. You need to have decided on a physical routine that you are familiar with, and you can practice it repeatedly without memory lapses (i.e. memory of the routine). In my case, I chose warming Karate exercises (the ones before class starts) because I was a Karate student then (1970 circa).

You start doing the movements chosen with almost exasperating slowness (imagine a slow motion movie) . Don't overdo it because it could disrupt your rhythm. Each time you reiterate your routine have the mind recap it quickly as, for example: "Now the body will do the lifting of the right arm, followed by setting it back next to the body, followed by lifting my left arm (etc)" While these movements are going on you must feel as if someone were watching you from some angle of the room you are in. This someone is as it were your Objective I. Also at the end of a cycle that you defined earlier, you need to aspire and believe in that you will create/strengthen your higher inner bodies. This conviction will generate emotions that you should pay attention to. You need to repeat these movements, sensings, and emotional "provocations" several times until you decide that the exercise is completed for the day.

Some people that I know - in addition to the instructions given - keep an intense alternate attention in the little finger ("pinky"), the ring finger, and in the large mound of the thumb on the palm of the hand. It makes the exercise more difficult to do but it is supposed to intensify the results. Some people start with one finger, and add another (as per what I say before) one performance at a time.

Thank you

Gabriel

---

by Gabriel

Is a good start Judy. I will do my week when it gets there.

Thank you.

Gabriel

---

by Gururaj

OK ,Judy.
I'll plan to post the exercise by Saturday night,India time, so that as the sun rises over Queensland on Sunday ,you can see it (the task).
(John,I presume ,stays further to the west).
Regards to all,
Guru

---

by JohnS

Fine by me.
I have disdained the west, I am due south of Judy, on the same longitude.

John

---

by Ian

> Judy wrote:
> Here's the order in which our names were drawn out;
>
> Guru
> Harry
> Alistair
> Judy
> Gabriel

> Karen
> John
>
> This gives us a seven-week tentative schedule, with week 1 (Guru) beginning this Sunday May 22nd, and going through week by week until week 7 (John) on July 3rd.
>
> Shall we give this a go?
>
> Best wishes,
> Judy.

Dear Judy,

Please add my name to the list. I will contribute a programme when my week comes up.

Thanks for this effort to engage everyone in the process.
We only learn by doing.

Cassandra, why isn't your name on this list.

Regards

---

by Cassandra

Ian,

Because I have been lazy and looking for easier ways to 'work.' Please add my name. I'll read through the posts to see how it is to be done.

Thanks for the reminder.

---

by Judy

So now we are nine,,,
Ian - your week thus begins Sunday July 10th,
And Cassandra - glad you heard the cooo-eee - Sunday July 17th.

After that, we can either repeat or reshuffle or of course add, as more members join us, as is hoped they will.
,
Cheers everyone,

Judy.

---

by Gabriel

Judy, Let's see if I understand.Based on the starting date of May 22nd, my turn comes on June 19, Correct?

Gabriel

---

by Judy

Yes Gabriel - correct.
Regards,
J.

---

by Ian

> Gabriel wrote:
> Dear Seekers:
>
> I give you an exercise here that I said I was going to share with you. In the past, I have had interesting results that I attribute to its practice. However, I have not performed it as much as I would like to because of the need to find the conditions that it requires: time (about an hour or more), privacy, silence, and absence of any distracting factors (e.g. extreme temperatures, concerns about something else, illness, etc.)
>
> 1- It was my choice to perform a few minutes of meditation (20-25) prior to the start of the exercise. The type of meditation that I practiced (I still do) was one that allowed me to reach a point where I could achieve: freedom of unwanted thoughts, deep and slow breathing, and physical relaxation. In my opinion, the meditation facilitated the proper execution of the exercise. The idea of the meditation prior to the exercise was my own. No one from the group had suggested it. If you do not want to meditate, for whatever reason, at least stay silent a few minutes, relaxing, without placing your thoughts deliberatedly in things that have nothing to do with the exercise.
>
> ...snipped a lot of the text ...
>
> Thank you (sorry for the lengthy explanations)

> Gabriel

Dear Gabriel,

As there was no formal exercise submitted in the exercise list on the forums, I have reposted your exercise as a "new topic" so that it shows up in the exercise list as "Work Program week beginning 16 May 2011".

---

by Gururaj

OOps !
Noticed now that all new work programs are submitted with date starting on a Monday.

Judy ,does it then follow that every contributor's post must be shifted by one day ?

I am anyway ,as agreed earlier , posting the work program (for my turn) under a new topic now.

But the date shall be indicated as starting Monday the 23rd May.

Gururaj

---

by Judy

Sounds good to me, Gururaj. You are correct. I hadn't noticed actually. Thanks for pointing it out.

Regards,
Judy.

Work Program week beginning 16 May 2011

by Gabriel

I give you an exercise here that I said I was going to share with you. In the past, I have had interesting results that I attribute to its practice. However, I have not performed it as much as I would like to because of the need to find the conditions that it requires: time (about an hour or more), privacy, silence, and absence of any distracting factors (e.g. extreme temperatures, concerns about something else, illness, etc.)

1- It was my choice to perform a few minutes of meditation (20-25) prior to the start of the exercise. The type of meditation that I practiced (I still do) was one that allowed me to reach a point where I could achieve: freedom of unwanted thoughts, deep and slow breathing, and physical relaxation. In my opinion, the meditation facilitated the proper execution of the exercise. The idea of the meditation prior to the exercise was my own. No one from the group had suggested it. If you do not want to meditate, for whatever reason, at least stay silent a few minutes, relaxing, without placing your thoughts deliberatedly in things that have nothing to do with the exercise.

2- The exercise must be practiced alone, of course. It is more convenient to do it in a room or another internal area of the house (or apartment or warehouse or basement, etc) with the least decorations, appliances, furniture, things such as pictures hanging from the walls, or any other distracting objects. Whenever I could do it in a place such as a corridor, aisle, or a large -not used- room I felt that the results were more effective.

3- You will start with some introspection. You are aware that the exercise that follows is very important for the growth of your soul. Your soul needs to become progressively stronger to the point that it will survive the death of the body with full clarity and free of negative influences. You say to yourself that the exercise about to start consists of three distinct important parts: 1) It will be led by your mind that knows the mechanics of the exercise very well, that is determined and decisive, and that will ensure that the rest of you does the exercise properly. Then, you address your body (talk mentally at your body as if it were a separate entity), and you tell it that it has to comply with the instructions that will come from the mind, and do what the mind tells it faithfully and error free. You pause for a few minutes (less than five) and induce the emotion of great satisfaction by thinking on the major spiritual advancement that you can achieve at this time with the correct execution of the instructions! As soon as you provoke in your self a posiive emotion that you can actually feel, you proceed to start the second phase of the exercise. If you fail to feel any emotion (rather unusual), you should try to restart again until you do feel the emotion. If you still do not, then leave it for another day. Some conditions are not right!

Some people do it right fron the first time, others as capable and dedicated, need several repetitions.

4- Here comes the practice that has to be iterated several times until you sense that you are doing the exercise correctly, with ease, and fulfillment. It may take you several attempts to be successful. You need to have decided on a physical routine that you are familiar with, and you can practice it repeatedly without memory lapses (i.e. memory of the routine). In my case, I chose warming Karate exercises (the ones before class starts) because I was a Karate student then (1970 circa).

You start doing the movements chosen with almost exasperating slowness (imagine a slow motion movie) . Don't overdo it because it could disrupt your rhythm. Each time you reiterate your routine have the mind recap it quickly as, for example: "Now the body will do the lifting of the right arm, followed by setting it back next to the body, followed by lifting my left arm (etc)" While these movements are going on you must feel as if someone were watching you from some angle of the room you are in. This someone is as it were your Objective I. Also at the end of a cycle that you defined earlier, you need to aspire and believe in that you will create/strengthen your higher inner bodies. This conviction will generate emotions that you should pay attention to. You need to repeat these movements, sensings, and emotional "provocations" several times until you decide that the exercise is completed for the day.

Some people that I know - in addition to the instructions given - keep an intense alternate attention in the little finger ("pinky"), the ring finger, and in the large mound of the thumb on the palm of the hand. It makes the exercise more difficult to do but it is supposed to intensify the results. Some people start with one finger, and add another (as per what I say before) one performance at a time.

---

by Judy

Hello everyone,

Ian has requested that, in the interest of conformity, we please ake the subject of each of the 'new topics' (the suggested work program we are posting each week) -
"Work Program week beginning dd Month 2011" (as above for example).
Also, I find it helpful to type the work out in an Office program first; then copy/paste.
This avoids losing any long posts owing to timeouts etc.

Thanks for posting the above most interesting exercise from Gabriel, Ian.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Judy

Hello everyone,

Ian has requested that, in the interest of conformity, we please ake the subject of each of the 'new topics' (the suggested work program we are posting each week) -

"Work Program week beginning dd Month 2011" (as above for example).
Also, I find it helpful to type the work out in an Office program first; then copy/paste.
This avoids losing any long posts owing to timeouts etc.

Thanks for posting the above most interesting exercise from Gabriel, Ian.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Gururaj

Gabriel and Ian,thanks for giving the opportunity to do this exercise.

Did it for the first time today and followed all the suggestions . The only part I could'nt quite invoke was a feeling of someone observing while I did the exercise.
The exercise chosen for doing in slow motion was a type of stretching exercise which I anyway do almost every morning.

In the long run whether the soul is strengthened or not,I experienced right now a slightly deepened and calmer being for a couple of hours after the attempt.The deliberate slowing down brought the perception close to the edge of the present moment which one is not at all aware of usually as events unfold.

Thanks again.

Work Program week beginning 23 May 2011

---

by Gururaj

The aim this week for the seekers shall be the deepening of their acumen for impartial observation ,free from identification while in the throes of mechanical and habitual reactions of daily life.

The following exercises to aid this endeavour are based ,in part ,on exercises suggested in Weekly work programs (of many years ago) and simple,practical techniques used in the path of Vipassana (insight meditation).

Upon awakening in the morning, the seeker will leap to their feet and take 7 deep breaths into the abdomen while sensing the diaphram, the ribs and the clavicle, and on exhalation, sensing in the reverse order, while praying for an inner calm of Being.

Twice a day ,preferably around sunrise and sunset,the seeker goes through a stationary meditation session of accustomed duration.Stay with the sensation of breathing,being aware of the movement of air through the nostrils and/or the rise and fall of the abdomen as it occurs. Concurrently, if the mind wanders and emotions arise the phenomena should be just noted.If you imagine ,note as 'imagining'.If you think,'thinking'.If you plan,
'planning'.If you percieve,'percieving'.If you reflect,'reflecting'.If you feel happy,'happy'.If you feel bored,'bored'.If you feel disheartened,'disheartened'.In general, note all movements of consciousness.
Sensations of discomfort in the body may arise like stiffness and pain.But these should be just labelled as such and endured as much as possible as long as one can sustain detached awareness.The discomfort may even disappear or become bearable.

Thus prepared the seeker will dance out into the world seeking to participate in the adventure that awaits, where they will seek opportunity to expand their search through the power of awareness and the same detached awareness as cultivated in the meditation,keeping to the task of peering behind the mask of a mechanically lived life.

During the week, Ponder: Like the pearl coated from the irritation of a grain of sand, is Being created by our struggle to sustain Holy Denying and Holy Affirming?

(suggestions for improvement,etc. are welcome from fellow seekers)

Gururaj

---

by Harry

I've long greeted the Sun every morning. One deep centered breath.

My only comment would be on the last observation in the post. The pondering. I'm not sure about the sustaining denying and affirming. My experience is that the crucial step here is to find and recognize the reconciling force. By doing that the affirming and denying change. And move higher or lower. this is a fluid development.

---

by Judy

Guru,
Just lost a post. Have to go out now.
Will try again tomorrow. Wi-fi unreliable this morning.
Cheers,
Judy.

P.S. Yes yes - I should have taken my own advice. Aargh..
J.

---

by Cassandra

Leaping out of bed...hmm....just didn't work for me. If I don't go to the bathroom first off to relieve myself, the sittng is severely compromised. So I had to first finish that necessary task and then start with the breaths. Focusing on the breath during meditation has always been more challenging than other forms where I might sense a body part. This is so because it feels 'empty'; I don't get those familiar thrills. But for this very reason, it is good for me to do what the sitting I doesn't want to do.

I think the push against my meditation comfort zone may be a way that brings about the coating of a 'new man' (being).

---

by Harry

Cassandra,

Just get out of bed, face the sun and greet it. Then do what has to be done.

---

by Gururaj

Maybe due to sleeping less than required , usually wake-up time is a groggy,grumpy time for me.So,it was difficult to summon up a lighter ,enthused feeling every day.

---

by Gururaj

"During the week, Ponder: Like the pearl coated from the irritation of a grain of sand, is Being created by our struggle to sustain Holy Denying and Holy Affirming?"

The " Orage Gurdjieff Meeting notes " file (containing weekly meeting notes by a participant of a program managed by Orage) - the link to which I had shared many weeks ago - is ,for me , a treasure trove.

Orage's exposition on pages 50 to 52 gives some great food for thought and for real-life exploration.

He says (my interpretation in italics) that Individuality (Being) is the third (reconciling) force in a triad ,the other two being (1) Will (active force) which is developed in us by exercising for an aim against mechanical inclinations - for its own sake and not for the sake of our usual desires (in other words,by intentional suffering) and (2) Consciousness (passive force) which is the awareness we need to sustain to see how the will is being exercised and the results thereof .

Further,he is quoted as saying , "...it is only regarding will and consciousness can we do anything directly.The first may be developed by self-observation and opposing inclination for no reason;the second by the effort to be on the qui vive when doing so;and let individuality lookout for itself "

This tells me that I can consider myself a true Worker only if I am invoking and developing these forces.

---

by Judy

Guru wrote:

> Upon awakening in the morning, the seeker will leap to their feet and take 7 deep breaths into the abdomen while sensing the diaphram, the ribs and the clavicle, and on exhalation, sensing in the reverse order, while praying for an inner calm of Being.

The sensing sequence here is interesting. I did do this part of the program daily, and found after a few days that the almost 'waves of sensation' had a calming effect, which aided preparation for sitting.

Cassandra, meditation can often be a struggle against going with various distractions which may seem more attractive at the time. Sometimes I sit and have to just watch a fair amount of inner talking until it subsides. This takes fewer or more minutes depending on state. During busy times the personality tries to tell me I am wasting time. It never does this when I actually AM wasting time of course. The opposite is clearly true, as you mention.

The leaping and dancing, though only done mentally, did start each day enthusiastically, with a touch of a smile too.
Thanks Guru.
Regards,
Judy.

Work Program week beginning 30 May 2011

---

by Harry

Relax your face.

Feel the muscles in your faces. Around your eyes. In your forehead. Around your mouth. Focus your attention on them. Relax those muscles intentionally.

Do this whenever you think about it. Do it during an argument. Do it when laughing. Do it during a cry. Do it walking. Do it watching a show.

Pay attention to what else is happening within you as you relax those muscles. Observe yourself during and after the relaxation. Observe yourself when you first think of relaxing your face. And continue.

Report your observations back to this forum.

---

by Alistair

Since joining the group there have been many exercises that have coincided with those that I have actually been practicing at the time, this weeks exercise is yet another; this is especially valuable when attempting concentration in my attempt to reach a meditative state. It seems that when relaxation of the body is difficult that this practice is the best place to start, oh how we contort our faces.

---

by Steve

Already just two days in I noticed that I take my work computer face into the world: jaw half clenched, eyes seriously focused and I cant take pick out a single emotion but rather a conglomerate that results in an attitude of 'determination'.
I wonder to myself if the 'attitude' exisited in the past prior to work and feeds into 'how I do' computer programming work or is it a learned habit in work that has it become a habit outside?

Will continue observing other things in other places.

Thank You for the exercise.

---

by Harry

Try practicing the relaxation at work, Steve. You can do it sitting at your terminal. No one has to know. Also recognize that some of those I's have been conditioning your body for your entire life. This exercise is a tool. A means.

---

by Cassandra

> Harry wrote:
> What I have observed mostly, of late, has been a periodic depression that has come with the passing of my mother. It is not so much that my mother is gone. We did all that we could for her. But it is a depression of facing the act of dying. And noticing the immediate and profound difference between her physical self the day before she died and the day she was dying. Like a different being was there. But my own depression comes more from being the eldest now. That I am next. (That is not a conscious thought.) And that I don't want to try to just fill my remaining time.

My mother in law died last night, something we'd been expecting. Some days before she died, I thought, there is no difference between us (the 'healthy' ones) and her. I had been trying to view her objectively, in order to help facilitate her dying, but it didn't seem correct.

I searched for Harry's post about his mother's death last year, and after reading it, realize also thta there are fewer and fewer cushions between me and the inevitable. Used to be, the 'old people died.' I'm now old, too. But what do I do with this knowledge, really fear. Stay with it. Ask that it heal.

I will also continue to observe my face in the following days.

---

by Gururaj

Your post set off associations ,Cassandra and then some pondering, and finally, hopefully ,a higher affirmation.

My father passed away just after I turned 30 many years ago.Within a couple of years thereafter quite a few dear elders in the family too were no more.

I became more inclined to ponder about profounder aspects of life .Maybe ,as is said in Work terms, a magnetic centre developed to explore so-called 'spiritual' aspects of life.

But the other 'I's still keep me quite attached to the usual passions of daily life and the intensity needed for a seeker is not really there more often.

Again only when someone close and known (and not much older than me) passses away , the intensity flares up briefly (or ,in other words, I go deeper into life) .Moreover ,nowadays as I grow older , If I understand correctly what you and Harry too shared, a tinge of fear is also there.

Further thought about this ,at-least intellectually, seems to suggest that we need to develop GILLS to dive deep and remain there for long .

My lungs force me to remain in shallow waters ,attracted to and tossed about by the only one type of known life.

For example,why must I be happy only when the world is fair and comfortable to me ? Can I not be Ok in all weather conditions ?

Thanks to the support and participation all of you ,Ian and this site I hope those gills are developed , a new way of breathing.

---

by Cassandra

Gururaj,

Beatifully expressed...remaining in the discomfort and in-between place of not knowing is the challenge.

---

by Gururaj

Thanks for the appreciation ,Cassandra.

My facial muscles would have relaxed a bit on reading that.  .

The practice of the task showed me that mental tension usually affected the jaw muscles straightaway.
Intentionally relaxing them did break the mechanical connection as long as the awareness lasted.

No wonder,as the saying goes, 'the face is the index of the mind / heart ' and poets have expressed it more eloquently.

Some discoveries on the 'net -
(1) Abraham Coles
"Contending Passions jostle and displace
And tilt and tourney mostly in the Face:
Unmatched by Art, upon this wondrous scroll Portrayed are all the secrets of the soul."

(2) Shakespeare
"You have such a February face, so full of frost, of storm, of cloudiness."

---

by Judy

I did this relaxation of the facial muscles quite obsessively all week. It is always a good exercise for me.
Each time I remembered to be aware, there was tension found.
How can that be? A I a tense person?
Not especially so. And yet....

Each time the remembrance served as a waking factor, a reminder to awareness.
And with each relaxation I noticed how any negativity melted away - very effective for this.

Thanks, Harry.

Oh, just a postscript; I noticed that the relaxation of facial muscles began a relaxation of other muscles (eg hands and feet muscles) by itself. This makes it a core exercise. Much energy being saved.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Steve

I had an interesting experience at a Tai Chi class that I have recently joined.
At the class end I asked for a demonstration of a movement that I was not too clear about.

The instructor demonstrated and I was aware of my facial expression, - interested during the demonstration, thankful, acknowledging, appreciative - I relaxed my face, but left the expression the same. I said 'Thanks,I've got it now'
The instructor then gave me another demonstration. 'I kept the relaxed face with same interest and appreciation'.
I had understood the first time - I had not been far away from understanding the movement in my mind when I asked for clarification. The second time, my interest was maybe a bit less, I looked to see if I had missed anything just in case, and concluded that I was clear on the movement.

The insructor then gave a third demonstration , at this point there was a clear mismatch between my inner experience and my expression, I was no longer interested, there was definately a moment of ' hmmm, what do I wear on my face now ?'
Thanks for the exercise , very useful.

---

by Alistair

Always beneficial to relax the face
It seemed to me that the tongue was the most difficult part to relax
It's as if it's always poised
Does anyone else notice this?

Work Program week beginning 6 June 2011

---

by Alistair

Be alert
Try to observe every time you use the words I, me, myself
Try to notice before using these words and attempt to communicate without them

---

by Ian

Indeed, we have to be aware of our own egoism, but we also have to be aware when some "teachers" try to divest us of our own critical faculties.
This video may be instructive...
http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=BSeLEoQ3VkE

Regards

---

by Harry

I was reading Nicoll this morning and would like others' feedback on his statement that young children don't use the word I, but instead refer to themselves in the third person. As I did not experience this with my son I was a bit skeptical about the concept. What is the experience of others?

---

by Alistair

Hans Christian Andersen, Snow Queen, lest ye be as little children

---

by Judy

Harry,

There's reference to this phenomenon in Bucke's "Cosmic Consciousness". He uses the term 'self-consciousness' to describe the change as the brain develops from eg: John seeing 'john' in the mirror to John seeing 'me' in the mirror. Bucke states this change occurs at around age two to three years (from memory).
Put simply, perhaps 'ego' - being connected with personality, takes time to come into being. Or is this just one aspect of it?

Yes, I'm watching this, plus lots of other processes, happening in my grandson Henry at the moment. For example, colour sense, which Bucke says solidifies around age 3 too, comes in much much earlier with today's tots. Hen absolutely loves putting his Lego into piles of different coloured blocks, and has been doing this for some time now. (Oh, he was 2 in March).

He varies between using 'Henry' and 'I/me' to refer to himself at present.
Most interesting.
He seems to have realised quite recently that when I speak to him on the phone, I really am speaking to him and the voice is somehow coming over a distance through the phone, even though he cannot see me. Earlier, he used to laugh a lot - as if it were a fine trick. Now he tries to tell me stuff and always says 'bye' and so forth.
Don't get me started on the immense joy a grandchild brings...

Kind regards,
Judy.

---

by Karen

Harry,

Hayden refered to himself in the 3rd person until about the age of 3 when this slow yet noticeable transformation began to take place.

Elle will be coming on 2 in October and she has not made reference to herself in anyway as of yet. However, she clearly calls her brother Haayen, and her parents are mommy and daddy. She can easily point us out in photographs but stops at herself. If we ask her "Where are you Elle?" she points to her picture...

It will be interesting to monitor the I/me/myself with Elle over the next year.

---

by Alistair

Material on http://www.gnosticteachings.org a site Judy introduced to us some time ago states unequivocally that the ego lies dormant for the first 2 years after birth then begins to remanifest.

---

by Gururaj

The twin kids with Guru are approaching 4 years of age .I/me/mine is demonstrated in them quite clearly ,since more than a year.One example is fighting over possessing objects.But their egos are simple ,as yet.No carrying of hurts and grievances.No creating of images about themselves.Just spontaneous and natural.
The adults around may have hastened their sense of a seperate ego by asking questions like "who are you","what's your name".

Can adults deliberately consider themselves as a third person (without being neurotic or deranged) ? By not verbalising I/me/mine does the feeling of 'I' weaken a wee bit even ?

Well,Alistair has given the participants here a chance to find out.

---

by Karen

[quote][quote="Ian"]Indeed, we have to be aware of our own egoism, but we also have to be aware when some "teachers" try to divest us of our own critical faculties.
This video may be instructive...
http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=BSeLEoQ3VkE
Regards

Someone (not naming any names) suddenly has a hankering to build an airport hanger, all the while drinking copious amounts of Coca-Cola.

Just kidding!

Ha ha ha! Thanks for this Ian.

---

by Karen

This may be slightly off topic but sparked a ponder and wanted to share...

Bruce Lipton's "Biology of Belief" mentions that a child's perceptions of the world are directly downloaded into the subconscious during the first 6 years of life, without discrimination and without filters of the analytic self-conscious mind that is not fully operational during this time.

Consequently, our fundamental preceptions about life and our role in it are learned without having the capacity to choose or reject those beliefs. Since the subconscious mind controls about 95 percent of behavior, other people essentially program our lives...shaping behavior for the rest of our life...

until one comes to the work and begins the de-re-construction/de-re-programming process

This excerpt led further ponder of the following statement seen on a bumper sticker today: "don't believe everything you think!"

---

by Cassandra

I don't recall how much the children used the first person to reference themselves, but I do remember a lot of possessiveness, 'my toy,' strong attachments to objects and of course parents. That's what comes to mind strongest, that after the children come, the parents' singularity, that is living largely for adult pleasures and interests had to be cut way down. There was definitely an intense 'we/us/family' after the children came that didn't get triggered when my husband and I married.

Judy, my daughter sorted toys and even food, when possible, into the primary colors. Once I picked her up from playschool about age 3, and she didn't want to leave until she had played on something red or green, or whatever color that needed attention.

---

by Karen

Last week Elle shouted from the rooftops "MINE". She just turned 20 months and attends daycare with many other little ones.

Work Program week beginning 13 June 2011

---

by Judy

During this next week let us observe ourselves as we try whenever possible to put ourselves in the position of the people we encounter.

Pick a particular person as the occasion presents itself. And try to satisfy what you perceive to be that person's wishes during the period of encounter, as if you were that person. Really try to put yourself in that person's position.

Notes on this exercise from Sy Ginsburg's “Gurdjieff Unveiled”.
Quote:
“It is extraordinarily difficult to put ourselves in someone else's position, especially if that person is someone with whom we disagree. That is because we function through our personality, which we believe to be real, and each personality is separate from all other personalities. It is only when we stand in essence that we will be successful, because in essence we are all conjoined with the universal. Through the Work we begin to make a separation from the personality that we have been mis-educated to believe is who we are. In separating from the personality, we stand in essence, and we then experience what Gurdjieff calls genuine, impartial and non-egoistic love.

“There is a particular method that is used for engaging in all such exercises. We must divide our attention so that all our attention does not flow into identification with personality characteristics. The Gurdjieff method requires including the sensation of part or all of our body in our attention, as a device to help divide the attention. As we proceed through the week, encountering various people, let us try to have a sensation of our body including the sensation of its weight in our attention, while we attempt to put ourselves in the other person's position.” End quote.

Bring a specific example back to share with others, together with any coments you may have.

****

---

by Harry

Here is my question. I understand external considering. Put the other person first. But I'm not sure that this can see that person's wishes.

Outside of this group and a few very close individuals I'm not sure that I want to be in another person's mechanical desires. I can see what they want. I can even give what they want. But the as if I were that person would be becoming a machine. Because they don't really have a position.

I'm not trying to argue with this exercise. External considering is extremely important. As my mother was dying much of my life was given over to fulfilling her needs. Even her mechanical desires. And I often give myself over to my son's needs. Less often his desires.

I have a close friend who I speak to regularly. But those are often very mechanical conversations. I enjoy the contact, but seeing those mechanical reactions and being involved in those mechanical reactions often pushes me more toward the mechanical.

---

by Ian

As a social lubricant or as greasing ones palms, it may be expedient to put oneself in the position of others, but G was notorius for stepping on peoples corns.
A corn is a belief or Faith in something.

Putting oneself in other peoples shoes is good for an exercise or for to gain an advantage, or to socially lubricate a situation, but sometimes we have to step hard on the corns/beliefs of others.

Never-the-less, it is a good exercise. An essential part of the Sly Man's repertoir.

Regards

---

by JohnS

Have been wanting to post earlier, but could not get access to this site -"down for maintenance", according to Cisco.

For some reason or other, EVERYONE I've met this week has been pleasant, including my usual intimidator. Perhaps some of it was my preparedness to be non-confrontational and receptive aka this exercise, but I have had no direct grist for the mill.

On the other hand, what seems to be a 'side effect' of this attitude shift is: I am suddenly acutely aware of a war within myself: the left side of my body feels very aggressive and arrogant towards my rght side. All my antipathies are seemingly collected in my LH actions - hands, feelings, and are directed at my right side's equivalent functions and feelings. So I am concentrating, when interacting, on whether the left area is dominating the situation.
I have been forcing my right side to do actions normally done with my left (I'm left-handed, in the main), but the left doesn't like it, and sneers at the weaker efforts of the right.
Hopefully, by continuing to observe this, I can gain a better insight into the mechanical workings within, and, as a corollary, without

John

---

by Judy

I worked with the exercise last week before suggesting it and found it interesting for a number of reasons. I tried it about five or six times. Except in one case, where the person's wishes were clearly stated (in an office meeting and the wishes were the opposite to mine), I was struck with the almost impossibility of really knowing the other person's wishes. Assuming I knew proved to be incorrect in two cases. (As Harry says, often a person doesn't really have a position anyway). This led to various strategies; one of these was that I had to listen intently to the other; another was that I was led to ask several clarifying questions each time.
This, plus the striking clarity of the division of attention - being between two such seemingly different concentrations of consciousness, "me" and "other", plus the ongoing sensing (I chose the hands), made it rather a busy exercise.
And before even getting to that, there is the definite felt effect of standing a little closer towards essence than usual. This in itself is useful. Well, I think that is what it was - there was a kind of oceanic sense of inclusiveness sometimes.
I haven't done much work along the lines of external considering and it seems there is an art to be learned there.
I do see the points made about it being a social lubricant and so forth though. One person commented to me that I seemed "quietly thoughtful" today. (Makes me wonder just how far I am from essence a lot of the time.)

Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by Gururaj

The task appeared to be a natural progression on the previous week's about being sensitive to "I/mine/myself"

But the practice has been such that there is not much of actual experience to report.

The few times when I remembered the exercise and brought a shift in me was when I became aware of a resistance building in me, dropping it and going along with what the other person wanted (the kids entreating me to play,wife asking for a helping hand and an elderly uncle wanting to be heard out).

However can recollect now how I usually 'experience' another person is from a reactive nature thru' the prism of my needs, likes,dislikes, judgements and the state of being.

---

by Judy

Guru wrote:

> However can recollect now how I usually 'experience' another person is from a reactive nature thru' the prism of my needs, likes,dislikes, judgements and the state of being.

,

I noticed this too, Guru. Thanks for expressing it. Yes, the attempt to externally consider seemed to assist any possibility of my interacting neutrally with another - with less bias, even though I don't usually see any present.

And it did follow Alistair's exercise quite well, didn't it? I love these little "coincidences".

Cheers,
Judy.

---

by Cassandra

I attempted to put myself in the position of my husband, whos mother recently passed away and also in the position of a work colleague who is today having surgery. What comes up first is a FEELING of sentimentality towards the person, which is accompanied by imaginary condolences, conversations, or myself as the one who can take away the imagined sufferer's pain. So, it seems I can't see this person for who or what they may really need or want, rather my ego wants to command the attention and make again a performance of the whole thing.

---

by Judy

Cassandra,
These are useful comments. Yes, this is one reason the exercise is difficult - ego gets in the way. It isn't the only reason, though. We cannot be mind-readers and often need to clarify where the other person is coming from and it isn't always appropriate to ask. Perhaps we can increase the weight of attention of the sensing in these instances. At least then it serves as practice for "three-brains- balanced" awareness and hopefully moves us closer to essence.
I did find the exercise most beneficial in a couple of situations of conflict resolution though, where the other person's position was clearly stated.

Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by Judy

Cassandra,
These are useful comments. Yes, this is one reason the exercise is difficult - ego gets in the way. It isn't the only reason, though. We cannot be mind-readers and often need to clarify where the other person is coming from and it isn't always appropriate to ask. Perhaps we can increase the weight of attention of the sensing in these instances. At least then it serves as practice for "three-brains- balanced" awareness and hopefully moves us closer to essence. I did find the exercise most beneficial in a couple of situations of conflict resolution though, where the other person's position was clearly stated.

Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by Cassandra

Judy, I also remembered that I didnt sense a body part while attempting to do the task. As it is ongoing, I will try to insert that element.

Thank you.

---

by Alistair

Firstly please accept this apology for not contributing to the group work during the last couple of months. In mitigation and with the wish to avoid another travelogue in brief a ten week journey to the UK has just been completed during which there was little routine which seems to create more favourable conditions for group work.

The first impression of this exercise was its impossibility, the impossibility of making the correct assumptions that truly reflect those intuitive, feeling and intellectual impulses engendered by the particular individual selected.

The conscious application of our three basic centres might actually provide a more complete understanding of that individual’s position if indeed that individual is being driven by one particular centre, which is quite likely.

Is the ultimate aim of this exercise to better enable us to suffer the unpleasant manifestations of others with joy?

During the return journey by chance I encountered a 65 year old woman whose circumstances were on the face of it less than ideal. Several broken marriages had left her homeless & drifting from one hostel to another. During a conversation in the hostel kitchen it became apparent that she urgently required dental treatment. In the interest of assisting others I suggested to her that she visit Crimea where dental treatment in Sevastopol is both relatively easy to arrange at short notice, treatment performed professionally and inexpensive compared to ‘western’ service.

After a few days a message appeared in my inbox indicating that she wished to visit and she purchased a flight ticket to arrive on 14th June.

The morning after her arrival I was enjoying my morning tea in the garden when our guest she sat down and began to tell me she had made a great error and was all for returning to England immediately. Listening attentively I attempted to put myself in her position. Observing her uncertainty and fear of the unknown my own feeling was to say nothing that might exacerbate her discomfort and let it pass. Was she simply seeking some reassurance? There was a feeling of this but this I resisted as any reassurance I could give was without substance.

By the end of the day she had calmed considerably and two days later we escorted her to the dentist where treatment was a success and at a fraction of the cost she was accustomed to.

Today she recounted details of previous dental treatment performed unsuccessfully which causes her bitterness and resentment but as I again attempted to put myself in her position I realised that I would probably be more angry and resentful had I suffered the same. The painful observation is that here is a lonely woman who struggles constantly to meet her attention needs.

Idries Shah in his book Learning How to Learn devotes a Chapter to attention where he states that in every human transaction there is to some extent in both or all parties the need to satisfy our need for attention and that a constant awareness of this improves our communication.

---

by Cassandra

Alistar,

Thank you for sharing this. As for dental costs in the U.S., it's quite expensive even if one has insurance. I have a bottom tooth missing since I was a teen and have been told it would cost $2,500 at a minimum to replace, and my insurance doesn't cover this because of the "missing tooth clause" attached to many dental insurances. Because the tooth was missing prior to the insurance coverage, insurance won't pay. Maybe I'll replace it, maybe not.

> Alistair wrote:
> Idries Shah in his book Learning How to Learn devotes a Chapter to attention where he states that in every human transaction there is to some extent in both or all parties the need to satisfy our need for attention and that a constant awareness of this improves our communication.

How true I've found this to be. How often I seek the limelight, even when I'm supposed to be in the passive role of listener--either by expressing some emotion ("oh, no...I can't believe it!", "how sad," etc). I will try to carry this remembrance through today, especially when I visit a work colleague who's recovering from prostate cancer surgery. I need not 'perform' concern but try to be there with all 3 centers and perhaps enjoy the wine we're delivering to him, if offered.

---

by Alistair

Although aware of site guidelines to avoid posting large sections of copied text it felt right and satisfied my attention needs of giving to submit the entire Chapter 2 On Attention from Idries Shah's, Learning How to Learn, Psychology and Spirituality in the Sufi Way.

It's also interesting to read the reviews of this book on Amazon
http://www.amazon.com/Learning-How-Learn-Psychology-Spirituality/product-reviews/0140195130/ref=cm_cr_pr_top_recent?ie=UTF8&showViewpoints=0&sortBy=bySubmissionDateDescending

Having, I feel gained much from this book and with probably more to gain I was amused by critical reviews from those who I perceive to be 'supermarket seekers' expecting too much too soon from a path that may well be more than lifelong.

Learning How to Learn, Psychology and Spirituality in the Sufi Way, Idries Shah
Chapter 2
On Attention
Characteristics of Attention and Observation

(Copyright text removed)

As Rumi said: 'Do not look at me, but take what is in my hand'.

PS. A root canal filling costs approximately U$D 45, appointments are usually available in 48 hours

Wishing all a profitable & peaceful weekend
Alistair

Attention needs satisfied phew

---

by Harry

My son says that Learning to Learn and Knowing to Know where life changing books for him.

A root canal in the States is at least 10x what you quoted there.

Work Program week beginning 20 June 2011

---

by Gabrial

Dear Seekers:

I resubmit here the long exercise from Mr. Nyland's group, Then, at the end, I transcribe the shorter exercise that hones some of the skills necessary for the long one.

I give you an exercise here that I said I was going to share with you. In the past, I have had interesting results that I attribute to its practice. However, I have not performed it as much as I would like to because of the need to find the conditions that it requires: time (about an hour or more), privacy, silence, and absence of any distracting factors (e.g. extreme temperatures, concerns about something else, illness, etc.)

1- It was my choice to perform a few minutes of meditation (20-25) prior to the start of the exercise. The type of meditation that I practiced (I still do) was one that allowed me to reach a point where I could achieve: freedom of unwanted thoughts, deep and slow breathing, and physical relaxation. In my opinion, the meditation facilitated the proper execution of the exercise. The idea of the meditation prior to the exercise was my own. No one from the group had suggested it. If you do not want to meditate, for whatever reason, at least stay silent a few minutes, relaxing, without placing your thoughts deliberatedly in things that have nothing to do with the exercise.

2- The exercise must be practiced alone, of course. It is more convenient to do it in a room or another internal area of the house (or apartment or warehouse or basement, etc) with the least decorations, appliances, furniture, things such as pictures hanging from the walls, or any other distracting objects. Whenever I could do it in a place such as a corridor, aisle, or a large -not used- room I felt that the results were more effective.

3- You will start with some introspection. You are aware that the exercise that follows is very important for the growth of your soul. Your soul needs to become progressively stronger to the point that it will survive the death of the body with full clarity and free of negative influences. You say to yourself that the exercise about to start consists of three distinct important parts: 1) It will be led by your mind that knows the mechanics of the exercise very well, that is determined and decisive, and that will ensure that the rest of you does the exercise properly. Then, you address your body (talk mentally at your body as if it were a separate entity), and you tell it that it has to comply with the instructions that will come from the mind, and do what the mind tells it faithfully and error free. You pause for a few minutes (less than five) and induce the emotion of great satisfaction by thinking on the major spiritual advancement that you can achieve at this time with the correct execution of the instructions! As soon as you provoke in your self a posiive emotion that you can actually feel, you proceed to start the second phase of the exercise. If you fail to feel any emotion (rather unusual), you should try to restart again until you do feel the emotion. If you still do not, then leave it for another day.

Some conditions are not right!

Some people do it right fron the first time, others as capable and dedicated, need several repetitions.

4- Here comes the practice that has to be iterated several times until you sense that you are doing the exercise correctly, with ease, and fulfillment. It may take you several attempts to be successful. You need to have decided on a physical routine that you are familiar with, and you can practice it repeatedly without memory lapses (i.e. memory of the routine). In my case, I chose warming Karate exercises (the ones before class starts) because I was a Karate student then (1970 circa).

You start doing the movements chosen with almost exasperating slowness (imagine a slow motion movie) . Don't overdo it because it could disrupt your rhythm. Each time you reiterate your routine have the mind recap it quickly as, for example: "Now the body will do the lifting of the right arm, followed by setting it back next to the body, followed by lifting my left arm (etc)" While these movements are going on you must feel as if someone were watching you from some angle of the room you are in. This someone is as it were your Objective I. Also at the end of a cycle that you defined earlier, you need to aspire and believe in that you will create/strengthen your higher inner bodies. This conviction will generate emotions that you should pay attention to. You need to repeat these movements, sensings, and emotional "provocations" several times until you decide that the exercise is completed for the day.

Some people that I know - in addition to the instructions given - keep an intense alternate attention in the little finger ("pinky"), the ring finger, and in the large mound of the thumb on the palm of the hand. It makes the exercise more difficult to do but it is supposed to intensify the results. Some people start with one finger, and add another (as per what I say before) one performance at a time.

Thank you

Gabriel

Here is the shorter exercise that is believed to improve one chances of succeeding with the long version.

The requirements expressed for the long one are also present in this one: be alone, in a site where there are minimal distracting things or decorations, concentration, and intensity. I usually do a medidation exercise to get me in the right attitude.

It is the simplest thing imaginable! You sit down. You begin raising an arm and very, very slowly lowering it until you pat your thigh with the hand. You tell yourself that you will not get up and end the exercise (use prudence here because you do not want to have too many "Oh! I couldn't quite complete the exercise!") until you have a major experience of a paranormal character. This experiencce can manifest as a view "of your own heaven!" One more thing. Please use also the device of believing that you are being observed from some angle in the wall or in the ceiling.

One of Mr. Nyland's coorinator would do this exercise during a couple of hours or more. Good luck.

---

by Judy

I have made two attempts at the long exercise.
The part about being watched from, say, an angle or a corner of the room is new. I usually observe with "little i" being in the head somewhere and what seems to happen is that that is still happening, but I'm adding another kind of division of attention by having this further-distant Observing I.

So I tried the short exercise given at the end.
The paranormal event noted was a mental imaging of myself doing the long exercise, but watched as if from several feet away.
This seems a promising beginning, although I realise absolutely no simultaneity there.
These experiences are not easy to write about. I don't have many of them.

If I may ask a question, Gabriel, it would request further comment on anything you have found useful in your performance of this exercise, especially any clues or techniques or attitudes to assist the "observed from the wall or ceiling or angle of the room."
However, you have already given us so much that further working with what is given will no doubt clarify things for me somewhat. We here are most fortunate that you have shared this gem with us. I hope it will become a weekly, if not daily, exercise for me.

In gratitude,
Judy.

---

by Gururaj

Have tried the long exercise once as of now this week.
There was a slight improvement (compared to my attempt a few weeks ago) in imagining an observer - sometimes as being in front and sometimes on top.

Creating time for the exercise has been tough. You need time to work for timelessness ?

Best wishes to all
Guru

---

by Alistair

The summertime schedule has not left much time to attempt this exercise.

This would be worth repeating in say November
No excuses for Judy:)

I'm also not quite clear about the movements

Is this a series of movements specifically selected by ourselves or have I missed something?

---

by AlbertoB

I'm not sure that the short exercise is easier than the other.
Perhaps i have not understand what to expect for "Paranormal experience". What i do expect is something "indipendent" from my will, and this would be an image or a statement. But it seems quite impossible to obtain something really indipendent from my desires and fears.

Turning on the "long" exercise, another point not clear is what is intended for "physical routine": is this a set of movements only for the arms (mantaining the usual meditative position) or a generic physical activity like, for example, some movement given by mr. Gurdjieff int the 39 series?
Apart from this, i have a direct question for Gabriel: when he says (point 3 of the long exercise) "Your soul needs to become progressively stronger to the point that it will survive the death of the body with full clarity and free of negative influences" is this to mean literally or not?
Or is this a by far too naive question to ask ?

---

by Gururaj

> Alistair wrote:
> Is this a series of movements specifically selected by ourselves or .....?

I have understood the movements as one selected by ourselves and so chose to perform a sort of warm-up yoga routine which I am familiar with, but in as slow a tempo as possible.

Guru

---

by JohnS

With extremely little internet access and time over the past few months, I am posting rather late. However, the short exercise has been extremely enlightening for me: not regarding any paranormal result (the jury is still out on this one, but I can sense what it is implying), but the corner of the room is becoming increasingly important, with regard to detachment: this kind of separation is absolutely crucial to me, as every other task seems wasted without it.

The 'every other task' includes most of my waking life!

John

Work Program week beginning 27 June 2011

---

by Karen

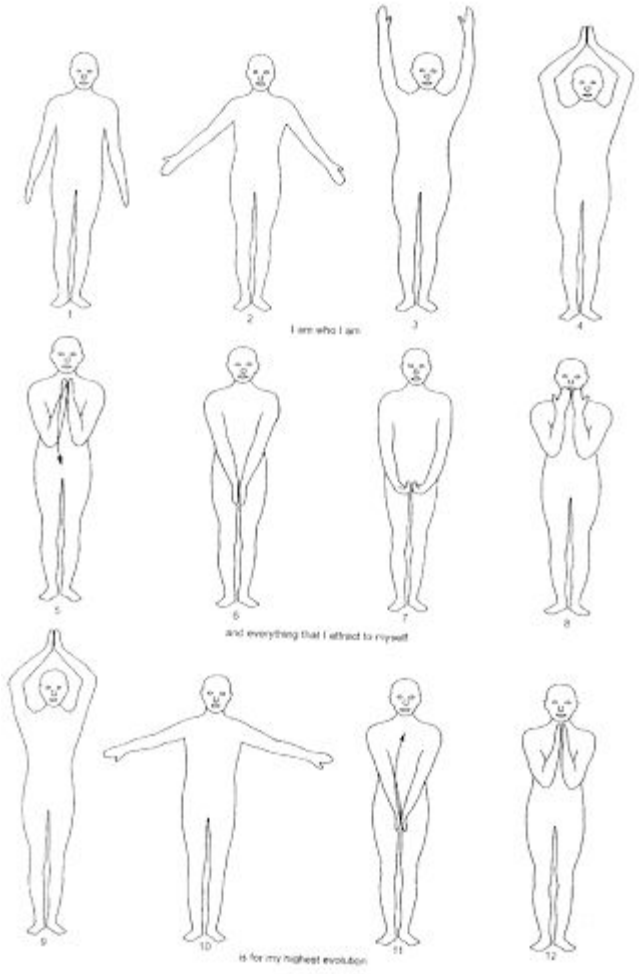
Here is this week's exercise, however it is missing a key component that ties it all together "the movements". I am not sure how to create a link to the .jpg file as the image sits on my harddrive? Anyone know how? Otherwise if you provide you email address I can send it to you, or the other option is to await until Ian is able to post. Kindest regards.

Complete the Gesture Sequence Below 3 times

Begin exercise by saying the following words outloud, while performing the 4 movements, following the inner sequence for each set:



Movements as illustrated below :: sighting "I am who I am" outloud :: inner sequence - sensation of whole presence
I am who I am (sensing - of whole presence)

Movements as illustrated below :: sighting "and everything I attract to myself" outloud :: inner sequence - thinking - clear all mental images and everything I attract to myself (thinking - clear mental images)

Movements as illustrated below :: sighting "is for my highest evolution" outloud :: inner sequence - feeling is for my highest evolution (feeling)

End by saying outloud or innerly "May the results of this work become part of my being" or sound AIEIOIUOA.

Report findings to the group.

---

by Judy

Karen emailed her exercise yesterday. It is a very useful little set of simple movements and I'd recommend anyone interested have them emailed, if we don't work out a way to post them.
I also tried them on Gabriel's exercise of last week and they worked very well.
Interestingly, as someone already mentions, these do only involve arm movements and though done from an upright stance, could easily be adapted to be done from a meditative position.
Oh, that reminds me, I don't think that was a requirement of last week's exercise though. At least I didn't perceive that way. I moved up from the meditation sitting before beginning the chosen set of movements.
The other reason I'm keen for these to be shared is that it would give us all a common frame of reference for any future similar exercises. Do we have one at the moment? If so, I'm unaware of it. For example, it could have been applied last week.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Gururaj

Wonder whether it was a coincidence or not.Since attempting the exercice this week,a few situations occurred in my job where I found myself faced with new challenges unexpectedly.And by managing to handle them i did experience an evolution ,at-least on the professional front.The inner posture,maybe due to the exercise , was of acceptance of the situation.

In the inner work (about mental images) with the second set of the series of movements, was not very clear to me and clarifications are welcome as to what exactly is required.

Thanks, Karen for the exercise - on this site as well as thru' eMail.

Guru

---

by Karen

Interesting experience Guru. Perhaps there is a correlation. This exercise helps me harmonize and temper ego/physical consciousness.

> Gururaj wrote:
> In the inner work (about mental images) with the second set of the series of movements, was not very clear to me and clarifications are welcome as to what exactly is required.Guru

For myself, I usually ponder a question for thinking. e.g. clear all mental images and ask What is moon? or Who is sensing? or whatever question arises for pondering. I've found that its certainly not the easiest to incorporate voice, movements and inner sequence.

The inner work of sensing, feeling, and thinking has always been a bit confusing. It would be wonderful if other fellow seekers could share methods that have worked for them.

Karen

---

by Steve

An interesting exercise. I practiced it in two very different locations. For the first few days in a very busy Paris and the following week in a quiet town of Vezelay in France,

On completion I was left with a sense of reverence and something else the closest which I would describe as an obligation towards maintaining quiet attention. This was more promounced in Vezelay where there is an old Abbey where i found myself going daily to the crypt under the abbey to sit in silence for some time. Just for the record I am not religious in a church going manner so this was out of routine.

Karen , I am curious of the origin of this exercise, was it given by Mr Gurdjieff?
I am curious about the 2nd line:
: sighting "and everything I attract to myself" outloud :: inner sequence - thinking - clear all mental images and everything I attract to myself (thinking - clear mental images)

Everything I attract to myself seems to imply fate? Perhaps not , if I am always mechanical then perhaps 'I' just inhabit a more mechanical world?

---

by Karen

Steve wrote:

> Karen , I am curious of the origin of this exercise, was it given by Mr Gurdjieff?
> I am curious about the 2nd line:
> : sighting "and everything I attract to myself" outloud :: inner sequence - thinking - clear all mental images and everything I attract to myself (thinking - clear mental images)

Steve,

Thank you for your post. Interesting to read that this exercise created an obligation towards maintaining quiet attention for you. For myself, similarily, it aligns the energy bodies and seems to make essence active and ego passive.

The movements of this exercise were gifted to me by Inge Rosa Knott, an instructor of Anatomy & Physiology of the Human Energy System :
http://colourtouch.ca/inge-rosa/

The inner sequencing comes from a most helpful exercise on this site, "Movement #39" :
http://endlesssearch.co.uk/movement_number39.htm

On "and everything I attract to myself"...for myself, this statement has nothing to do with predetermined events or that of the like, but rather an increasing awareness and assuming of responsibility for Self and all energies one attracts to oneself based on ones present level of being. So in a sense, this ties in with your comment, "if I am always mechanical then perhaps 'I' just inhabit a more mechanical world?"

Thank you for sharing your findings

Karen

Work Program week beginning 4 July 2011

---

by JohnS

This exercise is not so much a physical one, but rather a search for the origins of physical movements, and why (or not) we are motivated by them.

Not knowing the source of our actions and decisions gives us the illusion of free will. Without emotional involvement, we do not carry a programme through, as our 'best intentions' are those of a small "I". It is necessary to begin a task in the right order, intentionally starting from the Heart, then getting approval from the brain, and not the other way round - a process almost impossible for us Westerners. The Wisdom of the Heart must be believed in, not as some religious or romantic fantasy, but in the way that the Buddhists and Egyptians and Gurdjieff did, and how the Bible described it when it defined Love (let's not get into that discussion now).
If our actions are based on the Way of the Heart - as the Egyptians called it - then the consequences of our actions are less likely to have those inevitable unforseen circumstances that normally occur, if the order of heart-brain-physical action is followed. Gurdjieff had many methods for strengthening the heart, including prayer, and omitting pity, which has a base of self-indulgence.

The following prayer is only an example, and it only works if the structure and terminology is explained a little:
When I say "I give my heart" this is not giving away your emotional energy, it is an offering, an expansion and a recognition of your innate emotional intelligence.
When I say "to my father and mother", note which parent comes first in your thought, and whether there is a resistance to changing the order.
When I say "my neighbour," imply your neighbour as your fellow searchers.
When I say "my self", mean your true Self, your essence.

In the typical structure of a Gurdjieff prayer:

I, Noumenon, entreat the Higher Powers
Please hear my prayer for the sake of the souls of my father and mother:
I give my heart to.....for the woman that she is, and for what she has done for me.

I, Noumenon, entreat the Higher Powers
Please hear my prayer for the sake of my Neighbour:
I give my heart to.....for the woman that she is, and for what she has done for me.

I, Noumenon, entreat the Higher Powers:
Please hear my prayer for the sake of My Self:
I give my heart to....for the woman that she is, and what she has done for me.

Repeat this triple prayer three times, and end with "In the name of the Father.....Amen"

Any prayer like this works especially well 'on the go" as well as in meditation.

---

by Cassandra

My first resistance is to including my father in the prayer because he was not a good father. But is that a part of the process, to include a denying force in my upbringing in this prayer for wholeness? I am willing to include 'father', but honestly I owe everything to my mother.

---

by JohnS

Yes, Cassandra, feeling the resistive force is the whole point, but just note the feeling and move on. It must be very difficult to think you should even repeat that word again, I imagine, but - easy as it is for me to say, who hasn't been through this kind of history - perhaps it does something small for his soul, in passing.

John

---

by Karen

John Wrote:

> It is necessary to begin a task in the right order, intentionally starting from the Heart, then getting approval from the brain, and not the other way round - a process almost impossible for us Westerners.

Hayden our 6 year old son spoke to the above quote today in his own way in a random conversation as he was doing his summer school work.

He said, "mommy, don't you know that your brain answers for you all the time!" So I asked him to further clarify. He said, "well you have a head brain and a heart brain and they work together. You also have a brain in your stomach. Everything even in your feet is smart."

I asked, "so what happens if someone consults their head brain first and not the heart?" He said thats a problem mommy and its backwards.

Thought it was worth sharing...

Thank you John for this exercise.

Drunvalo Melchizadek, also speaks to this in "Living in the Heart" if anyone is interested.

Off to the mountains

Regards

---

by JohnS

So precise, and so confirming!

Ask your 6-year-old to post the next exercise

---

by Judy

John, regarding the order, some Gurdjieff teachers say what appears to be the opposite.
Mr Willem Nyland, for example, says that "Intellect is King Emotion is Queen"

Would you be so kind as to share the reference material for this? Perhaps I'm mixing up different aspects. Or maybe just being too "western".
I was thinking about it yesterday. Even the words "intentionally starting from the heart", for exaple. Where does the "intention" come from?

Also, Cassandra, if you are able to pray for your father as well as your mother, you may find it very beneficial in a deep sense. It will heal irregularities of the relationship. This prayer for one's parents isn't about superficial things such as whether it is "deserved" or not, I don't think. In a very basic sense, it is a prayer of thanks to them for giving the possibility of life in its present form.
Perhaps it is noteworthy that 12-step programmes stress the importance of praying about any resentments, in particular for any other person involved, no matter how much "disliked". The prayer releaases one from any lingering negativities faster than anything else I know of. It takes one to a slightly higher state in oneself.

Yes, thanks John, for this exercise. The journey from the head to the heart - the longest journey, but a blessed one.

Best to all,
Judy.

---

by Karen

> Cassandra wrote:
> My first resistance is to including my father in the prayer because he was not a good father. But is that a part of the process, to include a denying force in my upbringing in this prayer for wholeness? I am willing to include 'father', but honestly I owe everything to my mother.

Cassandra,

I try to see the layer of resistance between me and what is “on my plate so to speak”. That is a great part of the work. It shows one the separation. It is the energy of the separation and it is through resolving that through transforming that, the awakening occurs.

Karen

---

by JohnS

Thanks for the input: currently my village has been hit by huge winds, large damage, electricity is out for at least another 3-4 days, and I can't get out: all roads are blocked, so I can't charge my laptop - its running out as we speak.
I've got a plan for tomorrow, if I can get to some sparky stuff, I'll reply ASAP

Thanks.

---

by Judy

Hi John,

I've been wondering how you are in the Blue Mountains. The news of the wild storms and outages has been broadcast widely. I hope you have a large wood fire and can keep warm too. Stay safe.

Kind regards,
Judy.

---

by Cassandra

Thanks to all-John, Judy, and Karen for your input. Surely, the ego speaks loudly and first--meaning those small I's resist work and put forth reasons not to work based on likes and dislikes.

Now to the task of saying the prayer.

by JohnS

By way of some requested background:
The Way of the Heart, as I have discovered it, comes via Ischa Schwaller de Lubicz, who, with her husband R>A, were Egyptologists for around 30 years. After studying hieroglyphs for many years, they discovered that it was a precise, intentionally emotional language, as opposed to the rational language of other Egyptian texts. It could not be comprehended by the brain, as the symbols had to be interpreted and incorporated by the Spiritual Witness (Gurdjieff's higher emotional centre)
This led to study of the purpose of each organ in the body, both with animal nature tendencies (ex the liver, seat of heredity and the personality) and higher emotions (the Spiritual Heart, situated near the spleen).
The Way of the Heart is emphasised in order to break down both the duality-only (yes or no) and analytical tendencies of the brain, and base the life around the brain in the heart (as Karen's 6-year-old mentioned), which is the seat of higher intuition (as opposed to animal-level intuition and the confusion with imagination and intuition) - which, naturally, takes training. The interactions and dependencies of all the organs and glands in the body play a precise part, but they must be impartially observed (local self-remembering, as in Judy's 1-4-2-8-5-7 energy flow exercise) to achieve optimum balance, usefulness, health and interaction). If all this process is based around the heart (which is a giver, not a hoarder like the brain), true intuition and not rational thinking will become the basis for the co-existence of body, soul and Spirit.This is not rejecting rationality, but putting it in its place, as Egypt did with its rational language and its spiritual language

The two books by Ischa which illustrate this system in such amazingly erudite detail are "The Opening of the Way" and "Journey into the Light", both published by Inner Traditions, NY. She also has a series of books on Her Bak, the Initiate, which is a more 'historical' view of initiation into the Egyptian temple system.

---

by Alistair

Hasn't Mr Gurdjieff stated that certain tasks are well executed mechanically?

Hayden's first comment draws attention to the need to balance our three lower centres to eliminate our lopsidedness.

Recently attempting to demonstrate the difference between the relative speed of the three base centres by stating that if one places their hand in a fire the thinking centre does not have time to make the observation the fire is hot, my hand will burn, best remove it; one's hand is removed instinctively. The listener commented, but surely the intellectual centre would have told you not to put your hand in the fire in the first place.

---

by Harry

The lower three centers are all mechanical. And they move with the speed of the fuel they burn. This is a machine. Our goal is to move beyond being the machine. I'm not sure that balance is as important as is right use.

---

by JohnS

Balance is also an intention of the heart-based system: I find it beneficial because I have a mental bias, and this is a way of trying to bring my emotional centre into balance with it. It is a constant struggle to do this, but it makes me very watchful over my physical and emotional centres.
I have a minor, permanent injury to my right arm, and it is interesting trying to maintain 'respect' for this arm, as the healthy side of the body tends to want to dominate it, so constant training is needed to bring it up to par. I find that 'emotionally caring' for this arm, rather than mentally examining its capabilities and defects, tends to make it want to work: it wants to get 'emotionally involved' with the rest of the body, rather than be mentally forced to participate through strict exercise, which tends to wane after a while.

---

by Judy

Dear Cassandra,

Are you contributing a suggested Work program for this week please?
Perhaps you could let us know?
If there's a problem or delay, perhaps some may like to choose one of Ian's recently submitted Northeon programs to have a look at?

Kind regards,
Judy.

---

by Gururaj

Cassandra's turn is actually the week starting 18th July - if one refers to the listing made under the thread started on 9th May.
And mine follows that ,thereby starting the cycle all over again.

Yes,Judy, we could focus this week on the latest exercise of the Northeon ... series,unless Ian suggests something else.

---

by Judy

Ah - I see what has happened and it is indeed completely my fault.
Sorry, folks.

Yes, Guru, you are correct. Cassandra's week is next week. According to the list posted in May 8th thread, this week should have been Ian's week. But, when Ian asked me for the roster list by email, I accidentally wrote incorrect order for this week and next week. Again, apologies - especially to Cassandra and Ian.

What we'll do is keep Cassandra's week as is (July 18th), and move Ian's week to July 25th. Ok with you two? This will return us to the order as in thread of May 8th as we begin the second round of exercises.

I'll post our back-up suggested program from the Northeon people very shortly.

Best wishes to all,
Judy.

---

by Cassandra

Hi Judy,

Finally back online. I'll post Saturday night, eastern standard time (U.S.). I assume I use the New Topic tab to post the week's topic? This will be my first time suggesting a topic and am not sure.

Thanks

---

by Judy

Hi Cassandra,

Yes, that's it. The "New Topic" button, then in the subject line is typed "Work Program week beginning July 18, 2011", then away you go!

Kind regards,
Judy.

---

by Steve

Hi John

I am not completely clear on the 3rd line:
I give my heart to.....for the woman that she is, and for what she has done for me.

who or what is "for the woman that she is, and for what she has done for me.' that is refered to each time.

Thanks
Steve

---

by JohnS

Hi, Steve;
This is more an example of a format: it can be either man or woman, but it has several applications:

) To give your heart (in the sense mentioned) as a reminder of someone to whom you should be grateful for generosity, help, or simply gratitude for their perceived being ) To give your heart to someone you would not normally think of giving to, but through duty (ex. a relative, or someone in the Work) - this aims to create a picture of generosity in the subject, so that you feel grateful towards them whereas normally you take them for granted.

John

Work Program week beginning 11 July 2011

---

by Judy

Exercises for week of 11 July 2011

1. Eat all kinds of fresh produce even the kind you don't like.
2. If you find yourself unable to remain neutral in an endeavor, at least imagine the other side in all centers.
3. Choose 3 people you know. Write down what you deem to be their good and bad qualities.

Report your findings, including a specific example if possible, back to the group.

---

by Alistair

Toast to then idiot
I'm tonights idiot.....
maybe ha
20 to midnight vodka party well not quite banquet with Tatari must listen
http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=NWIrSwcZ4aw&feature=grec_index love to all
so much love
professor skridlov tears

---

by Gururaj

Considering fresh produce as raw items,a few times this week, consumed a few fruits and vegetables which were not tasty .But the mind liked it from a health point of view.

Saw in me that the good and bad qualities judgements one makes of a person is coloured by the good and bad they have done to me !

Remembered an Oragean task which asks us to judge persons in the context of considering them for selection to your team for a very difficult expedition.The personal perspective certainly alters.

The link shared by Alistair led to a brief expedition into Gurdjieff/Hartmann music,dervishes and Rumi. Skimming ,really , an ocean of exploration with different centres.

---

by Gururaj

Considering fresh produce as raw items,a few times this week, consumed a few fruits and vegetables which were not tasty .But the mind liked it from a health point of view.

Saw in me that the good and bad qualities judgements one makes of a person is coloured by the good and bad they have done to me !

Remembered an Oragean task which asks us to judge persons in the context of considering them for selection to your team for a very difficult expedition.The personal perspective certainly alters.

The link shared by Alistair led to a brief expedition into Gurdjieff/Hartmann music,dervishes and Rumi. Skimming ,really , an ocean of exploration with different centres.

---

by Judy

Thanks for the link, Alistair. I too enjoyed a brief expedition through its various phases.

In particular, Rudolph Steiner's assertion that the human-being's sensitivity to music is because the tones are already present in the astral body, and so to the extent that one can connect with this/be it etc.....and so forth.
Then a little further on, another master speaks of humanity eventually being uplifted by the octave, whereas today he is mostly only uplifted by the third (as in music); and then eventually he will fully embrace each single tone. (This brought mental associations to Mr Nyland's "3-bodies-diagram" which indeed tells us that current Kesdjan (astral) development is only up to the note "mi" - this would certainly confirm sensitivity to the "third" involving notes doh and mi, as it does.

All fascinating stuff.
The video is quite long, but well worth a look - much grist for the mill, everyone.

Cheers, Alistair.
Judy.

---

by Alistair

Apology for the drunken post, actually given the state at that moment in time the post is relatively coherent. With the slow internet speed here it’s quite a task to download You Tube stuff. This particular piece took in excess of three hours. Due to the download time there is a tendency to replay the clip several times. This was the case during the course of Friday evening. Our Tatar neighbours prepared fresh plov to supplement the roast goose that had been executed the previous day, more on that. The music itself was so enjoyable that just before midnight there arose in me a strong impulse to share this with the group.

The goose must surely have qualified as fresh produce or to be strictly correct should it have been eaten raw? Perhaps not so fresh and possibly executed in part as punishment for killing two and almost killing a third recently born gosling. This two-year old male was the largest and dominant male in the field. Since last week everyone in the close vicinity, humans and geese are enjoying greater peace as the constantly honking goose is no longer. No remorse as it was being terminated.
Although the general consensus was that the goose was very tasty by my own standard I felt it was a bit undercooked, maybe he was just a tough old guy as opposed to many of his offspring eaten during the last year, this being his second year as a parent.
Fresh produce is a fairly normal part of day to day existence in Ukraine especially right now. The aforementioned banquet also included the first ever potatoes grown by us in this garden which were to my taste more enjoyable than the meat but had been cooked in the roasting tray, mmmmmmm. We have giant Zuchinni or locally know as cabachok taking over the garden, very tasty sliced thin covered in flour and fried not so nice raw. Could go on a bit here but better save that post for the cookery site. Being such a normal part of the diet here it's probably appropriate to remember Ansari's first trap; ingratitude in good fortune, we always say grace but maybe a longer pause for gratitude before eating would be appropriate.
No.3 is impossible. My I's don't know each other at all, so what would be the value in my judgement of others and by what I. Will it demonstrate ego? Or is this the trick? three of our own multiplicity of I's? Then there is the problem that each I is either good or bad as some engender remorse others not and maybe the ones that engender remorse shouldn't and vice versa. Back to the old nugget of smoking cigarettes, almost every one causes a tinge of remorse but that I is weak. The I that attempts to assist other doesn't engender remorse, therefore good. Now it feels like Pandora's box is open; the good I's & the bad I's.....
All that said Gururaj's mention of the Orage assessment i.e. those you would enlist for a tough expedition is food for pondering. Does that assume that one is the team leader?
John & Karen, afraid attempts at your exercises were unsuccessful. Not that there was anything wrong with the exercises just that our house is like the YMCA right now, summer guests & couch sufferers needing taken here there and everywhere, plenty chores not least the old water issue. Hoping next week things might quieten a bit and allow time for some concentration practice in the afternoon when the temp will be nudging past +40C. There will then perhaps be an opportunity to back track. The room usually used for any physical exercises is currently a dormitory.
In the next hour or so there will be a good test of my ability to remain serene among a house load of at least semi drunken revellers. To make this post and a few other comms I forewent a trip to the local fish pond where yet again there will be plenty vodka toasts but today felt like peace, serenity and a clean temple with of course the tobacco exception were the order of the day. Always one of the best exercises bearing other unpleasant manifestations with joy.
Haha, just about to post at 22:15 and the phone rings..... two Polish couch sufferers crying emergency, let down by their prospective host two hours north of here, what can one do but say welcome, that's my early night well and truly stuffed with joy

Work Program week beginning 18 July 2011

---

by Cassandra

I am happy to share, what for me is a constant struggle, and that is to replace imagination/day dreaming/fantasy with the simple present. So, anytime I am tempted to have an imaginary conversation about what could have been or what might have been , I stop and say something like: "I would rather know god than this." Or if I am really bold, say :"I am a god, what need have I of that [thought, diversion, etc.]."

---

by Gururaj

A set of MP3 files containing audio of Eckhart Tolle's long talk on the topic "Dimensions of Stillness in human relationships" can be googled and freely accessed on the 'net.

Found them very inspiring and just the right aid to be with the aim suggested by Cassandra this week.

Regards to all,
Guru

---

by Cassandra

Thanks for the supplement, Guru.

---

by Lawrick

I'm constantly nagged by an almost uncontrollable inner dialogue which takes body sensations or unconscious emotions an intertwines images or fantasies into preambles, arguments,monologues in an almost endless commentary on internal or external impressions. It's not enough to wake up to these impostors except they be reconciled with a sincere and determined effort. To interpose a real effort, the use of something personally greater than myself, something Holy, helps create the necessary emotional energy to sustain my effort.

Although I have never used the specific phrases Cassandra suggests, I have used similar affirmations to wake up to the simple present. But of course there is nothing simple about the present, or the ability enter and remain there. However, Cassandra has given us another door this week and that's always a good thing.

Thanks Cass,
Lawrick

by JohnS

True (and great to see you back, Fred!)

I have just been reading this morning yet another book which tells me once again how easy it is to be present, because it is a natural tendency for our harmonious makeup to look for this state, and at the same time so difficult, because we are not in our harmonious state at all. It mentions that the Emerald Tablet aphorism "As above, so below" is not only a reference to the structure of the universe being replicated in our own personal space and makeup, but also to the condition that it only applies fully when the harmony of the Above is also able to be reflected when there is an equally harmonious (receptive) state Below.

How many times do we need to be prompted? Endlessly, it seems.

---

by JohnS

And, as a perfect example:
I was not present when I wrote the above post.

---

by Cassandra

Guru, yes, I'm sure the 'receptive' state is key to any possible hopes of reconciling, but often when the I's are confronted with irritations (especially these!), the simple presence where these annoyances abound is abandoned for some daydream of a 'better' state. As for example, while on vacation now I become irritated with the children's sillyness or my husband's cigarette smoking, I imagine a mate who does not smoke or picture perfect kids. I refuse even the possibility of of the reconciling force. And this seems my constant condition.

---

by Harry

It is very important to understand that three forces always work together. Don't think in terms of "reconciling" as we would normally use the word. Think in terms of + - = Think in terms of the triangle. Every thing that happens, even the husband smoking has a reconciling force or it couldn't exist. And it can easily be seen that silly kids can be both positive and negative and maybe even reconciling to the husband smoking. (That last was a stream of consciousness joke.)

Read Beelzebub's discussion of viewing Earth from Mars with a telescope. (I forget the word he used for the viewing device.) (Tescoano?)

Positive isn't happy. Negative isn't angry. Equalizing isn't uninvolved.

Push. Pull. Don't leave go of the rope or everyone falls down.

A tisket a tasket. . .etc.

---

by Gururaj

IS it also true that when we set along on this path and profess to seek,that obstacles either arise or we become more sensitive to them?

Are we tested by life ,so to say ?

These issues are dwelt upon in the article by Hugh Shearman , of the theosophical school.
http://www.katinkahesselink.net/other/shearman43.html

My 'me' is quite bothered right now about an issue at the office front and this perspective might help in 'reconciling up ' rather than take away my energy.

Further another of Hugh Shearman's ponderings on the topic " A cool view " (supportive of self-remembering,though he does not use those terms), in my opinion is also excellent.
http://www.katinkahesselink.net/other/shearman3.html

---

by Judy

Cassandra,

Maybe you could replace the imagination with an exercise of your choice in transforming suffering. There are many of these, some excellent ones on our site here - for example The Heptachord of Suffering. There is a search bar on the Gurdjieff exercises page which will bring up lots of them.
Sometimes, though, in the heat of an emotion, you may want something faster. Then The Serenity Prayer or The Holy Equation Prayer could be chosen (or one of your choice of course) until calmness is restored.
And, if one can accept the suffering by observing it face-to-face, turn it perhaps into intentional suffering even, then much Work is done at the same time. Of course, this rapidly becomes the method of choice, because when one does this, suffering ceases to be suffering in the usual sense.
What is not so simple is to remember to do any of this when the heavy energy (eg irritation) is at its highest. Do it in hindsight even. It all helps.

Best,
Judy.

---

by Harry

Everything happens in the only way it can.
My being attracts my life.
I want to replace "life" with the Work.

So you have a situation at work. If you think you can do anything about it, you can't. You can only do what must be done. So the best attitude is to remain passive. (I don't mean negative passive, but meditation type passive.) Work. If you Work in that situation then the work situation will happen as it should.

I once walked into work in the morning expecting to lay myself off. There was no money left and no prospect of finding any. To face this situation I Worked as much as I could. Strangely I received a call from an associate that morning. He was looking for a way to accomplish something for his organization and had money to make it happen. From giving myself a pink slip at 8 AM I went to having funding for two years by noon. I did nothing. I let it happen. Two years later, though, I did lay myself off permenantly.

---

by Gururaj

Wise counsel. Thanks ,Harry.

Neither be positive active nor negative passive .Just try being meditative neutral.That shall be my mantra.

Fits in well with the next week task.

---

by Lawrick

> Cassandra wrote:
> I am happy to share, what for me is a constant struggle, and that is to replace imagination/day dreaming/fantasy with the simple present. So, anytime I am tempted to have an imaginary conversation about what could have been or what might have been , I stop and say something like: "I would rather know god than this." Or if I am really bold, say :"I am a god, what need have I of that [thought, diversion, etc.]."

Cassandra I am continually reminded of Ian's injunction that contact with the body is always the simplest way to remember yourself. For what it's worth.
Lawrick

---

by Cassandra

I very much appreciate everyone's input on this, especially the emphasis on facing and dealing with what presents itself. These may be irritations, but there is nothing else for me to do, really, except to deal with these. As Judy and Fred suggested, using one of many exercises once entangled, preferably before this state arises--And Harry's example of 'working meditatively, not negatively' rather than insisting on my way--this is great.

In terms of relations at the office, a couple of weeks ago, I nearly went to someone's office to tell them off, that is to say, I felt my authority was being disregarded and my position disrespected.

Luckily, I did not, and the situation resolved itself. Or rather, I resolved to try and deal with someone I don't like. But as it turned out, this person is probably leaving the project for a much better position. I'm certain I would have caused bad feelings and created much tension among several people by voicing my feelings. I still don't like this person's personality, but I feel a sort of reconciling force was allowed in.

Work Program week beginning 25 July 2011

---

by Judy

We have a program from Northeon this week.
It is one they had for June 26th this year.

1. Make an aim for whatever you would do. Try not to expect so much of the result.
2. Endure the holy denying creatively by visualizing that you are ingesting it. Imagine it will fuel your becoming.
3. Watch your words carefully today. Observe as your preconceptions or lack thereof create your world. What reality exists behind that veil of illusion?
4. Direct your attention to your reading habit. What do you read? Why? How does it affect you?
5. As you go about the day be aware of the sensations through the feet. Watch what happens to the sensations moment by moment. Observe what happens without mental concepts or stories. Be curious about sensations, thought, mental formations.
6. Sacrifice an illusion today. Do you have a choice of what if anything fills the void?

---

by Harry

If you sacrifice an illusion, do you really want to replace it? Or do you want to see what the reality is?

---

by JohnS

Long discussion today with a friend on illusion, ad how to get beyond it, prompted by her feeling that everything she sees and feels is 'not quite real'. It led to the limitations of our understanding, and how difficult it is because of this to replace the hidden state with the 'reality' around us. We talked about developing the 6th sense, how to replace imagination with intuition (someday), and falling back on a sense of presence being the only solution, partly because it has a feeling that comes with it.

The talk ended with us once again discussing illusory things (social stuff), but it felt for both of us that the nagging fight had to continue, through more and more illusory steps, before we could even begin to replace illusion with anything but more of the same.

---

by Gururaj

"2. Endure the holy denying creatively by visualizing that you are ingesting it. Imagine it will fuel your becoming."

An ad on TV helped here .It showed,in reverse, the dark ink-like colour (which normally spreads out from a black tablet dropped in a clear glass of water) merging back into the tablet leaving the water sparklingly clear.
Whenever , on a few occassions , found self engulfed in a heavy denying state,on the deep in-breath imagined all the dark negativity merging back into a dense point in the solar plexus area.On the out-breath this point burnt up with a bright light pouring out in all directions in the body.
At the least this stalled the deepening of the denying feeling.

"4. Direct your attention to your reading habit. What do you read? Why? How does it affect you?"
This was experienced -
Reading the newspaper - Mechanical.Read more out of habit,while sipping the morning tea.Shallow experience.Avid feeling at the end of it.
Reading a work book - only if done very slowly ,repeatedly,while pausing and trying to ponder/sense the import of the words in my own experience.With this intentional effort,sometimes valuable insights occur which would have got glossed over if one read at normal speed.

---

by JohnS

In theory, Gururaj, I would never need to buy another Work book: I am currently reading one which I have read at least 6 times before, and each time it is like a new book. But I am still re-reading passages 3, 4, or more times.

Work Program week beginning 1 August 2011

---

by Gururaj

(1)Respond to impressions , including your your own automatic thought forms,from the love for being present and no longer from the vantage point of personality.

Quoting Madame De Salzmann from Reality of Being - " This requires a conscious effort at the moment of the impression.And it requires a definite feeling,a feeling of love for being".

In case of situations which are always triggering negative emotions in us automatically,it may help to dwell beforehand about the accumulated pain/memories/small "I"s behind each situation and visualise a more creative response when the same causes actually occur.
Experience and share the new 'taste' in sensation,feeling and mind.

(2) As we start on another cycle ,review where you are from the Work perspective and renew your vows to move deeper.
With best wishes to all
Guru

---

by Gururaj

The feeling of love for being was, if at all, present all too fleetingly. Hence the 'taste' was of the usual reactive state.

Only on one occasion, I watched out for a typical negative triggering and related with my younger brother differently thereby preserving a somewhat balanced state physically and emotionally.

Somehow ,of late ,its been all quite on the Posting front to this OLG.I hope all are OK .(healthwise)

In case the task has not been somehow "Workable", I wonder whether the two to three days I took just before August 1st was too short a time to do justice.

On my part the next time around I would'nt like to succumb to the disease of delaying.

Wonder too whether the delay and the quality aspects can be minimised by working in a team of at-least 2.

Regards to all,
Guru

---

by Judy

Hello Guru,

Yes, these are interesting times. Yes it has been quiet, but that happens from time to time. Thanks for the good wishes. I am well, thank you. Hope others the same.

Ian has thrown open the whole repertoire worked over the past seven years, and now it is up to us what we do with it. It is of course a challenge. And it is early days. Personally, I think there is progress, in that we have individually chosen to take up the challenge. Jacob Needleman, in his synopsis of "In Search of the Miraculous", reminds us that we do in fact have the great knowledge. How often complacency sets in and I forget the wonder of those many early "aha" moments of unforgettable wonder. I take it for granted. Perhaps it is human nature. Sogyal Rinpoche, when asked how to live the enlightened life, said, "Eat when you eat; sleep when you sleep." So presence is much involved.

Your program instigated some pondering on my part. I realised that "the love of being" has to be consciously evoked often, very often, so that it eventually becomes more frequently known to me. So it is very much a work in progress. Meantime, perhaps I can actually use the usual old reactive state by reading about "love of being" - just keep working, really. More familiar terms are self-remembering, self-observation maybe.
Nothing "unworkable" at all, Guru.

Regarding preparation times, personally I need a couple of weeks to present something even remotely new/original. Even then I'm usually not as content as when I re-produce (perhaps with a little personal perspective) a favourite exercise taken from the past seven years or so, or perhaps from earlier groups. A few days seems to be adequate for this. Additionally, others are ore likely to have familiarity with it as well.

Of course, if you wish to try working with another, go for it. Earlier it was felt, correct me if I'm wrong, somebody please, that perhaps online is a little unwieldy for the "Triad" to actually consist of three people. As mentioned, it is totally up to us what we make of this opportunity.

Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by Cassandra

I believe Gurdjieff said a lot about the waste of energy that goes into talking, commenting to simply fill the often uncomfortable silence. For me it is easy to respond in situations from the I that would comment and gossip about situations, fueling the negative exchanges of energy. Negativity, is by the way, very prominent, seems to fuel many of my exchanges with others, often in subtle ways.

Can I respond from the love of being present, I wonder, because I often do not have a love of the present. Rather, the near continual stream of commentary on things would pull me out of the present and into an imaginary conversation that is negative.

However, I notice attempts on my part to resist the empty chatter. This imparts a feeling of liberation and authentic power, just this simple thing of not engaging in a negative exchange, for example, "It's so hot today; when will we ever get rain! Must be global warming--no global warming is a hoax, etc."

Renewing vows to move deeper include taking up morning meditation again and commenting less.

Guru, thanks for the exercise

---

by Karen

Guru,

Impressions arrive, and various tapes are brought forward playing the same ol 'recordings' over and over again until my universe makes a conscious effort to recognize them, even locate the learning aspects and rewrite and re-record.

Ah, but to increase the gap in which impressions arrive. To have a chance to catch them, to have a choice to be able to respond from a higher place...this is one of my goals in the work.

"from the love for being present" every playground and interaction becomes a platform to work. The focussed intent to always come from the love for being present is powerful. Much gratitude.

The 'taste' becomes lighter, less dense and more freeing. However, many "i's" are resistant. The energy does not want to transform or leave. This is where additional efforts to locate the memories and players behind each situation are required. To move through such density is liberating. It is very much worth the effort, even if the reward is seemingly not visable.

Thank you Guru

In all I am, in all that is Karen

---

by Gururaj

Thanks, Judy for covering all the bases , with ref. to my post.

On reading the other posts expressing their aim was "love for being present",it seemed to me that that is more 'Workable' than "love for being".

Thanks , for your sharing,Karen and Cassandra [I do not have the Chutzpah {the broader,modern meaning to be taken} of Lawrick to address you as Cass !].

Guru

---

by Cassandra

Guru, no need to stand on formalities! 'Cass' or 'Cassie' are both fine.

I also need to keep this in mind, what Karen mentioned: "It is very much worth the effort, even if the reward is seemingly not visable."

Work Program week beginning 8 August 2011

---

by Harry

Apply the first conscious shock at least once a day for the next week.

Remember yourself. And then report here. Don't judge. Don't explain. Just describe remembering yourself. If you can report each day so much the better.

If you do not have the feel for self remembering, the apply self observation and report similarly.

---

by Gururaj

Early this evening, on sensing a recurrence of the (flu) fever of the earlier two days, I decided to rest a while.
My wife (not knowing the reason) chided me as she needed my support .

Yours truly, roused himself up and set about doing some chores.Initially there was an internal grumbling and a mild reproachful statement to my wife that my fever has recurred.But just then remembered a Buddhist monk's words in reply to a question as to what is enlightenment.He says - oh, its just eating when you eat and walking when you walk.
This remembrance made me give up my internal chatter and mindfully attend to the chores on hand.A certain peaceful state resulted for a few minutes.(I could observe a little inner gloating which ,I reckon, hastened the departure of the state).

Regards to all,
Guru

---

by Karen

I am grateful to be alive here and now! I am grateful to be...

---

by Cassandra

I haven't learned to self observe but remembering I think I can do. When I observe the machine, I see clearly the tendency to talk, to give an opinion when none was asked for. And again, observing that most exchanges with people are in negative terms although this passes for the positive. These exchanges don't come from the Heart (as suggested in an earlier excercise) but from the shallower part of our existence, from the myriad roles or 'Is' we display. Erving Goffman's (sociologist) Presentation of Self in Everyday Life may be an interesting read on this.

For me, the task is to break through this every once in a while.

---

by Harry

You have described some observations. But self remembering comes later. You need to BE present in the present. To not allow the small i's to babble. Observation let's you see things. But don't take it to that next step. Don't judge that the communication is in negative terms even though we think it is positive. That may well be true. But just observe what is happening.

---

by Steve

I have had some experiences of coming to myself and feeling a connection to the moment and it seems to 'life' where there is a sense of stillness and quietness and just being. This sate is not maintained for long but sometimes I seem to be able to come back to it throughout the day. At other times , when tired - or when I felt I was fighting an infection I had quite the opposite experience, a chaotic feeling, self remembering was momentary connected to, it felt full of effort and there was an intense emotional desire to reject the state as if felt too much effort - as if I had to try and 'hold the moment' there was intense desre to let the mind ramble on with associative thought or even concentrated thought as long as the focus was external rather than on self and as long as it involved mostly 'thinking' - the resistance to 'being' was almost too chaotic to bear.

---

by Judy

Harry wrote:

> Apply the first conscious shock at least once a day for the next week.

Various ways of doing this have been the quintessance of Work for me for a long time. When working solidly, there are often approximately ten attempts daily.

Sorry to be so late with this, folks. I've had little to no computer-time for ten days or so, owing to outside committments.

To continue... Even so, how refreshing to have the experiencing of the first conscious shock as the main target for the week's suggested program!
Thanks, Harry.

What I did do, which was a little different, last week, was that on Saturday, for the duration of a long drive south to a funeral, I practised the "I Am" exercise for pretty much the whole way. This could not help but to make the simple graveside funeral a memorably beautiful experience. Really it was a memory and a celebration of a remarkable lady's 96 years on Earth. She was a true pioneer; a German immigrant who did much for her community. Rest in peace, Great-Aunt Elsgret (Elsbeth Margret).

On another topic, I agree very much with Harry's comment that if anyone doesn't have a method of self-observation/self-remembering, then we should most definitely talk about this.

I, for one, simply cannot think of anything more vital to the Gurdjieff Work. In fact, the increased awareness (and it is truly increased awareness, not just alertness) of these quintessential practices have kept me on this particular path for three decades. They are experiential. We have assurances in that occasionally in life they happen spontaneously. But to evoke them regularly is vital.

Best wishes to all,
Judy.

---

by Cassandra

Harry,

I meant to say I can observe but not remember in the Work sense. I have been able to observe myself twice when I didn't get the response I wanted in a one one one conversation. Both involved my children's schooling. Important for me is the aftermath of such exchanges, what I do with the somewhat unpleasant energy that arose in the exchange. These people weren't mean or bad, just didn't react how I wanted them to. I see clearly the chance for coating the higher being. The 23rd Psalm is a good mantra for helping with this, or a walk around a the block.

---

by Harry

Being in a situation where you are likely to have an irritation is a good place to begin. Go in "working". Go in with a reconciling attitude. Don't allow yourself to be an ordinary life self.

I remember once my boss invited me to lunch. I was not a favored lunch guest. So as we walked to the restaurant I worked. I am. I wish. I can. Breathing. Walking with purpose. And I continued this work effort throughout the beginning of the lunch. I knew what my boss was going to say and do before he did it. I was not trying to accomplish anything. I was simply following G's advice "do not do what can't be done". In this case the agenda was his. By being in a totally reconciling mode this "event" played out in a much different way than either of us would have anticipated. Because I was not the "self" he expected me to be. So he couldn't be the self he wanted to be. And I continued to work all the way back to the office. None of those negative wellings surged up.

Hope this example is something you can apply.

---

by Cassandra

Harry, very much so. Thank you.

Work Program week beginning 15 August 2011

by Alistair

Given the relatively poor response, including my own, to Harry's excellent exercise of last week we shall continue the same for a further seven days.

As a supplement herewith is an extract from 'An Introduction to Gnosis', by Samael Aun Weor on the subject of Tattwas of which you all may be aware; nevertheless the basic information follows
Any comment would be greatly appreciated

Wishing us all a profitable week ahead
Alistair

Tattvas
The study of the vibrations of the ether (Tattvas) is indispensable. Remember that business, love, health, etc. Are controlled by cosmic vibrations. If you know the vibratory laws of life, if you know the Tattvas, you will be able to obtain much money. Remember that money in itself is not good or bad; everything depends on its use. It is good if you use it for good, evil if you use it for evil. Obtain much money and use it for the good of humanity.
There are seven Tattvas that you should learn to use to succeed in life. No Gnostic student should live in misery. It is necessary that you know the names of the seven Tattvas. These names are Sanskrit terms. It is possible that it might be somewhat difficult to learn these names but remember that studying is well worth it to succeed in life.

The Names of the Tattvas

Akash is the principle of ether
Vayu is the etheric principle of the air
Tejas is the etheric principle of fire
Prithvi is the etheric principle of the element earth
Apas is the etheric principle of water

There are two secret Tattvas named Adi and Samadhi that vibrate during the Aurora (dawn) and are excellent for internal meditataion (Ecstasy or Samadhi is achieved with them). We will not expand on these Tattvas now because they are useful to advanced students only.

Tattwic Timetable
The vibration of the Tattvas begins at sunrise. Each Tattva vibrates for twenty-four minutes in a period of two hours. The first Tattva that vibrates is Akash, followed in succession by Vayu, Tejas, Prithvi, and Apas. Two hours later, Akash vibrates again and the succession of Tattvas in the same order is repeated. The Tattvas vibrate night and day.

It is necessary to know the hour of sunrise. Bucheli's Astrological Yearbook is one of the calendars that marks the time of sunrise in each country of Latin America. Some daily newspapers (especially in the United States of America) and magazines indicate the time of sunrise. Galvan's Calendar is also good for this purpose. Those who would like Bucheli's American Yearbook (in Spanish) can request it from the following address: Mrs Elly de Buchelli, Casilla 1880, Santiago de Chile, S.A.

*Editor's Note: Samael Aun Weor wrote this section based upon the investigations of other occultists. Upon further investigation of his own, he later wrote that such timetables are discordant, and that "the best Tattwic day-timer is the one from nature." (Occult Medicine and Practical Magic, pgs 28-29, Thelema Press edition).

Properties of the Tattvas

Akash
Akash is exclusively good for meditation. We advise you to pary a lot during this time. Do not have business appointments during this time because you will inevitably fail. This Tattva causes us to make very serious mistakes. If you work during this period, you should then be very careful. (Artists should abstain from working in Akash). Everythingthat begins with Akash will fail. Akash is the Tattva of death.

Vayu
Everything that is velocity and motion corresponds to Vayu, the principle of air. Winds, air, aerial navigation, etc. are related to Vayu. During this period people enjoy speaking ill about their fellowmen, lying, stealing, etc. Usually airplane accidents happen during this period. Suicides are stimulated by this Tattva. We advise you not to marry during this period because your marriage will be of a short duration. All kinds of simple and fast businesses are very good in Vayu, but businesses that are complex and of a long duration result in failure. It is good to carry out intellectual works during this period. The great yogis mentally manipulate this Tattva and use it intelligently when they want to float in the air.

Tejas
Tejas is hot because it is the etheric principle of fire. During the period in which this Tattva is active we feel more heat. You can bathe in cold water in Tejas and you will never catch a cold. Never argue with anyone in Tejas because the consequences can be serious. You should utilise the time of Tejas to work intensely. Do not marry during Tejas because you will have constant quarrels with your partner. The most terrible explosions and accidents happen in the period of the Tattva Tejas.

Prithvi
This is the Tattva of success in life. If you want to succeed in business, do it in Prithvi. If you want to have good health, eat and drink in Prithvi. Marriages accomplished in Prithvi are happy for life. Every party, lecture, business or appointment done in Prithvi will be a total success. Prithvi is love, charity, benevolence.
Apas

Apas is the principle of water and is the opposite of Tejas (fire). This Tattva is marvellous for the purchase of merchandise. It is marvellous for business and you will be able to earn much money if you know how to take advantage of this Tattva. Buy lottery tickets in Apas; journeys by water are good in Apas. Rainfalls that begin in Apas tend to be very lengthy and heavy. The Tattva Apas works in concentrating and attracting.
Remember that you need to know the exact time of sunrise to be guided by the Tattvas. Always have a good wristwatch or pocket watch and take advantage of the Tattvas in practical life.

Exercise
Sit at a table facing the Orient, rest your elbows on the table and proceed in the following manner:
Introduce the thumbs of your right and left hands into your ears. Cover your eyes with the index fingers, cover your nostrils with your middle fingers, and seal your lips with your ring fingers and little fingers.

Inhale slowly counting one to twenty. It is necessary to remove your middle fingers to inhale and exhale. But during the retention of your breath, the middle fingers should hermetically seal your nostrils. It is necessary for you to try to see the Tattvas with the Third Eye during the retention of your breath. The Third Eye resides between the two eyebrows. At the beginning you will see nothing, but after some time you will be able to see and recognise them by their colours. Akash is black and its planet is Saturn. Vayu is greenish-blue and Mercury is its planet. Tejas is red as fire and its planet is Mars. Prithvi is golden yellow and the Sun is its planet; it is also influenced by Jupiter. Apas is white and Venus and the Moon are its planets.

May peace be with you!

---

by Harry

I am compelled to say something. Self observation and the subsequent self remembering are a key to Work. The first conscious shock needs to be applied for the octave to move forward. It is ok to do exercises where we manipulate physical experiences which "remind" us. But this isn't a conscious shock. It is an aid.

If you don't understand self observation or self remembering, then I think we need to discuss this topic. Because they are activities that should be a part of daily life. I am self remembering as I type this. I am conscious of my eyes. My fingers on the keyboard. My breathing. The words coming from my brain aren't being thought about. I am aware of my posture. I am aware of what my body is doing. I breath. I breath. I drop down and push "submit". . .

---

by Cassandra

It would be very helpful to have some more discussion on self remembering.

---

by JohnS

Yes, I think it would be very beneficial, especially the progressive differences between self-observation and self-remembering.
Another essential aspect is acquiring the energy to do it. I know self-remembering itself stores energy, but how to continually create the Terror of the Situation in order to fully realise the urgency??

---

by Harry

O described self observation as taking pictures of oneself. Many of the exercises that we are given early on help us to get moments of observation that we wouldn't normally get. The one that I found helpful early on was any time I walked through a door to observe myself as if something were above me like the sun observing me. And then try to keep that observation going as long as possible. Some of the walking exercises also help with this.

I have had the thought that some of the seemingly inane things we were taught as youngsters were observation exercises that got filtered down to the general populace. As a young man I was obsessed with "step on a crack break you momma's back". But of you think of it as an exercise the emotion goes away and an opportunity for observation opens up.

These observations begin to string together and create an opening in a center. This then gives you more power in situations. We've all had deja vu experiences. Self remembering becomes very similar to that. It is remembering the taste of an event and stepping outside of the event. Working. I've quoted Tom Rapp before: "We are all prayers of action on our way to God." That is what we want to become prayers of action. Working is a prayer of action. It is coming into that magnetic center and holding it present during a given situation. Nicoll calls this transformation.

The point in both is objectivity. It is not to get what we want. It is not to make anything happen. It is to keep ourself from doing what can't be done. How often in our lives to do we try to do what can't be done.

Yes I know that is one of those G statements that stick with you. But those are the best aphorisms. I once bought a book of poetry simply because of the title. "All gods must learn to kill." What a thought worth pondering.

---

by Gururaj

ONE offshoot for me of this week's 'supplementary' task was to become curious about the solar pattern of rise, set and daylight duration thru' the year at the city where I live, Bangalore.

Amidst the hustle and bustle of life in a crowded, once green and open city, I have rarely seen the sun at dawn and dusk.

Further, restarting a morning meditation routine has been of some help in getting back to 'Work' after a very listless period.

Regards to all,
Guru

---

by Alistair

Remembering to walk when we walk, wash when we wash, eat when we eat but don't vacillate, don't day dream and concentrate on the task. This is objective.

---

by Cassandra

> Alistair wrote:
> don't day dream and concentrate on the task. This is objective.

This is what I typically do, day dream, rather than to strive for the objectivity mentioned by Harry. If a good feeling comes about, I give in to it by trying to enhance it with day dreaming. To remain objective, even in the face of warm, fuzzy emotions is the aim. At church, for instance, the temptation is strong to become attached to emotions that certain hymns evoke.

Better would be to watch even that emotion, which, when I was younger seemed to be the end, the god after which I searched, but I realize now that it is nothing. Something lies behind that.

Work Program week beginning 22 August 2011

---

by Judy

I would like to share the first exercises given in Mr Willem Nyland's series of Introductory Seminars, from listening to the tapes of same.
What follows is taken from my own notes of six years ago, so I take full responsibility for any errors.
We are joining the seminar after the theory of the creation/uncovering of the objective “little i”. We imagine and believe that it exists, even though in the beginning it may not. However, it becomes “real” when the impressions are received directly through awareness in the application of the first conscious shock.

“(a) Say often “I am now” as a mantram.
This is useful for a better state – especially physical.
Meanings:
“I” - the relationship between man and higher levels of being, up to and including God as you understand Him.
“Am” is your amness, your existence as a being, living unconsciously on this earth.
“Now” is said to bring you to the present moment because you want to be free from space and time.

I am now
Now I am
Am I now
I now am.

(b) Collect with the Breath:
Inhale slowly – feel the life-giving air - say “I”, as deeply as you can. (This is your connection to everything higher).
Exhale slowly – then say “Am”, while you acknowledge your amness.
Then as you recover from the breath, say “now”, crisply, to bring you to the present moment.
Do this cycle at least three times.
Additional considerations and meanings:
“I” means
You implore to be affected and receiving energy from a higher source and from higher centres.
You dedicate yourself to the possibility of further growth
You remember what life is.
And you remember where it came from and what quality it is.
With “am”
You are down to earth.
“Am” is a vibration in your body, and when it is done correctly, the solar plexus engages and this “am” is actually a sound/reverberation in your chest
And it makes you realise that that is what you are, existing on earth, and you realise at the same time that you are trying to make this connection between “I” and “am”, because you wish to wake up.”

Note: It is recommended that the “Draining Exercise” be done prior to these exercises whenever possible to ensure maximum relaxation. It can be found as “Work Program Week Beginning 20 February 2006.”

Experiences, findings and comments are most welcome. There is a need to get serious about life and about what is to become of us. Isn't this what brings us here?
I wish us all a hard-working and fruitful week.

---

by Lawrick

I've tried this exercise twice now, both times using the draining exercise and a variation of same. The inbreath I and the outbreath Am have the annoying habit of becoming habitual, an imposter, posing as awareness but in fact providing nothing more than background music form my sleep. I must continually sense the body without which nothing happens.

The "NOW" aspect of the exercise is quite new and appears to serve as a shock. But when to apply the now? Any ideas? How strange that if I command the "NOW" immediately following the outbreath, the command echos from my solar plexus. If, on the other hand, I generate the "NOW" after the inbreath, the command seems to originate in my head. Somewhat confused here but perhaps more work will clarify the situation for me.

But the "NOW" command is an interesting addition to this old companion and I believe will unlock a few doors as the week progresses.

regards,
Lawrick

---

by Gururaj

The pattern which I have settled upon is to out-breathe in two stages and say 'now' (internally) alongwith the second stage of the outbreath.The first stage of the outbreath is the automatc reversal after the inbreath whereas the second stage is due to a conscious extention aided somewhat by a further relaxing of the muscles involved .I found this to be the least disruptive way of breathing while at the same time co-ordinatedly intoning I AM NOW.

With "I" ,i evoke feeling (of relatedness between the individual and the Absolute) with "AM" the body is sensed and with "NOW" the mind is centered.

Thanks ,Judy, for this gem of an aid.

Guru

Work Program week beginning 29 August 2011

by Ian

(from a programme by Paul Beidler, March 16, 1980)

Exercise - To be practical whenever it is remembered.
- Neutralize every thought - for example, thoughts about the future diverted to thoughts about the past =(Now). Also vice versa.
- Neutralize every feeling - for example, negative feelings about a person diverted to positive feelings. Also vice versa.
- Neutralize every action - for example, rapid movements diverted to slow movements. Also vice versa.

Objective
- To consciously reverse/neutralize our perceptions. Also practice the previous Octave Exercises at least once a day, but reduce the time span to the observed attention span and cover it with a prayer like attitude. Eliminate sight impressions from "la" and revise "si" to eating natural leaf, or rose hips, or twig. Continue pondering upon what could be sacrificed when it becomes necessary.

Meditation
- Morning only. Practice octave exercises and add "idea" of sacrifice.
- Evening only. Ponder on the nature of your perceptions, its inaccuracy, its ficle unreliability.

***

Note - Here are the Octave Exercises referred to above (this exercise was given by Paul Beidler in February 1980):

DO - Endure your situation - whatever it is as you find it, endure it as creative suffering.
RE - Endure your thoughts about your situation through process of observing and accepting - do not dhange - accept.
MI - Endure your feelings about the situation - do not complain but endure and suffer.
FA - Occupy your physical body and begin sensing it.
SOL - Inflate your body with sacred air. Breath - let the air reach into all areas of the body by way of the rays of sensing - add to this reception the sense of smell impressions.
LA - Fill the body with impressions, especially touch and sight - open up and let it pour in. (note - as suggested above, remove sight)
SI - Eat your meal - feed the body - one part of the earth eating another part of the earth. (note - as suggested above, eat natural leaf, or rose hips, or twig)
DO - Beginning of Being Octave - transfers accumulation of higher energies to higher being bodies.

by JohnS

This has been a very hard exercise for me: I have trod the fine line between active suffering and the mediocre role of the Victim. I know one involves observation and the other is totally subjective, but observing the inevitable slip from one back into the other is frustrating: what automatic power habits and small desires have!
I thought about 'just accepting' before I made a decision whether or not to force a situation, to try and improve everyone's lot at work : should I do it, or just accept the current circumstances? Well, in a calm moment I did it, and I think it was a 'good' decision, although after it was done I began to see, of course, the inevitable set of new circumstances that the new situation will carry with it. So, if the decision-making was not conscious enough, then nothing will have really changed, except for a slightly different view of mediocrity.
"Suffering" is sacrifice, I can see: sacrifice the small desires for the larger ones, the higher ones, and focus so constantly on the Big Picture that it becomes the permanent goal.
There's a big leap waiting here: another octave to begin. I haven;t yet been able to do it by this reverse future and past method, as I find they are basically the same, connected by habit: future imagination is just a repeat category of past pleasures.
I'll try again.

---

by Harry

G: "The only thing we can sacrifice is our own suffering."

John, I think the idea of sacrificing for higher ideals is moving away. Because it means you, your 'i' has already decided what better, higher is. And if it is making that decision, how can you trust it?

Do something totally selfless. Or as selfless as we can be. What is the difference?

---

by Gururaj

Practiced the octave exercise a few times this week but without the eating part included in the same sequence .How does one eat when it ai'nt meal time,thought I .And was not 'awake' to do it while eating.

One instance was satisfying.

Yesterday after a long,hectic day ,as I set the mobile alarm to wake up after another 5 hours,the automatic suffering thoughts occured - brooding about lack of sleep.But instead of just trying to go off to sleep,I rested awhile on the bed and neutralised the negative thoughts with an affirmation that the organism can renew itself quickly .Sensing and relaxing the body,I centered it with last week's "I am now"" exercise .(Yes ,this can become one useful routine).It was a surprise in the morning to wake up without the alarm and without the expected grogginess. A higher octave touched ?

Noted John's observation ,and Harry's caution too, about desiring a higher state (and putting the efforts accordingly) decided by our usual "I". But is'nt some "I" , maybe a work "I" ,needed to consciously choose the path less trodden ?

---

by Judy

Ian wrote:

> Note - Here are the Octave Exercises referred to above (this exercise was given by Paul Beidler in February 1980):
>
> DO - Endure your situation - whatever it is as you find it, endure it as creative suffering.
> RE - Endure your thoughts about your situation through process of observing and accepting - do not dhange - accept.
> MI - Endure your feelings about the situation - do not complain but endure and suffer.
> FA - Occupy your physical body and begin sensing it.
> SOL - Inflate your body with sacred air. Breath - let the air reach into all areas of the body by way of the rays of sensing - add to this reception the sense of smell impressions.
> LA - Fill the body with impressions, especially touch and sight - open up and let it pour in. (note - as suggested above, remove sight)
> SI - Eat your meal - feed the body - one part of the earth eating another part of the earth. (note - as suggested above, eat natural leaf, or rose hips, or twig)
> DO - Beginning of Being Octave - transfers accumulation of higher energies to higher being bodies.

This was new and most interesting as a way to transform everyday negativity and by going into the body by sensing, coing into presence. The words "one part of the earth eating another part of the earth" resonated deeply and appeared in various guises in my dreams for a couple of nights.

Oh, John, by the way, I took the reversing of past and future differently. I brought both past and future back to the now. Yes, I do see where you are coming from though.

There's rather a lot covered in that octave. It is more complex than a couple of favourite methods I routinely use for sacrificing suffering/negativity, though simpler than the Heptachord. All good grist for the mill.
Thanks for sharing this one, Ian.

I want to share something personal from recent activities.
I have begun regular yoga classes after a break of almost twenty years. Have to say I'm loving it.
One side-effect is worth a mention perhaps; before falloing asleep most nights, a cascade of very old "moving" memories have come into consciousness. By "moving", I mean such things as dancing, diving, swimming, running, skating, rowing, even long-ago yoga classes! In fact, I don't recall these ever being so vivid, though obviously they must have been at the time.
There's an awareness exercise at the end of each class and the quality of full-body sensing which happens concurrently is the best I've experienced.
These vivid memories seem to be coming from the body. The body remembers and fifty minutes of yoga has enabled me to access various rolls archived in moving centre. Also some rolls out of eotional centre. I recalled the frisson of fear/excitement before the first dive from a beach diving-board (aged about eight years), and then the relief/satisfaction on emerging safely up through the water.

It is early days with the yoga. Obviously I mean to continue. What a bonus gift - to be aided so much in some Work exercises as well as the usual health and vitality gains.

In gratitude,
Judy.

Work Program week beginning 5 September 2011

---

by Karen

RELABEL
Identify any negative thought or emotion as a distorted pattern of negative ego consciousness. This “Fear” is my Negative Ego. This is not the real me.

REATTRIBUTE
Dis-identify from the thought or emotion as you. You begin to master your emotional states and you can begin to choose. I am the eternal being, not my thoughts or emotions.

REFOCUS
Move yourself out of the situation, environment or trigger for that thought. Go for a walk, listen to music, change your focus. Affirm: Not my will but Divine.

REVALUE
Revalue the power you have given this thought or emotion to rule your life. See it for what it truly IS. Limiting you. Disempowering you. Robbing you of inner peace and fulfillment as a Divine being. (Get behind ME, Ego! I AM that I AM!)

REQUEST Help
Commit to expressing Higher Emotion and Living your Soul Purpose. Ask for help from Spirit. Work your tools. Everything you require can be found within. Be here NOW!

REPORT
Your experiences and finding to the group.

---

by Gururaj

The devotion , the fine feeling and the continuous attention for this week's task (and any other Work aim) would be inspired (at-least for me it has) by this remarkable 17th century document about Brother Lawrence available for free download at this link http://www.ccel.org/ccel/lawrence/practice.html

What a direct path !

I see 'me's' mischief clearly,immediately.

May the divine sustain this .

---

by Steve

RE:
RELABEL
Identify any negative thought or emotion as a distorted pattern of negative ego consciousness. This “Fear” is my Negative Ego. This is not the real me.

Today I went and prepared lunch, I then went to put the knive and plate in the dishwasher. Much to my horror the dishwasher was full of Clean dishes when I expected to find and Empty dishwasher, My Heart Sank at lifes injustice - I was going to have to empty the dishwasher.

I jest a bit, but seriously, I thought 'oh crap I thought this had been emptied'
I immediately saw how lunatic this thought and attitude was, Seriously , how did I get to the point where I can have an negative attitude towards a dishwasher or the task of emptying a dishwasher. How could I have let such useless patterns of thought and emotion to proceed unchallenged and what others are there ?
This 'attitude' is a distorted pattern.....

Thank you

---

by Gururaj

"REVALUE[/b]
Revalue the power you have given this thought or emotion to rule your life. See it for what it truly IS. Limiting you. Disempowering you. Robbing you of inner peace and fulfillment as a Divine being. (Get behind ME, Ego! I AM that I AM!)"

At least now after the situation has passed I am seeing now the great power I have given to a need in me for others/life to be fair to me.The boss again said something that I considered was unfair and a night's sleep was ruined in total "sleep" .

Thankfully ,a while ago , somehow heard Ian's superb talk about the Second conscious shock on You Tube http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=uII4gx1Wxkc&NR=1 (The text version is there already on this site) and the distinction between automatic suffering and conscious suffering is clearer.

One of Gurdjieff's aphorisms says to the effect that the most troubing situations of life are of the greatest value provided one is remembering oneself.

May I practice the Affirmations of this week's task on my Denying manifestations - more often.

---

by Karen

Steve wrote,

> My Heart Sank at lifes injustice - I was going to have to empty the dishwasher.

Guru wrote,

> At least now after the situation has passed I am seeing now the great power I have given to a need in me for others/life to be fair to me.The boss again said something that I considered was unfair and a night's sleep was ruined in total "sleep" .
> ...
> One of Gurdjieff's aphorisms says to the effect that the most troubing situations of life are of the greatest value provided one is remembering oneself.

When remembering oneself, these irritations become pearls, and paradoxically, something of value emerges from that which was problematic.

Thank you for sharing your experiences and posting the link to Ian's talk.

---

by Cassandra

Karen,

I sometimes talk with my 10 year old son about emotions not being all there is, of separating from these. My prayer for him is that he come to know wisdom and courage. I also think the same work can be applied to pleasant emotions, watching these come and go as well. And Guru, speaking of work, I recently received a promotion but not one I was seeking. I feel not ready for these responsibilities and some fear of just the whole thing. I keep repeating this to my friends, but that seems counterproductive. Better is to see what it brings, in the work setting, not speak if I have nothing to say from the HEART and accepting NOT KNOWING.

---

by Karen

> Cassandra wrote:
> Karen,
>
> I also think the same work can be applied to pleasant emotions, watching these come and go as well.

Cassandra,

Agreed. Not sure if you had a chance, but the I found the exercises from the work program from Paul Beidler posted for August 29, 2011 useful and insightful.

To experience, familiarize and know both sides of the stick, and eventually find the falcrum point and neutralize. This for me is where something new can be created...in the middle.

Work Program week beginning 12 September 2011

---

by JohnS

This standard method for self-observation (by a French pupil of Gurdjieff's) gets its power from the final observations:

The true conxciousness, the consciousness to speak properly, is that of the person who looks at the tree in the following way..I look at myself looking, I call to myself while I look,, and in this difficult action - in which the object of my attention is not this tree but the perception I have of it - in which it is a matter ofestablishing my perception ofthis tree in relation to an I in me, compact and fixed, obtained through the SACRIFICE' of all the elements of my person set in motion by the spectacle - my real consciousness begins to dawn, born of this effort that I make to call it. At the same time, this tree passes from relative existence into absolute existence. It delivers its own BEING to me. I no longer see this tree, I no longer examine it, I KNOW it, we are born from each other.

---

by Harry

I happened to read a section of Nicoll this morning in which he quoted G. When you look at a tree you are looking with your head. When I look at a tree I see a tree.

---

by Judy

John wrote:

> This standard method for self-observation (by a French pupil of Gurdjieff's) gets its power from the final observations:

Gosh, isn't that the truth, and an effective portal into presence.
I looked out the window at the tree and the final observation of this week's exercise took me straight into a clear presence. And yes, I KNEW it - in absolute existence, the tree and I are born of each other.

May I enquire where you found the quote, John? It would be interesting to read more.

Cheers,
Judy.

---

by JohnS

Judy;
The quote is by Louis Pauwels from his book 'Monsieur Gurdjieff' - which I have not read.
This quote appears in Pierre Bonnasse's book "The Magic Language of the Fourth Way"

Thanks

John

---

by Cassandra

And John, to know something is perhaps not to be bored of it or not to be bored at all. When we were in a national park (Yellowstone) where one goes for a non-commercial vacation, I noticed the same kind of consumptive drive among all of us visitors to SEE (really consume) the buffalo or moose. After one consumes the object, boredom sets in or even if it's not consumed, we become bored because its physical form cannot fill the void.

Judy, glad to know of your experience.

---

by Lawrick

The quote by Pauwels is pregnant with perspectives for approaching this elusive state of consciousness. As yet I've been unable to reach Judy's level of remembering, but it seems to be hovering, light, prescient whenever I do the exercise. Perhaps by the end of the week.....

The quote is one of the better descriptions of the process, and I plan to keep a copy in my wallet. Thanks John,

Regards,
Lawrick

---

by Karen

This weeks exercise sparked this ponder:

Couldn't consciousness be an emanation on the scale—an emanation divided infinitely but infinitely complex and powerful—of the universal law, of "universal consciousness"?

If the answer is yes, the words by Socrates now resonates fully with a great burst of truth: "Know thyself and thou shalt know the universe and its gods."

Therefore, every fiber of our being contains a portion of our consciousness and consequently reacts in alignment with that consciousness.

---

by JohnS

Karen et al;

Yes, for me the struggle between recognising universal consciousness as a reality rather then an idea is helped by my long-held belief (ie an understanding) that there is ONLY Universal Consciousness: each person taps a certain amount of it according to their natural affinities, and as no two people are the same, the individual consciousness mix is different. A genius or a Master is able to access a richer amount than the average.

This has also helped me to see that someone classified as a genius - for example - is not one because of their talent, but because they have nominally received a greater "gift from God", this gift being a mental, emotional and sensible fact rather than a theory. Therefore pride should not exist, as we are not individuals, but all connected as part of the Pool.

It makes me grateful for my 'talents" rather than taking pride in an individuality which does not exist.

---

by Karen

> Therefore pride should not exist, as we are not individuals, but all connected as part of the Pool.

Beautifully said John!

On our scale of existence, if there is in fact a single memory, a single brain so to speak—that of the whole of humanity, each time someone increases his or her clarity of thought, harmony of feelings, or beauty of actions, it is a holographic present given to the whole of humanity.

It is my daily aim to work on myself and pay for my arising...contribute to this gift, this change of mind for the whole of humanity. It is my wish and hope that others do their work over the course of their lifetime and allow/give themselves the gift of awakening, the renewed state of wonderment in all things.

Thank you the spark...

Work Program week beginning 19 September 2011

---

by Cassandra

This Work should involve all 3 centers. When a difficult thought or situation arises, or just throughout the ordinary course of the day, turn attention away from the problem or routine. Do not address the 'problem' or boredom at all; rather, evoking the mental, emotional, and physical centers to create (or repeat) a meditation/movement/song/dance, in which the coordinaton of 3 centers is sought.

I listened to a broadcast that mentioned almost in passing, the response of the Irish people to recent economic troubles. Seems ordinary Irish people may be resorting to poetry, creating poetry, rather than or in additon to intensifying their understanding of financial matters. In composing this Task, I'm also reminded of Harry's post on 18 July (I think) about Working, not negatively, but passively in difficult situations--(meditate, go for a walk, prayer, sing a nursery rhyme). Attempt to allow what is to happen to happen; and hopefully, by Allowing, that which should manifest for the seeker, from a 3-centered place, will unfold and the Seeker will receive a new coating.

---

by Harry

From my morning Nicoll reading: Either you do it consciously, or it does you. Quite a good way to understand Work.

---

by Cassandra

I sent a post from my IPhone but guess it didn't make it. After giving an "important" presentation on Tuesday, I wondered for hours after how well it was received. For me this was an instance of Nicole's discussion of the Imaginary Self presenting itself to Imaginary Others, with the focus on performance. As I sat on a train anticipating the 13 hr. trip home afterwards, I thought it better to sense a body part or repeat the Holy Equation rather than think about how well others perceived the presentation. I didn't do this, though. Instead, I cast quick glances at people whom I wouldn't normally come into contact with. No worries here, just class bias on my part. At the same time, though, this contact was a good shock for me. I had to ask myself: Do you really think you are better than the guy muttering in his coffee cup?

---

by Gururaj

A 4-day conclave of some 40 Gurdjieffian Workers from a few cities of India occurred last week in sylvan surroundings on the outskirts of the city where I live.Yours truly was one of the hosting team members as it was the turn of our small city group this time . Early morning chants ,meditation sessions,discussions about an ancient Indian myth in the context of the 4th way and a rare occasion to experience some movements every day - orchestrated by three wise old souls who had travelled a long way across the globe - all contributed to something special for everyone.

There were epiphanic moments (usage is OK) and by the end of the period did sense some fine energy in me, though in a diffused way.

However ,getting back to usual life,I am seeing a dissipation happening ,accelerated maybe, by my getting swayed by passions, and not being attentive enough.

So ,the doing of this week's task has been a useful one in nudging me to stay on course.Often thru' the day ,have come to my senses, so to say, and intoned 'I am now' with awareness of body ,mind and feeling.Thanks Cassie !

A thought also occurred - why the automatic urge to regain comfort and composure as soon as possible ?

Regards to all,
Guru

---

by Judy

Cassandra wrote:

> Attempt to allow what is to happen to happen; and hopefully, by Allowing, that which should manifest for the seeker, from a 3-centered place, will unfold and the Seeker will receive a new coating.

Yes, Cass - well put. I've enjoyed your exercise this week. Thank you.
The "letting-go", allowing, accepting process has become a true portal into remembering/presence often for me. It works even better when combined with some sensing, of course. There are many situations in life where our usual meditative portals (silence, for example) aren't easily available, and acceptance is very useful here.

Harry, I often read a Commentary in my morning readings too. Just that one simple practice helped the Gurdjieff work to remain warm over some decades. Your quote above is so true. More and more I find I can choose. The addictions obsessions and compulsions are gone - at least the big ones are - and a better state can often be chosen through Work. This is still recent enough to retain its "miraculous" hue. What a blessing!

Guru, thanks for sharing about the conclave. I feel its warmth a little. It sounds very good indeed. Coincidentally this past week I've also been delving a little into an Indian myth, via listening to Deepak Chopra's four cds on "Life after Death", which I enjoyed very much.

Kind regards to all,
Judy.

---

by Cassandra

> Gururaj wrote:
>
> A thought also occurred - why the automatic urge to regain comfort and composure as soon as possible ?
>
> Guru

Thanks to all for your comments. Guru, yes, why the urgency to return to the comfort zone, when in the distress a blessing might wait.

---

by JohnS

Yes, I've been reading some work on shamans (ex. Don Juan), and their connection with the essence of the world around them is fuelled by tension, danger and risk.
How removed are we from this as a normal condition of living?

---

by JohnS

And then, i read, on a comment on Waiting for Godot:

Indeed, who wants to wait for someone who will never come, not knowing who they are waiting for? Who wants to start the day just like the day before it and the day after, like a sick robot? No-one, no-one would want to lead such an unfortunate existence, answers the first person to whom we pose this question.
We wait, not knowing why, for things to happen instead of triggering and then seizing them. We wait for the 'luck' that, by definiton, will never come (except by the law of accident), blindly submitting to the law of chance.

Easy and scary to ponder.

---

by Cassandra

John I agree that mechanical waiting racks the nerves but consciously done I believe essence can be uncovered.

Work Program week beginning 26 September 2011

---

by Ian

"You have given your life to become the person you are today. Was it worth it?"

During the week, Ponder the question 3 times each day - morning, noon, evening - in 3 different postures, for example, sitting in the morning, walking at noon and reclining in the evening. In all 3 potstures, be simply aware of your body and breathing.

---

by JohnS

A very interesting question, which I have been podering all week, as it currently relates closely to a project I'm involved in, and whether I'm the 'right person' for the job, or whether I've just made up my past personal history to suit my inclinations.
I'm still a little scared to truly face this, because of my life-long commitment to it.

Work Program week beginning 3 October 2011

---

by Lawrick

Gratitude as Being Food

Fellow Coconuts,

While visiting a good friend a few weeks ago my buddy brought up the severe medical problems I was experiencing last spring and winter. He expressed his amazement that I could remain so positive under such duress. Strange, because I never really thought about being positive and in fact I'm quite miserable and nasty when I'm ill. In retrospect, the answer probably lays in not expressing negative emotions. Such is the subtle effect of the Work.

One of the strategies I use to confront negativity is to engender Gratitude whenever possible. When ill, I'm grateful I'm alive. Grateful for close friends and family. I'm grateful for the Work and this forum which anchors my life. For the members who challenge us with their thoughtful work programs. Grateful for Harry's crusty insights, for Judy's insatiable intellectual curiosity, for Alistair's insightful travelogues, for John's music, Karen's metaphysical travels, for Cassandra, Gururaj, Jame's and Steve's unique commentary, and of course for Azure's brilliant madness. Where are you Greg? Most of all for our Dear Leader's truly super efforts. I'm particularly grateful for the realization that, while I may be but a tiny coconut hanging on the Endless tree of the Big Kahuna, every once in a while I'm given to realize the awareness of the process. How truly fortunate I Am.

So this week's theme is Gratitude: to be grateful for the many gifts both positive and negative, which wake us up to ourselves. Being grateful for the many blessings we take for granted. Breathing for example……. This week try to be grateful for those manifestations which under normal conditions might produce irritation, anger, worry, or even lip smacking retaliation. In fact these are wake up calls which, if we recognize as such, are great sources of being food.

I've read that Mr. Gurdjieff, notwithstanding his almost superhuman achievements, remained uniquely humble his entire life. I've been speculating that humility might be a by-product of gratitude. I've also noticed a subtle joy that accompanies a sincere expression of Gratitude and perhaps we might find some commentary here. In short, this week I shall engender Gratitude whenever possible and take note of it's effects. The Joy accompanying might be reconciled using the Heptachord of suffering found onsite.
Regards,
Lawrick

---

by Karen

Thank you for this weeks exercise.

This simple exercise is a lifesaver and cultivates a coherent state in the garden of one's mind.

I've been 'trying' to reside in the feelings of appreciation or gratitude, without any reason to do so, other than to just simply enter into this vibratory state without causation other than 'choosing' to do so for 1 to 2 minutes at a time, a number of times a day.

Experiencing gratitude appears to be something passive, you just rest in it, and it creates a vibratory field that by its very nature protects the emotional and spiritual essence.

This is of great benefit to us as an Initiates, to cultivate a coherent emotional state, something we can return to again and again. A great ally!

---

by JohnS

I've noticed this week that my gratitude is 'on hold': regarding a big project I'm involved in, I'm definitely at the si-do interval, and have been trying to bridge it with as much balance as possible, and also trying things such as introducing a lateral octave, and I know I'll only be grateful when I get a result, and not before. At least this realisation is good, but I'm not showing any gratitude for the effort involved - which I should be, because that's keeping me conscious of the situation.

---

by Judy

Good one, Fred!

Engendering an attitude of gratitude is a regular daily routine. It begins with mentally listing five new things to be grateful for each day. It is food for the soul.

Recently I was listening to some audio tapes by Deepak Chopra - revisiting from more than a decade ago. He maintains that one of the most effective ways to slay the dragon of self-importance is this engendering and expression of gratitude. This is because gratitude is the direct opposite of self-pity, which of course is the reverse side of self-importance. Interesting - and it certainly works!

Kind regards,
Judy.

---

by Cassandra

The COurse in Miracles says the ego speaks lodest and first. Similar to the Work idea that he Mechanical respnds fist. It is a task to wait and respond from 3 centers. That is the positive. One of the auhors of Buddha's Brain also stressed the importance of being positive. In doing so you become your savior.

---

by Gururaj

Many instinctively welcome situations/events happened of late for me which naturally makes one feel grateful - like moving into a new house in a better locale ,enjoying the innocence and liveliness of my kids, fairly even-keel sailing at work and so on.

But maintaining the 'posture' of gratitude thru' troublesome situations ,even as one is experiencing them, is something still to be tasted.

Ultimately ,gratitude needs to be experienced as Fred so eloquently puts it - "I’m particularly grateful for the realization that, while I may be but a tiny coconut hanging on the Endless tree of the Big Kahuna, every once in a while I’m given to realize the awareness of the process".

Guru

Work Program week beginning 10 October 2011

---

by Gururaj

Trying out the WILL muscles

"Try always to be aware of what in fact you are doing,and when it occurs to you to act against inclination, be especially aware of how it feels and what happens."

The two elements involved in this are WILL and CONSCIOUSNESS.
Will initiates activity against inclination and Consciousness aims only to be aware of what is happening.

What we call inclinitation is a disposition , a mechanicalness resulting from our history.

Will referred here is of a totally different kind than ,say, ambition or a need not to fail.It is an action done for its own sake.

The more consistently we exercise this Consciousness of Will , the seed of true individuality in us shall sprout.

(Source - Orage Gurdjieff meeting notes)

Regards to all ,
Guru

---

by Judy

Hi Guru,

Thanks for this exercise. It presented good opportunities and I already regret that I slept through most of last week, so missed them. I'm including some "acting against inclination" this week and will report back then. In fact, it usually happens as a regular facet of my work.

Kind regards to you,
Judy.

---

by Judy

Acting against inclination has, I have to say, made for a week of extraordinary happiness. Sounds trite, but there it is.

I've in particular been working on how I view "exercise". I've mostly looked at it quite half-heartedly, going through the motions, but not being a true believer as to its benefits. Anyway, there has been extra this week. I've used the stairs, not the lifts and elevators - and enjoyed it.

And little synchronicities abound. I heard during the week - "It is easier to act oneself into a new way of thinking than to think oneself into a new way of acting."
Definitely true.

Thanks Guru. Acting as if has been given a boost thanks to your exercise.
Regards,
Judy.

---

by Gururaj

> Judy wrote:
> "It is easier to act oneself into a new way of thinking than to think oneself into a new way of acting."

That's a good one to remember and use.Thans, Judy.

Not lingering on in bed at wake-up time was one exercise I started on that week.

Guru

---

by Cassandra

Hi Guru and Judy,

Acting against the routine in everyday pursuits such as moving from one place to the next and waking habits, now that's where the rubber meets the road. I hadn't thought of applying the exercise to things like that.

After reading this just a day ago, I thought of acting against my tendency towards introversion. I'm traveling for work right now, and one of the things I've had some instruction on during this trip is an evaluation of the emotional/behavioral type that I'm supposed to be. Well, that's 'introvert.' So, after a long day of interacting with others, I don't want to go to the 'hospitality' suite and have wine or beer; I want to go eat, just with 1 or 2 people maybe, and go to my room.

Instead of this, I went to the hospitality suite 3 evenings, and though it was somewhat draining, I socialized around small talk, listened to stories of people's sick or dying dogs and just tried to absorb or be in the social.

Thanks for the exercise

Work Program week beginning 17 October 2011

---

by Harry

To continue our theme of observation, this week observe how you use energy. In particular observe how you use up energy unconsciously. Observe your hands and how they move of their own accord. Observe how you tap your feet. Observe the tensions in your body as you sit. As you walk. Observe tensions which have nothing to do with the act you are purposefully doing.

Then pick one and briefly try to change the unconscious use of energy to conscious use of energy. If your hands are moving on their own, then do something consciously with them. And then continue to observe them when you have done something consciously. It doesn't have to be something meaningful. Just instead of letting your hands behave nervously, consciously pat your head. Then continue to observe your hands once the conscious action has been taken.

---

by Judy

That's an interesting little bit, Harry - about changing the unconscious movements to not necessarily meaningful (I took this as "meaningless") conscious movements.

Just a couple of experiments, one with tension in the jawbone and one with hand movements, have demonstrated clearly that much energy is indeed wasted through the tension of nervous restlessness, for want of better words. The whole thing even seems quite silly, once the conscious movements are observed. (I chose light tapping the teeth together for the conscious movements around the jawbone, for example.) Indeed, I had to smile, and couldn't keep the conscious ovements going for long either. Yet, the body keeps lots of these little "restlessnesses" going for much of the time. Incredible really.

How much I need to remember to consciously relax as often as possible.

Most interesting exercise, Harry.
Where to from here, having observed this clearly? Is there any particular follow-through I'm missing? Or not?

Thanks.
Regards,
Judy.

---

by Harry

Judy,

Once you have the initial observation, this is something that can become one of those time photographs. If you find your hands moving, then try to become more aware of your hands. One of mine used to be shifting weight. Especially when I was teaching. I would constantly shift weight from one side of my body to the other. And becoming conscious of that leads to stopping that. It doesn't lead to it "going away". But it does lead to reducing the more conscious I become of the habit.

---

by JohnS

Harry;
The posting of this exercise has brought not only my observation up a notch (I don't seem to have all that many nervous extra-movements, but I am discovering traits such as your shifting weight), but I have consciously revived my hand position I was taught years ago in Alexander therapy: there is a certain positioning of the hand (with the first finger extended and the wrist at an exact, unnatural angle) that gives a surge of energy and location awareness, which changes the way you walk, and other traits. Some African tribes use it naturally, which is part of their greater body awareness.

It just seems to be getting incrementally better this week. My hand will keep you posted.

John

---

by Steve

I have just had a day to observe and practise this having been away from home and offline for a week.

One startling thing I became aware off yesterday as I was catching up with computer based things was not just unconscious movements of hand but even unconscious preparation of the limbs.

Example: Catching up on emails, sitting ccomfortable in an easy chair with the mouse on the arm on the chair. I noticed that even when my 'mouse hand' isn't moving that it is 'activated' it is ready to move , ready to press and not at rest. Consciously readying and consciously relaxing was very interesting as was the slip back to habitual readyness or activation.

Initially it appeared to me to be a fairly simple and straightforward exercise but from what has emerged from what little I have explored I think there is a lot I could learn from the continued study not only of limbs but to find how far this habit of unconscious activation has pervaded. Is it just my body? Does it affect thinking set up? Emotional attitude to habitual situations? Thanks for the exercise.

---

by Harry

Steve,

Want to take it really further? Just try to observe facial expressions. Feel them.

---

by JohnS

Observing facial expressions is a large jump, because that auotomatically -for me - suddenly includes the whole room that the face is in.
Having just returned from a fairly 'intense' cafe conversation, where matters of the soul were attempting to be thrashed out, I found that observing my. facial expressions came whenever I attempted to really listen to the other person.
I'm pretty sure, also, that immediately after these moments began, I quickly 'adjusted' my observed expression in order to appear more conciliatory or sympathetic. I never once was able to just observe without adjusting.
Therefore, I did not 'feel' the expression, as you put it.

John

---

by Harry

Remember to separate judgment from observation. Observation is just that. An objective camera focused on your self. Yes we often try to change our expressions. But we can also just observe. Like right now my mouth is slightly open. My eyes are focused so there is some tension in my upper cheeks. The rest of my face is neutral. A little wrinkling of my forehead as I search for words.

---

by Steve

> Harry wrote:
> Steve,
>
> Want to take it really further? Just try to observe facial expressions. Feel them.

Thanks, I will add that in.

Steve

---

by Gururaj

Observed that when the feelings are constrained (negative ,anxious) , the body is also constricted in different parts. The mind also is not efficient.

On the one hand ,it is said in Work literature that we need to train ourselves to (intentionally) use all centres together in the same tempo.(Could anybody share some examples of this state ? And how to prepare oneself to evoke it ?)

And here I find that in mechanical / automatic states , these centres are all in synch. (negatively)

By the way , this is the link to Orage's 1925 article on Economising energy.

http://www.gurdjieff.org/orage13.htm

Work Program week beginning 24 October 2011

by Alistair

Hello again dear endless searchers.

Since the beginning of August it has been interesting to note the high level of solar activity, you can check this each day on the Endless Search home page. It's a bit calmer now but August was especially active.

Opposites; the day after I last posted an exercise Ian posted work guidelines for Aug to Sept entitled opposites. One angle to this was trying to do less when it felt like time to do, meditate, or in my case quiet sitting or to practice concentration the first step toward meditation. Yesterday when walking in the forest allowing others to select direction, being a follower rather than trying to be a leader.

Judith asked a book question last week about what we are all reading. As usual Idries Shah's Learning How to Learn is never far away and the day of reading Judith's post was on a bus ride and had taken Learning How to Learn. Usually the procedure is to randomly open whatever book has been chosen for the journey and something always knows the right page at the right time.

Lo and behold the book opened at a page that I hadn't seen for a considerable time.
The Number of Readings of a Book!

Rather than copy the entire Chapter, although not that long, here are a few lines.

Rumi teaches of the use of books in a book (The Diwan of Shams-i-Tabriz) where he denounces books as a source of wisdom. They are, as in the case of the one which he is writing at that moment, instrumental:
The Man of God is a wise one by means of Truth:
The Man of God is no lawyer from a book

Literary passages, teaching instruments, may need much time and various experiences before they exercise their true potential effect upon the human being. In his Ruh al-Quds (Spirit of the Holy), Ibn Arabi tells us how he was taught through a quotation from the Koran given him by Abu Abdullah of Ronda in Spain. This great Sufi, who had many extrasensory abilities, chose a passage and asked Ibn Arabi what it meant. The later did not answer him but when the meaning came to him he found Abu Abdullah again and told him the answer. This was four years later. In conventional temporal terms, therefore, this one lesson had occupied four years. Since we have started publishing books of Sufi tales and encounters this kind of reaction has become more and more frequent from readers of the books: those, that is, that are not so impatient that they abandon the study as soon as it yields no immediate results of the kind they demand of it. And as Kalabadhi says in his Taaruf:

Patience is to be patient with patience.

In the spring of this year a visit to Western Europe enabled me to more easily than usual obtain some new reading material. On this occasion I purchased several titles by Samael Aun Weor the Gnostic teacher whose work was drawn to my attention through this website indeed as a result of references made by Judith to the website www.gnosticteachings.org

The main titles purchased were ‘The Revolution of the Dialectic’ and ‘Perfect Matrimony’

‘The Revolution of the Dialectic’ Chapter One Ahimsa: Non violence. Page 41
'The personality must not be confused with the “I.” In fact, the personality is formed during the first seven years of childhood. The “I” is something different. It is the error that is perpetuated from century to century; it fortifies itself each time, more and more through the mechanics of recurrence.
The personality is energetic. It is born during infancy through habits, customs, ideas, etc and it is fortified with the experiences of life. Therefore, both the personality as well as the “I” must be disintegrated. These psychological teachings are more revolutionary than those of Gurdjieff and Ouspensky.'

If ‘The Revolution of the Dialectic’ contains an enormous amount ‘The Perfect Matrimony’ is overflowing.
As per the earlier comment regarding the selection of a page of a book at random here is today’s special choice from ‘The Perfect Matrimony’ page 174.
'When the initiate has been illuminated by the Brahmanic Fire, he enters the esoteric or secret circle of humanity. In that circlewe find an ineffable family, made up of those ancient heirophants who are known in the world as Avatars, Prophets, Gods, etc. The members of this distinguished family are found in all the advanced races of the human species. These beings are the founders of Buddhism, Taoism, Christianity, Sufi, etc. Actually these beings are few, but despite being so few they are in truth the directors and leaders of the human species. Cosmic consciousness has infinite degrees of development. The cosmic consciousness of a new initiate is inferior to that of an angel and that of the angel is not the same as the development of an Archangel. In this there are degrees and degrees. This is Jacob’s Ladder.'

The opening Chapter entitled ‘Love’ sets out in no uncertain terms the difficulty we all face in fulfilling the most simple of fundamentals necessary for advancement.
The main thrust of this book is the practice of Maithuna. Is this what Mr. Gurdjieff covers with the second conscious shock?

This week’s exercise; since Harry highlighted the importance of self observation, self-remembering in early August it seems to have become the main preoccupation of the group, probably quite rightly so as it forms such a fundamental part of our aim. Continue to focus awareness on the facial muscles, this is so valuable.

For my own contribution this week two things firstly when you walk concentrate on walking, nothing else just placing one foot in front of the other. Don’t look around. If you do want to look around stop and do so but when you walk just walk concentrating on the ground in front.

The other thing to try is with regard to turning. As far as we are lead to believe we all have chakras that spin clockwise. Dervishes spin clockwise. Having had no experience with Gurdjieff movements I have no idea whether there are clockwise and anticlockwise movements. It occurred to me to observe which way I move when turning and how do I feel when I turn clockwise as opposed to anticlockwise. In theory should we attempt to make all our turns clockwise? Why would we turn anticlockwise against the spin of our chakras? Observe which ways you turn. There will be certain situations in the bathroom, kitchen etc where you always turn in a certain direction. If it's anticlockwise try changing the direction to clockwise. What do you feel, what do you experience. You can even try this in bed only rotating clockwise.
Your feedback would be most welcome, if nothing else to satisfy my attention needs Love and best wishes to all, Alistair

---

by Judy

Most interesting exercise, Alistair, regarding the observation of which way turns are made. Some experimentation clearly shows a "natural bias" for turning clockwise.
I haven't heard of this being related perhaps to the clockwise turning of the chakras; rather just put it down to a sort of "right-footedness" - so to speak. Of course this varies a little with the particular circumstances involved, but generally, I'm surprised at the degree of preference; much greater than expected.

I've enjoyed the mindful walking as well.

And thanks so much for your sharing of some activities. I know we are quite an intense and active little group here, though do not necessarily share the same thread of activity all the time. Yet we do have common purpose. And sharing helps strengthen this, don't you think?

Note to all:
I'm heading south to spend some time with family tomorrow and return in a couple of weeks. John, bless him, has kindly swapped roster spots with me, and will be contributing a program for next week, as I won't be at the computer much, if at all. Thanks John.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Judy

Oops - post above posted twice - just editing.

Postscript:
New activities for the past month for me have included resuming concert-going locally and having just the best time!! Plus a day of mindfulness given by the Khacho Yulo Ling Buddhist Centre here is coming up soon after I return and I'm looking forward to that.

Gurdjieff-related reading has been mainly Nicoll's Commentaries plus Ravi Ravindra's "Heart without Measure".
And I've been playing the piano a little.

Stay well everyone,
J.

---

by Gururaj

Walking situations (not counting the short steps at home) mainly come up for me in the campus of the organisation where I work for my living (and habit ?).

Often ,thanks to the task of the week,could remember to be mindful of just walking.

Apart from not frittering away energy with automatic thoughts , it also was useful as a reminder to Work and be present.

As to turning inclination, the few times I was aware , saw that it was as per the needs of the situation but there seems to be a preference for 'left-to-right', i.e. clock-wise .Could be because of being a right-hander/footer ?

As I post now, saw the unnecessary tension in the jaw muscles and the fingers even when not typing or tapping .Surely, work on these aspects of the body will be a long on-going one.

Regards to all,
Guru

Work Program week beginning 31 October 2011

---

by JohnS

Quoted from Michel de Salzmann, 2002:

All men are dead, except the ones that know;
All they that know are dead, except the ones that have good intentions;
All they that have good intentions are dead, except the ones that work responsibly;
And they are in great danger.

Spontaneously after reading this, I asked myself: "Which of these levels am I on at this moment?"
I was very ashamed at the answer.

Recall the severity and urgency of these words during the week, and quickly ask yourself the question: "What level am I on now?"

---

by Alistair

Dear John, was it really shame or perhaps disappointment or possibly remorse of conscious? Whatever; are you truly responsible?
As Harry sometimes says, don't judge (even yourself), just observe

Patience is being patient with patience

Happy Halloween

http://gnosticteachings.org/the-teachings-of-gnosis/lectures-by-gnostic-instructors/496-the-mysteries-of-halloween.html

---

by Gururaj

So John, you are inviting us to check every now and then whether we have written out rain cheques (UK English version) to ourselves or truly making the payment !

Wonder what Michel Salzmann meant by "And they are in real danger".

Just a preliminary comment.Hope to get some experiences as the week goes on.

Thank you

---

by Alistair

Dear Guru, the razor's edge?

---

by JohnS

Well put, Alistair: the razor's edge.

Gururaj, I believe my feeling was one of shame, as it was spontaneous, and related to a level of inconsequence, when I should have known better after all this study and time, and especially concerning all the help and information given freely by 'those who know'. Shame at not adequately appreciating their efforts and sacrifice up to this point.

John

---

by Lawrick

The Razor's Edge. Great movie about personal inner observations confounding people after the Great War. I continue to wonder what was so bloody great about it, with the exception of the numbers of corpses. The Razors Edge was remade into a remarkable personal journey that starred Bill Murray. One of the few movies that actually mentioned Mr. Gurdjieff I believe.

Great program John. Requires courage to gaze into the depths of such perfect symmetry.

Regards,
Fred

---

by Alistair

This is what the Gnostic Glossary has to say about 'The Path of the Razor's Edge'

"The Initiate must travel, with determination, along the Path of the Razor’s Edge. There are terrifying abysses on either side of this difficult road. On the difficult path to the dissolution of the ego, there are complex passages which have their roots precisely in the real path. Obviously, from the Path of the Razor’s Edge multiple paths diverge which lead nowhere. Some of them take us to the abyss and despair. There are paths which can transform us into the majesties of this or that zone of the universe. However, they can never return us to the bosom of the Eternal Universal Cosmic Father. There are fascinating paths of a most holy, ineffable appearance; unfortunately, they can only lead us into the submerged devolution of the infernal worlds. In the work of the dissolution of the “I,” we need to devote ourselves completely to the Innermost Christ. At times problems appear which are difficult to resolve. Suddenly the path is lost in inexplicable labyrinths and we do not know where it continues. Only absolute obedience to the Innermost Christ and the Father who is in secret can, in such instances, wisely guide us. The Path of the Razor’s Edge is full of danger, both inside and out." - Samael Aun Weor, The Great Rebellion

Work Program week beginning 7 November 2011

---

by Karen

ON WILLING WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO (extracted from pg 1389 of the Commentaries-Volume 4)

One Method of Self-Remembering

"Try to will what you have to do this week"
(e.g. washing the dishes, waking to the 1st alarm in the morning, going for a walk,and all the rest of it)

To will what happens to you has a most marvellous issue in your own relationship to second force.

Report findings back to the group.

---

by Harry

This is a very effective exercise. Willing what must be done.

One of my favorite G quotes to hold on to is "Do not do what can't be done." So often when we don't will what we must do it is because we want to do what can't be done.

---

by Alistair

Dear Karen, do you have a link to an online copy of the Commentaries?

---

by Karen

Alistair,

Some of Maurice Nicoll's work can be found on scribd.com. I couldn't locate Volume 4 though.

I do recall Judy mentioning in another thread that she has some of the commentaries as pdf's. Judy, do you have a copy of Vol. 4 available for the group?

Regards,

Karen

by Judy

Hi Karen,

Yes I do. In fact, I have all the Commentaries plus the Imdex.
Volume 4 is a 1.25mb file. I'm only too happy to make it available here, but cannot seem to copy/paste to our site and I don't have a personal website.

Leave it with me for a day or two. I'll ask Ian if there is a way to do it. Otherwise, Alistair, and anyone else interested, could email me and I'll attach file in reply email. We'll do it one way or another. I've been thinking about it for a while, as it is probably out of copyright by now.

Best,
Judy.

---

by Judy

Postscript:
Alistair, and anyone else who hasn't read the Commentaries, you are in for a treat.
J.

---

by Judy

Hi Everyone,

I heard back from Ian immediately. He has the same six pdf files and will post them soon onsite, for members only.
Cheers,
Judy.

P.S. And how about Sy Ginsburg's site with the free pdf of "Gurdjieff Unveiled"! Another tasty feast for anyone who hasn't read it before. It is without doubt one of my most used and valued Gurdjieff books. Thanks, Ian.
J.

---

by Karen

Fantastic!

Making all of the volumes available to our members will assist in the Endless Search Discussion forum "Self-Remembering" thread that Judy initiated and all other commentary references moving forward. They are a most tasty treat indeed!

Best Regards,

Karen

---

by Judy

Karen - your signatory comment -

> We are always the student of the higher order and the teacher for the lower order, along a fractal ladder of intent in a field of change.

I came across this very recently elsewhere. This ladder of consciousness is, according to the author, Jacob's ladder.
Most interesting.

Yes - it will be great to have member access to thbe Commentaries. Hardcopy is quite expensive.

Kind regards,
Judy.

---

by JohnS

Thanks to Ian and Judy for the .pdf - am just about to devour it.

With regard to Karen's exercise: it has been most opportune for me, as I have just started a 3-week holiday. The intention of this holiday has always been to catch up on multiple tasks not done: work on house, cars, music, etc.
I always knew - in preparation for this busy time - that there would be competition between the tasks - between the Favourites (subtitled Most Necessary) and the Dark Forces (the Supreme Excusers).

If I can see a trend where any real Will becomes dominant - I can't see it yet, clearly, although the overall attitude towards everyday tasks is changing - I can feel it - without it yet being anything like permanent.

John

---

by Steve

> Karen wrote:
> ON WILLING WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO (extracted from pg 1389 of the Commentaries-Volume 4)
>
> One Method of Self-Remembering
>
> "Try to will what you have to do this week"
> (e.g. washing the dishes, waking to the 1st alarm in the morning, going for a walk,and all the rest of it)
>
> To will what happens to you has a most marvellous issue in your own relationship to second force.
>
> Report findings back to the group.

Hi Karen

Can I get some clarification on this please, is this setting an intention in advance ,rather than haphazardly plodding throught the week?

---

by Harry

Steve,

There are many things we have to do. We have too cook, for example. I have little problem doing that, because I enjoy cooking. But if I will to do it, the process becomes more concious. But there are other things we do because life requires them. Some can be simple, like writing the monthly housing check. I don't like to do it. But it must be done. So I will to do it. And will to do it on time. When I had a lawn I hated cutting the grass. Willing to cut the grass, cutting the grass consciously, changed the act of cutting the grass.

---

by Harry

Judy,

If you could guide me to where Ian has posted these, I would appreciate it. I have all five volumes, but having a searchable file on my computer would be a great benefit.

---

by Steve

> Harry wrote:
> Steve,
>
> There are many things we have to do. We have too cook, for example. I have little problem doing that, because I enjoy cooking. But if I will to do it, the process becomes more concious. But there are other things we do because life requires them. Some can be simple, like writing the monthly housing check. I don't like to do it. But it must be done. So I will to do it. And will to do it on time. When I had a lawn I hated cutting the grass. Willing to cut the grass, cutting the grass consciously, changed the act of cutting the grass.

Thanks Harry, thats very helpful.

---

by Alistair

Further to my Discussion Group post in connection with this weeks work Eliphas Levi also had some interesting things to say

That human willpower is a real force, capable of achieving absolutely anything, from the mundane to the miraculous.

AXIOM 1:"Nothing can resist the will of man when he knows what is true and wills what is good."
AXIOM 9:"The will of a just man is the Will of God Himself and the Law of Nature."
AXIOM 20:"A chain of iron is less difficult to break than a chain of flowers."
AXIOM 21:"Succeed in not fearing the lion, and the lion will fear YOU. Say to suffering, 'I will that you shall become a pleasure,' and it will prove to be such-- and even more than a pleasure, it will be a blessing."

---

by Judy

Harry, I don't think Ian has posted them onsite as yet.
I've emailed you and Alistair with half of them. The rest to follow soon.

Folks, let's give Ian a few days and if there is a problem with posting here, then I'll collect emails from those of you who would like a copy. Ok?

Cheers,
Judy.

---

by Karen

> Steve wrote:
> Hi Karen
> Can I get some clarification on this please, is this setting an intention in advance ,rather than haphazardly plodding throught the week?

Thank you Harry for responding to Steve. Waking to the first alarm in the morning and cleaning the cat litter are tasks that require me to 'go to them as they usually take me to them", as I mutter profanities.

All preparations…Exercises to prepare the soil in the garden of our being. To prepare us to receive higher energies without blowing our hard drive...Pray for the neutralizing force of the Work, which comes only through self-observation and self-remembering. Eventual with much effort, 'super efforts' as G says, a psychological transformation can occur and in my experience there are certainly no shortcuts on the road to mastery.

For whatever reason, and a wee bit off topic, part of me felt like sharing this very long internal dialogue on the topic of energy (bear with me as pen hits paper in an attempt to translate into language, the pieces of the puzzles floating around in the soup).

I had the honor of meeting a brilliant scientist by the name of Dr. M. Sharp. He spoke of energy and that we need to consider and keep in mind 3 features of energy that have an impact on how we create and function in the world. The qualities of energy being:

Persistence
Neutrality &
Valence

Once you draw energy to yourself though intent, and once that intent is manifested or expressed, that manifestation tends to stick in that form.  It becomes viscous. The lower the vibration of energy, the denser, thicker it becomes.

The energy of creation is neutral. Energy is just energy and it is morally and ethically inert. It makes no judgments about its use or abuse. It simply is.

Think of our own storage and use of energy. We eat 'food' that is converted into energy that our body uses in activity. However, what we 'eat' and how our energy is stored does not dictate what actions we engage in. You and your body are always free to choose how to utilize stored 'food' energy. The point being as Nicoll pointed out on pg 1390 in the commentaries, 'how you react to incoming impression is up to you" (keeping in mind that energy tends to stick around).

pg 1389 As has been said, if you could see incoming impressions before they act upon you mechanically, and put the Work itself between your reception of them and your mechanical reaction, you would begin to know what Self-Remembering means, which is really Psycho-transformism.

Energy is just energy and it does not care what we do with it. It has no mind, no will and no morality. It is the substance of God, of Cosmos, the Absolute. But the energy in raw form is empty of Spirit and responds only to intent. As with your choice of activity/action, you have a choice on how you use this energy. As Harry mentioned in an earlier post, “So often when we don't will what we must do it is because we want to do what can't be done.”

Energy also has valence. Sounds so eloquent. It carries an imprint. Our bodies are manifestation devices and as energy passes through our bodies, it takes on an imprint provided by our body's emotional state. Valence can be described in terms of spin and color. Our bodies spin energies in one of 2 ways: clockwise (towards unity), or counterclockwise (towards disintegration). Energy also has emotional color and us “artists” color energy with all kinds of emotions. Whatever you feel, you can stamp or imprint. (kind of a scary thought)

Now, combine the qualities of persistence, neutrality and valence and we have a set of qualities with profound implications.

Because energy is neutral, you can draw it and choose to manifest whatever you like. Because energy has valence, you stamp that energy with your own personal imprint. And, because energy is persistent, it tends to stick around in the form in which it was originally creating. If you stamp energy with negative emotions, the energy you have used to manifest stays like that until you make a conscious effort to re-stamp it.

However, in the body and in amnesia, things are significantly different.

So as Dr. Sharp explained, at root we are dealing with energetic inertia and the fact that we are “asleep” or not fully conscious. We forget who we are, forget who our brothers and sisters are, and react inappropriately and fail to take responsibility for our reality.

We live on a planet riddled with negativity and sleeping people. Energy follows intent, As Above in Consciousness, So Below in Matter.

Oh what a mess we have made...Shame on us for stamping so much negativity and not cleaning up after ourselves! 😔
What an incredibly difficult task it is, in our current state, to begin the path of neutralizing and transmuting our energies.

As per Nicoll's wise words "The beauty lies in realizing that you have a right not to be negative and without that realization you cannot remember yourself." We can choose not to be negative.

We can choose not to be negative. We can choose not to be negative. This is our birthright!

---

by Alistair

Karen, isn't it funny how cats make us curse . Smiled this morning reading your post visualizing you cursing the cat litter tray as I might well also but fortunately our wee beast lives mainly outdoors. I do curse the cat when chasing it out of the house except at night when it's allowed to sleep in the hall.

As a rule simple tasks no longer seems to bother me perhaps because I've been fortunate enough not to have to go out to work for over a decade and all my activities can be dealt with largely at my convenience. That said this morning when I wanted to continue working on this post and other work work I was mildly irritated taping the front door to enable spray painting the panels especially have anticipated that others might perform the task for me. Worst of all I was too busy to will it.

Where the greatest irritation is consistently encountered tends to be with those closest to me.

'Whatever it is that we criticise so much in others is something which lies on the dark side of ourselves, and which we neither know nor want to recognise.'
SAW, 'The Great Rebellion'

This is where the greatest opportunity lies; to comprehend ourselves through meditative analysis of our flaws, these response to others that cause us remorse.
It seems that the more we can simply tell ourselves to 'let it pass' the better off we are given the nothingness of everything that is ego.

---

by Harry

My son left me two cats when he moved across country. The only thing I find irritating is that the female is just plain to affectionate. I don't know about you two, but if I say Food they know where to go. If I so no they will usually respond. If I say in or out they do what I'd like. Of course they only go out to the balcony. But as my son says, you don't train a cat, it trains you.

---

by Cassandra

> Harry wrote:
> Steve,
>
> There are many things we have to do. We have too cook, for example. I have little problem doing that, because I enjoy cooking. But if I will to do it, the process becomes more concious. But there are other things we do because life requires > them. Some can be simple, like writing the monthly housing check. I don't like to do it. But it must be done. So I will to do it. And will to do it on time. When I had a lawn I hated cutting the grass. Willing to cut the grass, cutting the grass consciously, changed the act of cutting the grass.

So, 'willing' is not insisting on one way over others but consciously doing what needs to be done?

---

by Alistair

Cassandra, nicely put & perhaps I might add with joy in your heart

Work Program week beginning 14 November 2011

by Judy

This week I've chosen to simply quote our current three-month program as provided by Ian, especially as it fits so well with Karen's program of last week; in fact, serves nicely as a continuation. We have had much original material (fantastic!) over the past six months, but we thrived on Mr Paul Beidler's and Ian's influences for many years and I'd like to repeat programs of theirs from time to time.
Here it is:

WILL

The Seeker realizes that the will to continue his Search is formed by a combination of certain I's which are becoming stronger but which are still opposed by other I's which are antagonistic to his Search.

These other I's are constantly responding to the ordinary antagonistic influences so predominant in society.

Evidence of a gradually developing dominant I is his persistence in engaging in the Search. This dominant I must be fortified by exercising will in the form of vowing certain elementary tasks without fail.

The vow chosen must also place the Seeker in confrontation with his 'inner considering' and may be one of the following:

never to smile; never to dress in acceptable fashion; never to shake hands; always to eat garlic before meeting people; to eliminate hand and face gestures while talking; to paint fingernails of one hand black; never to bathe the arm pits; never to talk at meals; never say "thank you"; always to belch after meals; to fart whenever necessary; always to wear hat indoors; to shave the eyebrows.

At least twice a day try to harmonize breathing with heartbeat: to the count of 1, 2, and 3, inhale on count of 1, exhale on counts of 2 and 3, hold breath on next 1, 2, and 3, repeat as above and continue for five minutes with thumb of right hand on left pulse to adjust tempo of breathing to tempo of pulse.

In general, consider the following: If I could 'do,' what would I 'do'? For example: Can I change desire to conform to a non-desire? Can I obey the voice of conscience rather than the voice of conformity?

***

(Note: This Work Guidline programme, and all previous Work Guidlines, were written by Paul Beidler)
(Copyright 1998 by Paul Beidler)

Ian C MacFarlaneSite Admin Posts: 1117Joined: Wed Jun 09, 2004 8:47 amLocation: England (end quote).

I've another reason for presenting this. In working with it, especially the paragraph which begins "never to smile", I have some inner conflict. I instinctively want to add, at the end of this one paragraph "except when to do so would injure others or myself" - or words to that effect. The concern stems from a wish to also "externally consider", I think (and hope). Or a I just being a wimp?

Anyway, so hoping (hope of consciousness ) that someone will expand on this passage in the replies.

---

by JohnS

The general theme of this exercise reflects the current situation I find myself in, ie that for some time my WILL has not been sufficient to cause any permanent changes, and as a result I have been at a virtual standstill, compared to the effort (WILL) needed for any true vertical progress.

I can certainly sense right now the urgency of this task, prompted by my having to return to work next week, thus I have a mental deadline, before the work regime tries to overwhelm once more.

I have been asking those questions: "If I could do, what would I do?" and "How can I change a desire into a non-desire (and vice-versa, in the interest of doing)?".
Question 1 has been answered by an "I" interested in the Work - so I should be able to monitor its progress (thus interest) via a task that also has a definite deadline, but where I am stuck at a si-do interval.
Question 2 has a definite focus of interest, as I can feel the enormous potential of the conversion of a particular desire. I 'converted' this desire once before, ten years ago, after much work, but now the task has to be done again. At least I have the emotion of the past experience as an aim, if not yet the WILL.

John

---

by Alistair

As my work effort proceeds, please note proceeds rather than progresses, nothing should be taken for granted, while digesting, or attempting to digest the lessons from written material and practical exercises coming from many greatly learned individuals, it is easy to forget that one of the first lessons when embarking on this path is not to take everything as gospel, to practically test and ultimately follow our own path.

Having reread the work programme for this week despite seeing great value in some parts of the programme in others I felt some reservations.

Let's start with Judith's introductory paragraph. While unquestionably we are grateful for Ian's work in creating the Endless Search website supported the knowledge he gained from years of study with Mr Beidler the most valuable information comes from source and that is Mr. Gurdjieff. Remember that the essence of any teaching is rapidly diminished and lost and this was very much in my mind when suggesting we try to continue our study of Beelzebub's Tales which should not be underestimated as purely an intellectual exercise.

That said if one goes back to 'The Arousing of Thought', page 24, immediately after the tale of the pepper eating Transcaucasian Kurd, the following long paragraph states that simply by reading Beelzebub's Tales (most likely although not stated at this point, in the recommended fashion) will in the majority of people cause a desirable mechanical transformation with results that are proper to man.

So, if we've all read 'the book', three times why do anything at all?

Being Partkdolg Judy; Conscious labour & intentional suffering

So back to this weeks programme.
'This dominant I, must be fortified by exercising will in the form of vowing certain elementary tasks without fail'.
• Alchemy
• Meditation
• Service to others

Although my experience in these studies is of a relatively short time span, the aforementioned seem to be the three critical factors.

The first instance of where I am at odds with this weeks programme is from the paragraph beginning, never to smile. While agreeing that the elimination of hand and face gestures is actually most valuable while talking, most of the examples will simply cause astonishment in others and while creating some inner friction can this not be created without causing astonishment in others. I can't immediately recall where but suspect that somewhere in Learning How To Learn, a venerable Sufi master states that it is wrong to astonish others especially with work related manifestations. Indeed I have resisted the temptation for a couple of years to post material with 'work' emphasis onto Facebook where astonishment and misconceptions will result.

I find considerable inner friction restraining myself from anger outbursts at actions I perceive to be undesirable by those with who I reside. Bearing their unpleasant manifestations and perceived stupidities with joy, in other words acceptance, avoiding the urge to teach and direct in the knowledge that most of what is imparted will be misunderstood & misconceived.

The breathing exercise also makes me a little suspicious. While finding some benefit in actually being aware of my breaths and also in filling my belly with air rather than only my chest I must draw our attention to the Chapter Ekim Bey in ‘Meetings With Remarkable Men’. Mr. Gurdjieff has encountered a Persian Dervish who initially draws attention to method of eating and goes on to explain the dangers of general breathing exercises. While the exercise described might be beneficial there are those who might be damaged, can we be sure?

If I could do, what would I do? We know we can’t so why feed the ego by asking a question that is likely to do just that?

If I could do, what would I do? Bear patiently with my effort to achieve inner illumination. Don’t create expectation.

A random look back at some previous work posts homed in on the Work Programme for the week of 11th July 2005. Therein was a useful reminder of the student whose cup was too full.

Desire into non-desire, always crucial to us, as usual for me the beast of tobacco is never far. By and large at home in the village I’m managing to avoid it but temptation is strong on town visits where watching the world go by with a coffee and cigarette was/is always mechanically pleasurable. It is a powerful I that clings to tobacco if it can be truly dissolved in this lifetime it will be progress indeed.

How to achieve this aim? A view on the possibility could be continued in this post but despite a previous comment regarding site partitions the continuation will be more appropriate on the Beelzebub’s Tales Forum hopefully sooner rather than later; but given that the sun is today shining brightly in a beautiful Greg sky I shall now prepare myself for a 7km bus ride to the east end of the Belbek Valley from where I will spend the afternoon hiking home through the decayed Soviet orchards..... without tobacco

---

by Gururaj

Have chosen one task for seeing 'inner consideration ' - not shaving the beard since Monday.
By the second day , some folks have started noticing and one friend has even commented.
My wife expressed her views more strongly - disgust.

But I've not been explaining why.

Vanity and being concerned about appearance is just one of the many attachments.
And ,if at all, am still not seeing their movement as the feelings manifest - but later.

This week's task with a specific focus should help in going more closely into this.

Guru

by Judy

Alistair.
Don't think for a moment that I missed it.
Regards,
Judy.

---

by Alistair

Judy, there are quite definitely long periods when I feel that way, last year at the A&E Conference was at a time when tobacco was easily avoided despite quite a few puffers around. The fall came during the return trip from the UK to Crimea as I dropped in on some friends in the Netherlands. It took until this Feb to act again but for some reason a few shopping trips to Bakhchisarai in March and a cig with morning coffee at the bazaar reopened the door and this years trip to the UK was smoky with the exception of Easter weekend when the Friday/Saturday fast prevailed. The following day was Easter coffee & cig and off we go again.

On 23rd August we made a visit to the local Govt. office in the neighbouring village Zelonoe (Green place). While standing in the sunshine waiting for the office to open I was smoking and saw an old woman making her way slowly along the dirt track towards us, she had a walking stick unusually coloured Greg. She walked straight towards me and asked for my right hand, stroked my palm then said a few words in Russian and hobbled off. The two women I was with explained that she had said if I didn't stop smoking I would be dead very soon but if I stopped I would live for many years to an old age. What do you do? One would surely be a fool to ignore a such a warning from baabooshka. That day there were few smokes, one after lunch an perhaps a few in the evening. Since then I have smoked but not much. Mostly at the weekend if there are a few drinks & on occasion while drinking coffee during a visit to the city.

There is an interesting Gnostic concept 'the false sentiment of the I' on which basis you would be challenged to resist temptation to smoke in the most stressful tobacco motivating situation and this would demonstrate whether that I was truly dissolved or just very well hidden. Gnosis comments that the sentiment of the I is always wrong.

Last night we visited the neighbours for dinner. My neighbour drinks vodka almost everyday & smokes every evening. Last night despite his 'kind' offers I resisted both. Within a short time of falling asleep was attacked by what I suspect was a very angry ego and woke crying out in a somewhat agitated state.

Are any of the rest of the group smokers or reformed smokers?

---

by Gururaj

Dear Alistair :
There is a 'Work'mate in my city who is always wrestling with his smoking habit.His family reproaches him for his habit."You are now a husband/dad/etc.At-least for others sake stop it". He himself tries to stop it but with no success as yet.It does'nt help that many famous seekers like Ouspensky were smokers and somehow (subliminally ?) it's OK to smoke in Work circles.No ordinary morality for us !

I've decided now to present him a new product - 'faux' cigarettes,ones with a somewhat benign variety of genetically modified tobacco.One can go thru' the motions of smoking,but not be harmed that much.

It somewhat amuses me how particularly this habit is such a ready target for the smoker as well as others around when there are many more not so obvious habits ,like ,say, getting depressed easily, which need to be worked upon.

As for me,beyond 2 or 3 puffs, more discomfort is sensed than any physiological benefit .So it has never become a habit though there were some periods when due to associative reasons the smoking frequency was tending to climb and I sensed it was becoming something of a bodily need.

In my experience,what helped to break the mild habit was not any direct attack , but getting involved in other activities ,like Yoga or sports , which almost without my 'participation' withered the need to smoke.Rarely , still , I do indulge on occasions.

Here's some matter about breaking habits which I archived after reading it first somewhere in Work related literature .I reckon, it does have some value.

"All you need to do is understand this key principle."The Strongest Desire Always Wins".It's not willpower that wins but always the strongest desire wins.

And you can have more than one desire hitting you at a time. But the strongest one in that moment will always win out.

Just pay attention to your own minute to minute decisions throughout the day and you'll see that they are always controlled by the two forces of PAIN and PLEASURE.

All you have to do to break a bad habit or addiction is find something you like better than the addiction and FOCUS on that instead. The stronger the desire you can generate the easier it will be to override your addiction.That stronger desire will block everything out except itself.

Whenever you're trying to break a habit or an addiction you need to find something you want more than that addiction. We all have that something inside of us and can turn on the switch at any moment.

We just have to find that desire or set of desires and simply focus on them. Your focus itself will give your new desires strength. And the more you take your attention away from your addiction the weaker it becomes as a habit.And the less power it has to influence you."

May we all transmute our desires .

Guru

---

by Alistair

Gururaj, thank you for the contribution to eliminate my tobacco addiction.

An general observation on the manner which tobacco is now delivered to the consumer compared to the days of Messrs Gurdjieff & Ouspensky is that it is unlikely in the first place that they would ever have seen filter tipped cigarettes although there would certainly have been some fancy holders. There would almost certainly also have been far fewer if any additives to the tobacco in the cigarettes as opposed to the extensive cocktails on sale today.

Guru, I understand exactly what you are saying about substituting one desire for another but would counter your comments in respect of our work which ultimately is aimed at eliminating ego driven desire. Desire; or you might say attachment to externals is the cause of unintentional suffering.
The definite aim of our current programme as I see it is to develop true willpower, Thelema. The problem here is to eliminate ego, I's in their entirety. This objective links in very nicely to Chapter 39, The Holy Planet "Purgatory" of Beelzebub's Tales.

Earlier today I was reading this lecture
http://gnosticteachings.org/courses/twenty-two-arcana-of-tarot/320-arcanum-1-the-magician.html

The unequivocal comment is made

'Spiritual elevation can be reached only through in-depth Meditation and sexual transmutation.'

Or in other words conscious labour; however it was in the Beelzebub's Tales forum that I wish to expand on the subject of sexual transmutation and unless that can be done today it might be the middle of next week before my next post as there is the possibility that this weekend could be busy.

That said it was a concern for me reading such a great amount in Gnosis emphasizing the critical importance of sexual transmutation in our quest for higher consciousness whereas Gurdjieff in Beelzebub's Tales is far less open or perhaps better put, literal about the subject than say for instance Samael Aun Weor in The Perfect Matrimony. So you can imagine how pleased I was when re-reading Chapter 39 to find that it's all there. Where there seems to be an anomaly between Gnosis & Mr. Gurdjieff is that, Mr. Gurdjieff doesn't use the term Kundalini for the raising of fire through the spinal medulla but describes the action in C.39 without attaching to it a specific name which given all of the neologisms in 'The Tales' is a point worth noting for discussion in itself?

We know that Mr. Gurdjieff is quite disparaging about ‘Kundalini’ in ISOTM Chapter 11 mentioning that the term is sometimes connected with sex energy. Here is undoubtedly a terminological conflict between Gurdjieff and Gnostic teaching. So this is where we must go back to C.39 and study exactly what Beelzebub is trying to tell us.

---

by Alistair

The Master Jesus said, “Ye must be perfect as your Father in heaven is perfect.” We are not perfect. Many people nowadays believe that this was a symbolic thing that He said, that we become perfect by believing in Him. But it is not said that way. It is said very clearly, “Ye must be perfect.” This is a very direct statement, and part of a talk in which He is discussing, anyone who has adultery cannot enter heaven; anyone who criticizes, who kills with their words, cannot enter heaven; murderers, fornicators, adulterers, cannot. The reason is heaven is, in levels, the realm of perfection, of perfected beings. How can we, who are imperfect, enter there? We cannot. We enter there by becoming like them, perfected in ourselves, which is a work of will.

http://gnosticteachings.org/courses/twenty-two-arcana-of-tarot/347-arcanum-1-transcription.html

---

by Alistair

Last week in my first post to the online workgroup exercise I was somewhat sceptical about certain elements of the exercise, most specifically the examples listed as possibilities for confronting one’s inner considering.

In that post I quoted the following three elements as the key ingredients for creating the Revolution of Consciousness
Alchemy
Meditation
Service to others

Also in that post was a reference to my resistance towards posting anything work related onto my Facebook (FB) page. In that post the reasons given were the wish to avoid astonishment and misconception but there is also a niggling feeling of throwing pearls to swine even though some of my FB connections are those who participate or are at least aware of ‘the work’.

I’ve regularly found during the last few years while attempting to work that things just happen, you might call it coincidence, synchronicity, whatever.....
Last week having made the remark about FB and with some niggling thoughts about service to others I decided to post a link to a series of Gnostic lecture transcriptions on the subject of Death; in my view an excellent series that for me fleshed out the comments of Beelzebub in the final two paragraphs of ‘the Tales’ before Mr.Gurdjieff has the final word.

The initial post was made on Friday 18th. Apart from a friendly hello unrelated to the lecture programme only one other of my 149 connections made any response. Interestingly however that one response came from a man I met during 2010 in connection with ‘the work’ and his response created an excellent opportunity.

Here is the exchange of posts

"We can learn very little from the phenomenon of birth, but from death we can learn everything." - Samael Aun Weor, The Great Rebellion
http://gnosticteachings.org/courses/death.html
18 November at 20:42

B; Why?
Saturday at 08:02

Alistair; Dear B, hello, I suspect your question may apply to the SAWeor quotation in which case the only possible comment would be, follow this valuable link, read the lecture transcriptions.
Saturday at 08:33

Alistair; B, once you've read them you're feedback will be much appreciated
Saturday at 08:41

B; OK I'll have a read. But I've spoken to students of gnosticism and also visited a centre of theirs here in Athens. Although they seem well read I find their philosophy to be a great mix combining Christian, Hindu, Western magical traditions etc. That I find suspect. I feel the same about New Age stuff that tries to combine everything into one. Anyway when I have some time I'll read the above link and let you know.
Saturday at 17:02

Alistair; B, thank you. Gnosis initially caught my attention due to similarities with Mr. Gurdjieff's material including much of the terminology. In current times Gnosis' most influential messenger Samael Aun Weor states throughout his writing & lectures that Gnosis is a synthesis of the essence of all religions which in their essence and by means of all the Holy messenger & scripture deliver exactly the same message to the inhabitants of this planet; awake, raise your consciousness . Unfortunately Facebook does not transcribe bold or underlined type as I wished to emphasise the words essence.

In respect of this particular post focused on our inevitable death you may recall the final two paragraphs of Beelzebub’s Tales where Beelzebub replies to Hassein’s question about the inhabitants of planet Earth…….

“Whether it is still possible by some means or other to save them or direct them into the becoming path?”

"The sole means now for the saving of the beings of the planet Earth would be to implant again into their presences a new organ, an organ like Kundabuffer, but this time of such properties that every one of these unfortunates during the process of existence should constantly sense and be cognizant of the inevitability of his own death as well as of the death of everyone upon whom his eyes or attention rests."

"Only such a sensation and such a cognizance can now destroy the egoism completely crystallized in them that has swallowed up the whole of their Essence and also that tendency to hate others which flows from it- the tendency, namely, which engenders all those mutual relationships existing there, which serve as the chief cause of all their abnormalities unbecoming to three-brained beings and maleficent for them themselves and for the whole of the Universe."
Beelzebub's Tales to His Grandson Chapter 47, page 373
Saturday at 20:49

B; Thanks Alistair. The Gurdjieff quote has great insight and is identical to a Carlos Castaneda practice. (of always remembering: "I am a being that is going to die". By the way did you know Castaneda was a very good friend, if not student, of one of Gurdjieff's pupils, Lord Pentland?). Yes awareness of the unavoidability of death is probably the fastest way to appreciate the value of one's life. But so is considering the question "Is there life before death?"

Now while in essence all spiritual paths originate and return to the 'Oneness', for want of a better word, I strongly believe that each spiritual tradition has its own integrity and reason for having been born. Every once in a while along comes a new religion that supposedly contains all the previous ones (eg Bahai religion)

Gurdgieff, Castaneda, and other esotericists reformulated ancient Knowledge because it was necessary for their times, and were able to do so because they were trained and also had direct access to the transcedental realm. So their teachings still have a ring of truth today, and a unique authenticity about them. This is very different from various New Age systems and modern day gurus whom I've seen or read who have created bastardised systems of teaching from the best bits that they picked from books they have read, and which they usually use to become rich .

When I visted the Gnostic centre in Athens I was very surprised that from the first meeting they gave everyone there an Indian mantra to repeat in order to start becoming conscious in their dreams. It was like saying :"take this magic pill and you'll become more powerful". There was no respect for the tradition where these words came from, they were simply stolen and also I believe devalued. By contrast, in my experience, if you study Buddhism, Taoism or Yoga your teacher initiates you into the tradition after some time and only then will give you a mantra, the meaning of which you can also understand because you have studied the scriptures. In other words first you adopt a way of life and a viewpoint as if you lived in a spiritual family, before you are given words of power that facilitate progress in that path. I questionned the Gnostic teachers about this and they just said that their system contained the best from all traditions (and that's why it was the best system of course!). The Gnostics have some interesting philosophical ideas about 'the archons and the pleroma' but I doubt very much that Gnostic teachings today are authentic. I know a group of people who left a Gnostic group after the leader there died, and they were all kind of burnt out by the strange sexual tantric practices they had been taught.

My advice is for one to respect the integrity of traditions, not make a soup out of them and through one's own experience to reformulate knowledge for oneself first. In other words to first study oneself. Only then can one appreciate the diversity and unity of the various paths.
Sunday at 11:52

Alistair; B, apology for the delay replying but once you reach my age daily physical exercise is vital. The subject matter of this discussion also warrants some time spent.
You have much experience and knowledge of various religious traditions way beyond mine. Thank you for pointing out the manner in which these recognised and established traditions operate.

My experience of Gnosis is limited to the writing of Samael Aun Weor (SAW) http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Samael_Aun_Weor and transcribed lectures on the website http://www.gnosticteachings.org

SAW , as far as I am aware, the only currently reliable source of Gnostic written material, frequently emphasises throughout his writing exactly what you state in your last paragraph; one must experience for oneself. Real religion is not about belief, it is about experience. Those who are serious also know that ‘the work’ lasts at least a lifetime and perhaps more.

Maybe the question “Is there life before death?” could be answered with a quotation from ‘Beelzebub’s Tales’ Chapter 21 ‘The First Visit of Beelzebub to India’ p246
“Blessed is he who has a soul; blessed also is he that hath none; but grief and sorrow are to him that hath in himself its conception.”

Your comment on the recurring need for ‘the Divine message’ to be reformulated in order for contemporary understanding is undisputed. This could provide a clue as to why contemporary teachers might attempt to impart something quickly to an audience that is used to immediate gratification in convenience society. In Mr.Gurdjieff’s teaching we know it as the ‘first conscious shock’ which is essentially square one.

Tantra is also an interesting subject, fundamental in the teaching of SAW. Beelzebub also talks at some length about the subject in Chapter 39, The Holy Planet Purgatory, page 383 “being-Exioehary, which is for the beings themselves their most sacred possession”. He goes on to talk about our failure to now use the substance (page385) “neither for self-perfecting nor for conscious reproduction”. SAW in ‘The Perfect Matrimony’ deciphers much of the Bible allegory that relates to this subject.

The ‘Information Age’ has without question created the most fertile of environments for false prophets, the most corrupt of whom will almost certainly disguise themselves within established orders. Perhaps the reason Mr. Gurdjieff states in ‘Beelzebub’s Tales’ Chapter One, The Arousing of Thought, pages 24-25 that in the majority simply by reading the book the appropriate transformation “which are proper to man” will take place automatically was because he knew how rapidly the essence of his teaching would be rapidly lost in the future especially if left to humans given as Mr. Gurdjieff himself said our “psycho-organic need to wiseacre.”

Sunday at 19:50

You might well observe here my determination to have the last word, this sentiment was at the forefront of my mind from the moment the post was made. Conversely I felt there was much importance in responding positively without contention. The greatest disappointment was that nobody else participated, however, if just one other read the posts & lectures and gained something all will have been worthwhile. The experiment also highlighted that to make any impact using this method will require repeated effort which I’m still not sure would be justified?

Work Program week beginning 21 November 2011

---

by Cassandra

Not my will but thine be done

I believe it's my week to post although I thought Ian was just ahead of me.

Anyway, I have pondered Karen's task from a couple of weeks ago and have been thinking about the tension between the 'will of a righteous being (some words taken from Allistar) and allowing what will happen to happen. Willing is not magic, not forcing a solution, but there is a part for the obedient I's to play in coating a new body, is there not? It's not all passive.

I would appreciate any thoughts on this topic--what is the role of the active force and that of the passive in our lives?

---

by Judy

Hi, Cassandra,
Yes - your turn this week. I posted the roster for the third cycle in the Discussion Forum and will continue to do this each cycle.
Warm regards,
Judy.

P.S. The title of your post is synchronous with what I was saying earlier this morning. It totally changes any emotional reaction to what otherwise might be viewed (well, if I'm only thinking of MY will) as adverse happenings.
J.

---

by JohnS

Cassandra;

As I understand it, the forces are not static: a force can be active in one situation, and the same force can be passive (or reconciling) in another. So, you might have a positive will to do something in one situation, but when you try to will the same situation later on, perhaps it has changed to a passive role instead of active, so 'nothing happens'. I need to try and remember this right now, as I have been trying to achieve something I've 'managed to do' before, and I've been sitting here asking myself why can't I do it again now??

The only way to even attempt to analyse what type of will is dominant is to sit back and try and see the big picture, every time.

John

---

by Alistair

Cassandra, this paragraph answers your question about I's being active, however the second paragraph from the following page relating to the first paragraph quoted might be viewed as less encouraging

In Search of the Miraculous, Chapter 3, page 60, paragraph 5
"The only chance of salvation is for a group of the more sensible servants to meet together and elect a temporary steward, that is, a deputy steward. This deputy steward can then put the other servants in their places, and make each do his own work: the cook in the kitchen, the coachman in the stable, the gardener in the garden, and so on. In this way the 'house' can be got ready for the arrival of the real steward who will, in his turn, prepare it for the arrival of the master.

In Search of the Miraculous, Chapter 3, page 61, paragraph 2
"But even the clearest understanding of his possibilities will not bring man any nearer to their realisation. In order to realise these possibilities he must have a very strong desire for liberation and be willing to sacrifice everything, to risk everything, for the sake of this liberation.

A sobering thought to start the day!

---

by Cassandra

Judy, John, Alistair, thanks for your comments. John, I can appreciate that the active and passive are dynamic and can change depending upon context; maybe this is what I need to keep in mind as well. And for me this has much to do with conserving energy. Knowing when to push and when to simply quiet myself. I had a situation at work today where I felt someone was attacking me. I was very taken aback; and now even hours after the event there feels like a small wound somewhere in the solar plexus arising from that encounter. The 'offender' apologized; so, what should I do with my hurt feelings? Will a peaceful relationship with the co-worker or put no engery into even thinking about him and what transpired.

I remember what Harry mentioned about thinking he would lose his job; rather than try to work it out, he meditated. So is that willing or allowing what will happen to happen? I think the latter.

---

by Alistair

The same advice as when starting meditation practice and the flow of thoughts seems unstopabble; everything passes, let it pass

---

by Judy

Cassandra,

There are many ways to transform negative emotions. We each have to find the ones which work the best for us in different circumstances.
Meditation is indeed one way.
Bringing yourself into the present is another. Then of course there are the many ways to do this; sensing is one of them, for example.
On this site we have several - the Heptachord of Suffering is one such.
Qualities such as 'acceptance' and 'letting go' have a place; even 'welcoming' the suffering.

Did you get the Nicoll downloads very recently from this site? If not, download them and if not all are successful, email me and I'll attach the six pdf s by return email. One could do worse than looking in the Index pdf under this topic and reading the relevant sections in Nicoll's Commentaries.

This is a most important part of our work. Some background theory is desirable. Sure - transformation is required; but how to effectively do this in the varying situations.....

Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by Cassandra

This has been helpful to say and be reminded of:

"forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us...."

---

by Cassandra

> Judy wrote:
> Cassandra,
>
> There are many ways to transform negative emotions. We each have to find the ones which work the best for us in different circumstances.
> Meditation is indeed one way.
> Bringing yourself into the present is another. Then of course there are the many ways to do this; sensing is one of them, for example.
> On this site we have several - the Heptachord of Suffering is one such.
> Qualities such as 'acceptance' and 'letting go' have a place; even 'welcoming' the suffering.

Did you get the Nicoll downloads very recently from this site? If not, download them and if not all are successful, email me and I'll attach the six pdf s by return email. One could do worse than looking in the Index pdf under this topic and reading the relevant sections in Nicoll's Commentaries.

This is a most important part of our work. Some background theory is desirable. Sure - transformation is required; but how to effectively do this in the varying situations.....

Judy, I have Nicole's commentaries and have read some. The question posed was more rhetorical than anything else. I know the path to peace lies in allowing the internal considering to pass, as Alistair says. Following last week's post concerning the WILL, I ask myself, what do I want in this situation? A measure of peace, more material for the creation of a 'heavenly body,' or the same dead end? I want the former. But I have to continually ask for 'forgiveness of my trespasses' as I 'forgive' the trespasses of others. It's like two sides of the same coin. If I see wrongdoing in others, then I have done wrong. So, I ask for a reconciling force to help me SEE differently.

Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by Alistair

The things that raise the greatest anger in us are when we sense them most acutely in ourselves but this serves as an opportunity to understand ourselves.
It's that old cliche, nothing hurts more than the truth

How to reduce these I's/egos/psychological aggregates is another question which we are perhaps closely focused on right now on the Beelzebub's Tales Forum.

---

by Gururaj

Jeanne de Salzmann , in Reality of Being, Ch.20,pages 44/45 gives a precise exposition of the 'passive will' as an aid to sense a finer force in me - while engaged in the everyday manifestations and expressions (downward current) of our being.

"What is important is that the two currents (upward and downward , evolution and involution) be established in me, havin g a definite relation that is maintained.
Until now the descending current alone has been the master of my Presence,without being confronted.

The ascending current has its source in the will to BE - not "will" in the usual sense but in the sense of the "wish to be".
It is necessary above all to disengage this will,to make room for it.I must accept being passive,really passive,in order that an active vibration can be perceived by my feeling.
The effort I can make with my ordinary means,the only effort that is incumbent on me , is one of voluntary passivity - a conscious effort."

I wonder what is the taste/sensation of this ascending current/ active vibration . Any experiences / pointers to share please ?

---

by Alistair

Gururaj, we are not sure about the term passive. It was our impression from descriptions of person types on the enneagram that type 9, the Mediator was the most difficult type to transform largely because of their passivity?

---

by Gururaj

Dear Alistair :

Did a quick recce of Eneagram personality types and it seems to me that they are the person's innate tendencies , and consequently the cause of their particular type of mechanicalness / expression in life.

But once the person starts 'Work'ing , other possibilities can be accessed.

The ' passive will ' indicated in my quotation from Mme Salzmann's book is , I gather, in the domain of Work ,a conscious effort, and not the in-born passivity of a type 9 .

Thanks for being a cause for me to look up about the Enneagram types.

Regards,
Gururaj

---

by Harry

If you are talking about the popular book on personality types, please don't bother. It is a wise acre effort. The enneagram is a learning device. Not a tarot card.

---

by Alistair

Dear Harry, would you conclude that the Enneagram has no useful purpose in identifying and dealing with specific types of person. When you mention Tarot in such derisory tone one would assume you see little relevance there either. Do you include the Arcana as wiseacre?

---

by Karen

> Harry wrote:
> If you are talking about the popular book on personality types, please don't bother. It is a wise acre effort. The enneagram is a learning device. Not a tarot card.

Harry,

A most revealing comment "The enneagram is a learning device."

I attended a course on sacred geometry last year that mathematically and geometrically defined the human body light body Mer-Ka-Ba. (chariot -divine light-spirit-body)

In short, our instructor, a student of researcher and physicist Drunvalo Melchizedek described the Merkavah as a "Star Tetrahedron", which can viewed as a three dimensional Star of David. By imagining two superimposed "Star Tetrahedrons" one masculine, one feminine as counterrotating, along with specific "prana" breathing techniques, certain eye movements and mudras, one can activate a non-visible 'saucer' shaped energy field around the human body that is anchored at the base of the spine.

One of the most interesting things that came out of the course work is that if someone was to look down from a aerial viewpoint at the human body with all bodies activated and in motion, one would see the enneagram. This was illustrated in the course via precise mathmatical calculations along with hands on exercises, some of which came from Madame Blavatsky.

Karen

---

by Harry

Alistair,

I have studied the Tarot. I used to do readings for others until they started to scare me. I've studied the I Ching. I've done astrological birth and progression charts. All of these have some meaning. But the personality of the enneagram, at least what I've read over here, is a book of pap. I started reading it once, decades ago.

Let me put it this way, The Kabbalah is one of the most sacred studies available. Whether you look at Hebrew, Greek, or Arabic. But I don't think Madonna has the slightest idea what the Kabbalah is.

If someone gets help from the Personality of the Enneagram, then fine. Don't kick anyone's religion. But this is a Work Group. This is supposed to be a group that is beyond the Madonnas of the world. (And that says nothing about Madonna. She might even be a sacred individual. But I kind of doubt it.)

Harry

Work Program week beginning 28 November 2011

---

by Ian

Ponder: What is the relationship between embarrassment and inner considering? Is there such a thing as objective inner considering and objective embarrassment?

Consider making a vow that this week you will put yourself into what you consider as an embarrassing situation. Observe your physical, emotional and mental reactions to the situation.

---

by JohnS

I have already had an example of this situation this week:

Suddenly, from nowhere, I had a gut feeling of the reality of the'terror of the situation': for fifteen minutes I actually felt that something had to be done NOW regarding my development, or it would be too late.
Then: I suddenly had to ask a simple technical question, the answer to which I should have easily known 30 years ago in my professional career. I observed much embarrasment on my part, and following imaginary scenarios such as "I hope nobody else finds out"...
I was simultaneously telling myself this is ridiculous compared to what I had been previously experiencing, but the inner considering maintained a prominent place. I was embarrassed that I was embarrassed.

John

---

by Karen

> Ian wrote:
> Ponder: Is there such a thing as objective inner considering and objective embarrassment?

How can one have 'objective' inner considering when one is identified or identifying? Is this not mechanical? Unless perhaps the considering is made conscious. But would we then call it external considering????

Karen

---

by Judy

Karen wrote:

> Unless perhaps the considering is made conscious. But would we then call it external considering????

Hi Karen, Interesting comment. I had a go at this the way you mention. What happens when my internal considering becomes conscious through self-observation is that I stop it, rather than calling it external considering, which it cannot be without changing content beyond recognition.
(I think. )

Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by Cassandra

Yes, yes an avoidance at all costs of being embarrassed. Would one rather be sick than embarrassed? For me this relates to the imaginary 'seat of honor.' I notice this in most social situations where I would like to be recognized, acknowledged for my comments, thoughts, humor, etc, etc. Be included as a member of the 'A' team as we say in the states. But instead of this, a task I set for myself is to attempt to be in a place and not be recognized for any meaningful contributions to the discussion. Of course, this is tricky as well because the internal I's have to forego recognition as well. In other words, if I'm in a discussion and externally I don't comment, then I have to be as vigilent in allowing that work to pass rather than stop and praise myself internally for being 'oh so conscious.'

I say all this to say that seeking the 'seat of honor' is the flip side of embarrassment. I didn't vow to do this, but I did go to a Christmas parade last night and yelled out names of my 13-year old daughter's friends as they rode by on floats. She was embarrassed a bit (I don't care), and it made me pause to wonder 'am I embarrassing myself?"

---

by Alistair

The moment we read this exercise it reminded us of our comment recently in a post to the Beelzebub's Tales forum
We said that we were embarrassed by how much had been missed in three reads of the Chapter

From that we pondered whether it would be objective if as a result of this 'embarrassment', or maybe it was really just disappointment, that it prompted us to pay more attention and read more carefully, in other words to consciously learn from a mistake

---

by Gururaj

Embarassment - in my 4th way terms - a specific form of internal imagining and automatically constrained posture , usually in the presence of one or more persons whom we consider as important for the esteem of our personality .

One feels a set of negative emotions ranging from mild to acute ,depending on our mechanical perception of how inappropriately we have expressed ourselves.The feelings are compounded if the significant 'others' also seem to be responding in a way appearing to judge us negatively.

On more than a couple of ocassions last week , I intentionally expressed myself overcoming a thought that that particular expression would be inappropriate (for my personality). Somehow it was a bit liberating, giving some elbow room to manoeouvre in inner spaces.Thanks, Ian.

Only conscious application of attention and will can make the living of this mantra possible - " Be very serious about not taking yourself seriously "

Gururaj

---

by Alistair

Gururaj, the observation of your state is well articulated. It reminds us of the refreshing feeling of admitting oneself to be wrong. This feeling was first experienced during the mid 90's when in a senior management position. Our two closests assistants were women who perhaps as a result of their own egotistical aims delighted in pointing out my errors. The initial impulse is of course to defend ourselves until the realisation that it only leads to further conflict.

Your one remark that we are perhaps at odds with is to be 'very serious about not taking yourself seriously'
This reminds us of a Sufi reminder that being greedy not to be greedy is in fact still greed

---

by Lawrick

Karen writes,

> How can one have 'objective' inner considering when one is identified or identifying? Is this not mechanical? Unless perhaps the considering is made conscious. But would we then call it external considering????

Of course one can become aware of internal considering. How else could we observe and change. Of course one can become aware of being identified. Are you suggesting you've never become aware of being identified? Is it objective or mechanical for the OBSERVER to be aware of these phenomena. External considering is not being aware that one has become inconsiderate, (inner considerate). External considering is placing the requirements of another first, at which point it becomes external or objective. But of course you might disagree. 😈

Fred

Work Program week beginning 5 December 2011

by Judy

Hello Everyone.
Fred is travelling at the moment and he didn't take his computer with him but has email access. (He's having a great touristy time too!). He emailed me the following just this morning for his contribution.
Here it is:

How does one remain present in the presence of another. How does one participate in the conversational ebb and flow without quickly becoming identified and falling asleep. Talking to another while remaining present is a continuing experiment producing for me, little to no results in terms of staying awake.

Awakening during a conversation is a great wonder to me, something I believe must be an act of Grace. Once awakened there is no judgement as to what my companion is or to what he is saying. Strangely, everything can make sense in its own way regardless of intent or content. All is possible in its specific framework. Has anyone else noticed this? There is a higher understanding involved, a greater external consideration.

My difficulty lays in maintaining this state.

Here are a few observations for your consideration;

I tend to say very little.

When I do speak I speak very slowly and deliberately with consideration to everything I say.

The words become the sound of my ideas and are quite noticeable.

I have noticed a bluish aura around the person to whom I'm speaking. This has happened several times for whatever reason. Enjoy your heart attack Ian.

But inevitably I again fall asleep, and the more I hold on, the faster it goes. "If you love something……."! When am I going to learn this cosmic truth. This falling asleep comes much faster when I stop listening and feel compelled to speak. Why is this? Do I identify faster with my own ideas? Yes, I think.

So the job this week is to awaken during a conversation and to report back to the Big Kahuna with your observations. It might help to bring an unusual coffee mug, book, or anything out of the ordinary which you might place in front of you, and which may serve to wake you up from time to time. In any case, that's my story and I'm sticking to it.

Regards,

Lawrick

---

by Gururaj

“If you love something……”! Would someone fill in the blanks please ?

Nice to hear from Fred Lawrick with this sublime exercise. It seems he has been more in communion with the Big Kahuna than we coconuts !

Gururaj

---

by Lawrick

Gururaj, I apologize for not knowing your name. Please fill in the blanks my friend.

“If you love something……”! Would someone fill in the blanks please ?

Nice to hear from Fred Lawrick with this sublime exercise. It seems he has been more in communion with the Big Kahuna than we coconuts !

"If you love something, set it free"!

In this context, in fact in all my experience, I've found that attempting to prolong a state of awareness is one of the fastest ways to chase it away. Holding on is an selfish act in my opinion, and these higher states of Grace, to me at least, are gifts from something so great and unfathomable that we almost commit a sin by attempting to alter that presence. What do you think?

As to your comment about having more in communion, please, if you only knew how little I experience, and how much I admire and respect the thoughtful commentary of the group and their experience, you would not make this statement. It's important to realize, that we all enter these states at different times and intensities not one more than the other and here, we have an opportunity to share.

My friends call me Fred. Lawrick is a nickname.

---

by Alistair

Fred, your last line reminds us of an old adolescent wind up
My friends call me Fred, you can call me Jim Seriously thanks for putting into words something that's been around us for sometime

The classic example noticed many times is when walking through the village reminding ourself to remember ourself and as soon as somebody approaches, everyone still greets one and other in Crimea Mountain villages, we exchange greetings then 30 seconds later realise there was no self remembering at all. Of course this is the same as meditation or for us novices just trying to develop concentration, oh how difficult, keep trying, perhaps eventually

---

by Cassandra

Hi Fred, nice to hear from you. Hope you're enjoying your VAY CAY.

I'm to attend an office Christmas luncheon tomorrow. I have been thinking about who I want to sit next to, don't want to be beside a boring person, want to be where there is laughter. Yes, yes I know how it sounds, but it's honest. At the same time, I've thought about just accepting whomever shows up next to me. And the added consideration of trying to be present in that person's presence is a bonus. I will try the quietness and deliberateness of speak rather than the merry merry routine.

---

by Lawrick

Alistair writes;

> Fred, your last line reminds us of an old adolescent wind up
> My friends call me Fred, you can call me Jim

You can call me Fred, or Freed, or Freud, or Fraud, or Lawrick as long as you call. Is that better my Caucasian Cinder.

Cassy writes:

I will try the quietness and deliberateness of speak rather than the merry merry routine.

Cassandra, just BE. Observe and BE. The first part of the relationship is waking up, becoming aware. Then bring that companion into the sphere of your awareness.
If you are There then you shall begin to observe both yourself and the other. It helps to know your companion. There were times with my niece Karen, that not only could I maintain this state for a very long time, but after a while Karen and her essence would also appear. Karen's essence is about 6 years old and always wanted to giggle and laugh and play. Other wondrous things occurred but that would be up to Karen to disclose.

But within this sphere is a Love so great that I'm almost compelled to suggest that Consciousness is nothing less than pure Love, Agape. Very difficult to express with the wounded words we are required to use.

Harry, thank you for the difficult and brilliant work on the Tales. My understanding dropped rapidly beyond Chapter 36 but your work is giving me hope that much more might be understood.

Regards,
Lawrick,Fred,Freed,Fraud, Just don't call me Johnson!

---

by Judy

Fred writes:

> But within this sphere is a Love so great that I'm almost compelled to suggest that Consciousness is nothing less than pure Love, Agape. Very difficult to express with the wounded words we are required to use.

Yes. And so beautifully expressed, dear Fred.

Thank you for this exquisite exercise. I am incorporating it into ordinary life (which it transforms, by the way) as often as I remember to do so. More on this later though, as this week I'm very short on computer time.

Sorry folks that I haven't posted the next cycle roster yet either. Gururaj, you start us off as usual please, this coming Monday. Roster will be up in the discussion forum soon.

Love and blessings to all,
Judy.

---

by Gururaj

> Lawrick wrote:
> In this context, in fact in all my experience, I've found that attempting to prolong a state of awareness is one of the fastest ways to chase it away. Holding on is an selfish act in my opinion, and these higher states of Grace, to me at least, are gifts from something so great and unfathomable that we almost commit a sin by attempting to alter that presence. What do you think?
>
> As to your comment about having more in communion, please, if you only knew how little I experience, and how much I admire and respect the thoughtful commentary of the group and their experience, you would not make this statement. It's important to realize, that we all enter these states at different times and intensities not one more than the other and here, we have an opportunity to share.

Dear Fred :

Firstly, I admit a lapse in missing to type "with" before "we coconuts" which has given a different spin to what I wanted to convey.My intention was certainly not to compare .Apologies to all other group members if such an impression was perceived.

Yes, holding on is like trying to grasp a fish in water.We can only keep tilling the soil,and do so with greater intensity in such states of presence. Not much personal experience of (obvious )Grace ,I must say here.

Gururaj

---

by Alistair

Oh Guru you're right on it, grabbing for the fish in water, keep on tilling the soil xxx

Work Program week beginning 12 December 2011

---

by Gururaj

3 exercises (need not be simultaneous) .Attempt them with Attention and Will.

As often as you can ,sense and relax the body as you breathe , imagining that the air is taken in and out by the entire body.

Practise giving someone what you think you are without.
Sometimes you may feel that someone should pay you attention, listen to you or respect you.When you are stuck in this, switch the situation round and put that which you think you are without at the disposal of the person of whom you expect, demand or are trying to enforce something like this.
(Source - The Ouspensky foundation http://www.ouspensky.info/exercisefile.htm)

The Inner Stop exercise
".. you stand motionless in your mind. Thoughts pass you, speak to you, ask you what you are up to and so on, but you pay no attention to them. You will see at once that Inner Stop is connected with a form of Self-Remembering. Now you must note that the Inner Stop exercise is not the same as trying to stop your thoughts. Try to stop your thoughts;and if you are sincere about your experiences of yourself—and you cannot work unless you are—you will admit it cannot be done. But to stand motionless in your mind is another matter. You can stand internally motionless in the mind, just as your body can externally stand motionless in the world. Now what does motionlessness do ? What virtue does it possess ? In Nature motionlessness is widely made use of for a definite purpose. Movement is the first thing noticed. The eye perceives movement before it sees colour or shape. The stopping of all movement is a common device in the animal world to escape notice.
The object is not to feign death, but to become invisible. Slowing down of movement also makes detection more difficult, as when a cat is stalking a bird. To practise Inner Stop in the mind is like making oneself motionless in space. You are not noticed. Yes—but not noticed by whom? In your mind you are surrounded by different 'I's. Each wants you to believe that you are it. Each wants to speak in your name.Suddenly they cannot find where you are. They look everywhere for you. I assure you that you can experience their searching for you and not finding you. "
(Source - M.Nicoll , "Psychological Commentaries ...." Vol.5)

Gururaj

---

by JohnS

My most telling stop exercise this week has been at mealtimes: often I would suddenly do it while food was in my mouth, and besides the awareness it brought, there were other observations such as: time had slowed, as it was now observed (it was no longer attached as a rushed part of my life), I was suddenly very hungry for the food I was eating, and often (but not always) there was gratitude for my simple action of having a meal. There was also observation of how hard I was being on my teeth (unnecessarily). Time didn't expand or stop, although it was much fuller and 'sweeter'.

Especially outdoors, with space around, time became more static, as there was suddenly so much more to see and hear, and for the body to become small within that huge space

John

---

by Gururaj

A discovery this week was the seeing that in most interactions with another person i have an emotional expectation or stake which was not so obvious as the explicit purpose of the transaction.
Some folks (more so, men) are more like this ,I wonder - unaware of feeling in themselves and the other person ?

---

by JohnS

Yes, Gururaj, I often notice this propensity with men, but wondering if it was just me, as it is something I have noticed in myself constantly, and which doesn't seem to get much better even though I fight it many times. I have been trying to improve myself, but, regarding the general idea of men in general, I find myself often 'hating' men for their attitudes towards women.
The counter-result is that when this happens, I tend to respect women more, every time.
There is something going on here, in the larger picture, regarding the possibility of redeeming mabkind through the feminine principle (the Way of the Heart)

John

---

by Cassandra

Gururaj,

Thanks for this challenging task. I look forward to the conscious doing of it although I have some experience with excercise 2 already. Just on Sunday at a restaurant with some friends, I noticed that the waitress made eye contact with these friends much more than with me. I've perceived this before, and I believe it has a lot to do with people (the waitress) seeking to connect with the most familiar face because I've also been in situations meeting someone for the first time with others around, and my face was the one focused on, I believe, because it was most familiar to the 'new' person. But my ego says to me in these situations, 'see, you're being slighted', 'even though she's looking for a familiar face, she should know better' or 'I'm not leaving a tip, etc etc.' I was able to give this waitress something of what I wanted by continuing to smile and lightening up a bit. I tried to notice her movements and more of her being. I ended up leaving a tip.

Work Program week beginning 19 December 2011

---

by Harry

Legominism.

This is the perfect opportunity to delve into messages sent to us from the past. Not a typical Work assignment, but one that should be valuable.

We celebrate Solistice this week. Which means we also celebrate Christmas, and Chanukkah and Saturnalia, and a number of other observations. It also means that we've finished some major preparatory events in a number of cultures and religions. Advent being the Christian period that we just passed.

Why Christmas? Why a Tree? Why a Menorah? Why a celebration in midwinter. Twelve days of Christmas. Nine Candles on the Menorah. The advent wreath has four candles, three of one color and a fourth of a different color. In traditional religious preparations this was a period of fasting. Similar to Ramadan. Only one full meal a day and that should be the evening meal. Why the fasting? (Beelzebub says that this period of fasting along with that at Lent does away with the need to be full fledged vegan.)

If Christ was a Fish, then why was he "born" in December and why did he die in Spring? Of course this would be the ninth month if he was conceived and the Spring in the Northern Hemisphere.

Saturnalia allowed for five days of debauchery. Supposedly to balance out the 360 day calendar to the 365.4 day calendar. But I'm pretty sure the Romans looked forward to it as much as we look forward to the week long celebrations of Christmas and New Years. Wonderful thing to have in the Northern Hemisphere. A party to look forward to at the time when the Sun is at its lowest radiations, the temperatures are the coldest. Those of you who live in the Southern Hemisphere will have to help us with how you view this period of time, because it is opposite, I suppose.

We have the Biblical tradition of the Wise Men brining gifts to the new born child. So that is supposedly why we give gifts at Christmas. Gold Frankinsence and Myrhh. Why these gifts?

Reflect and study and report on your own observations. Think not only of these traditions but your own reactions to these events and to the time of the year. What messages were transmitted to us? And how do we use them best?

---

by JohnS

I have had five northern hemisphere Christmases, the rest upside down in the South.

As far as history and myth go, the Southern hemisphere has always seemed to Westerners to be the poor cousin, because we slavishly and sentimentally follow the north in its traditions and timing. Our Christmas cards have San.ta and snow
There is sometimes a bit of snow here in winter in the mountains where I live (winter is June-July-August), so the hospitality industry has tried a "Christmas in July" promo for the past 20 years or so. It is now waning, as the pretence felt just too ridiculous. Plus it doesn't snow any more.
Of course, we are also out of kilter with Easter, which comes in autumn.

There is a strong alternative group up here who celebrate the solstices, and have a winter magic festival for the winter one, but it is definitely against the mainstream (except for the Grand Parade and the market stalls).

All the traditions and calendars we were brought up on were based on northern calculations, and it was hard for us to appreciate the turning point at the winter solstice - the first seeds born towards the coming spring - when it was 40 degrees celsius outside, and a ridiculous full turkey dinner sat on the table.
When you study things such as astrology and the precession of the equinoxes, all the books reference the northern hemisphere, and mention the south casually by saying "in the south, calculate the exact opposite."

I always travel to Europe in the winter, as it is the most powerful and cleansing time for me.

Perhaps we should follow the southern traditions (Aboriginal, south American, etc), but it feels too foreign, as we are invaders, usurpers, and feel guilty at trying to adopt local traditional culture in order to make us feel comfortable.

John

---

by Alistair

'Nothing we have is our own'

http://gnosticteachings.org/courses/path-of-the-bodhisattva/516-gnostic-nativity-of-christ.html

---

by Judy

Some good food in the reading from the link Alistair provided above. Thanks, Alistair.
Here's a snippet appropo this time of year:

> It would be worthless for the Christ to be born one thousand times in Bethlehem if > he is not born in our hearts as well. We have to form Christ within ourselves in order to enter through the doors into the triumphant and victorious city on Palm Sunday.

>
> Christmas is a cosmic event that must be performed in each one of us. The Nativity (Christmas) is absolutely individual. It is necessary for the Christ to be born in each one of us. - Samael Aun Weor, Tarot and Kabbalah (1978)

May we all remember each and every day to continue to form the Christ within.

Best wishes to everyone,
Judy.

---

by Cassandra

John, my home is towards the south of the northern hemisphere (the state of Georgia, U.S.). It gets cold here, but we don't have much snow. It's quiet at this time, many people taking end of the year, Christmas holidays so it adds a challenge to me, that I cannot expect diversions and easy talk at work. My husband opined that because the earth is turning back towards the sun, it is a difficult time on the planet (although westerners are insulated, don't notice nature) but like Harry alluded, the winter celebrations help to carry us over this hard time. My mother is now a member of a religious group that celebrates no holidays, least of all Christmas. This makes me pause, not that I'm that attached to Christmas, but more that the exchange of cards acknowledging the holiday will be something that we will not likely share again.

Regarding last week's exercise, to allow thoughts to pass and the analogy of still animals. As I attempted the task on a walk, I noticed a rather large doe observing me as I passed a small wooded patch. I would like to think that I could become as still as she.

---

by Gururaj

Being very much a non-traditional Hindu, this week's task was an opportunity to go deeper into the various rituals that I am vaguely aware of as being performed still by some in this part of the planet.
As per Vedic (Hindu) tradition the period from approx. mid-December to approx mid-Jan is to be observed basically with the motto " pray early, pray more and avoid new beginnings and avoid feasting" . The temple prayers begin about 90 min. before sunrise as against the usual practice of around sunrise.The devout person is expected to be done with prayers before sunrise followed by an early repast . It is said that any prayer offered to Vishnu, in the early hours now , is worth thousand times more than at other times of the year.Any person dying on a particular day falling in this period can rest assured of the soul going straight to merge with the Absolute.

The festivities,post-harvest , start from and after Jan.14th when the sun transits from Sagittarius and 'enters' the sign of Capricorn.
(So, the winter solstice itself (around Dec. 22nd or 23rd) is not the transition marker for this period but the sun's transit as told above).

Yet, the explanation for this tradition is as follows (based on my brief research only) - For the Devas (gods - of an intermediate status - and not the Holy Trinity) one day is equal to a year of earthlings.Their day starts as the sun reverses its apparent movement after the winter solstice and night begins when the sun starts to go back the other way after the summer solstice (presumably, the gods of the southern hemisphere sense these things in the opposite )

Now, the hour and half before sunrise for we humans is considered to be the ideal time for waking up and performing daily prayers and meditation.So , for the gods this period of Dec/Jan is wake-up time and we need to be very reverential now.

Another explanation for the extra rigour of this holy period is to counter balance the lesser day-lght hours and the tendency to sleep more in the cold winter mornings , though in most parts of India the minimum temperatures stay anywhere between 5 to 15 degrees depending on the latitude and altitude of the place.

---

by Harry

So the Hindu tradition remains very much the same with a different set of concepts. Thanks Gururaj.

Work Program week beginning 26 December 2011

by Alistair

Apology for my tardiness, herewith my suggestion for this weeks group exercise

A web-site from which I receive frequent contributions is http://www.Poetry-Chaikhana.com

On 111111 this poem was the selection

Repeating the name of the Beloved, by Bulleh Shah (1680 - 1758)
English version by J. R. Puri and T. R. Shangari

Repeating the name of the Beloved
I have become the Beloved myself.
Whom shall I call the Beloved now?

The site host went on to explain the meaning of the poem thus
Many Sufi traditions practice zikr, he remembrance of the name of God, often through all-night prayer circles that involve devoutly repeating the names and attributes of God. You'll find similar practices in Hinduism and Buddhism with the recitations of divine names and word formulations through mantra and japa. In Catholicism, there is the repetition of the rosary. In Eastern Orthodox Christianity, there is the Jesus Prayer...

The purpose behind all of these practices is a gentle but persistent assault on the mind. By taking the name or words that most remind you of the Divine, and repeating it over and over again, with attention and devotion, a cleansing process starts to occur in the awareness. The mind, at first, likes the sense that it is 'doing something good,' focusing on sacred things; but it soon becomes impatient, wanting to return to its old fixations, its comfortable patterns and habitual ways of viewing the world. Continuing the practice of sacred repetition allows the mind no quarter, bringing it back again and again to focus on the Divine. Do this long enough, and the mind starts to see empty spaces in itself -- a terrifying experience for the mind, since it normally expends great energy to hide its essentially empty nature behind constant activity and attachment. But continue the practice further still, deeply, and an amazing thing happens: The mind not only sees its emptiness, it sees THROUGH its emptiness to the radiance within. It recognizes that that shining presence was what was being named all along. And, since the mind has finally admitted that it has no solidity or boundary, that it has no essential reality in itself, it recognizes that there is no separation from that living radiance. The identity is finally understood to have always resided There, within the Beloved all along -- you have "become the Beloved" yourself!
Also see
http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Zikr

So this week I suggest that we perform our own personal Zikr by putting together probably three but preferably the seven most motivational, wake up statement for ourselves. They might come from the Bible, Qu'ran, Beelzebub's Tales, Pinnochio, Ian McFarlane's Exotic cookery book, whatever you wish. Morning & night spend ten minutes reciting these until you memorize them.

You might wish to share these with the group, but you may wish to pray in private, the choice is yours; regardless this Zikr can be used at any time in the future.
Wishing you all a profitable week ahead and when it arrives may 2012 bring you the best of health with many more years to come.....

---

by Judy

A personal zikr is something most of us may already have, though we may not have thought of it in quite those words.

For me, there are several chants, mantras, prayers and poems which I use frequently. They come from various traditions.

From Gurdjieff, there is the Holy Equation prayer and the AIEIOIUOA.
I would also include self-observation and self-remembering as an important part of my personal zikr.
Also the Gurdjieff "Sitting".
Also several learned methods of the transformation of negative emotions.

From other traditions come;
The lord's Prayer
Serenity Prayer
"Now I lay me down to sleep" etc - has persisted occasionally from age about 4 years.
2 prayers attributed to St Francis "Lord have mercy. Christ have mercy. Lord have mercy" which I use when Work is difficult/flat/uninteresting. (Read as "When I am difficult, flat or uninterested..")

Om mani padme hum (chant)

Baba nam baba nam kevalam Baba nam baba nam kevalam Parum pita baba ki. (sung)
Sri Ram Jai Ram Jai jai Ram Om - repeated as a sung chant

Harimmmm - emphasis on second syllable - used as a meditation mantra sometimes Poetms of Rumi, Rabindranath Tagore, and Walt Whitman. Also Gibran and various classical English poets such as Wordsworth Shelley Yeats. Also Dylan Thomas, Robert Frost, Shakespeare's Sonnets in particular, Emerson, Thoreau and the list continues.

Here's one of them I especially love:

What Was Said to the Rose

What was said to the rose that made it open was said to me here in my chest.

What was told the Cypress that made it strong and straight, what was whispered the jasmine so it is what it is, whatever made sugarcane sweet, whatever was said to the inhabitants of the town of Chigil in Turkestan that makes them

so handsome, whatever lets the pomegranate flower blush like a human face, that is being said to me now. I blush. Whatever put eloquence in language, that's happening here.

The great warehouse doors open; I fill with gratitude, chewing a piece of sugarcane,

in love with the one to whom every that belongs!

Poem by Jalaluddin Rumi, translation ©2005 — Coleman Barks

And a new one for this week fro the Sufi tradition - thanks Alistair;

Repeating the name of the Beloved
I have become the Beloved myself.
Whom shall I call the Beloved now?

Maybe I've left some out, but a partial post is preferable to none at all.
I'd like to add to this. Maybe I can add something from the zikrs of others in the group, if you would please share here.
This is quite an important topic, Alistair. Thanks for your exercise. There will be times and situations for all of us when we will be left without access to information except that that we have made our own.

Best wishes to All,
Judith.

by Gururaj

What a diverse set of influences ,Judy !.Amazing open-ness.

As repetitive inner chants i 'do' just 3.

The Holy affirming,Holy denying,Holy reconciling .... prayer coupled always with the 12-bone sensing, Om namoh Bhagavathey Shri Ramanaya (in deep gratitude to my first - spiritual- guru, Ramana Maharshi) and the Gayathri Mantra

My regards to all with advance best wishes for a transforming 2012,
Gururaj

---

by JohnS

Thank you all for your insights.

Apart from many mentioned by Judy (the Gurdjieff ones), I have made up three myself this week, and intend to do several more, they being pertinent to the state I am trying to attain, because at the moment it happens to have more focus than usual, so I'll 'grab it while I can.'

Within a few days, I hope to have picked seven, and each of those with three aspects (active, passive and reconciling, for example, or physical, emotional and mental)
In this way, I hope that the inner structure will give me more focus in definite areas.

Thankyou, Alistair. When daylight saving ends in March, I will once more be up before dawn when going to work, so I will make an effort to recall your programme.

John

---

by Harry

I am, I wish, I can. Holy Rejoycing, Holy Revolting, Holy Reconciling, transubstantiate in me for my being. Amen. These are the G mantras. Others become sayings that are culled from many different sources, but which mostly come to mind when needed.

G: Do not do what can't be done.

The title of a book of poems: All gods must learn to kill.

e. e. cummings: there are possibly two and a half and impossibly three individuals

Every several fat thousand years
Expecting more is neither pathological
Nor fantastic, but Dumb
The number of times a wheel turns does not determine its roundness.
If swallows tryst in your barn be glad
Nobody ever earns anything.
Everything little looks big in a mist.
And if, by him whose blood was for us spilled,
Something more small or more distorted
than so called civilization exists
I'll kiss a Stalinist's ass.
In Hitler's Window on Wednesday next
At 3 Eastern Standard Time
Bring the kiddies
Let's all have fun.

Leonard Cohen: An Ape with Angel Glands.

G: Personality scarcely has a right to exist here.

Bob Dylan: We have to pay for going through these things twice.

e.e. cummings: if most people were to be born twice they'd improbably call it dying

Procol Harum: A pilgram climed to the top of the mountain to see the priest. When he finally got there he asked:
What's the meaning of life, father?
Well my son, the wise man replied,
Life is like a bean stalk
Isn't it.

Rolling Stones: You can't always get what you want, but if you try sometime, you just might find, you get what you need.

---

by Alistair

Thank you all for your rich contributions

There are so many words of wisdom available to us

Say Prophet 'If the whole ocean were ink for writing the words of my Lord, it would run dry before those words were exhausted' - even if we were to add another ocean to it.

Sura 18:109

Wishing you all the very best of health in 2012, with that, all things are possible.....

Work Program week beginning 2 January 2012

---

by Judy

The following is taken from the website of the Ouspensky Foundation http://www.ouspensky.info/exercisefile.htm
I think this was recently provided to us by one of the group. I've been experimenting with several of these and finding them worthwhile.
Perhaps others may find similarly.

Here is the suggested exercise for this week. Please attempt it at least three times and report on your findings.

- Practise: Take the position of the Objective Observer for 15 minutes. Explanation: This is the easiest exercise in the world, which is the least easy to put into practice. It is the exercise for filling so-called empty moments when waiting for the train, bus or people. The exercise is like this: resolve to just watch, listen, feel, smell and/or taste (these are the sensory functions) for 15 minutes. To optimise this exercise, the advice is to go to a busy environment, such as a park, a train station or busy shopping street. Naturally, you will notice that in no time, your consciousness will be stuck in one or other thought, association or judgement. When you see this, you open your consciousness again as wide as possible, and make sure you do not forget that consciousness is a fact. Every attempt at 'doing things yourself' will not work.

---

by Cassandra

Happy New Year Everyone!

Today, I received a 'shock' which reminded me of the necessity, no the urgency to Work. Nothing unreal can replace work efforts. I cannot even say that I really Work but rather make attempts at working, which is fine. I suppose the following quote is in the Koran; I remember it from the movie Malcolm X: "take one step towards Allah, and he will take two steps towards you." So, my efforts at 15 minutes of trying to maintain awareness is all that is necessary. In doing so, I hope to attract 'Allah' or more consciousness.

Have a blessed day.

---

by Alistair

Cassandra, thank you for starting the year with a positive reminder.

---

by JohnS

I have plenty of opportunities every day in my travel and work routine to do this, but the reminder of this exercise made some moments more intense.

Looking back over the week, I can't sense that there has been any net gain in energy or attention - not that I'm looking for a result, though I am looking for a feeling, a sensitivity I have lost, which perhaps stops me from doing this exercise as well and as heart-connected as it should be done.

I'll continue with it, as it is so fundamental for training, but i'll continue to question myself until I can truly take the correct "step towards Allah"

John

---

by Gururaj

The task , of becoming conscious to what the senses were experiencing during intervals between activities, was a useful one to bring awareness to otherwise wasted moments.
I aim to make this an operative practice. So ‘coming back to one’s senses’ has a different, specific meaning now.

Of late, though, my problem has been to get ‘free’ moments. A change in job function has led to me being somewhat overwhelmed by activities and to be amidst new situations which were automatically making me outward focussed.

But 3 situations came about which are helping me to attempt to manage mundane issues better and to arrest this automatic tendency of being identified with the external.

(a) Techniques for managing time better were , quite coincidentally, received – one from an Online source (http://www.superbeing.net/Simpleology101.html) and another set in a back issue (May,2011) of Harvard Business Review specifically focussed on personal productivity.

(b) I shared to a fellow seeker about my inner state about the situation I was facing at my workplace which was bothering me.(some , in my opinion, unprofessional work culture exhibited by a few colleagues) .Then , on further pondering, it occurred to me that the issue here was about what I was giving importance to – judging the behaviour of others or being aware of my self . This somehow led to more moments of watchfulness (of an immediate kind – not an after the fact, judging type. It has a different ‘taste’) . and sensitivity to when I was operating from personality.

(c) In response to my statement of life activities being too much , my friend gave a wonderful book by Karfield Graf Durckheim titled “The Way of Transformation – Daily life as Spiritual Practice” (Published 2007 by Morning Light Press) from his big collection of Work and related books. I'll post shortly about my experience of reading it in the Discussion Forum.

Gururaj

---

by Judy

Gururaj wrote:

> I aim to make this an operative practice. So 'coming back to one's senses' has a different, specific meaning now.

Yes, interesting, isn't it? I use this "coming back to one's senses"/sensing to ground me; also as a voluntary portal into presence.

Thanks everyone for the reports and comments.
Cheers,
Judy.

Work Program week beginning 9 January 2012

---

by Karen

pg 729 Vol 2 of the Commentaries

I remember it was said a long time ago by G. that we must remember that we can do this work.
What would be the good of teaching a system of Work that no one could do?

He said: "All call out in loud voices and say: I can work." We did this and I think we all got force from it.

So every one of you say to yourselves each day this week "I can work," because this is what we can do.
I can remember myself according to my own level;
I can separate from negative emotions according to my own state and my own level;
I can stop making internal accounts;
I can practice non-identifying;
I can stop fantasies;
I can stop self-justifying; and so on.

And even if it is only for a short time yet you are working if you can do this and you will change your level of being, not downwards, but upwards, not outwards, but inwards, and through this you will come under different influences, better influences, influences in other words that belong to your next level of Being...

Share your comments and findings with the group.

Happy 2012 everyone!

Karen

---

by Harry

When one of those small i's sound off for your attention, say internally "Stop. I don't have time to indulge you right now." Remember you can't fight. You can observe. Fighting internally is the civil war that G describes watching from Mars. If you fight a small i you give it power. If you separate and observe then you move into a neutralizing point.

---

by JohnS

Harry, I agree: I tried this week to fight, and I think I lost, on the whole.
Yet, today I read this quote:

The search for the soul is the hero's quest. Only by searching does one find it, for the soul only comes into being (is constructed) from the quest itself. That is the secret.

So: no choice but to try again, and look for the cumulative effect.

---

by JohnS

And, suddenly, just arrived in the post: quote from "Glimpses of Truth":

"You knew it all before. The only thing I did was to bring order into your knowledge. I systematised it. But you had it before you saw me. You owe it to the efforts you already made in the field....And thanks to this work, to your own work, you will be able to reach a much deeper understanding of what I have said. You will 'initiate' yourself. In a year's time we may say the same things , but you will not wait during this time in the hope that roast pigeons will fly into your mouth. You will work, and your understanding will change - you will be more 'initiated'."

---

by Gururaj

Apart from being aware of instinctively painful states like negative emotions,the momentary experience of

"I can stop savouring comfort ,pleasure and identified joy"

was also found to bring one to a balanced centre giving rise to a feeling similar to but not the same as pleasure

But that was last week.

This week,eventhough my first reaction on reading Karen's exercise was "wow",i've been mostly on autopilot.

At-least ,now , as I read the task again and the heaviness crept in at not having done justice to it, watched the cloud and away it went.

Gururaj

---

by Karen

> John Summers wrote:
> And, suddenly, just arrived in the post: quote from "Glimpses of Truth":
>
> "You knew it all before. The only thing I did was to bring order into your knowledge. I systematised it. But you had it before you saw me. You owe it to the efforts you already made in the field....And thanks to this work, to your own work, you will be able to reach a much deeper understanding of what I have said. You will 'initiate' yourself. In a year's time we may say the same things , but you will not wait during this time in the hope that roast pigeons will fly into your mouth. You will work, and your understanding will change - you will be more 'initiated'."

Thank you for well said post John. What a great journey.

Karen

---

by Cassandra

So, similar to saying 'I can work stop daydreaming' while driving to work or home from work, I said okay, 'your life depends on doing the 15 minutes of opening to the world, without becoming identified.' I've been sort of staying with this one for a while to feel and do it deeper. But in order to really DO it, I had to impose a harsh restriction on the I's that wander, and they all do that, flit from this to that.

---

by Karen

> Cassandra wrote:
> So, similar to saying 'I can work stop daydreaming' while driving to work or home from work, I said okay, 'your life depends on doing the 15 minutes of opening to the world, without becoming identified.' I've been sort of staying with this one for a while to feel and do it deeper. But in order to really DO it, I had to impose a harsh restriction on the I's that wander, and they all do that, flit from this to that.

Hi Cassandra,

Thank you for sharing your comments with the group.

Today I bask in gratitude (thankfulness for what is, as it is), but this was not the case last week.

On a similar front, my efforts to separate from negative emotions, well... The negative emotions that graced the stage were most powerful. I found much frustration by what should be versus what was actually happening. My request, wish and intent to work afforded fleeting moments of being a spectator to this event. But what I was able to view was more than usual and this in itself was difficult to digest. Despite my best efforts not to judge, I was serverly bothered by the mechanicalness of others and in turn, the mechanicalness of self. It went deeper this time and my ability to balance or reconcile was none existant. Despite Harry's warning, the internal fight was on.

One thing I was able to observe more clearly than before, was that placing demands or harsh restrictions on self and others created fight and a takeover of less beneficial influences. I observed this playing out this week at the office. Demands put the energy on the defensive, and prepared the troops for battle.

I was able to observe some of the contradictions in myself, illustrated that I am not one being, but many who are not necessarily connected or in alignment with one another. To read about this knowledge, or even receive a warning is one thing, but to search and have first hand experience of this playing out despite how difficult it is...this is the real gold.

Thank you for the warning Harry. Despite the fact that I could DO nothing, I beleive it assisted.

I parrot John's sentiments "So: no choice but to try again, and look for the cumulative effect."

Thank you Cassandra, Harry, Judy, Gururaj and John for sharing your findings with the group.

Karen

Work Program week beginning 16 January 2012

---

by JohnS

With all the connections in the past few weeks with the work we try to do, and the work we need to do, how about, this week, instead of concentrating on what to do, and what we should, or can, do, we reflect on -and let enter - one major factor needed for the process: Grace. Uncontrollable, unpredictable, essential:

"When the soul aligns with the body
The mind slivers glass with harmony of the three, impossible to acknowledge corruption in anything least of all, the self.
In the infinitesmal moment of water pleading with current, the Matrix is vitreous with the Universe and briefly, oh so briefly, a glitter of comets illuminates vision you celebrate the reason to exist down to one grain of sand bound to the next.

But the alignment is a rarity
you dare not ask, never seek, no church, no fast no prayer, no art will make a unison of the three."

John

---

by Cassandra

Very nice suggestion, John. Often, in this forum someone reports on more or less "effective" ways to work, for instance someone reports "this worked better than that." I'm not sure if it's a good idea to expect results. So much of what may happen with Work may not be perceived at all, or at least not for a long time.

Work Program week beginning 23 January 2012

---

by Cassandra

An Attempt at Perceiving Essence

Try, with all three centers, to perceive the essence of someone with whom you come into contact. This may be more easily done with someone you've known for a while, or it may happen as well with someone you just meet on the street. The aim of the exercise is to move beyond our routine perceptions of the other as primarily physical. Quiet listening in the presence of the other will help in this perceiving.

---

by Harry

Using the unfocused stare can change a level of perception. Don't think. Just see. See the other being. One of the processes that maintains our ordinary perception is that we are always judging and interpreting. Stop and just look.

Much of my life I taught Public Speaking. In order to provide helpful feedback I practiced trying to see the other being during the speech. When I say being I mean full being. This really allowed a focus that saw beyond the surface masks that we parade in front of our imagination on a regular basis, and those that we try to project to others.

Another thing that you can try to practice is to see the being of an actor in a movie or TV show. Just see what is being shown. Break the fourth wall yourself. There is no story. There is just these beings who have been photographed.

Leonard Cohen uses the line "there's a crack in the world through which the light gets in". You want to sneak a peak through that crack. And you will find that you open a crack in yourself.

---

by Cassandra

The closest I have come to this perception is not close at all, really, just another role played. But I've finally realized the vast power of imparting something positive to another person. This is simply a smile or saying thank you. Admittedly, this is 'playing nice,' and is merely role playing but at the same time, it helps me see the other at least, as worthy of an ordinary courtesy.

What I would like to do is 'see' them as you say, Harry, without even the compulsion to feel I owe a nicety. This is the real respect.

As always, I appreciate your insight.

by Judy

Nice little synchronicity...
Last night I picked up BT and began on Chapter 41.
First page, fourth paragraph there is a comment about how the typical contemporary who likes to talk on "higher matters", often automatizes himself without any essential cognition to talk to anyone who will listen. And I couldn't help but be reminded of myself during the early years.

Harry, looking at the tv without the story becomes very boring very quickly, doesn't it? Thanks for that useful little exercise.

I do have moments towards essential perception sometimes. The involuntary ones seem to be invariably in quieter atmospheres. I haven't worked a lot on the voluntary ones, so thanks Cass, for this opportunity to do so.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Judy

Here it is from the 1949 text;

> "He was very typical of those contemporary terrestrial three-brained beings who have a tendency > to enthuse over, as is said there, 'higher matters' and who always automatize themselves to speak > about them without any essential cognition with anyone they meet, on opportune and inopportune > occasions. And whenever we met, he also liked to talk only about these matters.

Interestingly, the earlier manuscript version doesn't include the bit about essential perception.

---

by Judy

Harry,
I just had a glimpse of going beyond "boring" while looking at a tv character. Is this sort of what you refer to?

Kind regards,
Judy.

---

by Harry

Judy,

It's more than just going beyond boring. It is to see the person underneath the mask. Or rather, masks. G talks about this. How real actors could portray a role in its essence. We have very very few. Instead we have people who try to twist their personalities to fit some preconceived notion. If you can just watch this (sound is OK, because sometimes the biggest cracks come in voices) then you begin to see when one mask is taken off and another is put on. At that moment you can see the underlying "person".

One of the things that Cassandra indicated in the initial post is also great. When you are walking around, just try to see the people. Make contact with them, eye contact. Many will not let you. But on occassion you will see a "real" person. You don't need to smile. Though you might, because you've just had a vision from a higher part of the ordinary center.

---

by Judy

Oh, I see.
We often see "real" people though, don't we? As you mention, eye contact is a way. Isn't this one of the reasons that a baby can hold the attention of a whole room of adults? And quiet listening is another way, as Cassandra suggests.
This is much simpler than I was making it. I was attempting to perceive "about" various essences, such as including aspects of typology and so on.
Cheers,
Judy.

---

by Cassandra

> Harry wrote:
> Judy,
>
> If you can just watch this (sound is OK, because sometimes the biggest cracks come in voices) then you begin to see when one mask is taken off and another is put on. At that moment you can see the underlying "person".

There are times when there seems to be a crack in the role someone is playing, for instance, when someone truly is amused by a joke. The polite setting of the face changes from a role or presentable expression to something less scripted. Someone is laughing at a joke because he really finds it funny, not out of politeness. This may be the fissure Harry mentions, the space between one mask and another. I find myself drawn to these fleeting moments; they stay etched in the memory. I will try to watch a movie now.

---

by Gururaj

During a meditation session today had an insight in the context of the legominism "As above , so below " which diminished the mischief of the usual 'I'.
Saw this as an example of grace.
In the subsequent discussion among the few of us assembled there, I was just absorbing what the others were saying without nitpicking or considering what to reply.There was a sort of unfocussed perception (akin to sightless gaze in the visual field).

[At-least one other person said he experienced a shift in the same session. Does a group (even our on-line forum) meditating together influence each other subtly ?]

More relevant to John's task of the previous week , would like to post something here from Ramana Maharshi on Grace.

"Question : Grace is necessary for the removal of ignorance ?
Ramana Maharshi : Certainly. But Grace is there all along. Grace is the Self. It is not something to be acquired. All that is necessary is to know its existence.
In the same way, the sun is pure brightness; it does not know darkness, although others speak of darkness fleeing away on its approach.
Like darkness, ignorance is a phantom, not real. Because of its unreality, it is said to be removed when its unreality is discovered.
The sun is there and shines and you are surrounded by sunlight; still, if you would know the sun you must turn your eyes in its direction and look at it.
Similarly, Grace is only to be found by effort, although it is here and now. "

Regards to all
Gururaj

---

by Judy

Morning Guru,

You wrote:

> Does a group (even our on-line forum) meditating together influence each other subtly ?]

Sometimes subtly and sometimes not so subtly.
Just before I read your above post, I'd been reading Ramana Maharshi's "Who Am I" from a small pdf found today also.
If you don't have an e-copy, I can send it if you wish. It is only small.

Kind regards,
Judy.

---

by Gururaj

Thanx Judy.

I have that booklet .

It had a massive (inner) impact on me many years ago and set me off on the truly religious path.

It made me begin to understand (intellectually) Krishnamurthi .

But finally Gurdjieff, 4 th way and actual practice with support of this group and a few persons in India, I am having 'organic' sensing , briefly, of these realities pointed at by Ramana.

Gururaj

Work Program week beginning 30 January 2012

---

by Ian

Humans are transformers of energy - food, air, impressions. Some of this energy is available for inner Work, provided we make efforts instead of wasting it mechanically. For example, we may waste energy by - uncoordinated functioning of the centers, worrying, daydreaming, fidgiting, inner-considering. Seekers are encouraged to observe themselves during the next week and look for the ways that they mechanically waste their energy. Ponder: Is there a connection between suffering and wasting energy?

Energy from impressions is one of the most vital foods needed for inner Work. During a 15 minute period each day, the seeker may sit and practice taking in impressions using the Sightless Gaze and Soundless Sound exercises, combined with a full body Sensing. Avoid catagorising the impressions with the formatory center. At the end of the sitting, observe and sense whether your inner state is more or less energisied than when you started.

During a 15 minute walk once a day, use the 12 Joint Sensing Exercise, as given in the sequence below. At every 'x' number of steps, move your attention to the sensation of the next joint. On Monday, use x = 7 steps; on Tuesday, use 6 steps, then 5, 4, 3, 2 and finally on Sunday, move your attention with every step. At the end of the walk, observe and sense whether your inner state is more or less energisied than when you started.

Sensing Sequence
---
1. Right wrist
2. Right elbow
3. Right shoulder
4. Left hip
5. Left knee
6. Left ankle
7. Right ankle
8. Right knee
9. Right hip
10. Left shoulder
11. Left elbow
12. Left wrist

Ponder: Does being in a three-centered state promote Serenity?

---

by Gururaj

A brief sitting with conscious relaxation on returning home from long work routine is always a good refreshing experience . The 12 joint sensing while walking is experienced ,for me, more as a means of conservation of energy which would have been otherwise wasted in scattered thoughts.

Twice during the week was in a situation (a long meeting at my workspot where I imagine that I am being judged by superiors and peers and that I need to measure up) which automatically tends to make me inner-consider so much that a heaviness of body results.One can see straightaway the connection between suffering and wastage of energy.It was more like a inward spiral.A little bit of negative emotion leading to lessening of alertness and weakening of affirmative strength and so on till finally the denying influence stiffens the body itself.

These meetings will come again .So the experiment will continue - if the impartiality in the experiencer survives.

---

by JohnS

This exercise (though not so ordered) is similar to the Alexander therapy exercises I constantly do, which consciously removes tensions from various parts of the body by conscious observation and 'key phrases' which work instantly. One always has to start, though, with observing and relieving tension in the neck, as this takes tension off the spine, for the spine is where most other tensions arise from. This is followed by a technique for removing the weight of the head from the spine, so that, when walking, the head leads the body in motion, and, when seated, does the same, so sitting erect with no tension is no problem.
It has always impressed me with Alexander technique that the secret to it is to do nothing regarding will or intention, for trying to will or force something to relax creates another tension somewhere else. You must stricly only observe the tension dissipating.
It takes years of repetition, but without it I'd be a haggard, shuffling old man by now, but the self-observation of habitual postures is the main benefit.

Work Program week beginning 6 February 2012

---

by Ian

Found this exchange among many quotes of the Master :

"Alice: I shall walk home, for exercise.
G: Why you want exercise?
A: To make strength.
G: Excuse, exercise not make force. When you make body do what not wish do,then that make force. For making do just one little thing which hate doing that make more force than whole day of walking."

The suggested exercise is - Choose any one persistent denying force in you in each of the centres of body , mind and heart and go against the 'grain' , so to say , this week.

An affirmation to help us along the way, again from a G quote (in conversation with a seeker who has chosen to quit smoking):

"G says: This can be thing for power. I tell you one very important thing to say each time when longing come. You will say it first time and maybe notice nothing.
Second time, maybe nothing. Third time, maybe notice something.
Say: I wish result of this my suffering be my own, for being.
Force such as this have special results - makes chemicals, has special emanations. This saying can maybe take force from animal and give to being.
And you can do this for many things for any denial of something that is SLAVERY."

(Gururaj)

---

by Gururaj

Often when I 'Google' for a Work word or phrase , this ES site comes up as the topmost url. Ian's intentional suffering is worth it.

I looked up 'Being Partkdolg Duty' now and sure enough it led to this site . (By the way, in my vernacular mother tongue there is a saying " having all the while your kid slung on your waist , one looked for it all over town") Why go far and wide for a treasure near at hand ! . Thanks , Ian.

This was one of the pearls rediscovered - under Intentional suffering -

"Without self-love a man can do nothing. There are two qualities of self-love. One is a dirty thing. The other, an impulse, love of the real "I". Without this, it is impossible to move. An ancient Hindu saying - "Happy is he who loves himself, for he can love me."

I see from Mme. S's report that no one has understood me. One needs fire. Without fire, there will never be anything. This fire is suffering, voluntary suffering, without which it is impossible to create anything. One must prepare, must know what will make one suffer and when it is there, make use of it. Only you can prepare, only you know what makes you suffer, makes the fire which cooks, cements, crystallizes, DOES. Suffer by your defects, in your pride, in your egoism. Remind yourself of the aim. Without prepared suffering there is nothing, for by as much as one is conscious, there is no more suffering. No further process, nothing.
That is why with your conscience you must prepare what is necessary. You owe to nature. The food you eat which nourishes your life. You must pay for these cosmic substances. You have a debt, an obligation, to repay by conscious work. Do not eat like an animal but renderto nature for what she has given you, nature, your mother. Work - a drop, a drop, a drop - accumulated during days, months, years, centuries, perhaps will give results.
(Gurdjieff. Meeting, December 7, 1941) "

Very momentarily this week there was a quite unfamiliar sense of having some mental discomfort and at the same time a distance from it.
Maybe invoking this state more often I can go to war on 'it'.

Gururaj

Work Program week beginning 13 February 2012

---

by Harry

Practice the Shaman's Power Walk.

First walk with an unfocused gaze centered toward the horizon. Coordinate your hand and feet movement. Left foot forward, right hand forward. Etc.

With your third left step walk as if scraping something off of your left sole. Fourth right step do the same. This should be a motion that is not perceptible to others around you.

With your sixth left step tap the toe of your left foot behind you after the stride. Seventh do the same with the right step.

With your ninth left step move forward as if stepping up a step. Tenthe do the same with the right step.

All of this should be done in "secret". No one should notice any difference in what you are doing. Continue as long as yiou can maintain the concentration.

---

by Alistair

Interesting exercise perfect for the daily 475 paces to the village spring Couldn't help but see John Cleese, does everyone understand?

---

by Alistair

John Cleese

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=IqhlQfXUk7w

---

by Gururaj

Nothing 'secret' about that !

---

by Lawrick

What was it? The Government Department of Bizarre Walks or something like that?
Freed

by JohnS

Because of an injury to my arm, my balance has been put out, therefore walking for the past six months has been a very concentrated affair. As a result, I am constantly aware of many movements, but especially walking.
I tried this exercise many times, and had some success (except when doing it downhill- difficult), but definitely not intuitive yet

John

---

by Gururaj

In the normal daily routine, i need to walk only a few times from points A to points B , about 150 steps at the most.

But almost every time that week,Harry's task was attempted, quite soberly and secretly , I presume , - not as jauntily and outrageously as in Alistair's video contribution
- though the third action led to some rocking back and forth sometimes.

Often , in the second action, the toe tapping (within the shoe) happened after the leg had landed forward. Anyway,if the aim was to use two centres consciously simultaneously,then some 'doing' got done.

Gururaj

---

by Harry

You're right, the aim is to change a normal routine. And to do this in a conscious manner, so that energy used can become more conscious. I used to have to walk from the parking lot to the office and did this daily, both ways. This was a path regularly people by beggars. Strangely when I was walking like this I rarely was asked to pay for that day's wine.

Work Program week beginning 20 February 2012

---

by Alistair

Q. What is the Tao?
A. Ordinary Life
Q. What does one do in order to live in accordance with it?
A. If you try to live in accordance with it, then it will flee away from you; do not try to sing that song; let it be sung by itself. Does not the humble hiccup come by itself?
Q. Do we have to dress and eat daily? How can we escape from this?
A. We eat, we get dressed
Q. I do not comprehend
A. Then get dressed and eat.

Suggested work
If you are eating, eat; if you are getting dressed, get dressed and if you are walking in the street, walk, but do not think about anything else. Do only what you are doing. Do not run away from the facts; do not fill them with meanings, symbols, sermons or warnings. Live without allegory. Live with a receptive mind from moment to moment.
When the doors of fantasy are closed, the organ of intuition awakens.
Let’s work against our day dreaming and the psychological song of our inexhaustible flow of random thoughts
Wishing all a fruitful week

---

by Gururaj

I have had to stem the "psychological song of inexhaustible thought" (of the type "the week has gone and I have no true experience to share") to post now that a sincere attempt was not made.
Maybe it is easier to "do" something than "not do" ?

Regards to all,
Gururaj

---

by Judy

Thanks, Alistair, for the very nice exercise above. I often do mindfulness exercises from Thich Nhat Hanh's little book. This week it has been noticed several times when I think I like to procrastinate (eg: packing a suitcase for a trip tomorrow). I don't actually enjoy procrastinating. It is in fact exactly the sort of useless suffering which has to be sacrificed.

Kindest regards to you,

Judy.

---

by Alistair

Dear Guru, sometimes the short posts contain the greatest value, you did indeed obtain something from the exercise, the observation that it is eaier to do than not to do. The Buddha said that if you catch yourself a thousand times being distracted, it is a very useful meditation. If you do not catch yourself at all, you need to work harder. Wishing all a profitable week.

Work Program week beginning 27 February 2012

---

by Judy

The following is a rather long copy/paste for your consideration. I am finding it fruitful.It is quite helpful, with its clearly stated differences between sensing and feeling, for a main exercise in "Life is Real...".
A fellowship I belong to talks about it being easier to "act your way to a new way of thinking" than the reverse. This is true and along similar lines.
All the best,
Judy.

Gurdjieff (from 'Views'):

As regards feeling and body—these parts are not in the least interested in putting self-remembering into practice. And yet the main thing is to change not in the mind, but in the parts that are not interested.

The mind can change quite easily. Attainment is not reached through the mind; if it is reached through the mind it is of no use at all.

Gurdjieff (from 'Views'):

At present we must have an idea of two different experiences, one of which we shall agree to call "feeling" and the other "sensation." We shall call "feeling" the one whose place of origin is what we call the emotional center; while "sensations" are those so-called feelings whose place of origin is in what we call the moving center. Now, of course, each one must understand and examine his sensations and feelings and learn approximately the difference between them.

For primary exercises in self-remembering the participation of all three centers is necessary, and we began to speak of the difference between feelings and sensations because it is necessary to have simultaneously both feeling and sensation.

We can come to this exercise only with the participation of thought. The first thing is thought. We already know this. We desire, we wish; therefore our thoughts can be more or less easily adapted to this work, because we have already had practical experience of them.

At the beginning all three need to be evoked artificially.

Work Exercise for the first week of October:

Cease all previous WWP exercises unless you are still finding these useful and only if they have not yet become mechanical.

1) If you do not already do some kind of 'morning work' (also variously called 'quiet work,' 'the preparation,' 'sensing exercise,' etc), take 5 minutes or so sometime soon after waking up to sit quietly and sense your body and become aware of your breath.

(I'm leaving the details of this open this time, for you to decide. But this does not mean that this step is not important.)

2) At the end of this 5 minutes or so (or at the end of your 'morning work'), make a suitable appointment time during your day when you can for 15 minutes a) be alone, b) sit comfortably and quietly, and c) be assured of no interruptions (e.g. turn off the cell phone). If you can sit at a table, this is best.

3) At the appointed time in your day, sit quietly with your non-dominant hand resting on the table in front of you and your dominant hand resting on your knee or lap. If you cannot find a table to sit at, have both hands resting on your knees.

4) Bring all your attention to your non-dominant hand. Relax and sense this hand, one finger at a time, then the top of the hand, then the palm of the hand; then sense the muscle, sinew, blood, and bone inside the hand; then sense the hand as a whole. Occupy your complete attention with this task, your attention moving constantly, checking and allowing sensation to grow.

5) Retaining this sensation of hand, now bring a part of your attention to your breathing (without changing anything about the breathing itself), feeling the breath come in, perhaps feeling something in you coming up to meet the breath, perhaps feeling the the exchange that occurs at the top of the breath, and then on exhalation, feeling the results spread throughout your body.

6) After a few breaths as in step 5, now, on the exhalation, intentionally direct the results of the exchange of breath into your non-dominant hand, allowing the fullness and the feeling of the air to fill this hand. Continue this effort for 10 breaths, allowing this feeling to increase in your hand and while also still being aware of the sensation in your hand.

The aim is threefold: 1) to sense the hand, 2) to feel the hand (connected with the air), and 3) to sense and feel the hand simultaneously.

If you are not used to doing this kind of exercise, you may find it extremely difficult if not impossible to begin with. But we keep trying. We have our aim. We have our wish. We do the best we can. We repeat, repeat, repeat.

If at any time, your attention flies away, as soon as you notice this, simply bring your attention back to the task at hand (in your hand) and continue. You may have to start from the beginning a number of times.

Whatever transpires, do not persist for longer than 15 minutes. No matter where you are at after 15 minutes, stop. Get up and continue your day.

Do nothing else except to note how your day goes after this.

As always, feel free to log your intent to do this exercise here. And also feel free to share your experiences, observations, or questions here.

---

by Gururaj

The sensing of the hand was a straightforward experience.
However the 'feeling' part was not.

If

> Judy wrote:
> We shall call "feeling" the one whose place of origin is what we call the emotional center

then the perplexing thing was that there was no emotion involved in that part of the task (like, wow,it feels cool ! , or, how annoying, I do'nt really feel any difference !)

Are'nt both basically 'sensing' tasks with some imagination involved in the second part ?

> Judy wrote:
> On the exhalation, intentionally direct the results of the exchange of breath into your non-dominant hand, allowing the fullness and the feeling of the air to fill this hand.

I reckoned that the "results of the exchange of breath" to be an oxygenation of the blood which in turn is nourishing the body and specifically the hand.

> Judy wrote:
> Do nothing else except to note how your day goes after this.

Somehow (If I have not imagined this) the first of the two days I did the task , was more 'vivified' and the impression of Air nourishing the body ,apart from the usual food,was felt more.

Thanks, Judy , for a new experience.

Regards to all,
Gururaj

---

by JohnS

Much as with Guraj, I experienced the feebleness of the emotional centre - a suspicion which I have had, and which has been confirmed by this exercise.

It sent me scurrying back to "in Search of the Miraculous', where I came across so-called 'passing comments' by Gurdjieff such as the astral body (the second body) is created via the emotional centre (its where it is 'attached'), access to the higher thinking centre is directly via the higher emotional centre, to be able to develop enough energy for self-remembering, you must work on the emotions - "THERE IS NO OTHER WAY".

Thanks, Judy, Guraj- I have my focus.

---

by Gururaj

Dear John : I meant that even the so called 'feeling' part of the task occurs to me more as a sensing exercise.

But yes, your observation is true that the emotion is a key element.I would say a force multiplier.

Pondering some on the feeling / emotion aspect , I wonder whether if the heart centre alone goes far ahead of the moving and thinking centres - emotion manifests .
Whereas if the other two centres vibrate as strongly as the emotion function then it is more a heightened, well channelled , feeling quite of a different quality than frothy,raw emotion.

Many years ago ,on the cricket field my batting partner made an acerbic comment when he thought I had run him out. Cut to quick , anger and hurt welled up in me .But somehow in unision with a heightened mind and body function, I played on 'out of my skin' , so to say, and scored well with a lot of uncharacteristic aggression.

Now , on the seeker's path, rarely whenever I do not get carried away by an insight or happy feeling but rather channel it to higher self-awareness, a higher feeling results. Can one summon the feeling , regardless of the situation ? Is this the way ahead for an evolving spiral, a movement to a higher octave ?

Gururaj

Work Program week beginning 12 March 2012

---

by JohnS

With the fragmenting of this group, and the feeling sometimes of it 'just hanging in there,' I was reflecting on the difficulty of an online group that has no physical teacher to directly transmit Influence "C". So I went back to the 'beginning' - Search for the Miraculous - to find out what is required, and what I have forgotten: almost everything that is important and fundamental, I find.

Gurdjieff talks about the amount of work needed to form a real group: much preparatory work is needed before you can even call yourselves a group. He then goes on to describe a real group:

"A group is a big thing. A group is begun for definite concerted work....First of all you must understand that in a group all are responsible for one another. A mistake on the part of one is considered a mistake on the part of all. This is a law. And this law is well-founded, for, as you will see later, what one acquires is also acquired by all.

The rule of common responsibility must be borne well in mind. Members of a group members of a group are not only responsible for the mistakes of all, but also for their failures. The success of one is the success of all. The failure of one is the failure of all.

A group must work as one machine. The parts of the machine must know one another and help one another. In a group there can be no personal interests opposed to the interests of others, or opposed to the interests of the work."

The exercise this week is to reflect on the current state of out little coterie, and what we can do personally NOW to think as a group would think, with all its responsibilities, and not as an individual.

John

---

by Harry

Follow up question. How many log in daily and review each new post in each area? Not just the group area. Because if we are the "working group" then shouldn't we also be answering, whenever possible, in other areas as well?

I believe that having a number of people spread around the world on different continents can really be a benefit to us. But I also believe there is a responsibility to being here. Not saying everyone has to answer everything. Just that it would seem to me crucial to do what we can.

I have been reminded of late of a saying in the Work: "If the Devil were sick the Devil a saint would be."

---

by JohnS

Good point, Harry:
If you look through the list of subjects, information and exercises on this site, looked at in total it is an inspiring amount - a view that should give us hope.
Its like a book, so we must get used to reading more than just the first few pages.

John

---

by Judy

John quoted:

> "A group is a big thing. A group is begun for definite concerted work....First of all you must understand that in a group all are responsible for one another. A mistake on the part of one is considered a mistake on the part of all. This is a law. And this law is well-founded, for, as you will see later, what one acquires is also acquired by all.
>
> The rule of common responsibility must be borne well in mind. Members of a group members of a group are not only responsible for the mistakes of all, but also for their failures. The success of one is the success of all. The failure of one is the failure of all.
>
> A group must work as one machine. The parts of the machine must know one another and help one another. In a group there can be no personal interests opposed to the interests of others, or opposed to the interests of the work."

Thanks for this, John. Most interesting.
Lots of questions arise, some of which may vary a bit because of this group's online nature. For example, most groups have a "primary purpose". What is ours, I wonder. Aim, I suppose Mr Gurdjieff would call it. What are our aims here? One would be to expand consciousness and help others to do the same. Or is this too vague an aim for the Gurdjieff Work? Another would be to coat the Inner Being Bodies. Perhaps as important though, I think, is that we should be able to help each other to increase the quantity and quality of actual Work each of us does daily. It is said that nothing much can be achieved alone. This gives high importance to a group.
As to "no personal interests opposed to the interests of others" or "opposed to the interests of the work" - this may be somewhat ameliorated in an online group? Or not? Certainly we follow this in spirit. What would be an example of a personal interest which could affect an online group, do you think? What could be opposed to the interests of the work - well, all negativity could slot into this category. So if laziness prevents any posting, is the person still a group member? I guess he is if and when he chooses to rejoin. And sometimes life circumstances intervene and people leave for a while. Lots can happen. Hopefully we welcome all who wish to enlarge their spiritual life and live by these principles in a spirit of goodwill and peace. Others may have health issues or other difficulties and yet remain integral members who are active on levels other than posting. Where the attention is... Where the heart is...

More higher energies would be available to the group too. Incalculable benefit.

This is a big question. What do others think?

Yes, Harry, I check in daily - sometimes more often during active periods. Essential. Group members care for each other's well-being and participating, as in for example family life, is a way of demonstrating this.

I'm safe home after a few weeks travelling and catching up with family and extended family. During that time, my posts have been few as I've only had internet access on the smart phone. (Texting replies is still very slow for me, though improving with recent practice. )
Best,
Judy.

---

by JohnS

"One would be to expand consciousness and help others to do the same. Or is this too vague an aim for the Gurdjieff Work? Another would be to coat the Inner Being Bodies. Perhaps as important though, I think, is that we should be able to help each other to increase the quantity and quality of actual Work each of us does daily"

I would say there's nothing vague about expanding consciousness, as we all know instinctively what this means. And coating the Being Bodies is a result of expanding consciousness.

Perhaps an online forum has too many opportunities for shirking responsibilities, as we don't have what Gurdjieff calls "someone with a whip" to keep us awake, and to push us to do not just efforts but 'super-efforts' which are the only ones that count in creating higher bodies. Hard to know how to get around this one.

Maybe we should all physically meet twice a year?? Your place or mine? I'd guess that Hawaii would be a mid-point.

John

---

by Cassandra

:

> "
> So if laziness prevents any posting, is the person still a group member? I guess he is if and when he chooses to rejoin. And sometimes life circumstances intervene and people leave for a while. Lots can happen. Hopefully we welcome all who wish to enlarge their spiritual life and live by these principles in a spirit of goodwill and peace. Others may have health issues or other difficulties and yet remain integral members who are active on levels other than posting. Where the attention is... Where the heart is...
>
> More higher energies would be available to the group too. Incalculable benefit.

Laziness is what prevents me from being more active in posting. I agree that having a central figure would help, but the work has to come from the individual. I attend church regularly, meet physically with people who give similar encouragement and guidance, but again, that doesn't really make me work any harder. I still 'hide out' in the pews and do minimal work with that group. My thing too, is that after several weeks not posting, I feel guilty and sort of want to avoid the group. During these times, I think more about the work than anything.

Is the online group is now closed to outsiders now? If it is, maybe opening it would bring in others, a few of whom might stick to it and be a help over the long run. John, I like the idea of physically meeting.

---

by Harry

Use this as a work opportunity. Feeing guilty is a negative emotion when it stops you. Remorse of Conscience is a different thing and should motivate you to do. And don't mix levels. There is great inspiration from many Churches. But Work is at a higher level. It was there at the founding of many Churches and still continues. That is where the inner sanctum comes from.

---

by Cassandra

Harry, yes, it is in the church setting that I often apply the Work. I will look into Remorse of Conscience to find out more about that.

Thanks

---

by Judy

John, that's an interesting idea about meeting physically. And yes, Hawaii does present a pleasant mid-point.

How many 'possibles' do we have for this idea?

Let's all consider the possibility and report back here.

Meantime, John, on a less ambitious front, should you ever be up north in Queensland, of course there is an open invitation to visit, and if I'm local to Blue Mountains, I'll certainly contact you.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Judy

Harry wrote:

> Feeing guilty is a negative emotion when it stops you. Remorse of Conscience is a different thing and should motivate you to do.

I've had quite a good look online this morning trying to compare - regret, repent, remorse of conscience, and even resent....
The older usages are one thing, the modern quite another.
Is your quote above from Gurdjieff somewhere please? (Had a look at BT Chapters 27 and 28, but not a lot of clarification to my understanding.
I've had struggles with this before. I recall Ian asking whether remorse of conscience is a negative or positive emotion and so on. We seem to be being advised to have no regrets, but to have deep remorse of conscience. I'd like to improve my current take on it.
Can you help me?

Warm regards,
Judy.

---

by Judy

Postscript. I forgot to mention that older usage of "remorse" is "to have pity and compassion". Now that one is nice and clear.
J.

---

by JohnS

And defining further: remorse contains the energy for recompensing and doing better from then on, as does true pity and true compassion/

I think my comment about physically meeting should not be taken too seriously: it would only be worthwhile if we could stay together for an extended time as a group.

What other alternatives are there?

John

---

by Harry

Two quick notes: conscience is defined as part of higher emotional center. Therefore remorse is an emotional feeling. You are crying consciously. Listen to Leonard Cohen's "The Future."

---

by Judy

Thanks Harry and John.
Yes - so remorse of conscience is a positive and real emotion. I read the lyrics of "The Future" which you posted the last time we spoke on this topic.
And regret is defined as "to remember with distress or longing" - indeed totally different; not much point in a memory by itself unless corrective action follows.
And 'remorse of conscience' may also be quite different from modern usage of 'remorse' used by itself.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Gururaj

The Work encourages one to attempt impartial observation of oneself.

Seems to me, reading so many fine posts in this thread, that John has set in motion an intentional 'look' at us as a 'group' entity.

To the extent we are 'connected' we are more or less of a unit.

In a way the Law of Three is at work here too ,is'nt it ?

The more we strive to sincerely experiment with oneself and give of ourselves to this activity , the Affirming force is manifesting.

If we are not 'present' to the Work and to the group, may I say, that the Denying action is predominant.Some Denying manifestations may also be , though participating here, I may be ,somehow, not - what's the right word here - 'appropriate' ? ,not in a good manners/etiquette perspective - but maybe more , in terms of adding 'good' fuel to the fire which brings more light to the group.

(God only knows how many times, I have been guilty of that and my fellow seekers here are being very polite.
But , on the other-hand , if such a politeness exists, it arises from what kind of Considering ? .Seems to me , when the child senses that it is unconditionally loved by its family, it will not mind some tough talking.But, it's always a tight-rope walk especially for a group dependent on written communication . The words seem to be written on rock.Whereas the same words face-to-face , with so many other nuances being exchanged, will be received differently.)

The Resultant , the whole body of output on this site and our individual Beings as we manifest in our lives , is the Reconciling element - which is a force by itself.

Thanks to this rumination among ourselves , some new ideas are emerging including adventurous ones like meeting in Hawaii (For many of you it may be a mid-point.For me it's the other side of the globe , folks !  . I am sure it was not meant to be taken literally, though. How about
(a) video conferencing, (b) joint meditation at the same time, or (c) baton-passing meditation as the sun moves from Australia(Judy,John) to Asia(yours truly) to Europe(Alistair and then Ian) and onward to America/Canada (It gets a bit crowded here - Harry,Cassandra,Karen,Fred . Not to forget Mukul who seems to be in transit - as of now)

By the way, I was out of my usual dwelling/working spot from Monday to Thursday. The organism was more in the grip of Personality than Essence,taken by new experiences. I came back today and as I drove to the office I put on a Kabir (mystic saint of India from a few centuries ago) inspired sufi song.It went something like this - the grain in the periphery of the grinding wheels gets crushed for sure.Those which are entwined with the axles are saved. It brought me to my 'essential' senses and the heart had a finer vibration. Would'nt have happenned , If not for me holding on to this group and vice-versa.

Regards and thanks to all my fellows here,
Gururaj

---

by Cassandra

Gururaj,

I'd be interested in either simultaneous or sequential meditation. I could also do the Skype thing or a weekly/bi-weekly chat room where we could exchange experiences. I think the barrier for me in embracing online group members more is that I can't get to know them, in a physical sense as you indicate (nuances, facial expressions). But I also think that knowing the personality could be misleading because I may go down the wrong path of putting my energy into manipulating or dealing with the personality (does he/she talk too much, too bossy, arrogant, etc. OR "I really like this one") rather than placing effort on work. In any case, I too, appreciate everyone's input and that you are still here.

---

by JohnS

Gururaj, Cassandra;

Meditational synchronising would certainly help me, but this and also video coferencing, I think, would be defeated by the time zone differences. Also myself (and Alistair, I think) have pretty bad internet reception that won't support conferencing.

There has to be some way.....

Work Program week beginning 19 March 2012

---

by Judy

Here's a program from this time last year from our Northeon Forest friends.
Cassandra may still post. I emailed her yesterday. If so, there'll be two!

exercises for week of March-30-2011

1. When you realize you are irritated, half smile (or inner smile) at once. Take 3 deep breaths.
2. Use your car today as a metaphor for your vessel. Use yourself as the seat of awareness. Stay present to yourself while driving. Switch your concentration between all the points of physical contact between yourself (awareness) and the car (the vessel).
3. Ponder: what is the most fundamental thing in your life?
4. Make a list of all things that provide comfort in your life. Sacrifice one for a day.

---

by JohnS

I only use my car on weekends, but I can't wait: me as a driver is one very special "I" which I have to keep constant watch over. He can be a beast, and usually a paranoid one - a flavour I can't recognise in my other personnas.

---

by Harry

I want to give a word of caution. Driving is one of those learned motor skills. Essentially you let the car become an extension of yourself. This is what you learn to do when you learn to drive. Move right arm to the right and the wheel turns. I offer this caution because you do not want to move out of that learned motor skill while actually driving.

---

by Gururaj

> John Summers wrote:
> ... me as a driver is one very special "I" which I have to keep constant watch over. He can be a beast, and usually a paranoid one - a flavour I can't recognise in my other personnas.

Nicely put,John.
That resonates with me too.

No wonder that "absolute power corrupts absolutely".

I often have to remind myself that while driving ,i am just getting from point A to point B.

Gururaj

---

by Gururaj

> Use your car today as a metaphor for your vessel. Use yourself as the seat of awareness. Stay present to yourself while driving. Switch your concentration between all the points of physical contact between yourself (awareness) and the car (the vessel).

I wonder whether it was intended in the above exercise, but it was a natural extension, once I alighted from the car, to consider "I" as the driver and the body and all its actions (inner and outer) as the path taken by the organism as I manoeouvred thru' daily life.
There is a promise of seperation and non-identification in this 'posture' as well as a better chance of intentional driving as opposed to automatic functioning.

> 3. Ponder: what is the most fundamental thing in your life?

One will not be truthful in saying "seeking along the 4th way" .The reality is that most of the attention and energy is instinctively spent on keeping the personality afloat.

> 4. Make a list of all things that provide comfort in your life. Sacrifice one for a day.

The body,mind and heart all have their slavish habits.One of the not so apparent ones may be working hard at the office.
Maybe even , logging in here to the ES site, more as a familiar , cosy retreat.

A great set of exercises.We could stay with it this week as well ?

Work Program week beginning 2 April 2012

---

by Karen

Observation of Active or First Force
The following Work exercise is from a free Online Gurdjieff Studies Group, moderated by Sy Ginsburg

The exercise for this week is to be more conscious of the active, or 'first', force.

The reference to active or first force in Volume 1 of Psychological Commentaries was to bring attention to the point that there is inherent in the mechanics of the Universe a "response to request". The request, in this case, is the active, or first, force with the idea being that people often think of the events of life in terms of "effects" rather than causes. This makes us blind to the request-cause-active force that we are always creating.

Assuming that second force is always accurate, then when what we are experiencing is unbelievable or unacceptable to us, the problem must be in first force. But this is simply to help us become more conscious of it, to feel it as an actual force with specific causal characteristics.

The object of the exercise is to pay more attention to your intentions and to realize that they are more than just clues to our being; they are their offspring and reflection.

Report your experiences, finding back to the group.

Karen

---

by Gururaj

> Karen wrote:
> Observation of Active or First Force
> The reference to active or first force in Volume 1 of Psychological Commentaries

Any further info. on which chapter /page ?
Thank you,
Gururaj

---

by Karen

Hi Gururaj,

Volume 1- pg 154 (159 of 376) of the pdf Judy posted
Titled: Birdlip, June 19, 1942 NOTE ON PRAYER, RESPONSE AND REQUEST

For further info on THE LAW OF THREE pg 108 or 113 of 376pdf and THE STUDY OF THREE FORCES IN ONESELF pg 113 or 118 of 376pdf.

Warm Regards,
Karen

---

by JohnS

As predicted, I found this observation almost impossible in anything like a direct way.

On the other hand, regarding some major habitual life issues which need to be changed, the thought of this first force gave me the sense that I cannot make the 'change' by force of will, as firstly , I would not be taking all the factors of the Law of Seven into account, but also because fundamentally I know its not me myself who is making a decision , its rather part of an overall process - one in which I must fit into with a very small role - and the better aim is to try and 'feel' the bigger parts in order to distance myself from my egocentric views, and thus graduate to the ability of observing perhaps some of the more local causes - otherwise if I don't, I have the definite feeling (now, in the plexus) that my non-observing parts will continue going round in mental circles.

As I say, this first-force observation seems very 'high', but its presence gives the feeling of something very fundamental - which I could say is one very important part of the exercise.

---

by Cassandra

This is a realization rather than a direct experience of intention. Relating to Nicoll's comments on prayer/petition: if I want something, pray for it, wish for it, would like it to manifest--I am appealing to that which is holy, really that which is normal but cannot be experienced by me in my ordinary state. So if I ask for better clarity for some issue, for instance, but then turn around and day dream most of the day, then that day dreaming is incongruent with the prayer for clarity. I cannot serve two masters. If I don't receive that clarity, maybe it's because my greater intention is to remain in the mechanicalness of day dreams. That's the larger energy for which I'm 'praying/wishing' because that is where the bulk of my energy has gone for that day.

Thanks Karen. Happy Easter or whatever you might do.

---

by Gururaj

A recurring pattern in life for me has been of a lot of time spent for office work .The wish is there to bring a balance but there seem to be no easy solutions.

Maybe the pain of living with the situation is less than the likely pain of truly addressing the problem and making the necessary 'payment'.

Similar is the situation as to bringing a shift away from internal considering .

Is the 'intention' at the moment of reckoning (obviously, arising from my Being at the tip of the time arrow) what matters than the pious intentions /wishes thought beforehand ?

The task was an opportunity to review the broad 'responses' of the universe to this organism (health,livelihood,relations,etc.) and to read some specific areas of Nicoll's Commentaries.

Thanks, Karen,

Gururaj

---

by Judy

Cassandra wrote:

> So if I ask for better clarity for some issue, for instance, but then turn around and day dream most of the day, then that day dreaming is incongruent with the prayer for clarity. I cannot serve two masters. If I don't receive that clarity, maybe it's because my greater intention is to remain in the mechanicalness of day dreams. That's the larger energy for which I'm 'praying/wishing' because that is where the bulk of my energy has gone for that day.

Thanks for this, Cassandra. Most insightful. Yes, remembering that our universe is a response to request means that one needs to take especial care with the request (expenditure of energy).
When facing a decision, I often have a tendency towards day-dreaming about possible details and intellectualising, rather than taking a small action which would undoubtedly clarify the situation - to take a small "first step", so to speak. So often that step opens the way for the appropriate next step to be taken, if wished. In other words, clarity is better found by a balanced reflection and action; and keep repeating until resolution of the question. This opens up other necessary perspectives, such as the practical aspects of the plan, plus the emotional component is explored.
I'll give an example. For some time I've been looking at and comparing various religious practices - I suppose Christianity and Buddhism being the two in question. Of course I have the Gurdjieff daily Work, and a Twelve Step programme in which I'm involved as well. Both of these emphasize the necessity of "improving conscious contact" daily and continuing to enlarge one's spiritual life, so I look for ways to do this. It is said that one will remain blind until one practises one's religion. It is also said to not make a religion out of anything, including one's religion; wear the world like a loose garment - and so on. Hmmm...

Anyway, synchronicities have been everywhere - too many to ignore.
So a first little action step was to attend Easter Eucharist at the chapel in the grounds of the local Anglican school last Sunday. This has clarified the question somewhat, of course in the positive. And it isn't all about me any more. It's about being a person among persons, community, friendship, fellowship, service, usefulness. Life just keeps getting better and better.

In gratitude,
Judith.

Work Program week beginning 9 April 2012

---

by Cassandra

Holy Temple

On any given day this week, imagine that a place that you enter--office, grocery store, home--is a temple and that all communication there is for the glory of god (or to coat the higher bodies). Especially imagine that all intentions exist for this purpose only. Try to bring about this awareness sensing all centers. We may be able to do it only for 2 minutes or so, but attempt to see your brothers as wholly innocent and striving for higher aims.

---

by JohnS

What I have found with this exercise is that: every time I thought of it, the space around (ie the room, or the house, or, if outside - the world) immediately seemed to increase in size, which was a function of my being more aware of detail and environment.
A decrease in subjectivity and being shut up inside the head, shifting towards the exterior and the objective, bigger picture.

The big bonus is that it is done with FEELING.

John

---

by Karen

John,

Nicely stated on your findings.

I took up the task to make this exercise my aim, to place the exercise as 1st force.

Imagining every place of entry as a temple for the glory of God created a shift in awareness and many intricate connections began to form. It felt like an infinite equation was unfolding and being revealed in glimpses. This focused intent also brought about an awareness of all actions and the potential impact the power of ones intent, thoughts and spoken words has.

The obstacles/resistance in the way of my aim were many. Many of which were belief systems that were directing my responses/interactions that were made apparent, surfaced and were recognized as a result of observation and a collection of previous work efforts. This exercise went deep and I am no where near reconciliation, but one step closer.

Thank you for posting this exercise Cassandra. It was most helpful.

Karen

---

by Cassandra

Karen and John,

Thank you both for your insight and work with this task. You both report a change in perspective and an associated feeling or emotional component. I am convinced that this unseen energy is what real communication consists of. I'm not just talking about being nice when I'm talking with someone but a more fundamental belief in the holiness that surrounds. Choosing this matters.

This week though I did not practice this exercise at all. In fact, I had several negative exchanges of energy, and I consciously participated in them all. I'm certain that was the denying force. I will try this again the coming week.

Work Program week beginning 16 April 2012

---

by Gururaj

A. Daily meditation.Work in the quiet - in conditions that are free from the demands of outer life.
"Each day I have to give as much as it takes - sometimes more ,sometimes less- to come to a clear perception of an inner Presence, a life in me that is much higher than my body.....I can come to it if I am actively passive , quiet enough for an energy of another quality to appear,to be contained in me.
...I let my functions come into my Presence.I do not go into them;they come into me.Only the attention is active , an attention coming from all the centers.
I need to find this Presence again and again until I know it as a reality that I cannot doubt. "
(From 'Reality Of Being',Pg.82,by Jeanne De Salzmann)

Each of you may already have your own practices , and time set aside, for a daily affirmation, a gathering of energies.
Anyway, this link could also be one approach, or tool, for meditation -
http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=PjqDCwRJbrg

B. See life as a game in which all roles are equal.
Observe one of your roles and try to unmask the identification.
Share your experiences here.

For this task, this resource could be useful, if not already 'internalised' -
http://www.endlesssearch.co.uk/exercises_roleplay.htm

C.This week ponder on , (again from Reality of Being) ,"I can no longer begin from a vague wish that I take for granted.I have to know why I work and what effort I am making"
I found these materials inspiring , a ballast to Work efforts,mainly through the feeling function.

(i) "Suddenly it happened! I was listening and lightning went through me. The veil was torn asunder, I was awake! I had just experienced 'It'.
Everything existed and nothing existed. Another Reality had broken through this world. I myself existed and did not exist..."
"I had experienced that which is spoken of in all centuries: individuals, in whatever stage of their lives, have had an experience which struck them with the force of lightning and linked them once and for all to the circuits of True Life." ..... Karlfried Graf Dürckheim in "The way of transformation"

(ii) http://www.endlesssearch.co.uk/philo_jeantoomerepiphany.htm

Gururaj

by Judy

Hi Gururaj,
Thanks so much for the utube link. I admit to being somewhat distracted from the exact weekly program, but my meditative practice has taken quite a step forward, owing to a couple of those excellent videos.

Of particular interest were two I viewed this morning. To find them, just type the titles into the utube search bar. There's a nice little 9 minute one "10 signs of a spiritual awakening" and an absolutely magnificent one, for which you'll need to set aside 56 minutes all up, called "Spiritual Reality Power of Meditation." This has much pure gold; quite the best meditation guide I've viewed in a long time. Oh, he could have left out the bit on 'pyramid power' for my taste though. It only went for half a minute or so which I put up with. This told me I had some prejudices in that area. Or maybe it is because I don't have a pyramid in which to meditate.

Love and light,
Judy.

---

by Judy

Oh, I forgot to mention;
The illustrations in the first part of the Spiritual Reality video allow clear visualisation for "watching the breath" in a way I haven't thought of before. It works really well in practice, and without any altering of the normal breath. This is something I've had trouble with from time to time.

There are clear explanations for many of the things which happen during meditation as well. Seeing one's own meditations (or parts of them) on the screen in front of one is quite astonishing actually.
Anyway, I won't go on and on. It may be of interest - or not.
As Guru says, most of us have our own tried and true practices which we regularly use.

All the best,
Judy.

Work Program week beginning 23 April 2012

---

by Harry

We all feel ourselves as two dimensional beings. Even parts of our bodies are two dimensional. A two dimensional me sits in a chair while my two dimensional hands type.

Feel your mass. Observe your mass. Not your weight. But your total mass. Feel it. Feel it in different positions. And feel it in different activities. Also observe the mass of others. Don't just see the person walking down the street opposite you as a paper doll all dressed up. Experience their mass. Experience their mass. Observe your mass in relation to their mass.

---

by Judy

Harry,

In working with this a little, it is quite striking how similar it is to full sensing.
I've noticed over the past decade or so that I view myself and others much more often as three dimensional (or partially so) than I used to. I thought this may be due to the sensing exercises. I seem to fully inhabit the body more often, rather than have main existence in the head, so to speak.

My little cat is a total master in inhabiting her body, I've often observed. A small masterpiece.

Should you wish to expand a little on this exercise - it would be appreciated. For example, if it isn't supposed to resemble sensing, some more clues would be helpful.

Best regards,
Judy.

---

by Harry

I think that you put a finger on it. When we truly sense our three dimensional selves then there is something observing that is beyond our normal observation. So we move a step toward Work. Like knocking on the door.

---

by Alistair

Yes

---

by Cassandra

I thought about this exercise often during the week but was not able to go beyond the physical in observing the mass of others, or of myself. It's funny though, that I had a meeting with someone who, physically, has a large mass. This is a very tall woman, 6ft. 5 inches, so unusual, especially for a woman. But I did manage to try and take in her verbal expressions, voice tone and intonation. In some small way, I felt this person had something to convey to me.

Work Program week beginning 30 April 2012

---

by Alistair

Every stick has two ends
Just as it is useful to remember the imminence of our own and others death the reverse may also be true

At all times this week try to remember that all those around you including yourself were beautiful sweet smelling little pink babies that we would all take great joy in holding and cuddling, Judith, Harry, Fred, Ian, Guru, Cassandra, Karen were all the same once, wee pure sweet babies not so long ago

Better in a bus or metro to imagine all the people there sitting in nappies pink & fresh especially the stinky sweaty old men, we were all so loveable, then.....
Then you love them all and there is a wave that if you focus hard I have felt he whole of the company move up, but they don't know why

It's baby week Dummy tits all round

---

by JohnS

Its funny, this approach came to me yesterday from a different angle: I was reading a connection with Gurdjieff's "way of blame" - connected with true remorse - and it was mentioned also that Gurdjieff refused any praise: even at the Toast of the Idiots he would scold someone who proposed a toast to the Master's health.
Suddenly, I felt a great detachment from the piece of work I was analysing at the time, as I relinquished any praise connected with me 'creating' it. At that moment, all the other passengers in my carriage suddenly became fellow travellers, and we journeyed on together harmoniously.

John

Work Program week beginning 7 May 2012

---

by Judy

This week please revisit your favourite sensing exercises.

The first part of what follows comes from the “Objective Science” section of our own site, from the section “Possible Foundations of Inner Exercises – Tony Blake”.
A read-through that Duversity site (it is linked to our site) will in addition be most helpful. Indeed, you may choose to select another one of the most excellent exercises reproduced there instead – or as well as.

We have been working for quite a while here now since Ian stepped back to allow this opportunity – one year in fact – so how about some more sharing of your individual choices and experiences?

Then I have copy/pasted my own two standard sensing exercises as a beginning. These are of course from the “Work Exercises” part of Endless Search site.
Please feel free to share others of your own choosing.

Best wishes for a fruitful embodied week of growing the “I am”.
Judith.

Relaxing and Filling
From the early days in Russia, Gurdjieff taught relaxation and sensing (see In Search of the Miraculous pp. 350-1). There he initiated the practice followed more or less since of beginning relaxation starting from the muscles of the face. He also showed how to 'feel' (i.e. sense in fact) any part of the body at will. The exercise in 'circular sensation' shown around 1917 became Bennett's 'Six Point Exercise' used at Sherborne more than fifty years later.
It is not documented when Gurdjieff explicitly introduced the practice of 'filling', though it became 'The' exercise for many after his death. In 'filling' we bring sensation energy into the body. Starting with the feet. Thus, relaxation goes from top to toe and filling from toe to top. The head is the last thing to be filled with sensation.
The deliberate sensing and movement of sensation is at first an astonishing thing. As far as we know, no one besides Gurdjieff has drawn attention to this as a fundamental practice of voluntary experience. It predates biofeedback by half a century. It is also intriguing, as Ouspensky points out, that none of this to be found in yogic practice.
In teaching about relaxation and filling it was always emphasised that attention should never be drawn into the inner organs such as the heart, liver, spleen, etc. This advice is echoed in e.g. autogenic therapy. The reason for it is that unskilled attention can alter the tempo of functioning or other features of the organ. In general, Gurdjieff was against any altering of diet, chewing, breathing, etc.
Bennett's arms out sideways (a practice that certainly came from Gurdjieff) will inevitably produce sensation! It must be emphasised over and over again that Gurdjieff taught that we do not need to get beyond the physical because we are not in it yet - and the first step is to attain the physical!

The Basic Sensing Exercise
To start with the experience Sensing, take a comfortable position and become aware of your feet. Imagine that you are being filled with a warm, thick, honey like liquid and that it is slowly filling your body, starting from the feet and moving up to your legs, then pelvis, then torso, then arms, then chest, then head. Be aware of the sense of gravity pulling your body towards the ground. Be aware of the position of your limbs. Strive to maintain an awareness of Sensing in the whole body. This requires your whole Attention.

12 Joint Exercise
While walking or during some physical activity the Seeker will continuously bring the Attention to the main joints of the body in the designated sequence while repeating a prayer such as the Holy Affirming Prayer, or by repeating a counting sequence. The length of time that the attention is held on each joint can be varied.
1. Right wrist.
2. Right elbow.
3. Right shoulder.
4. Left hip.
5. Left knee.
6. Left ankle.
7. Right ankle.
8. Right knee.
9. Right hip.
10. Left shoulder.
11.Left elbow.
12. Left wrist.

I say one word of the Holy Equation Prayer for each joint.
Holy Affirming, Holy Denying, Holy Reconciling, Transubstantiate in me for my Being.

_____

---

by Harry

I want to say something. Everyone should respond. Even if you respond to say that you can't do this. Just everyone posting an exercise a week isn't Work. Comment in some way on the weekly exercise. If you can't, then ask a question. If we don't begin to discuss, then we are doing the worst thing we can do with this opportunity.

As to this week's exercise, when I first met this exercise several years ago, I did it while walking. And like Judy had a word for each joint. And I quickly added one more thing. At the end of a cycle I said "Amen" and felt the energy rising in my spine to begin another cycle. Not given anywhere. But something that doing the exercise prompted me toward. And with each Amen there was a moment of taking of picture, of self remembering. And a moment of energy to keep the cycle going.

---

by Judy

Harry, how interesting.
I too sometimes find myself adding an "Amen" - just with that 12 joint exercise after saying the Holy Equation words with it. You mention the spine. I've also been led to the spine, plus the skull and the sensing of the face. It just seems to complete the whole thing somehow.

I too have concern as to how we as a group are approaching this opportunity. Yes, discussion is needed. The typing/writing/posting has another equally valid aspect, as I see it. Like the longhand journalling which is considered the structure ("bones") of much psychological work, without expression through writing, much of a person's inner work exercises will be left undigested and so will be not very nutritious at all.
And just like that longhand journalling and inventorying, the hardest part about it is the beginning of it. An effort must be made. What is received after the fact is beyond price - but you don't even begin to believe this until afterwards.
For me, it is like digestion and elimination of the unused material, before any further progress can be made. Otherwise the organism is not so clear as it might be - psychologically - and there is not room enough to receive anything new.

Unless anyone has a desire to take over the facilitation, I'm happy to continue that for another year. Two years is a good time frame for this, I think. It isn't who facilitates that is important. It is who is posting and so opening the way for his or her continued development. I'm not saying the person isn't developing elsewhere, of course. Just talking about our development as a group and as individuals here on this great site. Speaking of that, I don't recall reading before the particular Tony Blake site mentioned, and wished to especially draw attention to it.

Best,
Judith.

---

by Gururaj

The 12 joint exercise and the one synchronising breathing with cycling through the chakras (From the post by Judy long ago titled Chakras and the Enneagram) are the two sensing tasks I re-visit often.

Yes , to state the obvious, participation in any group endeavour benefits both the individual and the group.

I always look forward to posts by others on this site - it makes this forum more 'alive' and interesting to be participating.

And pushing myself to make a post always is like upward blending action of the law of three

(and not posting is the movement in the other direction).

Regards to all,
Gururaj

---

by JohnS

Regarding other historical correspondences: around the same time as Gurdjieff, FM Alexander (an Australian) developed similar relaxation exercises. It developed from his work as an actor, when he had such stagefright that parts of his body locked up, and he could not perform. The principle is the exact same as the sensing exercise, but including a technique where no muscle is tensed in trying to do the sensing, so there is awareness of the part to be sensed, and at the same time awareness of lack of tension developing in doing the exercise.
The only difference in approach was he always started with the neck, because this area supports the whole rest of the body, including the head, so trying to sense a part while the neck was tense and unaware was futile, as the neck in this case would be spreading tension to other parts.
This has been my version of sensing for many years, and has constant results.

John

---

by Harry

I think that it is important to separate sensing from relaxation. We are not trying to relax when moving energy around the joints. At times relaxation may result. But it is not the purpose. G. gives a number of relaxation exercises, including the draining exercise which he describes in the third series. He also discusses relaxing different parts of the body.

Tension can be both positive and negative. When it is unconscious and not being used, then it becomes negative. Try pounding a nail without tension. Or turning a screw. Even if you're using electrical tools you still need that tension.

---

by Gururaj

That's an important distinction - relaxation vis-a-vis just sensing.The latter has a hint of expectation , of desiring a particular outcome.

(By the way,after reading Harry's post , I tried intentionally tensing the muscles of the face and eyes and then letting go. That was another way to bring the body to neutral - if that be one's aim).

After years of unconsciously and instinctively not liking to be in a heavy,negative state whenever such a state got set, it was a novel experience for me to somehow find myself , at moments recently, just watching the state rather than doing anything about it.

That's the way for Intentional Suffering ?

---

by Gururaj

One correction in my previous post. I meant 'former' not 'latter' .

---

by JohnS

I agree about the difference between relaxation and tension. Perhaps I was not clear enough in stating that the aim of Alexander techbique is - the same as Gurdjieff's -to notice and get rid of totally unnecessary tensions that reduce our energy reserves.
It begins with objectively observing the body, because without awareness, the tensions cannot be observed.
One really inrteresting part of the process is to be able to take the weight of the head off the spine - the difference in energy flow when this is achieved is often remarkable.

John

---

by Harry

Observing rather than fighting with something like unnecessary tension is certainly work. The most available is to relax the muscles of the face. This was a given exercise and it is often harder than it sounds. The draining exercise is something that can be done when there is time and much need.

---

by Cassandra

Funny this week's task was about sensing. I had recently picked up (again) the book Sadhana- a Way to God. It begins with simple sensing exercises much like those recommended by Gurdjieff. I feel I need to stay with these for a long while before moving on with the book because there is something I need to see for myself. That is whether these simple exercises reveal anything about myself to me.

I have done the 12 joint exercise but have never noticed anything different or, just anything after doing them. Granted I didn't stay with these for months on end, but for the 6 weeks or so doing it--nothing to report. Not having any noticeable result is what discourages me from continuing. But I will commit to the sensing for and try not to expect any particular results but at the same time, do as G. suggested, try it and see what happens.

Gujuraj, I can relate to the pushing of oneself to post. Why is it I ask myself that the ratio of views to replies each week is often 3 or 4 to 1?

---

by Karen

> Judy wrote:
> The Basic Sensing Exercise
> To start with the experience Sensing, take a comfortable position and become aware of your feet. Imagine that you are being filled with a warm, thick, honey like liquid and that it is slowly filling your body, starting from the feet and moving up to your legs, then pelvis, then torso, then arms, then chest, then head. Be aware of the sense of gravity pulling your body towards the ground. Be aware of the position of your limbs. Strive to maintain an awareness of Sensing in the whole body. This requires your whole attention.

Thank you Judy. The basic sensing exercise was very grounding and really placed me in the body. Any time that I felt flighty, and was aware enough to apply this practice, I'd visually the thick honey filling the body and it would snap my presence back into the body. A most helpful exercise.

Warm regards,

Karen

Work Program week beginning 14 May 2012

---

by Karen

Sounding - from Ouspensky's "In Search of the Miraculous," p. 304

On one occasion, in connection with the description of exercises in concentration and bringing the attention from one part of the body to another, G. asked:

"When you pronounce the word 'I' aloud, have you noticed where this word sounds in you?"

We did not at once understand what he meant. But we very soon began to notice that when pronouncing the word 'I' some of us definitely felt as if this word sounded in the head, others felt it in the chest, and others over the head--outside the body.

I must mention here that personally I was entirely unable to evoke this sensation in myself and that I have to rely on others.

G. listened to all these remarks and said that there was an exercise connected with this which, according to him, had been preserved up to our time in the monasteries of Mount Athos.

A monk kneels or stands in a certain position and, lifting his arms, which are bent at the elbows, he says--Ego aloud and drawn out while listening at the same time where the word "Ego" sounds.

The purpose of this exercise is to feel "I" every moment a man thinks of himself and to bring "I" from one center to another.

Report your findings and developments to the group.
Have a wonder-ful week!

Karen

---

by Harry

This is an important exercise which G gave. Can you place I in different locations? Can you notice where the sounding is when you are not conscious of the utterance. Or even the thought. Can you feel other words.

---

by Gururaj

No particular discovery arising from the exercise.

An observation though - only when a thought or feeling springs forth, there is an "i" behind it (one of many).

In true silence , there is just sensation.

---

by JohnS

I could not get it to 'move' to another lcation besides the chest, except for a few occasions when I found the solar plexus. This was done using Gurdjieff's recommendation to sound the "I" in the head and the "am" in the solar plexus.
If observations, not results, are required, then like Gururaj, I did not observe anything specific. If it is meant to locate energies - or flow of them - then Judy's 6-count Energy Circulator still seems to have more definite energy-flow characteristics for me. My guess is I haven't done this exercise nearly enough times, and with enough discipline

John

---

by Karen

> Harry wrote:
> Can you place I in different locations?

Not sure about the capacity to direct or influence I to different locations, but when sounding I aloud, when centered, and aware, observed on a few occasions that the vibrations bounced between the head, heart and solar plexus then aligned and stood to attention so to speak on the pranic tube/central column.

When sounding the word ego aloud, it vibrated in the head, in the frontal lobe area or in the solar plexus, but never in more than one area at a time.

> Can you notice where the sounding is when you are not conscious of the utterance.

No, not at all.

---

by Harry

Just feel your hand. Nothing else. Put your consciousness in your hand. Focus all of your attention there. If something appears elsewhere, like the back of the neck, resist it. Then stop resisting the other influence and allow the consciousness to flow there.

For those doing the G exercise, do the entire thing. I AM I Wish I Can. I always resounding in the head. Flows to solar plexus, open the solar plexus. This is on exhale. Then I back to head. Flows to emotional center. (Can, and often is in three different places.) I back to head. Inhallation while the energy flows back up to the head on Can.

Happiness is a circular motion. Donovan.

Work Program week beginning 21 May 2012

---

by JohnS

Often I am brought up short when I come across the original meaning of a word, when suddenly struck by how much it has changed (the Law of Seven turning back on itself), and conversely how accurate was the initial description.

From Pierre Bonnasse, "Magic Language of the Fourth Way":

"Every work that aims for evolution must be experienced as a spiritual asceticism that seeks to raise consciousness to a higher level. Those who seek DIVERSION -from the original etymology of the word - will turn themselves away from the essential,from the essence of heaven, the source of salvation, condemning themselves forever to confusion and incapability."

Observe this week the times you lapse into diversion, going away form the essential. It can be disguised in 'time for a little rest', or "I just need to relieve the tension for a minute, it will do me good,', "I worked hard today....'

Within one day, make a rough percentage count of essential vs non-essential work.

John

---

by Gururaj

"Essential" ---- Nurturing the Essence ?... Hmm.

Lord have mercy

---

by JohnS

What this week has reinforced is the importance I try and put into the work, and the real lack of effort I use to achieve this, in terms of sustained attention. I have set myself an artificial deadline to achieve a certain state by a certain time, but unfortunately the "I" that created this deadline seems to have faded away.
Habit is the over-ruling god of my life. This week I tried to trivialise habit in contrast with the Essential, but habit won - again: an overwhelming victory!

John

---

by Harry

Don't fight civil wars, John. Habit is a trait. Some habits are very good. They are things we need to live. If yo had to drive a car consciously every day you would go out of your mind. And be a very bad driver. Do not do what can't be done. When you can touch the essential live in it. Don't fight off the rest. Our higher centers know more than is dreamt of in our philosophies.

---

by Karen

> Harry wrote:
> When you can touch the essential live in it. Don't fight off the rest. Our higher centers know more than is dreamt of in our philosophies.

This is such an important point that you make that has been a learning as of late. To see so many things that could be done and could not. . . and to just take notice, put it all up on the shelf so to speak and touch 1 thing at a time, the essential, and remain neutral to all of the rest. Not to fight off the rest...it has been a learning, that fails at times, but has create a more balanced state, a richness, a conservation of energy.

---

by Cassandra

I probably spend 10-20% of any given day thinking about work but not actually working; however, this varies. Like John mentioned, the I that vowed to WORK tires easily. Typical distractions for me are lapsing into day dreams/fantasies and voicing an opinion (a loud one, sometimes). But there are also many times over the course of a month where I am aware of the need for silence.

---

by Gururaj

> John Summers wrote:
> Observe this week the times you lapse into diversion, going away form the essential. It can be disguised in 'time for a little rest', or "I just need to relieve the tension for a minute, it will do me good,', "I worked hard today....'

"I read (and pondered a bit) on some Work literature today" - Is this too a diversion from actual Work ?.

Somehow , I manage to do this (reading) for about 1/2 an hour or more every day. I do'nt watch TV or 'indulge' in any pleasurable pastimes just for relaxing. But moving beyond reading up to being ,say,present to the moment and trying to validate what I read, hardly ever happens.

G says in VFTRW that knowledge is the water , flour is the body and emotion/suffering is the fire - to bake the bread.

May John's task continue to remind me to evoke some feeling heat into this equation.
Regards to all,
Gururaj

---

by JohnS

Gururaj;

You have mentioned the vital factor which I left out:
When I was struck by the meaning of the word 'essential', that was an emotional shock.
When I 'planned' the viewing of essential and non-essential tasks for the week, I did not include the emotions as a vital part of proceeding.

Thankyou
John

Work Program week beginning 28 May 2012

---

by Cassandra

Simple Forms

This exercise is from Anthony de Mello's Sadhana.

de Mello advises the practitioner who is attempting sensing the body: "To advance in it (body awareness) what you need is not to complicate your techniques but to persevere in simplicity....Put up with your boredom. Resist the temptation to seek novelty and instead, seek depth.

For 1 month I commit myself to the following at least once daily:

Begin with roughly 5 minutes of becoming aware of sensations in various parts of the body. Then move to awareness of breathing. Become aware of the air as it comes in and goes out through your nostrils. Do not concentrate on the air as it enters your lungs, just your nostrils. Do not control the breath. Do not interfere with it. Observe it. Do this exercise 10-15 minutes.

---

by Gururaj

The simplicity is indeed useful.
Have been able to do the exercise atleast once daily and am also ,more often, sensing the status of the face muscles.
So , no suffering of not being able to do the weekly task

Thanks Cass !

Gururaj

---

by JohnS

I also do it often. I found that concentrating, as suggested, on point of entry and exit of air (instead of the lungs) was a more immediate awareness of the process, possibly helped by the fact that at this point one can physically feel the air movement, and thus 'investigate its quality' in both directions.

John

---

by Cassandra

Thank you, Gururaj and John for your posts. This is a good one for me because of its straightforwardness. It helps me not to get caught in expecting an immediate response from work efforts. Simply paying attention to various body parts and the breath. Important for me to note is that I have noticed nothing out of the ordinary in doing these two things, just the tedium and effort to focus and bring attention back again and again.

Work Program week beginning 4 June 2012

---

by Gururaj

THE REIGN OF THE QUEEN OF HEARTS

Observe all of your emotions, positive and negative. Just watch them as they change and march through your day.

Enquire into the causes in the light of knowledge from Work principles.

Be also aware of the states of the other centres - instinctive(CLUBS) ,moving(SPADES)and intellectual(DIAMONDS).

Gururaj

---

by JohnS

I'm very attracted to the Queen of Hearts, especially with her direct method of dealing with my over-dominant intellectual centre:
"Off with his head!"

John

---

by Judy

Ah - "The Queen of Hearts she made some tarts..." - She likes to make tarts and to be positive. She says she has a right not to be negative.
To this end, she can be very tricky, and manage to get both the King and Queen of Diamonds working towards her positive ends.

For example, this morning I was considering that "I have quite a difficult day ahead."
Queen of Hearts didn't like that approach much.
So I changed it from 'victim' to 'volunteer', being the Diamond attitude. Perhaps a sort of metanoia in there.
Now it sounds more like
"Yes - interesting day. Let's go to it."
Consciously changing from victim (having to do) to volunteer (being interested in doing) brings about a shift; a sort of "unfreezing" of the lower centres, so Spades and Clubs swing easily into service.

Of course the defect of self-centredness was prominent in the victim attitude, whereas the volunteer attitude is more 'others-centred'.

Queen of Hearts is somehow happier and grateful.

In general terms, though, intellect is King and emotion Queen. Yes, they work best side by side and with the other centres in train.

Thanks, Gururaj. This is a good one.
Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by Harry

So we're praising the Queen of Cups? Emotions? And why is the Queen of Swords (Spades) so routinely defiled?

---

by Cassandra

This is a bit off subject, but the power of emotions/thoughts in regulating health was presented to me last week. I'd had a certain tenderness in one part of the body but when I was told, 'oh, no worries," the tenderness seemed, no did, disappear virtually over night. I'd had it for 2 weeks. So why can't I harness that kind of power, consistently for work efforts? I wish I could believe as strongly in this week's exercise in eventually bringing about a different body.

---

by Harry

You can't harness it regularly because you are talking about a single incident. Who knows what happened. It may well have been "forgetting" the problem. Or directing energy toward it. G. gives a variation on the I Am, I Wish, I Can in which energy is directed to a particular part of the body for a particular impact. But this is not something a lower I can direct. And we can't Work for results. We Work and the results happen. We must observe them. And carry on. Until we are able to fully understand what Work has what Result. And that may be in another life time.

---

by JohnS

Harry;
That's a timely emphasis regarding the lower I trying to direct an exercise, and directing the thought instead totally on observation only.
Every time I have an enthusiasm for an exercise or task, I'm more aware now, most times, of it being a compartmentalised enthusiasm, raised by a small I - even though enthusiasm is something which at the time seems all-pervading and 'right'
It really is, as you say, an eternal fight.

Thanks
John

Work Program week beginning 11 June 2012

---

by Harry

This comes from Transcripts of Gurdjieff's Meetings 1941-1946. This is from Meeting Ten. Page 34 in my text.

It is impossible to work all the time on an object; you haven't enough energy. For this reason, one-half of your time should go to your task and half for the preparation of the task. It's a very good combination. You must use the time when you are not seeing the person to prepare yourself. How to prepare? You can only do one thing---you can consciously increase your wish for contact with that person. You can increase it by saying to yourself "I am". You breathe consciously. You say, "I am." When you say "I", you breathe in the air consciously with all the active elements of the air. When you say "am", you accumulate some energy in your battery and you think of using this energy. You represent to yourself the person with whom you are working and you think that when you see that person you will be more concentrated, you will have more contact with him. So that what you would have done in seven times, you will do in one.

---

by Gururaj

On some of the days this week, for just about 3 to 5 minutes at a time , I did the "I Am" exercise but with no particular relationship/person in mind.
The next day in a couple of interactions, I wonder whether it was imagined, or it was just a coincidence, but a state of being grounded and connected(more aware of) the others was experienced.

Have read other similar exercises indicated by G (at-least one of them is in the "Du-Versity" section of the ES site) .
But I hav'nt tried them consistently.They appear as a somewhat simple but exotic ritual compared to other Work efforts like self-remembering .

But may be they are just the simple tasks one can do more easily first before being able to attempt difficult Work efforts.

---

by Harry

Work is simple. If an activity gets too complicated it's sort of like using a fancy word when a simple one would do.

Yes, this is a variation on G's major Work Exercise. I am, I wish, I can. And it does store energy for future use.

by Cassandra

Harry, I am (no pun intended) adding the "I am" to the breathing exercises I began about a month ago. Rather than only concentrating on the sensation of breath in and out of the nostrils, I do the I on the in breath and am on the out. I have no person or activity in mind.

I've been doing this over the past week and remember doing it while driving in Atlanta traffic. I was driving with a work colleague; most of the time we try to maintain small talk conversation, which for me is sometimes hard to do, especially when trying to concentrate on driving and mentally preparing for these evening meetings.

Anyway, I attempted to do breath I am for a stretch of highway only and was able to give it some attention. I noticed a very subtle calming or relaxation in the car and almost a jolt when the conversation resumed. I'm not sure if the task fortified me for the meetings, but they ran very smoothly.

I will continue with the I am breath. Thanks

---

by Harry

Remember to direct your breath. Inhallation up the spine to the head center. Exhalation down to the solar plexus. Once this circle becomes familiar, add the I wish. I can. steps. This will give you a full centered three brain experience.

When dealing with others, prepare yourself. And then behave as usual. This is acting. You aren't lying to them. You are just acting consciously instead of letting the record play. I am can provide a stop. You can also tell the playing record to stop. And then choose which ones to play.

---

by Cassandra

I've looked on the site at the breathing exercises and can't find what you suggest. Can you give the complete reference for the inhaling up the spine and exhaling down to the solar plexus. Is that "I" up the spine and "am" down to solar plexus and the same with "I wish" "I can"? Thanks.

---

by Harry

The actual reference is in the Third Series. G describes the exercise. I believe it is somewhere near page 100. . .just beyond.

---

by Cassandra

THANKS

Work Program week beginning 18 June 2012

---

by Alistair

The challenge of self-remembering continues unabated. Accepting karma with joy is a continual trial. Distraction buffers are always a blink away, our work is ceaseless and never ending.

For me the most useful of this year exercises was posted by Harry for the weel of 23rd April. It's an exercise that can be employed at any moment and my own impression is that it immediately seems to create a different perspective.

The objective was to sense and feel our mass or perhaps one might term it as our depth, to feel ourselves and others three dimensionally rather than two dimensionally. We feel our true physical shape and that of others and objects.

So my suggestion is to try and remember to use this not only this week whenever possible but as an extremely useful focus at anytime anywhere. These tend to be my preferred exercises, ones that can be applied anytime anywhere to assist our self-remembering

Wishing all a profitable week

---

by Gururaj

> Alistair wrote:
> The objective was to sense and feel our mass or perhaps one might term it as our depth, to feel ourselves and others three dimensionally rather than two dimensionally. We feel our true physical shape and that of others and objects.
> Wishing all a profitable week

No 'profit' yet , Alistair.On the other hand, niether have I 'invested' much efforts.

One thought , or doubt - When I remember , I SENSE my physicality & inner state.
But of others I can only SEE them (not feel) in 3 D.

By the way even this is a shift .Normally I only feel the automatic triggering of the memory I have of another person when I meet them

---

by Judy

I agree with you Alistair, about the usefulness of this exercise. I too use it often and yes, there is an alteration of perspective every time. One can almost feel new neuronal pathways happening.
I've been noticing the sensations of differing bodily masses/depths connected with different feelings/emotions at certain times too.

On June 15th, I was at the funeral of my closest cousin, Helen Kay. We had a lifelong bond. She was like a sister to me. We spent much time living in the other's households as children, when respective parents were away travelling, as they did a lot. Some tears had flowed. As the service ended, I couldn't help but notice how extremely heavy the body felt. I had some difficulty moving, in fact.

May she rest in peace. Hers was a fine death, if it can be called such. She was conscious and peaceful, with all the family around her. At 2pm she looked up and said faintly that it was time to go. Then she closed her eyes and breathed softly. Twenty minutes later she stopped breathing. She is sadly missed but we must release her. Prayers for her soul especially welcome for these first forty days.

At other times, those of high energy, there is a lightness and joy about the very same bodily mass.
And yet again, the degree of relaxation of the muscles changes the perceptions here.
However, I don't want to complicate this exercise by intellectualising too much. Kept simple, it definitely helps me to live more completely in the body.
Little Russian Blue Elliecat keeps it very simple; she lives perfectly in her body.

Warm regards to all,
Judy.

---

by JohnS

I have a cafe I go to with a window onto the street, where I can watch people passing by. Several times I have done this exercise, and when a passer-by becomes 3-dimensional, you see their history: in their face, and how they move. I can't actually READ that history, as their thoughts are invisible, but I can feel the mass built up over their lives, especially in their movement. Even 5-year-olds have large chunks of what they will be and do already ingrained in them.

Of course this perception shows me two main things: my habits of watching and analysing, plus my automatic -and immediate- judging of people. I have to constantly pull back and just WATCH.

I am certainly very aware of my own mass, my own history, and at times like that, lightness of Being can seem a long way away.

John

Work Program week beginning 25 June 2012

---

by Judy

A current focus of my work is from a treasured book I've been reading daily for some five years. It is Sogyal Rinpoche's “Glimpse after Glimpse – Daily Reflections on Living and Dying”. Below are the suggested exercises (2) and ponderings (1) from the past three days.

June 21.
Imagine vividly a situation where you have acted badly, one about which you feel guilty, and about which you wince even to think of it.
Then, as you breathe in, accept total responsibility for your actions in that particular situation, without in any way trying to justify your behaviour. Acknowledge exactly what you have done wrong, and wholeheartedly ask for forgiveness. Now, as you breathe out, send out reconciliation, forgiveness, healing and understanding.
So you breathe in blame, and breathe out the undoing of harm; you breathe in responsibility, breathe out healing, forgiveness and reconciliation.
This exercise is particularly powerful and may give you the courage to go to see the person whom you have wronged, and the strength and willingness to talk to him or her directly and actually ask for forgiveness from the depths of your heart.

June 22.
What really matters is not just the practice of sitting but far more the state of mind you find yourself in after meditation. It is this calm and centered state of mind you should prolong through everything you do. I like the Zen story in which the disciple asked his master:
“Master, how do you put enlightenment into action? How do you practice it in everyday life?”
“By eating and by sleeping,” replied the master.
“But Master, everybody eats and everybody sleeps.”
“But not everybody eats when they eat, and not everybody sleeps when they sleep.”
From this comes the famous Zen saying, “When I eat, I eat; when I sleep, I sleep.”
To eat when you eat and to sleep when you sleep means to be completely present in all your actions, with none of the distractions of ego to stop you from being there. This is integration.

June 23.
Think of the moment of death as a strange border zone of the mind, a no-man's land in which, on one hand, if we do not understand the illusory nature of our body, we might suffer vast emotional trauma as we lose it, and on the other we are presented with the possibility of limitless freedom, a freedom that springs precisely from the absence of that very same body. When we are at last freed from the body that has for so long defined and dominated our understanding of ourselves, the karmic vision of one life is completely exhausted, but any karma that might be created in the future has not yet begun to crystallise.
So what happens in death is that there is a “gap”, or space, that is fertile with vast possibility; it is a moment of tremendous, pregnant power where the only thing that matters, or could matter, is how exactly the mind is. Stripped of a physical body, the mind stands naked, revealed startlingly for what it has always been: the architect of our reality.

****
On a personal note, I am going to the U.K. In September for two weeks. I'm hoping to catch a coffee with Ian. Just thought I'd mention, on the off chance that anyone else may happen to be in the London vicinity around that time. A little face-to-face energy may energise the group. It usually does.
Best regards,
Judy.

---

by Gururaj

"From this comes the famous Zen saying, “When I eat, I eat; when I sleep, I sleep.”
To eat when you eat and to sleep when you sleep means to be completely present in all your actions, with none of the distractions of ego to stop you from being there."

One of my major distractions being inner considering , this gem from Nicoll's ..Commentaries ,pg.264, which I came across quite randomly has been of some help towards the mindulness exercise.

" The being identified with oneself comes first,being upset and offended comes second,making inner accounts comes third"

---

by JohnS

On trying this, plus via material I am reading, I have found that for any effectiveness to be confirmed, I must be aware I'm doing it in the right part of the right centre. As I normally live in the formatory parts of my centres, trying a delicate exercise like this is not valued unless I am in the emotional part of either the intellectual or emotional centre. One faint indicator that I have moved out of the formatory parts is a feeling of expansion. I'm not talking about results, but about the process.

This has been apparent to me since attempting the 'I am' exercise recently: I had to be constantly aware that the "I" expressed as "I Am" was not a false I. "I" was fooled many times, but at least I was aware of the deception sometimes.

Thanks, Judy, for yet another method towards the means, as distinct from the end.

John

---

by Judy

Yes, John - an interesting point you make about which "I" in the I Am exercise. Mr Nyland used to say it should be the highest "I" in you, and to take a little time to work towards this, depending on your understanding. For instance, remind yourself that you are partly "star stuff", or that there is a vast unsuspected most of the time Inner Power which can be called by various names, and so on, before this primary exercise is attempted.

And Guru, thank for the comment and Nicoll reference P264. An absolute gem! I so often these days concentrate on the fifth volume that it has been a while since reading that one. I would love to read Nicoll at a steady rate of say, two pages a day. It would take a while, and we'd need a small dedicated group - just like the one we have doing the work progras, come to think of it - and we could read individually and share comments in a new forum here, perhaps (with Ian's ok). Hmm - not a bad idea really. Do we have any takers or expressions of interest?
I know we have a BT Forum which needs resuming. It sees to have however run out of steam at present. Maybe we could still consider the above. Sometimes one thing feeds another, and knowledge is much needed.
Here is another Sogyal Rinpoche recent reading about ignorance which seems appropo:
June 17
"There could be no bigger mistake than to think that ignorance is somehow dumb and stupid, or passive and lacking in intelligence. On the contrary, it is shrewd and cunning, versatile and ingenious in the games of deception, and in our wrong views and their burning convictions, we find one of its deepest, and, as Buddha said, most dangerous manifestations:
What do you have to fear from the wild elephant
Who can only damage your body here and now,
When falling under the influence of misguided people and wrong views
Not only destroys the merit you have accumulated in the past,
But also blocks your path to freedom in the future!

Thanks for the comments and interest in this little sojourn into Tibettan Buddhism this week.
Best wishes to all,
Judy.

---

by Gururaj

William Blake is considered as a mystic,is'nt he.

After pondering quite a triggered by the 3rd part of Judy's work program,finally I saw Blake's lines and it sort of seemed to sum up my thoughts.

1.Forgiving others and seeking forgiveness - are acts of remorse necessitated by having lead a life in strong reactions,steeped in the past and future,holding on to joys and sorrows.

2.By the grace of the divine ,if one is lucky to learn to live in the present and kiss the joys and pains and let them fly by, then there is a chance to experience deeper realities.As Madame De Salzmann says in Reality of Being , the usually 'active' in us must learn to become 'passive' and be in a state of service to allow something in us which is hidden and passive to become stronger .

3.Then at the point of the giving up of the body , if there is a finer energy apart from it,maybe its further movement would be an evolutionary,lighter one ,even if in another new body ? I have'nt the faintest clue as I am mostly BEing in (1) above and aspiring for (2) .

I am OK Judy with your suggestion.We could also take each of the building blocks of the WORK ,like the Centres,Considering,being Asleep,etc. and read and share what each of the great seekers on the way ,like G himself and others have said about that aspect - while at the same time studying that particular aspect in our own lives.
But what do the other seekers in our small band think of it ? Is our chain (I sometimes visualise it) stretching across the globe energised ?
Guru

---

by JohnS

Well, we just seem to be hanging in there: I thought the basic aim was to contribute one reply per week, but we seem to be fading.....I tried to email Ian, but I just got a message saying we are not accepting new members at present.

I must admit I was a bit stumped by the current BT chapter on America, and perhaps others were, too. But as you say, Judy, a revival is a priority at the moment, and I agree Nicoll's Commentaries would be a place of real focus.

I'll have a real think about things this week, as far as they may be under my control.

John

---

by Cassandra

Judy, I'd be interested in reading Nicoll's commentaries. Thanks.

---

by Harry

I want to say something. I have read much. I have read all five volumes of Nicoll. And consider him a good psychologist.

Personally I began this quest over 30 years ago when I found A New Model of The Universe. This lead me to The Fourth Way and In Search of the Miraculous. My academic training then kicked in and said if I was reading the pupils I had best find the source. I went to the public library and found All and Everything. I then read it three times as instructed in the prelude. Followed by Meetings with Remarkable Men and finally The Third Series, which, at that time, was only available by special purchase through the Gurdjieff Institute.

If you came upon something that was written by Christ, or Buddah, or any of the major figures would you not desperately read that? And if it gave you instructions wouldn't you follow those instructions?

Yes I know All and Everything is difficult. It is meant to be difficult. G rewrote it again and again judging the impact upon listeners. He created his own language. He wrote in symbols. And part of the beginning of the Work is to digest this teaching. The chapter on America is not just on America. We need to ask ourselves why the jam is so suspicious. Because that is how we live. But we also have to remember that America represents the New World. The World to Come. And this pretty jam which has no nutritious value is typical. And anyone who is living today has to be certain that we are doing only "money business". But what does that mean? It means we are saving up things of supposed value and not producing anything for our own futures. And Mr. Bellybutton. Wow. How funny. How beautiful. Big old fat Mr. Bellybutton and Lindsay Lohan. (I choose the latter on purpose. A very talented young woman who has been belly buttoned and drugged into wasting the talents given her. Just like the biblical story of hiding the talents.)

If you are struggling, pick up Nicoll. I still read a chapter at random when I want advice. But take a moral oath to yourself that you will read All and Everything three times. As G describes. And that you will work on understanding symbolic language and made up words and begin to Work as you read. Because you will Work as you read.

If you read a full chapter of G with as much attention as you have I will posit that you will get "high". And you will reach a state beyond that of meditation. Then try to keep that state alive as long and as often as possible. You will then realize that much of what we need to do is not waste the little energy we have. To create new energies. Because you cannot power a Formula 1 Race Car on kerosene. It will run, but will never be what it was designed to be. But kerosene lights a great lantern that can help us find the race car.

Finally, this is a struggle that we all continue to be on. Whether we have been in touch with this Work for 40 years or 4 days. And we need to help each other with our growth. If we can do this, this little outpost on the Web can be the most important door we ever open.

---

by Gururaj

"But kerosene lights a great lantern that can help us find the race car". Superbly put

In Sanskrit , the great original works are "Sutras" - cryptic and profound - the race cars.
The "Bhashyas" (light of the lanterns) were the commentaries on the "Sutras" created by the more adept among the followers - to better understand the main work.

But I wonder whether we should ,or should not, compare the issue of contemplation on the works of Nicoll vis-a-vis G's with the example , say , of a fighter pilot first getting trained on less challenging vehicles.

Or ,is it that the effort needed to stay with BT ,itself the thing which transmutes us (from kerosene to aviation fuel) which benefit may not be there in ,say,the Commentaries?

---

by Karen

Harry wrote:

> Because you cannot power a Formula 1 Race Car on kerosene.

What a brilliant fully loaded sentence Harry!

I began this quest, and sat at the table, feasting on many a great writings etched by those in the Work 5 years ago this July!

Speaking from personal experience, All and Everything is very difficult, but our physical body needs to work everything through emotionally and mentally first, so it's important to feed the new information to the body little by little, so that it has an easier time integrating the information on all levels...and so our ego doesn't go off half-cocked, sending our systems into panic mode creating mass pandemonium.

Much gratitude for being a part of this group of fellow seekers. Everyone's contributions and efforts to post, have assisted in my growth and as Harry mentioned we need to help each other out.

Dean, Chuck, Layne where are you? -- miss your input

Karen

---

by Harry

I began my post by saying that I started elsewhere as well. If you want the full background, had I not had wonderful English instructors who taught me to truly read, I might never have reached out for even those. Of found that marvelous little bookstore in the basement of a more traditional bookstore run by a hippie couple. Or even the arcane shop where I eventually bought my own copy of All and Everything, despite feeling very freaked out just endering the domain of someone very very strange.

We all come to this Work with some background. I even read Nicoll this morning for my Morning Reading. Before I feed the body I feed the spirit.

That stated purpose of All and Everything, to utterly destroy everything you currently believe, is certainly true. I have a Masters in Theatre. Love film. Much of what I originally read was almost an affront. But I was convinced this was a Teacher. Perhaps The Teacher for Our Age. I still remember when I came to the personal realization that Rimbaud was an act of emotional masturbation. Because I had embraced the poet as a young idiot. On the other hand no one will ever convince me that cummings wasn't someone who knew. And was preparation for what I would experience later. Actually taught me to read poetry by his own pecularities.

Two books my son read were Learning How to Learn and Knowing How to Know by Shah. There are many out there who belittle Shah. But he was the only available source of Nasruddin when I was investigating those stories. (I also own a complete set of Burton's translation of the 1001 Arabian Nights, all 12 volumes bound in leather. Maybe read three of them. The footnotes are better than the stories.) (I have also read the Eastern, Indian, and other original sources and once even ventured into the Book of the Dead.)

After all the years I came to the conclusion that the title All and Everything literally meant that.

We are a beginning Work Group. The best thing we can do with this opportunity is to spend time here exchanging ideas and thoughts. And Karen's five years are just as important as my 40. Judy and I have both had contact with Nyland groups. We have the advantage of different cultures and different live experiences. And we should be using this on a regular basis. We should pay Ian back for taking this chance and supporting this little experiment. We should provide him with food for his own growth.

---

by Cassandra

So, the reason I'd be interested in a Nicole reading group is because of his references to the Gospels, ancient texts that form the basis of the religious upbringing I've had--christianity. Of course, I've heard the stories again and again since childhood but realize that the way they're routinely interpreted is limited to the level of the superficial, physical, material. Nicole's 'New Man' and and the Commentairies have been good for me because finally I feel that I can make sense of some of what Christ is reported to have said, get away from Christian exceptionalism and see similarities with other traditions. And as others have intimated, Nicole is easier to read than G.

But I get your point as well, Harry that BIG effort is required.

One reason I started with ISOTM several years ago was because of hearing G's name (again) in Eckhart Tolle's lectures. My husband had read some of G. way back, and he could vouch for G. But like you say, Harry, I wanted to read the original, but it's not easy.

I contributed to BT discussion early on but was way over my head in terms of being able to interpret anything or draw connections to anything I knew from other like-minded writers; so I limit my contribution on this site to the weekly discussions. I'd like to practice more of the ideas rather than intellectualize about them. What good is it if I can elaborate on the Law of 3 or 7 but am involuntarily (or vuluntarily) rude to the person next to me in the check out line? This is my task as I see it, how to accept what is in front of me graciously. Hopefully, I can add something to my being and realize the nearness of the kingdom of heaven.

Thanks everyone for your posts and input.

Work Program week beginning 2 July 2012

---

by Karen

Sun Absolute Meditation
Let there be Light!

Imagine the sun. Imagine the sun, our sun, shining on you. Just feel the sun, without other details. Notice the effect it has on you.

(Pause)

Now imagine the Sun Absolute, where our Creator resides. It is very far away. Far away even from our tiny sun. Feel how the rays of the Sun Absolute touch the earth - just barely, just a few rays make it all the way to Earth. But feel how incredibly intense they are to our being. Feel how these rays which hardly even make it here, are more than enough for us to absorb. But we have to be open to them.

Notice where the rays of the Sun Absolute touch you. Much deeper than the skin and head-brain. Stay in contact with these rays of the Sun Absolute for a few minutes, and if you get lost, return first to our sun, then venture out to that sun which is so much bigger and so less familiar.

When you are ready, stop the exercise.

Report your experiences back to the group

Warm Regards,

Karen

Work Program week beginning 9 July 2012

---

by JohnS

Apologies for the late posting.

It was noted that I had some difficulty with the important "I Am" exercise - trying to summon the right 'I', or what Judy called the highest I.
The obvious answer (though still elusive in practice) is a conscious I. Now, you can only be conscious (the 3rd level, or self-consciousness) if you are working from all three centres: mind, heart and body - all have to be involved.

So, when performing this exercise

1. Say the 'I' and bring into view mind, heart and body. With the body last in mental order, you should feel a grounding effect
2. With the sequence body, heart, mind, feel an expanding effect upwards
3. With the sequence heart, body, mind, feel an expanding outwards
4. The overall aim is to be in all centres at once, but the above steps help to locate them first.

John

---

by Gururaj

An inner posture which I recently found useful to be in a more colllected state was inspired by this extract from Lee Van Laer's blog http://www.zenyogagurdjieff.blogspot.in/

In fact, since everything is already exactly as it is, preordained, and arranged according to destiny and the Will of God, if we feel we lack, the deficiency must belong to us, and not to God. When Al Arabi speaks of the eternal reality and essentiality of things, He makes it quite clear—as he must—that reality and essentiality are qualities without prejudice.
Since everything arises from God, nothing, in and of itself, can be deficient—even our feelings of deficiency constitute sacred truths, which must be inhabited. We forever wish to inhabit them conditionally—conditional, that is, upon our like or dislike—yet this choice is not actually ours to make.

I just totally accepted (not as a thought) a somewhat uncomfortable state I was in , and maybe it's fruit was that collected state.

Thanks ,John as well, for a 'do-able' task .

Regards to all
Gururaj

by Judy

Thanks for the reminder about Lee van Laer's site, Gururaj. I like it a lot.
Found there this morning, and relevant to the sounding of the I Am and the frequent emphasis on three-sentered attention, is;

"In any event, we must pray. It is this central attention pointed towards prayer, and the call for help, that keeps our minds from distracting us. To be sure, they'll distract us anyway; the mind is an undisciplined animal that runs from place to place like a rabbit, in search of the next good thing to gnaw on. The regular focused practice of prayer—preferably, a spontaneous and inspired one, but if not, a disciplined and prepared one—combined with a placement of attention on the point where impressions enter, is a powerful antidote for this kind of nonsense.

This idea of placing the attention on the point where impressions enter is quite important. It actually bears a close relationship to the practice of prayer, because the practice itself is the practice of the Presence of God, and that practice is inextricably linked with prayer, since (once again, as Al Arabi explains) one of the principal purposes of man, in so far as he meets the requirements of inner development, is an unfettered worship of the Lord"
(extract from "A Call to Prayer" on the site).

Thanks John for your most thoughtful exercise.
Regards to all,
Judith.

---

by Cassandra

John,

I had been doing a variation of the I AM during a breathing task, with a silent saying of 'I' on the inhale and AM on the exhale. Harry reminded me of the sensing of the spine and solar plexus. I've attempted to add these but find it hard to relax into the exercise because I'm torn between saying I AM and focusing on the spine and solar plexus. But that's fine, as I realize it takes a long time to see any results, and results should not be the end goal anyway. I just don't want to do things wrong, but I feel that any attempt is fine because even if I feel I'm 'doing it wrong,' my sincere efforts would attract a force to set me in a better direction. Thanks.

Work Program week beginning 16 July 2012

by Cassandra

Continue the Focus on the Breath

This is from Sarmoung's blog on G's I AM exercise, which in turn is from Possible Foundation's on Inner Exercises . It's long, but don't let that throw ya.

This is the exercise.

Outwardly , at the first glance, this exercise is simple. For instance, you see, I sit here in my usual posture. I am dividing my attention. But no one can see this inner process. I divide my attention consciously into two parts. With one part I now sense, feel and constate simultaneously with one conscious concentration. Now I breathe. I feel that something happening to the air that I breath in. Part of it goes in, part goes out, and a part remains. My organism, that is my lungs, take a part, then a part leaves and a part remains. I feel what is happening in my lungs. When I breath in, part of the air is assimilated and I feel its flow all over the body. It goes everywhere. I keep my attention fixed; I feel, I sense how this air is being assimilated in me and how It flows in my presence. It is not necessary to find out where it goes, it just flows in my presence.

One part of my attention is occupied with this – breathing, assimilating and flowing of the air. Already my mental associations are very weak. I notice them sometimes, by the way, because part of my attention is free, and is able to notice mental associations.

Now I will concentrate the ether half of my attention on my mind. my head brain. I feel that in my head-brain something arises from the total of the flow of associations there. I don’t know what is taking place there, but there is something, and with my half attention I notice this very thin something arise, so small, so light, so thin, that nobody feel it the first few times, not until constant practice gives the feeling. I know this subjectively because I have practised it. I feel , I sense, l constate, that something arises in my head-brain. All the time, of course, the other half of my attention is occupied with the breathing process. Even while speaking, this exercise is being automatically done.

Now I direct my attention to help this something in my brain to flow towards my solar plexus. What arises in the brain is not important. What is important is that the something that arises there should flow into the solar plexus. Now I feel how it flows. My attention is fully occupied and I don’t see any more associations All my attention is occupied pied with feeling, sensing, and assimilating the flow of air. and also with this arising in my head-brain.

This flow of assimilated air, and this something which arises in my head brain, I specially, consciously, with my wish, concentrate to let it flow Into my solar plexus.. Now. by the way I feel and constate that I breathe , I assimilate and that this flow goes to the solar plexus. And all the time the flow from the air I breathe and the flow from my head-associations go to the solar plexus although they issue from different sources.

For me personally, at the same time, I feel very strongly that I AM. I feel that I AM ten times stronger. My “I” takes in this food more intensely, but for you, at the present moment, do not do this exercise in order to be stronger. For you this exercise is only a preparation to have an “I” and so that you should constate the two sources from which this “I” can arise. For me it gives food to my “I”. It makes it stronger, so that now I am not “tail of donkey”. I AM.

But you can not yet use this exercise to make yourself stronger; you must first learn and constate the two sources from which this possibility can arise, to have a real ” I” – from air and from mentation, even automatic mentation; and then , when you will have practised this exercise a great deal, you may be able to have possibilities for real active mentation. And then with real active mentation, the ” I” can become stronger.

Enough. I stop and let these processes proceed in me automatically. Now, without titillation without philosophizing and manipulation, try to understand the total of all this and formulate it according to your subjective understanding, according to whatever kind of idiot you are. Then do [it].

Don’t imagine things.

Don’t be the slave of the data you have in yourselves for autosuggestion, but try very hard

---

by Gururaj

This exercise ,apparently, does something.
Shall 'do' and watch a few more days and report further.

---

by JohnS

For some time I have used a 'short version' of some of the essentials of this exercise, in order to try and remember myself while busy with an activity:
I simply say 'Receive' on the inbreath, and 'Return' on the outbreath, also being aware that the air emitted is different to the air in, and I have retained some qualities.
The word 'Return' also implies for me that I am trying to give something back for my existence.

John

---

by Gururaj

G mentions (in the text shared by Cassandra) that this exercise has the possibility of strengthening the Real I .

Well, my experience was like this . Did the task, as best as I could, before going to sleep on the day I read it.The morning after , during a short early morning walk there were states wherein one could see the I of the personality appearing and fading away .The witness in me then , was a distinct entity.For quite some time thru' the morning there was a different feel in my mind, which was reinforced by doing the task again for a while.
I had a thought not to squander by being unnecessarily outgoing and just be watchful. Yet was not very successful at that.

However ,on succeeding days the same vividness has not been there.

Yet , I reckon this is an exercise for the long haul.

In fact , I recollect having briefly tried out this task the first time I read it a year or two ago on the ES site.But maybe my visualisation/sincerity was not good enough then.Or is the 'effect' dependent on one's readiness , I wonder.

Thanks , Cassandra.

---

by Alistair

Dear Gururaj et al, the use of mantras, mind protection, and we would probably class I Am as a mantra, is indeed a requirement that might well last more than a lifetime in order to establish a still mind. My own experience is that this objective is extremely difficult having used a variety of different mantras generally built around the seven sacred vowels of which I Am are three. There is no easy way, so much to remember, moment to moment, to accept our karma and the unpleasant manifestations of others with joy and positive emotion
Luke 21:19 With patience ye shall possess thy soul.
Love & best wishes to all

---

by Harry

Alistair,

I would not qualify the I Am, I Wish, I Can as a mantra. This is not just a phrase to occupy the mind. It is an exercise in consciously eating and transferring energies.

---

by Cassandra

Thanks to all who posted. I agree Gujuraj that this is a task for the 'long haul.' I have tried this about three times and cannot say that I understand at all how to divide my attention. It is frustrating to say the least. But that's why I feel these kinds of exercises should be part of one's daily routine; then maybe after several years a person may be able to add something to their being. So, for me, nothing obvious to report except attempts at the exercise and a hope that I may be able to eventually perceive something different.

Work Program week beginning 23 July 2012

by Gururaj

Once an hour, make an effort to return to the still-point in the centre of the whirlwind of thoughts, emotions and sensations.

When annoyances of thought, emotion or sensation draw us into identification, counter them with a conscious affirmation, a 'doing otherwise', such as, instead of trying to banish the annoyance immediately, dwell upon it, observe it, examine it, experience its energy deeply. Then send its energy into the earth and return to your still-point.

The Seeker has observed that much of their habitual inner dialogue consists of reviewing the past or rehearsing for the future. Has the Seeker observed a common trait or chief feature which characterises their internal dialogues?

(Source - From the Work Program archives for 2008 , contributed by Ian)

Work Program week beginning 30 July 2012

---

by Harry

There are many things that we do mechanically. We foster habits. And the machine does them. We don't really want to change these mechanical habits if they work. Driving a car consciously can happen when it is an absolute necessity. Storm. Icy Roads. But for every day driving, the body and the habit work faster than the brain. They function on a faster energy. But cursing the red light is a mechanical habit that is not needed and drains energy. More to the point feeling resentment about being stuck in traffic is a habit that drains energy, and it is a habit.

G tells us that the way to transform these events is to will to do them. To will to be stuck in traffic. This then changes the entire event.

So will to wash the dishes. Will to vacume the floor. Will to cut the grass. Will to file those hundred folders. And the action becomes more conscious.

---

by Judy

Willing to do things the machine doesn't want to do is a daily part of my life. Though word usage is slightly different, "willingness" and "being willing" to allow defects to be removed where they interfere with my usefulness to others is also implicit in Step 6 of my Twelve Step Program
(6. Were entirely ready to have God remove all these defects of character.) These are correct uses of the will.

Incorrect use of the will is seen in many of my negativities.
Here's a paragraph from a current read "The Spirituality of Imperfection" by Ernest Kurtz and Katherine Ketcham, p125
"According to Farber, our will - our ability to choose - operates in two distinct realms. The first is the domain of objects, which has to do with specific entities that we can directly choose. The second realm involves directions or goals, those realities that cannot be directly grasped or chosen; in fact, Farber warns, goals and directions are distorted, even destroyed, by attempts to control them.
Soe examples may help. We can, for instance, directly will knowledge but not wisdom directly will pleasure but not happiness

" reading/listening but not understanding
" going to bed but not sleeping

Confusing the two realms leads first to anxiety and then, inevitably, to addiction.(end of quote).

Experience shows me that "willingness" and "willing" are most important aspects of my ability to move up in various octaves of activity - perhaps THE most important for me at present. This leads to a growing realisation that these qualities/attitudes are closely connected to surrender, which is involved in the Second Conscious Shock for me. Suffering, as Ian says, may also be involved; though even this is surrendered eventually.

Anyway, just comments on a Thursday morning.
Thanks, Harry, for the exercise. Whether "willing" or developing "willingness", one certainly gains in consciousness, as you point out. This is the wonder, really; that in the actual day-to-day struggle with negativity, is the spiritual growth/progress itself. How blessed we are!
Another current read is Emmet Fox's "The Sermon on the Mount", which is beginning very well indeed.

Love and best wishes,
Judy.

---

by Gururaj

Nike may be using the slogan "Just Do It" to encourage people to indulge. But in another sense it is certainly an energy conserver .

By just getting on with it and doing what needs to be done , the focus shifts from 'moping' to 'doing' and the result is 'coping' with life situations.

The other day my dear wife asked me (not very politely) to manage the garbage disposal daily. The initial energy drain from internal considering did not persist when I decided that , yes, it will be my job and even stared to think of better ways of doing it.

But it could also become a habit - that is always wading into tough tasks - without pausing to think of the aim, the final goal , as in say,working and accumulating money and not enjoying/ utilising it.

---

by Gururaj

And oh, would like to also share like Judy,what I have been reading .

Every morning a brief chapter from the commentaries of Maurice Nicoll (who inspires deep gratitude) is a very valuable "influence from out of Life" .

A few weeks ago I had completed "Reich and Gurdjieff" by David M Brahinsky - a comparitive study of the precepts of Gurdjieff and the discoveries of Reich (mainly in the aspects of sexuality of the organism)

Regards to all.
Gururaj

---

by Harry

Here is a language thing that left a "shock" impression. Over here a garbage disposal is a device in the sink that grinds up left over pieces of vegetables and meat. It is a flip of a switch.

The interesting thing is that I remember my Mom scolding "take the garbage out". Such a simple task that takes a minute. And yet it enticed such resentment. How we waste energy over nothing.

---

by JohnS

Very, very gradually, this week, I managed in some small ways to notice how much absolute foreboding I have for certain regular tasks - some of them large (in my mind's scale), others completely garbage-trivial. I see it is a life attitude, in that is my majority attitude, to worry beforehand. And I have seen how this gives me no will, pseudo or otherwise, mainly because there is no space for it.
I am doing it again today, and reflecting on the absurdity of: if I was going to always have regret for this task, then why did I initially accept it as a pleasant opportunity?
VICTIM!

Thanks

John

---

by Judy

Volunteers not victims...

It is ongoing for me. I use several tricks often.
Best,
Judy.

---

by Cassandra

Glad to be back after a 2 week train trip to California. I'm on the east coast of the U.S. (Georgia), and California is 3,000 or so miles away. It was nice to see the Pacific Ocean and giant Redwood trees.

Yes, my bain(sp?) is managing the check book. I tend to stuff receipts into my wallet and ignore them, sometimes until the wallet bulges; so if I will to record a receipt just as it is received, or at least every week, I may be able to realize an energy savings. Instead of feeling bad because I don't do better, I try to DO better.

Thanks Harry.

Work Program week beginning 6 August 2012

---

by Alistair

Decided to go back into the Work Programme archive from 7 years ago and see what was there.
My suggestion for this week is to look at the Exercise for the week of 8th August 2005, read the posts and do the exercise
One or two members that currently contribute are still active with us
What are their current impressions and have they altered with the passage of time?

Wishing all a profitable week

Alistair

---

by Harry

I went back and looked at my posts from that week. The exercise that Ian introduced is one that I still use. And we've discussed it some, in variations since. But more important, at least to me, was the discussion of the one Word and how to pronounce it. Because I think this discussion is an insight into how G wrote Beelzebub's Tales. There is much to contemplate on just that one word. And realize that G said the second reading should be aloud, so that brings more importance to it.

---

by Gururaj

1.Almost every day , at-least once , could remember to do the intoning of 'aieioiuoa' while having a walk and also doing the 12-bone exercise (which I normally mix with the inward chant of each of the 12 words of the Holy Equation).

2.Regarding the mindfulness task, today attempted to remain conscious for about an hour as I got ready for work and then drove to the office . Earlier in the morning ,I had been inspired/influenced by these words from Nicoll's Commentaries -
" 'Life' demands mechanical effort,but if you practise non-identifying,it becomes conscious effort.
Only do it for a certain time-say an hour- and keep conscious and observe yourself carefully. For instance make your aim not to object to anything for an hour.This helps you to see what non-identifying means."

I think, this must have been the first time I could stay with a Work Aim for a while.All was OK for some time But suddenly caught myself righteously blowing the car horn as a driver in front stopped to argue with another driver , holding up the vehicles behind him.

Reckon , being righteous is a recurring state for me.At-least am 'seeing' it now.In a flash Identifying sets in.

---

by JohnS

For me, there was something missing - or unexplained, unconnected - in this vowel intonation exercise, and now I think it was background revelation. I had a book I had put aside years ago, as I now see because I was not ready for it.
I will quote from the first chapters, and post anything that may be relevant as I progress. The first part of the book (The Mystery of the Seven Vowels) is theory, the second part is practice.

"The vowels, according to Nichomachus, symbolize what he calls elsewhere "the primary sounds emitted by the seven heavenly bodies", caused by their rotation, mass ratios, etc. But since the planets rotate in the aether, not in air, their sounds are inaudible (plus being outside our octaves of hearing); hence the vowels are unpronounceable (thus the derivations of the unpronounceable Name of God), until they are framed in the material consonants. The euphonious sounding of seven vowels is thus a way of reflecting (and connecting via the vibrational effect of resonance) the wholeness of this creative vibration that has formed the cosmos and the planets, as it has informed (like with like) our own souls"

John

---

by Harry

John, I really can't accept that explanation. G stated directly that his work was to be read aloud. And the idea that a vowel is unpronounceable is pretty strange. Vowels are what give meaning to words. If you look at Arabic the dictionary contains no vowels. Because a set of consonants relates a set of words. The change in meaning comes about from which vowel is used in the word.

---

by Gururaj

Reading the above posts got me vocalising all possible vowel sounds .

One thing led to another and i ended up watching this superb tutorial on YouTube

http://www.youtube.com/watch?feature=fvwp&NR=1&v=eeaghqkLRi8

Any clues from all this to any esoteric / hidden meaning in the sound aieioiuoa ?

Beats me !

Work Program week beginning 13 August 2012

---

by Judy

From the archives December 2007:

In moments when your patience wears thin, endure a little longer with a super effort comprising of a sub-vocal murmuring of a phrase such as "All things must pass", with an inner smile and while Sensing your four illuminated limbs with each word.

Eat with full attention to physical, sound, taste, visual and smell impressions. After eating, spend a few minutes breathing consciously deep into the solar plexus.

When you talk, sense the sound vibrations resonating in your abdomen. Use the vibrations to help you Remember yourself.

In the evening, relax three centers and gaze at a candle or fire or star. Ponder - "Does the candle/fire/star provide light and heat?"

_____

Please also read, from Zen Yoga Gurdjieff blog (Lee Van Laer) the essay from August 10th - "The Great Enemy."
http://www.zenyogagurdjieff.blogspot.in/

There is a second education available with this Work, Nicoll tells us. It is for those who find that Life cannot be explained in terms of itself. It is only for those who want it and make efforts.

Best wishes for a good Work week,
Judy.

---

by Gururaj

Lee Van Laer's blog post narrowed down to the real enemy being the 'unconsciousness' in us. In my case,this week,the enemy has won .

The thought and intention did come to be conscious while eating and speaking. But very rarely could I sustain it in practice even momentarily.

Would welcome any guidance / tips on what has worked or helped others in making a shift in awareness.

Regards to all,

Gururaj

Work Program week beginning 20 August 2012

---

by Karen

DAILY GOAL: Monitor and Track your SELF–Awareness By Cultivating “THE WITNESS”
The Witness or Observer has no judgment. It allows observation of external events without needing to control the outcome. Stay in the now moment. Practice this intentionally as a daily exercise by monitoring Mental and Self Talk Awareness...

For the next 7 days, make a commitment to avoid all negative thoughts into your mind. Witness how long you can maintain positive thoughts and keep a positive mental diet. When coming across self defeating and negative thoughts, make a commitment to “correct them” by becoming aware of their content and creating a neutral association to the thought-form.

Report your experiences to the group...

Warm Regards,
Karen

---

by Gururaj

While attempting to be as a Witness of oneself it is seen that
(a) when at ease and not otherwise occupied in any activity, the need is to remember the task
(b) when involved in activity especially with others , then the challenge is having the divided attention.

As Monday comes to an end, have fleetingly managed (a) .But have drawn a blank in (b) situations (did not even remember the task)

HELP - Group and Lord !

---

by JohnS

I have been helped in this task by what I have been (re-) reading: Rodney Collin, Theory of Celestial Influence.
For several days I have been reading about the internal instinctive operations of the body, and it has given me (temporarily at least) a closeness and awareness of internal functions (especially bloodstream and air), and a high appreciation of its intricacy and delicate management and adjustability. Plus the feeling of only witnessing these processes: as I can control none of them, I can only 'watch' them, and this carries over into the witnessing of external events.

John

---

by Judy

Karen's exercise included -

> When coming across self defeating and negative thoughts, make a commitment to "correct them" by becoming aware of their content and creating a neutral association to the thought-form

This is a good trick! Works seamlessly in most instances. Thanks, Karen.

On a general note, I have asked Ian if he would consider re-opening the ES site to new members, as lately the participation has dwindled somewhat, and, as you know, newcomers are the lifeblood of any group. I also hope to chat with him during the second half of September, when I'll be in the U.K. I'll keep you all posted.

Kind regards,
Judy.

---

by Gururaj

Thanks,John, for sharing your experience in response to my post.
In my opinion, that is one example of one of the benefits of group Work, where fellow seekers share their practical efforts on this arduous path.

I read this the other day from the works of an Indian "holy-man" Rajneesh. He relates how a scientist , a couple of centuries ago when on a short visit to an old European palace , observed two clocks hung adjacently , one bigger and the other smaller, working in perfect unision.
He stayed on for many more days to fathom the mystery and deducted that the smaller clock picked up the vibrations thru' the wall from the bigger clock.
Rajneesh goes on to explain that similarly in ancient Indian precepts there was a practice of seekers gaining enlightenment just by silently sitting near a master.

Being a passive witness and not letting the personality to run riot would, I guess, prepare one to be receptive to tune in to higher energies.

Nothing to share from my own efforts , though.

---

by Gururaj

Quite by chance(grace ?) today,while waiting at a busy,noisy junction,it occured to me to unfocus - sightless sight & soundless sound - sort of sensing. And,voila,it started to seem like impartial witnessing !

---

by Judy

Any enlightenment I experience is invariably Grace, Gururaj.
Gifts abound. But we have to be willing, put in the footwork, be receptive, seek it, and so forth..

As Lee van Laer points out in an essay "The Action of God" on his zenyogagurdjieff site yesterday, we have the capacity but not the ability.
Best wishes to you,
Judy.

---

by Karen

> Judy wrote:
> Any enlightenment I experience is invariably Grace, Gururaj.
> Gifts abound. But we have to be willing, put in the footwork, be receptive, seek it, and so forth..
> As Lee van Laer points out in an essay "The Action of God" on his zenyogagurdjieff site yesterday, we have the capacity but not the ability.
> Best wishes to you,
> Judy.

Remembrance seems to be the forerunner of grace. There is no real quest without grace, nor is grace active for he/she who does not seek the Self. Perhaps our attempts are the earnest quest, and the deep inner movement is grace.

Grace is always there. Dispassion cannot be acquired, nor realisation of the truth, nor inherence in the Self, in the absence of grace.

But practice is necessary. Staying in the Self by one’s efforts is like training a roguish bull confined to his stall by tempting him with luscious grass and preventing him from straying.-Maharshi

Thanks to all for your contributions to the weekly exercise. Sharing of our efforts and experiences are most valuable.

Karen

---

by Cassandra

I've been attempting this task and a more general one of not talking to myself, not daydreaming, etc. Conserving that energy for work. I tried it last weekend at a family gathering, which went okay. But when it came to my son's recent entrance to a new school and the emotional challenge for him, I had a much more difficult time of not identifying with the situation. I see how inner considering works so strongly. Still, I am practicing the 12 bone exercise on walks, asking for help to see and know the reconciling force in this change. I find it hard to detach when it comes to my children, but then a more honest me must also admit that in my mind I set ideal standards for my children, and it's my ego that is hurt when they don't achieve that. So, realizing this, I ask for the reconciling force to appear.

---

by Cassandra

> Gururaj wrote:
> Quite by chance(grace ?) today,while waiting at a busy,noisy junction,it occured to me to unfocus - sightless sight & soundless sound - sort of sensing. And,voila,it started to seem like impartial witnessing !

Can you elaborate more on this?

---

by Gururaj

Hi Cassandra:

Most of that week I had no 'progress' with Karen's task. I consider that a sincere attempt is the least one can do and I had not even done much of that.
Therefore was feeling somewhat helpless and remorseful about it.

So , that next Monday , the experience was that for a while I got into the mode of not particularly seeing the sights nor hearing the sounds around me and rather just letting the impressions come .I cannot recollect any particular intentional choice to do this - hence the thought ,later, of it being a moment of grace.

The discovery was that when I was not pursuing an intention and I sort of had no inner reactions to the noises and chaos around , then the impartial witnessing was occuring with no interference of my usual 'I'.

Season's greetings,
Gururaj

Work Program week beginning 27 August 2012

---

by JohnS

Beginning to re-read 'The Theory of Celestial Influence,' this paragraph suddenly took the Ray of Creation and the Law of Three completely away from theory, and into sensible reality.

“The moment we think of the Absolute, we have to think of it as modified in some way or other. We have to think of it in the form of some body, or quality, or law. For such is the limitation of our mind..
Now the effect or influence of any body upon another varies in three ways (Kepler's 3 laws):

1)In inverse proportion to the square of its distance – this effect we measure as radiation, or the active effect of the greater on the less.
2)In direct proportion to its mass – this effect we measure as attraction, or the passive effect of the greater on the less.
3)In direct proportion to its distance -this effect we measure as time, or the delaying effect between the emission of the influence of the greater and its reception by the less.

These constitute in effect the first three modifications of Unity, the first three modifications of the Absolute.”

From this, and subsequent analysis of our solar system, universe, galaxy, etc, comes an overwhelming sense of scale, a picture in which the whole of our Earth is but a speck of dust (literally) in the scale of things.

This week, try and keep a Sense of Scale in your activities, your involvements. When you are overwhelmed by the importance of your feeling, your righteousness, your task, your mission, your life's work and its lack of appreciation by everyone else, then, in the Scale of Things
a) It doesn't matter,
b) Really, How on Earth can it matter?

John

---

by Gururaj

I've read here and there that Gurdjieff was a stickler about many things,especially for creating conditions of 'Work' for those he intended to test.
So somethings do matter.

But ,yes, as John is inviting us to see - whether many of our usual feelings,righteousness, aims,etc. really matter ?

I was impressed by one comment of Nicoll - we are careful about our bodies and take care to protect it and watch out whether the environment we are moving into is suitable for the body or not .
But are we , he questions, equally careful of the environment our mind inhabits ?

Often I let it remain in a toxic state . It matters enough that I see this and do something about it.

---

by Cassandra

A constant concern of mine is for 'success,' the constant moving forward in terms of work, my children's performance at school, etc. Of course I know these are not the primary aims in life, but this type of internal considering in there. I have found, however, that the urgency for perfection in such worldly activities diminishes after a brief while if seek for the space of reconciliation.

---

by JohnS

Thanks for the replies.
I appreciate the concern on the things that matter - most certainly we are in this group for exactly that reason and to be involved in this kind of important detail.
I think I was a bit flippant in implying that "nothing matters" without qualifying it further. I only meant it in regard to the sense of scale which was the viewpoint of the exercise.

Thanks
John

Work Program week beginning 3 September 2012

---

by Cassandra

Law of Three Internally

Holy affirming, holy denying, holy reconciling...Father, Son, Holy Spirit.

Recently, I've taken up (again) the 12 bone exercise repeating the Holy Equation. It is my aim to offer any one of the veils that cover my eyes (regarding personal relationships, work, parenting, etc.) over to the energy of the Power of Threes so that I might 'see this thing as god sees it,' things that have vexed me for years.

I welcome any comments, insights fellow seekers have on observations of reconciliations in their work. As always, thank you.

---

by Harry

I believe you beginning by observing, hopefully in the present, but even in retrospect.

The first step is to banish the usual definitions. Go to Active, Passive, Neutralizing. Plus, Minus, Equal.

Then think in terms of a triangle. This is a crucial point. It is the first object that can stand alone. A point and a line, one and two dimensions, cannot stand alone. So there is a balance in the triangle. And that is what you are looking for.

Try to see the examples that have been used. Bread: flour, water, fire. Without the correct combination and temperature you do not get bread.

Begin by reconciling. This means to avoid being active and avoid being negative. Reconcile. Think of meditation. Walk through your life in a meditative state. Do not try to do. Do not try to undo. Try to fascilitate what can happen. This is a difficult thing, especially for those who feel we can do. Once you have actually participated in forming a triangle, you realize that all those things that "you" did, it really did.

I don't remember if you have children. Did you know when your child was conceived? In the moment of conception? Doing is like that.

I've often quoted Leonard Cohen. Will quote him again. Different Sides:

(Copyright lyrics removed)

Read more: LEONARD COHEN - DIFFERENT SIDES LYRICS

http://www.metrolyrics.com/different-sides-lyrics-leonard-cohen.html#ixzz25R96IXTz

---

by Gururaj

The thought came this morning that the being/action at this instant is the manifestation of the three forces - whether we are aware of it or not.

It is like a light ball suspended in mid-air by a jet of water from below.

I am the ball(denying), the water(affirming) and the intelligence(reconciling) which is - ideally - maintaining the balance in a way which is implied in the posture -

"Try to fascilitate what can happen. This is a difficult thing, especially for those who feel we can do." mentioned by Harry above.

---

by Cassandra

Harry and Gujuraj, much appreciation for your posts.

In response to your question Harry, I have 2 children, ages 14 and 11. I don't remember the moment of conception of either, but I have observed their personalities over these many years, and if I could categorize, them, the older one, the girl is active. She pushes for the best grades, wants to be at the head of the class, the boy, is much more passive in that respect. I feel he has so much more ability, but he seems afraid to aim for the number one spot. So, in steps mom to push the passive boy into action.

Much of my work effort is applied on my relations with these kids. So, your suggestion to begin from a neutral place, and facilitate "what can happen" is helpful. But I don't know what it means in practical terms for me, but will try to figure something out. One of my problems is confusing passive with neutralizing. I think, if I'm not in there making it happen then all else is just letting life's opportunities slip by, but there is this third position that stands outside of the push and resistance.

Work Program week beginning 10 September 2012

by Gururaj

Reinforce the awareness in yourself that the birth as a human gives the possibility of choice unlike for two-brained beings.
Be inspired to evoke a fine feeling in yourself to exercise this choice in the Present Moment – Now – in as many moments as you can .

Leading on from this introduction is this Aim for the week (from the ES archives of 2006) :-

"Seekers may Ponder whether they have found that: "I often experience two forces: the Denying force of the organism that automatically reacts, accomplishes, feels, thinks, suffers, sleeps, dies; and the parallel Affirming force of a new presence that observes, remembers, acts, is remorseful, endures, has aim, and lives." (Paul Beidler)

During the next week, using the examples given above as a guideline, select an Affirmation to be consciously applied whenever you experience any of the automatic Denying Forces. Float in the being-presence of your resulting state of Reconciliation.

Each evening the Seeker may Ponder with Sensed breath: Can we experience a Reconciling state without first automatically experiencing a Denying force and then applying an Affirmation? "

Continuing with my contribution …..

Through the week, Work on just one or two of the following Denying / Affirming pairs , given more as suggestions to choose from or devise your choice from your own unique life situations.

Denying – Automatic impulses to accomplish ; Affirming – Stepping out of the rush Denying – Reacting with blame,resentment,fear; Affirming – Looking inward at what is causing this and making a higher request for something new.
Denying – Being judgemental,critical ; Affirming – Helping the other person grow higher.
Denying – Feeling heavy, negative ; Affirming – Being light in spirit and standing apart from the emotion
Denying – Being dependent on positive outcomes in life situations for feeling good ; Affirming – Seeking the understanding of being already Complete in oneself .
Denying – Giving up,not trying ; Affirming – Jumping into the battle and developing the muscles of the will, starting all over again, afresh.
Denying – Compromise yourself and suffer inwardly ; Affirming – Doing what is true regardless of the consequences.

May the action begin !.There is only Now , no Later.
Gururaj

---

by Cassandra

> Gururaj wrote:
>
> Denying – Being dependent on positive outcomes in life situations for feeling good ; Affirming – Seeking the understanding of being already Complete in oneself .
>
> Gururaj

Gururaj,

This one is something I have been paying attention to--that is stepping outside of the outcome, whether perceived as positive or negative. I find it very difficult. My approach is to go through the day with more attempts at self-remembering and non-identifying to see how these practices may aid in bringing about reconciliation with respect to dependence on positive outcomes.

---

by Gururaj

Yes, it is very difficult .

I saw that the 2nd(affirming) force in me is very feeble.It acquires some life of its own , for me, from reading some profound Work material and a prayerful attitude.

Some inspirations were - reading about the three forces from the prime source itself- that is BTG (Chapter 44) , the chapter on Identifying in Nicoll's commentaries and Lee Van Laer's current blogs.

But even the little awakening of this consciousness for a while,due to the practice triggered by the inspiration, is a precious thing.

---

by Cassandra

Thanks Gururaj, I'll check out Lee's blog.

Work Program week beginning 17 September 2012

---

by Harry

Let's change things up. We seem to be repeating exercises. And they come and they go singing praises of Michaelangelo.

Discussion Week.

Post and reply. Post something that is on your mind. Reply to someone else. Daily. Keep a discussion going. Log in every day. Say something every day.

On my mind, how so much is impossible. It is impossible to face my own mortality, though I live with it daily. It is impossible to help others except in the smallest things. I see what my son needs, but I cannot give it to him. All I can do is hope that what he has learned in two thirds of his life will come to mind and will intervene when he needs it.

Realize that it is always the other person's life. Be they family or friends. It is their life. And while we might intervene in a time of crisis, it is often impossible to even know when it is good to say yes and when it is good to say no. Some of that harkons back to last week's program of work. Good and Bad. And to the readings in the chapter of Beelzebub.

How much has Zoroaster influenced Gurdjieff?

---

by Judy

Morning All,

Good one , Harry.
"And they come and they go singing praises of Michaelangelo."
Love it!

It is 2.36am here. I have a 4.30am pickup for a flight, so, to be honest, that is on my mind right now. I have risen early so as to have a quiet time in the usual routine.
This morning that includes some pondering over Chapters 44, 45 and 46 of the manuscript version of Beelzebub's Tales, which I read last night. Makary Makary who could you be?

Inspired, without a doubt. I love the manuscript version. Anyway, early days. I was downloading versions to the files on my phone so that I'd have them with me over the next three weeks, and got caught up in the reading.

Have to fly!
Judy.

P.S. No internet on a regular basis for a while. I'll pop in when I can though.
J.

---

by Harry

Judy,
Mockery Mockery?

---

by Alistair

Dear Harry, don't know about Zoroaster, but do know the difficulty accepting that the unpleasant words and actions of others around me, as I perceive them, are exactly what is due, no more no less.

The last three weeks have been hectic here since arrival of a communal water supply, progress indeed, but has triggered all sorts of other domestic remedial work. I'm physically tired and am constantly irritated by the adolescent son of my partner who spends his entire life horizontal playing computer games while his mother vents her agony on me, what I deserve, no more no less, suffer with joy

---

by JohnS

My time to post is limited these days, but I have a chance in the coming weeks to change that, and, hopefully, permanently.
My reading and communication lately has seemed to stress the fact that, to observe anything such as attitudes, habits, hopes (unreal or otherwise), work, work, and more work is needed, as this is our earthly lot, our only method available (apart from the very occasional stabs of Grace). Plus, we cannot expect progress or results, except perhaps for incremental advancement (followed by slippage!).

So Harry's message is a timely test. Shame should result if we fail without making an effort.

John

---

by Cassandra

Post something everyday: I still feeling aghhhh about having to "whip" (we say that in the south) my son because of his slowness in starting this morning. His excuse "I'm tired." Well, we all are tired. Was this a mechanical reaction? I don't know, but I do know that I cannot accept smartass responses from my children. IT's the way I was raised, and the 'child and parent' as equal way that I see so many westerners use in raising their kids doesn't work for me.

Still, I am inspired by Nicole's comment that our goal is "to prepare the lower centers to received the ideas and force always coming from the higher centers." That is my daily task, to stop daydreaming and perhaps one day, I will KNOW.

---

by Harry

I think many of us were raised the same way. But try to see if you are experiencing negative emotions. And accept the teaching that negative emotions are useless. And fueling the rebellion is useless.

I'll give you one that I dealt with. My son was half way through his senionr year. He was 17 and wanted to fly to New York to meet a girl he had met and was chatting with. I knew fighting with him would not accomplish anything. But still, he was 17, it was NYC, and I was a single father. So "he had to visit NYU" as a possible college, and he had to get his picture taken in front of e. e. cummings' house. And call every day. Have little idea what he did in NYC, but he fulfilled all of my requirements and made it home alive.

Of course I experienced anxiety.

---

by Gururaj

> John Summers wrote:
> My time to post is limited these days, but I have a chance in the coming weeks to change that, and, hopefully, permanently.
> John

Best wishes , John .

Permanent change. Major shift . Clean break . These are phrases evoking a wistful longing for me,when I see myself as deeply mired in my office work as a Yezidi in a circle.The feeling of helplessness is a negative refrain in the background.

12 to 13 hour days at work for weeks together and so many other commitments not getting attended the way they ought to be .Today I felt overwhelmed by it all.

I am scheduled to participate in a 4-day conclave of fellow Gurdjieffians from all over India- some 45 of them - starting from Wednesday and am in a whirl trying to tie as many loose ends as I can before the break.

There is a hope that things shall come to an even keel. But I suspect , It will not happen automatically.Some shift has to occur in me, I need to do something differently.

---

by Alistair

Yes Cassandra we are living in a time when child discipline is not in fashion
How many kids these days fulfill the list in the first chapter of Meetings with Remarkable Men?

From early childhood there should be instilled in the child:
Belief in receiving punishment for disobedience
Hope of receiving reward only for merit
Love of God – but indifference to the saints
Remorse of conscience for the ill-treatment of animals
Fear of grieving parents and teachers
Fearlessness towards devils, snakes and mice
Joy in being content merely with what one has Sorrow at the loss of the goodwill of others
Patient endurance of pain and hunger
The striving early to earn one's bread

Judith sent me a series of seven lectures on the Tibetan Book of the Dead
One of their recommendations is just to satre out into the endless clear blue sky and softly say aaaaaaaaaaaaaaaa
It seems to work

On a cheerful note our village has in the last couple of weeks finally comissioned a communal water supply
In years gone by living in the UK I would never have imagined the joy of just having a cold water tap in the house

---

by Karen

Cassandra's post sparked a stream of activity related to belief systems, which has been top of mind as of late.

What do I believe and why do I believe it? Where did I pick up and adopt each belief?: parents, family, peers, the conglomerate system of beliefs and rules our society has taught us to accept as truth or the stories of our ancestors embedded in our DNA...what is each belief based on: love or fear, control, manipulation, anger, greed, power, lust etc. So many of these beliefs are so integrated that they have become invisible. The strategies and roles we have taken on and the emotional patterns that repeat themselves throughout out lives seem to stem from these core patterns (that are certainly not easy to identify on our own).

Awareness alone is not enough to change a pattern. These inner programs are like tapes that keep playing telling us what to do or not to do, stuck on auto play. So we carry the vibration of limited belief patterns and we continue to repeat the same self-defeating patterns. (ground hog day again?!@#) So when one finds a belief, how does one go about reprogramming that reality? (releasing the old belief that no longer serves our being and bringing in a new one that is alignment with evolution).

In order to let go of these limiting patterns, we first need to neutralize the energy that is behind them.

So where do the roots of beliefs reside in the many layers of this body of light? Are beliefs geometrical formations, triangles? If we are structured similarly to a computer, these belief systems would have to be stored somewhere, in our masculine or feminine electromagnetic fields, perhaps, in our energy bodies. If our energy bodies and connected to every aspect of the physical and move the physical, then it would make sense that energy bodies are affected by our every thought, feeling, word and action.

There are no short cuts it seems. Assembling the details is like gathering the ingredients for a good recipe.

Gratitude to all

Karen

---

by Cassandra

Everyone, thanks for your input. I am clear about my expectations for my children's behavior but do feel regret about negative emotions that arise.

---

by Harry

Karen,

I think you've described the source of multiple personalities well. We have these different personalities through the instruction of "life". So we either try to meet those expectations, or fight against them. This is when it is important to develop Magnetic Center and develop an I that can transcend the personalities we have been "taught". That doesn't mean we throw them out. It means that we learn to use them, to act accordingly, when that is necessary, without identifying with the personality.

---

by Alistair

Dear Cassandra, don't feel regret, suffer your karma with joy 😁
At least if you remember that it might be advantageous to be joyous when you feel anger and frustration it may be a start
First commandment to love thy neighbour as thyself, no the ego, but to appreciate that manifestation as it assists us to see ourselves more clearly, to know ourselves. Here we link to the undersatnding of our multiplicity of I's, the personality and its multidudinous, good word, manifestations.

..... and todays light note, Sevastopol today, in the warmth & sunshine, looking for a dry cleaner. Was at a CrimeanTatar wedding last week with 300 guests, just from the grooms side. Wore the white tux for the first time in almost ten years, they loved it. Pride? Tried to be conscious of that likelihood, intentionally remained sober despite the lake of vodka available, love them all without a condescending demenour. Pride now? recounting the story, maybe more likely, not the prime intention, just a wee anecdote to brighten up the day. It's easy to become intense in this effort so it would also perhaps be benificial if we include anything about events in the course of the day that create a reason to be cheerful and what ego's they trigger. Dinner time.....

---

by Alistair

Retrospection on a full stomach and a few slurps of piva
The sentiment of the I is always wrong
Pride at the wedding & pride recounting here Attention needs!

---

by Karen

This post may be better suited in the B's Tales forum under chapter 44. There appears to be link with the stories of our ancestors embedded in our DNA that we carry forward and have been given the opportunity to transmute and transcend and help alleviate All who are connected! Generations past, present and future.

Guirdjieff wrote the following titled Repair the past... that speaks to this

Gs: You know "Justice" is a big word - it' is a big thing in the world. Objective things are not small things like microbes, they go according to law, as the law has accustomed them to go. Remember as you sow, so you will reap. Not only people reap, but also families and nations. It often happens that, that which happens on earth comes from something which was done by a father or a grandfather. The results converge on you, the son or grandson it is you who have to regulate then, This is not an injustice, it is a very great honor for you it will be a means which will allow to regulate the past of your father, grandfather, great-grandfather. If misfortunes come to you in your youth, it means that someone brought them - for this you must reap. He is dead, it is another on earth who reaps. You must not look at yourself egotistically. You are a link in the chain of your blood. Be proud of it, it is an honor to be this link. The more you are obliged to repair the past, the more you will have remorse of conscience. You will succeed in remembering all that which you have not done as you should in the past. Those things which you have done contrary to JUSTICE have mortified your grandfather. Thus you can have ten times more remorse of conscience and your worth will augment in proportion. You are not tail of a donkey, You have responsibilities, a family. All your family, past and future, depend on you, your entire family depends an the way you repair the past, If you repair for everyone, it is good. If you do not repair for everyone, it is bad. You see your situation, Logically, do you see what Justice is? Justice is not occupied with your little affairs, unredeemed pledges, it is occupied with big things. It Is idiotic to believe God thinks of small things. It is the same with Justice. Justice does not touch all that and at the same time, nothing is done on earth without it. Search for the reasons You are obliged to have a position of responsibility in the line of your blood; you must work more to repair the past. It is difficult to understand all at once.

A grand honor indeed and an obligation I've sought out for the past 2 years.

Much gratitude
Karen

---

by Cassandra

Interesting indeed. For me the task is to think about my foreparents not in a sentimental way but in a real way. Kind of hard to do this without having known them, only stories passed on. In western culture, the focus is on the immediate, nuclear family, sometimes a disdain for more distant relatives. Mom, dad and 2 kids separated from all those around and only vaguely knowledgeable about who came before.

---

by Harry

Part of what is being described is being a good householder. That is a message that often gets lost as we pursue metaphysical thoughts.

Taking care of our forebearers is certainly something that we must look at. Our psychic DNA if you will. I faced some of this early on because my father died when I was five. My mother remarried a good man when I was ten. But I moved from the city to the country and one DNA to another. Both my maternal and paternal grandfathers were major forces in my life.

The idea of changing our pasts is intriguing. I'm not sure that means changing what remember, but changing what we have carried forward.

---

by Alistair

Charity begins at home, the same location where most of the most unpleasant manifestations occur, we can choose our friends but not our family.

---

by Cassandra

After a more careful read, I see your point Harry, to change "what we carry forward." The quote is: " your entire family depends an the way you repair the past, If you repair for everyone, it is good. If you do not repair for everyone, it is bad."

Allistar, if I understand you correctly, I can relate to the thing of: being awake in situations, observing the action of self and others, and then the ego whispers, "see how you are conscious and they aren't." The pride of being conscious, but I realize this is just another I to observe.

---

by Karen

Harry wrote

> But try to see if you are experiencing negative emotions. And accept the teaching that negative emotions are useless. And fueling the rebellion is useless.

This is not an easy task.
What I've found through working with negative emotions is that I can 'try' to set them aside, and push them down, but that doesn't seem to change anything, their vibrational pattern still resides in my systems, and they continue to be triggered.

The triangle is very important tool I use for negative emotions. To be able to move from an energetically charged state, which i visualize as the left and right ends of the bottom of a triangle (positive and negative) to hovering above at the point at the top of the triangle in an attempt to rise above the judgement that created the emotion in the first place where the emotion can no longer be triggered. It's amazing how perspective changes from the view at the fulcrum.

---

by Alistair

Cassandra, Samael Aun Weor calls it the false sentiment of the I, exactly what you state, you think you are conscious when in fact the mind or should I say ego is just playing tricks; and this is why observing rather than evaluating our impulses is the correct action.
On the other hand there is evaluation required in the process of determining 'right action' in terms of say Buddhist ethics.
Judge but don't judge

---

by Harry

Karen, start by not expressing the negative emotions. And then just start observing how the negative emotions emerge. Very few really emerge from inside. They may have been planted there long ago. And bubble to the surface when called forth. Usually they are called forth by an event, either big or small. So the first thing recognized is that they are reactions. Ask yourself who or what is re-acting.

But be neutral. Neutralizing.

One of the things I learned from someone years back was to say "Not now. I don't have time for you now. I'll indulge in you later when it doesn't matter." This can be a surprisingly balancing position.

Then remember: If you're going on a spree go whole hog, postage and all. And add this refrain: if you aren't ready to go whole hog, then don't go any hog at all.

---

by Karen

If it there is truth in that we inherit the emotions and beliefs of our ancestors, programmed into our every cell, hidden deep in the memory of our DNA, it's no wonder we don't change and are influenced in ways we are not even aware of.

From a quantum perspective the past, present and future can all be accessed here and now. In a quantum way, there is no such thing as a 'past life', but the experience lives in your DNA as a current life energy....so could this be what G was aware of, that its just not that simple, that if its contained in that which is quantum, it cannot be broken down and layed out in a linear way (as he most certainly reminds us of in B's Tales). That It's a complex web of interconnected/interrelated and interactive systems that make up the flavour of the soup.

Maybe in all of Mr. Gurdjieff's brilliance he has aware on the surface one could linearlize and read the energy of ones past lives, but could one really "access it" for the purpose of using it NOW in this life based on ones current level of being and understanding?

My definition of family has expanded over the years to include all human and non-human forms as part of my family as we are all a part of this infinite desolation, each a single cell in the honeycomb and though individual pieces of this puzzle may never physically touch, they all form part of the same grand mosaic.

At my present level of understanding, i believe working on self, with all in mind, alleviates the suffering of the entire family. One cannot do the work for anyone but oneself, but working on self opens up the pathway and assists those who chose to follow; a chain reaction of unforeseen benefits. We might not witness those results but they happen all the same.

---

by JohnS

Gurdjieff, Ouspensky, Collin, Nicoll, etc all had practical approaches for actually changing the past, which was 'simply' to live in more dimensions than three - which is merely a crossection of life. The 'small matters' that Harry speaks of disappear in the big picture, where the past CAN BE SEEN and repaired by true remorse of conscience, beginning with how we treated our parents so badly. This is the practical, physical aspect of self-remembering.

I am not citing quotes here from books: I am saying these things to myself to try and distinguish between 'gratitude for my arising' and the dreaded DNA I am trying to shake off - heredity habits I see and fight against most days.

John

---

by Harry

John, start with what is not hereitary. Start with what we have learned from others. From educators. Preachers. The Law. The culture we live in. These are traits which we have embraced in our "false personality" because they have helped us survive in ordinary life. We need to see then for what they are. Sister Mary Benedictus and her trusty metal edged ruler enforcing discipline. Mr. Jones master of the Chemistry Classroom. Our bosses. Our friends. Our fantasy desires.

Work Program week beginning 23 September 2012

---

by Alistair

From 7th March 2005

Theme: Abstract Purpose

We act out our business in the world each day. We perform rituals of social behaviour in order to play our roles in our family or worklife. Nothing that we do or say has any meaning or importance, unless we do it in the right spirit, for a greater good rather than selfish reasons. It is a tiny thing that makes all the difference. To carry out a task with gusto, to ones fullest ability, whether it be Work on self or work in the world, is to feel joy in the humblest task; this is only possible if we do it in the spirit of a higher abstract purpose - selfless service without expectation of reward.

During the week try to perform all tasks, whether they be Work on self or work in the world, with abstract purpose in mind. This may be coupled with an abstract attention to ones breath; ones sensations; ones impressions; ones emotions.

The payment for periods of joy, compassion, love, reverance, or awe shall be to evoke an abstract humility.

Ponder: What is the alure of abstract purpose?

---

by Harry

I don't know about the rest of you, but I'd like to see the dialogue continue as we had it last week.

My question on this one is "do we have a language difference"? I'm really unsure about abstract purpose? Is anything in this work abstract?

---

by Gururaj

First I needed to be clear of all shades of the meaning of 'Abstract' - otherwise my idea would be abstractedly different from another's(it can still be)

The info under this link was useful - http://www.thefreedictionary.com/abstract

Keeping an "abstract purpose in mind" is quite understandable - in that an idea or vision animates our actions rather than any 'sens'ible ,concrete aim.

On the other hand the task "This may be coupled with an abstract attention to ones breath; ones sensations; ones impressions; ones emotions" is somewhat perplexing.

How can a sense ,impression or feeling be abstract ? Do we filter out the organic impressions of the body and remain with whatever is left - if any ?

By the way, am back from ,what one can call a ,spiritual retreat largely based on the 4th way teachings sprinkled with Movements.
About 45 of us from a few cities of India participated . An abstract idea may be the inspiration for such group activities .But the impressions are quite concrete and there is a certain calm taste at the end of it.
(Just for the record, I have felt it fit not to share any specifics about my ES participation with my local city seekers who form a tiny group of 4 persons)

---

by Gururaj

"Selfless service without expectation of reward" , in other words, Karma Yoga, is an aim which is seems to be clear enough .
Let me see what happens in practice.
Somehow , till now, this week, have been unconscious and identified and the task has not been kept in mind.

---

by Cassandra

I have been heavily identified this week with results! Have set the task of feeling a body part when eating, but have been so identified with conversation or just talk during meal. I also find the conversations with myself creeping back in, for instancce about how I would have won an argument in 9th grade, or stood my ground with an intimidating person. Sometimes I fear that it is my efforts alone that can only bring about a change, but like I've said, these efforts are oftentimes week. In the Christian tradition, we're taught to pray and to expect grace. Is that something the Work talks about, grace? In other words, if one works, should is it only our efforts or may there be some form of assistance from our higher consciousness that kicks in. I know we shouldn't EXPECT results, but are we alone, totally? I could use a boost every now and then. But maybe that's the group's purpose because I've certainly gotten encouragement from the group.

I found last week's stream of input very helpful, too.

---

by Karen

Cassandra wrote:

> I know we shouldn't EXPECT results, but are we alone, totally?

You are never alone Cassandra.

Our guidance is here to support us in our highest good. The way to access this guidance is simple: When our deepest intention is to support our own highest good -- when our deepest desire in any given moment is to know what is truly loving to ourselves, and we are willing to take loving action on our own behalf -- spirit will show us the way.

While we may consciously think our intention is to love ourselves and support our highest good, our unconscious intention in that moment may be very different, and it is this deeper intention that actually governs whether or not we connect with our guidance. If your deeper, unconscious intention in connecting with spirit is to:

Have control over blocking out or getting rid of your painful feelings;
Have control over how others feel about you and treat you;
Have control over the outcome of things...
... Then you will not be able to connect with your guidance. When your deepest desire is to control rather than learn about loving yourself and others (not self-love but unconditionally), you will not be able to access the love and comfort, or the wisdom and truth of spirit. And we can't fool spirit.

Connecting with our guidance is easy when our deepest desire is to evolve into a more loving human being -- with ourselves and others. When we have the courage to take loving action on our own behalf -- such as standing up for ourselves and speaking our truth without blame or judgment, taking risks to discover our joy, taking care of ourselves physically through diet and exercise, feeling our painful feelings and taking responsibility for what we may be thinking or doing doing to create some of our own pain -- then spirit will show us the way. Spirit will find a way to communicate with you -- through words, feelings, images, books, dreams or other people -- when your pure desire is to learn about love, starting with loving yourself and learning how to take 100 percent responsibility for your own feelings.

Your guidance is just waiting for you to ask. Again easy to talk about and not always so easy to do.

With everything, take what resonates and throw the rest away.

Karen

---

by Cassandra

Karen, I know what you write is true, but often that knowledge slips away. Thanks for the reminder.

Work Program week beginning 1 October 2012

---

by Karen

It has been mentioned before that the forum and participation has become a bit flat, with only a handful of regular contributors.

In the spirit of keeping discussions going, let's repeat Harry's last exercise this week.

> Harry wrote:
> Discussion Week. Post and reply. Post something that is on your mind. Reply to someone else. Daily. Keep a discussion going. Log in every day. Say something every day.

May the force be with you.

---

by Harry

I'll start out with my reading for the morning: From the transcript of G's meetings: Learn when to be an egoist. Before you can be a philanthropist you must be an egoist. But not every situation allows for egoism. In this discussion G respond to a woman, "You cannot be an egoist with Mom and Dad." The point being that a high order was present.

We must also decide what is meant by true egoism. I am must be present for the ego to be in touch with Magnetic Center.

I want to touch a bit, also, to Karen's response to the other thread. In that she suggest to keep what resonates and discard the rest. The important unspoken is that you must keep what resonates with the Magnetic Center, or as Arnold described in his Victorian essays, the Gold Touchstone. You hold on to what has been proven true and see if what is coming in resonates with that. There are also times that something beneficial may come in but your Center doesn't resonate because it hasn't been prepared. Those parts of Higher Intellectual or Higher Emotional haven't been contacted yet. So something might not resonate today, but will resonate seven years from today.

---

by Gururaj

"Login in each day ..." . Like visiting a church or temple ? And renewing one's vows to Work ?

From my morning reading of Nicoll's Commentaries, I read , from the beginning , learn from one who knows.

In our search here is this "wise one" a single person, a set of persons and/or the written sources of the Work?

---

by Judy

Good morning All,

Still in England. I met with Ian last Tuesday on the porch of St Martin in the Fields in Trafalgar Square. It was windy and raining, so we moved down to the cafe in the crypt below the church for coffee and chat. That took a couple of hours. It was lovely to meet face-to-face, though the funny thing was for me, that Ian was pretty much as I had imagined.
Anyway, he has agreed to reopen the site to new members and in fact may have already done so.
How good it was to be able to report that Harry's exercise of last week had some 25 posts. Ian was delighted that the forums have found a life of their own. I did explain that it isn't always like that though. The jury is still out on whether he will return to active posting. His other commitments don't permit at present, though he is most happy to work with us, however we wish to run things. We discussed possibly extending the time for one person to suggest; say from one week to perhaps a month on an ongoing topic. Interestingly, that is what has happened this week.

I'll be home in Cairns on Sunday next. My role as godmother at Lizzie's christening yesterday was such a privilege and definitely the highlight of the trip. I felt totally at home in St John the Evangelist Church in Crowborough, which is an Anglican church in the Catholic tradition, built in 1839, right on the edge of beautiful Ashdown Forest. Truly a blessed experience and one engraved deeply in the memory scrolls, I hope, as I did self-remember as often as possible.

Talk more soon after my return home.
Yes, Cassandra, we are never alone - "nearer than our hands and feet" is the higher guidance. True, we are not always aware of It.

Love,
Judy.

---

by Harry

My grandfather, my step-father's father, went to Church every morning. Until he was 92. Then it just became too difficult. It was not something I wanted to do. But I understand the need for those who are working on themselves to be present to each other.

My grandfather was a good householder. As was my step-father. No small part to Church, which I have abandoned. But also due to heritage.

Can we be good householders in our online home?

---

by Karen

> Gururaj wrote:
> In our search here is this "wise one" a single person, a set of persons and/or the written sources of the Work?

There is wisdom seeded all around us, right before our very eyes and beyond, and if one seeks, one will find..."but it must be knowledge of a certain kind that one must will"

Learning from one who know most certainly sets one in the right direction but only you or I alone can work to complete ourselves and change our level of being-individually.

I like what Nicoll has to say on will, being and structure on page 1496, Volume 4 of the Commentaries

"One may know all about esotericism and all about the Work without ever willing it and without ever doing it. When the Work is not willed, being cannot change. Change the will and being will change. But it must be knowledge of a certain kind that one must will, in order to change one's being. Willing ordinary life-knowledge will not do this. Knowing how to make an engine and willing it, doing it, will not change being. Knowledge that can change being comes down from those belonging to a higher level who have changed their being-that is, from the Circle of Conscious Humanity. To seek and get that knowledge and to do that knowledge changes being. For then you will be willing in a new way. If you will always as before it means your level of being is as before. But if you begin to will in a new way, new being will result, and new being in turn will result in new willing. What you formerly willed will not be acceptable to your being and what was acceptable to your being will not be so to your will."

---

by Cassandra

Karen, thanks for the opportunity to continue the open ended input. I have to remember to try to work, though, and not only provide comments on how difficult it is to work or how I can't make efforts. It's much easier for me to talk about the work, like the commentary from Nicole says rather than do it, which doesn't help.

---

by Harry

Provide comments on how you succeeded in working. Forget the difficulty. It would be called

Work if it was easy.

---

by Gururaj

When I am in despair of being lost in my identified way of being in life, reading Work literature is one of the causes to make me feel - "try again".

But the tough part has been bringing the awareness .

I do a lot of work in conventional life, but as there so in inner Work, the breakthrough is needed in making a shift from the usual way.

Maybe one small tip, i can share from experience is to be with an Aim,like-self-observation, for specific short times only.

Hopefully, in the long run ,(again from Nicoll) - When you begin to really say :"What is IT doing ?" instead of "What am I doing ?", you begin understand the Work.

---

by Harry

Every time you walk through a doorway remember yourself. Keep I present as long as you can.

---

by Gururaj

"Can we be good householders in our online home?"

This is a question we can all ponder on .For me ,it brings up further questions - what exactly is happening to me by this participation ?
How can one add value to oneself and others ? What are the acions for maintaining this home/commune in a way aligned to the unstated aims?
What influence are the 'others' here on me - or in other words - what specifically is the experience between being in the group and 'working' alone ?

---

by Karen

> Harry wrote:
> Every time you walk through a doorway remember yourself. Keep I present as long as you can.

Many opportunities to walk through doorways today at the office. Busy day, coucil meeting, many affiliates in the office making random requests. Was identified and feeding negative emotions. After reading Harry's post, I thought, "I got this one", i will make this my aim for the remainder of the day. My success, if you can call it one, is that I remembered the exercise after walking thru doorways.

Will continue this aim tomorrow and post any changes.

---

by Harry

After the doorway is still remembering. Just don't let it be negative. Rejoice that you remembered.

---

by Cassandra

Remembering oneself, this is something I can try to do and had set the task of feeling a body part as I ate three meals. This is one of the early exercises from Ginsberg's G. Unveiled. I've not been able to do it consistently, only a bit at dinner, and then I'm caught in conversation or watching the TV as I eat. Yes, TV. I will try again tonight and also add the doorway remembering.

I have also set a task of not listening to coverage of the impending presidential election because I am so identified with the outcome. It would be good practice to listen to the pundits and try to bear it, but I'm not there yet.

---

by Karen

Continued the aim of remembering myself while walking thru doorways. Forgot many times but remembered on a few occassions. While walking thru the doorway, all other visable doorways became apparent. Don't know how else to explains this but it felt like an expansion of perspectives, an opening, and ability to see from many angles. Held onto this energy for as long as possible which lasted about 1-2 minutes and occured twice today.

---

by Harry

I've described it as coming to full attention. You walk through the doorway and suddenly you are present in a three dimensional world. Almost like watching an HD TV for the first time. Only it has surround vision, not just sound.

---

by Gururaj

Just more than 5 years ago I decided to stop watching TV.With twin infants needing my attention whenever I was at home, I could not continue to be a compulsive TV viewer which I sometimes lapse into even now,like when staying in a hotel out of town.

Usually,the aftertaste of a TV session is not satisfying.The predominant state is of being hooked - a passive participation with mainly the emotional centre being involved.

Today , after reading Cassandra's comment , I was pondering about my experience of having largely renounced the idiot box.Then it occured to me that ,in life ,I am continuing to be in a similar state as when watching TV. Only difference being that ,in a way, I am within the TV screen,sort of. I am now active and move around as one of the characters but the undercurrent of identification is there - even stronger ,in fact.

Holding on to this possible insight, went out for a short walk in the late night and could see glimmers of how my identified state is coming in the way of impartial observation.

---

by Karen

Doorway presence not as strong today. How quickly and easy it is to become distracted and leak energy. However, today did not commence with stating my intent to work with a focused aim for the day. There appears to be a difference when doing so. The strength of all of my work I's create enough force to remind me to work when such intention is set forth.

Will set intent upon waking and note any changes.

Thanks to all for this weeks participation.

Karen

---

by Karen

> Harry wrote:
> I've described it as coming to full attention. You walk through the doorway and suddenly you are present in a three dimensional world. Almost like watching an HD TV for the first time. Only it has surround vision, not just sound.

Yes indeed. Very accurate description Harry. It was very much the taste of the experience. There was a very definite change between the states of unaware to being switched on. It was like a telescope being out of focus and blurred to having mega zoom with unbelievable pixel clarity.

---

by JohnS

Back online!

Its good to come back to this thread, and see the responses as a whole.
My similar related awareness struggles were given a new boost this morning, reading Lee Van Laer:

"The higher energy I come into relationship with also works in secret. It needs to be ingested in small amounts, over a long period of time, in order to enrich and inform—inwardly form—what is needed in me for development. My insistence on believing that everything I know about working, and all the work I do, ought to be accessible to my ordinary self at any time, and visible to others, is nonsense. There is an iceberg in me. All I see is the tip of it. It looks shiny and white, so I think that icebergs are shiny and white, and float. 90% of the iceberg, however, is matte and translucent blue, and sinks; and furthermore, it's invisible."

A good reminder that we don't have visible results, and shouldn't expect them. Also reinforced by other reading, which says doubting is destructive: doubt comes from the body, and should be destroyed by the intellect (pondering), which, if used properly, should have only questions, not doubts. My present awareness task.

John

---

by Karen

Many instances of remembering post doorways today, however no hd tv. Grateful for the messages received to remember myself. Have learned not to expect anything specific as every experience when it comes is different. A distinctive taste, but always unique. Thanksgiving dinner tommorrow. Many work opportunities usually abound.

---

by Cassandra

In response to Gururaj, about seeming to be in a tV show and identified with it--as a kid I would imagine myself as being sort of in an alternate reality, mainly because I have an active imagination and I wanted a 'better', 'different' family. Well, that role playing or identification was okay, I guess for a child, but as Paul says in one of his letters, 'when I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child: but when I became a man, I put away childish things.' And so it should be for me, the imagination helped me through the ups and downs of growing up, but I have something now--the work--to help me put away childish, or lower level thinking and to think like a real person a 'man' or woman as is the case with me.

---

by Harry

This is a little twist. Watch a TV show, but don't watch the characters. Watch the people. Try to actually see the individuals involved in the production.

---

by Cassandra

I'll try this, but I'm not really sure what you mean.

---

by JohnS

I think Harry means, try to estimate the consciousness (or unconsciousness) of the individual people.
I find the best place for this is in a panel discussion or an interview, especially with people whose opinions interest you. For me, it generally means switching off the show after a while, as you begin to see that the discussions are based on individual theories and personality rather than anything approaching what you could call a true statement, that applies to everybody.
This method tends to make me watch myself at the same time, how I am judging people from my own bias and habits. I also notice the tendency in the watcher to visualise how I would be uncompromisingly truthful if I were the speaker, and then comes the realisation that I would actually fold back into the safe area of personality and politeness, as anything vaguely esoteric (getting to the heart of the matter) could not be brought up in that environment, and I would also face the fear of being challenged in public.

John

---

by Cassandra

Thanks, John. I see what you mean.

---

by Harry

You can also catch the point when the actor is changing masks.

One of the things I teach is Public Speaking. It is very interesting to see the different persona someone goes through in giving a speech. And from time to time they switch persona. And you can see the real self. You can also do this yourself if you begin paying attention to your own personae. Small i's.

With an actor on a show, the real person is always there behind the character they are playing. Try not to see the character on Law and Order. Try to see the person who is doing this. See what they are doing. Don't judge. Just watch. This can also be done with a film, But be careful you don't ruin watching movies for life.

Work Program week beginning 8 October 2012

---

by JohnS

Once again, lets keep the discussions rolling without being specific. I have internet time now and can contribute more regularly.

The factor of presence should always be dominant, as it is our main lifeline to our invisible progress.
And, let's hope Ian will accept new members with fresh input (and presence).
God knows why we should need constant prodding and coercion to keep us upright in this wonderful quest - the resistance generated sometimes feels enormous. But if I work with others in mind (Judy's volunteer not victim,and Van Laer's servant of God as incentive) everything expands, and I just need to keep a watch on my real motives, which always reveal themselves in time.

John

---

by Harry

I think we've turned a bit of a corner if we can keep this level of discussion going. There is a committment. As I said before let us be good householders of our online home.

I would also suggest that people pop in with things that have worked. Worked. And questions. We all have experiences.

One thing that might be something to share. How did you start this? Do you remember when you first came into contact with the Work? Was it a different experience? Can you still feel it? Know when and where it was? And what led you to that?

---

by JohnS

Good starting point, Harry, because to me, the beginning was so clear.

In the early '80s I shared house with a couple who were Gurdjieff followers, but who never mentioned that name. They gave me tantalising 'hints' about their meetings, but not much detail. They would answer some questions, but refuse to elaborate on others, always saying I would misunderstand unless the whole context was understood.
The next year, I moved to another rented house. The room I came into was totally bare - no furniture - just empty, except for a pile of 3 books in the centre of the floor. The book on top (the second one was James Bond) was Search for the Miraculous. As I read it, suddenly everything that had been hinted at fell into place: this was the system.

I threw out a lot of 'heavy' philosophy books after that: they became totally irrelevant, and have been ever since.

John

---

by Cassandra

When I have tried to remember myself, whether walking, going through doors, etc. I do not get the 3-D sense that Harry and Karen mentioned. I have a sensation of my physical body for several seconds at a time. I know this is different from my usual state because the mind seems quiet, the tapes stop rolling momentarily. Then this quickly passes into a duller sensation, and the mind is pulled back to usual thoughts or habits. I find myself wanting to hold on to the awareness, and when I do, the awareness state seems strained or turns into something other than awareness of my body. It's almost like I'm pretending to be aware when I try to force it. I'm struggling to stay aware, but I think the thing to do is to let go as soon as I sense a struggle and simply come back to it fresh after a few seconds.

---

by JohnS

Cassandra;

Perhaps these words from Lee van Laer might help:

"The inner arrangement has to be different, different enough to allow something to penetrate; and there's no need to discuss much of anything else. I need to keep this point of work in front of me over and over again, all day long. Actually, an enormous amount is taking place in this action: I believe that it is distant, that I only experience something remarkable or feeding once in a while, here or there, under special conditions. Yet the energy that creates life is ever present. If it wasn't, I'd be dead.

And I forget that.

I forget that a direct attention to this living energy will create a set of conditions that encourages it to express itself in a new way. I forget that this is always possible in one way or another. "

John

---

by Harry

I dare say there are very very few people who know that I participate in this Work. I am very careful who I introduce to G. I have a very good friend, whom I talk with regularly. He knows I study The Work. And he will occassionally ask me a question. But his interpretation of everything is academic. While there is certainly a connection between G and quantum physics, quantum physics does not explain All and Everything. Though quantum physics is explain in All and Everything.

Think about it. There are sayings we use without thinking about them. Pearls Before Swine. (That is also the name of a very enlightened Rock Group. . .find some of their music.)

---

by Cassandra

John, I agree with the quote. Perception of anything out of the ordinary depends on the ability to perceive, whether the place has been prepared for the "bridegroom," as the parable goes. I've spent most of my life in imagination. The vessel is not ready for many things yet.

Harry, I usually get very nervous when I have to speak in public. A couple of weeks ago, I did a webinar, no one could see me but many heard my voice. Initially, I had high anxiety, but I made it my aim to feel a body part as I sat there waiting for the GO light. It turned out well, but I typically repeat the same anxiety cycle before speaking.

---

by JohnS

Harry;
One of the interesting things about the books I read when posting the 'Gurdjieff's big numbers' thread was exactly that perspective: how All and Everything and its influences - including the Pythagorean School - could be related to quantum physics, and not the other way around. The point of the books was, as the Work states, that all this quantum analysis was known in ancient times, with the difference that then it was linked with a relationship with the Whole, the One, the Unity, whereas science today is not allowed to take that definitive step and mention the word God - even though it is perhaps only a step away, as the more they 'discover,' the more they see how organised everything is, and how much the same everything is.

Your mention of your private reservations in mentioning the work is my situation also - unless the other person has a bit of 'inside information', any attempt at bringing up the subject - even in a casual way - falls flat or misfires.

John

---

by Gururaj

Have been hoping to come back to an awareness of me (it) participating in life as it flows .Not much success. i do not 'will' it enough ?
What force in me can I summon stronger than the one of being immersed - is what I am asking myself.

---

by Harry

I'm not sure about that 'awareness of me(it)'. There is no one it. What you want is an awareness of I, or your magnetic center, of that spiritual touchstone. It will always be there. You live in it most of the time. And it can change in a microsecond.

---

by Judy

Good morning all,
Wow! What a delight to come home to such a welcome plethora of posts. I haven't caught up with them all just yet. Yes, some good starting points, Harry.
I recall the beginnings clearly - both intellectually and experientially, together with some emotional highs and beginner's epiphanies. It began with "In Search of the Miraculous" plus a rather strange intro to Beelzebub's Tales, by way of the fact that a good friend kept on reading it without saying anything more than that it was "interesting", and I assumed (wrongly of course), after glancing at the cover illustration, that it was soe kind of a sci-fi comic. Not so indeed. It took years before I took it up seriously. Meantime, ISOTM kept fascinating, and as I began to apply some of the exercise suggestions, rather definite things began to happen on a regular basis. These were mainly in connection with attempts to 'self-remember', which, even in the early days, led to many moments I'll never forget (as Mr Nyland was fond of saying).
The first of these was whilst travelling as a passenger along a country road. There was an alertness, a clarity, as the trees in particular appeared to 'jump out' at me and colours were so vivid and yes, I was catapulted into the awareness of the three-dimensional world. Everything had more life. This was undeniable and to this day I remain grateful for these early glimpses of reassurance that a higher consciousness is not only possible, but achievable in this lifetime. I had been experimenting with lots of methods of increasing consciousness. Here was one that worked.
Some five years along and I was introduced to Maurice Nicoll's Commentaries. They have saved me many times and remain a regular reading (I'd like to say 'daily' but that isn't so). Here were ideas I could try. Here were suggested "life skills" which an expensive "education" didn't provide. And here were ideas that worked! Again! Gradually the negativity began to decrease and the mind to become calm. I am shown a better way to look at life. For example, when an event brings about ripples of whatever negative emotion you'd care to name, I'm told I can either (a) non-identify or (b) will it, depending on the circumstances.
So I'm still with the Work of Gurdjieff because it works for me. I use various skills from a Twelve Step program as well on a daily basis, for the same reason. The Twelve Steps and all they involve are inspired, in my opinion, and are America's most authentic contribution to modern-day practical spirituality in the world. I also love the "mindfullness" exercises of Tibetan Buddhism.
This potpourri is a kind of "Fifth Way" for me.

I'd love to hear about others' searchings and findings, especially in practice. It seems we have morphed just a little into a close little spiritual support online group here, does anyone agree? How blessed we all are.

Good to be home, after rather a big adventure out in our beautiful world.
Love,
Judy.

---

by Judy

Gururaj wrote:
Have been hoping to come back to an awareness of me (it) participating in life as it flows .Not much success. i do not 'will' it enough ?
What force in me can I summon stronger than the one of being immersed - is what I am asking myself.

Might be worth really going back to the basics entioned on Commentaries p1 in the letter to Mr Bush, Gururaj. Are you separating from Gururaj, for example? And do it in peace and quiet to begin with. I'm assuming you wish your "I" (that is, the highest, most spiritually developed part of you,) to be observing Gururaj (it) as he goes about his daily tasks. Self-observation, in other words.
As to "being immersed", not quite sure what you mean, but it is okay if your sense of "I"/presence seems to be within "Gururaj". For me, this changes. Sometimes inner sense, sometimes (less often), I may be looking from a corner of the room or above, for example. Make sense?
It is no easy thing to retain. I almost always lose the awareness after being in conversation with another for some seconds. Don't expect too much too soon. The real self-observation energy is a very high one, available to most of us only in glimpses. Anything longer is usually called an "epiphany" and is seen as Grace - well, it is all Grace, really. There's an interesting read called Jean Toomer's epiphany on the web somewhere. You might enjoy it if not already read.

Kind regards,
Judy.

---

by JohnS

Nice to have you back, Judy.

Gururaj, remember that to have the will for awareness, the emotional centre has to be involved: the awareness of the breath is via the emotional centres (the six of them, located at the six chakras.
Judy's 142857 energy flow exercise is always a good tool.
Gurdjieff reminds us that trying to understand self-remembering does not come from the formatory intellectual centre (worry) or from the body (doubt). Awareness of the breath (ie awareness of incoming impressions) is done by the emotional centres.

So easy to drift away from this and try to reason it out (the 'why' factor)

John

---

by Gururaj

Thanks - Harry ,Judy and John for your inputs.Much there for me to wrestle further with the issue , yes,simply put, of self-observation .

A superbly clear account of Jean Toomer's epiphany is on the ES site itself. Had read it long ago and it was good to revisit it.Very interesting person,I gathered from biographical accounts about him.

Work Program week beginning 15 October 2012

---

by Cassandra

Let the Discussion Continue...

Mr. Gurdjieff has been characterized as not being a good person by many of his followers, for many different reasons. Sometimes I question the validity of this system because of his bad reputation. Do others have a problem with this? Maybe these are reluctant work I's in me that are looking for excuses not to work.

---

by Harry

What does the external view matter? Does a note sound within you? Do you understand that you have met something that is different from any other teaching? Are there answers?

Reputation is a part of the outside world. It is not even part of personality.

If you want a great omlete and someone can help you learn how to make a great omlete, what does it matter if others don't like the teacher?

---

by Gururaj

In a subtle way ,G's many unconventional manifestations may also be being copied by followers.

"It's OK to do/ be .....G himself did/was ... " sort of thinking.

---

by Cassandra

Harry, I think it's very important to question someone or something that presents an idea that I'm following. And yes, reputation is one of the pieces of evidence that I have to evaluate because I did not personally know G. I don't expect perfection but example, a mostly good example. If I were to evaluate some of G.'s actions by today's standards, I would reject his teachings outright. I won't do that, but if we can't look at the whole of someone and ask questions about irregularities, we are not looking objectively. Of course I find value in the teaching he brought.

---

by Harry

Of course you should verify for yourself. It is at the heart of this Work. But what do you verify for yourself. Someone wrote a book called G and the Women. Lots of scandelous material there. (And I've only seen excerpts.) But what does it matter? The work is about awakening your higher centers and your soul. The outside world will say many things on outward appearances. And, perhaps, all of that scandal is designed to keep away those who want sensation.

As to people imitating the behavior. Why? If we are imitating behavior we are going against the entire purpose of the work.

As I am I cannot do. I want to be able to do. I want to have a Real I. I want to grow so that my life is complete with meaning.

The major work is All and Everything. And that includes all and everything. We talk about all of those things like the most recent chapter on Good and Bad. In a sense we are talking about that very thing right here in this discussion. We are judging. By outward reports. From someone else's camera.

Does the Work help you find something higher? Does it help you in times of difficulty? Are you growing?

What someone else thinks is really not important.

Someone has written a book called Jesus's Mistress. Have no idea what it is about. Mary Magdalen? I don't know. And I don't care. And I won't riot in a square if someone makes a crappy movie about it. Nor will I kill an ambassador. That is life and life is a series of events that only impact on me the same way that weather does.

---

by Cassandra

Harry, it's interesting that you point to examples of alleged relationships with women for both G. and Jesus. That doesn't concern me.

But the greater ideas remain, and there are living examples of people like Maurice Nicole who offer much inspiration. I agree, the purpose is to work.

It seems we may have hit a turn in the road with these open discussions. At first there was a lot of participation but that started to wane some last week.

---

by Harry

Just to be accurate. Nicoll died in 1953. But is certainly a major commentator.

As to participation, it is up to those who wish to be good householders to continue this Wednesday.

---

by Gururaj

It's still Wednesday in Bangalore now - a half hour left !

The discussion on judging made me ponder on and observe for a while on the nature and flavour of my thoughts as they occurred.

Some thoughts were a sort of putting in words of an observation,some were intentional to work out a solution for a life result.
The judging ones ,on the other hand,had an emotion attached.

The watching of thoughts ,and the gaps between them, seems to be an endeavour worth pursuing and I suggest could be taken as a task for the week as we continue with the discussions.

---

by JohnS

Recently I was given a source to read, written by someone in the New York groups, who had met and worked with Gurdjieff. He described him as pushy, sometimes bullying, equally short and kind to everybody, but with a sense of being he had never come across before or since - a being which far outweighed his personality.

John

---

by Judy

Good morning, Cassandra,
You wrote:

> Sometimes I question the validity of this system because of his bad reputation. Do others have a problem with this? Maybe these are reluctant work Is in me that are looking for excuses not to work.

Every great man has many detractors. In Mr Gurdjieff's case, they seem to often be people who didn't know him - total strangers. Those who knew him loved him. I have never been bothered at all by any of the stories. However, if I were, I would be looking for a way to work with these doubts, which could well be a form of useless suffering which we are told to sacrifice/resolve, because it wastes much energy and is a distraction from our work. In this case, balancing the "reputation" is very easy indeed. There are many heart-warming accounts of Gurdjieff, told by those who knew him. One of these is found in the "Epilogue" (last page actually) of John G. Bennett's brilliant "Talks on Beelzebub's Tales". I'm happy to type this out if you don't have the book - unless someone has an e-copy? There are many others. As Harry says, it isn't even personality stuff; it is another degree removed as 'reputation', so what does it matter? Not at all.

Doubts about the Work itself are entirely different. It is such a vast and complete system that there are bound to be parts of it which I may not understand fully, or, if some understanding is there, it may be difficulot to articulate, and this leads to varying interpretations of various aspects of the work by many different students. In these instances, I attempt to take it into everyday life and to verify its validity for me. If it works, it is added to the repertoire. If it doesn't, I may put it aside to be looked at again further down the track. There is so much division between different Groups even in these early days of the Gurdjieff Tradition. Whilst respecting everyone's right to be following as they see fit and understand, surely we must, as serious Gurdjieffians, show some unity about our similarities, instead of too much focussing upon differences, for the Tradition to thrive. I'd be most interested in others' thoughts about this.

Busy week here for me, on a personal note. I have my son and his wife staying here. Our relationship has always been close, and it is a blessing to have this time together as adults. He is forty-two. We may be touristing on the Cape for a few days, so if I don't post right on time this Sunday/Monday, please continue the open discussions and I'll post comments as soon as I return to Cairns.

Kind regards,
Judy.

---

by JohnS

I agree with Judy's approach, and I have found that going to diverse sources other than straight from G's books has helped me immensely, as it has helped, for instance, in keeping me advised of the fact that sometimes Gurdjieff was serious, and other times seriously joking. Both had the same purpose in the end, but its a lesson to be learnt when you find that for years you have staunchly defended some idea in the Work, only to find you have been taken for a ride all that time. Its a revealing wake-up call when it happens, but diversity and luck are needed for it to happen.

This is also tied to the resonance of language: Gurdjieff's language is often a struggle (and he has stated good reasons why - it is an exact language, a precise language, a new language), but it often takes the style of another disciple to fortuitously give you a perspective on a difficult concept (Nicoll is good at this, as well as others like Charlie Nott, Bennett, Orage....). It may be only one sentence, or one word, or one idea, which gives you enough impetus to go back and tackle the original thought again.

Or, completely differently, when for example I found a whole new focus on the Work based on a different starting point (Gurdjieff's teaching via the musical intricacies of the Pythagorean mystery school), the links I never guessed had existed opened up rafts of new detail and perspective.

Long and far may we search, and only resonance will raise our vibrations!

John

---

by Judy

Yes, John, resonance is so important; and not only in its purest sense - of the way that various concepts are expressed; resonance of ideas. I agree reading others is often most helpful. Then I check back with BT, to see if understanding is increased in conformity with what G. has actually written.

As Harry suggested recently, we each may be sounding different notes in the group octave and this is necessary and lawful. Resonance is lawful. Dissonance too.

And to complicate further the fact that students will often have seemingly contradictory views about one topic (conscious labour and intentional suffering comes immediately to mind), we have concepts of 'levels' and 'scale', which are both very real in the Gurdjieff teachings.

So my job is to find something I can best work with practically, in order to keep doing the next right thing and being of use to others, as well as myself. To grow towards full potential one day at a time.

Kind regards,
Judy.

---

by Gururaj

> Cassandra wrote:
> Mr. Gurdjieff has been characterized as not being a good person by many of his followers, for many different reasons. Sometimes I question the validity of this system because of his bad reputation. Do others have a problem with this?

The logical part of the mind says, if a person's actions are not in line with what he is teaching/saying/preaching ,then there may not be much validity in his system .
And, even if there is some truth in the concepts,he can't be trusted about being capable of coaching others to live those concepts.

But ,as in the case of G, if there is also a large body of evidence , mainly from written accounts , and to some extent , from personal experience of the Work,of his enormous contribution, then one is left with bafflement about the reports.The fact that I continue to grapple with the Work indicates I am not letting these thoughts to stop me.

In india there is a saying " Do not probe too much of the origins of a river , a lady and a saint ".Maybe we should'nt hastily judge too much about anything.

Work Program week beginning 22 October 2012

---

by Judy

Good morning fellow-seekers,

"Let the discussion continue", as Cassandra titled her program of last week, is a nice one to keep.

Regarding the judging or non-judging of the Work, I came across the following recently;

> Gradually, as we listen to the teachings, certain passages and insights in them will strike a strange chord in us, memories of our true nature will start to trickle back to us, and a deep feeling of something homely and uncannily familiar will slowly awaken. (fro "Glimpse After Glimpse" Sogyal Rinpoche part-reading for October 18).

Seemed appropo our discussion on resonances.

I am currently researching the Guide and Index to BT together with the text itself, at present on the topic of "conscious-labor-and-intentional-sufferings" (pp409 and 1179 plus 8 other references); in addition reading what various students have to say on the subject.
Just this morning had awareness of the example of what the Twelve-Step Program calls making amends, as being exactly this being-Partkdolg-duty.
This made me smile and totally changed how I was feeling about some current discomfort, into a glad acceptance - "Aha! Yes, I knew I was going to suffer by pursuing these questions! I knew I may not like all the answers." Yet, in order for the relationship with a grown child to progress, it had to be done.
Gratitude and praise to Endlessness!

I like what John Bennett has to say on the subject in his chapter in Talks on Beelzebub;s Tales.
There is also a great section in the exercises on our site here.
Anyone else interested in adding on this question? Or not?

Let the good householding continue. In a very small way, that is an example itself of conscious labor, and sometimes voluntary suffering. I notice in Gurdjieff's "Meetings", which I'm also dipping into at present, he uses "voluntary sufferings" quite a lot.

Cheers, folks,
Judy.

by JohnS

Judy;
What struck a chord with me was Lee Van Laer's post on conscious labour and intentional suffering, in that he states that these two forces or concepts belong to the Law of Three, and thus are external to us (see his accompanying enneagram): we cannot 'do' these things - even though we think we do - therefore we cannot develop them like, as he describes, a muscle or a will. They are only given to us, if we are open to them.
This removed, for me, a lot of the contrary talk, and theory concerning these difficult concepts

John

---

by Harry

I've always liked contemplating the phrase "Being Partkdolg Duty".

Three words. Two often ignored. Being. Essense is connected with being. Not doing. Duty. What is required. Responsibility.

Then the mysterious Partkdolg.

---

by Judy

John, It was actually the reading of Lee's recent essay on this topic which began my current exploration, as I couldn't readily see where he was coming from, but respect him enough to look for some reconciling forces between his view and my current one. I also heard in the Nyland Group here that "intentional suffering is far away from our abilities as we are" and noted its place on the 3-bodies-diagram.
My understanding (as far as practical work goes) is that conscious labor and intentional/voluntary sufferings are indeed exercises/duties that we must undertake to the best of our ability daily and every day - along the lines of information on ES site here really, plus Bennett's ideas in TOBT. Here's some material from our own site:

> "'being-partkdolg-duty,' that is to say, thanks to those factors which, from the very first arising of three - brained beings, were destined by our Uni-Being Common Father to be the means for self-perfecting." (8)
> Being Partkdolg Duty
> This term covers the core practices of the Gurdjieff Work and gives an indication of what is required of us in our daily Work. They are similar to the yamas and niyamas of the Noble Eightfold Path of Raja Yoga : non-violence, truthfulness and honesty, non-indulgence and austerity, non-possessiveness, cleanliness, contentment, self-observation, awareness of higher consciousness.

It includes the practice of :

Conscious Labor
Intentional Suffering
Five Obligonian Strivings
The Four Commandments

***

Conscious Labor and Intentional Suffering
And as for these factors, which are the sole possible means for the assimilation of the cosmic substances required for the coating and perfecting of the higher being-bodies, today we call them 'conscious labor' and 'intentional suffering. (9)
"And this is because the thought never enters the heads of these hapless contemporary 'monks' that, although it is indeed possible to perfect themselves by means of this substance, this can proceed only if the second and third being-foods are intentionally absorbed and consciously digested in one's presence, which is possible only for one who has already accustomed all the parts of his presence to fulfill consciously both 'sacred being partkdolg duties,' that is, 'conscious labor' and 'intentional suffering.'" (10)

"To tell the truth, my boy, I did not understand at once all that he told me, it all became clear to me only later when, during my studies of the fundamental cosmic laws, I learned that these sacred substances 'abrustdonis' and 'helkdonis' are precisely those substances which enter into the formation and perfecting of the higher being-bodies of the three-brained beings—that is, the 'kesdjan body' and the 'body of the soul'—and that the separation of the sacred 'askokin' from the two other substances proceeds when beings, on whatever planet they may be, transmute these sacred substances in themselves for the forming and perfecting of their higher bodies, by means of conscious labor and intentional suffering." (11)

"And so, my dear Hassein, when it became clear that there had entirely disappeared from the psyche of your favorites the instinctive need for conscious labor and intentional suffering in order to take in and transmute in themselves the sacred substances abrustdonis and helkdonis—thus releasing the sacred askokin for the maintenance of the Moon and Anulios—Great Nature was constrained to adapt herself and to extract this sacred substance by other means, one of them being precisely that periodic terrifying process of reciprocal destruction." (12)

***

The terms 'abrustdonis' and 'helkdonis' refer to the two being foods of Air and Impressions.

However, a page from gnosticism, found this morning, is also most interesting, and hints at reconciling between two seemingly very different views. Alistair, you used to enjoy some of Samael aun Weor's essays, didn't you? How are you? I hope you are well.
Here's the mentioned page:

Being-Partkdolg-Duty

Often translated as "Parlok"; a term used in the teachings of Gurdjieff.

"To exercise the Being-Partkdolg-Duty means that we not allow intellectual concepts to pass through our mind in a mechanical manner; in other words, we become cognizant of all the intellectual data that come to the mind. How do we become cognizant of that data? It is done by means of Meditation. So, if we read a book, we should meditate on it, try to comprehend it.

"2. We must become cognizant of all the activities of our Emotional Center. It is unfortunate to see how people move under the impulse of emotions, in a completely mechanical manner, without any control whatsoever. So, we must become self-cognizant of all emotions.

"3. The habits and customs of the Motor Center. We must become self-cognizant of all our activities, of all our movements, of all our habits, and not do anything in a mechanical manner.

"4. We must become lords of our instincts and subdue them. We must comprehend them in-depth, integrally.

"5. We must transmute the sexual energy. We transmute our creative energies by means of certain alchemical procedures.

"Obviously, our life unfolds harmoniously, when we fulfill in this manner the Cosmic Duty or Being-Partkdolg-Duty and we live in harmony with the Infinite, in agreement with the Great Law. Thus, we will be able to reach old age full of ecstasy; we will be able to attain Mastery and perfection." - Samael Aun Weor, excerpts from The Erroneous Functions of the Five Centers

And yes, Harry - the most mysterious "Partkdolg".

---

by Judy

While I'm at it, may as well quote a little from a J.G.Bennett site http://starvethematrix.com/esoterica/fourth-way/the-work/item/217-conscious-labor-and-intentional-suffering-being-partkdolg-duty Bennett's full lectures on this subject are available here, for anyone who doesn't have TOBT.
Here's an exerpt:

> Let me sum up the three aspects of conscious labor, as Bennett sees it.
> First of all, it means being able to recognize what is needed.
> Secondly, it means to do what is needed without regard to the fruits of action, and > Thirdly it requires being content to have sown the seeds for a harvest that others will reap.
>
> He reiterates, to quote again, that "It’s not difficult to see that if one works in this way this will contribute to liberating us from our own egoism, from the consequences of the properties of the organ Kundabuffer."

Kind regards,
Judy.

---

by Gururaj

One interpretation for me of Intentional suffering (I S) is that it is lawful for the world to respond to us (or appear to respond to us) in ways we do not like or want inspite of our right efforts. Bearing this with equanamity is I S.
And one can ,however , be able to manage this only when Conscious Labour (C L) has become ingrained in us.
Otherwise the waves of life are gonna knock you down and wash you away.

Would welcome any further guidelines , if I am off the mark with the above interpretion.

Thanks a lot Judy for the contributions. Exploring them, I hope to design some exercises to attempt as the discussions flow on.

Regards to all,
Gururaj

by JohnS

I think the point I was trying to convey - especially in the light of Judy's following excellent quotes which clarify things even more - was that with we 'ordinary beings' there may be a lot of imagination involved in our ideas of carrying out conscious duties: we readily embrace the principles and are eager to participate, but mortals such as ourselves are not ready, as it is pointed out that it is a 3-centred state, and not an action (which is what we automatically think participation to be) that is required for the Duty which forms the higher being-bodies and the responsibilities (duties) that go with them.

The whole process depends on preparation, acceptance, which I for one know I haven't got: I'm not clean enough, I'm not clear enough, I'm not simple enough, I'm not conscious enough.This is not disparagement, as, for example, I see myself drifting towards and away from any real consciousness while I'm writing this.

I know one of the solutions to this dilemma is feeling the Terror of the Situation (ie emotional centre is involved and ready to fight to the death).. this is another aspect of Duty, and a good signpost whose absence is a warning that imagination is the only thing working.

John

---

by JohnS

After now having read the Bennett quotes on this subject, I would say that there is a lack of responsibility in me for future generations and the fate of this planet.

---

by Harry

Imagination does play a part. G and O both describe the process as imagining that you have an I. Be as if you had an I. This begins to concentrate magnetic center.

To act or to be. It acts. I am.

The world does not react to me. I am much too small for the World to even care about me. There are Events in Life that this thing that i am becomes involved in. This it will be acted upon. If I am, then I have the stilts to stand above the sandstorm of life.

---

by JohnS

"To act or to be. It acts. I am."

So. I'm understanding that, like everything else, conscious labours act on I Am. I don't acquire them, they act on the Am. Perhaps they are not even assimilated, although something must eventually permeate and collect, like a residue, but in a fluid sort of way, until the stage of 'crystallisation.'

Perhaps this is the reason why we feel such little 'progress', as nothing is permanent yet (except the Ideas), and what is permanent is external to us at this stage.

John

---

by Harry

What is permenant is not external. It is inaccessible to ordinary consciousness. It can be experienced. That is what the practice of self observation and self remembering brings. A connection with the accumulations, with the development of the growing magnetic center and hopefully the higher centers.

---

by Alistair

Dolg as it would appear in Latin is a well used word in Russian that can can either mean duty or debt dolgee, translates to long, as in long winter dolgo, locally pronounced more like dolga translates as long, as in for a long time post will not be accepted if they include cyrillic also when submitting a post the error warnings at the top of the screen disappear

---

by Judy

From Harry;

> Imagination does play a part. G and O both describe the process as imagining that you have an I. Be as if you had an I. This begins to concentrate magnetic center.
>
> To act or to be. It acts. I am.
>
> The world does not react to me. I am much too small for the World to even care about me. There are Events in Life that this thing that i am becomes involved in. This it will be acted upon. If I am, then I have the stilts to stand above the sandstorm of life.

Yes indeed. Thanks, Harry. Beautifully put.

And then from John;

> So. I'm understanding that, like everything else, conscious labours act on I Am. I don't acquire them, they act on the Am. Perhaps they are not even assimilated, although something must eventually permeate and collect, like a residue, but in a fluid sort of way, until the stage of 'crystallisation.'

This is helpful as well. And yet, and yet....
If "it" can somehow be caused/imagined/allowed to do the next right thing, as often as possible, day after day - then we have some true soul growth? Some true "Haida Yoga"?
But why then, if "it" is doing the labor, is the concept called "conscious labor"? Is it because only by allowing the highest within me to direct the "it", that this can be achieved?
And if this is so, then isn't the "I" acting on the "it" (or acting as if I have a real I)?

So isn't there a kind of 2-way action going on?
I don't know how else to express it - aren't we kind of being 'co-creators with Higher Centres/God' in this?

Thanks for all the input. What a complex concept. I sense a small breakthrough in my understanding. Gratitude for that. Precious - even if partial at present.

Alistair, I'll pass on your comment about posting difficulties to Ian also - or you can do if you prefer.
Your connecting of "dolg" with debt and duty much appreciated. Gurdjieff spoke of repaying our debt many times - yes? Helpful.

Love to all.

---

by Judy

These days I accept that I must continue doing the next right thing, however small that may be, and that understanding may come further down the track.
This is quite a change from the old insisting on understanding something before acting.
There is some living contentedly with uncertainty.
Perhaps the beginnings of a little humility? Please.

---

by Judy

Associative random thought - "conscious" because they lead towards higher consciousness as well? Could be also called "consciousness labors"... or soul labors?

Or not? 😎

---

by JohnS

And, in conjunction, the 'I Am' is a prayer towards the hope of conscious imagination, or conscious wish?

John

Work Program week beginning 29 October 2012

---

by Gururaj

Here's a task from a source not noted when I stored it some time ago. I thank him/her ,anyway.

"Observe all of your emotions, positive and negative. Just watch them as they change and march through your day.I do as often as I can.
Notice that your opinions and attitudes are full of emotions.
If you "purify" your opinions and attitudes, they will be from objective perspective and, yes, that would be a great help to the right functioning of the Emotional Center, which will increase the connection.
Beginning with Observation, progressing to Inner Separation and Non-Identification will disconnect you from the wrong work of the Emotional Center which essentially purifies it.
This is a long process in the Work, and I do mean years, and it begins, and for a very long time remains, mostly Self-Observation.
All of the Understanding that you will gain in the process of doing the Work will come initially from Self-Observation."

Let the discussions continue with the sharing from the above task.I'm sure all of us will have enough emotions as grist for the (Work) mill !
Gururaj

---

by Gururaj

Tired and groggy at the end of a busy weekend, I am afraid.yesterday I posted a task which was quite similar to one i had done two roster turns ago.

Yet , this feature of being swayed by emotions - of either type and more often the negative one - is an enduring issue for me.

After pondering on my experiences of the day , before I hit the hay today, I dwelt on the nature of happiness and the lack of it and sought out a remarkable statement I had come across many years ago by Ramana Maharshi stating that happiness is innate to our true nature but we somehow seek it in objects of desire in the external world.

You may see in detail his words in the famous classic "Who Am I" available freely at this link http://www.messagefrommasters.com/Ebooks/Ramana_Maharshi_Books/Who_A

Of late have been in the throes of a particular desire peculiar to man(with a small m) and tonight itself (oh the wonder of serendipity !)
I came across this , for me , very valuable talk , addressing precisely the pain am going thru'. Do not be misled by the title - it is applicable for all humanity and is available at this link http://www.ramatalks.com/insights/why-dont-more-women-attain-enlightenment.html

I am seeing that though the talk basically addresses sexuality , one can extrapolate and attempt to see in ourselves the sources of disturnbances of other types as well.

---

by JohnS

Gururaj;

Here is another view of happiness, from Georgette le Blanc, which may help to lift you to a state of ease:

" According to me, life begins at fifty, and afterwards rises all the time. Everything worth while begins at that age. It is the time for “something else.”
I have the feeling that I have lived the whole of my life for this particular present.
I must admit that I have not yet finished with art and moonlight, with music and spring, and that I shall never be insensitive to all the delights that are the delicious froth of the earth. But in order to learn to live one must be prepared to abdicate, to make way for changes of plan and level. There is a way of looking at things that is eternal and that accords to happiness the place it deserves."

The full text is here:
http://www.gurdjieff-bibliography.com/Current/07_leblanc_la_machine_2004-07-02.pdf

John

---

by Harry

"What does happiness have to do with it?"

There's a Procol Harum song in which a seeker climbs a mountain to see the guru. When he gets there he asks: "What's the meaning of life, father?"
The guru responds:
"Well, life is like a beanstalk, isn't it?"

Hedonism is the ultimate "philosphy" of "happiness". But we are looking at finding a center before anything else. In deep meditation there is a lack of almost anything. Nirvana called it nirvana, but I'm not sure Curt Cobain understood anything about that name he took for his band.

Is happiness contentment? Then it would be awfully close to sleep, wouldn't it?

Just posing reactions. Which probably isn't a beneficial thing to do. But I have contemplated these ideas when dealing with this concept.

---

by JohnS

Another view on happiness, again from the link above

"It is the same with everything that touches on the secret history of humanity, of which Gurdjieff and a few others believe themselves to the trustees. But on what basis, precisely, does this science of the soul rest? Philosophers are satisfied in saying that: “this interpretation of the Universe, this anthropocosmogeny is the highest, the greatest, the most admirable, the most invulnerable that has ever been conceived; it overflows man’s thought and imagination in all directions.” (Maeterlinck.) “But,” they add, “what influence will a revelation such as this have on our life? What will it transmit to us, what will it add to our morals, to our happiness? No doubt very little. It will pass over our heads. It will not descend to our level. It will not touch us, we shall lose ourselves in its immensity and, in the end, knowing everything we shall be neither happier nor wiser than when we knew nothing.”

Unless we can assimilate the relativity of it, 'happiness' will remain a useless dreamword

John

---

by Judy

No worries about the repetition, Gururaj; it is a good one. It fits in with some current work for me, which basically involves self-observation and personal inventory on a day-to-day basis until the end of the month, today actually; then at the end of the day I journal one of these observations. The addition of noticing emotions in connection with any inner talking etc, is excellent. Of course, I should have been watching them anyway, but a reminder of this aspect is always useful.

Happiness. Ah - this is a tricky one. I see it as a part of the natural state of awareness, together with existence/bliss. Thus it is only natural that we wish for this birthright. The tricky part is that, the more we seek it, the more it may elude us. Dr Leslie Farber says this is because seeking happiness is misdirected use of the will. (Oh, btw, Harry, I see hedonists as pleasure-seekers rather than happiness-seekers). Anyway, misdirected will in that we can do certain things but not others. eg; we can control objects but not directions or goals. Thus we can control pleasure but not happiness; knowledge but not wisdom and so on. I think I've shared this before. The point is that trying to control directions such as happiness will cause anxiety ande even the opposite of what we seek.

The various religios traditions thus have various skills within their teachings. The general gist regarding happiness seems to be towards becoming "other-centered" or even "God-centered" instead of self-centered.
Sure enough, this works. That is my experience.
There is a good exposition of this on pp125-7 of "The Spirituality of Imperfection" by Kurtz and Ketcham.

Kindest regards,
Judy.

---

by Judy

Oh, Guru, I've downloaded that 67Mb talk of Ramana Maharshi's but haven't had tie to listen to it all yet. Thanks.
J.

---

by Gururaj

All your inputs were helpful.

The ease ,finally came back when I very slowly read and re-read the first chapter of Michel Conge's "Inner Octave".

Particularly apt was the statement "...In fact, I am nothing more than a ceaselessly moving point where lines of forces interact.
This perspective on things is the only one that can really show me the right way to work."

---

by Judy

Thanks, John, for the Georgette le Blanc pdf. It is well worth a quiet read.
Here's a snippet from one of her journals:

> Monday, November 2nd, 1936—A great day. When I arrived at his flat he opened the > door himself. I said at once: “I am in a new body.” The light from the sitting room fell > full upon him. Instead of withdrawing, he lent back against the wall. Then, for the first > time, he allowed me to see what he really is—as though he had suddenly dropped the > mask that he is obliged to wear. His face was stamped with a goodness that embraced > the whole world. Transfixed before him, I took him in with all my strength, and experienced so deep and painful a sense of gratitude that he felt the need to soothe me.

> With an unforgettable look he said: —“God helps me.”
> November 15th, 1936—The efforts required are infinite and almost hopeless; but to > believe at last that a truth exists, is there, and that one can go towards it, is enough. I > understand, now, that happiness was nothing, that the delights of love and art were > nothing but pleasurable soul-deceivers evoked by a desire for self-manifestation. I am > aware that my subconscious has lived in spite of me, like a deeply buried treasure. It > was necessary to have lived first for a long, long time, according to the usual laws.

Yes, there is a whole eternity way beyond mere happiness. But, as she says, it is necessary to have lived first for a long, long time, according to the usual laws."
And living for that long long time is more effective with a modicum of happiness to lighten and infuse with motivation.

Cheers and blessings,
Judy.

---

by Gururaj

"pleasurable soul-deceivers evoked by a desire for self-manifestation" . What eloquent words !

It appears that she perceived a movement beginning in her to another dimension beyond and above the usual one of pain/pleasure , (conventional,identified)happiness/unhappiness.

Lee Van laer somewhere quotes original Work sources to say that one only gets glimpses of the above state and a longer consciousness of the same can only result after creation in us of higher being bodies (which respond and act to a finer vibration).

---

by Cassandra

> Gururaj wrote:
> Here's a task from a source not noted when I stored it some time ago. I thank him/her ,anyway.
>
> "Observe all of your emotions, positive and negative. Just watch them as they change and march through your day.I do as often as I can.
> Notice that your opinions and attitudes are full of emotions.

One of the most useful quotes I've heard is something like this: "Learn to treat both happiness and heartache as strangers that come 'round and stay for a while, sometimes for a long time, sometimes for a shorter time."

For me, the aim is to learn how to be in that place where I can see these polar opposites and all that lies in between as visitors, as foreigners really to the essence of me.

Work Program week beginning 5 November 2012

---

by Harry

Contemplate and Practice

There is a strong teaching about changing the third force from Life to the Work. What does this mean to you theoritically? What does it mean to you practically? How do you try to incorporate this knowledge into your daily life? How does it become part of your Work?

---

by Judy

Good morning,
I plan to simply call in most days this week with a comment or two. This is a huge topic for pondering and practice, Harry. Where to start? Involved is the whole process of making personality passive and essence active - a life work. So, what can I do right now within the next hour? Just popping in here has at least woken me up to the fact that there is work to be awakened to daily. There are many opportunities for work, suffering and grace. Already, while pondering the question briefly, I had a couple of pictures of Judy gifted me. She was sitting reading the post, coffee in hand, and feeling slightly anxious about a swelling on the gum above a top tooth. Immediately I saw this anxious Judy, the anxiety ceased. Of course she could go about her usual day - it is only a tooth, after all, and if it doesn't clear, simply make a dental appointment later in the week. The self-observation effort, though slight, had allowed some Work third force to enter and there was some reconciliation. This of course saved energy which could otherwise have been lost to useless and pointless anxiety. In this freedom, a thought arrived, as to how useful it would possibly be, for us to have the diaries of a group of Gurdjieff students available to us to read; diaries written in James Joyce style "stream of consciousness" over a period of several days - or even glimpses of examples from such.
We could always attempt the writing.
Now I am to sit for twenty minutes - after cleaning teeth and a quick shower. A friend replied recently to a question I had about prayer and meditation; "Two main points; the first is to start, and the second is to continue - daily." Simple, yes. Easy, no.
Regards,
Judy.

---

by JohnS

As Judy said: making personality passive, and Essence active.

Practically, it means for me trying to recognise essence when it calls, to try and distinguish it from the tricks of disguised personality. As I write this, I feel something permanent, something grounded, that wants to connect with this task, but at the same time I must be wary of that feeling (or thought) if I also am not aware of the presence and balance of three centres - and this is almost the case now: I can observe a certain calmness of thought - ie absence of the kind of thought that just wants to be heard - which happens when the emotional centre has some presence, and this can bring associatively (as now) the body as well.

Today being the first day of the working week, though, I observe that something has already mapped out my thoughts for the next four days (at least), so my personality has already rehearsed and acted out my pending reactions - word-for-word, in fact - and this is my work : to wait for these events, to be ready for them, and to reflect on how many times I catch them, and how many times I'm left with Homer's "Doh!". Then after that comes the standard weekend thoughts - which are totally segregated from the weekday ones, except for the overlap of preconceptions and planning that arrive on Sunday evening - and the cycle begins again.

The constant Work can only be in trying to change the circle into a spiral.

John

---

by Alistair

Harry, Third Force refers to Holy Reconcilling?

---

by Judy

Good morning,

The twenty minute morning meditation seemed to take little time today. I become quieter when the practice is regular. Two little gifts - one mental image of being patted on the head by the inner teacher, and the other a multicolored view of the screen of a computer defragmenting. Interesting. Read recently in an Oxford University magazine an article on the furthering science of meditation (Tibetan Buddhist style), where they spoke of the area in the brain, the insula, lighting up on scans after regular meditation, and that this connected to a "more organised" brain; also a more optimistic attitude generally.

So, some unseen Third Force (I'll use capitals to indicate Work third force) happening - yes, Alistair, Holy Reconciling of the Holy Equation prayer; Holy Ghost of Christian terminology. By the way, if you are interested in choosing an aspect to talk about, Nicoll gives many in various commentaries. Just check the Index for those on Third Force and it'll give several starting points. Harry, please excuse if I am butting in a little. I'm sure you'll let me know if you'd prefer another aspect of your question focussed upon.

Anyway, back to this morning's ramble. Recently reading William Chittick's "Heirs to the Prophets" ; also the Shobogenzo. Both illuminating. I have e-copies if anyone would like. Here's a small quote I like, to do with what he calls "imaginal vision" (I was actually looking up

"gnosis" when I came across this in the former.)

> The “gnostics” are those who achieve this sort of knowledge – direct, unmediated knowledge of self and God. Thus “gnosis,” if this is the right translation, means simultaneous > self-recognition and God-recognition. In his frequent explanations of the meaning of this maxim, Ibn ‘Arabi sometimes takes one or the other of the two basic routes of understanding God – asserting his incomparability or declaring his similarity.The more we use our rational insight to analyze the knowing self, the better we come to recognize that we are not God and we cannot hope to know him. But the more we are given the gift of imaginal vision, the better we recognize ourselves and the world as forms of the divine self disclosure.

That's it for me this rainy morning.
Cheers and blessings to everyone,
Judy.

---

by Harry

Alistair,

We are discussing the Law of Three. Higher blends with lower to produce the next higher or the next lower.

So if you have an active and a passive they need a reconciling to blend. In most of our days Life provides this force. Our education, our habits, our routines. Work asks us to place it in the position of reconciling. Thus changing the external result.

---

by Cassandra

Practically speaking, this includes attempts at not identifying with outcomes. I mentioned before that I am very attached to the outcome of the US presidential race. If my candidate wins, the personality says everything will be alright for the next four years; and it is also about gratifying my self--that I'm on the 'right' side.

But what if the hammer falls the day after election--a close family member dies or some dread disease is discovered at my next physical exam, then what. So, for me the Work as a substitute for Life is about reailzing and knowing deeply that the next 'satisfying' event is not what saves but rather coming to terms with what simply is.

---

by Harry

Don't think of Work as a substitute. Think of it as a key. Life goes on. You will live Life.

There are some events that are larger than others. And these have the power of pulling us in. I went to bed last night satisified that another travesty hadn't been carried out. But woke up worrying that someone would have tried to pull something over night. Has nothing to do with my development. But my personality abhors what has happened in this country. Where a company has the same rights as individuals, except the right to be executed.

Of course G dealt with all of that a long time passed. Good old Mr. Belly Button and all of those dollar makers. Perhaps it was that contact with the work that first had me contemplate our obsession with earning more, owning more, having more reputation.

There is a line in a Jefferson Airplane song: The human name doesn't mean shit to a tree.

---

by Cassandra

Harry,

I hadn't thought of the power that some events have on the whole of humanity, and perhaps it is too much to presume that certain things met without difficulty. That your personality doesn't like what's happened in this country--I've heard other personalities express the same except they fear we're moving too far left. So, how might a collective like a country move towards the reconciling space? This can't be just about 'reaching across the isle' because that's of false personality although on some levels it may help.

---

by JohnS

I shouldn't think a country could consciously move towards a reconciling force when the large majority of individuals concerned are unconscious, thus the Law of Accident applies rather than the Law of Fate.

You would need someone of the highest motives such as Gandhi to be able to effect anything close to a conscious outcome for a country. And the Law of Seven has acted on the results of even his labours, if you look at India now in a general or economic or political view (spiritually I don't know).

Where are Gurdjieff's 'two hundred conscious men', who would be enough to save mankind? Right now that seems like a very large number.

John

---

by Harry

Events are well out of our "control". Even a flu. Or, of course, a hurricane. But how we respond internally and externally is within our control. By Working we change our selves and those around us.

Can a group of individuals change the World? Well, G gives some examples. But that isn't the goal. It is the side effect. I believe that the 60s and 70s were one of those times when it was extra profitable to Work. That this also began to change groups larger than our individual selves.

I do not think that the Beatles were especially conscious individuals, but their moving toward consciousness impacted a generation. And when you combine them with Donovan, The Stones, The Airplane, The Dead. . .you had a cultural movement that impacted a generation. I know in the early 60s no one even imagined Meditation. Hell, when I was in high school I had no idea what pot was. But the Summer of Love was a different time. And think of the cultural leaders of your nation trying to "levitate the Pentagon". (Read Armies of the Night by Mailer if you are too young to remember this.)

There were two or three bookstores where I could find G and O back then. And the clerks knew what I was talking about. And could talk about it.

Nevertheless, back to the exercise. I think we change our own being when we can work in the face of an event. This election was an event in this country, perhaps moreso than 2008. Contemplate: 86% of those voting for Romney were White. Most were male. This is a change in the culture of this country.

---

by Judy

Seems appropriate to this week's task:

> Consciousness—attention, mindfulness— is the bridge between inner action and outer action; the reconciling principle. When we are unconscious — asleep, inattentive, unmindful — outer action attempts to inform the inward, with poor results. It ought to be the other way around: inward action should inform the outward

(from LVL this morning).

Thanks, Harry. Most interesting week of attempts.
Regards,
Judy.

---

by Alistair

The Third Force, the result of every action

The manifestation of the Law of Creation

Does that action result in a higher or lower result?

Our essence strives for a higher result while the “I” strives for the opposite.

This is the crux of self remembering. Remembering oneself manifests a higher result while ego driven dominated sleep manifests the opposite.

Don’t ever forget that the sentiment of the “I” is always wrong!
Whenever we think we are not manifesting a particular sin; lust, pride, envy, etc we almost certainly are.

Law of Creation? - The Physical body is a result thereof; + & - , male & female create physical body
How does the Law of Creation differ in order to create higher being bodies?

---

by Gururaj

Almost the entire week gone by was out of town ,travelling around on work, busy, distracted and hardly ever in self-observing mode.So compelling were the externals , or rather, my immersion in them.The Life third force had full sway.

However, is'nt it true that wherever we go, in whatever external circumstances we find ourselves in, the one constant is always this entity called ME ?
All the new impressions are still hitting the same ME.Yet being dazzled by the externals and not aware of one's internal dynamics, we consider that the new circumstances are to blame.

Back in familiar surroundings today, I re-read Harry's first post and here's some experience ,and the findings thereof, shared below.

Reminded by my wife, I had agreed that today is the day to buy the fireworks (of the safe variety) for our kids prior to a festival (Diwali) starting tomorrow during which traditionally many Hindus indulge in igniting fireworks emitting light and loud noise, though over the years the abstainers have increased.
Finally I bought and took home some fireworks to the delight of the kids.

In the process , looking back, I can see the affirmatory force INSIDE ME being the intention to buy, the denying forces being , initially some sleepiness and later a dilemma on how to get a good bargain.The reconciling element was when I chanced upon another buyer's approach to get a reasonable deal which solved my dilemma and made me complete the job - all quite automatically .It would all have been forgotten, and am recollecting it only due to the intention now to use the experience for this post.

I think, if instead, one were "at Work" and self-aware , it might have influenced differently not only the third force but the nature of the other two forces too could have played out differently.I might have affirmed to give a different Diwali experience for my kids, the resultant resistance from the wife and kids would have resulted in a major challenge for me to resolve somehow.

But as G said (in different words, and in a loftier context), a great dispute ,if one stays with it, gives a worthwhile result.

Apart from the above imaginatory example, I think one can truly say that while applying a third force from Work ,one would operate from a non-reactive state and ,at the very least ,be aware of our organism's participation more intimately.

---

by Judy

Gururaj,
Thanks for such a clear example of third force in life coming in the form of new knowledge. Interestingly, In ISOTM pp77-81, Gurdjieff uses new esoteric knowledge as the reason for increased momentum to the initiative to Work, finally resulting in movement being achieved in the desired direction.

This Law of Three is easy for me to mix up. For a long time I didn't realise that the "result' was a fourth parameter (sometimes called the phenomenon) and that a fifth consideration, that of the "medium" also exists. The above pages resolved this confusion nicely.

I might add that daily increased knowledge often acts as Third Force for me. This happens both in life and in my Work. Sometimes an attitude has to be changed in me (and increased knowledge, together with prayer and meditation work well here usually) before I can launch into a particular day as a volunteer rather than a victim. It has become very important to well-being. I sometimes have to go back and start the day again if any negativity is not budging. New knowledge (someties I may have to read exerpts from several trusted books to achieve this. But I know when it happens. It is like a weight has been lifted. Of course volunteer not victim is just one example of an attitude. There are of course many.

I've had insidious little negativities this morning. Typing this post is somehow working well today. No actual new knowledge per se, but some "defragging" going on, has worked its magic. Examples are brilliant for this clarification process. I always so appreciate it when others share their day-to-day experiences in this manner. It is just of so much practical help. Yes, the theory is great; but how do I use Triamazikamno to convert a resentment into acceptance and gratitude and equanimity again? Yes indeed.
Cheers, folks,
Judy.

Work Program week beginning 12 November 2012

---

by Alistair

In earlier posts perhaps reference was made to comments of Idries Shah in respect of Sufi teaching in that there are times when progress can and cannot be made and that certain exercises are appropriate for some and not for others or perhaps it is not the right time.

To that end rather than point to one specific exercise this week it might be useful to remind ourselves of a few that have already featured this year that can be executed anywhere anytime perhaps increasing their usefulness to remember ourselves from moment to moment.

Use whatever you find useful, use them all, the more we work the more we remember ourselves

The first is Sensing our mass and the mass of those people and objects around us as opposed to the two dimensional view we mechanically accept.

Relaxing the face muscles is another relatively simple exercise to return us to brief self-remembering, and if we can hold on to it extend the exercise further through the body; a useful starter to meditation and any more intensive exercise.

Always turning in a clockwise direction is another relatively simple action to assist our self-remembering as is walking through a door. The clockwise turn however often finds us turning in a direction that we wouldn't ordinarily. Mr Gurdjieff draws attention to doing tasks that we perform frequently a little bit differently.

Last, you are probably all familiar with the Pentagram, the Flaming Star
Try the following mantra to manifest the Flaming Star instantly

KLIM KRISHNAYA GOVINDAYA GOPIJANA
VALLABHAYA SWAHA

Intuitively sense when and where.
Is there any noticeable benefit to you?

For more information follow this link http://gnosticteachings.org/faqs/prayers/836-klim-krishnaya-govindaya-gopijanavallabhaya-swaha.html

---

by Gururaj

I suppose some you may have experienced that seperate Meditation sittings are an aid to be more attentive in daily life.

(and to be able more often to do exercises like those suggested by Alistair this week).

In this context, a massive tome with the title "Zen and the Brain" authored by James H Austin, MD is a book I return to rarely and am progressing thru' it at snail's pace.

In the chapter on Attention found these useful words

" "The faculty of voluntarily bringing back a wandering attention, over and over again,is the very root of judgement, character, and will".
William James
James was correct. And training both attention and awareness is also absolutely central to Zen. Everyone knows what it feels like to “pay attention.”
What goes on,technically, is that we enhance the way we process information from a preselected location in space.

Attention seems like a simple matter, but within it is a whole series of interrelated phenomena. They include awareness, a word derived from being wary, watchful. Awareness implies perception, a purely sensate phase of receptivity. Attention reaches.
It is awareness stretched toward something. It has executive, motoric implications. We attend to things.We can be more or less attentive.

The term attentiveness conveys how much intensity we devote to the act of paying attention. This intensive aspect of attention resembles in a sense the separate “volume” control function found on an older radio or TV set.

But in those days you first had to turn on the separate off/on knob. Then, before anything else could happen, you had to wait for the set to warm up. The brain responds in a similar fashion. It reacts sluggishly when we first awaken. This fact reminds us that arousal is basic.

First, we must be sufficiently aroused. Then we become generally aware enough so that we can attend.
Arousal, awareness, attention."

James Austin recommends sittings twice a day.I would like to do that at-least once a day , to begin with.

---

by Judy

This morning was special locally. Cairns just happened to be the place (with enough accomodation) for the best viewing of the total solar eclipse due 6.38-6.41am November 14th, 2012. As the sun's activity is extremely high at the moment, this solar-system event will not be repeated at similar intensity and totality (94% totality here this morning) for two hundred years. Thus, local population increased by some sixty thousand this week, with scientists arriving from all over to photograph the sun's corona during the eclipse, as this gives them the best opportunity to view, thus study, it. Normally it is harder to see because of the intense brightness of the sun. There is also a vast gathering of new-agers here - interesting and colorful.

I've been thinking that the whole place had "eclipse-fever" and gone quite mad. That was before and until the experience.

Just after six , my visitor and I walked the one block down to Clifton Beach, where several hundred people were already set up, but of course there was plenty of room, as the local beach is some two miles long. There were apparently similar scenes along the whole coastline. Nature didn't disappoint. How awe-inspiring; and right on time. We were lucky, as could have missed the whole event if the heavy clouds had been over the sun. But they weren't. So the scene was set; balmy morning, 23 degrees celsius, fifteen kilometre breeze, high tide and waves, dry sand, and most of the nearby residents sitting quite close together. There were many involuntary oohs and aahs and when it became dark, the whole crowd cheered. Then there was a hush as we witnessed the cosmic spectacle. The darkness lasted a couple of minutes and the viewing was spectacular. I felt that familiar rush of the blessed third state of consciousness, which must admit happened quite involuntarily (before I had remembered to remember myself). Absolutely unforgettable.

So, although our blue planet is in the Solar System Ors, right on the edge of the Milky Way Galaxy, and indeed a very long way from the Absolute, and Cairns is way down in the Antipodes of the planet, there was amazing presence and grace available here this morning, for all those who roused themselves early, were aware, and paid attention.

Judy.

---

by Harry

Life gives us reminders from time to time. An eclipse. A hurricane. Or just a strange event.

My son, his girlfriend and I were driving back from his birthday dinner when we looked up and saw a large triangle of lights in the sky, almost directly above us. And no noise.

It does not really matter what we saw. It took us back to that moment of awe we experienced much more often as children.

"You must be like unto these children if you want to enter the Kingdom of Heaven."

---

by Gururaj

The awe experienced by Judy and Harry are evident in your words.

Bye the way, Judy, though you did not mention it, was the viewing done wearing dark glasses as recommended by the medics ?

In traditions prevalent in my corner of the planet , many folks fast during the entire duration and cook only after the event.Pregnant women stay indoors with curtains drawn.

A minor pleasantly surprising event for me on awaking today morning was the unusual restfullness and calm experienced after only about 5 hours of sleep.

Instead of just hitting the hay late yesterday night, I meditated for about 20 minutes with a few minutes towards the end of inward chanting of the
"Kleem Krishnaya ..." mantra (with some feeling and devotion.It helps that I know the meaning of these Sanskrit words) and had then slept .

---

by Judy

No, Gururaj, no glasses, but I was careful and only looked directly during the totality, which was safe. I noticed that all the younger children were wearing the glasses, though, which was good to see.
Cheers.

Oh, Alistair, I've chosen the exercise of sensing and observing the mass this week. It is always a lot of fun as well as interesting. Cats are very good at living three-dimensionally - though they no doubt don't know it  . I place my hand on Ellie's side when she is quiet, and gently push sideways; she goes with it beautifully with all her mass, and then just before she falls over completely, she bounces back upright; except on a couple of occasions when she has started purring and just settled right down on her other side. No unnecessary tensions whatsoever. Beautiful.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Alistair

Dear Gururaj, would greatly appreciate your translation of the Sanskrit mantra

---

by Alistair

Gururaj, this is the most complete available definition found to date

---

by Gururaj

Kleem is a single word mantra invoking "attraction" - called a Bija (seed) mantra.
"Krishna" (the cause of all causes,the Absolute,also one of the incarnations of Lord Vishnu) and his other names being - "Govinda" (protector),"Gopijana Vallabha" (beloved of the cowherd girls of Vrindavan - where Krishna grew up) , "Svaha"(a word traditionally used at the end of every incantation while offering sacrificial objects into a sacred fire during certain rituals.It is considered that if Svaha is uttered,only then the food/results to the intended recipients is transferred out from the oblations made into the sacrificial fire).
The addition of 'ya' at the end of each name of the lord converts it into a dative form - giving the meaning - to or for (Krishna).

However when the Individual words with their meanings as given above,are strung together , I will be wiseacring if I attempt to derive ,and tell here, the mantra's overall meaning.It's beyond me,frankly.

An evolved soul,C W Leadbeater in the "Hidden life of Freemasonry" has this to say -
"Some years ago I was requested by our noble brother Sir S. Subramania Iyer of Madras to investigate a mantra which he had been using for many years, which had been given to him by Swami T. Subba Rao, a great South Indian occultist. I looked into the matter with considerable care, and also made use of it afterwards, for it was very remarkable.
This mantra is found, I am told, in the Gopalatapani and Krishna Upanishads, and is composed of five parts, as follows: (1) Klim, Krishnaya, (2) Govindaya, (3) Gopijana, (4) Vallabhaya, (5) Swaha. As one meditates upon this with intent each syllable makes a line in such a position that a five-pointed star results, as in Fig. 17. <(A pentagram)>
And as the mantra is repeated these stars pile up behind one another to form a tube having this five-pointed form of cross-section, which makes a channel for spiritual force coming from Shri Krishna, who is the same Being as the Lord Maitreya, the present Bodhisattva or World-Teacher, the Great One who entered into the body of Jesus as the Christ. With this force coming through it the mantra can be used for many purposes, such as healing, or the removal of fire and other elementals, as well as for general good.
I found, however, that there were three stages in the process. With the recital of “Klim”, which it is said is called “the seed of attraction” by the Hindu occultists, the attention of the Source of the force is attracted and what may be called a kind of downward door or valve is opened; then, throughout the body of the mantra the force pours into the form; and finally, with the sound “Swaha”, that force is sent out to do its work."

Thanks Alistair - for being a cause for me to delve into some data from a culture in which I have taken birth but was unaware of.
Yet ,I feel, some glimmer of values in them can be discerned for me only using the 4th Way lens.

by JohnS

Something that has helped me with sensing the mass this week (i'm doing it now in a carriage full of people, and the first stage is always the sensation of a mass of pulsating flesh that seems so heavy, its a wonder the train can drag this weight along) has been stumbling across an old LVL post, where he links the three forces with Heisenberg's uncertainty principle in quantum physics: if mass is known (point 1 on the Enneagram), and also position (point 2), then momentum (point 4) cannot be known, as the presence of the observer (point 3) affects the observation. In other words, any two of the three properties required to define a particle can be known, but not the third. LVL relates this to Gurdjieff's invisible third force, known only by practising conscious labour - self-observation, the first conscious shock. Only by 'standing apart' can the real process be truly observed.

By linking these points of view (not the first time), you can easily see the great similarity between Gurdjieff's explanations and that of the physicists.

Seeing that science is getting closer and closer to having to say the word 'God' in discovering the organisation and intelligence of the universe, the correlation is far from surprising. It helps, though, when logic can be applied to so-called esoteric exercises, which strengthens rather than diminishes them.

John

---

by Alistair

Gururaj, thank you for that brave translation, glad the exercise has struck a chord with you, while making the original post it had passed me by that there would be a close cultural connection through yourself.
Literally within minutes of making that post I felt the symptoms of what has turned out to be what many would define as a common cold. Monday Tuesday were the most uncomfortable days with plenty snotters  and a throb in the frontal lobe which seemed to abate whenever the Klim mantra was sounded.
Judith, thanks for the description of your eclipse experience. Haven't been paying much attention and had forgotten the event. Coincidentally had picked that day to reattempt a permanent tobacco fast and so far it's been relatively easy.
Klim Krishnaya Govindaya Gopijana Vallabhaya Swaha

---

by Gururaj

An expansiveness, a lightness was experienced a few times this week .It seems to be linked to the mantra's utterance.If so, it is a wonderous effect.
I have been cautious about the whole thing - not to do it often,not be mechanical about it ,not to wallow in the pleasantness of it - but to channelise it to Work.

Thanks again, Alistair.

Work Program week beginning 19 November 2012

---

by Judy

Good afternoon,

I'd like to keep the open discussion going and invite everyone to ask questions of the group, about anything relevant to their current work. I read in Nicoll recently that Mr O used to say he didn't want people to tell him that they had been "working on themselves". That meant nothing to him. But if they were prepared to explain about a very specific problem as to a very specific something that they were working on in the work, then he would be very glad to hear that.

Currently, I am looking at, in particular, for self-observation attempts, what "i s" I am going with. With what am I identifying? For example, if I say inwardly that I am tired, first of all, is it true? Then, is it appropriate? Or is it simply a wayward negative i who takes over and convinces me, perhaps with an alterior motive of avoiding some unpleasant (to these i s) task?
That sort of thing.

I'm also experimenting with a little of "acting as if"... This works well with the identification self-observation. One of the ways I test if I am tired, for example, is to act as if I'm not for several minutes.
This particular work also involves looking at attitudes. Am I open-minded about something? Or is it merely indifference? A I really prepared to listen to the pther person's opposing opinion impartially?
And illusions happen, of course. Nicoll warms of the really insidious one of thinking that I have no illusions.

That may be enough to begin with for me.
My day today has involved a burst water-tap in the kitchen, which necessitated cancelling tonight's dinner here for six, as the plumber cannot come until tomorrow. So water is turned off and mess cleaned up for now. And yes, I can smile now. In the middle of the broken tap and resulting forceful stream of water everywhere, though, I settled on a steady mantra of "Volunteer not victim" and "Act as if you are a plumber, Judy - just get the water turned off - fast!" Hilarious really.

Anyway, all quiet on the kitchen-front again.

Best wishes for a successful working week, friends,
Judy.

---

by Harry

Judy, I think you've given some good examples. But a word of caution. You won't want to start a civil war inside of yourself. Observe, don't judge. Just watch. When the time comes for something to be chosen, the I that will be choosing is not one your ordinary mind can identify.

---

by Judy

Harry, that is so true! Thanks for taking the time.

I need to remember continually, really, just Who is in charge. And relax and trust and watch a life better than I could have even imagined, unfold. Mind you, I have to put in the work effort.
But then relax and trust as to the outcomes/results.
So no civil wars - just looking for an incremental progress daily, and increased conscious contact with higher centres and beyond.

Thank you for the reminder, too, about ordinary mind not understanding what is going on. That is a goodly part of the wonder of it all.
Best wishes to you,
Judy.

---

by Gururaj

Am passing through that portion of Nicoll's commentaries that discusses about the Essence and Personality and the continual efforts needed to make the "passive", and initially very feeble, Essence to be watchful of the "Active" Personality.

Does Essence not manifest with and thru' thoughts? What is the taste of it? Does simultaneous sensing of some aspect of the physical centre help in this vigilance?
--- are some of the aspects I wish to explore.

---

by JohnS

From what both Judy and Harry are saying, we cannot trust where a particular thought is coming from, unless we have, as you say, at least body consciousness as well, plus emotional centre, to make us a three-centred being - no matter how temporarily. But personality has to be passive for essence to be active, and that takes much time and conscious labour.

The main hope on the horizon is that Essence is only passive with respect to personality: Essence does not need to be made active: if personality gets out of the way, then Essence would manifest automatically, without prompting.

The best - or most reliable - time for Essence to manifest is in times of danger, emergency, or some similar state where it takes over automatically - but even then we may not hear it if we are in a panic. I think this is why Gurdjieff stressed the 'Terror of the situation' such as the constant realisation of our own death and that of those around us - to awaken the emotional centre and reduce thought to essential thought - essence thought.

When you mention the 'taste' of Essence, I guess I can relate it to times of danger (for me: in danger of drowning, and pending car accident), where time slows down while you completely dispassionately observe the situation around you. Your life doesn't really 'flash before your eyes', its just that you see all the details in a condensed, orderly parade as they march by while time slows down to an incredible extent: you can live through a lifetime in one amazingly long couple of seconds.

Perhaps these are the few characteristics of Essence we can trust: a sense of complete non-involvement, coupled with a different view / feeling of space-time: if you ain't got at least these signposts, then you ain't there yet.

I ain't there yet, but Judy's attempt to believe you are is a tempting but dangerous option

John

---

by JohnS

Immediately after posting above, I stumbled on this

http://www.zenyogagurdjieff.blogspot.com.au/2009_05_01_archive.html

which is much mor illuminating and precise than my paltry explanations

---

by Judy

I came across this earlier today. A little gem from Sri Anirvan.

> Once a Nepali boy that Sri Anirvan knew, tasted something new and in delight he exclaimed,"It tastes so sweet." Sri Anirvan took pleasure in his joy, and remembered the words.
>
> The day before he died, Sri Anirvan wrote in "Aditi," the journal he was writing at the time, - (Translated from Original Bengali by Sudipta Munsi)
>
> "A cruel truth is that even the Maheshwar or the Great Lord has to be the bhokta or enjoyer. As on one hand that enjoyment is the poison turning the throat blue, on the other hand it is the ambrosia of Uma's body. There is no way of rejecting either of these. One who is able to enjoy both is verily Maheshwar or the Great Lord.
>
> Maheshwar is verily the true enjoyer, for He alone is the humorist. To him good and bad, pleasure and pain, all " taste so sweet."

> This is verily what is Brahmaswad - the taste of Brahman or tasting by Brahman, whatever you may call it.
>
> The intense heat of May - "It is so sweet." The unbearable intestinal pain - even that "tastes so sweet."
>
> The unuttered mantra of the whole day is this, "It tastes so sweet, it tastes so sweet." "Om Madhu, Om Madhu, Om Madhu."
>
> My self-consciousness is "Madhu" or "Honey" - let it be pleasurable or painful, whatever.
>
> While in the body I am counting out pain like taxes, that too is honey.
>
> One day I will not need to count it out any more - even that is honey.
>
> "Om Madhu, Om Madhu, Om Madhu.
>
> "I am Madhucchanda."
>
> This was the last thing he wrote.

John,
I had a look at the link you posted. Lee is very articulate. His essays are sometimes like what I'll call "talking meditations" in that I almost touch a meditative state by the end of reading one. Stream of consciousness style. Oh, deja vu! Or have I mentioned this before? If so - senior moment. I find Eckhart Tolle brilliant at this too; not his books so much, but his audio talks. He can take one into the present moment beautifully.

In general, I've missed a few days of meditation, though back to it today. The fruits of the more regular practice overflow into an increased ability to enjoy life, even quite tricky situations. A wee glimpse of "It tastes so sweet."

May our hearts be open,
Judy.

---

by Judy

Synchronicity.

The below quote from zenyogagurdjieff says most eloquently exactly what I was recently trying to express when I attempted to post examples of inner work, as I do from time to time. It is from today's essay.

> Only the prisoners who share practical insights and advice with one another about their effort to become free have a chance of escape; And only in so far as they share what they know—not their speculations.
>
> Remember that Gurdjieff said, if you cannot do something or be something, pretend to do it or be it. The effort needs to be there, even if we fail. If we are not compassionate, we can pretend to be compassionate; let others decide if there's a difference. We should make efforts in every area to reach the highest possible standard, whether we understand it or not. And we should never, never, beat ourselves with the whips of judgment over the idea that we are not conscious.
>
> What matters is how conscious we are, not how conscious we aren't.
>
> Consciousness has an inherent wish for some freedom and light and joy; if I make a dank prison for myself and sit around in it, moping because I'm not conscious, why would it want to visit me there?
>
> Perhaps the door isn't even locked.

Examples, even if sometimes difficult to articulate clearly, are still the best way I know of exchanging real help with inner work to each other. And they are a sine qua non for being put back on to the right path too. Even a master cannot help me if I don't at least try to explain what I am doing.
Judy.

---

by Gururaj

Many of us here have become "followers" of LVL (it took me a little while to figure out the acronym when John first used it).
I mean "follow" -ing of the Twitter kind ,meaning to read his blogs on Work.

Yesterday I was inspired by a post of his (which I came across thru' John's link) to completely sense my body in stillness for about 15 minutes and the sway of a strong negative emotion just faded away and a good sleep resulted - without me aiming for any such result.

Sri Anirvan's state seems to indicate a simultaneous existence of a fine vibration (of sweetness)witnessing the shifting experiences of the grosser nature also occuring at the same time.An example of a person with well developed higher bodies even when alive.?

Ah .. G's precepts makes one think like an engineer about all phenomena

---

by Cassandra

People have talked about holidays and special events recently on the forum--tomorrow is Thanksgiving in the U.S. As I was walking through the neighborhood just now in the warm sunshine (68 degrees or so), I noticed the beautiful colors of autumn leaves and neatly kept homes. These times take me back to childhood, remembering meals served and the loving presence of a parent. But it is these rememberings that can be a snag because what is recalled is idealized. Better is to work while noticing the loveliness surrounding me now.

I have been lazy the last couple of weeks, just being motivated to read something from the work. Instead, I have filled my evenings with old movies and melancholy. I feel today that it's time to get back going on the right track. Wish me well!

---

by Harry

You can Work and still notice the lovliness. Work isn't dour. The world can give us inspiration. In hale. In spire. Just don't connect those "memories". Be Here Now.

---

by Judy

The very best wishes to you, of course, Cassandra.
While looking at the loveliness, remember the two-headed arrow. In other words, don't forget to look back at Cassandra while she looks at the scenes. And they may become lovlier and more vivid and perhaps a work memory is formed. And, as Harry says, just be in the moment and don't connect those memories. "I Am Here Now."
You may wish to let us know how it goes?

Judy.

---

by Gururaj

True ThanksGiving is a 3-centred activity ?! A mind which is perceptive about the reality around it sees the fact of who are the benefactors, the heart wells with the emotion of gratitude and the body manifests a suitable action acknowledging this.

ThanksGiving is called for here - towards the creator(Ian) and the "All Quarters Maintainers" of the ES site (the stalwarts Judy and Harry chiefly).

---

by JohnS

True.
Notice how mysterious the Creator is these days - watching from the wings, perhaps, but busy in another cosmos.
Ian, I echo the thanks for keeping the site open - a lifeline for we far-flung entities!

John

---

by Cassandra

I also wish to convey my thanks from this part of the world for the site's continued existence....
Regarding Judy and Harry's suggestions on sharing observations--I had been thinking about what to report back when the flu bug hit my household, so just 48 hours after noticing the beautiful weather and feeling good about my home, I felt 'as sick as a dog.' But the beauty of that experience of sickness is that I noticed a slowing down of thoughts and of course actions. My mind is so often engaged in imagination and amplification, if you will, of realities. But when one is beset with body aches and pains, one's energies tend to concentrate on the most essential of functions. Strangely, in this concentration, judgments, arguments, self-flattery and so on were minimized.

---

by Harry

If the Devil were sick the Devil a saint would be. G.

Work Program week beginning 26 November 2012

---

by JohnS

Sorry for the late post - no internet access today. My work server often blocks this site - perhaps it feels something subversive is going on here....

In suggesting we continue as per the last few fruitful weeks, I was considering what focus to add, what exercise to add or pursue, when I realised that by doing this I was really looking for a 'fill-in' subject - one which, no matter how relevant, was taking me away from this present moment; and, if I was leading myself away from this present moment, then by implied distraction I was inviting all of you to do the same.

So, to stop avoiding the obvious, let's stop avoiding the obvious, which is, obviously, this present moment. The big question is: if it is naturally here, then why do we avoid it?

John

---

by Alistair

We avoid the oment  because it’s easier than working now Working now is hard
Many of my I’s think I work, and sometimes think they work hard but they don’t really make super effort
Tonight just after sunset, sitting under a tree vocalising chakra mantras an inner voice told me that although it was quite cool to strip to the waist again and go through the six asanas again which I did after a little internal procrastination
You can see these postures here;
http://www.space.net.au/~dcmorgan/Tibetans.htm
Now 12 days into the latest tobacco fast that includes a fair amount of physical exercise and chakra work.
A friend here questions the direction which they spin. Do any of have any information. Gnostic teachings say to spin clockwise as the Whirling Dervishes.
Also using vocalised mantra I.E.O.U.A.M.S.
I recall sometime ago there were a number of posts regarding the pronunciation AIEIOUOA; I would now suggest that it’s pronounced in a manner that creates the strongest inner vibration.

---

by JohnS

Perhaps we organically avoid this present moment because, organically, not conceptually, we know that it contains EVERYTHING -something that we fear is just too much to grasp.

John

---

by Harry

We avoid the moment because it is impossible, almost, to be in the moment. That is what Work is about. We are always reliving the past or anticipating the future. Anticipation was a song for a reason. Memories was a song for a reason. Being present is an effort. It requires work. Because our world doesn't live in the present. Except for maybe when you hit a ball. Or maybe drive a car in a blizzard.

---

by Gururaj

Ruminating on my today's actions, I text the following - seeing the truth of it in my life - hopefully not just blindly accepting what our teaching says.

Apart from the specific situations of the mind running riot(past , future, imagination,worry,etc.) , I see in me and the mass of driven humanity around a strong magnetisation, alignment or "sheep" walking thru' and with life.
We flow automatically with the dominant currents of LIFE and even help in contributing to the flow and keeping others in the grip of it.

In this sort of activity, eventhough apparently active and immersed in life, and working for certain objectives moment to moment,I am not fully aware, totally taken by externals.
When the desired outcomes (as per the needs of the Personality from situation to situation) do not materialise , the mind/emotion reactions kick in resulting in another type of unmindful state.

After many cycles and years of this, some homo sapiens (in any case , Gururaj) get to "know" about the Fourth Way.After a lot of "study" all I can do is knowingly say "there goes my life according to the Law of Seven"

Will it help to imagine the "blizzard" Harry and get some intensity , fire , feeling ?

---

by Harry

Life is a Blizzard. We don't have to imagine it. Events come at us just as snow does in a blizzard.
Can we steer our carriage?
Does the horse function if it is on fire?

---

by JohnS

I am fascinated by the real physical resistance that is pulling me constantly away from NOW. I can feel it most when I try to be in the moment, when I can observe it as being like a magnet pulling me off-centre, away from this point. So this must be the natural state: a constant, physical force creating distraction and non-awareness. It feels like trying to defy the force of gravity.
One of the incentives, then, feels like the chance to live under less laws, and the law of gravity is one of the 'heaviest' and most immediate ones we come across at every moment. You can feel the weight of gravity. Those free moments, though, are so brief, its remarkable that we have such a vivid memory of them, and try so constantly to recreate them.
The Unbearable Lightness of Being seems so far away sometimes....

John

---

by Harry

The Law of Gravity can be counter influenced, but not escaped.
Don't feel the weight. Pay attention to the Light.

And go back and watch The Unbearable Lightness of Being. Better yet read the book. Being. Is always out of reach in that work. But it is Being.

---

by Alistair

There is nothing better than a rocky path for keeping the mind focused on the moment and enjoying that fact, feeling your toes and how your muscles and all the other bits are moving There are of course many moments when we are completely absorbed in the moment but we are not remembering ourselves.

---

by Gururaj

Two nights ago saw the whole film The unbearable lightness of Being" available at this link http://vimeo.com/44721262 .

---

by Cassandra

Yes, for me that is the key to life--not just living a life of quiet desperation but being able to experience some of that thing called the kingdom of Heaven, in the present form of existence. The amusement park has appeal for only so long. At some point the roller coaster stops and the fun house closes--then what? I am left with myself. Typical is to 'go home' and wait for the amusement park to reopen, so to speak. But better is to Work, then the park is no longer needed.

Work Program week beginning 3 December 2012

---

by Cassandra

Preparations

As we in the northern hemisphere prepare for the turn back towards the sun and those in the southern anticipate turning away from the sun, let us continue our self-observations with this change in mind.

---

by JohnS

In relation to this changing of the seasons, I read something yesterday which expanded my fixed attitudes a lot, and broadened the horizon of my feelings: it said that the weather is not static (:Tomorrow will be 26 degrees"), but constantly changing, adapting to conditions. Suddenly I could feel the flow in the outside world, instead of looking and expecting and feeling by association only a rigid maximum / minimum temperature which was programmed into me by the weather report.
Similarly the constantly changing impressions I experience are an adaptation of these same ever-evolving conditions, and if I am not aware enough of them, I miss them completely, as well as the sense and the messages they bring.

John

---

by Harry

How much do we consider the placing of the Holidays to this season. The shortest days of the year? The least sunlight. Is it just coincidence that this is our biggest party season. That the Romans placed Saturnalia at this time of the year. Six days when laws didn't apply?

But of course laws do apply.

So what note are we sounding with our celebrations and our New Year's Eve and even things like Trick or Treat? If we did not sound these notes, would there be a difference?

Some of you live in different cultures. Are there similar holidays that you know of in those cultures that correspond to times of year. Easter is the dawning of a new cycle. A rebirth. And Christ was the fishes. But he is born well before that sign by this tradition. Which, of course, is certainly a doctrine that has been set up.

What have our ancestors left us in Kris Kringle and the like?

---

by Alistair

As usual there is a fairly comprehensive offering from gnosticteachings.org entitled Gnostic Nativity of Christ

http://gnosticteachings.org/courses/path-of-the-bodhisattva/516-gnostic-nativity-of-christ.html

---

by Cassandra

I've often thought that the lights and merriment associated with Christmas is there to counter balance the dreariness of short, cold days. My husband mentioned some time ago that the approaching turning of the sun to a different direction brings with it a caution or precariousness--people in ancient cultures thought they should be especially careful at this time of year because "things" change. Life is more sensitive because of this turning and that great things or maybe not so great things could happen.

But who do I know that lives that 'close' to the earth that one would be so affected? No one. If I'm cold, I put on a coat or turn up the heat and so on. And the holiday sales events take my mind away from noticing anything really real that's associated with the changing seasons.

Still, I want to believe that attempts that I make to be present, to ask for clarity and guidance will be heard precisely because the 'angels are bending nearer to earth' at this time to help those of us seeking the Christ child or that rebirth.

So, I will continue to seek the quiet and hopefully not grow impatient when there seems to be no answer.

---

by JohnS

Only for the times when I lived in Europe did I ever feel the festivities were in their right place. Australia has mimicked the holiday times of year, but the seasons are out of step: Easter is supposed to celebrate the spring equinox, but here we are headed into winter. Similarly, the winter solstice is the shortest day of the year, but we celebrate Christmas in the height of summer - totally meaningless. An even more bizarre custom is celebrating Christmas in July in the mountains where I live, just because there's a possibility of snow.
Never did I regret the dark, cold days of winter in Europe, because the long memory of tradition could be felt behind them..

John

---

by Harry

John and Judy, what does Australia do for summer solstice?

---

by Gururaj

In my part of the planet and in Hindu tradition , the 6 month period after the winter solstice is the "day" part and the next 6 months are the "night" part
- of one day for the Gods.(So one year for earthlings is one day for the gods).

The "day" time is considered auspicious for new beginnings . Even for departing souls , death in this period is considered to be beneficial for their evolution.

But , as Cassandra says, in these days with their constant and unvarying routine throughout the year, (and the nature-insulated existence) one's life pattern hardly varies with the seasons - more so at the lesser latitudes like Southern India. The more dependant people become on processed foods , even the diets remain the same.
Having a farming hobby ,however , I still get to be ocassionally with nature in a rural environment.

As the next roster gets underway a few days from now, any suggestions for different and new preparations here ?

---

by Cassandra

As John notes, the aura of Christmas only makes sense in the Northern hemisphere. This makes me wonder what type of rituals the Australian aborigines have had when the sun turns? Seems like much could be learned from them (if they have been able to retain remnants of truth) by someone not indigenous to that part of the world. I could learn much from Native Americans.

Gururaj, that is interesting that the year is divided into day and night. As for preparations for the coming year, I wonder if Ian made a decision about opening the forum to new members. Judy was checking on that.

---

by Judy

Christmas - peace on earth, good will to men.
Some say that "good will to men" means that it is a time when God's Will is available to man. That the angels brought not only the message, but also the possibility.

Sure, externally, things are different. As Gururaj points out, for those up north, it is the equivalent of the gods' sunrise; for us in the antipodes, it is the sunset of their day. Is sunrise any more special than sunset? They are different, but overall, I think not. And the weather conditions are opposite, though the effect here is that we don't spend all that much time outside either - it is too hot! So the effects of the two weather extremes are similar; in that you turn up the heating inside and we turn the cooling up. Not much difference really. There are many festivities and carrolling and gift-giving and getting together; the same better-avoided manic shopping atmospheres and commercialism. I do see John's point about "not the same aura of Christmas as Europe", having recently experienced the true wonder of a little part of England, but Australia has its own aura of eucalypt Christmas trees and barbeques and daily surf and sand and swimming, and none of this is to be compared with the real Christmas spirit of seeing family and friends and having spare places at the table for those alone at this time, and all other expressions of good will which are seen at this special time.

Christmas for me is about the celebration of the birth of the Christ-child, both externally and interiorly. It is something much bigger than hemispheres, literally. Bigger even than global - Universal. I use Christian terms, as I know them best. But this Summer Solstice is all-inclusive of Traditions everywhere. May we all bless and be blessed during this Advent time.

Love to all.

---

by Judy

Oh, Cassandra, yes the site has been open to new members for a short while. Ian messaged me about one enquiry and potential new person just this week. It may happen any day now.
Best,
Judy.

Postscript to the post above:
I arrived in England late on a clear night. It was a different wonderland, yet it still felt the same. So much so, that when we arrived home at Crowborough, and I looked up at the sky - as one does when in a new place - I just expected the stars to look the same, which of course they didn't. Felt the onrush of one of those involuntary third states of consciousness. Another 'never to be forgotten' moment.
J.

---

by JohnS

I think the dichotomy for me is that the birth of the Christ-child is symbolically tied to the winter solstice, so here we should be celebrating that at the appropriate time of year, and the same for Easter. We are socially tied to celebrations that are legitimate in the North (in essence), but opposite at the same time in the South. This is what makes it empty for me.
I actually don''t know the history of aboriginal season celebrations:; I'll look it up.

John

---

by Harry

I don't know how many were raised in a tradition like the Roman Catholic Church, but there were fasting periods for each of the seasonal changes. Advent and Lent were, of course, the big ones. And appropriately. The shortest time of the year in the northern hemisphere for Christmas, and the turn of the world back toward the Sun for Advent. Easter actually being calculated by a phase of the moon. But fasting occurred during Summer and Fall changes as well. And if you think of the weekly fasting, every Friday, then that may well have been a shock point in the weekly cycle of 7.

There is a lot of research out there to be found on ancient traditions that tie most cultures and religions together.

The diurnial period seems most tied to Hindu beliefs. Light and Dark. Inhale and Exhale. Daily and annually.

I have been thinking about this "practice" we've been doing. I think we need work exercises. But I'm not sure that we need to be changing things quite so much. We have been in a discussion period for a while and the core members are certainly participating. Why not make a dedication to continuing an exchange and then incorporating exercises as we go along without this continual cycle. I believe that we have studied most of the major exercises that have been given in a number of the G traditions.

For example, with a new G book being published (hesitant until I see it) why don't we all get a copy upon publication and do a chapter a week in this discussion area? (As I said, I am hesitant about this, because I'm not sure that G ever taught a Fourth Way).

If we look at both G and O and their meetings, there was a time for "teaching" but then also a time for questioning. And suggestions that were directed toward individuals and groups of the workers.

There are things that I've suggested over the years. I used to bring up G's suggested fast on a regular basis, but found little response. Understand. It is radical. But it came from G. Vegan for Lent? Or at least no cholesterol.

---

by Gururaj

Is this the new book being referred to ?
http://www.shambhala.com/in-search-of-being.html

Its an option we can try - joint journey thru' the book , but accompanied by a related task , so that it does'nt remain an intellectual exercise.
If every one agrees, we can start with the ordering process.

Regarding having tried all methods of the 4th Way (By the way, I have read some material attributed to G specifically describing his precepts as a 4th way

- the way of the sly man - contrasting it with the other Ways) - for me , the experience with Gurdjieff/Hartmann music and Movements have been very limited.
Of course, Harry may be mentioning in the context of an On-line group.

Would like to sign off this post with a poem by a Sufi saint of the 18th century - Bulleh Shah - whos life and times and a few poems I read with great interest lately.

One thread, one thread only!
Warp and woof, quill and shuttle, countless cloths and colors,

a thousand hanks and skeins -- with ten thousand names
ten thousand places.

But there is one thread only.

---

by Cassandra

Regarding the need for work exercises, I've noticed, too, that it's easier for me to opine about something than to remember myself when walking through doorways. I would very much like to read this book or any other one as a group and do the exercises. Thanks for the mention, Harry. And Gururaj thanks for the poem.

---

by Judy

Harry wrote:

> Why not make a dedication to continuing an exchange and then incorporating exercises as we go along without this continual cycle. I believe that we have studied most of the major exercises that have been given in a number of the G traditions.

Sounds good to me, Harry. Would you be interested in facilitating this? I'm happy to go along with this, plus the idea of a chapter each month of a selected book. I too have reservations about doing this with the new one suggested until having a look. My copy will arrive by the end of January. Meantime, we could look at something else ,if you wish. I recently started "Views" again and am finding it great. It is a much-overlooked primary resource, in my opinion. Or a volume of Nicoll? Or "Gurdjieff Unveiled"?
I'm also interested in considering the Lenten fast you have spoken of several times. I'll consider it with some care. As Herbert Spencer reminds us:

“There is a principle which is a bar against all information, which is proof against all arguments and which cannot fail to keep a man in everlasting ignorance—that principle is contempt prior to investigation.” And I like to remember that slight contempt often masquerades as indifference for me, which can lead me to think I a being open-minded about something, when it isn't necessarily so....
So yes, I'd like to attempt this.

What does everyone else think? How about you, John and Alistair?

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Harry

I have ordered the new book. Supposed to be released in the States on January 8th, per Amazon.

Views from the Real World we could discuss that until everyone can get another book. Personally I find much of the material repetitive of other sources, but it was certainly an inspiration when I first received it. Like some of the other works everything stopped just short of revelation of real details.

We never finished Beelzebub, which is mandatory for everyone. If everyone has read it at least once, we could move to Meetings with Remarkable Men in this private section. There is some real detail to deal with there. Life is Real Only Then When I Am should certainly be reserved until we are certain that everyone has read the first two books.

I am. I wish. I can.

---

by JohnS

I am certainly in agreement with the book readings, though I am somewhat concerned that the possible reasons for not finishing the All and Everything thread could carry over into the examination of new books. Personally, with the Beelzebub thread I felt it really needed a third force from a new member - not that the current inputs were lacking, but the 'interval' at which we had halted needed to be forced from without, in order to wake up the established order within. Perhaps it was just me who was stuck, but I don't think so. I believe another reason for the halt was that at least I myself could not see much allegory in the last few chapters studied, and could, on the whole, only manage to take them literally. I think I was at the stage of forcing myself to find alternative meanings - not a good sign.
Then again, a new book is a new octave - let's do it!

John

by Gururaj

BT also can be completed.
We are so near - the end , that is.

I intend to post about Ch 45 shortly.

---

by Judy

I'd like to put in another BT effort as well. It would be such a pity not to complete this run through, when so much good work by so many have gone into it. I'll commit to devoting January to this task.
Very good idea indeed, Gururaj.
John, I know exactly what you mean about struggling to find allegory. I found the same thing. Perhaps it is time for me to relax and just follow Mr G's instructions - again.

---

by Alistair

Dear Fellow Seekers,

As we approach the end of another calendar year, thank you for all the effort made this year and the current proposals to move the group forward.
With regard to the analysis of a book or other books I am not convinced this is a wise decision. We already have the five books of Mr. Gurdjieff to analyse that in theory provide a lifetime of work, and perhaps more.

In anticipation, one might argue that another's perspective on these five books adds to the effort to release us all from jail, maybe. I would be more convinced by that argument if the generator of that material or author, was an active participant in the group discussion.

As far as any commentaries or analysis of Mr. Gurdjieff's work I am also less than convinced of their value. As an example of this return to the group analysis of Beelzebub's Tales Chapter 39, The Holy Planet Purgatory, further personal investigation into what Mr. Gurdjieff refers to as our greatest vice on earth, or elsewhere in the great cosmos, the most sacred of divine sacraments revealed that none of the recognised Gurdjieff commentators or analysts have made any attempt to shed light on these references. The-most-sacred-of-divine-sacraments-in-the-universe; is it symptomatic of our tragic debility that we pass this by as though it were meaningless?

So it was therefore pleasing to see today that there is a will within the group to complete our own analysis of the remaining chapters of Beelzebub's Tales and then presumably to proceed to Meetings with Remarkable Men.

With regard to weekly exercises we have an archive that dates back to year 2004, surely this is the treasure trove in our hands created by us right under our noses. There must be many exercises of great value for us to repeat without us reinventing the wheel. We would all probably learn much from searching through the archive.

---

by Harry

I believe that much of the value of BT is in the personal intellectual and emotional interaction with the books. There are many comments that can be made, but some should never be made aloud. Like speaking the holiest of names.

---

by Alistair

Harry, with respect, then surely the objective position is to either talk about the entirety or not talk about it at all?
Any lines or limits will always vary from one person to another and it is most certainly the ego that draws the lines and disunites

---

by Alistair

Whether or not Mr.Gurdjieff teaches Sahaja Maithuna or ‘sexual magic’ and if so how this message is hidden interests me because of my great appreciation for Mr.Gurdjieff’s teaching; while I also greatly value the teaching of Samael Aun Weor who openly teaches Sahaja Maithuna.

The importance is this; on planet earth, unquestionably, sex is our greatest vice, the stage for our greatest debility, deformity and loss of energy. Anything that might possibly interrupt that devolving path must be a benefit to humanity on this planet and potentially beyond.

It would be disappointing if the teaching of Mr. Gurdjieff acknowledges a major problem but fails to provide a remedy.

If one perceives this subject cannot be discussed publicly then surely within private study groups these subjects can be discussed. The sincerity and openness of group discussion is spoken about by Mr. Gurdjieff in his Fifth Talk in ‘Life is real only then when “I am”’.

Meditation, transmutation of sexual energy and sacrifice for others, the basis of Mr. Weor’s teaching appears simple although the effort required to make progress similar to the teaching of Mr. Gurdjieff is onerous and severe.

---

by Gururaj

Certainly , it would be a useful and necessary indeed to harness the waves of sex instead of being tossed about and even wrecked by them.

Small beginnings,simpler victories would first be needed ,though.

There was this e-file I had come across on the ocean of the 'net detailing some past seeker's notes of meetings with Gurdjieff .

There were in it a few Q & A s related to sex and , in response to Alistair's post above am copying them here. Thus spake Gurdjieff on sex -

Extracts from notes of Meetings at 6 rue des Colonels-Renard, Paris (Gurdjieff's Paris apartment) 1938with Mme de Salzmann assisting

Questioner:
Why does the major part of human suffering revolve around love and things of sex?
Gurdjieff:
Why this question? It does not concern you personally. Ask it in another way.

Questioner:
Why are the major part of the associations, which interfere with the work, sexual associations?
Gurdjieff:
This question is subjective. It is not so for all men. It is an abnormality which is a result of infantile masturbation. But what is the connection between this and suffering? There is no trace of suffering here. Each man has in him three excrements which elaborate themselves and which must be rejected. The first is the result of ordinary nourishment and eliminates itself naturally, and this must be each day, otherwise there follow all sorts of illnesses. (The physician knows this well.) For the same reason that you go to the bathroom for this maintenance, you must go to the bathroom for the second excrement which is rejected from you by the sexual function. It is necessary for health and the equilibrium of the body; and certainly it is necessary in some to do it each day, in others each week, in others again every month or every six months. It is subjective. For this you must choose a proper bathroom. 🤓 (In Russian do Bedroom and Bathroom have the same word ?Italics & smilie are mine) One that is good for you. A third excrement is formed in the head—it is rubbish of the food impressions, and the wastes accumulate in the brain. (The physician ignores it, just as he ignores the important role of the appendix in digestion, and rejects it as wastes.)
It is not necessary to mingle the acts of sex with sentiment. It is sometimes abnormal to make them coincide. The sexual act is a function. One can regard it as external to him, although love is internal.
Love is love. It has no need of sex. It can be felt for a person of the same sex, for an animal even, and the sexual function is not mixed up there. Sometimes it is normal to unite them, this corresponds to one of the aspects of love. It is easier to love this way. But at the same time it is then difficult to remain impartial as love demands. Likewise if one considers the sexual function as necessary medically, why would one love a remedy, a medicine? The sexual act originally must have been performed only for the purpose of reproduction of the species, but little by little men have made of it a means of pleasure. It must have been a sacred act. One must know that this divine seed, the Sperm, has another function, that of the construction of a second body in us, from whence the sentence, Happy he who understands the function of the exioehary for the transformation of his being. Unhappy he who uses them in a unilateral manner.

Questioner:
Why do religions forbid the sexual act?
Gurdjieff:
Because originally we knew the use of this substance, whence the chasteness of the monks. Now we have forgotten this knowledge and there only remains the prohibition which attracts to the monks quantities of specific disorders and illnesses. Look at the priests where they grow "fat like pigs" (the concern about eating dominating them), or they are "skinny as the devil" (and they have inside little love for their neighbour); the fat are less dangerous and certainly more gentle.

Questioner:
Sir, I'd like to ask another question. I don't understand what conscious love can be. I don't understand why the lucidity with which one examines one's passion and discloses its causes does not at once kill it.
Gurdjieff:
Well then, say that love only interests the functions. It is only physical polarity that is working. When you have thought that,love will become repugnant to you. The love that everybody has, you have. But conscious love, that is real love. You have only love based on sex; it is a sickness, a weakness. You cannot have love. That which perhaps your grandfather had. Today, for everyone, love is based on sex and sex on polarity. So if a person has a nose like this you love her; if she hadn't a nose like that, you don't love her. Real love is objective; but in Paris objective love doesn't exist. You have made the word sentiment for sex, for dirty things; you have forgotten real love.
Questioner:
But must one seek to repress it for the sake of the other?
Gurdjieff:
Regard it as a weakness and put it aside. And at the same time, use it for looking at yourself. Profit from everything. And from instinct you will perhaps be able to feel real love. The taste will perhaps come to you. Once you have pity for a person whose nose you don't like, or for another who seems ill, for a child without a mother, for a person who is hungry, for a man without a wife—then,for each person, you will be able to enter his situation. Have contact with your different impulses; and if you remain impartial, you will see that everything you have had in you until now is merde, and at the same time you will be able to try to have the taste of another quality of love. And if the taste of it comes to you, I can explain the details to you.
Questioner:
Sir, in order to experience this conscious love, can polarity be a help or a hindrance?
Gurdjieff:
A hindrance, naturally. But you can't do anything about it. You are a slave of this law. Wish or not wish. Your body makes you love or not love. Consciously, you can be no longer the slave of your polarity. But first you must have the taste. All I can say in the meantime is that love exists, objective love. But you must have the taste of it. Afterward we will speak about it.

All that we can say beforehand would remain theoretical. About this, the First Series explains many things. Concerning the commandments of Ashiata Shiemash there is this:

Love of consciousness evokes the same in response.Love of feeling evokes the opposite.
Love of body depends only on type and polarity.
And there is also this about hope:
Hope of consciousness is strength.Hope of feeling is slavery.Hope of the body is disease.
And about faith:
Faith of consciousness is freedom.Faith of feeling is weakness.Faith of the body is stupidity.

Questioner:
Mr. Gurdjieff, this sex function is a function? It is not something one must reduce and flatten as much as possible?
Gurdjieff:
We are not speaking of the functions which are parts of us, but of dogs, that is, of weaknesses around our functions. Functions are the villages—one cannot change them. As to dogs, yes, one must change their breed.

Questioner:
I suppose there are more dogs in a weaker village. Is it so?
Gurdjieff:
Perhaps the village becomes weak because it has many dogs to weaken it. Each dog has a name in those villages. I know all their names. [Mr. Gurdjieff jokes about the dogs' names.]

---

by Alistair

Great synchronisities today, this morning found myself pondering 'Hope of consciousness is strength' mentioned in the previous post
Also two of the prayers mentioned in this weeks exercise subject have been a major focus for the last few days, Pater Noster & Ave Maria. Hope to post something in the next few days.....

Gururaj, thank you for the research. Is the most significant comment
' Happy he who understands the function of the exioehary for the transformation of his being.
Unhappy he who uses them in a unilateral manner'

---

by JohnS

Also coincidentally, I have just met another follower in my village, and one of his main focus' (if I may speak for him) is the transformation of sex energy to form the second body.

And on the same subject, a woman whose 'shape of the nose' I have always liked, became something other than a law of polarity last week when my daily prayer for her changed spontaneously to 'I am her angel' - not a self-aggrandizing shift at all, but a protective one, and hopefully a small step upwards on the scale.

John

Work Program week beginning 10 December 2012

---

by Gururaj

In Views From The Real World, section 2, Ch.8, there is a discussion of our organism having parts similar to a vehicle carrying someone (who are usually casual passengers - multiple 'i' s - instead of a Master) giving directions to a Driver who using Reins controls (or tries to control) the Horse for going to a particular destination.

I would like to invite all of us to , moment -to-moment - see how actually is our organism operating .What in us corresponds to each of the parts of the analogy.
What in us are the connecting links - between the passenger/master and the driver , between the driver and the horse and between the vehicle and the horse.

An inspiring comment from M Nicoll's Commentaries, which, for me, acts as a ballast to get the efforts going -- "It is very necessary to see and to observe the lying 'I's.... You need not take their inner talking as truth ... and this reality is magic. You shake yourself as it were, like a dog coming out of water, and get rid of the whole thing instantly.

---

by Harry

The horse carriage and driver is one of G's most important stories. And comes directly from the Sufi tradition.

We don't have a real driver. Just a hired man. And he can only communicate the most elementary rules to the horse. And he isn't always in concert with the passenger.

An interesting personal tale: My step-grandfather was a farmer. After a days work in the fields, which included sunset milkings, he would set off to market with that day's harvest. This was no mean journey. It's a good twenty to twenty five minutes in a modern car on modern roads. He would then sell that days harvest and head home. His journey home was his nap. He started the horse and the horse took him home.

How often do we start our emotions and have them take us where we want to go?

---

by Judy

Harry, most interesting story and the last line of your post is an absolute gem! Thanks.

How often, indeed. I reluctantly have to say that it happens a lot more for me than I would wish, though, as your story shows, it has its place. And if it isn't the emotions, it can be the senses; even to the simple example of too much coffee-swirl icecream. Still indirectly though, its the emotions, which this time are seduced by the senses, quite inappropriately, when there is no sense of hunger present whatsoever.

How often does 'doing the next right thing' mean going against desires? Yet in that are the real rewards. And in that is the evolution.

Just yesterday, I read - "Any kind of life which is making no effort to evolve, is escapism." (Sangarakshita)

And from Lee yesterday was an essay relevant to this week's task...

> Gurdjieff's ideas are, on the whole, meant to try and raise the intellectual octave to the degree of objectivity. His movements are meant to try and raise the physical octave to the degree of objectivity; and his inner exercises — most of which are not recorded for review by the general public — are meant to try and raise the emotional octave to the degree of objectivity. By working on all three of these pieces of territory at the same time, the chances of the centers supporting one another is much greater.
>
> I believe it's important to understand this so that one sees that the system has a deep integrity and structure to it. The overall context and the exact aim can be clearly stated in this manner. It eliminates much of the vague and insubstantial commentary on how the system works, why we have three minds, and where the failing of their relationship lies. The situation is specific; it requires specific explanations

Of course, many of us have our yoga or alternate form of exercise to the movements, but you get the picture.

I notice, especially during this very hot season here where I live, that extra effort is invariably required for the usual business of living. It isn't helped by the ageing process either. This morning it occurred to me that, without the meaning which I get from the Work, it would indeed be very much more difficult. How blessed we are to have made contact with this system.

Judy.

---

by Judy

From the ebook: Early Talks Section II, section 8 - a part thereof:

> It is easy to decide to change sitting quietly in your room.

But as soon as you meet someone, the horse kicks. Inside us we have a horse.

The horse must change.

If anyone thinks that self-study will help and he will be able to change, he is greatly mistaken. Even if he reads all the books, studies for a hundred years, masters all knowledge, all mysteries—nothing will come of it.

Because all this knowledge will belong to the driver. And he, even if he knows, cannot drag the cart without the horse—it is too heavy.

First of all you must realize that you are not you. Be sure of that, believe me. You are the horse, and if you wish to start working, the horse must be taught a language in which you can talk to it, tell it what you know and prove to it the necessity of, say, changing its disposition. If you succeed in this, then, with your help, the horse too will begin to learn.
But change is possible only inside.

As to the cart, its existence was completely forgotten. Yet it is also a part, and an important part, of the team. It has its own life, which is the basis of our life. It has its own psychology. It also thinks, is hungry, has desires, takes part in the common work. It too should have been educated, sent to school, but neither the parents nor anyone else cared. Only the driver was taught. He knows languages, knows where such and such a street is. But he cannot drive there alone.

Originally our cart was built for an ordinary town; all the mechanical parts were designed to suit the road. The cart has many small wheels. The idea was that the unevennesses of the road would distribute the lubricating oil evenly and thus oil them. But all this was calculated for a certain town where the roads are not too smooth. Now the town has changed, but the make of the cart has remained the same. It was made to cart luggage, but now it carries passengers. And it always drives along one and the same street, the "Broadway." Some parts got rusty from long disuse. If, at times, it needs to drive along a different street, it seldom escapes a breakdown and a more or less serious overhaul afterwards. Badly or well, it can still work on the "Broadway," but for another street it must first be > altered.

>
> Every cart has its own momentum, but in certain senses our cart has lost it. And it cannot work without momentum. Moreover the horse can pull, say, only fifty kilos, whereas the cart can take a hundred kilos. So even if they wish to, they cannot work together.
>
> Some machines are so damaged that nothing can be done with them. They can only be sold. Others can still be mended. But this requires a long time, for some of the parts are too damaged. The machine has to be taken to pieces, all the metal parts have to be put in oil, cleaned and then put together again. Some of them will have to be replaced. Certain parts are cheap and can be bought, but others are expensive and cannot be replaced—the cost would be too high. Sometimes it is cheaper to buy a new car than to repair an old one.
>
> Quite possibly all those who sit here wish and can wish only with one part of themselves. Again it is only with the driver, for he has read something, heard something. He has many fantasies, he even flies to the moon in his dreams.
>
> Those who think that they can do something with themselves are greatly mistaken. To change something within is very difficult. What you know, it is the driver who knows it. All your knowledge is just manipulations. Real change is a very difficult thing, more difficult than finding several hundred thousand dollars in the street.

---

by Judy

Harry wrote:

> How often do we start our emotions and have them take us where we want to go?

Oh, I've just spotted the other side of the coin that I looked at earlier - the proper one perhaps! The carriage is just too heavy for the driver to pull by himself... Of course, use the horse.

Apologies if earlier post a little confusing. Every stick has two ends.

---

by Gururaj

More often it is "... we start our emotions and have them take us where we (later) regret having gone".

Also ,some actions in the present are motivated by the memory of past emotions.

Many other actions seem to be driven by one's will .Behind the will is there an emotion -before and during also - while performing the actions, which aids or retards the movement?

What about habitual behaviour (in us as in the horse of Harry's anecdote).Is a "being comfortable" sort of emotion behind them ,even when we are doing tough tasks which we somehow like to do ?

Taking the example of this itself - as I struggle to make this post - One 'I' wishes to make a coherent post ,others intervene diverting the attention away from the task on hand, the body shows some resistance due to it being beyond my bed-time, but yet it also co-operates to some extent. The driver in this endeavour appears to be an entity which has learnt the language, has the knowledge of using the tools and methods of making a post. What is the 'horse ' element here? My motivation, the inclination in me to do this activity? Could be.

And you know what - I actually should have been attending to another task whose deadline is overdue. 😟 So the horse is running the show here, afterall. 😈

---

by Cassandra

This topic applies so directly to an experience I had three days back when someone said something to me that I resented to the nth degree. I became very angry (inside, did not show outside very much) that this person would pass such judgement on me. I don't often get angry. I did tell a friend about this, but I realize that's just making a case, building witnesses, if you will for my side of things. It matters not really if I was wrongly or rightly accused.

Still, I want to get on that horse and let it buck all across the countryside--self justification, anger, and so on. HOWEVER, I had just read in Nicole's Commentaries about impressions and the level at which they come in (Hydrogen 48). This is passive. What is needed to complete the triad or for the reconciling to enter is to have Hydrogen 12 come in to bring the whole thing up to Hydrogen 24--to have the middle actualized.

---

by Harry

As someone who used to anger, there is something I learned. What good does it do to get angry at a machine? Nicole has the lovely statement: "Poor me, it is raining on MY birthday party." It is clear that the anger is mine and I must disown it. A learned small eye that other machine know how to turn on.

Work Program week beginning 17 December 2012

---

by Harry

Is there a legominism in prayers?

Take a look at the three traditional Catholic prayers. Or those of another religion that you might now. What is the legominism in The Our Father, The Hail Mary, and The Glory Be. You could also add to that the structure of the recitation of the rosary.

If you have your own examples please add them.

---

by Judy

Gosh, Harry - quite a task.
As the saying goes about how to eat an elephant, with the answer being "a bite at a time", I'll post a couple of definitions as a starter.

> "My dear and beloved Grandfather, tell me, please, what does the word Legominism mean?" Hassein asked. BTG XXV
>
> "This word Legominism", replied Beelzebub, "is given to one of the means existing there of transmitting from generation to generation information about certain events of long-past ages, through just those three-brained beings who are thought worthy to be and who are called initiates. BTG XXV
>
> "This means of transmitting information from generation to generation had been devised by the beings of the continent Atlantis. For your better understanding of the said means of transmitting information to beings of succeeding generations by means of a Legominism, I must here explain to you a little also about those beings there whom other beings called and call initiates. BTG XXV
>
> "Well then, my boy, Legominism is the name given to the successive transmission of information about long-past events which have occurred on the planet Earth from initiates to initiates of the first kind, that is from really meritorious beings, who have themselves received their information from similar meritorious beings. BTG XXV and, from Llewellyn Dictionary:

Term: Legominism
DEFINITIONS
Legominism: In occult traditions, a method by which wisdom traditions are transmitted in a form that appears to be intended for an entirely different purpose; the Atlantean legend in the 19th and 20th century occultism is a classic legominism.

All good grist for the mill. Easily noticed are some implied differences in meaning between the quotes.
Any particular aspect in mind, Harry? Big subject. Would you be so kind as to share an example, please?
Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by JohnS

I recall Ouspensky and Bennet interpreting legominisms in the Our Father, which opened up the prayer a lot for me. The most obvious are that it is divided throughout into groups of three (1 Our Father 2 Who art in Heaven 3 Hallowed be thy Name...etc). Also the structure is two trios of preparations before the third group, which is the first request (Give us this day our daily bread), which comes with two near-impossible (for ordinary man) conditions attached. I think also that it was Ouspensky (perhaps Nicoll) who noted that 'daily' was a mistranslation, and that literally it should be 'supersubstantial bread'.
I wish I had the sources handy, as there was much more detail than this, especially regarding interpretation - perhaps someone can elaborate further?

John

---

by Harry

Our Father who art in Heaven. . .Dear Higher Intellectual center.
Hail Mary full of grace. . .Dear Emotional Center that has been purified Glory Be to the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. . .Law of Three

---

by Alistair

Found this among my 'work' files, have a feeling it was posted on this site earlier this year, by who?

The Lord's Prayer
In the Original Galilean Aramaic Language that Jesus Spoke

O Cosmic Birther, from whom the breath of life comes.
Who fills all realms of sound, light and vibration.

May Your light be experienced in my utmost holies.
Your Heavenly Domain approaches.

Let Your will come true in the universe as on Earth.
Give us wisdom understanding sufficient to our daily need.

Detach the fetters of faults that bind us,
As we let go the guilt of others.

Let us not be lost in superficial things.
But let us be freed from that which keeps us from our true purpose.

From You comes the all-working will, the lively strength to act.
The song that beautifies all, and renews itself from age to age.

Sealed in trust, faith and truth, I confirm my entire being.

---

by Cassandra

The 23rd Psalm comes to mind:

The Lord is my Shepherd,
I shall not want (what is there to be desired other than the realization of god within)
He (this higher self) makes me lie down in green pastures (real I herds in little I's)
He leads me beside still waters
He restores my soul
Yea though I walk through the shadow of the valley of death
I will fear no evil for thou art with me
Thy rod and thy staff comfort me
Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies (not al-qaeda but the many I's within)
Thou anointest my head with oil
My cup runneth over
Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life
And I will dwell in the house of the Lord forever--Amen

---

by Alistair

A little bit off topic but just read this piece and if you haven't already herad this story you'll probably enjoy it

A devoted meditator, after years concentrating on a particular mantra, had attained enough insight to begin teaching. The student's humility was far from perfect, but the teachers at the monastery were not worried.

A few years of successful teaching left the meditator with no thoughts about learning from anyone; but upon hearing about a famous hermit living nearby, the opportunity was too exciting to be passed up.

The hermit lived alone on an island at the middle of a lake, so the meditator hired a man with a boat to row across to the island. The meditator was very respectful of the old hermit. As they shared some tea made with herbs the meditator asked him about his spiritual practice. The old man said he had no spiritual practice, except for a mantra which he repeated all the time to himself. The meditator was pleased: the hermit was using the same mantra he used himself -- but when the hermit spoke the mantra aloud, the meditator was horrified!

"What's wrong?" asked the hermit.

"I don't know what to say. I'm afraid you've wasted your whole life! You are pronouncing the mantra incorrectly!"

"Oh, Dear! That is terrible. How should I say it?"

The meditator gave the correct pronunciation, and the old hermit was very grateful, asking to be left alone so he could get started right away. On the way back across the lake the meditator, now confirmed as an accomplished teacher, was pondering the sad fate of the hermit.

"It's so fortunate that I came along. At least he will have a little time to practice correctly before he dies." Just then, the meditator noticed that the boatman was looking quite shocked, and turned to see the hermit standing respectfully on the water, next to the boat.

"Excuse me, please. I hate to bother you, but I've forgotten the correct pronunciation again. Would you please repeat it for me?"

"You obviously don't need it," stammered the meditator; but the old man persisted in his polite request until the meditator relented and told him again the way he thought the mantra should be pronounced.

The old hermit was saying the mantra very carefully, slowly, over and over, as he walked across the surface of the water back to the island.

---

by Gururaj

The first few times I recited the "Klim Krishnaya ..." mantra there was a new me, there was devotion ...and there was some magic.
Now when I say it --- no such thing. So more than what is recited , who is praying ,and how - that matters.

Very evocative story, Alistair.

Regarding legominisms - except for a need for secrecy when there is persecution around or to preserve something for posterity (like the sphinx) thru' eternal long-lasting symbols, why would anyone like to make information difficult to get ?

It may be more likely that the truth is staring us in the face but one is not evolved enough to 'get' it.

It may also be that an esoteric message is deliberately packaged in a 'popular' format to ensure it's longevity over generations to come.

But if a key like the 4th Way is needed to unlock the message, how could the encrypters of antiquity be sure that such a (seperate) key would become available ?

So it seems more likely to me that the means to bring about the shift in being , to thereby make the hidden truths apparent, are also part of the 'popular' vehicle.

---

by JohnS

"But if a key like the 4th Way is needed to unlock the message, how could the encrypters of antiquity be sure that such a (seperate) key would become available ?

So it seems more likely to me that the means to bring about the shift in being , to thereby make the hidden truths apparent, are also part of the 'popular' vehicle."

It seems there has always been a key, somewhere, all saying the same thing in different language: Buddha, Egypt,Persia, Babylon, Pythagoras, Plato,Christ, Islam, Sufism,cathedrals, templars, troubadors, freemasons, fairy tales, Rosicrucianism, Neoplatonism, alchemy, music, art, Gurdjieff....G says the line has never been broken, as direct links remain.
I have several books on alchemy, and if you think 4th way language is difficult, then try alchemy! Almost everything is symbolic, and seems to use the emotional centre to convey truths, as did the hieroglyphic language (Egypt had two languages: practical and esoteric). There is plenty of intellectual meat in it, but you can't get to it through ordinary logic. The same applies with the Enneagram (whichG. said was also ancient)

And of course you're right about the popular vehicle: laws of music, literature and art have a popular meaning and an esoteric meaning, and I suppose its hard to think how the esoteric "C" influences survive when diluted so much into "B", but....this little group, for example, is still trying to separate the chaff from the grain, so perhaps the 'momentum' of an "A-launch"' was able to be calculated (G: everything can be calculated) - its just hard for we ordinary mortals to conceive of such foresight, but to me believing in such levels of knowledge doesn't seem incredulous, after the intricately-planned scenarios we have been privileged to partake in.

And, Alistair, that version of your prayer is stunning.

John

---

by Harry

Keys?

They must be learned. That is one of the reasons we are all here. To pass on the keys we have learned. I remember being in Modern Lit class. And there was a novel to read every week. And in each of those novels a major character died at the age of 33. As a young college student this seemed like punching us in the face with symbolism. But no one discusses this. What is a Christ symbol? And what is the symbol Christ lived? And how does that get translated into Of Mice and Men or The Sound and The Fury?

Millions of people have seen the film I mentioned last week, Joe Versus the Volcano. To most of them it is just a dumb comedy. Or the one that was less known. Lord Love a Duck, created by a Hollywood Director who made a habit of including messages in his otherwise fluffy films. (There is a line in the closing credits of this one that says "Find a school, you only have this life.")

The Pyramids. or A squared plus B squared equals C squared. Is it really just geometry?

The Tarot became a deck of regular cards. And sometime someone has to sit back and why are those spades? Clubs? What is this all about?

Knowledge and Being are somethings that are not infinite in supply. And the swine will never do anything but eat the pearls.

---

by Harry

What is the sacred message in Christmas.

New Years.

The Epiphany.

---

by Cassandra

Harry,

I intended to give a Christmas card to someone I know. I called, and said I'd be over soon. The response I got was 'we're about to leave the house.' Noting the tendency for internal considering, I tried to let it be. After all, I called him. But the little voice in me kept at it with: 'he didn't even...' and 'I would have stayed home 10 minutes...' or at least said 'thank you.'

I found it interesting (coincidental) that 20 minutes before this exchange with my co-worker, I'd been listening to Christmas carols from one of the big English churches and thinking that I needed to look for something more than the sentimental in the holiday. The response from my co-worker was not sentimental, but was a kind of shock, if you will that pierced the tendency to sentimentality.

---

by Harry

Expectations, especially those that have been built on common sentiments, are one of our biggest enemies. Look at what G had to say about the tendency of people to unconsciously express sympathy to him at the death in the third series.

---

by Gururaj

I can ,oh so well,relate to that ,Cassandra.

If that Guru who takes offence , can just be a spectator instead ,what a great and different victory it shall be.

How can this usual I move to a place of there being no ' I ' , or some different I , which neither sulks in defeat nor savours a petty victory ?

Lord have mercy !

---

by Gururaj

And the Lord thru' G said "Externally consider always, internaly never"

By the way , I just went to the2008 Winter solstice OLWG weekly post and read Harry saying the above !

---

by Cassandra

This was a good experience with that co-worker. What resentment I felt has abated. There is another co-worker whose father died a few days ago. Not wanting to express false expressions of sympathy, but also acknowledging, at least intellectually, that the loss she is experiencing is great. I certainly don't feel sad as she does because he was not my daddy, but to help relieve her sadness in someway would be helpful.

Work Program week beginning 24 December 2012

by Alistair

So here we all are for another week, the world didn't end on 21st December so it's time to post another exercise suggestion that we hope will lead us further along the path to fully awakened consciousness.

Apology for the delay posting but in some ways we have had our own little end of the world here in the Crimea Mountains. On 21st for the first time in eight years, since I arrived here, the buses didn't run. Frost during the night left the roads with a centimetre thick coat of ice which wasn't gritted or salted, enough to cause mass uproar back in western countries. Natalie had already arranged to visit Bakhchisarai taking advantage of a lift from the neighbours. It was a slow 60km round trip during which time she saw an unprecedented number of road accidents. Let's hope for the planets sake that there were plenty seekers driving on the local roads last Friday.

This also coincided with an Internet shutdown. Approximately a month ago a couple of guys appeared in the village with some cable and offered to supply anyone willing to pay U$D 90.00 with fast Internet. For three years I've used Bluetooth to Mobile phone and a modem to the mobile phone network, top speed 25kbp/s. This seemed fine and the demonstration showed that for the first time it seemed that you tube clips could be watched, I think the term is streaming? Within a few days it during the evening access was much slower as all the other village users were enjoying their latest technological upgrade so any streaming you tube was now limited to mid morning before the kids arrived home from school.

Starting on Friday 21st there has hardly been any connection time. Allegedly the 'ISP' is currently engaged in their own technological upgrade with the aim to provide their dear customers with truly 'hi-speed Internet'. It is my hope that this post will be made before Christmas Day.

To the weekly exercise; I mentioned a couple of weeks ago the wonderful archive in our possession so decided to look back at some of the previous Christmas week exercises. First I looked at 2008 which was personally a very difficult time that marked a real low point.

Harry, are you still using the same barber?
Judith, your life seemed to be quite the opposite of mine at that time, full of joy.

2006 was the last time I spent Christmas in the UK, what was the group doing that week?

Work Program week beginning 25 December 2006

During the week, with all brains balanced, Ponder:
Monday - As I breath in, I Ponder: What is the meaning of Christmas to a Seeker?

Tuesday - As I breath in, I Ponder: Does Christmas have any relevance to a Seeker?
Wednesday - As I breath in, I Ponder: Is Christmas a Myth?
Thursday - As I breath in, I Ponder: Is Christmas an Allegory?
Friday - As I breath in, I Ponder: Is Christmas a Legominism
Saturday - As I breath in, I Ponder: Does Christmas represent a objective process?
Sunday - As I breath in, I Ponder: Does Christmas represent an subjective process?

Combine each Pondering with the following pattern:
As I breath out, I Sense: Right shoulder
As I breath out, I Sense: Left hip
As I breath out, I Sense: Right hip
As I breath out, I Sense: Left shoulder
As I breath out, I Sense: Head
As I breath out, I Sense: Heart
As I breath out, I Sense: Whole body

End each Pondering with an affirmation such as:
May the results of this Pondering feed my inner being embryo.

Let’s have a go with this one!

Wishing you all a peaceful Christmas, may the Cosmic Christ illuminate thy Spirit.

The night is far spent, the day is at hand: let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armour of light.
Romans 13: 12

---

by Alistair

Ninety minutes later & that's the Christmas tree decorated.
First tree I've seen this year other than online photos.
One of the pleasant things about life in the USSR is that they don't become very enthusiastic until a few days before New Year.
Western influence is changing the culture, too quickly.

The tree symbolises the Tree of Life or our spinal column and the lights on the Christmas tree represent the senses of the soul that we need to awaken in order to perceive what Christ is.

---

by Gururaj

Another symbolism, i see, is that the lights are the enlightened beings like Jesus Christ - they emerge in different places at different times - on the tree of organic life on this planet.

Their life and precepts are so illuminating that the darkness for others is dispelled - or at the least - they set out on the Path.
We are grateful for them at such times as Christmas and (ought to) deepen our Work.

Wishing that my fellow seekers get imbued with the Light of Christ.

Gururaj

---

by Cassandra

Merry Christmas to all on the forum.

By the way, Allistar, I received a copy of the Gospel of Thomas as a gift this year and am looking forward to reading it.

---

by Harry

Think of the Immaculate Conception. How much have we thought about this. Forget about it being an external event. Think of it as the virginal part within us conceiving something new. And once that is dealt with, what is the role Joseph plays in that teaching story. All those crib scenes are nice reminders, but we forget our own heart and higher centers when we memorialize the donkey. By the way, what is the donkey? Or was it just the manger that meant it was necessary to give birth within the "Earth".

---

by Alistair

and Harry, what about the hairdresser

---

by Alistair

We recognize the birth or emergence of Jesus as one who incarnates the light or fire of Christ (INRI, Ignis Natura Renovatur Integra, fire constantly renews nature), as all great masters. We celebrate or recognize this event at the darkest time of year when the light emerges from the darkness, link here to Genesis.
The moment of Christmas presents us with that moment when we can begin to retain and transform the Christic energy within ourselves, that is a conscious energy transformation. Jesus emerged on this planet to demonstrate to us how to incarnate Christ, to show us how to physically do it. The majority believe that Jesus was the only one.

In order for us to be born again—as Christ taught through the lips of Jesus—we have to be born by the waters and the spirit. The waters and the spirit are the symbol of this fire that we are describing here. The spirit is the Solar Spirit of life that is symbolized by Santa Claus and that comes and places gifts into the hearts of those who are working with that fire, with that force.

Every year on 25th December the Christic fire enters into the planet, through the water, through the air, through the fire, through the earth, and into the body of the animals, plants, human beings, and minerals giving the gift of life. Who retains that gift and develops it in order to give life to their Tree of Life, or what people at this time call the Christmas tree.

"Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven." – Matthew 18:3
This is why Christmas, the Nativity of Christ, is for children. Do we have the minds of children? What type of mind do we have?

---

by JohnS

"Every year on 25th December the Christic fire enters into the planet, through the water, through the air, through the fire, through the earth, and into the body of the animals, plants, human beings, and minerals giving the gift of life. Who retains that gift and develops it in order to give life to their Tree of Life, or what people at this time call the Christmas tree."

My dichotomy about northern vs southern hemispheres has become widened a little more by these details, as it gives me just a slightly larger displacement and disparity between north and south. Jesus' historical message was given to the northern people, and their cultures have woven their lifestyles into it (with variations of the theme and date such as in Jewish and Muslim faiths) . I have searched for Australian Aboriginal tradition and December, but can find nothing specific yet. The northern hemisphere also has the rich history of winter solstice celebration before Christ (pretty much the same story), for example Zoroastrian and Mithraic tradition. So a Christmas tree in December should mean nothing to us - we should put one up at 'Easter', which is our winter solstice! Truly Christians down here are a foreign, displaced species, slavishly following Northern Homeland traditions!

I am not an Aboriginal, so I am not entitled to be part of their Dreamtime (though my story is in there). There is so much longing to be in the North.
Perhaps I need to study more anthropology to appreciate the similarity of all cultural messages - remember, Gurdjieff was also a Northerner, and never passed below the Equator, and based all his learning on Eastern and other districts in the North - not a 4th Way mention of the Antarctic!

O Northern Gods and your bright Christmas Trees, spare a thought for your poor Southern brethren!

Hello, up there,

---

by Gururaj

> John Summers wrote:
> "Truly Christians down here are a foreign, displaced species, slavishly following Northern Homeland traditions!

Reading that, am curious to ask a Catholic Christian friend of mine (and fellow Worker) who is an ethnic Indian, whether he has any such (is it the right word ?) angst.

I think, finally what matters is the piety and religious feeling invoked in us by the tradition.

Australia is a relatively young country, and John, in a way, could your generation be a pioneering one for developing an Aussie flavour to Christian traditions? (- like the accent)

Speaking of other things - In today's reading of "Inner Octaves" by Michel Conge, in the 2nd chapter titled "The idea of evolution", he says: "...man has two roles to fulfill, a mechanical one and a conscious one"; and further, "To live this octave in its totality would be to discover that these two movements, which are called 'first birth' and 'second birth', far from being opposed combine with and complete each other.The first was the promise of the second;the second will justify the first".

How true! That second birth, that setting out on the path of developing consciousness thru' our organism, is such a vital step in one's life. Only C influences can trigger that - I think. And how fragile and wavering is that flame (if at all it is truly lit in me).

---

by Judy

John, I am a little surprised at the vehemence of your opinion as expressed in your last post and respectfully disagree.
Jesus' mission was much larger - planetary at the very least - in fact larger than geography at all.
There are some very fine Christians locally as well.
But I hear some suffering. Perhaps something else is entering here? Homesickness? I don't know.

I wish us some holy Reconciling Force.
We seek the unitive vision together.
Blessings to us all.

Judy.

---

by Harry

I want to echo Judy a bit. But also add some other comments.

Easter would not be the Southern Hemisphere's solistice. Actually it would be midSummer day. And that was also an important time for the Druids and many other believers.

The point is that these traditions existed because there is an inherent cycle in our planet. And much of what we are "celebrating" is really the message to treat these times as special. G had a name for them. Solionensus. (I'm not sure I spelt that correctly.)

The Mayan were an equitorial population. But their ancestors were Southern hemisphere.

Perhaps it is best to remember that the culture of Australia is essentially Northern, simply because of the way the British exported population there.

This has nothing to do with the rest of this post, but it is a wonderful little snippet from my morning reading from All and Everything. (G in Russia for those who want to find it.) "This could not be explained in the language of Scherherazade or in that of Mr. Canineson."

Work Program week beginning 31 December 2012

---

by Gururaj

My preferred response to New year greetings from well wishers was to wish them that every moment be new and valuable.

I wish this to myself and everyone else here, for 2013.

Nicoll says in the Chapters titled OPPOSITES that when the pendulum is at the extreme, the (potential) power or attraction of the opposite side is the maximum and the movement starts towards that side.

The more centred one is, (more likely when the centre of gravity is on the inner awareness than taken by external events), the swings are not extreme.

Can we see these movements in us, in this week of this month named after Janus ?

Just a filler exercise to keep the prayer wheel spinning.

Gururaj

---

by Harry

We are in a holiday week. One that exists because of these extremes. And we have all of these "diversions" which help us through the extreme.

One of the resistances that I have seen many times is the desire to hold on to extremes. The mind knows that the highest up is but the opposite of the lowest down. And the mind says that it wants to avoid that down, but it also wants to hold on to that extreme up. As if the thrill of victory compensates for the agony of defeat. (For those of you less connected with the US culture, that was the tag line for an old TV sports show, The Wide World of Sports. Selling the emotions of victory and defeat.)

I think it is also most important that G talks about making a choice at the branch in the river. And that after a certain point we must make an effort to jump back into the other stream. Is the difference in the streams the difference between floating down the deep water way versus riding out the rapids? Surely the world teaches us that the rapids are fun. But they are fun because of the earth intruding into the water. And often that stream disappears into the other rather than emptying into the ocean.

The sine curve of life can have different amplitudes. Can you embrace the thrill of the roller coaster? Is it necessary to see the merry go round as a tame way to live life? Only if you don't understand that the wheel goes round and round. Happiness runs in a circular motion, Mr. Donovan, I'm sure.

---

by Judy

Good morning Everyone,

Yes, as Harry says, a holiday week. Many diversions and outside distractions.

Appropo nothing in particular, I watched a BBC documentary about Bruce Parry in the Arctic recently. He was talking to a local Siberian tribesman about connections to the old Shamanic ways. The tribesman said that although the Shamans have gone, his people still try to live in the here and now. They ride on horseback most days. They attempt to constantly sense their heartbeat as a remembrance and recollection of presence and unity of all beings with the Earth and Cosmos. Anyway, I'm doing this this week as a Work exercise. It fits in with the 'busy-ness' and tempers the distractions.

I heard from Ian this morning that we have a new member. Welcome to you, Tomas. We look forward to hearing from you soon. I hope you find this site as beneficial as I have. It is a calm and clear lifeline to the work for me. There are many blogs and forums out there, but, although we do this as well, ES is primarily a work site. This is priceless. Let's make the most of the opportunity.

Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by Gururaj

Reading and ruminating on the above two posts and with the rememberance of a few turmoils in me this past week , some clarity is emerging now.

When we are unconsciously immersed in day-to-day situations, the pendulum swings sometimes gently (merry-go-round) and sometimes wildly (roller coaster) but the circle keeps on repeating. And maybe this is what is meant by the waters not reaching the ocean. This scenario plays out in innumerable 'stories' - one for each person.Most strivings and manifestations of life are the outcomes of this reactive process - good, bad and the ugly.

Blessed are the ones who somehow get a glimpse of this. But even they, (speaking of myself) go round and round the base of the sacred mountain for a long time. When the Work truly becomes the 3rd force, does the attempt to climb the mountain begin. Only then the circle can become an upward spiral.

May I maintain this awareness thru' the rapids of life and hopefully bring my centre of gravity closer to the centre.

by JohnS

I agree wholeheartedly with all the above.

At least with me - and possibly for most of us - there is an extra reason for seeking the extremes of the pendulum: efforts to escape the mediocre, the bland, the safe, which is a state despised both in the Bible and by G. Even though the realisation of states being circular is ever-present, our only hope is to turn our circle into a spiral. 'Constructive Imagination' is our narrow method of achieving this, and the theory is that, as the spiral grows, its increased momentum will take the place of the attraction for pendulum extremes.

Dangers in this view include hopes for the future masquerading as real effort. Sincere, constant reviewing of the big picture is necessary.

John

Work Program week beginning 7 January 2013

---

by Judy

Good morning,
I have taken the liberty of posting a substitute work program for this week. It is from our Northeon friends for this week one year ago.
Cheers and blessings,
Judy.

* * *

Serenity

"In the first book of Moses, called Genesis, it is recorded that the world was formed over a period of seven days. Our Work, our Search, has been described as 'esoteric Christianity,' and we have often been reminded that 'as above, so below.' The biblical account of creation can be interpreted as having a concealed message, an esoteric guideline. The Seeker, in his search, has come to the edge of a central unperceived area in his inner world. He decides to use an esoteric interpretation of the first chapter of Genesis as an aid in his search. On each day of the week he will try to set up his inner environment around a reasonable esoteric interpretation of Genesis...."

Sunday (rest) - Resist disturbing influences that come in to upset calm, poise, and Serenity".

- Ponder while walking in the forest with an inner smile.

- Movement: try to relax and calm the movements of the muscles, the emotions and the mind.

- Inner work for the work period: watch the emerging disturbing influences that upset calm and find ways to alleviate it.

- Inner work from Paul: "By visualization the Seeker has sought ways to an innermost marrow, where stillness is to be found like the calm in the eye of a typhoon whose whirling spin resembles the seeker's turbulence".

- Read: “A Note On Relaxation” by Maurice Nicholl in Psychological Commentaries on the Teaching of Gurdjieff and Ouspensky, Volume Three p.806:

http://books.google.ca/books?id=1adQzHV_6mUC&pg=PA908&lpg=PA908&dq=note+on+relaxation+novembe

When I occupy all streets in my relax body

When I let go all likes, dislikes, thoughts, and identities

When I balance all centers with the same intensity

Is there Serenity?

* * *

1. Remember to be aware of your posture and facial muscles before meeting other people.
2. Maintain a relaxed face and straight back while eating.
3. Per the reading of Nicoll's 'A Note on Relaxation' place your internal attention on relaxing the muscles around the eyes and around the mouth throughout the day.
4. While stopped at a light, alternate between external observation of your surroundings and internal observation of 1 (one) of your centers.

Work Program week beginning 14 January 2013

by Judy

For pondering and discussion: I found much in the following transcript of an exerpt from a Gurdjieff Meeting September 1941.

I catch myself behaving like a practising agnostic or atheist from time to time. By that, I mean that I do not act either from the highest in me, or from the highest outside of me, and that my ordinary self acts as if it is It.

Premiere Initiation
by G. I. Gurdjieff
Introduction to a meeting from September, 1941.
You will see that in life you get back exactly what you put in. Your life is the mirror of what you are, it is your image. You are passive, blind, demanding. You take all, you accept all, without ever feeling indebted. Your attitude towards the world and towards life is the attitude of one who has the right to demand and take. Of one who doesn't need to pay or gain. You believe that all things are due to you, only because it's you! All your blindness is there. It doesn't catch your attention. It is however what, in you, separates a world from another.
You have no measure to measure yourself up. You live only between 'I like it' and 'I don't like it'. Which means that you have appreciation only for yourself. You do not allow for anything above you - theoretically or logically maybe, but not in reality. This is why you are demanding and keep on thinking that everything should be cheap, and you can afford to pay for anything you want. You don't recognize anything above yourself, or outside yourself or inside yourself. This is why, I repeat, you have no measure and live only to satisfy your whims. Yes, your 'self appreciation' makes you blind! It is the biggest obstacle to a new life. One has to be able to pass this obstacle, this threshold, before one can go further. It is the test that separates the 'chaff' from the 'wheat' in people. No matter how intelligent, how endowed, how brilliant a man is, if he doesn't change his opinion about himself, he will be lost for inner development, for the work based on self-knowledge, for a real evolution. He will stay as he is all his life. The first demand, the first condition, the first test for he who wants to work on himself is to change his appreciation of himself. He cannot just imagine, or simply believe or think, but actually see things in himself that he did not see before, really see them. Never will his opinion about himself change as long as he will not see inside himself. And in order to see, e has _to learn_ to see: it is the first initiation of man into self-knowledge. Before anything else, he has to know what to look for. Once he knows it, he has to make efforts, focus his attention, look constantly, with tenacity. By maintaining his attention on it, by not forgetting about looking, one day he may see. If he sees once, he can see a second time, and if this is repeated he cannot ignore seeing. This is the state to look for in our observation; it is from this that the true desire, the desire to evolve, will be born; from cold we're becoming hot, vibrating; we will be deeply touched by our reality.

Today we have only the illusion of what we are. We overestimate ourselves. We do not respect ourselves. To respect myself, I have to have recognized in me a part which is higher than the other parts, and to which I show respect by the attitude I have towards it. In this way I will respect myself. And my relationships with others will be ruled by the same respect.
We have to understand that all other measuring units, talent, erudition, culture, genius, are changing units, units of detail. The only true measure, never changing, objective, the only real one, it is the measure of inner vision. 'I' see - 'I' see myself - and you have measured. With a higher, real part, you have measured a lower one, also real. And this measure, defining by itself the respective roles of each part, will bring you to self-respect.
But you will see it is not easy. And it is not a bargain. One has to pay a lot. For the bad payers, the lazy, the losers, no chance. One must pay, pay a lot, pay immediately and pay in advance. Pay from oneself. With sincere efforts, wholeheartedly, without expectations. The more you will be willing to pay without reticence, without cheating, without falsity, the more you will receive. And from then on, you will meet your true nature. And you will see all the tricks, all the dishonesty it goes to in order to avoid paying cash. Because you have to pay with all the gratuitous theories, all the deeply rooted convictions, all the prejudice, all conventions, all 'I like it' and 'I don't like it'.
Without bargaining, honestly, not just make believe. Trying to see while using fake money. Try for a moment to accept the idea that you are not what you think you are, that you overestimate yourself, therefore that you lie to yourself. That you lie to yourself always, every moment, all day long, your whole life. That the lie rules you to the extent that you cannot control it anymore. You are its victim. You lie everywhere. Your relationships with others, lies. The education you' re giving, your petty conventions, lies. Your learning, lies. Your theories, your art, lies. Your social life, your family life, all lies. And what you think of yourself, lies too. But you don't stop from what you're doing or from what you're saying, because you believe in you. You have to stop inside and observe. Observe without prejudice. While accepting for a time this idea of lies. And if you observe in this manner, paying of yourself, without self-pity, by giving all your false riches for one moment of reality, maybe someday you'll see all of a sudden something you have never saw in you before. You will see are someone else from what you thought you are. You will see that you are two. One that is not, but takes the place and play the other's role. And the one that is, but so weak, so inconsistent, that just brought forth it disappears immediately. It cannot stand the lies. The smallest lie kills it. It doesn't fight, it does not resist, it is vanquished in advance. Learn to look until you have observed the difference between your two natures, until you have seen the lies, the impostor in you. When you will see your two natures, that day, in you, the truth will be born.

This particular answer by Mr Gurdjieff to a question put to him, also connects directly with Nicoll's very first Commentary, Letter to Mr Bush, in which he speaks of the necessity of dividing into the two selves for purposes of self-observation, as being a primary requisite in learning how to observe ourselves correctly.
Judy.

---

by Alistair

First contribution of the year on the birthday of dear Mr Gurdjieff, 13th January

Hate your neighbour!

This morning needed to repair the boundary fence because the neighbour's large dog had pulled it down and was running into our garden, rummaging in the waste pile, just the beginning
..... and the neighbour wasn't doing anything about it.

Snowy day and even with gloves it was difficult to grip the wire being used for the poor quality repair to what was already a dilapidated fence but more irritating was the large dog jumping on me and the section of fence being repaired. Perhaps the only consolation, as I cursed the neighbours, for having a large dog, and not maintaining the fence was that at least I did notice myself doing it at the time and commented to myself ironically 'hate your neighbour'! I did calm down and noted a variety of aggressive thoughts toward the dog and the neighbours and all this after last week's preparation.....

.....spent, reading 'In Search of the Miraculous' cover to cover for the first time since 2009.

Initially the exercise was prompted by a wish to find the part where Mr Gurdjieff states that 'nothing we have is our own' which a few nights earlier I had found myself pondering with the result of producing a most pleasant sensation having further concluded that if nothing we have is our own then we have nothing so there is nothing there!

It ran in my mind that the statement, 'nothing we have is our own' was early in the book and in fact it appears twice but not early in the book and amusingly I didn't mark the spots so can't immediately reveal them.

Reading ISOTM cover to cover was of course an extremely valuable exercise.
It was in reality little of a surprise how much I had missed or forgotten.

Judith's post for this week highlights one of the main points of emphasis from ISOTM; that is our propensity to lie, a lot!

The first two pieces of text that I copied to my notebook were, Chapter 6

'Besides being a very good method for self-observation, the struggle against expressing unpleasant emotions has at the same time another significance. It is one of the few directions in which a man can change himself or his habits without creating other undesirable habits. Therefore self-observation and self-study must, from the first, be accompanied by the struggle against the expression of unpleasant emotions.'

Coincidentally just a couple of days after reading this, a wordier version appeared on Facebook quoted from another book, 'Toward Awakening' by Jean Vaysse.

How many writings on the work of Mr Gurdjieff plagiarize ISOTM?

The other point of note from this was the reminder that so much of what we might believe to be useful in our development is quite contrary, and that in fact without expert direction we are best to do what we do best i.e. nothing.

The second piece copied was from Chapter 7
'If a man really knows that he cannot remember himself he is already near to the understanding of his being.
This is a very great realization. People who know this already know a great deal.'

After noting this it was obvious that a great deal could be noted but from there on nothing more was actually noted, as I be came more absorbed in the book and didn't want to interrupt 'the flow' by stopping to make notes;
however it has stuck with me moreso than previously what seemed to receive the greatest emphasis.

At the time of Pyotr Ouspenski noting the fragments of Mr Gurdjieff's 'Unknown Teaching' it seems that the technique of self-remembering is the most foundational process in preparation for receiving anything of a more advanced nature emphasised by that short piece from Chapter 7 regarding the great difficulty we have in doing so.

This connects directly to the three centres and our gradual recognition of which does which and when one does what another should or should not, Seventh Commandment, Thou shall not steal, one centre from another!

Two things stood out from this reading of ISOTM that are for want of a better expression not happening for me.

The first is that I am not under the direction of a teacher who receives my 100% obedience which it is stated is essential for any progress. Secondly the teacher would identify my ‘type’ and base all my tasks on that identification thereby eliminating useless or counter-productive effort.

These two factors highlight the difficulty so many off us face in our attempt to raise our consciousness.
They also served to remind me of quite a few things that it was too easy just to slip past when reading ISOTM and focus attention on what was more easily digested.

When one reminds oneself of the difficulties facing us by reading this first hand account of Mr Gurdjieff’s teaching it is easy to understand why All & Everything seems to have been written with a view to eliminating the need for a teacher, assuming we accept The Arousing of Thought p24-25 ‘by themselves mechanically bring about that transformation’ which having re-read ISOTM requires tremendous effort to obtain a little.

Enough for now, it is my hope to return to ISOTM sooner rather than later and post some more on the subject.

Wishing us all a profitable 2013.....

---

by Harry

You must become your own teacher.

Realize that O was grounded in theosophy and other "esoteric" studies. ISOTM is a great introduction to G's Work, but it also includes O's interpretations.

We all must become our own teachers. And things like defining a type can help us if we understand how it creates interactions. I know, for example, that I am an introvert. This means that I depend upon my own judgments. And it helps me when dealing with others who require verification from others to understand that. But this is just an i. A means of operation. Perhaps even rooted at the genetic level. But still one i.

That teacher you seek to obey is the I that you are trying to grow inside.

The Kingdom of Heaven is within.

by JohnS

The details in these three posts constantly put me in mind of the Bosch analysis, the theme and message of which is the corruption of Divine influence in the earthly realm. It was emphasised that, even with good intentions, there is still degredation, as no ordinary motives contain enough purity of intent and complete lack of ego, which spoils any attempt, to a greater or lesser amount.
Gurdjieff's watchfulness and objectivity and analysis is the only hope towards pure motives.
The kingdom of Heaven is within, but is not so easy to get to through the invisible barbed wire.

John

---

by Alistair

Harry, thank you for the words of encouragement. The post was perfectly timed.
I viewed it immediately upon returning from the, weather permitting, daily sunset walk or as I commented this afternoon, my daily sleepwalk, which ended with me accompanying the village Imam on his way to evening prayer. Within seconds of us parting I wondered if this chance meeting had been a prompt to accept the Imam as a teacher to obey!

We first met in March 2009 when for a few weeks I attended the village prayer house but soon found myself a bit at odds with their what I would describe as over emphasis on the Hadith to the exclusion of the Qu'ran, which although not surprising to me, didn't feel right.

Later that year the Imam was arrested for firearm possession and spent a couple of years in Simferopol Gaol.
I don't feel he is a bad man, of course we can't converse fluently, my minimal oral contact with others for quite a few years now has perhaps increased other senses, that said taking 'work' into account this is probably less apparent, certainly to me!

So Harry, I'll gratefully accept your advice this week and continue the search within.

ISOTM; yes it seemed to me as I began to work through All & Everything that ISOTM had been perhaps the best possible introduction to Mr Gurdjieff.
While there is no doubt that once a word has been uttered the moment it is repeated becomes something different one does feel reading ISOTM that Mr Ouspenski has attempted as much as possible to quote Mr Gurdjieff word for word.

I always remember my first example of words shape-shifting from way back, the story of WWI and the officer at the front sending a message to send reinforcements we're going to advance and the message that arrived was send three & fourpence we're going to a dance!

There is no doubt that after the trip to Finland Mr Ouspenski’s observations increase culminating in his table of breaths which he never has the opportunity of discussing with Mr Gurdjieff or if he does the outcome isn’t covered in ISOTM.

Have already mentioned the emphasis on self-remembering in ISOTM and it has provided some impetus for just that. Also resisting the expression of unpleasant emotions which outwardly is much easier than inwardly both of which are of course material.

---

by JohnS

Alistair, the table of breaths and many other related and expanded calculations is in Rodney Collin's "The Theory of Celestial Influences"

John

Work Program week beginning 21 January 2013

---

by Gururaj

Could we get back to the basics about why am I in the Work and how am I going about it ?

The following text in italics is excerpted from the book "In Search Of Being", Ch.1

The aim of self-knowledge and the possibility of self-development are of such importance and seriousness
- they demand such intensity of effort - that to attempt this in any old way and among other interests is impossible.If we undertake this aim,
(a) we must put it first in our life (time available is limited)
(b) we must be serious about it which means determination and persistence,intensity and constancy in the undertaking and
(c) We need freedom from every kind of attachment.This is a matter of our inner structure and our attitude towards these inner conditions.

Towards this
(a) Make an inventory of the various activities you pursue nowadays and see what priority is given to this Seeking
(b) For whatever Work aim you have taken for yourself , see for how long do you hold it and how often do you come back to it and stick with it till completion - if it is of such a nature - and not an on-going one.
(c) How often can you "Dance like a butterfly and sting like a bee" - that is,in a way,being mindful and aware and not taken or in automatic reaction.
For example, can you sense your body completely at the same time as when you are in any disturbed state this week.

Gururaj

---

by Boever

Hello to all of you,

I am new to this forum and I'm not quite sure how it works. Since I did not find a proper place to introduce myself, I will do so here, briefly.
I am Tomas, 25 yrs old and live in Belgium. Some years ago I discovered the world of occultism and, a little after that, I discovered the teaching of Gurdjieff.
From that time on, I have been very passionate about Fourthway. I hope I will be able to contribute to this online group.

Concerning this weeks exercises :
I adopted the good habit of keeping a "magickal journal" and "dream diary" so I have some observations to share concerning the exercises.

- I keep jumping from one goal to another goal. Never actually attaining something.. my line of work keeps deviating.
- I keep lying to myself that I am practicing alot. While my journal proves the opposite...
- I have no permanent I .. When you plan doing a practice, by the time you should be doing the practice your desire to do it is no where to be found. (Planning exercises is a good way to invoke some intentional suffering).
- Even after regular practicing (maintaining the good habit of 20 minutes exercise a day), it is possible that this line of work stops. At some point it will hit a retardation and slowly fades away.

---

by JohnS

Welcome, Boever!

You introduced yourself in the correct way: by posting something relevant and incisive. All you need to do now is make sure you continue the habit!

One of those happy coincidences happened yesterday while thinking about this thread: I opened my ebook at a random page, and there was Nicol's method of the stages in creating a soul. The first stage he called physical purification, by which he means relentless focus: deciding on what you consider to be essential in your life (aims), and trying to 'fix' them, ie make them permanent in comparison to other life aims (ambition, lifestyle, money, etc). This process includes pondering on the thoughts you have chosen to keep with you for the rest of your life, and do you really want to drag some of these around with you forever, or are they a true thought for development?

This struck me greatly as a true focus for thoughts, aims, habits, exercises, as well as a handy future 'review process'.

I wonder how long this focus will stay with me? I'm afraid Boever may have already answered this for me

John

---

by Cassandra

Welcome to the forum Thomas. It will be nice to get your input. And thanks Gururaj for steering us back to the task at hand. I read in Nicole's Commentaries this morning of the need to keep in touch with others in the work as this helps one's efforts. My priorities are child rearing, work (outside the home), and resting! I've made it a goal to read the three books--starting with All and Everything. This is something I must keep coming back to because I would rather relax my mind after a long day at work rather than struggle with this text. To get around this resistance, I can take the book to work and read it at my lunch break when my mind is fresh. Where there is a will there is a way.

---

by Gururaj

Welcome on board , Tomas.
You are now the 2nd European in our group , after our Britisher , Alistair, who is domiciled in the Caucasus.
I hope , by some day, we will have seekers here encircling the globe - a la Akhaldan Society ?

Gururaj

---

by Alistair

Tomas, welcome to the Endless Searchers.
Today while pondering it occurred that we must strive to be able to reply as Mr Gurdjieff did to the journalist on the train ISOTM
"We always make a profit.....war or no war it is all the same to us. We always make a profit.
How many days or hours or minutes can we honestly say this?

Yes indeed, self-remembering is without doubt a fundamental that obviously must be well developed before any further progress can be made...

Coincidentally Saturday was the 18th birthday of Thomas, one of my nephews. Along with sending love & best wishes for the day & many more attached was this piece which you may have read , nevertheless, the link http://gnosticteachings.org/scriptures/gnostic-scriptures/205-the-book-of-thomas.html

---

by Gururaj

This week took an aim of intoning (audibly or internally) the sacred sound OM with every outbreath - to begin with only while driving.
Not consistent but have kept coming back to it.
There is a sense of having conserved energy in the process.

Once involved in LIFE , either at the office or home, the 'me' goes to autopilot.

I need to see closely what is my inner structure which allows this.

---

by Judy

Gururaj wrote:

> I hope , by some day, we will have seekers here encircling the globe - a la Akhaldan Society ?

Nice. Then we would have a khalke of Akhaldans!

Just finished reading about the sacred root HLK (in Helkdonis as well).

Cheers,
Judy.

---

by JohnS

Did the task of writing down my priorities - which came out automatically in time-honoured order of preference, not in order of what "I" would call absolute priority - and now I have the urge to re-order in terms of absolute necessity, which will (unfortunately for my perceived image of myself) drop a few off the list.

That leaves a list of what proportions to divide the remainders in. I hope I can be honest,as well as review it, mentally at least.

John

Work Program week beginning 28 January 2013

by Harry

In keeping with the idea of having exercises that associate with the newly published Anniversary Book:

We've all studied the Horse, Driver, Carriage lesson. And one of the aspects of that is the horse being controlled by the Driver with reins. This is a rather inefficient means of managing our motivating emotions. So what pulls our reins.

This past week I faced a rather ordinary senior event. I had to have an nuclear stress test. Any time we are faced to confront our own mortality can be a mind clearing experience. I'd done one of these test previously, that turned out well, but that had been a real negative experience. So for a weak I tried to ward off the unease that was building between the scheduled appointment and the actual test. My old "predict" the future mentality came into play. So I worked hard at staying centered and have high intellectual and higher emotional present, especially during my sleeping hours. By the day of the test it was something that had become an "event" for me. Something that I had to experience. Life had given it to me. And I would walk through the day with a calm and clear mind.

Interestingly there were some unique experiences. For an MRI you lay flat on your back and let a machine almost caress you for fifteen minutes. This test requires the patient to experience this twice, before and after the stress. I did not notice until the second pass was almost over that the staff had glued stars to the ceiling. And I am sure that if they had turned out the lights these stars would glow in the dark. And then I remembered them from the last visit. But did not see them for almost twenty five minutes laying on my back, even though they were obviously there.

I recognized the technician who carried and injected the nuclear material, even though I had only met him once, briefly, three years before.

The day was full of "extended notes". You are prepped. Tested. Then stressed before being tested again. This is to go smoothly. But because the above technician was the only person on duty that day, there was a half hour wait between the first test and the stressing. No emotion or feeling seeped in. The stressing ultimately got done, and was rather uneventful, partially due to a very good nurse, who gave me time cues throughout the stressing process. She made it easy and accessible to me. Something she does five or six times a day and that I will hopefully never do five or six times in my lifetime.

My only irritation was when the second MRI was finished, I knew it was finished, and the harried nuclear medicine guy did not show up to release me from the machine. (It is relatively painful in that your arms must be placed above your head in a very narrow space, in the position of a diver.) During this time you cannot move. For fifteen minutes. But my mind intervened and recognized the pressures this guy was under and he was relatively quickly there to release me.

So you now have the event. Second event: nurse calls from Doctor's Office the next day and says "Dr. wanted you to know the results of your stress test were negative." OK. Long pause. I failed a test. She sensed the pause in the conversation and added: "Your heart is strong."

This should be relief, but then we come to the third event in the triad. I should have been feeling rather good. My apprehensions had been warded off, I had gone through the process without wasted energy, And everything was fine, despite that misunderstood message that sounded like a Mi. But the rest of that day I was apprehensive. I felt bad. I was worried about the nuclear materials that were running through my blood for sixty hours. I had about every sympton of a heart problem that man has been able to design. Something was pulling my reins. My horse was bucking.

And then I realized a number of years ago I had met a favorite uncle at this same doctors office. We were on our own separate appointments. He seemed pleasant and was just coming in for "some tests". And he died of a heart attack the next day.

Reins. Being pulled. By past i's.

And how many of these events do we all face in our daily lives.

---

by Alistair

Dear Harry

Please excuse my ignorance but what exactly is the purpose of this medical test, the definite aim of the 'health industry'

I live in quite a different world from the high tech USA a photo of our local part time medical station would make you

---

by Harry

Tells you if your heart is damaged or you have a series clogged artery.

---

by JohnS

Sympatico, Harry, with what you're going through - I'm doing the same in a few weeks, and though at this stage I'm a little anxious, Ive still presently got that 'disease-of-tomorrow', where the future possibilities bloom instead of the present moment, which is where I should be, being something, rather than trying to do something.

Its good, though, as you say, this lifeshock (I've also had to submit to retiring next year, because of this plus bad eyesight for fine work), because life doesn't begin when you have free time, it only begins when you can feel the reins in your hands.

And my copy of the book arrived last week.
Take Care

John

---

by Gururaj

When the horse is doing its own thing , does it not mean that either the driver is not there or he is unable to control ?

But more often, when we do the same things again and again, like going to the office and doing whatever it is we do, with no variation, here too the reins are really not being used.

So going against the grain and sticking to the path till some aim is acheived - only then can the exercising of the reins be checked.

Its early in the week and I will chose a few contrarian approaches and see how it goes.

---

by Judy

Good news then, Harry, from the test. Hope yours goes similarly, John.
Just curious - my doctor is very keen on these preventive tests and puts me through various regular ones, but has not suggested one of these. Have you two both had possible symptoms or family histories to indicate this particular test?
I'm all for these things. If one can gain a little more time for work on this planet by taking responsibility for one's health, then why not?

We have just had the internet restored here after interruptions from a massive cyclonic system Oswald. (It's heading your way, John, but has weakened a lot, so good luck with it.) Wild weather all over half the east coast of Australia with serious flooding in some areas.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Judy

Thanks for the example of the effect (often unrealised) of past "i" s, Harry. I've been pondering these a bit. Looks like they are quite powerful; perhaps all the more so when unrecognised. I can use them to advantage though, as in 'good' habits, when driver and horse want the same outcome and work together towards it. Then the reins simply connect and require an occasional corrective tweak. Or they can work powerfully against me, as in 'bad' habits, even possibly addictions.

Habit is most interesting. Sometimes it is useful.
But often, when I wish to 'change my operating system', it works against me. Of course it must - as the brain is simply using the same old pathways. If I am seeking a changed consciousness (or anything connected with this), then habit/automaticity is to be avoided. Thus Gurdjieff changes the exercises. We change our focus ande exercises weekly here on this forum.
Quite a fertile topic.

---

by JohnS

Yes, habit is useful, but I notice factors like heredity tend to want to cement them in place, making them hard to shift, as you're working against your gene pool.

One of the best definitions I have come across of a Master being automatically present and controlling the reins - and, consequently, a state to work towards - is from Rene Daumal, and I keep it in mind as an ideal template to work towards:

"The true painter possesses within himself - in his muscles, in his sensibility, in his thinking - the golden numbers and the laws of colour, he possesses them, he has earned them, he makes them live through everything he experiences and sees, not just on the canvas: his work is therefore both useful and universal."

Judy, the cyclone remnants passed through here last night: all OK now - hope you survived up there

John

---

by Harry

Judy,

Doctors here prescribe tests that are covered by insurance. They make money. But in this case there was a symptom. The EKG he took in the office was "abnormal".

To show how isolated we are, I've heard nothing about Oswald. (And we would never name a hurricane after Lee Harvey.) And our TV covered the Australian Open for two solid weeks.

But back to the exercise. As O suggests someplace, it is important to repair the carriage and understand how the different parts work together. I think he also said we have to sober up the driver. Surely until I was able to sober myself up (not literally, emotionally) I did not even see this as an event. It was something to endure and survive. I still have a reminder. A nice large bruise on my hand where the radioactive material was inserted. I look at it and a little i says shouldn't that be gone already?

I found myself also seeing my son in myself. He has always been very good in other people's crises. (Not always so much his own.) But as I worked through to the actual test, I became that dispassionate person who just did the right thing.

---

by Gururaj

To sober up as a driver (and also as the passenger) - even for a short time - what triggers this sometimes for me is when I read ,listen or see something which somehow has a power to move. Subsequently ,there seems to be arise in me of shades of just emotion but could also be a finer feeling , a making available of more energy,which makes the driver be in greater control, which further ensures very less frittering away of energy in unaware manifestations.

Today , this paragraph from M Nicoll's chapter of the 'Commentaries' with the title 'Cosmology' had that effect :-

You remember the definition that Plato gave of the difference between a man glued to the senses and a man of understanding ?. He said : "The first believes that matter created mind,whereas the second believes that mind created matter".
Do you think that mind and consciousness arose accidentally out of some chance combination of atoms whose origin you cannot explain,or do you think that mind created matter and all its possibilities and you live in an intelligent and ordered universe

With the rememberance coming at the same time of the thought "As above so below" ,I was in an elevated mood for a long time thru' the day with some degree of freedom from small "i" s and more watchful of inner movements.

---

by JohnS

The same for me, as well, Gururaj, and on exactly the same topic.

In this context of an ordered Universe, LVL talks about the 'chance universe' people such as Richard Dawkins, then examines Gurdjieff's system of this earth being under 48 laws. One of these which he explores is the Law of accident, which, if it is described as a law, is not random, despite what the description 'accident' may convey. It is more like a subset, acting under strict rules, which include karma, or cause and effect, but as a subset creates lawful choices, which produce lawful opportunities.

He quotes his teacher, Betty Brown, who, regarding this concept, often said "Well, constant change is here to stay!"

John

Work Program week beginning 4 February 2013

---

by Alistair

Continuing with the aim to benefit from our extensive archive, it seems that during the summer of 2005 there was a great deal of enthusiasm within the group, so much so that the exercise for the week commencing 25th July generated 4 pages of posts.

Work Program week beginning 25 July 2005
by Ian » 25 Jul 2005, 04:23

Whenever you experience a Holy Denying Suffering such as anger, fear, jealousy, hatred, annoyance, exasperation, depression, etc., bring that suffering into your solar plexus on the in-breath and let the fire of the suffering warm your heart, transforming it into a blazing sun, whose heat and light are carried by your out-breath, illuminating you to the marrow of your bones and filling you with joy.

It looks as though Ian might have posted this exercise at dawn?

ISOTM Chapter 6; ‘Besides being a very good method for self-observation, the struggle against expressing unpleasant emotions has at the same time another significance.
It is one of the few directions in which a man can change himself or his habits without creating other undesirable habits.
Therefore self-observation and self-study must, from the first,
be accompanied by the struggle against the expression of unpleasant emotions.’

So whenever we experience an unpleasant emotion the aim is to recognise by self-observation and transform using the exercise, sounds simple enough

As well as the exercise I would suggest reading the posts from 2005.

Wishing all a profitable week.

---

by Gururaj

When I first read the task , I had been experiencing for a few days of very "good weather" internally and externally and even felt a bit smug that I have evolved beyond this sort of exercise.
How wrong I was !. (Law of Seven ?) When the turbulent winds and discomforts of life hit me soon enough, the boy ran squealing to mama, so to say.

In the midst of a small (internal) cyclone, the memory of this task popped up.This visualisation was 'resorted' to and things came to an even keel.

By the way, have deliberately not yet heeded Alistair's invitation to see the old posts of 2005 for this same exercise. Thought, i'll do that after a week's 'original' experiencing.

Now let me move to the other discussion thread (with the title "In Search of Being ")where many of my fellow seekers of the ES Work group have congregated of late.

---

by Boever

Thanks Alistair, your post has been an "alarm" for me today.

I find this exercise very interesting. What we are trying to do here, is to transmute negative emotions into positive emotions. This is exactly what the second conscious shock is about. Remember that their won't be a second conscious shock without the first conscious shock.

This exercise follows the holy equation as given to us in Beelzebub's tales, The Holy Equation could be said to be the Sly Man's Pill". To me this is the real deal. This is what has to be done. This is the method of creating and coating the higher being body kesdjan.
http://www.endlesssearch.co.uk/philo_holy_equation.htm "

I will try this exercise this week and post some results. I always find it hard to get a connection with my emotional center...

Whishing you all good luck

---

by Judy

Thanks for this, Alistair. It comes from the time when I had just joined the site. It was most interesting to read the four pages and a good little ego-leveller.
I remember well that comment of Harry's;
"Non-sense is not necessarily nonsense."
That was rocket science to me at the time. I was really taken with it.

Yes - a most beautiful exercise. It made its way to becoming regular for me. I still use it from time to time.

In answer to a question, Jose and Greg no longer post here but so far as I know are still active in the Work. Jose also has some Buddhist tradition affiliations.
Be nice to hear from lots of members we haven't heard from in a while. How are you, Dean, Layne, Lawrick and others? Hope all are well and motoring along profitably.

Judy.

---

by Alistair

Perhaps the first observation on last weeks exercise is that if we were honest the process would take place almost constantly?

Some teachings remark that at least 97% of our existence is within the multiplicity of I's, hence the opening comment to this post; this exercise should be executed 97% of our 'waking' life?

The more I analyse honestly the more it becomes quite apparent that a considerable amount of time should be spent here and it illustrates, for me, the tremendous difficulty we face, especially given the limited number of occasions I actually put the exercise into operation.

Of course the moment the exercise was most required it was the farthest thing from my mind.
The old nugget, how many times must I remind myself of Proverb 23:9
Speak not in the ears of a fool for he will despise the wisdom of thy words.
I allowed myself to be unduly influenced by my partners son's behaviour, the consequence, a large explosion in my chemical factory on a day I had been working fairly hard and built up considerable energy by engaging in several tasks at greater than average speed.
Fortunately the energy lost was rapidly re-accumulated by similar physical exercise conducted at a more rapid rate than necessary.

This ongoing strife with the boy is I feel firmly rooted in Karmic debt accrued by under valuation of my own Father with who I frequently contradicted and now of course with the benefit of hindsight recognise my own stupidity resulting in a legacy of regret and remorse.
On the other hand this relationship provides a perfect opportunity for me to fight against my own egotistical responses;
of course easier said than done.

Another observation, one that is not new, is the danger when having accumulated energy of exploding with it rather than utilising it for transformation or real inner accumulation.

The exercise of last week did demonstrate that on the occasions when it was applied it provided a calming and stabilising effect. This exercise as commented by others is fundamental for us and would be useful practiced constantly as stated in the opening line of this post.

---

by JohnS

You're right, Alistair, AFTER the explosion comes the realisation that that was a negative emotion, so the shame of expressing it comes quickly after, with the hope that its not too late to still save some energy. However, it works much faster than you can think, so no choice: what's gone is gone.
Perhaps, however, the shame is the first step in recapturing the positive inflow - as long as it doesn't turn into self-pity - another waster-in-waiting.

I have been following LVL's progression of posts on the distinctions between outer and inner energies - the former created by external events and the reactions to them, the latter fuelled by the amount of higher energies we allow to be accepted within our inner processes - and how to link the two, rather than trying to keep them separate by 'protecting' the inner because that is our imagined 'holy path'. I need to keep these views in mind when I react externally, as this reaction is also connected to my incomplete and misunderstood inner state, which is not open enough to higher influences so they can have a better chance of being the dominant force.
So I think it is possible to view the accumulation of higher energy as simply a measure of our degree of opening to them, rather than an imagined action of trying to collect and possess them.

John

---

by Cassandra

Speaking of energy conservation, for me I would like to practice this more-- simply not commenting--even when I feel those comments are good and honest. Must someone really hear my views on a topic or hear how I might approach a problem? I had thought that I do good by 'helping' in this way, with these loving suggestions. However, I feel it may not be necessary and may be egotistical. The main or higher point is that energy, energy needed for my development is maybe wasted unnecessarily with talk; and maybe when I do comment, this should be with a softer voice rather than louder. I've wanted to steer away from stereotypical roles of women as soft, but this has nothing to do with that, rather with conserving energy that I would hopefully use to read Work material in the evenings or simply take a walk around the neighborhood.

Work Program week beginning 11 February 2013

---

by Judy

Please revisit another strong program Ian provided in 2005. It contains several profitable soil-preparing exercises. Share your findings with the Group.

Work Program week beginning 29 August 2005

At least once a day, perform a quiet meditation or sitting. Relax the three centers and watch the breath. Keep the eyes open and use the Sightless Gaze.

Whenever you get angry or impatient, count to 10 while Sensing the following 10 bones:
1. Lower right leg bone. 2. Upper right leg bone. 3. Pelvic bone. 4. Upper left leg bone. 5. Lower left leg bone. 6. Spinal column and skull. 7. Upper right arm bone. 8. Lower right arm bone. 9. Upper left arm bone. 10. Lower left arm bone.

Whenever you are happy, recall a time when you were sad. Reside in the mid-course.

Observe your thoughts and try to trace them to their source.

---

by Cassandra

I am still focused on last week's exercise. Not expressing negative emotions--I will make this my aim, my god for a while to see where it might lead. I was just reading in Views, that magnetism can be acquired "by doing small things voluntarily." This statement comes during a Q&A on trying to accomplish some small task or aim. What is that for me--it has to do with less talk, specifically not expressing negative emotions either out loud or to myself. I had forgotten this and have been lately in the place of quick and easy criticism.

---

by Gururaj

My uncle (Father's elder brother) was staying with me for many months.He was almost 83 years old when , the other day, his living-ness stopped in front of my eyes, as the cancer in his vitals finally made his body stop functioning.

As I do the meditation suggested in this week's task, a pondering is there on -

(a) Is there something which survives the body

(b) Is this ,what is said in the Work , Essence

(c) How do I (or even, can I)sense this when I am alive

---

by Cassandra

Gururaj, I think this time presents a very special opportunity for you and all those around you.

---

by Gururaj

Very true,Cassandra.

Death at close quarters is a powerful reminder for Work.

Work Program week beginning 18 February 2013

---

by JohnS

Pierre Bonasse, as a writer, is here talking about how and why to write, but this is just one example of many disciplines (choose anything) in the struggle to be able to “do.”

The exercise is to carry this example into one other (or all) disciplines.

“The writer must be conscious he is writing: he must be conscious simultaneously of the action of writing and the fact that this action is, from its origin, the fruit of the relationship between his intellectual centre and his motor centre before it senses the primordial and intellectual part of his emotional centre. He must observe the functioning of his machine in order not to be duped by his mechanisms.

In order to write – a practical exercise – we must know the laws that rule us. This is so precisely covered by the five Obligolnian Strivings, which go hand-in-hand with the being-partkdolg duties that are inseparable from objective work.

We must work at our desk of awakening, here and now, in a total and conscious presence of the world, with our attention divided perfectly between the hand and the page. We must direct our attention, step back, plan out, thrust our strength into the phrases, aim for the target, and send our ball into the centre of the net. He masters his energies, breathing them into the very body of the work, which in turn requires many centres that work together to vibrate in the reader's consciousness. The entire being takes part, aware that it is only in the action of the moment, and that is why it can be eternal.”

Seeing that, as Alistair said last week, this type of consciousness is absent from us 97% of the time, let's try this week to get the vacancy down to at least 95. Give yourself a score.

John

---

by Gururaj

Is this week's task ,in a way, inviting us to explore doing any particular activity (Writing being one example) - very '3-centred' consciously ' and with quality and full focus on the ultimate aim ? .(Correct me,John, if my reading of your post seems incorrect).

If so, then ,this extract from the latest Lee Van Laer blog post resonates with that -

" Mr. Gurdjieff has given your life a meaning. Here is your task. Now, in your everyday life, in what you do for a living, try to manifest what you have received from the work so that it can be felt by others. It doesn't matter what you do in your life, whether you are a teacher or a taxi driver or a doctor or anything, but do what you do with such quality that your inner work will be sensed by the people you deal with. Do not talk about it to them, but only be it. Do you understand?"

Ask yourself, she continued, is this essay a manifestation of inner work or reaction that will only provoke counter reactions, etc., etc. ... forever?
Same old story. "Righteous indignation."

Regards to all,
Gururaj

---

by JohnS

Correct, Gururaj: a three-centred effort is the only true marker for any attempt at doing, otherwise, by G's definition, its not 'doing' at all.

Throughout the book I have quoted from, the impression is given that this process is being carried out - or at least constantly getting close to it - because there is so much emphasis on word and language - what they really mean at the deepest level -that it makes the writer constantly aware of what he is putting on the page. I'm sure what was written was reviewed many times, in order to reduce it to as essential a communication as possible. And to review like this, as close as possible to an objective view would be constantly required for that process.

To me, I believe that he has succeeded to a large extent (and, in the same way but differently, some of LVL's blogs), because the book, in the end, has the status of a reference, and not a theory.

John

---

by JohnS

The warning that we think we are 'doing' consciously when most of the time we are not -even though we believe we are, because we automatically think we understand - is expressed neatly in LVL's blog today:

"Even more insidiously, the network (layers of false personality) assimilates everything one has ever heard or experienced about inner work and folds it into itself like the Borg of Star Trek. It produces an artificial entity called "inner work" which one becomes entirely and absolutely identified with, utterly convinced that it's the real thing...when it is anything but."

John

Work Program week beginning 4 March 2013

---

by Gururaj

Whenever the phone rings for you (and even when you decide to initiate a call) , use it as a trigger for self-awareness and to make a shift to an all-three-brains-balanced condition.

Through out the day ,be mindful of your state as you go about responding and managing life situations.
At the end of the day , after a few minutes of mindful breathing, devote some time to recall the events gone by and try to remember the predominant emotion,be it pride,vanity,jealousy,dislike,laziness,desire,enthusiasm,etc.

Sharing your self-observations here would be a good effort along the 2nd Line of Work.

If you have access to it, do read from Maurice Nicoll's "Psychological Commentaries...." Vol.I , his notings from page 367 to 370 with the title " Commentary on Vanity and Pride".

Regards to all,
Gururaj

---

by Harry

Something like a phone can be a good reminder. I would like to offer a caution. If you communicate via phone for ordinary jobs, be aware that some of those conversations are mechanical and need to be mechanical. That does not mean you can not observe your own mechanicality. But hold that in mind if your job requires you to spend time on the phone.

I have had fully centered job conversations, and they often turn out much different than the same conversation might have turned out without being centered, observing.

---

by Gururaj

Devoting long hours to office work and coming home late (the kids were already asleep today) , is a regular pattern with me.
Need to get to the root of it. Seems to be due to a combination of fear of failure and getting attracted and immersed in the job on hand.

By itself it is not harmful.But I may be missing out on something more valuable , more precious.

Today ,remembering to be mindful , now and then, the difference at-least was, the enervation at the end of the day is much less than usual.

Before only a few calls sensed by body , but was not anchored after the conversations began. In fact, had not considered that as an Aim and only after reading Harry's post above has that possibility occured.

Tomorrow is another day, as the saying (in Hollywood , and in the novel preceding it) goes .

---

by Harry

We depend so much on our jobs. Eventually I learned to sense 'storms' coming. On those days I would Work much more intentionally. I would walk through doorways consciously. I would follow the twelve bones while walking to lunch. And I can think of a half dozen times when I know that by working I kept myself from being embroiled in the swirling sandstorm. I had my stilts on.

---

by Judy

Hi Gururaj,

Yes, as Harry says, put your stilts on. One goes to work to earn a living and of course this is a right and proper thing to do. For me, it was helpful a lot of the time to simply be aware that this 'working' is an outside role I must play, but it is not who I am at any deep level. Somehow this assists in detaching a little and prevents strong identification with that particular role. Sometimes it isn't realistic to mix inner work deeply with our necessary outside roles. Detachment, wearing the world like a loose garment, though, is possible to avoid useless negativity.

Kind regards,
Judy.

---

by Gururaj

Thanks , Harry and Judy for your responses.

Pondering on the issue , it seems to me there are two aspects -
One - Managing life situations efficiently - which is a life skill and Two - In whatever I am doing ,being on stilts - which is a Work skill.

As our Work skills , and the meaning,valuation, love for 'Work' increases, we may even alter our 'life' priorities fundamentally - in a natural way.

---

by JohnS

Yes, I am in the habit of dividing work and 'life' into different parts of the day, so they hardly ever meet: the journey to work (3 hours) is spent, mostly, in preparation for what is coming, ie life, and for this reason, they never meet: one stops where the other begins. Towards the end of the day, I am looking forward to my work hours on the way home. Thus there are hardly any 'triggers' during the day for observation and separation.

This has to change. My excuse is I am a 'busy man', plus the job pressure is high. I read about continuity of energised states, and how recall can help to preserve it, but my routine is too fixed to allow the right energy to flow and alter.

Reading this, I have a sense of shame for not having the courage to allow change to enter

John

---

by Gururaj

Here is a recording of an exchange between the great sage Ramana Maharshi and a devotee which , for me, shows an approach to Work for a person (like me) who feels it is very difficult to balance 'life' responsibilities and the Inner Search.

"Once an earnest seeker came, prostrated in all humility to Sri Bhagavan and asked Him:

"Bhagavan said that the real nature of the Self can be attained only by constant dhyana.
But how is it possible for one like me saddled with official responsibilities and the management of household affairs?
If a major part of one's life is spent managing these, where is the time for Atma Vichara, much less uninterrupted dhyana?
What is the way out? I beseech Bhagavan to enlighten me on this."

Looking at him compassionately, Sri Bhagavan said:

"Suppose you leave your house with the intention of coming to the Asramam and on the way you meet a friend.
You greet him, exchange pleasantries and then take leave of him, proceeding to the Asramam while your friend goes his way.
Now you don't go away with your friend but rather continue toward the Asramam, do you not?
The thought of coming to the Asramam is so fixed in your mind that whomsoever you happen to meet on the way, is spoken to in the proper way, and parted with in order that you may fulfill your original intention.

Likewise if the mind is deeply engaged in meditation after doing whatever has to be done, the mind will return to to meditation.
By engaging the mind before starting work and after finishing it, even while working, it will automatically acquire the ability to do the necessary while inhering in its natural state.
In the course of time, this becomes in built, habitual and natural, and one no longer feels the lack of being engaged in constant meditation."

---

by JohnS

Thanks, Gururaj;

Perfect. Also, perfectly logical - that is the core of it - so 'doable'

John

---

by Cassandra

Yes, thank's Guru for the exercise and others' responses. This work issue I can understand as well. I have been working on a paper (research article) for about three months and am now ready to have my colleagues take a look at it. But along the course, I have sometimes become engrossed in it to the point that I would come home and work some hours at night. This isn't that unusual, but I have thought: what if I devoted time like this to the Work. That said, I do try to use those stilts throughout the day. Many times they are forgotten when the small irritations come in. This seems to be what gets me off track--e.g., someone in a big SUV cutting me off in traffic or the woman there giving me a 'look.' I have observed these ordinary interactions during the past week and have been able to come to my senses sooner rather than latter. It seems to me that this kind of interaction IS the stuff of work, it is, at least for me, the deep work. I cannot get to 'heaven' without coming to peace with those who would irritate me.

Work Program week beginning 11 March 2013

---

by Harry

Find a mirror. Find a person. Find something that reflects your self to you. Observe the mirror. Observe the reflection. What do you see that you previously didn't see.

The memory of my mother has become a mirror for me. I hear my mother speaking from my mouth at times. And I suddenly see that this is an i that we both had inhabit us. I find myself sitting in a certain position and I see my mother sitting in that same position.

I do need to explain that this is a late reflection. I grew up the image of my deceased father. I would look at photographs and see myself staring back at me. I would look at photographs of my self as a young man and see my son staring back at me. And then I would look at photos of my father and see my son there. So there was an identifaction with the visual aspect of my father.

My son and I spent much of the last year of my mother's life in her company. And it was after she passed that I began to see her in the mirror, hear her in my expressions, my postures.

A mirror does not have to be that personal. Someone shaking your hand can be a mirror. We can often observe others with greater ease than we can observe our self. And in finding that mirror we find our self.

---

by Gururaj

Yes , we can observe others more objectively than ourselves.

But how accurately can we sense what exactly in the others' manifestation is influenced by me , and is therefore a reflection of me ?
That may be more difficult to perceive.

On the other hand, I saw , in hindsight at the end of the day today , that I could recollect I was sometimes obviously and oftentimes subtly, differently behaved with different people - my children, my wife, the boss, the subordinates , the friend.

---

by JohnS

A potential solution to these 'mirror questions' and observing our inner and outer selves plus others, lies in the subjects LVL is covering in his current essays on internal and external considering: As G. puts it: "external considering always, internal considering never.'

Because internal considering is self-love, and involutionary, and external considering is mindfulness, and evolutionary.

Even writing this post, i have to be aware of inner and outer considering: outer because I want to be sincere (which according to G. is almost always an excuse and, thus, lying) and inner: trying to make an impression. I can SEE both, but I can't FEEL the difference, which means not being in all centres.

I guess, Gururaj, that your seeing your reflection in others is also self considering, but at least in a constructive way of 'mirroring', reminding us of our own faults in others.
But, do we have to transcend this stage (well, yes, if it is just a 'stage')? And what does this do to our mirror image? Maybe I will have the courage to see more of my parents in that face (a very difficult thing to come to terms with), and thus more of the illusion of myself as a unique and self-loving individual.

John

---

by Gururaj

"And in finding that mirror we find our self."

When I see (and more often imagine) my reflection in others - it is inner considering.
But when i see Gururaj's reflection , that is impartial observation.

I have been for the past few days in unfamiliar surroundings - travelling out on work. This throws up many new situations ideal for finding reflections.
But the tool for seeing itself is often shaky due to its identified state.

---

by Cassandra

I was told as a child that I favored, that is looked like, my paternal grandmother and my father. This always errked me because they were both very difficult people. I'm okay now with that since they're both deceased, but I can also see selfishness in me, the same I saw in them.

---

by Cassandra

Another thing about my grandmother, whom my sister and I called "Miss Carrie." She would often lament the loss of her dead husband Herbert. I never knew him, but as a child I took this in. I can remember seeing her on the couch wailing. I often thought she should just get up and do something else. Again, this is the same with me. I long for a deeper life, but spend more time relaxing than Working. I mean no disrespect to my grandmother, but I see myself clearly in her.

Work Program week beginning 18 March 2013

---

by Alistair

Apology for the delay replying and the lack of contribution recently.

This week, suggest you read from the archive exercise & posts from 21st February 2005 and execute.

---

by Gururaj

Did the task towards the end of the day for about 15 minutes.

For the past week ,have been thru' somewhat taxing times physically and psychologically ,on tour to another city.

So the experience of the task was mainly a draining of that tension , leading to a relaxation and good sleep subsequently.

While going back to the 2005 archives and seeing the many posts, the thought came "It was quite lively those days".

Valuable exercise. Looking forward to going thru' with it daily this week.

---

by Harry

Just want to note that this exercise is directly from G. He describes it in the Third Series.

Would also like to note that this is not something to be done frequently. That was noted in the original post. This is a very powerful exercise which should be done with reverence.

---

by Alistair

Yes Harry, this came over loud & clear, that this is not a daily exercise
It occurred to me that tomorrow Wed 20th the equinox, a time of balance on earth, might be an excellent moment for the process

---

by Alistair

This morning Wednesday 20th March performed the draining exercise for forty minutes.

Sat upright, feet flat on the ground, hands dangling.

Initially there seemed to be a quick clearance from my head then it felt like everything remaining was thick treacle and that a considerable length of time would be required for a full cleaning. Is this why one requires 40 days and nights in the wilderness or in the case of Ashiata Shiemash a bit longer?

---

by Alistair

This exercise seems to be a deep meditation with specific focus.

Yes the usual distractions occur but as Buddha allegedly remarked
'If you catch yourself wandering off a thousand times, it's a good meditation!'

---

by Gururaj

The Draining exercise daily before sleep and a slow absorbing of one M Nicoll chapter of Commentaries in the early morning - has been the routine for me this week .

By the way, when Ian posted this task in 2005 , he started saying "do this task daily this week" . So I am taking it literally - for this the first week at-least.

A deeply felt truism today - what matters is the Inner state .Our organism is a temple/church and the inner state needs to be taken care of like the Sanctum Sanctorum.
The First Conscious shock is nothing but the moment to moment inward watchfulness. Yeah - we need to come back to it a thousand and one times.

Work Program week beginning 25 March 2013

---

by Judy

I am finding the repetition of some of Ian's (Mr Paul Beidler's) earlier programs most beneficial and think we can do a lot worse than to keep this going for a while.
Thanks for the Draining exercise last week, Alistair. The Nyland group I was with for a couple of years here used to do that exercise (with very small differences, if any) on a seasonal basis and placed importance on it.
Here is another set of exercises from November 2004.

"Every time you walk through a doorway, repeat I AM and sense the reverberation throughout the body.

On one day, agree with everybody and observe the organisms resistance to expressing contrary opinions. Be aware of the "heat" this produces in you. Visualize this heat burning away your self-importance.

On another day, disagree with everybody and observe the organisms resistance to expressing contrary opinions. Be aware of the "heat" this produces in you. Visualize this heat burning away your self-importance.

Later in the week, review the different effects these exercises produced and report any interesting observations to the group forum.

Ponder - Do I see my own faults in others?"

I also have a comment. Since being here at ES alost 8 years now, I notice that I talk less about the work; but seem to be engaged in it increasingly. Curiosity is perhaps less and new exercises are fewer. There is a more balanced engagement of the three centres. At first it really was predominantly intellectual. Have others noticed any similar 'quietening'?
Of course this makes for a less lively site for us, which may not suit some members. It may therefore be quite useful for the old posts to be read each time a repeat exercise is posted. Optional of course.

Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by Gururaj

A very few times when passing thru' a doorway and more often after doing so - did I remember the task.

A marginal improvement compared to the earlier time this exercise was posted in the OLWG many months ago.

The Work is not yet the main focus for me.Life is.

---

by Alistair

Nothing makes us more angry than seeing our worst character flaws displayed by others

Work Program week beginning 1 April 2013

by Gururaj

The week beginning is upon is and I found this fine program of Ian from the main ES site. So am taking the liberty of posting the link to this task (John, you owe me one).

Laughter

The Seeker has observed with interest the phenomenon of laughter in human relationships, and he believes that a study of why he laughs may reveal an element of chief feature.

His skirmish with objectivity will prove valuable in analyzing this common spontaneous reaction, especially when he notices that the same happening stimulates laughter in some and sorrow in others.

Its mechanicality places it within the Holy Denying Force to which his affirmation may begin with recognizing the subjective way with which laughter is usually considered justified.

He will not suppress spontaneous laughter in any way but will try to observe and record what he laughs at, why, and whether it falls on the positive or negative side of his emotional range.

The Seeker has tentatively arranged various types of laughter in the following complementary categories: laughter of amusement and laughter at another's discomfiture; laughter of merriment and laughter at another's frailties; laughter at something incongruous and laughter at another's beliefs; laughter at oneself and laughter because others are laughing; laughter at something sexy and laughter at race or religion; laughter of satisfaction and laughter at someone's behavior; laughter of good will and laughter of ridicule.

Various degrees of laughter such as loud cachinnation, the chortle, the smirk, the simper, the belly laugh and the snicker will be included in his objective study.

The Seeker may also experience from time to time a deep inner laughter with its complement of essence remorse.

He will begin and end each day by repeating three times with deep inner laughter and three times with essence remorse the three independent forces of the Sacred Triamazikamno: (1) Surp-Otheos, (2) Surp-Skiros, (3) Surp-Athanotos.

>For each force in turn he will at (1) face east arms outstretched palms together, at (2) face south arms lifted, at (3) face west arms crossed on breast.

In the course of his research, the Seeker may resort to sayings, cartoons, skits, and stories to illustrate any relationship between humor and laughter.

***

Seasons greetings to all,
Gururaj

---

by JohnS

Yes, I owe you one: physically I haven't had the opportunity till now to post, and I've done my cut and paste, only to come here and find: too late!

I guess I'll have to laugh!

Thanks, Gururaj

---

by Gururaj

The other day, was in a situation of acute discomfort when a subordinate over-reacted to something I said .
Later In some relevant context when I narrated the incident to a fellow seeker , he broke into a deep chortle.
Since it was of a wry sort and not judging of me, my painful memory of the event too melted and I smiled seeing the incident a little bit more objectively.

I reckon when one can get this lightness on our own , and see one's 'seriousness' and touchiness progressing with age like ,say, deteriorating eyesight , then the inner laughter would be there more often and manifest outwardly as well. That is truly infectious.

---

by Judy

In searching for something more on "surp otheos", apart from the references to Beelzebub's Tales Chapter 39, I came across the following about the Trisagion:

> Form of the prayer
> For other languages, please see the section below
> The Trisagion prayer is an ancient prayer in Christianity. It may be that the prayer was originally an expansion of the angelic cry recorded in Revelation 4:8 (sometimes called the Sanctus).
>
> In English:

> Holy God, Holy Strong, Holy Immortal, have mercy on us.[2] > or more commonly:
> Holy God, Holy Mighty, Holy Immortal, have mercy on us.
> In Greek:
> Agios o Theos, Agios ischyros, Agios athanatos, eleison imas. (Traditional Romanization)
> In Latin:
> Sanctus Deus, Sanctus Fortis, Sanctus Immortális, miserére nobis.

Note the Greek in particular.
Most interesting.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Judy

So what about the "surp" ?
Any clues from anyone?

Thanks for pointing out this exercise, Guru. Laughter is a huge topic. Paul Beidler makes an interesting comment about its mechanicality. Yet how this spontaneous, mechanical feature is much praised in our society. How we value "a good sense of humour". And an intriguing allusion to the possibility that what we laugh at may reveal clues to chief feature.
I've usually thought of sense of humour - or lack of it - as perhaps indicating something deeper than personality; but does it?
Here again, thoughts anyone?

And this reference to "deep, inner laughter". Ah yes.
Much grist for the pondering mill.

Work Program week beginning 8 April 2013

---

by JohnS

Its a good thing to look at the Work, sometimes, from other points of view, to realise that others are describing the same thing in similar or even dissimilar language. It helps to de-insulate ourselves from our chosen and possibly precious Fourth Way world, as well as to assimilate ideas coming from a different direction.

I have been re-reading Carlos Castaneda, and its Gurdjieff all the way. Don Juan advocates training in three ways: knowledge (via the body, as the body knows what is needed), feelings (via the heart), and understanding(via the spirit).

Fundamental to it all is being able to 'stop the world', ie stop the constant flow of thinking that gives us our assumed and habitual 'educated' view of everything.

Here is a typical excerpt:

“Look at the shadow oft that boulder. The shadow is the boulder, and yet it isn't. To observe the boulder in order to know what the boulder is, is doing. To observe the shadow is not-doing. Shadows are like doors, the doors of not-doing. A man of knowledge, for example, can tell the innermost feelings of men by watching their shadows, by not-doing.
To believe that shadows are just shadows is doing. There is so much more to everything in the world that obviously there must be more to shadows, too. After all, what makes them just shadows is our habitual view of things, our doing.”

This week, do something unusual, that is, opposite to your normal view of anything: observe shadows of things and people, and regard them as the real part of the object / person. See how it takes you away from your normal assumptions, and gives you a doorway to a view and a reality you have not considered before.

John (Me and my Shadow)

---

by Harry

John,

I spent many years working through Castenada. Even learned his Tensegrity movements.

There is a difference. When I pick up G, or O, or Nicoll my inner touchstone says this is beneficial. This is in touch with something higher. When I pick up Carlos I can have fear. I have no doubt that he had contact with the Fourth Way. I also have no doubt that he had some contact with shamanism. However there is the same hint to his work that there is to Alistair Crowley. Crowley understood the Tarot, for example, but if you pick up his deck there is darkness present.

I do not discourage anyone from any source. But I suggest to everyone to develop an inner compass, what was called The Golden Touchstone, what G calls Center of Gravity.

Harry

---

by JohnS

I can understand that, Harry, but what impressed me about what some may take as morbid, or depressing, or perhaps part of the dark side, was the insistence that we all have to die, and you must constantly be aware of your death - which always travels with you by your left shoulder, and one day he will tap you on that shoulder.

However, I'll take your view seriously. I have just downloaded a new book by Castaneda, and i will be aware of the tendencies, and see if he has changed direction at all - or not.

Very interesting.

John

---

by Harry

There are certainly insights in his work. I just put forth the caution. I still have his books on my book shelf. Crowley is stored away in a basement box someplace.

---

by JohnS

I had an actual experience of what is meant by 'shadows":

I was reading Castaneda, where don Juan was trying to explain how there can be a knowledge without words. It suddenly occurred to me to switch over immediately to chapter 48 of BTTHG. I started reading, and the changeover seemed seamless: apart from the style differences - which didn't matter - it seemed like the same person speaking. I went back and forth between the two texts, and there was no conflict, no 'division of intent.'

What I felt I was seeing was: the words were the 'doing' - the surface images - while the knowledge was the shadow in the background, living separately to the words, though superficially connected to them.

A wonderful, objective insight

john

---

by Gururaj

What I see and How I see are the issues being (shadow ?) boxed with here .. ?

WHAT I SEE - Is by 'shadow' meant here the subtle manifestation of a person (non-verbal ques, etc.) .
Or is it the darkness emanating from a person when they interfere or cut across a source of light - like ,say, when I am being mechanical ,or negative and am basically not activating the 1st conscious shock of attention .

HOW I SEE - Is by 'seeing' or 'knowing' meant here a wordless illumination , an insight instead of ,literally , just observing/watching or thinking/analysing ?.

I mean , when Sherlock Holmes surprises Watson by telling him exactly what he(Watson) is thinking after observing his expressions for a while, is he being spiritually wise or just very clever ?

---

by Gururaj

> John Summers wrote:
> A man of knowledge, for example, can tell the innermost feelings of men by watching their shadows, by not-doing.
> To believe that shadows are just shadows is doing. There is so much more to everything in the world that obviously there must be more to shadows, too. After all, what makes them just shadows is our habitual view of things, our doing."

From listening,today morning, to the audio of Nicoll on the 4 centres in man (Vol 2) (Thanks,again,Tomas, for the link),it seems to me that G has been more precise and closer to the bone .
The above statement of Castaneda is clearer when we have the understanding from the 4th Way that when the impressions fall and are perceived only by some parts of some centres , say, by only the moving parts, then we do not 'get' the full picture.

The challenge then is what is the response needed to this ? First of course is the organic seeing of this (helped by the intellectual knowledge , to begin with) and then , it seems to me thru' some means we need to develop finer materials in us to bring other parts of all centres into play.

The various 4th way exercises , like divided attention ones, I think, may help to create the ,

what are called as, the higher hydrogens for this.
Of course , the ballast for all this is our devotion, our feeling , our valuation for the WORK.

By the way, my habitual way of approaching things only from the mind, maybe, made me miss to acknowledge and rejoice alongwith John in his having of his objective experience mentioned in the earlier post. I do that now. Way to go, John !!

Work Program week beginning 22 April 2013

---

by Harry

We have not had a new work exercise for a while. When I saw none this morning I thought I'd jump ahead and post something.

This exercise comes from the compilation of G's lectures. It happened to be my morning reading today.

We are each of us like a planet. We have an atmosphere. This surrounds us just as the atmosphere surrounds the earth. And it can be pulled by attention, by a focus that does not stay settled. The first step in self remembering is to pull this atmosphere to ourselves.

Sit in a relaxed position. The atmosphere may radiate up to a meter. And if you think of something, say Mom, then it gets pulled in that direction. As our imagination and our random thoughts move in many directions we are always being pulled in many directions. If we want to remember ourselves then we have to pull this atmosphere in to ourselves. The first step is to calm down the atmosphere. This involves keeping it from moving about with random thoughts. Do not have time for those random thoughts as you sit relaxed. Let the atmosphere relax around you.

Once the atmosphere has relaxed then pull it in to yourself. Condense the atmosphere to your core being. Pull it in. And intone I AM.

Do this often. Do this regularly. Calm yourself. Concentrate yourself. Feel your Being.

---

by Gururaj

Ever since I have become a member here and attempted to do the tasks involving bringing of awareness while going thru' life , rare has been the week when I could consistently remember and do as suggested.

Came across some Work input today which promises much to bring a breakthrough regarding this.

While listening to Nicoll's talk in Vol.2 on "The Enneagram - Talk V ", he speaks of a comparision between breathing and self-remembering.

He says , just as the (first) Mechanical shock of breathing involves an inward and outward flow, so does the (second) conscious shock - of attention or self-remembering has a two-directional feature , of simultaneously being aware of our inner state while also being drawn to the external situation.

This made me use the act of breathing as a sort of peg to hang self-remembering on - though in an approximate way - and many times through the day came back to it.

As I breathe out , I sense the "sensations" and as I breathe in , I take a quick inventory of the state of mind and feeling.

This seems to be more "do-able" for me and also gave a centred state quickly - in a way being in sync with this week's task.

---

by Judy

Harry,
Thanks for this. It is a wonderfully refreshing exercise with a lot of potential for me. In itself, it contains much. There have been some synchronicities while reading (below is an example from today) plus some very vibrant first conscious shocks from several attempts.

> As one grows closer to God, as one's embryo develops, one discovers that one is connected to everything, and that all of the objects, events, circumstances, and conditions in the universe are both deserving of, and attracted to, feeling conditions, that is, they are drawn in to the cyclical action of the chakras by a form of spiritual magnetism. So the growth of the Being-Body is analogous to every kind of growth, from the growth of the embryo to the amalgamation of planets around the sun — and the magnetism of gravitational attraction dominates this action. We draw the world into ourselves; and in doing so, we become the world.

(from LVLs essay "Everything" today).

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Alistair

Last week's exercise obviously has constant usefulness in the critical sphere of self-remembering as well as accumulating stored energy for subsequent effort. This week there were two prolonged activities that especially provided opportunity for this focus.

The first involved a strenuous climb of 800 metres accompanied by four others including a member of the Ukrainian National Orchestra who typified Mr Gurdjieff's description of a modern artist in every way. Easy to be distracted and consumed by his constant need for attention and adulation the necessitated for me the conscious awareness of enduring the unpleasant manifestation of others with joy, and in the instance of interaction with modern artists the expediency of lying to them made the excursion infinitely more pleasureable than would have been the case years ago when his ego manifestations would have rubbed against mine thereby creating all manner of unpleasant inner friction for myself and also the possibility of negative outward expression towards him and the rest of the company.

The second opportunity occurred yesterday with the physical task of working with a grinding power tool equipped with a circular rotating sanding disk. The aim was to smooth off 130 different sized pieces of rough wood that I had cut earlier in the week with the objective of building 8 outdoor chairs, which given the cost of the plastic variety will provide us with longer lasting, more aesthetically pleasing and assuming nil labour cost, cheaper units.

I perhaps irresponsibly decided to operate the tool without the hand guard enabling me to turn the tool through a wider angle and as is usual with us undeveloped human organisms on commencement and during the activity my mind was filled with all sorts of distracting thoughts until having successfully cleaned off approximately 20 pieces I caught my left index finger with the rotating disk luckily inflicting minimal damage and pain. There is nothing like even a mild shock and a little physical pain to assist ones concentration. Gradually I became more focused on the task until the point where I was consciously making the same move each time I used two hands to manipulate the tool thereby negating the careless unconscious action that caused the minor accident to occur.

Next week, Easter week here in Ukraine, today is Palm Sunday, I am about to restart what is for me a major project. You may recall some posts made in 2010 that referred to my digging a water-well. Since December 2010, for various reasons, there has been no work on the project leaving the well uncompleted and a large hole in the middle of the garden. Having had an incredibly mild winter has allowed us to make faster than normal progress in the garden and with time available I refocused my attention on how to cover the large hole. The Law of Association led me to the inspiration on how to attempt the completion. Tomorrow morning four metre by metre concrete well liners are scheduled for delivery and digging will recommence. I’m sure this activity will provide fine opportunity for inner work.

In general it is quite noticeable that all my manual tasks that are performed in silence are more efficient. When I say silence, I mean with little or no talking, the real struggle is calming the mind and concentrating entirely on the task in hand.

---

by Harry

Just a question. Because I'm interested in holy days and how they are established. Here Easter is established as 40 days after the Pascal Moon. How do they determine Easter there?

---

by Alistair

Dear Harry

It's the same calculation, second Sunday after the first full moon after the spring equinox, but, still calculated using the 'Old Calendar' which is two weeks later. Coincidentally I only just discovered this recently.
Russia still has a public holiday to commemorate the October Revolution but its the second Monday in November.

Work Program week beginning 29 April 2013

---

by Alistair

In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. John 1:1

But let your communication be Yea Yea; Nay Nay; for whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil. Matthew 5:37

Even so the tongue is a little member, and boasteth great things. Behold, how great a matter a little fire kindleth.
And the tongue is a fire, a world of iniquity: so is the tongue among our members, that it defileth the whole body, and setteth on fire the course of nature; and it is set on fire of hell. James 3: 5-6

Apparently when the Spanish arrived in South America and asked the locals the name of their God they simply made a gentle exhaling breath aaahhh sound.

Gnostic Teachings in the series of lectures on the Ten Commandments teaches that every word we speak is sacred, hence Jesus' warning in The Sermon on the Mount. We kill with our tongues, our speech, Thou shalt not kill, including killing our own essence with our ego driven inner chatter

The suggested exercise for this week is to read at least Chapter Three of the General Epistle of James from the New Testament, read the other four if you have time.
During the week firstly try to minimise your speech outwardly and second inwardly. If possible post at least one example from when you resisted the temptation to talk.

Love and blessings to all

---

by Gururaj

http://www.earlychristianwritings.com/text/james-kjv.html

Yours cryptically,
Gururaj

---

by Gururaj

While having lunch with a friend ,observed an impulse in me to fill up a silent period with ...chatter and, just that one time, used the mouth only for eating.

More often , the impulses ran riot and words which were not all that necessary were uttered. But at-least ,for a few times, there was an awareness in the background of this pattern in me.

LVL says in one of his blogs in April, that we are so driven to make a spectacle of ourselves in wordly transactions.
Surely,talking is one of the means for manifesting this urge.

---

by JohnS

In speaking to a casual acquaintance in a cafe yesterday, I first excused myself regarding opening a conversation by denigrating a previous stranger there, who I described as someone who talked too much. This suddenly made me aware of how much I was talking, and it let me 'oversee' the resulting conversation, where at least I consciously considered the other's position, and tempered my own mania for filling up the holes. I also caught my self justifying my chat, as I believed it was very interesting, and would benefit the other person greatly!

Coincidentally, while currently reading one of Castaneda's latest books, they are experimenting with holding onto reason, and letting it go. The criterion for losing the stranglehold on reasonableness is to stop the incessant internal dialogue. At this stage in his training, it often takes Castaneda only a few minutes to obtain silence, whereas in his earlier stages it would take hours.
One of the reasons for his progress is that he has someone external to keep prodding and shouting at him. How can we measure any real progress if we have to do it alone (physically, if not mentally)?

John

---

by Cassandra

> John Summers wrote:
> Coincidentally, while currently reading one of Castaneda's latest books, they are experimenting with holding onto reason, and letting it go. The criterion for losing the stranglehold on reasonableness is to stop the incessant internal dialogue. At this stage in his training, it often takes Castaneda only a few minutes to obtain silence, whereas in his earlier stages it would take hours.
> One of the reasons for his progress is that he has someone external to keep prodding and shouting at him. How can we measure any real progress if we have to do it alone (physically, if not mentally)?
> John

Good point, John. We are all alone in these attempts....The inner dialogue for me starts immediately after waking and intensifies in the shower. In some ways, these are times of clarification, but mostly not. I had several opportunities to resist outward commentary, and on two occasions (big ones), I did. My 11 year old son has a head cold. He blew his nose in class; he reported that the teacher said this was "disgusting" and ordered him out of the class to blow the nose. Just writing about this makes me angry for a number of reasons, but I did not send an email or go to the school to tell her how I felt about this. School is almost over for the year, and I won't have to hear about this person any more. But I did relay this to another parent last night. So, I don't know how well I am able to really stand back from this and hold my tongue.

---

by Alistair

As expected there have been numerous instances this week of moments when the tongue would done well to stay silent.

The first major incident occurred on Tuesday afternoon during the first attempt to lower a 600kg concrete liner 6 metres into the well shaft using a chain winch. The winch only had a length of 2 metres so I knew beforehand that we would need to tie the liner and extend the winch rope. Unfortunately due to what I already knew was a shortage of rope I used a couple of pieces I shouldn’t and dropped the liner into the shaft causing it to shatter irreparably. This was the cue for my partner to start screaming I told you so not uncommon behaviour. More and more I accept that this is part of my karma and resist the temptation to verbally retaliate but on this occasion I failed and returned the derision with interest.

During the hours of sleep from Thursday night to Friday morning it was increasingly apparent that I was suffering some kind of illness, sore throat, running nose. Friday as mentioned previously was Good Friday, the first day of the Easter weekend fast, the culmination of Lent.

For Lent I exclude all red meat. Early in the period I was this year tempted by a little fish but as the period passed the non flesh diet was both enjoyable and acceptable. Easter weekend has become a full three day fast until Monday at dawn, water only, this year due to illness with a little lemon juice.
In previous years the fast was spent quietly with a little light work and frequent meditation but this year the combination of work in the well from just after 7am until 5pm and feeling unwell, with only water for support caused almost constant inner irritability that quite often manifested in to say the least sharp speech.

Today, as my health recovers and no need for physical work, thankfully there has been more silence.

So Easter this year has been quite sobering in the sense of realising how little progress has actually been made in the last three years since reading Beelzebub’s Tales three times and gaining access to Gnostic Teachings.

There seems to be some confusion with the order of posting group exercises. I have become used to following Harry hence my post last week, but a look at the schedule today reveals that this it was not actually my turn, perhaps this could be clarified.

---

by Alistair

Guru

Thanks for the link to James, it's easier than my Bible with the magnifying glass

Work Program week beginning 6 May 2013

---

by JohnS

In order to set up some immediacy, a sense of urgency, a sense of fate:

Live only by the hour: give yourself an hour of time left in your life, and feel what this does to you:
1) It will feel like an indulgence, because suddenly you may feel that an hour is a long time, and you're taking a risk in giving yourself that much time
2) Reason and normality will fight it: how can you plan anything if you only look an hour ahead? (well, this is only an excuse, not common sense, if you really admit it, because giving yourself an hour makes more sense, as essential planning is then a total necessity, and it almost eliminates life's mixture of usual so-called 'planning' and what just happens -fate and accident)
3) You have no choice but to have an Essential Aim, and to act on it
4) If you live longer than an hour, then the second hour will have reflection in it: how lucky you are to have another hour after your last one, and - was the last one good enough?

Can't say in all honesty that I'll see you at the end of the week, but...did we go out fighting??

John

---

by JohnS

Well, so far, I must admit, this directive ha been a total failure for me:

The preoccupations of life - plus the hopes and expectations accompanying them - have taken over completely, and comfort reigns once more.

I am reading and distilling some pretty powerful and illuminating material these days, however, this experience shows that my core is not resonating fundamentally with it - it is more like a surface wish, an ideal that I am able to put off indefinitely, although I can tell myself sincerely that an hour from now is too late, because at the end of that hour, another hour is certain to appear.

I shall try again.

John

---

by Harry

John, I think the problem with the exercise is the fantasy aspect of it. We all only live for the moment. It is our illusion that there might be more time. And deep down we know that. I think that is why we respond to disasters the way that we do. A 9/11 throws your being into a different level of experiencing. In the same way viewing a car accident. We "shift gears".

What G would say, I think, is to divide your attention. You only have so much energy. You act in life. You let life go on and no one should know you are doing anything differently. If there was only an hour left then you would act differently.

---

by JohnS

You've nailed it, Harry.
What I was trying to get at was exactly that energy for shifting the gear. It must be approachable to some degree, as G. emphasised it so much, and importantly and conclusively in chapter 48.

It definitely feels like a lack of the right energy, and as you pointed out, we know the method - but accumulation through practice has to be there first.

Sorry to bring Castaneda up again, but he refers to a diagram (not shown) of the 6 energy centres in the body, plus an extra two (higher centres) that are not connected, but need to be for extraordinary things to happen.
Love the equivalence, universality, of all these teachings

John

---

by Gururaj

Many years ago , as I stood at the edge of the bungee jump platform looking with unspeakable apprehension at the ground way below, the person managing said, "When I say go, you go" .Somehow I did just that with no hesitation.

An external trigger is usually needed , the way I am.

On one's own , acting with a sense of urgency , even for conventional life aims, has been developed in me gradually over the years, and is always a struggle.

For inner aims, too consistent efforts seem to be required (from the lower centres) , for those fabled higher centres to do their job.

At the beginning of the week , for half-a-day, kept the feeling for the task - was quick to forgive ,apologised promptly and watched my breath closely.

---

by Cassandra

For me, the usual anxieties of whether I'd done enough to "enter the kingdom of heaven" after I died. Again, this superficial understanding of the larger picture--as if one day, I'm grocery shopping and the next (if I'd earned it), caught up in the spiritual realm. So, I imagined trying to 'get my house in order' so to speak so that I would 'live on.' But that's like seeing things in terms of a foot race or or other competition. I was never able to even approach a different energy level.

Work Program week beginning 13 May 2013

---

by Cassandra

Mother's Day

I'm not sure what the rotation is, but given it's Mother's Day in the US, it seems appropriate to reflect on the influence of mothers on our Work. How has your mother influenced any search for something higher, different than the ordinary. And what is your present relationship with your mother, whether living or deceased? What does the Work say about a mother's role in one's life, if anything?

---

by Harry

An interesting question in that G says don't start with God. Make your parents your god.

My relationship with my mother was a bit of a quandary at times. She was strictly Catholic. When I was divorced I was going to hell. Even on her dying bed she wanted to see me get back together with my wife after thirty years apart. But more importantly is G's demand that we each "pay for our arising." This is something I taught my son throughout his life. And something he still tries to do, despite having a very strained relationship. In a sense my mother, his grandmother, was as much his female progenitor. And he helped her pass through the end of her life. Often spending more time daily with her than myself, my brother or sister.

I remember early on in the Work, when I fasted every Advent and Lent. Totally vegan during those periods. And Thanksgiving comes right there. I applied G's discussion about eating. When out in public others should not know what you are doing. So we ate thanksgiving dinner with Mom and Dad. (For those in other countries, this is a family holiday in which gluttony over turkey is honored above all else.) In her last outing before dying, we took Mom to a local French Restaurant for Thanksgiving dinner. We ate turkey with all the trimmings.

The interesting thing about this is that eating the turkey would almost make me ill. I had started me fast and meat did not taste good to me. And my stomach was already into the purge. Rest assured Mom never knew about this early on. After she passed 80 and was on her own I explained to her my fasting routine. In a sense this was something she understood. The Catholic Church requires such fasting. Or at least used to.

More importantly, I think, is the ethical and moral background we were raised in. Would I have found the Work without that religious input? I don't know. I see students now who have not had that same moral core. Beyond that was Mom the teacher. Every summer we read. Eventually a reward was given. A dollar for each book finished. Both my sister and I continued to be life long learners. Once I had my son on the reading path, he was devouring the library at home. (As an English major I have some library.) He told me recently how he climbed to the top of the book shelf to get to the Work Books up there. G was and is held in reverence on the top shelf, together. As a young boy he realized these books were treated differently. They weren't kept from him, but the have always been on the top shelf. So he climbed up to investigate them, because he knew they held power for me. So he started reading the Work before I let him know anything about it.

He did get Sufi stories very early only. Highly recommend Idries Shah's Mulla Nasruddin series for anyone who has children. Great learning and fun for younger workers.

---

by Gururaj

My mother (now in her mid-seventies)was and is not a very religious person as far as outward practice goes.
This is quite a departure from the norm for a person from a traditional Hindu milieu of her age. She could never bring herself to follow rituals beyond the bare minimum nor did she express devotion to or deep curiosity about a higher entity.
Now she meditates a lot but does not read deeply about the subject.

When I moved into adulthood , my own attitude was that God was not the Creator but a creation of humans.

So I had no ready 'solutions' when ,through much of my later twenties and early thirties , often was in the grip of a major personal angst.
("A feeling of deep anxiety or dread, typically an unfocused one about the human condition or the state of the world in general ")
So it's been a long and continuing journey of discovery and an open-ness about the quest may have been unconsciously inculcated by my Mom.

My experience of Mother is a person who accepts everything about her sons. There is more give rather than take or ask.
And I must admit, I often take her for granted. I consider that I do my duty towards her but my wife is much more warmer in her interactions with my Mom.
Yet , when I hear or read any Ode to Motherhood, a lump forms in the throat.

---

by Cassandra

Growing up, my mother was everything to my sister and me. Father was there, but that's about it. We were brought up in the very conservative black church of the U.S. South; at an early age, I can remember my mother singing from a hymnal, and to this day, I wax sentimental when I hear a particular hymn. This context nurtured what may be a 'natural' inclination to search for God. Around about age 10, my mother's sister and her family became Jehovah's Witnesses. This conversion really changed the tone and tenor of our family because everything we'd believed or done as a family around religious holidays (and secular ones as well) was brought into question. No Christmas, Thanksgiving, Easter, Halloween, even Mother's Day. That's a different story, but suffice it to say, there were long drawn out discussions/arguments among the adults about heaven and hell and who would go to each of these places--'only the 144,000.' Scary stuff for a 10 year-old. But my mother was influenced by these exchanges, and after many years, converted to JW.

After college, I realized could not reconcile with the 'Jesus as the only path to God' instruction I had grown up with. I don't tell my mother this, because similar to Harry's mother, she has a strict interpretation of God; and I see no purpose in rehashing the old divisiveness. We did celebrate Mother's Day with her last week, despite what her religion teaches about holidays. I now know the need I have to pay for my arising. I think this is crucial to right development but sorely lacking. One way of honoring and paying back for me is taking the material form of trying to help my mother purchase a home, one where the roof doesn't leak, and there is sufficient ventilation during the hot summer months.

Thanks both Gururaj and Harry for your input. I'll look into Idries Shah's Mulla Nasruddin series for my kids this summer for summer reading.

Work Program week beginning 20 May 2013

by Judy

Suggested Work program.

The following is paraphrased from Sy Ginsburg's “Gurdjieff Unveiled” Appendix 3 “Exercises”. The author divides our exercises into three groups; first are the Strivings, which are considered so fundamental that they should be done all the time; second Sy calls the various Stop exercises and thirdly, all the psychological exercises. He suggests that the second and third groups be altered weekly to avoid mechanicalness.
Into the first group, he has added an extra seven strivings. Here they are for those who may not have the book:
The first five are of course the familiar Obligolnian Strivings found on P386 of Beelzebub's Tales.
Then:
Striving to watch the reflection of the splendor of the sunrise every day. P78
Striving to meditate every day. 355
Striving to consciously labor. 792
Striving to intentionally suffer. 792
Striving to put ourselves in the position of others. 1164
Striving to be cognizant of the inevitability of ours and others deaths. 1183
Striving to manifest “as if” we already stand in objective consciousness. 132 – 136
(this last is from Life is Real only then when “I am”.)

This week our exercise involves the first of these additional strivings. It is part of our BT Forum reading for this week, on P78.

“So in the meantime, exist as you exist. Only do not forget one thing, namely, at your age it is indispensably necessary that every day, at sunrise, while watching the reflection of the splendor, you bring about a contact between your consciousness and the various unconscious parts of your general presence. Try to make this state last and to convince the unconscious parts – as if they were conscious – that if they hinder your general functioning, they, in the period of your responsible age, not only cannot fulfill the good that befits them, but your general presence of which they are part, will not be able to be a good servant of our COMMON ENDLESS CREATOR and by that will not even be worthy to pay for your arising and existence.”
(from 1950 pdf)

Ponder:
Do I feel the true remorse that Hassein feels, even at his young age, at not realizing fully enough just how much has been given to me, at great cost to those who have gone before? Have I considered clearly how best to pay for my arising and existence?

Make a list please, of three unconscious parts or manifestations which I notice are hindering the most mindful and effective doing of my daily being-duty.
Please share these observations with the group.

For those who wish to do so, locating Sy Ginsburg's seven additional strivings from your copy of Beelzebub's Tales and Life is Real, may also prove fruitful. It was for me.
I have been revisiting "Gurdjieff Unveiled" recently and as always, it is found to be a treasure of basic exercises from the Master, as well as providing reminders towards such essential attitudes as reverence and gratitude.
The other focus of personal work involves observation of inner talking, especially with regard to any negativity, with a view to stopping this maleficent habit and replacing it with an affirmation such as "It is nothing. I wish to be."

Perhaps you may like to share with the group your own personal efforts as well as comments on the above.
Regards,
Judy.

---

by Gururaj

After watching the sunrise from the house terrace for the 2nd time this week (nothing splendourous felt - in a city landscape) , I pondered on the days gone by and the experiences.

The organism is always giving a feedback - through sensations of the body . When I adopt an uncomfortable posture , the discomfort is felt .When I allow negative emotions to persist , there is an effect on the body as well , which reinforces the negative emotion - if I allow it.

I am unconscious as I go thru' daily life and when the effects accumulate , finally the organism draws my attention to it.

This is not intentional suffering at all.

The chief unconscious part , or way of being ,seems to be allowing the mind-brain and emotions to run in their usual way , in the background .

Maybe watching them in the face, so to say, acknowledging and accepting them and making an appropriate affirmation - closer to the moments of manifestation, would be a first step in getting back the balance to even start paying for my arising.

Thanks for the task ,Judy.

Work Program week beginning 27 May 2013

---

by Gururaj

Apart from proposing that we all continue to work towards bringing a shift in our usual waking consciousness,(as per the many tools and suggestions given in the previous week's program by Judy) I am also inviting your participation in a sort of survey this week.

Please share about your perception of

(a) the valuation of Work/4th Way/Gurdjieff for your life .

(b) Going forward how do you see your participation in the Online Work Group here on ES and why.

Needless to say, the answers, and discussions arising therefrom ,I feel, may be crucial for the future shape and even existence of this forum.
Therefore participation of all is requested.

Regards to all,
Gururaj

---

by Gururaj

I missed adding this part in the task above. Hence this postscript .

Almost 4 years ago , Chuck had contributed this link

http://www.phx-ult-lodge.org/eternal_verities.htm

Particularly read the sections numbered 35 to 43 as a valuable and inspiring input for the "shift in consciousness" portion of theweek's program

---

by Harry

I met the Fourth Way in the basement bookstore over forty years ago. Found All and Everything in the library. Don't think I've gone a day since without it. I begin each day with a greeting of the Sun and a reading from one of the texts, chosen at random. (Or a book I'm rereading in order.) I end the day with a centering prayer and "Center of Gravity" contact with Higher Being Centers. Work is a balancing force in my life. It is the equalizing force. I'm not saying I am always successful, but the Work is there as I move through Life. And Life moves through me. When we do this we change our being, we change our life, we change our past and future.

---

by Gururaj

2 days ago ,while reading the sections 35 to 43 on the Theosophical School link I posted above, , It was a shock of sorts to see a topic discussed which had always been a deep mystery for me - that there is no end to space . How can it be so - was the unspoken thought always.

Then the remembrance came of the Hermes Trismegistus saying "As above so below" leading to the idea that in me as well there must be an object as well as space around it . So it is but natural that this being simultaneously is identified as well as free.

Somehow the power of the thought did bring a distinct shift in being of "seeing" this dynamically . There was my usual mind, there was a separation from it and there was the attention of this as a whole. It seemed as though all 3 forces Affirming (some deeper or pure aspect), denying (my individuality) and reconciling (the overall attention) were acting simultaneously.

Priceless experience - unless I am deluding myself - and any cautionary inputs from others are welcome.

Such moments , and the preparing of the ground , show the value of Work for me .

---

by JohnS

The Work has been a constant focal point for me since its ‘discovery’, because there was a truth in the detail that was constant throughout – and that detail was in itself a revelation. Repeatedly, the foundations of the system support me in other efforts, across all borders – something nothing else comes close to.

A typical life-enhancing example happened (again!) yesterday, in a non-Work-based book I am reading. In ordinary circumstances, this passage would be classed as ‘interesting,’ but with the Work background it became a crystal-clear explanation of a fundamental striving – and thus yet another verification of the universality of Gurdjieff’s system:

“Then I exploded. I disintegrated. Something in me gave out; it released something I had kept locked up all my life. I was thoroughly aware then that my secret reservoir had been tapped and that it poured out immediately. There was no longer the sweet unity I call “me.” There was nothing, and yet that nothing was filled. It was not light or darkness, hot or cold, pleasant or unpleasant. It was not that I moved or floated or was stationary: neither was I a single unit, a self, as I am accustomed to being. I was a myriad of selves which were all “me,” a colony of separate units that had a special allegiance to one another and would join unavoidably to form one single awareness, my human awareness. It was not that I ‘knew’ beyond the shadow of a doubt, because there was nothing I could have ‘known’ with, but all my single awareness ‘knew’ that the ‘I,’ the ’me’ of my familiar world was a colony, a conglomerate of separate and independent feelings that had an unbending solidarity to one another: the unbending solidarity of my countless awarenesses, the allegiance that those parts had for one another was my life force.”

John

---

by Judy

Interesting quote, John. Where is it from?

Regards,
Judy.

---

by JohnS

Hi, Judy;

"Tales of Power" by Carlos Castaneda.

John

---

by Cassandra

As someone said recently, we are all at different places with the Work. I think I joined this Forum in 2007, not sure what to expect. I saw (and see) that my life is mostly ruled by avoidance of fear and desires for what is not. This is what I hope to change by Working, but I find it is not glamorous, but if I can perceive a shift in being where the fear and the longing can be observed, then it is worth the effort.

Work Program 2 weeks beginning 3 June 2013

---

by Harry

Have you read All and Everything three times as suggested by G in the Prologue? Have you studied Meetings with Remarkable Men and tried to piece out the places and people and ideas therein? Have you then followed up with the Third Series?

Is G a real Teacher?

Few if any of us began with Gurdjieff. Whether it be Ouspensky or Nicoll or Orage or any of the other students who later went on to found their own groups we probably started with one of these pupils. Who did you start with? Where did you go from there?

Did you then do a comparative study of World Religions?

Studied in a Group that still continued from one of the original pupils?

Are all teachers created equal? At a bookstore run by people from Mr. Nyland's group they proudly featured books by Alice Bailey. Others have delved toward Cayce.

There is only one God and His name is God. The Islamic recitation.

What do you want to immerse yourself in?

Can man serve multiple Masters?

---

by Cassandra

Harry, I started with an interest in meditation/yoga in college, then read a range of 'spirutual' books; but a really big help was the 12 step program--Al Anon; no bells or whistles but constant work on oneself. Then that lead to A Course in Miracles, eventually to Eckhart Tolle. He mentioned G. several times; and that lead to ISOTM and to this group. There was a group in Atlanta that I participated in for a while, but that never felt right, can't explain it. I eventually found this group. Recently, I started reading Views; put it down for a while but am about to pick in up again; also started BT with the group but stopped.

People on this forum mention other influences, but if they point to the same road, I don't have a problem with that. What seems important is consistency.

---

by Harry

Speaking of Work on Oneself, has anyone tried any of the lessons that G included in his stories in All and Everything?

---

by Gururaj

Turning the torchlight towards this organism , in a way, started first either side of my Twenties with popular self-help books.
Then it was the teachings of J Krishnamurthi and Ramana Maharshi.

Took many years to read G's BT - once through - , while also going thru' (more digestible material) on a site under the GeoCities link which has now become defunct.

Only after becoming a member of this forum did I attempt Work on myself. A few fellow seekers in my city are also there adding another dimension compared to the virtual on-line interaction.

There is an overall sense that the organism is slowly "drying" up and loosing the "moisture" of personality but a lot remains to be still lost to truly become combustible material.

Many more questions in Harry's post need to be pondered on and , as I see it , try to see objectively what I am doing with G's teachings.
Yes, he is a great Guru for me - both for providing the nuts and bolts , the daily tools for Inner work as well as a provider of a cosmic vision.

---

by Harry

I often forget Krishnamurti. Some really interesting works.

The question isn't whether there are other valuable works out there. Hopefully everyone has done some comparative religion study once they met G or O or whomever. Because there is some much the same. And the archeology of things like the pyramids on two continents, the Taj Mahal, Canterbury. The lei system in England. The dolmans throughout the middle east. Pythagoras. And how many of those does G mention in his own works?

Modern literature. e. e. Cummings. Leonard Cohen. John Fowles. Steinbeck. How much is there in a small volume like Of Mice and Men?

But who else has provided a unified system of All and Everything?

---

by JohnS

I did a lot of study before G, including Gnosticism, Kaballah, Egyptian, Greek, American Indian, but there was always something missing - due, I found out later - to the fact that none of these faiths were native to me. Strangely enough, after studying G, I began to see and feel the similarities in all these differing paths, and they are much more a part of me now, in a collective way.

Regarding contemporary writers / artists, I can't help looking at the centre(s) from which their work seems to come. Italians such as Calvino (and, in the past, Da Vinci and Dante) seem very balanced, and that to me is an overriding condition for appreciation.

I am currently reading a book on the Toltec indians, and I may as well be reading a Work book, the methods and aims being so similar. However, without G as a reference, it would all fade and disintegrate.

John

---

by Boever

I have been studying the occult for about 5-6 years now, mainly focussing on Qabalah, Magick, Alchemy, Hermeticism, Egypt. Although I'm now fully focussed on fourthway and practical alchemy.
One needs a firm base in either of the systems before you can start comparing with other systems. Like John says, once you have some understanding of the concepts, you start recognizing the same in other systems.

Let me illustrate with an example of the simularity of hermeticism and fourthway.
Active force : Fire
Passive force : Water
Neutralising force : Air
Hydrogen : Earth

Although each system has some idea's I find the fourthway to be the most complete system. f.e. I haven't met with another system that has the idea's of self-remembering or identification in it.
Remember that the teaching has been the same throughout all the ages, it's just the outer form that keeps changing (necessarily). Esoteric Christianity talks about sleep and being aware of yourself, but without the understanding of fourthway these would just be some other meaningless words.

I have read BT's 2 times front to back and often pick it up to reread some chapter. I haven't read it as if reading it out loud to someone. I am planning on doing this when I finish my current books. Do you guys think that you should read them out loud to yourself? Do you pass the information to your physical center more easily like this?

I am currently in the Gurdjieff Institute of Belgium, this group was founded by 2 people in 1970. They asked for help from the Paris group (founded by Salzmann) to help organise the group. Now a days they are in close relation with the groups in Paris and Amsterdam. Our group in Belgium has monthly movements and activities. The movements are being thaught by a women who knew Gurdjieff as a child. Altough I haven't been able to join the movements nor the activities, I would recommend everyone to look for a local group. The vibration that fills the room when everyone starts meditating together is remarkable.

---

by Harry

I don't think you need to read it aloud to yourself. But you should read it as if you are actually pronouncing the words. When you do this you will also find G had a great sense of humor. Beyond Mr. Bellybutton.

---

by Boever

I just read this interesting piece regarding BT
(Hidden Meanings and Picture-form Language in the Writings of G. I. Gurdjieff (Excavations of the Buried Dog) Copyright 2007, John Henderson)

So, if you have not yet read that book from cover to cover, do so now. Even if it puts you to sleep, fight that sleep and read it. Read it aloud (highly recommended) – or, as Gurdjieff put it, “as if reading to someone else” (when seemingly alone), which means, of course, that you should read aloud – to your other ‘self.’ Read standing up or pacing back and forth, read with a pot of coffee at the ready; use a cold wet cloth or pinch yourself or stomp your feet or do whatever it takes, but do read that book. This one will wait.

(sorry for going off topic a bit)

---

by Harry

Not off topic. Just consider this. If you are stomping on your foot, etc. are you really reading as if to someone else?

G is trying to get you to read so that you are Communicating the Meaning to Another Person. Which means that you are already familiar with the content and are considering your listener. This is something that is done in the theatre all the time. You read to yourself as if others are hearing you. You look at inflections, sentence structure, pauses. You consider all of those parentheses that G uses. You consider the strange capitalization. But you don't go through histrionics to stay awake.

Quite frankly I have never found myself dozing when reading G. And I mean both types of sleep. If my attention wanes I go back and reread the same paragraph again.

---

by Boever

(Hidden Meanings and Picture-form Language in the Writings of G. I. Gurdjieff (Excavations of the Buried Dog) Copyright 2007, John Henderson)

I started reading Beelzebub's Tales "as if you were reading aloud to another person". I was wondering if I should read this aloud, I think Gurdjieff answered it for me on the very first page.

"..when beginning anything new, unfaillingly to pronounce aloud or, if not aloud, at least mentally,..."
"..begin by pronouncing this utterance and moreover pronounce it not only aloud, but even very distinctly and with full, as the ancient Toulousites definded it, "wholly-manifested-intonation".."
".. in this new venture of mine will now proceed, as is said, "like a pianola".."

Does he intend to turn us into a wholly-manifested-intoning pianola?

---

by Gururaj

> Harry wrote:
> Can man serve multiple Masters?

If one does that , it may be like trying to dig multiple wells for reaching to the water in the same water table.
It is better , instead , to stick to digging one well - well . (our energy is limited and precious).
However , one can always interact with other well diggers to learn useful techniques from them.

As proposed elsewhere earlier at the start of this roster, we can continue for the next week as well Working with Harry's post started on June 3rd.

---

by JohnS

I'm tending to disagree about 'multiple masters:'

I know this is not implying a conflict in views between approaches, however I, at least, have often found a degree of insight from an appropriate (for me) alternative approach, even if only from the idea of perspective. Simply by some other party expressing a Work idea in a different format, it can suddenly expand the depth and vision of the original teaching.
One aspect of this has to do with the unfettering of the unconscious following of what is commonly known as Groupthink, where a firm belief in the truth of a system begins to become rigid, as you must agree to all the principles and methods of this system by putting it on a preferential pedestal to all others, resulting in somewhat of a subtle closing off in ultimate value of those other approaches.

If 'other' methods end up reinforcing the original Work, thus placing even more value on this primary Belief, then I would class it as a reinforcement of focus, not a scattering. For example, I am currently investigating some specific exercises on feeling using self-observation, designed to refine what feeling is and is not. I know Gurdjieff has described this also, and in precise detail, however one does not negate the other. These exercises are quite simple, though specific, and I know I could not have endowed them with any worth without the unbending faith in my primary system.

As the Work emphasises, 'bad action' or wrongdoing increases unconsciousness, and the only good is conscious expansion.

John

---

by Gururaj

> John Summers wrote:
> If 'other' methods end up reinforcing the original Work, thus placing even more value on this primary Belief, then I would class it as a reinforcement of focus, not a scattering.
> As the Work emphasises, 'bad action' or wrongdoing increases unconsciousness, and the only good is conscious expansion.
> John

Very true, John. The general emphasis of your post is also what I intended to convey.

G himself , I understand ,has said that his teachings are based on other , prior explorations.

Thanks, Tomas for the link to John Henderson's eBook extract. It was interesting to note G's clarification to his pupils that not just the bone , the dog itself is buried in his works.

---

by Harry

We started this out fairly well. Just post what is on your mind for the day. I'm sure we all do something every day. For example I reread the introduction to the Third Series this morning. Some interesting little insights. I get something new every time I read G.

A question he brings up himself, is it possible for someone not familiarized with his mentation to understand his writing? Is that why he suggests to read A&E three times?

---

by Cassandra

Okay, so just posting what is on my mind for the day: much has been said about various traditions--the emphasis being on the reading of these. If I concentrate only on this, I run the risk of possibly intellectualizing Work or Fourth Way ideals. Don't get me wrong, read on, but for me the "rub" comes when in the midst of life, being able to relate, especially to other humans, based on the foundation provided by real Work on oneself--from whatever tradition this comes. Currently, I'm on a road trip with my family-husband and 2 kids, to and from the US state of Colorado--halfway across country for us--Beautiful, cool weather in the Colorado Rockies, hot humid in the middle of the country. Seven to eight hours in a car all day with 3 others provides nice opportunities for the doing of Work. I'm constantly reminded.

So many examples of mechanicalness could be shared and also the fight against that same mechanicalness. For example, we drive through a city and the mind wants to categorize instantly: "is this a good part of town or a bad part of town; are these people Republicans or Democrats, should I give the panhandler a dollar for gas or not" etc.; Irritations from kids talking too loudly; sun burning too brightly.

How do I respond? Wonderful work opportunities.

---

by Gururaj

A magazine specialising in green alternatives , to which I subscribe, guided me to a link this week to a documentary titled "Earthlings" .

In graphic detail it shows how man has treated ,and is treating , with appalling callousness , fellow earthling animals for mass produced food, entertainment , luxury goods , scientific trials and by habitat degradation.

For us individuals all these are a remote issue. What is out of sight is out of mind.
It was a very disturbing , extremely saddening series of filmed visuals of actual every day scenes of man's treatment of his two-brained brethren on this planet.
What else can we expect from a mass of mechanical humans ? It was a shock to make me feel that I need to intensify my Work efforts.

Listening to Audio readings of M.Nicoll's commentaries are a day-beginner for me since many days followed by listening to short recordings of De Hartmann's G. music .

However much the reading , ultimately it is the sensitive self observation alone which is of value. Rare are these moments in the midst of incessant activity.

---

by Harry

Intellectualizing is one of the difficult things. When I first started this work, the constant feedback I got from the Nyland group was "get out of your head." To combine the two responses, I think our green movements are from a wrong placement of our intellectual interpretation. And this is also the reason I posted the question about serving multiple masters.

I find it impossible to read G with only one center. Yet the intellectual center is absolutely necessary. And such works as the Buried Dog seem to come from the same place. I remember when we first discussed it and I just stopped reading.

Wiseacring starts in the mechanical part of the intellectual center. In the secretary if you will.

I remember in college I had professors who berated me for using the word "feel". Because to them feelings didn't matter. So I learned to be an intellectual. And then I had to unlearn all of that.

You should have seen the diagrams and charts of Hydrogens and the like that I created when reading O.

---

by Gururaj

"getting out of the head" ....Umm .

These are more of a questions to myself - to organically explore.

'Intellectuals' are out of touch with their and other's feelings ?

One common observation of 'intellectuals' is that they are low on action / being.
So , for such tendencies to be balanced ,is that a pointer for what to Work upon ?

Are'nt feelings (of a certain kind) the origin of "green" movements or "green" thinking ?

What is the difference between being intellectual and being sensitive ?

Al Gore and George Bush come to mind , somehow.

The Lower intellect coupled with insensitivity can be very dangerous - if possessed by an action-oriented person.

Does a sensitive intellectual suffer more . If she or he gets the right magnetic centre ,do they therefore get more opportunities to transmute their pain through intentional suffering ?

---

by Gururaj

The precision in language matters.

A person full of Inner consideration can also be termed "Sensitive" .
And such a person's "Green" campaign may be just a reaction from his mechanical suffering ?

I meant an impartial , objective sensitivity in the previous post.
It is just an intellectual ideal and I can see that ,for me as I am ,it is not an actual experience.

---

by JohnS

Being 'sensitive' to things such as Green issues could be based on our intuitive knowledge that we are literally part of the Earth and its systems, thus we should innately respect it; however, because we have learned not to trust or develop intuition, the end result is a feeling of guilt at our actions,
A comedian put it well yesterday (it could have been B speaking{):

One advanced being from another planet asked another: "How are the Humans going? I believe you said they are on Jupiter??"
The first replied: :I didn't say Jupiter, I said 'Stupider.'" Amen.

Reason gives us our fixed view of the world, thus it must not be purely intellectual, as it also includes emotions such as 'like' and 'don"t like', which are part of our classifications. And you're right in that they all belong to personality only, and thus are totally unreal.

What other kind of completely different world is out there and in there, for the three-centred being?

John

---

by Judy

Good morning everyone.
Well, I've been absent for quite a while, though have managed to check-in each day (or close to it) to read this most interesting discussion.
The longer I do not post, the more difficult it seems to be.
So much so, that I have to wonder if this could be how we have lost some regular posters over the years.
However, I do not want to lose my seat at this sumptuous table. It is way too important to me.
So I make a small effort to get back into the "swing of things" today.

My Search began with Theosophy. Having said that, I, too, strangely, forgot to mention Krishnamurti. A favourite uncle, who lived with us when he wasn't in India, was a close disciple of J. Krishnamurti's. As he lived with us for several months each year for many years of my childhood, he had quite an influence on me. In hindsight, it could well have sown many seeds.
Some years into Theosophy, I "found" Gurdjieff - first reading ISOTM and The Fourth Way of O's, then Nicoll's Commentaries and Beelzebub's Tales came soon after. That was 1979.
Unlike Harry, I cannot honestly claim to have never left Gurdjieff. The first time I left it was to pursue a career after a marriage breakup. This went well for a time. Then I somehow got into trouble with alcohol. I joined the Transcendental Meditation community for some four years then - I still use their meditation method sometimes. Lovely people; no drinking; no smoking; no meat. It was good for a while. Though I had given up direct Gurdjieff Work, I still read Nicoll more or less regularly. After this came several years of great confusion and incomprehensible demoralisation as alcoholism gained a foothold. I found Alcoholics Anonymous in 1996 and, although it was not easy at first, I have since been blessed with a life beyond my wildest dreams. So now the Twelve Step Program is a big part of my activities.
Since 1996, Gurdjieff has been my primary path.
I don't perceive these different paths as "serving two masters". Both help me to serve God and my fellow human beings. The main distinction I need to make is to make sure that I am actually practising as best I know how, and not just reading about "how to practise."

I begin each day with prayer, meditation and several daily readings. Also check in here and usually read Lee van Laer's blog.
Thoughts this morning have included gratitude for the synchronicities abounding around "intuition" "inner knowing" and "language of the heart", which have also been talked about in this current thread. Everything I listen to or read seems to be echoing this topic.
Everyday thoughts mainly involve usual activities needed to make the transition from living in a guest room in my daughter's house for some weeks, in order to mind her four year old son during a very hectic study-time for her, back to living in my own beach house back here in Cairns. The cat was very pleased to see me.

Best wishes to all,
Judy.

---

by Judy

Oh I forgot to mention.....
According to LVL today, Henri Tracol says that Gurdjieff, on his deathbed, did not say
"I leave you all in a fine mess."
But rather -
"I go now back to planet Karatas."

After reflecting, there was an inner prompting. Some others may be interested in also seeking that inner knowing we call intuition.

---

by Harry

Is stepping on green stepping on corns?

---

by Cassandra

Judy, thanks for the reminder of 12-step programs. I, too, joined a 12 step program some time ago--Al Anon, which is for family and friends of alchoholics. My father was an alchoholic and died from liver disease prematurely, I'm sure. Anyway, the 12 step program emphasizes WORK. Very similar in intent to the G. Work. No glamour, just day to day work.

I wonder sometimes about the makeup of this group, that we are mostly male, and that that tends to shift the focus somewhat away from the intuitive, touchy feely. I would not like to go in the opposite direction of emotion over reason or physicality either; there must be balance. I see the Work as belonging to what deRopp called 'The Master Game.' Humans can play all kinds of games--the scientific/intellectual, religious, and so on, but the one worth engaging in is that master endeaver, no matter what tradition it comes from.

My thing is the grandmother test: if a tradition could be practiced by my unlearned grandmothers then I think it has some merit. Could my grandmother self-remember yet not be able to construct diagrams depicting the intricacies Hydrogen? I think so.

---

by Judy

As soon as I left my previous post, I remembered one notable omission to the search history - namely that in between Theosophy and full-on acceptance of Mr G's system, I spent twelve years, one monograph per week, on the complete correspondence course which was available from A.M.O.R.C. (Rosicrucians). After several years of this, the children also joined the junior order (think it was called the Torchbearers). They were aged about ten years and six years. We spent a half hour weekly exploring their little monographs and experiments. I also had both of them taught Transcendental Meditation about two years later. They both loved all these activities, though I didn't really see much long term influence. Funny how occasionally there is a nice surprise though. On my recent trip south, I forget what the conversation was about, but somewhere relevant, my daughter says; "By the way, Mum. I have no idea why you think I am agnostic or even atheist. I've always believed in God. Always have and always will - in an esoteric sort of way."

As to why these various traditions, one aspect in my case has to do with local availability to a community of like-minded people. For example, here in Cairns, I am two thousand kilometres away from the nearest Gurdjieff Group, Theosophical Society or Rosicrucian Group, and the closest TM Centre is about half that distance. So this online group is my Gurdjieff group. I do spend several hours weekly with friends from the A.A. fellowship and find absolutely no contradiction in this. It is all about practical spirituality and quite often I'll share something from the Gurdjieff tradition with them. They in turn share their own primary tradition (currently one close friend is a lay Carmelite and another a Buddhist nun) so it is quite eclectic.

So for me it is about daily living as best I can first in my own neighbourhood and then online and occasionally in the wider world. I love the intellectualism from time to time. Would happily immerse myself in the dry learning like a little pig in mud (as Robert de Ropp reminds, one can still be what he calls "pig in trough" even if it isn't about money, but rather about spiritual things. (Yes, Cassandra, "The Master Game" is definitely worth a read; thanks for the reminder) - and be of little use to anyone else. I also love retreats and 'sitting on the mountain top in pristine solitude' but too much of this is also most unhealthy and unhelpful. Where the balance comes in for me, the struggle if you like, is in practical service to family and those around me, because this often involves working against "what it wants to do."

Thanks for instigating this thoughtful discussion, Harry. A bit of a quick review serves to point out my lack very effectively.
Regards,
Judy.

Work Program 2 weeks beginning 17 June 2013

---

by JohnS

Looking through the comments and views from the past two weeks, the diversity of approaches, plus the individual paths developing from them are evident. The constructive outcome seems to be our united belief in the Gurdjieff system. This gives us focus, understanding, continuity, innate certainty, and many more fundamental aspects. Some of our comments are coloured by our personality, and others by the struggle within to contact our Spiritual nature, which we know is innate and constantly present – somewhere.

Now, we all know and feel that our 'education' – what we were taught is real – has been warped from day one. The rest of our lives are dedicated to trying to find the best approach to eradicating and correcting these unfortunate events. G, stresses that we don't really have a good chance of succeeding here unless we are shown the mistakes at an early stage – too late for all of us, it seems. So perhaps some radical steps are needed to awaken us to the urgency.

For the next fortnight, can we be daring enough to be able to report just such a changing step – one that feels decisive and is proven by a change in feeling (not necessarily permanent, for that takes time, as we all know we slip back) – and the contrary situation: the step we know we must take next, but cannot, and what part of us is stopping us.

I'll start by stating that I know with all my feeling that the world I see is totally shaped and limited by my personality – which is a result of my 'education.' If anything unexplainable happens, my reason looks for an explanation, and as soon as it has found it (within the bounds of my own small reason), tidies it up, congratulates itself, slots it into my personal belief system and goes back to sleep.

What I am doing at the moment is using feeling instead of reason by not acting on every thought, but acting on feeling and intuition instead, whatever the consequences (without trying to fall into the trap of acting on every feeling as well- discrimination helped by intuition). Acting on feeling has a rule: I cannot harm myself or others.

So far, my personality has got the upper hand, but several times I have not fought it (useless) but tried to accept its domain.. This gives me some cracks in the fabric, where another view of the 'world' actually appears, which is not imagination. This morning, for instance, the moment I woke -and for a good five minutes after – I felt time around me stop: things were happening around me, but they weren't happening in Time. I felt my breathing, but that too was not progressing along a timeline.

I am slowly beginning to trust my feeling and intuition.

John

by Harry

I spent a long while thinking about this late yesterday. There are so many changes that I could probably write a book.

I believe I came of age in one of those eras that G describes in which growth can occur spontaneously. From about 1964 through 1974 there was an almost universal revolution going on in the States. In retrospect it is called the Vietnam era, The Summer of Love, and many other things. We war babies (and I am on the early cusp of that) were all coming of age. Kennedy was shot. (If you're young think 9/11 but more of an internal revolution to the psyche.) This was followed by RFK and Martin Luther King. There was an unpopular war with nightly pictures of people dying home and away. And a military draft that faced all of those of us coming of age. But perhaps more importantly there was Music, and Literature, and Film.

People sat in front of FM Stereo radio (there was no such thing previously) and listened to underground rock. The Grateful Dead, the Jefferson Airplane, Woodstock happened. And film stepped into things like Easy Rider. (Which was also Music.) Drugs were exported out of the ghetto. People like Tom Wolfe, Tom Pynchon, Ken Kesey, Tom Robbins and John Updike were appearing in literature. Flowing in on this wave were the philosophers and thinkers imported with the Beatles.

My journeys began underground. In an underground bookstore and an underground music store. Multi weekly visits to both. Newspapers from the underground in NYC and LA. Rolling Stone, the magazine. (A social force. If you are much younger than me you can't imagine how much an influence Rolling Stone made.) Both of these stores were "managed" by what would be described as hippie people. (Others made the money.) And it was in that book store I "met" Ouspensky. On one of my journeys. Bought it almost as a challenge. The cover screamed: "The answer to every question you've every had." --Oh yeah, prove it.-- and he did. In the music store I found mind altering music like In Held Twas I, Dark Star, The Incredible String Band. If you've never been "high" listen to A Very Cellular Song and try not to fly.

I could go back and paint a picture of the seeds that had previously been planted that this wealth of fertilizer helped grow. But the real thing is that something had to be held on to. I could flow down to the gutter on everything that was flowing around or I could grab a life boat and start swimming upstream. I chose O and began swimming.

I need to mention one experience. I had read a library copy of All and Everything, and went in search of my own copy. There was another bookstore, called the Dawn of Light. The man who owned this was a devotee of Crowley. I actually feared going into this store. Incense suffocated. There were images that disturbed. But it was where I could buy All and Everything.

The second half answer is one that sits in the back of my brain. How to die. I'm 68. The end is in view. I don't have to work. There is little I want for. This is a changed perspective. I read the opening of the Third Series. G struggling with what to do with his writing, musing that he might have three years left to do it. I must maybe nine. If we all make it that long.

---

by Gururaj

Is what is to be accessed / sensed / felt a 'something' implied by the following extract from an LVL blog -
"Jeanne de Salzmann well understood the intimate link between intuition and knowledge. From The Reality of Being: "We have to guard against judging with our mind before we have allowed our intuition, which is at the heart of the experience, to bring us knowledge." (p. 181.)

Again my thought goes to the 6th sense mentioned by G in BT but not explicitly described. Is this "knowing" , not exactly from the mind. something which is perceived by the 6th sense ?

In the same LVL blog it is indicated that "So we need to know from within the heart, according to our own nature. We need to know what is appropriate for this world. And to know from within the heart is to know organically—from within sensation—and even more from within a blend of sensation, feeling, and intelligence, which is intellect rightly ordered and aligned with the other parts.
This action is rarely present. Self-study accompanied by a right sensation unmasks the missing elements of feeling that belong in an intelligent exchange; and yet such intuition of the heart cannot be invoked or forced upon a situation. It is a Love that arises naturally. This is the intelligence we seek, and which can be given if we search."

Am all at sea , in this exploration. But need to remain in the Search.

---

by JohnS

"So we need to know from within the heart, according to our own nature. We need to know what is appropriate for this world. And to know from within the heart is to know organically—from within sensation—and even more from within a blend of sensation, feeling, and intelligence, which is intellect rightly ordered and aligned with the other parts.
This action is rarely present. Self-study accompanied by a right sensation unmasks the missing elements of feeling that belong in an intelligent exchange; and yet such intuition of the heart cannot be invoked or forced upon a situation. It is a Love that arises naturally. This is the intelligence we seek, and which can be given if we search."

This is it precisely. Add to this Harry's realisation of limited time left, plus monitoring (or decision-making) without closing off the explanation of the feeling by habitual logic - this really takes self-awareness in order to 'see' in an organic manner, plus intuition of the importance of doing this.

My exercise of a few weeks back (which I admitted I failed at, most times) tried to induce this from the best lesson I got from Castaneda: your death is at your left shoulder, it follows you everywhere, and at any time may tap you on that shoulder. So make death your friend.

And, why do we have to die? Because we are born.

John

---

by Harry

I just read the section by G of giving up the most favored thing of his being. Hypnotism. That can be thought of in more ways that one. This is the reminding force.

---

by Judy

Harry,
Thanks for the heads-up on "A Very Cellular Song". Absolutely wonderful! Somehow I missed that one decades ago. My cat had quite a reaction to it. She hopped up to near the laptop and started meowing! Pretty funny - might have been all the strings, but made her high too.
The bookshop (in a lower arcade level - underground) I visited weekly through the seventies was called The Circle Bookshop. And that is where I met O. and G. And yes, there was a favourite record store, yes, run by special people who were more or less alternate for sure. Do you remember Judy Collins and Seals and Croft? And yes, I went to see the Beatles in 1964 and was amazed. I take your point about the sixties and seventies being a time-opportunity for spontaneous growth. As Peter Paul and Mary sang; "The Times They Are A-changing". Wasn't that spot-on for 1960....

I am 68 too, and don't have to work and need for nothing. I like to volunteer two or three days each week at the local Red Cross though. I, too, wonder about dying well from time to time, though perhaps not as much as ideal. Life is good and there is much to be done.

Regards,
Judy.

---

by Harry

Judy,

All of those people and more. I went to the University of Dayton (Ohio) and we had monthly concerts. People like Simon and Garfunkel before anyone had heard of them. And yes Peter Paul and Mary. I don't think those younger than us can quite appreciate what music meant in our lives.

Interesting that you describe a milieu in Australia that was so similar to what we had here in the states. Yes I know we are all part of one big world, but the particularities are interesting.

Harry

---

by Boever

> Harry wrote:
> I just read the section by G of giving up the most favored thing of his being. Hypnotism. That can be thought of in more ways that one. This is the reminding force.

Thanks Harry,

Your words brought me to a new understanding, namely understanding that he is here talking about self-hypnotism.
What better reminding factor is there then the constant self-lying, self-hypnotism, self-suggestion?

---

by JohnS

Yes, self-hypnosis is yet another way of describing the arch-villan of this thread. This is why it is so all-encompassing and yet invisible, unless seen from the 'outside.' also why it is impossible to fight, and only able to be observed. And probably why G. made it the centrepiece of work on oneself.

I have had some pretty good dreams a couple of nights this week, and have taken pains not to analyse them on waking, ie to put them back into the field of logic. As a result, they have slightly increased my field of vision, as I feel them to remain as real as my waking thoughts - though there is a constant magnetic pull from my mind to dismiss them and slot them away.

I know any small annoyance will instantly lessen the boundaries again, but I feel a certain amount of potential for elasticity - a readiness and acceptance for surprise - that has not been shadowing me for some time.

John

---

by Gururaj

Was'nt G an expert in the use of Hypnosis on others ?
I remember reading somewhere that he chose one day to stop using it.

So sacrificing a favourite source of power / joy / satisfaction is what is being referred here as a reminding factor ?

Like our fictional Superman being an ordinary media person most of the day !

Many years ago , I had made it a point to use a bicycle instead of a motorised vehicle for short trips around the neighbourhood .
On the busy city roads ,with more powerful vehicles whizzing about ,and me pedalling away cautiously , there arose a humility and acceptance of my comparatively powerless state.
Moreover there was no energy left for imagination and other mental exertions.

Anyway that was a manufactured "lack".
Without needing to artificially create a lack, one is anyway , in the usual course of the day often experiencing a sense of lack .
An awareness of this lack (instead of being totally identified with it) can be used as a reminding factor for Work on oneself.

---

by Gururaj

> John Summers wrote:
> Now, we all know and feel that our 'education' – what we were taught is real – has been warped from day one. The rest of our lives are dedicated to trying to find the best approach to eradicating and correcting these unfortunate events. G, stresses that we don't really have a good chance of succeeding here unless we are shown the mistakes at an early stage – too late for all of us, it seems. So perhaps some radical steps are needed to awaken us to the urgency.

The fundamental (unreal) "programming" seems to be the creation and sustenance of a psychological Gururaj . Our body needs to be cared for and sustained by attending to the basic needs of the organism (The first Obligolnian striving , in fact, recommends it). But from a very young age - through comparision,etc. - very insidiously - a psychological entity is also created . The reactions of this psychological entity - paradoxically - even harm the physical body (Psychosomatic effects) . Moreover a large part of the organism's energy is engaged in sustaining this personality - to maintain "face".

There was a moment this week when I saw the movement of this force - the urge of my psychological entity wanting to have its way . This seeing gave rise to a truer valuation of external considering , a shift in feeling , albiet short-lived.

The value of a strong ego/personality is mentioned in the Work. Maybe only that , and grace, can help me watch , more often, how and when the false personality takes over. Experiences / comments of the group are welcome.

---

by JohnS

In the books I am currently reading, the personality is described as our whole life. It encompasses everything we use to get through this temporal world. This is why the personality must be strong, so we don't give in, collapse with self-pity. Everything we think of is in personality - even God, because it is how we think God is, not what God really is. This is why G. says we can't destroy personality, because it is the basis of our earthly survival, like it or not. His message is to balance the centres of our personality, in order to give the Outside the best chance of coming in, as in this situation our main resistances (chief features) would be moderated as much as possible.
The only thing outside of personality is what we call spirit, or essence, or whatever. It could be Consciousness- but not our consciousness. It is always there, but ...where is there? It can't be wherever we think it is, because our consciousness can't encompass what is unknowable for our personal logic.
By this definition, the Unknowable will always be unknowable, but I think our individual striving has to do with...how close have some people got?? Can we do it? Our personality certainly thinks so, but where is the small, unmoving kernel that really knows? How do we really tell which is which - fundamentally?

John

---

by Harry

John,

I think this is the danger of serving multiple masters. Personality is all illusion. It is formed by imitation and little i's.

Would G say that the Absolute was connected to personality?

Yes, our normal concept of god is formed in personality. Because we have to make a conscious effort to reconnect and grow our essence. It is covered over like a nut.

When G says we need a strong personality that is what he is talking about. The seed or nut is designed to provide the food for the gestation of the plant. Without a good covering the germ will not grow into a strong plant. The initial food is in that outer layer. We don't destroy it, we use it. Until it is consumed and something else blossoms.

---

by Judy

The thing is, we are not going to be able to observe consciousness - nor infinity, spaciousness, awareness, and such, for that matter, because it is our real nature. We can say that it is 'here', I suppose, if we like. I have had enough direct experiential instances of this over the years to establish a stable kernel of inner knowing. The first instance of this peeping through the veil happened during an early attempt at self-remembering. Correction - this was the first instance where I realised what it was. Surely there were many earlier ones, but lack of knowledge may have prevented the irreversible change in outlook which happened in 1979. I was thirty-four years old then. Felt like everything had rearranged. I'm sure most of us have similar experiences. We may or may not have realised what they are.

And we are both this Spirit/Essence and this 'monkey-human' with all its foibles. Finding the middle path between the two is a constant work in progress. It seems very important to do the small things consciously. This is the practice necessary to have any chance of 'doing' the big things like developing the soul. It also means truly living the life given at each moment. Of course I fall way short of this and that is ok. I must see this lack.

So I look at the "many masters" aspect from a different perspective these days. My current understanding and terminology is that I serve only God, Spirit, and whatever parts of me which are that or in line with that. "God' also means 'the good' for me. This of course frees me up to be quite eclectic in my readings and listenings. It is not so much an endless search any more. The focus now is upon how best to live these realisations, be true to the unitive glimpses I have been gifted.

Love.

---

by JohnS

I definitely did not make it clear enough that I was not implying that the personality was real: what I was connecting it to was the normal temporal world we see and live in , the conditions and vision of which are also not real, but our limited, personal version. So if we take our world as real, we take our personality as real. This is our 'education.'

A good exercise to test the grip it has on what we perceive as solid objects: science has proven that everything is mostly space, but our educated senses continually deny that.
The effort to 'see' objects as particles and space is enormous - thus the grip of our false personality is equivalent in its effort to bind us - thus the initial plea of this thread regarding the quest for the essential but almost-impossible Drastic Step.

John

---

by Cassandra

Going back to John's solicitation that we post about a definitive shift in consciousness or being, something that made clear a response was needed. This actually happened to me at a fairly young age, about 13. I grew up in a conservative christian church, was baptized at 10, and felt at that tender age, that I'd been saved and needed to do nothing more than not sin in order to be in God's favor. It was after a Gospel Meeting (something like a revival) three years later that I knew my baptism was a sham of sorts. I knew that I didn't understand anything about what it meant to be a Christian, nothing. I was more or less following convention. This awareness had come about as a result of sincere prayer and longing after God. Yes, in my naivete, I stepped beyond the mechanical conventions that had "brought me to God," so to speak, into the potential for something much more real. I know that sounds like a cliche (maybe it is), but I KNEW that something much more was required of me if I wanted something real. But I didn't respond to this gift; I was too embarrassed to admit to anyone what had been revealed to me. I spent the rest of my teen years in and out of fear/guilt/denial. When I left for college, I had sufficiently insulated myself from these feelings, but they never totally dissipated.

Work Program 2 weeks beginning 1 July 2013

---

by Judy

Good day to everyone,

Recently I've been enjoying the discussions here very much. The work continues daily here. In particular at present, I'm considering several aspects, and thought I'd share them with you.

1. Meditating on air – from the consideration of it as being a universal impartial unconditional "giver"; also considering this quality for other earthly things such as the soil, the trees.
This began after listening to a talk by John Bennett, where he reminds us that man is the only universal "taker"
Question: Can I be mindful of this and be more giving?
Comment: Harry, you asked about "corns" to do with being "green" a while back. I think we should talk about this. Here in Australia, we have a political party called "The Greens". They present a needed viewpoint, though it may be too long-sighted for them to ever get into government. Mankind in general has a very short-term limited avid view for this to happen.

2. Considering the relationship between negative emotions, inner considering, and daydreaming. It is interesting how negative emotion sees to be always present in inner considering; whereas inner considering is often a big part of daydreams.

3. During the past week, I registered (free) on a site "The Translucent View" by Arjuna Argadh. (There is much Gurdjieff influence and he speaks of him reverently). This led to my receiving by email over a few days, several "gifts" from the site. They are deceptively simple, but effective.

Here's one to Self-remember:

Who Am I?

Be still and listen to the sounds around you.
The sounds are heard, aren't they? Heard perfectly.
Now shift the attention from the sound to that which is hearing the sounds.
What is that?
What sound does that itself make?
Ask yourself, who am I?
Now feel the sensations in the body, just as they are:
The breathing, the places of tightness and relaxation, pleasure and pain.
Let the attention shift, from the sensation in the body

To that which is feeling the body.
What is that which feels?
What is that which says “my body”?
And ask, who am I?
Let the eyes be gently open.
Look, see what is here.
Notice the shape of it, the color of it, the form of it.
Now let the attention shift from the object to that which sees.
What is that which sees?
Again, ask yourself, who am I?

Whatever arises to be experienced,
Shift your attention from the object to the experiencer.
Seek out your own presence, and discover what that is.

And here is a fine little 'trick' against inner considering:

Just Like Me

Whenever a judgment or evaluation
Arises within you,
Whether positive or negative,
Add the three words: “. . . just like me.”
You can go ahead and judge another as lazy,
But be inclusive with it:
He is so lazy, just like me.
She is arrogant, just like me.
They are incompetent,
She is unreliable,
He is angry,
Just like me.
Call back positive judgments in the same way:
The Dalai Lama is so wise, just like me.
She is so compassionate,
He is so strong,
Just like me.

In this way, call back every judgement to yourself
And realise that there is no other out there:
It is all you."

4. I am reminded that at least ten self-observation attempts are mandatory daily, according to Orage/Nyland recommendations, for this is our best, perhaps only, way of 'enlivening' our potential "I". And that I remember to sense body and feel emotions while observing.

That's it from sunny Cairns this morning. I hope everybody has a fruitful couple of weeks. Please share the bounty here as a part of the giving spoken of above.
Kind regards,
Judy.

P.S. Alistair – where are you? I miss your input and am sure others do too. I trust you are in good health and will be re-joining us soon. J.

---

by Harry

Judy,

Interestingly I just finished reading the first chapter in Life is Real in which G talks about stepping on corns intentionally.

As to the proposed discussion: All and Everything brings forth two very important discussions. One begins with Beelzebub talking about what earth looked like with the flare ups of red, as seen from Mars. These were the results of the wars which were generated by the diseases on earth that introduced a psychosis into the human creatures who lives there.

But more importantly is the other discussion. How human creatures had to take on the roles of rats, and tigers, and other two brained creatures because they had eliminated them from the ecoculture. Since men had eliminated these other beings, then they had to live the two brained being lives, because the Earth, and the Moon, and the Sun and the other planets needed these emanations.

We often forget that we are here as part of something bigger than ourselves. Right now our West Coast is baking in 120 temperatures. We have areas of our South East that are so wet that temperatures are lowered. And we experience massive storms that are record setting. We live on Earth. We contribute here. But we are small creatures in the big picture.

Recently we had three "storm chasers" killed when they drove toward a two and a half mile wide tornado. (For those in other cultures that is a 150 MPH cyclone on land.) And our news media praised these "heroes". I think, rather, that they had taken on the role of the cow seen in the 90's film Twister. Because we've eaten so much beef that someone had to take the place of that flying cow. And Toto is waiting his replacement, as well.

To me this comes down to quite a simple, but complexing G quote: "Do not do what can't be done."

---

by Gururaj

A professional body in which I am a volunteer is expecting a specific contribution from me this week.

Struggling to get going with the job, I have been in the throes of internal considering .
On the one hand stress of "I must deliver and not fail " and on the other hand the woe of "what a pain" .

Pondering on this week's post on "giving" instead of "taking" - a liberating perspective is seen in the above struggle.

Why not aim to "give" value to my professional community instead of to "take" a satisfaction of "not failing/achieving" ?

---

by Judy

Harry,

I take your point with the complex quote mentioned above.

I am a little more optimistic perhaps. I see the evolutionary change we spoke of in the sixties and seventies as still happening, though on the surface, it doesn't seem as startling as that first burst.
We had Lyle Watson's "The Romeo Error" back then, in which he proposed that less than 1% of people even slightly awakening was sufficient for a global shift in consciousness. Maharishi Mahesh Yogi postulated the square root of one percent for global peace. Later there have been various postulates such as "The Tipping Point". And there is a huge increase in the value of emotional intelligence, finally dragging us out of three hundred years of Cartesian rationalism, with its attendant parental comments such as "Don't be so damn emotional..." , "Ladies don't get angry" etc etc.
Plus there is coming to be what Peter Russell calls "a global brain", thanks to new technology and the Internet.
And things needs must change quite quickly, otherwise new technology plus old Iago trance values of separatism could fling us into disastrous unsustainable states. At least that is a danger.
And there are many huge forces and high Beings involved in this experiment called humanity, for it to be allowed to fail easily.

But I take your point in that I can only do what I can at a personal and local level, and help raise awareness when given the opportunity.

Here is a quote which I read this morning, actually.

> Humanity is becoming our indentification > group, and not the ego, or ego > spelled large as nation, as state. Life > will take us beyond the communication > stage, and it will give us the next step, > the consciousness stage. We are > going through a process of evolution.

> — Ram Dass

Kind regards,
Judy.

---

by Judy

Gururaj,

Twelve Step Programs agree with Bennett about the focus on giving. They say if ever one doesn't want to get out of bed, shift one's focus from self to asking what one can do that day to assist others (without their knowing, preferably) during the coming day. And it works! It turns out to be a direct route to some real and positive emotions. It is an aim which liberates.

Bennett says yes, we give our bodies back to the earth when we die, but that is more or less by default (smile) and not enough.

Interesting that you are testing validity in a work project. Keep us posted?

Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by Judy

A further comment with quote from "The Translucent Revolution" postulating a change in paradigm from the Industrial Era to what the Author (Arjuna Ardagh) calls the Consciousness Era.
We are now in the Age of Aquarius, with symbol (for this air sign) of water pouring out abundantly into the air. The "water" symbolises information pouring out over the airways. No need to postulate this. We see it is fact.

However, for your consideration:
(humanity did indeed begin to "speak words" thirty-five thousand years ago according to recent estimates).

> It was our ability to communicate that allowed us to move from one paradigm > to the next, as each outlived its usefulness. Communication allowed us > to evolve together from the hunter-gatherer to the agricultural era (thirty-five > thousand years ago), and then again to the industrial era. Today it is communication > that will allow us to evolve from the industrial era, which has > become as destructive as it was once useful, to the consciousness era, or translucent humanity. Our ability to communicate with every other human being more and more effectively is both the result of the wiring of the global brain and necessary for the cells of that brain to be able to work as one organism without conflict.

(Author defines "translucence" as bringing the new consciousness forth in the life lived - letting this knowledge 'shine' through).
I hope this isn't too much off-topic (green). I can see a connection to preventing the ongoing mass destruction of Earth's forests here. We could well need nothing less than a paradigm shift.

---

by Harry

One of the things about living with pets is that you learn a lot about communication. Keefe left me a pair of cats when he moved to the West Coast. There is communication with and without words. I say food and they run to their room to be feed. They want something, they come and get me. And they have their own language. I think, at times, that they also receive messages nonverbally. And I don't mean from body signals.

Tracing this back to a time when we had yet to develop words, I'm pretty sure that any conscious being communicates.

I think the big difference is that we can decide on the language we are using. The words we use. I think that is what G did with All and Everything. He devised a language for his followers. And he developed a mental cadence.

I have never met someone who has seriously read All and Everything who hasn't developed a stronger sense of concentration and attention.

---

by Judy

Interesting your mentioning the care Mr Gurdjieff took to communicate with his readers.
I happened to read this today as part of a refresh and renew of many things "Bennett."

http://www.gurdjieff.org/bennett3.htm

Here's an excerpt:

> In the reviews of the book which have appeared, All and Everything has usually been described as a cosmological epic or allegory. This disregards the distinction between allegory and myth.7 Allegory is a weaker and more sophisticated form of expression than myth. It belongs to our ordinary language, in which only relative ideas can be expressed. The myths which to this day are the symbolic forms of our deeper thinking, have existed since the dawn of history. Toynbee has said that no genius has arisen in the last four thousand years capable of creating a new myth. This amounts to saying that for forty centuries, mankind has not discovered a new approach to 'the deeper truths.'
>
> I believe this to be right, and it is a measure of the place which I would assign to Gurdjieff's work in the history of human thought that I find in All and Everything a new mythology, the power of which will only be understood by generations yet unborn.

As to cats and communication, my little Ellie (she is in fact not so little any more and is now almost 8 years), communicates very clearly with her tail, especially when she has her back to me. I had to smile at the thought of Keefe's cats running when you say "food" in your home, Harry, while here I am in the Antipodes, with one grey feline running to her room when I say "dinner".
Aren't they little masterpieces! I bought Ellie from a rescue centre in May 2005. She had been abandoned by owners who moved overseas. It has just occurred to me that it was very close to when I joined our ES site.

---

by JohnS

A fantastic book concerning Toynbee's comment on no new myths created is Giorgio de Santillana's "Hamlet's Mill," which traces the story of Shakespeare's Hamlet back to the Sumerian Epic of Gilgamesh, and via many cultures as diverse as Icelandic, South American and the Pacific Islands. And like the Tales, they all have their own special language, which is a mixture of myth and allegory.

The point made is that the purpose of myth is to connect mankind with higher powers and the greater universe as a force of everything created, and as such is a universal story, handed down from culture to culture. So I would be inclined to believe that Bennet's idea of Gurdjieff creating a new mythology - if that's what he means - is not accurate (for there are no New Myths), but rather he has created a new version of the oldest myth, and I tend presumptuously to think that G. would agree with this, as he himself stated that his teaching was not new, but based on ancient methods.

Its up to us now to try and organically connect with the stories of myth, rather than just treat them as a good read. This is our work and our new language.

Speaking of language, my cat knows one word of English, perfectly: "Now!"

John

---

by Harry

I've tried to research cat tail movements. It's about as fruitful as researching human body language.

Keefe rescued Cobalt, the male of my pair, as an almost feral two week old and raised him from then. Must always sit on my chair until I'm ready to get up. I say up before moving because he sits above my head.

As to "myth", I think it is ignored that G wrote this book as Beelzebub. Imagine that in today's ultra conservative Christian world. Or if he wrote it as any figure in Islam in today's ultra conservative Muslim countries.

---

by Gururaj

Obedient for an organisation's purposes - like an ant
Instinctively reactive - like a rat
Going with the flow - like a sheep
Not minding to take on burdens - like a donkey
Busy - as a bee
Largely operating from and with the mind like ...an owl (?)
I have many animals in me

At-least those animals are authentic ,natural - to their selves

Attempting to "Work" is a saving grace.

Judy, the exercise of sensing the outer and becoming aware of the organism is simple yet effective.
Somewhat like the task suggested of seeing the candle and "dropping" it which you had posted long ago.
Thanks .

---

by Gururaj

I had said " Obedient to an organisation's purposes - Like an ant " . Too soon !

Now , when an expectation from the powers that be has not been fulfilled and that obedience is shaken.

There is much psychological pain. After regaining some anchoring thanks to this week's task of moving back to the experiencer, I am reminded of the , as yet a concept for me, that it is one of the "I"s operating.

The wish to move away from the pain is there. The reactionary thoughts and words are there.

The wish of consciousness - to just stay with the pain and observe - is what I am aiming to strengthen - from now on as I write this.

Work Program 2 weeks beginning 15 July 2013

---

by Gururaj

Hello everybody :

Trust each of you is fine . It's been a while since anyone posted .

(1) So the chief task is to login and post whatever you would like to share , including about your regular Work practices, the literature you are reading and any major life events.
Basically to sort of acknowledge your (virtual) presence in the Online Group.

(2) I have seen of late the simple attempt to "Stop and stare "(inwardly) is itself a way of generating a material in us for being a bit more aware and self-observant through greater periods in the day .
So here's a task sourced from Sy Ginsburg's " Gurdjieff Unveiled "

THE GAME OF STOPS

For the next two weeks at different moments / stages during the day like Getting out of bed ; completing the morning toilet ; breakfast ; proceeding out of the house to work or (if retired) just when starting your morning activity;
when your reach your work spot ; lunchtime ; midway through the afternoon around 3 PM; on return from work to home or at sunset ; dinnertime; bedtime.

1. At each suggested stop , count up to 10 to yourself while sensing your body and dividing (expanding) your attention.

2. Continue sensing and self-remembering even after the 10 seconds for as long as possible.

3. If you miss the stop, when you do remember (before or after) also use this as an opportunity to be self-conscious and count up to 10 while body sensing.

4. At the end of each day, after the final stop, count the successful stops and record the total for the day .
(Preparing and ticking on a matrix table - each stop versus Day of the week - may help in maintaining the record)

5. Be aware that the game does not become mechanical. For this reason, the actual stops should be varied from week to week. For example, instead of a stop at the first flush of the toilet in the morning, it could be made when the teeth are brushed. Another variation would be to engage in any activities with the hand opposite of that to which we are accustomed to. Many variations can be tried being true to the principle behind this.

---

by Judy

I couldn't let this pass without comment:

> Another variation would be to engage in any activities with the hand opposite of that to which we are accustomed to

.

It so happens that last night, around sunsaAet, I was opening a can of tuna for the curlews, which had been tapping on an outside glass door with their beaks, to be fed - when my right hand slipped on the can-opener, and I sliced open the knuckles of the first two fingers. There was much blood.
Anyway, just before logging in this morning, I had decided to put this injury to good use by using it as a reminding factor for self-observation of my own mechanicality. Already it has been fruitful I would have thought I cleaned my teeth using the right hand. But no, looks and feels like it is always the left.

Synchronicities abound. This is a nice one.

I see also in the BT Forum that you suggest a possible moving on to MWRM - how exciting! Sounds great! We may need to request Ian's assistance to open a new Forum for this, unless anyone knows how to do this. What do others think of this idea?

Cheers, everyone,
Judy.

---

by Boever

Thanks Gururaj for your contribution. Let me give you an overview of my 'work' day.

- After my shower, I sit down for around 10 minutes for the preparation meditation.
- Whenever I remember myself during the day, I make a sincere effort to sense the whole of my body and release all physical tensions.
- At 12 o'clock, the people of the Gurdjieff Institute all make a sincere effort to sense the whole of the body all together.
- Before going to bed, I read a chapter from JANE HEAP' NOTES and reflect on it.

Remember, quality before quantity

I will try to set some stop signs today

by Gururaj

Tomas, you are well on the path to make the 4th Way as the 3rd force.

Actual Work is the best , but reading ,pondering and meetings with like-minded souls (in person or virtually) is also of much value .

The other week , as I weathered a psychological storm, saw the value of never losing contact with the Work for the past few years.

Trying out this frequent "stop" exercise these 2 days (with moderate recollection success) seems to be just right for the stage of Work at which I am in now.

For a long time this afternoon totally forgot the task - identified with my job. Finally recollecting it made me feel the loss/waste of a few hours spent in unawareness and ,more importantly, a glimpse of separation from the I at the point of rememberance.

Does everybody have access to "Meetings with Remarkable Men" ? I do not as yet have a copy of my own.

Gururaj

---

by Boever

I forgot about the stop exercise, will try to introduce some today.

---

by Harry

I want to say this about the "stop exercise". Realize that G said it was impossible to do this yourself. What it does lead to is a possible self remembering.

I may have mentioned it before, but when I was a kid we played a game called swinging statues. I have no idea how this got incorporated into our play. But an adult or a larger child would take the smaller children by the hands and swing them in a circle so their feet came off of the ground. They would then be left go and had to "freeze" in the position they landed, like a statue. Wonder if this went to other cultures?

As to self observation, give yourself one of those reminders. Like walking through a doorway. Or whenever a bell rings. You can try to freeze, but it is difficult to do without an outside master. The key is to observe. Later you want to remember.

---

by Gururaj

> Harry wrote:
> They would then be left go and had to "freeze" in the position they landed, like a statue. Wonder if this went to other cultures?
> As to self observation, give yourself one of those reminders. Like walking through a doorway. Or whenever a bell rings. You can try to freeze, but it is difficult to do without an outside master. The key is to observe. Later you want to remember.

Have not come across any such game in my part of the planet.
The variant I have seen is that In playful moments among kids or in party games a shout of 'statue' by one of the kids or the stopping of the music, is a cue to freeze instantly.

I have read in Work literature that another approach to self-observation, as we go thru' the day ,is a sort of 'looking askance' rather than a direct gaze at our inner state.
Not had the taste of this , though.

---

by JohnS

Apologies for not posting for a while, have not been well for a few weeks

John

---

by Judy

Sorry to hear that, John. And the really cold weather no doubt isn't helping. Hope you are speedily returned to good health.
Kind regards,
Judy.

---

by Gururaj

Wishes for a speedy recovery John.

Nature seems to have put a little 'stop' and the instinctive centre sure takes much of the energy away.

Work Program 2 weeks beginning 29 July 2013

---

by Cassandra

Finish the drill...

...or complete the octave. I read recently in Views from the Real World of the importance of octave completion. My daily octaves are small--getting up in the am, showering, readying for work and leaving. But then there are those larger tasks that require more concentration and assistance from other sources; these are harder to complete in a timely manner because the organism wants to relax or the forces of the moon are calling to it, or whatever. So the challenge is to stay on task, for just one hour of the day; or for the completion of a task, whether cleaning the kitchen, taking a walk, or completing a more complex problem solving exercise. What does completion of an octave offer for the seeker? But the completion of an octave is much more than physical.

See the following for a discussion, and the website has further reading (http://www.earthgeomancy.net/Law%20of%20Octave.html):

Introduction to the law of Octave

The law of Octave is a metaphysical law about how time works, which involves cycles consisting of seven distinct steps, stages, or what can be called notes. These are do, re, mi, fa, sol, la, ti, and then back to do again - but starting another cycle or another octave at this new do. Each of these notes represent distinct stages of time and their corresponding qualities of energy. As well, at each note our role in 'doing' or 'working' is different; in other words, each note requires a unique mode or way of being, which will be necessary to fulfill that particular stage in order to move into the next one, and in order to finally complete the whole octave in the most fulfilling manner. Each octave has its own potentials to be fulfilled. That is, there are great potential possibilities in any octave, which have to do with how we experience and the energies transformed in us.

This is not merely about getting things done. Accomplishing a physical task, or completing a particular work, is of course important in all of this, as well as the quality of the work done and our efficiency of time in completing things. However, there is much more possible in doing work, than just its physical accomplishment. For there is much that is possible involving our inner being and various transformations of energies in us, which can happen along with our outer work or activity. And it is this inner side of things of which we are particularly concerned with in these teachings, which includes the quality and expansiveness of our experience, the positive transformation of energies inside us, and the spiritual evolution of our very being. Even though the outer work, efficiency and quality of the job done are also very important. These inner possibilities are available with each octave, but only a portion of such potential will usually be actualized in our experience and in our being. Another way of understanding this is that there an abundance of potential in each octave, potential relating to our inner consciousness and being, so our goal is to make as much of this real in us as possible. Each intentionally worked octave will provide an new opportunity.

It has been said by one teacher, 'Man is a transformer of subtle energies,' and this means both inner and outer, because there is a possible interchange between the inner and outer, between our own being and the world around us, as subtle energies are brought in and then out and then in again, and so it goes, like the cycle of breath, and remember that breath will be ever important in this.

Whenever something is begun with a completion in mind, an octave of time is set into motion which proceeds from the beginning but also in reverse time from the future to the present. The time from beginning to end can be divided into an octave of notes or phases of time. As we observe the octave in practice we will begin to notice the subtle change or difference in the quality of each note. These phases might change on an hourly interval, if agreed to, or may change phase in their own time. The duration of one note is not necessarily equal to others, but if we organize a time for completion in a progression of seven notes, we will create a more consistent order in the octave. As we begin to know where we are in the octave, we can know how to use this particular quality of time with greater success. In any one note all the notes are potentially there, just as the whole phase of a process subsists within any one phase of it, yet one particular note is most dominant at any one time. One octave is most predominant and relevant at any time, yet usually many octaves are happening at the same time and in different phases. One could potentially be aware of many octaves all happening at once, but it is most practical to concentrate upon the most relevant and necessary one to work on at this time.

The Octave is a fascinating subject and is meant to be quite practical in life, if used with knowledge and intention. So our goal is to learn about and make use of this law of octave. What is stated here is a foundational introduction, but it can only be truly understood and made applicable by way of our experimenting and working with it.

---

by Boever

There is 1 octave of great importance and that is the octave of your own being!

The following chapter can be found in "The Reality of Being" by Salzmann p183

(Mme. de Salzmann was wholehearted in her devotion to Gurdjieff and his work, dedicating her own contributions as "in homage" to him. She was also unrelenting in her call to others to live the teaching.
These qualities are reflected in this book. She often echoed, and sometimes repeated, his exact words. Examples include the text on the octave in section 85, which she said came from him, and the exercise o f divided attention in section 92, which is as he wrote it in the Third Series.)

85. Degrees o f the octave

In Gurdjieffs teaching, work passes through the degrees of the octave, degrees of intensity. He described the process as follows.

First, there is a note, a vibration that comes from a higher octave and sounds as do. It is like an opening to a new vision o f a quality that was not here before, to an idea from a higher source. Then, because o f a relation between the energies, a stronger intensity begins to appear, a vibration given b y a higher octave. We have feelings, sensations, belonging to layers that are deeper, and pass to the level re. A new seeing appears that b rings a new understanding, a conviction. Here, there is a certain light, but it is still insufficient. It has the power to illuminate what surrounds it, but one feels a necessity not to project outside. The attention must stay free. What sees appears more essential than what is seen. We come to an intensity o f perception o f the idea that cannot be more intense. We are at the note mi.

The proximity o f another degree appears, a sensation o f another possible level. Nevertheless, it seems inaccessible by the same means, without the intervention o f new help. One feels that to pass to this new degree, the vivifying power o f the idea must increase. This does not depend on the idea alone. It needs a support that will allow it to last, a force by which it can be nourished. This is an important moment. The thinking is no longer enough. A second center must come into play. The whole body must voluntarily offer its participation. It must allow this force to intensify through it, to manifest. It feels the quality o f this force and refuses its automatism in order to receive the action. The body submits consciously in order to allow the conscious manifestation o f this force from another level. This is decisive. The struggle is between two octaves— one must take authority and the other accept it. If this is resolved in favor o f an inner sensation, the interval is passed— the octave is saved. This is the note fa that sounds.

The sensation must be d e fin ite ;^ needs to become established. It must exist in m y Presence as a complete sensation— stable, with all the new ideas and feelings that accompany it— in order to pass to the degree sol. Then, exactly what took place with the original idea begins again. But this time there is no longer a force from outside. It takes place with a force o f my own. The thinking and the body are no longer enough. A new feeling must appear— the feeling o f being. I feel myself subject to a force that is beyond me, a w ill that is beyond me, and I see the process o f inner transformation intensify in the fire o f the wish to be. The concentration then reaches its peak. And from the union o f these three forces appears the independence o f the sensation o f self, the consciousness o f se lf with its own individual life— a new octave.

The octaves are superposed and must not mix. Descent is obligatory if one mixes with vibrations o f lower notes.

Good luck!

by Gururaj

Cassandra , initial cause of my present joy - thank you , thank you.

After reading your post, one thing led to another and another and many things have fallen into place. The circle is complete. There is a coherence about 4th Way and what efforts are needed by me - finally. A blessed day. Am overflowing with thanks to G , O , the many deep seekers after them and our own Ian and all of you here to have kept this search going.

Actually , now it is truly START of the drill for me .

The cosmic vis-à-vis human scale , the laws of 3 and 7, the food factory, the five obligolnian strivings and the first and second conscious shocks - I see how they all fit with each other.

1. I am mechanical as I am. The difference in state is quite clear ,as a sense , not just a thought - between being immersed /lost and being aware of one-self.

2. So ,not 'do'ing anything , just being conscious, I make the food factory do a better job .The second octave (of Air) too moves to the 'finish'.

3. After a long ,persistent efforts , by grace, the finer material created in me shall aid in bringing about a more conscious state - one including the 2nd conscious shock - I do not leak energy with negative emotions, in inner considering and reactionary behaviour to others. The 3rd octave (of impressions) too shall move to its 'finish'.

4. This alchemical transformation and creation of finer materials shall , make one sense the higher emotional centre and subsequently the higher intellectual , as well.

5. The higher being bodies created in this physical organism shall make it more akin, miniaturely , to the cosmic design.

At every step above , the organic feel of the transformation in one's state itself can be the authentic feedback. One cannot delude oneself.

Being at point no.1 , I can see a very long and arduous way ahead .But at-least the path is seen and it beckons.
I need not go all over the place , still remaining unchanged in basically the same state.

---

by Judy

Hi Cassandra,

The site www.lovewisdom.net which your quote is from, is quite interesting. Thanks.

Also interesting is that nowhere does it seem to mention any particular either individual or group of individuals, or tradition or source.
Does anyone know?
Just under "new age teachings" perhaps?
Man as a "transformer of energies" sounds like a reference to Gurdjieff.
Just curious.

Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by Judy

Gururaj wrote:

> After reading your post, one thing led to another and another and many things have fallen into place.

Good for you! To the worker come the rewards.

Isn't it great when this happens, especially if unexpected...
Because quite a lot of the time, it is simply "chop wood, carry water."
Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by Cassandra

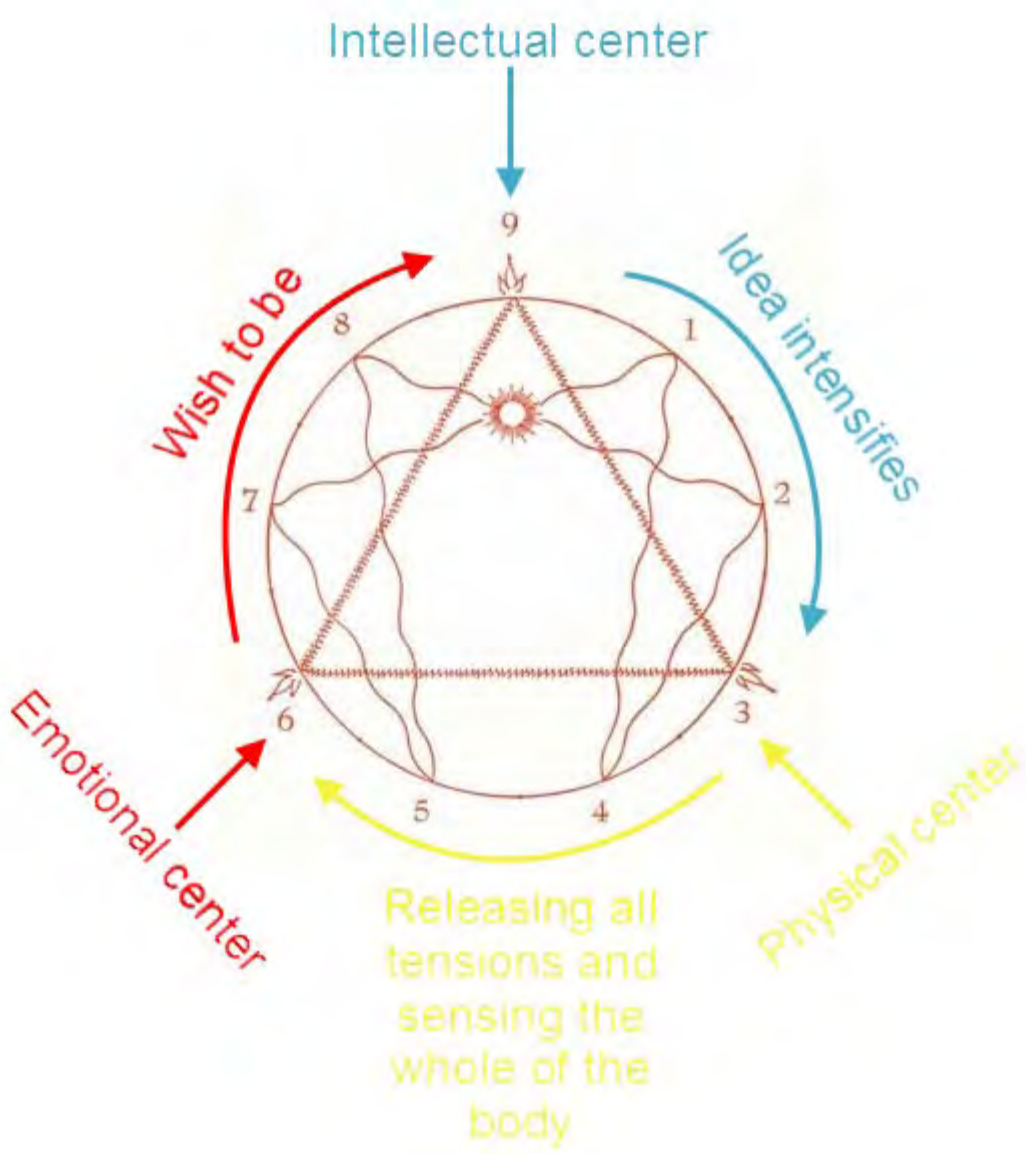
Tomas, yes I agree that the most important octave is that of one's being. Is this what is referred to in the quote: "what does it profit a man if he gains the whole world but loses his soul." It seems that the larger being octave is composed of the smaller ones, the ones that seem mundane, but if observed closer are the real stuff of soul building. For instance, if just for this week, seven days, if I can sit in the morning and walk about 45 minutes for exercise, that would help me at least mechanically to complete two beneficial things. I think that if I can demonstrate to the higher energies my readiness for what was included in your quote, then some type of transformation may be possible:

"It is like an opening to a new vision o f a quality that was not here before, to an idea from a higher source. Then, because o f a relation between the energies, a stronger intensity begins to appear, a vibration given b y a higher octave."



Gururaj, can you explain more about the one thing leading to another and another...? Elaborate on just one small piece of this chain, por favor. And Judy, I'm not sure what the site is about either that the quote came from. I tried to see more about it, but no luck. I did some searching on finishing the octave, and this came up. I'll try to find the exact reference in Views.

So, for me for the next 2 weeks, posting here and pondering what others post represents for me an octave of the utmost importance. Maybe not a post everyday, but attention to the task of remaining connected!!

---

by Boever

I distilled an enneagram from chapter 85. Hope you like it.
I'm mostly getting stuck on 6 :p, what about you?

DO/0 : The idea of collecting attention enters the intellectual center
RE/1 : The idea brings new feelings, sensations and thoughts associated with this idea Mi/2 :
3 : The physical center remembers itself
FA/4 : The body allows this collected attention to flow through it, it submits to this new force
SOL/5 :

6 : The emotional center remembers itself
LA/7 :
SI/8 :
DO/9 : new octave : the consciousness of self (self-consciousness, next state of being)

Anyone able to complete this octave?

---

by Gururaj

> Cassandra wrote:
> Gururaj, can you explain more about the one thing leading to another and another...? Elaborate on just one small piece of this chain, por favor.

The site was very quite/no traffic leading up to the last Sunday. So it warmed the cockles of my heart to see your post as promised by you weeks ago .
The thought in me was "Cassandra has sounded the 'Do' - with a post on the Law Of Seven. How can we now complete the octave over the next 2 weeks".

An intention arose to use the opportunity to get a clarity and an organic feel of this fundamental precept of the 4th Way. The first step of action (Re) was to look up more sources explaining this Law. I have found our ES site itself is a fine source and so gave a search command for The law of Seven and ,sure enough, at-least seven links came up. Slowly devoured each of them (having taken the Monday off from office was a big help) .

Especially one link http://www.endlesssearch.co.uk/philo_human_nature.htm was a rich one which made me think of going back to the original classic ISOTM.
Finally there, the food factory so clearly explained , with diagrams ,by Ouspensky quoting G gave me a sumptuous understanding like never before .(I had first read it a long time ago and had found the going tough).
As I said earlier , many other precepts of the 4th Way gelled with each other now, for me.

With heightened feeling ,I (my state ?) has moved to 'mi' with an increased remembering to be conscious , or one can say , from theory to practice. But am still in the right half of the Enneagram.

---

by Harry

Heptaparaparshinokh.

G himself strongly suggest that we read The Holy Planet Purgatory in All and Everything.

Also note that it is necessary to know and use Triamazakamno in order to fully understand Heptaparaparshinokh. The two combined form the enneagram.

---

by Cassandra

I had set for myself two tasks that I wanted to accomplish on a regular basis--morning sitting and walking exercise. I thought of these as forming an octave that I wanted to observe, observe myself as a participant in. This had been coming along fine; then on Thursday, I received some news about the possibility of a family member being ill, just the possibility. And I was stopped in my tracks emotionally; I became stuck in a tumultuous "what-if" cycle for about 17 hours. I've been like this before, and there seems that nothing can shake the state unless I receive confirmation that my fears are ungrounded. Well, that I got on Friday morning, but in the aftermath, it seems that it took several hours for my energy to get out of the 'bad' cycle. This experience has to do with the law of seven and three, and the enneagram. I think the shock allows for a parting of the clouds in the sense of saying "hey, how deep is this search of yours." If the things of life go sour, am I still motivated to be a seeker; or do I give up any search because of the superficiality of me, that my real search is only to be comfortable and undisturbed. I went to Nicoll's The New Man for guidance, and read the section on prayer. It's to be constant, asking only that heaven be made manifest on earth, the earth that is my life.

---

by Gururaj

Nice to read here actual struggles of fellow seekers.

From among the many eBooks under Fourth Way in the EsotericOnline website resource (link to which was shared by Judy) , would like to share from the readings of two of them -
One is from notes of Rodney Collin's meetings wherein I liked very much a practical advice he mentions of Working on something specific rather than have an aim like "becoming more conscious"
The other is also from Notes of meetings .But the host of these meetings is the 'Pater Familias' (right usage , I hope) himself - Gurdjieff.
One exercise he had given was " Never identify internally and always play a role externally" . He also says to the effect that - come to a special state and visualise for a next certain duration what roles you are going to take with different persons and perform this as a 'complete egoist'. He cautions to do this exercise only with non-family members and also , of course, that no one should have a clue that you are playing a role.

This is valuable advice for moving from Mi to Fa , I reckon. Comments , suggestions are welcome.
What could be a more 'close to the bone' approach to Non-Identification than just saying to ourselves 'Never identify internally' ?

The other day , at office found myself automatically manifesting a hurt reaction to an insensitive comment of a colleague which stepped on a pre-existing corn in me and then carrying on a negative state for some time thinking " How could I have been so reactive ?". Impartial observation - much gap remains between Knowledge and Being !

---

by Cassandra

Gururaj,

Nice advice, but how does one "never identify internally." Who can do this? So I have to come back to G.'s reminder that we can't do anything, really (at least in the beginning of the search), only observe.

---

by Cassandra

So, fellow seekers, can we finish this 2 week 'octave' of participation? This issue comes up often on the site--the relatively lack of participation. I was going back through some of the postings from several years ago and noted the activity when Ian was running the site. What then keeps interest? Is it intriguing and challenging topics, certain key personalities (i.e, Ian), a combination perhaps?

Any responses to Tomas' questions or Judy's? In response to Harry, I started chapter 39 of BT, re: The Holy Planet Purgatory, looking for insight into the Law of 7 and 3. Any comments on that?

---

by JohnS

Will be posting soon

John

---

by Gururaj

Listening to the Audio talk today morning on the chapter "Law of Fate and Law of Accident" of Nicoll's ....Commentaries... Vol 2 , got one more perspective and a fresh impetus to being more conscious of the inner talk . Since then , for the last 1/2 hour , am sensitive to the inner dialogue as I move thru' the daily routine.
Nicoll discusses whether what keeps happening to us in life is due to accident or our Fate - accident meaning any life event/impact on us which may not be attributable to our actions, an apparently random occurrence which gives us pain or pleasure (we may attribute it to our luck or even think we made it happen) and Fate meaning , in some way a response of life impacting us in a way much needed for our essence (it may be quite painful also).
I saw that when I live unconsciously , I am more often swept away ,hurt,tossed and turned by life events. Am more 'accident' prone.

When I am centred and more conscious , one is also aware of the inner state and there is a likelihood of better digestion of impressions.
This rumination gave a shift in my being to become aware of my inner talk which is generally reactive, carrying grievances, imagining and so on.
(under 96 laws applicable on the Moon).
This heightened awareness , on the other hand, seems to give a shift to be more "Earthed" (under 48 laws) , I suppose.

Is this an example of an external shock at the Mi-Fa interval , and the Law of 3 in operation , reconciling to a higher state ,giving a momentum to move further on the Enneagram ? Am just exploring this here.

First - Why do I say Law of 3 operated and next how can this be construed as an external shock .
The 3 components would be my intention to Work (Affirming) ,my being/personality during the process(Denying), the Work literature itself- here specifically,Nicoll's commentaries and my resultant valuation of Work (Reconciling) - all pointed to the Aim of Working .

According to the Law of Seven, to move from Mi to Fa , and external Shock is necessary. We need to place ourselves in such a way that this Shock acts on us.
The external influence was the Wisdom of Nicoll and by staying with the task (both the immediate early morning reading and the 2-week task of this fortnight to have some insight into the operation of the Law of Seven) I allowed a possibility of the external influence to touch me.

Thy will be done.

---

by Cassandra

Gururaj, yes, yes, and yes. I can relate to your post. Your posting ins similar to what I was trying to relate in my post before last. I had an aim, maybe is was a rather small one, to go about the dutiful task of posting an exercise for the 2 week period, casually checking the site to see if there were responses. But then the news of possible illness acted as a jolt, I think to remind me that there are much higher stakes at play here. Am I really committed to this search, even if it might mean my earthly world is disrupted. Can I continue the search in discomfort, pain, insecurity? I realized (maybe the shock you talked about between mi and fa) that the larger octave required Nicoll's metanoia (repentance). This shock was a blessing.

Peace to you all.

---

by Harry

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=3FzM_XrgtPo

by Gururaj

That was a fine impression for the mind and ear(melody). Much to digest.

After that , navigated to the following 3 more Leonard Cohen creations.
In which of these is Love the 'Creator's for us' and 'Our's for Life'

Is 'Repentance' the act of staying in-between ?

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=OU7dlql8F3w

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=PzjpRVmXF3k

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=F24VqlFBvrU

---

by Gururaj

Some thoughts related to the relevance of participation here to our search

In the last fortnight we have seen many posts indicating the benefit derived from the posts of others here. This ,I reckon, is an example of the external shocks at the relevant stopinder to keep the octave going. On my own the striving is very difficult and the group's influence is valuable.

Yes, speaking for myself, it would have been very ideal and valuable if there were active members here , like Ian used to be, who are ahead of me on the path so that more value is available for seekers. But reality will not be always the way we wish it to be and one can only accept the situation as it is.

On the other hand It need not be an 'acceptance' like the active one of the Caucasian Kurd of BT or the passive one of a patient who is not really on the way to recovery but is just kept alive by the medical technology in a hospital.

I hope , from wherever each of us is at present, the evolutionary spiral of our seeking and discovery is kept going thanks to the participation here.
It is , for me - thanks to the rest of you.

---

by Judy

Gururaj wrote:

> In the last fortnight we have seen many posts indicating the benefit derived from the posts of others here. This ,I reckon, is an example of the external shocks at > the relevant stopinder to keep the octave going.

Good point. Good example, Gururaj.
Yes, Ian is, of course, remarkable. We are most fortunate to have had his active guidance for so many years. What a blessing! Thanks, Ian.
Thanks to everyone, most definitely.

As the Buddha reminds us, everything changes. It is the way life here is. We must ready ourselves for possibly new or different opportunities and grasp them gladly after due consideration.
And keep working.
Be encouraged. Ask for help from the higher centres and it will be given.

Cheers, folks,
Judy.

---

by Cassandra

Thanks to you all for your posts. Keep searching....

Work Program 2 weeks beginning 12 August 2013

by Boever

Let me share with you the following sitting meditation as has been given to me by the Gurdjieff Institute (Brussels). This meditation is called the preparation.
(the following words are a transcript of the meditation)

> Practice the following meditation on a daily basis for 5 minutes in the morning. Be sure you are full awake before starting this exercise. Take a shower or drink some coffee.
>
> Sit comfortably on a chair with a straight back.
> Close your eyes.
> Make an effort to be here now. Try to be in the present with whole your being.
> Try to sense the whole of your physical body.
> Already you start noticing a different energy. A higher attention.
> Now fill your body with this higher attention.
> Bringing it in from the crown
> Cerebrum > Forehead > Eyes > Ears
> Face
> Top of your spine
> Try to find a place on top of your spine where your head automatically rests.
> Move on to your shoulders
> Left arm
> Right arm
> Both arms
> To your hands and finger tops
> You are actually doing nothing you are letting this happen
> There are thoughts but you they are arbitrary, don’t pay attention to them
> You are releasing yourself of all tensions
> Move this new sensation further to your Chest > Back
> Abdomen
> Sexual Organs
> Buttocks
> Right Leg
> Left Leg

Both Legs
Feeth
Toes
Now you sense this new energy, in this energy it is now possible to say I
and in your body it is now possible to say AM

Men as he is only knows the denying force (the resisting of this attention on your self). For the next 2 weeks try to introduce the affirming force in the morning everyday (affirming this conscious force).

---

by Gururaj

Two quotes someone shared with me recently are also about the usefulness of the body for our practice -

“The important thing is the real I, which is independent of the physical body. But the body is very necessary because the higher energy needs the body in order to manifest itself. The body is needed so that the I can have an action. That I can create a new body if the connection is strong enough, that is to say, if one permits the higher energy to pass into me. The conscious response or attention, which arises from the me, which is personal, serves as a thread for connecting the I and the me. The I is not personal. I can awaken me and serve the Earth. The Earth as a whole has need of more conscious energy." --Madame Jeanne de Salzmann (1889-1990 CE)

"There is one thing that, when cultivated and regularly practiced, leads to deep spiritual intention, to peace, to mindfulness and clear comprehension, to vision and knowledge, to a happy life here and now, and to the culmination of wisdom and awakening. And what is that one thing? It is mindfulness centered in the body." --Gautama Buddha (6th century BCE)

---

by Cassandra

Thank you for this Tomas and your comments Gururaj. It helps to expand my continual prayer: Help me to see this thing as God sees it."

---

by Gururaj

A few days ago , in a brief period of inner sensitivity , could observe the mind's wanderings as a nebulous matter getting ahead of the other centres.

On shifting attention to the body , which is ,of course , sensed as solid and steady, I could observe the mind getting back in sync.

This was a good use of the body - as an anchor.

But it is far more often seen that the mind goes its skittish way like tree leaves and branches buffeted about in the wind.
Am wondering - Is'nt the psychological mind arising out of our sense of "me" which in turn has been created by our identification with our body / organism ?

This (the mind's mayhem) seems to be the denying aspect whose root cause is the same body.

Looking forward to John's return to these forums. Trust health is back to even keel.

By the way, have been able to be with Tomas' task every morning this week.

---

by Gururaj

Except for the moments of conscious effort , as when we are in the task of this week , I AM isn't

What prevails is (small) I suffer, I enjoy, I complain, I want , I act and so on.

What will be freshly available , if instead we remember to feel, imagine and think (and say say inwardly) at the various moments in life -

This suffers , I am ; This complains, I am ; This is happy , I am ?

---

by Harry

That's stepping in the right direction. See that these emotions are the same as the weather. They come and go (talking of Michelangelo).

One of the benefits of complex exercises is that they occupy the ordinary mind, trying to figure out where the exercise is going. But that is also a detriment. Because the ordinary mind is taking over and "so called learning". G gave specific exercises for specific purposes. Beyond that there were two: observation which came first and self remembering that came second. Only because it was higher. Or more interior.

I am. I wish. I can. Every exercise is that simple.

---

by Judy

"You are actually doing nothing. You are letting this happen"

Doesn't this apply to so very much in the spiritual life....
Also "letting go" as used for allowing character defects to be removed - as in the Seventh Step of the Twelve Step programs.

The other line about finding the particular spot on which the head automatically rests on the top of the spine was also effective in allowing small neck tensions to be released.

Thanks, Tomas.
Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by Cassandra

The exercise is fine when done early in the morning but by the time I've arrived at work 1 hour later, I'm lost again in thought, tension, worry. I'd like to think that I'm banking something with such exercises, but that's buying into the falseness that I can 'get somewhere' or 'improve' upon me. It's all about the now, not a golden future isn't it?

---

by Boever

> Cassandra wrote:
> The exercise is fine when done early in the morning but by the time I've arrived at work 1 hour later, I'm lost again in thought, tension, worry. I'd like to think that I'm banking something with such exercises, but that's buying into the falseness that I can 'get somewhere' or 'improve' upon me. It's all about the now, not a golden future isn't it?

Cassandra, no real exercise is ever done for waste. You will always be drawn again by the descending force.. It is a matter of comming back to yourself over and over again.
You will have to find a balance between the 2 forces. You will always be taken away from yourself, try to see what takes you.

---

by Gururaj

"bankable" - An Interesting word . Do you mean by this that an inner action in one period creates a certain material (equivalent to money from outer actions) which can be used readily in subsequent and different periods .

Though this sounds improbable, our own experiences ,on a closer look , seems to indicate to me that this could be valid even in inner efforts. For example, when we have good sleep or an effective meditation session , there is a carry over effect for some time - till we empty the reservoir by our various actions - inner and outer. The more wrong work of centres happens (worrying , inner considering, etc) the quicker is the reservoir emptied.
Moreover , when I first read ISOTM , it was surprising to read G saying to Ouspensky that everything is material .

Maybe we do not see the 'bankable' effect much because not much is accumulated in the first place . 5 minutes of the "I am " exercise may create only small change ?

As Tomas' post mentions, this is a preparatory exercise and beyond it ongoing Work is needed as we move thru' life.

Harry , what is the taste of the pure "I wish" and "I can" ? How different is it from the normal I's wishes and actions ?
Of course you can't convey the "taste" to me .But some pointers would be welcome.

---

by Cassandra

Tomas and Gururaj,

I meant to say that it's wrong thinking to believe that I can accumulate enough stuff to coat the higher being bodies; maybe these same struggles with worry and fear I will have all of my life, so maybe I cannot erase them by sitting daily. I'ts not like a production line or physical treatment to get rid of anything, necessarily, but to be with what is there. I'm always trying to cover up that fear, to run away by doing something like reading, watching TV, or even sitting. Rather, it may be better to be bored or scared. Thanks, guys.

---

by Boever

Why wouldn't you be able to coat higher being bodies?

The following is from "Reality of being", thought it related well to your question

> It is only by working to be present that my attention will develop. When it has a better quality, I struggle to keep it from weakening, I try > to prevent its being taken. I try but cannot, and I try again. I begin to understand what this requires from me even i f I cannot do it. In the > struggle where I come back and then go again toward manifestation, I see that w hen my attention is completely taken, it is entirely lost to me.
> But if it does not go too far, it can be pulled back, as by a magnet. In that > movement o f my attention, I learn something o f its nature. I will > have to go toward manifestation, and I w ill always lose myself unless my > attention goes both toward life and toward the inside.

> We think it is one attention divided equally, but in fact the parts are not equal, not the same. There is a great difference that I need to > experience. If I cannot center my effort in a certain way, I am bound to lose myself. I must see that I cannot do it because I do not have the > quality o f attention that is required. Here is my effort, here is what I have to exercise. This is the only thing that matters.

I would also like to hear more about the "I am" "I wish" "I can" formula. I lack understanding

---

by Cassandra

> Boever wrote:
> Why wouldn't you be able to coat higher being bodies?

I don't quite know; I was reading something recently about the "now," not attaining anything just accepting the present state. That's what prompted my comment.

[/quote]I would also like to hear more about the "I am" "I wish" "I can" formula. I lack understanding[/quote]

Yes, that would be helpful to me as well.

Work Program 2 weeks beginning 26 August 2013

---

by Harry

When you say "I am" describe the I experience. The Am experience. The Wish Experience. The Can Experience.

I am. I wish. I can.

Describe your experience. What you see, think, feel, hear, taste, sense. . .

---

by Gururaj

Early observations being made here. Much remains to be intimately explored. This is not a thought experiment.

In a calm stationary state , "I am " meditation makes one be aware of more aspects than normally - sounds around, the state of the body - and one is not taken by thoughts but can still observe them.
As I move thru' life having 'forgotten' myself, when I then remember and say "I am " , a central presence is created and one is less taken by the running thoughts.

In fact , when towards evening I had a headache and much unease bodily, and when I said inwardly "I am " the discomfort subsided and the headache considerably got reduced by bedtime.

Regarding "I wish " and " I can " , yesterday had pondered awhile on this and felt that I can't make out how can "I wish" stand all by itself. Is'nt it "I wish " to be something and "I can" do something ? So had chosen a wish to imagine breathing thru' the spinal chord as often as I could remember . Kept coming back to this initially but as the day progressed remembered less and less.

---

by Harry

In answer to the two questions about this circle that came up last week:

G gives this exercise directly in the Third Series. It is an exercise that deals with consciousness, breath, and all three types of food. We have had a number of exercises discussed which are complex amplifications of this exercise. The twelve joint exercise, for example.

We have three brains. But we rarely pay any attention to the differences and the interactions.

We eat three foods. And they have to be combined in the body. Breath has to mix with physical food to start the second octave. And intentional suffering has to mix with that mixture in order to start the third octave. This is explained in some detail in All and Everything. O also spends much time with his table of Hydrogens that is part of the same thing.

We have three bodies, possible, and these three octaves are native to the three bodies.

This also combines with the ancient teaching of chakras.

G gives the direct exercise in the Third Series. (One of two he gives there.) I believe it is around page 130 in my version of this book. But I have the copy that was privately published by the foundation back in the 70s.

How does Oxygen flow through your body? When you say I where do you feel it? Is there a singular I? When you say AM where do you feel the vibration. You say I again followed by Wish. Where do you feel Wish? Then I CAN. Where do you feel Can?

What we do here should build upon what G has left for us. We have plundered through Beelzebub. G specifically refers workers to the chapter on Purgatory which also relates to this exercise. Meetings is a whole different experience, for an entirely different body. As is the Third Series.

An exercise here should not be a callisthenic for the mind or body. It should be something that we can use to develop our bodies and to understand other things. We must develop our understandings.

Gururaj's answer also refers to this exercise. Because G talks specifically about how it can be used to work on disharmonies and even illnesses.

I sound like my teacher self in writing this out. Sorry for that, fellow members.

---

by Dean

Hey everybody, I'm going to be posting again on the forum and will be participating on the weekly work programs again.

The I am, I can, I wish exercise was good for sensing myself in a new way. I breathed into different parts of the body while doing the exercise, for example breathing into the chest, head and spine and skull while internally saying it. This brought about an awareness of the body and made me more focused on the present moment.

---

by Dean

Hey everybody, I'm going to be posting again on the forum and will be participating on the weekly work programs again.

The I am, I can, I wish exercise was good for sensing myself in a new way. I breathed into different parts of the body while doing the exercise, for example breathing into the chest, head and spine and skull while internally saying it. This brought about an awareness of the body and made me more focused on the present moment.

---

by Judy

Hey Dean, that's terrific news! Welcome back!

I'm currently caught in a cycle of intense activity looking after my grandson - away from home - and with very limited time at the computer, so please forgive the lack of posts at present. I'll be back home next week though in plenty of time for some comments on this foundational exercise.

Thanks Harry for giving us the opportunity.
John, hope you are well and truly on the mend by now. I look forward to hearing from you soon too.

Best wishes for a fruitful couple of weeks with this wonderful experiential exercise.....
Cheers, folks,
Judy.

---

by Judy

And Harry, no apologies at all for sounding "like your teacher self" please....
It is wonderful. And a great help.
Thank you.

---

by Gururaj

Hi Dean

It's like a person in the family comes back to the ancestral home and there are kids of siblings, etc who were not born when he left home.

Me being one such "Kid" of this ES on-line group , am curious for a brief Re-Introduction.

It would be nice if you / any of the elders can do this .

With warm regards,
Gururaj

by Dean

Well I began doing the work when I was 19 after reading The Outsider by Colin Wilson. This book mentioned Gurdjieff and his ideas of centers among other things. I began looking up information about the work on the internet and also began getting some more books on the subject, one of these being Ouspensky's In Search of the Miraculous. After a few years I joined the Endless Search site and began learning some new things in regard to the work. Endless Search has been a valuable resource to me and has helped with the exercises and some of the other ideas that are present in the work. Besides the work I am interested in music and play the drums, and have been doing this since I was about 11 years old. I come from a pretty musical family, my brother plays guitar, and my dad plays bass so we play together and try to come up with some things now and then.

Anyway, I hope to stay on the forum and look forward to participating in the weekly discussions.

---

by Dean

Well I began doing the work when I was 19 after reading The Outsider by Colin Wilson. This book mentioned Gurdjieff and his ideas of centers among other things. I began looking up information about the work on the internet and also began getting some more books on the subject, one of these being Ouspensky's In Search of the Miraculous. After a few years I joined the Endless Search site and began learning some new things in regard to the work. Endless Search has been a valuable resource to me and has helped with the exercises and some of the other ideas that are present in the work. Besides the work I am interested in music and play the drums, and have been doing this since I was about 11 years old. I come from a pretty musical family, my brother plays guitar, and my dad plays bass so we play together and try to come up with some things now and then.

Anyway, I hope to stay on the forum and look forward to participating in the weekly discussions.

---

by Gururaj

Thanks, Dean for sharing. The abiding interest of all of us here in the Gurdjieff theory and practice facilitates our use of a common 'language' though we have grown up in different cultures.
In the context of your long experience of creating music , of late I have had the opportunity to train briefly with others in my city in singing a devotional song (called 'Bhajan') which is usually based on a poem composed originally by a saint / mystic . I have never sung together like this before. It has been a very affirming experience involving mainly the emotional centre.

---

by Gururaj

Came across this today from Rodney Collin ....The theory of Eternal Life

"But what man's consciousness is strong enough to become attached to the explosion of an atomic bomb and retain its awareness?
When irritation or flattery or a sudden shout may instantly deprive men of all sense of their own individual presence and existence, what possibility is there of them retaining such a sense through the unimaginable shock of death?
For that a man would have to be most intensely prepared and trained. He would have to acquire an incredibly strong being, which by superhuman efforts had become accustomed to withstand, without loss of self-consciousness, the most intense shocks, hardships, deprivations and violences which can be met with in the physical world. Only then could he hope to bear the final shock of death without swooning into insensibility.
Such a possibility clearly does not refer to ordinary man."

The atomic bomb referred above is the transition in states at death. So WORK in life is a preparation for that , according to Rodney Collin.

Reading the above , I can now better appreciate the penultimate chapter of BT wherein B receives what is transmitted by higher beings and grows antlers.

I am . I wish . I can.

---

by Cassandra

Early attempts at the exercise highlight the tensions in my body rather than alleviate them. I'm reminded that I'm trying an exercise to help in some way but I don't know exactly what the aim of it is. On the surface, the exercises seem like much of the current self help stuff, "believe in yourself, you're the greatest, etc.", maybe they are in some ways. But I'll try to remember to do them and see what happens. Also, welcome back Dean!

---

by Harry

This is not believe in yourself. This is a direction of energies so that they are harmonized in the body. I resonates in the body. This is one of the three force. Holy Rejoicing. Am resonates elsewhere. Holy Revolting. Can (or now) has another resonation. Holy Suffering. Now the energy flows from I to Am to Now. This circular motion brings the results back to the beginning. And the whole resonates.

Now there is much analysis in what I wrote previously. Much of that comes directly from G.

Some from others who were his pupils.

The whole business of curing disharmony is directly from G. He also says this in context of "I was the only man in the world who could have cured her cancer, but I was not properly prepared due to my accident." Also remember that G has also said that this accident, like being "shot three times" wasn't really an accident.

Where is your Intellectual Center? Where is your Emotional Center. Where is your Moving Center. What are the connections. And how do you feed each of these bodies. We know that ordinary food is for our physical body. And G has taught us about using the Air Shock, which is a mechanical shock, which can be enhanced by the way it is applied. And then there is Conscious Suffering and Intentional Labors, Partkdolg Duty which is the intentional shock of certain impressions. And this impressions push both of the other foods forward and begin the final octave, the final body.

This is the enneagram. This is All and Everything. This is G's teaching. And it is all there for the receiving, if we take it and use it.

This is a formula to jump streams.

---

by Boever

Harry, Could you tell us more about conscious labours and intentional suffering? (I have scanned the tales several times to get a better understanding, but still I don't fully understand it).
Conscious labours is comming back to yourself? Reclaiming your attention on your centers? What about intentional suffering?

How can we "perform" these partkdolg being duties?

---

by Harry

What this exercise is. It is a conscious labor.

You need to read G. Or those major followers like O. and Nicoll. This is the Work. One of the conscious labors is to work on understanding the difference between voluntary suffering and intentional suffering. G spends much time with examples of this in both Tales and Meetings.

---

by Gururaj

On our ES site itself I found good resources about Intentional Suffering one of which is http://www.endlesssearch.co.uk/philo_is.htm.

Moreover under the Work Exercises link of the ES site home page , many tasks are mentioned for experiencing this.

When we are "un"Consciously labouring thru' life ,we will be usually subject to "Voluntary suffering" (We bear this in return for some Life benefit - like getting our paycheck).
During the above process we quite often victimise ourselves with Automatic / Mechanical suffering (feeling hurt, angry, etc. on occurrence of unfavourable situations).

When we become conscious of all this and with awareness bear the pain - for the sake of Work itself and not for any Life intention/ benefit (though that may also be vouchsafed to us when we approach situations with equanimity) - then this is an experience of Intentional Suffering. There is an after-taste of being energised or at-least not drained while we are in Intentional Suffering as compared to the state when we suffer mechanically. And instead of reacting we respond.

While driving back from office today in chaotic traffic on bad Indian roads , I was mindful and courteous to others - for a change  . Much Inner benefit resulted.

---

by Judy

Good morning Everyone,

Arrived home safely from some weeks of family work away a couple of days ago. Still settling in. Good to be back.

This "assisting" exercise suggested by Harry could well be explored for a little longer - (Gururaj, what do you think?) - another week or so?

Has everyone read the Fifth Talk in "Life is Real..." yet and absorbed the detailed instructions for the exercise from Mr G himself? If not, it is most worthwhile.
How is the sensing of the reverberation in the solar plexus proceeding?
Personally, I do not yet experience this reverberation regularly, but am encouraged hugely when it occasionally is felt.
The instructions for the dividing of attention given in this chapter are very clear and detailed too. Wonderful.

I note that Mr Gurdjieff says towards the end, "not to use this exercise for strength". I'd forgotten that bit. The thing is, it works remarkably well for that purpose (emotional equanimity and calm courage) for me. Any comments on this please?

Also, Gururaj, whereabouts is the current roster please? I saw it once, but now cannot locate.
Good wishes to all,
Judy.

---

by Harry

Judy,

For the exercise, and many others, active imagination is necessary (And actually directly related to the exercise.) First start by observing. When you say AM where do you feel it? Can you change where you feel it? When you say I AM can you direct that feeling. In a sense this is like imagining the Master to the Carriage.

For me the biggest changes came over time. Am in the solar plexus seemed natural. It just came. Wish began to move. And actually there are three chakra areas that reverberate now. (I hesitate to describe some of this, as in a couple of my previous comments. Because I fully believe that we must individually discover what is there for each of ourselves.) And the circular movement through the body came of its own, as well.

I've actually added Higher Intellectual Center and Higher Emotional Center. Imagining contact with these two centers.

I want to say something, again, for emphasis. It is important for each of us to work through the Work Teachings, for our self(ves). All and Everything is, indeed, all and everything. G created a teaching text. Meetings builds upon that. The Third Series is like a quick commentary. But we must mine these works. Yes we can help each other. But we need to help each other find the veins of precious teachings which each must then mine. We can't mine for each other. By describing what we experience we should give the flavor, but each may have a differing experience.

---

by Gururaj

The current roster schedule is in the "Discussion Forum" under the thread "Options for the fifteenth cycle"
Am reproducing the operational part here

Harry - (started) 26th Aug.
John - 9th Sept. (I trust we shall be hearing soon from you, John) Judy - 23rd Sept.
Gururaj - 7th Oct
Cassandra - 21st Oct and Tomas De Boever - 4th Nov.

To avoid any possible confusion , I feel we can retain the sequence as above. The next fortnight is for John's post .
However till he comes back , we can continue with Harry's suggested exercise.
I shall also see the archived unanswered posts to see if any filler can be kept ready complementary to the exploration of " I am / I wish / I can " .

Alternative suggestions are welcome.

Dean, if you choose to, please inform whether you would like to join the roster after Tomas' turn.
And , of course , Alistair has said that he may join in one of these days.

---

by Judy

Oh, in the Discussion Forum - of course. Thanks, Gururaj. Sounds good.

Harry, thanks for the encouragement. Yes, I can move the "Am" around. I seem to naturally feel "Wish" in the heart most times. "Can" makes itself known in the head and the limbs, especially the legs, which seems strange, but that is the way it is at present. Isn't it interesting that I didn't think I felt the "reverberation" often at all. Mostly it is just felt/sensed as a sort of swirling of energy - sometimes spinning. Just occasionally, a true buzzing, which I'm now realising as being just a slightly stronger result.

I agree progress comes over time with lots of work. I sense an energetic vibration wherever the attention moves to, with the bones and joint exercises as given in the Sensing exercises on the site, for example; (more practice has been done with these) and usually sense the "Am" quite definitely in the solar plexus (although years ago it began in the head). Obviously, the Can and the Wish need more work. Not much has been done with them. I have begun.

There is a distinct bodily enlivenment afterwards. I seem to have become aware of, and be participating in, the actual "living in the body". Sometimes it even seems to be that I am sensing life-force in some way. So much so, that I have wondered from time to time where on earth I was living before... And yet, paradoxically. there is also an improved awareness that I am not just my body; it has become a comfortable separation into "Me" and "Judy". This of course assists further observation attempts enormously.

I too hesitate to talk about any of this. Indeed, much of it began with imagination and even self-deception (as G, points out, even self-deception can be put to good use for this high aim). I remember decades ago, when first introduced to producing the sensation of heat in various parts of the body by attention, how imaginary it at first felt. Same with this vibration. It has become real now.
As G. has entitled his Third Series book.

Your reassurance is much appreciated, Harry.
Sincerely,
Judy.

---

by Judy

And yes, Harry, I have been adding in the Higher Centres for some years now. This began as a Twelve Step Program went a bit deeper, and the Higher Centres naturally became an integral part of my personal concept of a "Higher Power". The few times one of these seems to have been sensed, two happened as a head-buzzing; once inside the head, once outside the side of the head; and once there were two bursts of light in the inner vision. Very heady stuff - literally. Easy does it. But definite never-to-be-forgotten experiences.

Most necessary to be grounded. I best do this by balancing the inner work with some practical service.

I'd like to add that without a group such as this, allowed to continue for many years, it would not have been possible for me to have made much progress in this work. We are indeed fortunate.

Ok - as the saying goes, "In for a penny, in for a pound."
May as well share an experience of last Friday which was a result of the current exercise, I think.

I was experiencing a good-quality overall sensing after sitting in reflection for some minutes. The vibration of energy happened to be noticed, in both head and chest. I after a while looked at my cat. She was staring at me. The energy expanded out from me towards her and we both seemed to be in a sort of envelope of what I would have previously referred to as "oneness", but it may be better termed a momentary awareness of an energy field which we all "swim in", if you like. This lasted for about a minute or more with complete stillness from both of us. Then it faded.

That's it for today.
Going to the kitchen to cook Sunday lunch now folks.
Best wishes to all.

---

by Harry

I do this every evening as my night prayer. My cat knows when I have done this. I am centered and she moves on.

Interesting beings. There was cause for commotion yesterday evening and when I went to bed they both came in to keep me company until I had settled. The male never comes in my room in the evening unless I have some inner turmoil or there is a thunderstorm.

---

by Gururaj

John has communicated that he is still not fully fit to post and shall do it by the 23rd of Sept. Judy has offered to swap places in the roster with John and we should be seeing her post shortly.

Meanwhile, Continuing further with the quest / creation of a Real I in us , the following exercise is suggested - from our archives (Contributed by Ian) .

Each morning this week, imagine that you are a conscious being who has acquired their own "I". Live each day accordingly as you imagine that a conscious being might behave in every situation.

Three or more times each day this week, perform the AIEIOIUOA exercise in the following manner:
Intone the following letters of aieioiuoa, silently or out loud as circumstances permit.
Begin each intonation with a deep breath to the solar plexus.
Pay special attention to visualizing the illumination in each bone.
Sense the vibration of the sound of each letter in the respective bone.

Intone A while Sensing the upper right arm bone illuminated
Intone I while Sensing the lower right arm bone illuminated
Intone E while Sensing the upper left leg bone illuminated
Intone I while Sensing the lower left leg bone illuminated
Intone O while Sensing the lower right leg bone illuminated
Intone I while Sensing the upper right leg bone illuminated
Intone U while Sensig the lower left arm bone illuminated
Intone O while Sensing the upper left arm bone illuminated
Intone A while Sensing the spine and skull bones illuminated

At the end of the exercise, evoke an emotion of Remorse for not Working more diligent;y for Being.

---

by Boever

Thanks Gururaj for the very cool exercise

---

by Cassandra

Everyone, please allow me to go back to the I AM exercise for a moment.

In the 3rd talk in Life is Real, Mr. G. says what "I wish" is not. This was helpful because I had/have some questions about what it is that the intoning or saying of the I AM I CAN and I WISH do! I will quote from pg. 111: When 'I wish'--I feel with my whole being that I wish, and can wish. This does not mean that I want, that I need, or that I like or, lastly, that I desire.... I never like, never want, I do not desire anything and do not need anything--all this is slavery.

Harry wrote earlier that these I AMs harmonize energy in the body. Maybe so with practice. For now, I try to bring in the recommended imagination by seeing a bright yellow energy in the solar plexus when I AM is intoned silently. I'll try this for some time and try not to expect any results.

If anyone has any insight on the fourth exercise G. gives in the same chapter that would be helpful, too. He tries to distinguish for English speakers the difference between his instructions on sensing and feeling. He talks about the importance of sensing and feeling fingers for this exercise; says sensing is related to the solar plexus and feeling to the spinal chord. Not sure how sensing the solar plexus, for instance, relates to sensing fingers.

I hope you feel better soon, John.

Gracias

---

by Judy

Cassandra,
The imagining of the reverberation is an essential part of this I Am, I can, I wish exercise given straight to us from Mr G. The reason for imagining the reverberation is that one is acting "as if", until the reverberation becomes real.
As Harry comments, this is a changing-streams exercise.
Mr Gurdjieff even says somewhere that without sensing the reverberation in the solar plexus, the exercise is of practically no value at all. It could even work against to strengthen ego.

Kind regards,
Judy.

---

by Cassandra

Yes Judy, that part is clear. Do you do the I AM, I CAN, I WISH as an extended meditation say for 20 minutes or so or is it interspersed throughout your day? Thanks

---

by Judy

Not as an extended meditation, Cassandra. My understanding is that this exercise is more like a prayer; so interspersed, or morning and evening - perhaps with other prayers.
The inner eye does much more than "see". It has to learn to sense and feel as well - all three parts - hence the reverberations and movements of energetic vibrations. And of course that is just one little added perspective of which I am aware.

What do others here find most effective?

Best wishes to you,
Judy.

---

by Harry

You can do this as you walk down the street. You can use it as a quick prayer. Once the taste is established it becomes a quick centering exercise. (An exercise to take you to a different level of being.)

The best extended exercise, from my experience, is the draining exercise which has been described here before. It is another act of being that you can use to move into the being state.

Work Program 2 weeks beginning 9 September 2013

---

by Judy

John and I exchanged emails today and have agreed to exchange roster spots.
I have been looking at the unanswered posts, as suggested by Guru. Here is a beauty. I have no idea how it slipped through without comments and posts. Here is a second chance.
The relevant exercise is below. Please share your specific comments with the group, one for each of the four suggestions.

Exercises for week of January 29, 2012

1. Observe yourself when you first meet someone you know, what you think of them.
2. Take an uncharacteristic trait of yours, as between lazy and energetic, and explore the unperceived territory that it opens up to you, taking it all the way to the edge.
3. Relax the neck and shoulder muscles.
4. Counter habit and established patterns by intentionally acting differently.
Ian
Being transforms the suffering through which it arises.User avatar
Ian
Site Admin

I see just now that Guru has also posted an unanswered program from Ian, the illuminated bones sensing exercise, done together with the intonation of aieioiuoa. This is very beautiful.
So now we have plenty of work suggestions to attend to. Let's go to it.
Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by Judy

First part of the exercise;
Of course this self-observation when I meet someone I know is supposed to be happening all the time. But I'm not there yet. I did this yesterday, twice. Both times it completely altered the type of interaction. A significant amount of external considering appeared spontaneously and both interactions opened up and lengthened into much clearer and deeper communication. It was evident that something in me cared for these two friends a lot. Usually we would just casually pass each other but stay isolated in our own heads, so to speak. Not so, yesterday.

Not sure exactly what the second part means, but just playing around intentionally with physical energy levels to see what transpires. I went for an extra walk to the beach for example. Noticed several resistances, not of the body but the mind; therefore emotions involved too somewhere. I imagined I saw things differently, for example. It was as if the mind was trying to justify this added activity by finding a benefit. Not sure that there was any, beyond the exploration of the exercise. Just doing things intentionally is its own reward, of course. There I go again.

Part three brought to mind that exercise Tomas shared, where one explores where the point is that the head automatically rests on the spine. I'm currently working through an "Uncommon Knowledge" program for anxiety, depression and lots of other negatives. (My usual focus for transforming negative emotion etc is Nicoll; just like to add something scientifically current to him once in a while. It always gives a boost.) There is a wealth of new (to me) information and they follow each section of this with a "Relaxed Review" guided meditation which is most effective.

The fourth part seems to have already been covered by the other three, but I'll find a couple of extras.

Cheers,
Judy.

---

by Gururaj

Have come back to my city from a four-and-half days retreat of 'Work'ers from all over India. 44 of us were there ably guided by two very experienced persons one of whom took us thru' Gurdjieff movements as well. Felt very blessed to have this opportunity.
A clear perception of the value of being fully available to the moment at hand and the use of the body (in all its manifestations) as an aid on the path.

Unexpectedly the phone and internet connectivity had problems and was pretty much isolated from the internet.

Thanks Judy, for the contribution and look forward to experience them and post shortly.

---

by Judy

You are indeed blessed. What a fantastic opportunity. 44 participants!
Welcome back with all the new perceptions and understandings, Gururaj.

Judy.

P.S. Don't suppose you noticed any interest in anyone for becoming a member of an excellent online group?

---

by Gururaj

"Observe yourself when you first meet someone you know, what you think of them."

Whenever remembered the above, observed that it's more that there is a stored feeling in me for each person rather than a thought.
In any case , the thought is coloured by the feeling automatically arising on meeting the other person.

Yeah, Judy, it has not occurred to me to invite anybody I know to participate here. Maybe one of these days I should.
But, I prefer that they would need to be someone who I am not anyway meeting for Work.

---

by Gururaj

One "uncharacteristic trait " (this is a bit of a confusing combination of words , as Judy also implied) - which I sort of stumbled upon today was to start and complete an activity well before a deadline (either set by situations / others or self-imposed) .

I started one activity today afternoon overcoming my usual sense of the time to start - which is always a bit late and then tending to hurry to complete or miss the deadline altogether .Today ,started early and finished the activity well in time for a succeeding appointment and then realised that that was a new experience.

There will be many opportunities ,in the days to come, to explore this different approach intentionally more often.

---

by JohnS

I'm very sorry, but I still won't be able to post today. I didn't have site access on the weekend, so I couldn't let you know sooner.

Apologies again

John

---

by Gururaj

Appreciate your conscientiousness , John, to keep us informed.

I'll post for this fortnight starting Sept.23rd and you can take over the Oct.7th slot in the current roster.

Meanwhile , look forward to sharing of your experience and participation here as and when you can.

With wishes for clearing of all obstacles to your return to ES,
Gururaj
(Hindu folks piously invoke a particular God while especially seeking this benefit - of clearing all obstacles before beginning an endeavour.
Whether or not there actually are such separate Gods ,I wonder whether diverse human aspirations are at the root of sustaining this multi-god theism in my part of this earth . Anyway I have enlisted Ganesha , the elephant headed God, son of Shiva / Parvati,right now on your behalf.)

Work Program 2 weeks beginning 23 September 2013

---

by Gururaj

When "I Am" , Attention Is. (Or is it the other way around ?)

From the Archives (Feb.6th,2006) I found , what I consider a fine exercise from Ian originally, to become attentive to our current state of attention and , hopefully, thereby to enhance it .

"Attention

1. Start by directing your attention into your hand and becoming aware of as many sensations as you can.
Widen your attention to include your arm and then your whole body. Next become attentive to whatever your body is in contact with - bed, floor, chair, etc.
Widen your attention to include the room or immediate environment you are located in.
Become aware of as many impressions as you can take in, in a non-judgemental way.
Gradually widen your attention in steps to include your town or city, country, continent, planet, solar system, galaxy, everything.
The last steps will require more visualization and imagination than the first steps.
Every step should build on the previous one, so that nothing is lost from the attention as it is widened.
Finally. reverse the steps and gradually return attention to just your hand.
Finish by collecting your attention into a three centered buoyancy of Being.

2. In free moments during the day, let your attention be directed to a series of seven distinct objects in your immediate visual environment.
Attend to each object for one complete breath. Observe each object with a sightless gaze and without judgement.
On the eight breath return your attention to the sensation of the whole of yourself.
On the ninth breath, expand your attention to include the whole of yourself and the whole of the environment.

3. When listening to others talk, try to be more attentive to the pauses, spaces and quietness between their words.

4. Choose one denying force that you are particularly attached to or identified with.
Resolve not to express or act out the chosen denying force in your habitual way, by substituting a consciously chosen and prepared counter action, activity or exercise to be performed instead.
Finish by collecting your attention into a three centered buoyancy of Being."

My further thoughts - Just like Suffering is of different types - automatic(or mechanical) , voluntary and intentional are the states of Attention too exactly corresponding to it ?

Can I keep coming back to Intentional Attention throughout the day ?

---

by Gururaj

Could each of us share one "Denying force " in us that we have chosen to wrestle with for this fortnight ?

Speaking for myself , would like to take on something not too daunting or vague .
Am yet to choose that as well and to make the visualisation of the alternate behaviour.

---

by Harry

I'm not sure that we should be struggling with denying or negative force. It is part of the triad. Positive becomes negative and negative becomes positive. The whole idea of triamazikamno is that three forces are needed. The situation we want to avoid is when we allow the two forces to battle with each.

This is emphasized by G in the chapter on Good versus Evil. God needed Beelzebub. Is this not why G named his book what he named it?

Yes we have instant resistance to some things. But you don't struggle with that. You need to find the neutralizing force so you can move up on the octave. Turn the negative into a positive. Or vice versa.

---

by Gururaj

So the aim needs to be to, in some way, enable the third force to have an influence in this battle of the 2 forces ?

Seems to me Attention , non-identification , pondering about Work ideas and so on is this 3rd force and visualising a different, affirming outcome is an attempt to strengthen the affirming force
- but, as I understand ,you are saying, that - we also need to be 3rd force aware.

Practice should make this clearer .

---

by Harry

Who is judging what is affirming? What I has decided that the affirming is better.

My own approach has been to give up that control. To recognize the presence of a quandary, if you will. And then Work. "Holy higher intellectual take control. Holy higher emotional maintain my life. Maintain my perceptions." Or "I am, I wish, I can."

Remember we are looking to invoke another octave in these situations. Sometimes breathing is enough. Sometimes we need the conscious labors.

---

by Judy

I used to get in a tangle with this too. I recall your mentioning one time to me, Harry, "not to get into a civil war".
Now my approach is also to get into an egoless state as rapidly as possible; to, so to speak, get out of my own way. Then there is a space, an abiding presence, in which third force is more likely to enter.
Learning how to give up control, to surrender to higher forces, is a big part of my work.

Of course sometimes I still slip into 'project-micro-managing' life. That is the old way.
When aware enough, I don't do it. Why would I, when there is a better way...

I like this, Harry:

> "Holy higher intellectual take control. Holy higher emotional maintain my life. Maintain my perceptions."

I'll borrow that one. Thanks.

I often say the Holy Equation prayer,

Holy-Affirming,
Holy-Denying,
Holy-Reconciling,
Transubstantiate in me,
For my Being.

or, depending on the duress, it may even simply be "Lord have mercy" or "It is nothing, I wish to be." And yes, attention to the breath and the increased mindfulness of the three-centred state.

---

by Cassandra

When attempting Guru's number 1 above, the thought occurred to me that when I expand, this is who/what I am or closer to it-- "I AM, I Can, I Wish."

Speaking of seeming dichotomies or "civil war," I work for the US government, and currently much of this government is "shutdown," i.e., no pay (at least right now). So there are very many opinions on this topic, very easy for me to take a side in this. For the sake of working on myself, this is an opportunity to watch my reactions, tendencies, desires around this. One part of me decided to remain neutral, but after hearing a comment on TV Friday, I went off (just to my husband), then decided again to attempt to work. A simple, identifiable thing I can do is not to express an opinion one way or the other, but to replace my position/comments, etc. with an appeal to (in Harry's terms) the higher emotional, intellectual, moving. Ask that my views be interpreted through these lenses. Why must I be right about this?

Work Program 2 weeks beginning 7 October 2013

---

by Gururaj

This is one from the archives , a contribution by Ian.
(Am substituting for John with this filler. But if John would like to , he can also post one for these two weeks.The next fortnight - starting Oct.21st - is Cassandra's turn)

Monks Walk. Shake the dust from your feet. Let go of past and future concerns and become present within a Soundless Sound and Sightless Gaze. With each step, nurture your own small portion of Great Being by filling one of the ten bones with light and breath. Ponder - Does searching necessarily imply finding?

While eating, use the Heptachord. Unhurried sensed motions. Breath. Soundless Sound, Sightless Gaze. Silently and attentively eat the three foods. Ponder - What are we food for? What parts of us are waste?

Suggestion to take snapshot of posture, breathing, emotions, thoughts, sensations. Label each snapshot according type and degree of Identification. Take the snapshot from the visualized point of view of being up in a tree looking down at yourself and the situation. Consider the opposite of each Identification.

Deeply sense the body at least once a day while pondering questions such as: Is the Seeker's Search all for Nothing? Has the Seeker sacrificed their Search for comfort? Can the Seeker's Search for a glimpse of significance be hidden within boring mundane everyday affairs? Does the stuff of Searching lie in the everyday anything and everything - the placing of a spoon, the getting out of a chair? The seeker refocuses their striving from a question of importance to a question of paying attention, being aware. The Seeker reaffirms their awareness of Remembering their Search: The Seeker gazes upon their own steps as they travel within their own land.

Evoke Gratitude for Being created with the ability to ask questions.

---

by Gururaj

It would be all of your experience that , from our external and superior vantage point, when we deliberately intrude or interfere in the functioning of an animal or insect , one naturally observes with curiosity the instinctive responses of that organism .

Don't we also have the ability to observe ourselves too ?
In this context the last statement in the task of "feeling gratitude for our ability to ask questions " can be extended to the feeling of wonder and gratitude about our ability to be a witness "of our own land" .

But is it as objective and detached as in the above example ? For me certainly this a muscle which needs a lot of strengthening. The task appears to be an aid to explore this closely.

Say something , folks. Let's reconnect .It's been very quite around here

---

by Gururaj

I meant 'quiet'

---

by Harry

If two or three of us have a conversation where is the energy?

Is there a commitment?

Is there even a question anyone else wants to ask?

---

by Gururaj

If a renewal is not happening , maybe fresh beginnings are needed. That's the way of nature , isn't it .

I ought to have shared it many weeks ago. But it brooks no further delay now.
It is regarding a communication from Ian about the future of this site.

Shall be using the eMail route to all of you in the roster today.

---

by Gururaj

Hi Dean - Could you inform your eMail id - either here or via mail?

I need to send a mail to you on the matter referred in my previous post.

---

by Dean

Ok, sounds good.

---

by Cassandra

> Gururaj wrote:
> Has the Seeker sacrificed their Search for comfort? Can the Seeker's Search for a glimpse of significance be hidden within boring mundane everyday affairs? Does the stuff of Searching lie in the everyday anything and everything - the placing of a spoon, the getting out of a chair? The seeker refocuses their striving from a question of importance to a question of paying attention, being aware.

For me, this the key. It is the peace that passeth all understanding. There is nothing to be gotten out there to brighten what is within me; but that is the ongoing fallacy that tomorrow will be a brighter day. Still, that remains elusive for me.

Work Program 2 weeks beginning 4 November 2013

---

by Boever

Hi,

1) When in a conversation with another person, try to be present. Listen with all your attention to what the other person is saying, try to be aware.
2) Everytime when you walk through a door, make an effort to remember yourself

---

by Harry

I would add this. What is the difference between the two situations. Is there a difference between observation and remembering? Is there a difference between observing the other person by paying full attention and shutting off your internal dialogue?

What "self" do you remember?

---

by Cassandra

By "self" do you mean which I happens to predominate at the time you are engaged with another person. If that's it, I don't think it matters which self because these are all from personality, and personality is that which we observe.

---

by Harry

That is the point. If the self is from the personality you are doing a callisthenic. And that is necessary. It is necessary to "act as if". But ultimately you must take this to an essence activity.

---

by Cassandra

I know we are to figure things out for ourselves, but Harry if you could elaborate on this a bit more, that would be most helpful. What is "take this to an essence activity?" Please throw another bone!

---

by Harry

We can "act" from any one of our "i's" Often we begin a task from an Intellectual I, the Intellectual Center. And this is often from the external part of the Intellectual Center.

(Remember too that type plays a place here. A physical type will act more from the moving center. And some activities come from there. Hitting a ball. Digging a ditch. Likewise emotional people and emotional activities come from that center. And often these become imitative. From the external part of that center.)

When we begin trying to work we are not balanced. We only have the idea of a I in charge. So we must act as if we have one. Once we have the beginning of an I then we can begin to truly remember.

Let's take an example. You are learning to hit a ball. Say a baseball. But substitute golf, tennis, whatever you want. We start with watching. We watch baseball players. We see what they do. We imitate what they do in our minds. And then we try to do it. We repeat and repeat until we get what has been called muscle memory. We see golfers lose this. This is a physical learning. A physical observation.

But at a certain point we balance the centers. Triamazikamno comes into play. We have a balanced approach to the activity. Yes the mind is working. But we aren't thinking things through. (Like once we've learned to drive a car we no longer think about the physical aspects of driving unless we are put into hazardous conditions.) The muscle memory is there. And we have an emotional balance. And we hit that ball. And we know we hit that ball with our entire being. With our balanced essence. It is still just hitting the ball, but it has become a prayer.

Like typing this becomes a prayer.

---

by Cassandra

Very nice elaboration, Thanks Harry. This is good.

So, if I make attempts at the suggested exercise--being present when in conversation, I begin with the calisthenic of physically calming my body, trying not to dart my eyes in the direction of the more interesting conversation taking place beside me; this may then lead to an emotional and intellectual presence.

I was in Lowe's recently trying to find material, and the store clerk assisting me had very penetrating eyes, it seems a presence about him that I wished I could convey in exchanges with people.

---

by Harry

Don't care what presence you give off. Just be.

I say this as someone who had the same thing said to him a couple of decades ago. "Get out of your head." Don't overthink. Don't try to become something.

Be Here Now.

---

by Gururaj

When I am in an interaction with another person I am seeing (now,after the fact, I admit) different elements present / arising.
(a) The objective reality of the other person's words, tone, expressions
(b) my own state at that time - influenced by the fact that either I have initiated the interaction for achieving my own ends or the other has initiated or it is a random ,unplanned interaction.
(c) the inner 'froth' which gets created as the interaction proceeds further .

To the extent I am not aware of this whole thing then and there as it is happening , to that extent is my consciousness non-existent and, at best, clouded.
Usually there is no impartial observer .

Even the "sensing-while-going thru'-the-door' task is remembered only when I am in some level of awareness before crossing the door.

---

by JohnS

I have just resumed (after 30 years) classes in Alexander Technique, which is a method of body awareness through non-action. It centres on observation in detail of habitual postures caused by habitual thinking centred in the personality (defence, survival, maintaining the image of oneself, etc.). Its no use using thought or 'will' to change any of this, as this process simply introduces a new point of tension brought in by the new intent - no matter how well-intentioned.
The aim is perfectly described in a LVL post I read this morning:

"In examining an inner process today, I realized that Being has the ability to grasp anything in its entirety in a single instant.

This capacity is rarely used, but it is an inherent one that always resides within Being. And there is an inexorable logic to it.

Because Being is an emanation of divine consciousness, it already knows everything, and has the capacity to understand anything within one moment. Many cases of apparent brilliance in autistic people are there simply because that one part of them functions in direct contact with this particular quality of Being.

We call this intuition without understanding its nature, which comes directly from the Divine inflow. Actually, this capacity is at work most of the time within us, and consists of that part within that recognizes everything before thought arises. There is, after all, an inalienable part of us that belongs to God which cannot be extinguished.

Thought is actually an afterthought; that is, it arises after the intuition has already grasped the situation in its entirety. The body, the physical self, already functions in movement directly from this intuitive capacity, but the mind doesn't. Thought actually obscures the living process and covers it with a perception that is no longer instantaneous, that is, of the moment.

If thought were to stop interfering with this process, we would be left with instantaneous participation, which is much more natural and grasps what is at hand without obstacles."

In interaction with others, when I am paying attention to what they are saying, I am also simultaneously observing my change in tensions and posture which that person has induced in me, and also some changes in gestures / attitudes of the speaker. These changes / processes in the person are not caused by their noticing an increase in my awareness, as Harry mentioned correctly, but by their own habitual patterns.

This process is a further step for me from observation to self-remembering, as it brings the action of centres into view. The next big step is to observe - without thinking - which part of which centre is acting. That involves much clearing of the path.

John

---

by Gururaj

John ,I wonder whether this part which you have quoted from LVL's blog "Being has the ability to grasp anything in its entirety in a single instant" is an example / consequence / manifestation of an Essence activity which Harry referred to in an earlier post on this thread.

Listened to a talk of J krishnamurthi on YouTube just before posting this and therein he says to the effect that observation in the present without thought is true meditation . This alone can shatter the fallacy we usually operate from - of a particular "I" trying to "do" something to control and shape our moment to moment problems and issues. The controller and the issue attempted to be controlled are both thought processes and therefore of no use.
Only pure observation can transform. Ah , for an experience of this !

By the way , It's a coincidence that only today , to our local weekly Work meeting , an Alexander Technique instructor (who is a rare entity in India , let alone my city) gave us an introduction to AT. So I could appreciate ,somewhat ,what you posted.

---

by Judy

Morning All,

Nice synchronicity with Mr Alexander, John and Gururaj.

And talking about meditation, Gururaj, I've recently been enjoying some old tapes by Rajneesh (Osho) on Vipassana meditation. He taught it in three stages: first is watching the breath; second is observing the thoughts; third is observing moods, emotions, feelings. He emphasises that this is to happen all the time, this witnessing. He talks of meditating for twenty minutes twice daily as being "meditation Western standard time." Most entertaining lecturer. They were different times though. As you say, Krishnamurti speaks in similar vein.

Our Gurdjieff system teaches us how to head towards this state, with much emphasis on objective self-observation.
Mr Nyland's group here suggests a minimum of ten attempts daily, for example.

I had a gift of an experience of a state of equanimity which lasted several minutes last Saturday afternoon while sitting listening in a group meeting of folks interested in "A Course in Miracles." Prior to this, my ego with its various communities of small demanding 'i's, was going through a difficult time. It (Judy) didn't want to be there in that space at all, but something deeper wanted to stay, so we did.
Anyway, I was gifted with a clear detachment from the ego and simply observed the myriads of busy thoughts and resultant confusions of feelings happening. Impartiality was high and good spontaneity. And, having had in mind to use your first suggested exercise while at this meeting, Tomas, apparently nobody else noticed this and I continued to participate in it as expected, so thanks for the opportunity.

One last comment; I am continually surprised at how things work out when I get the personality out of the way as much as possible. I had expected to perhaps not stay at all. Instead, what transpired was by far my best work for last week.

Also, hope it was my turn to post the suggested work program for today. I had some idea it was due November 18, but folks, if that is incorrect, please just ignore and I'll repost at correct time.

Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by JohnS

I get more and more pleased as I come across non-G authors who have a very accurate analytic grasp of the presence and obstructions of false personality, and definitely not from the view of modern psychology.
I am re-reading Coomeraswamy at the moment, and his insight into things such as will, fate, intuition, etc do not clash, but reinforce, G's analysis.

John

Work Program 2 weeks beginning 18 November 2013

by Judy

This coming fortnight I am suggesting one of the exercises handed down to us by Mr Paul Beidler, through Ian.
We have been touching on the topics of the emanations of Divine Consciousness of Being, Grace and Mercy. These three form a primary triangle and thus we can use the Holy Equation formula to attempt to make contact with these ever-present Realities.

We can affirm to be; I am, I wish to be.
We have already noticed a Holy Denying, such as a negative emotion (the one I have been working with in particular recently is irritations), and then through proper impartial spontaneous self-observations of this Holy Denying, which will connect us with Grace,(related to the first conscious shock), we can then use the Heptachord of Suffering exercise to connect with the second conscious force of Mercy (connected with Intentional Suffering). This reconciles and transforms the Holy Denying.

You may find it useful to read the work exercises here on our site "Intentional Sufferings". Choose your own particular negativity.
The Holy Equation and the Heptachord of Suffering exercises are quoted from our site thus:

> The Holy Equation
>
> Holy-Affirming,
> Holy-Denying,
> Holy-Reconciling,
> Transubstantiate in me,
> For my Being.
> "This is a prayer given to us. In it I have found what I call the Holy Equation which provides us with a basic pattern for most of our work. Holy Denying equals our inherited mechanical "myself" manifested by our habits, traits, thoughts, feelings and actions in sleep. Holy Affirming is our conscious effort to accept, endure and to meet with objectivity all our Holy Denyings. Holy Reconciling is the resultant of them both leading automatically to a Transubstantiation. By self-observation we learn to recognize accurately our Holy Denyings to which we then eventually apply our Holy Affirming."
> "We understand the ordinary pursuits of our lives responding to desires to be educated, well thought of, useful, admired, superior, wealthy or spiritual, as examples of Holy Denyings. We try to meet these denyings with our conscious efforts in our search which we call Holy Affirming. Both are of equal substance and importance." (Paul Beidler)

Heptachord of Suffering Exercise.

This exercise details the sequential process of applying the Holy Equation twice to form an Octave of Transubstantiation.
Perceiving the suffering arising from our connection to a living system and suspecting that creative enduring of suffering may enhance conscience, we will apply the heptachord of suffering to our daily encounters with suffering.
For example, starting from :
0. Life experience of a personal Holy Denying suffering, followed by ...
1. citing or naming the personal Holy Denying suffering, followed by ...
2. a Holy Affirming of the energy spent in the suffering, resulting in ...
3. a Holy Reconciled "impartiality", making it possible to ...
4. curb the suffering's manifestation, then diverting the energy saved ...
5. to the expression of a companion characteristic such as joy, followed by ...
6. a savouring of a transubstantiated comprehension between the suffering and its companion, leading to ...
7. a coating on an inner-being embryo often surfacing as intellectual deprivation, a quiet mind.

Don't get overly caught up in any seeming complexity with this. You may of course use any favourite method for transforming a negative emotion. Sometimes a simple "It is nothing. I wish to be." is sufficient.
First of all, of course, one has to notice it when it is happening. In that first instant of noticing that irritation, for example, detach from it and simply be a witness to it. Various little tricks may assist here too. For myself, I may mentally say "Judy is irritated. I am not" for example. This is to remind me that proper self-observation involves using the highest "I" available to be the Observer. This in itself defuses it substantially. Then sometimes I use 'watching the breath' for a short time to reach the needed detachment, even adding "Lord have Mercy" if required for a proper return to equanimity and quiet mind. One must fine-tune one's own paths which work. Suggested exercises may point the way somewhat though. This is indeed something we can "do".

Share an experience of your own transformation of a negative emotion here with the group.
Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by Judy

No replies?

I want to say that this is basic Gurdjieff work. It is covered in Nicoll's Commentaries in many different ways. Use one of these if you are not attracted to the particular method above from Mr Beidler. Is there nobody interested in transforming a recent negative emotion, for example, and sharing the experience with the group?

Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by Harry

Judy,

I did not reply because we discussed this a bit ago (you and I). I think this is an important exercise in whatever way it is applied.

We must act through three centers.

Harry

---

by Judy

Hello Harry,
Oh yes, of course. I do recall. Besides, you have been particularly busy here lately and I have been enjoying all the insightful posts, as I always do.

Thanks for reiterating that important point about working with the three centres.

Saying the Holy Equation prayer reminds me of this. The negativity is then seen as the Holy Denying. I can affirm towards transubstantiation (Mr Gurdjieff says we have a right not to be negative), and then often the Work itself becomes the Holy Reconciling. This is one triamazikamno. The Heptachord of Suffering uses two of these to form a heptaparaparshinokh and complete an octave upwards in consciousness.
What happens if I do nothing? Well, most often I go downwards towards useless energy-wasting misery.
I also try to remember to sense the body while working.

Harry, should you feel inclined towards elaborating a little on your reminder to work with the three centres, it would be much appreciated.

Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by Harry

Here's an example:

How much do we live in "stories" we tell about our lives? Sometimes I think that different i's look for events to participate in so we can tell the story later.

How does this impact on our real I?

How do we keep from getting lost in these stories?

The first thing is to attempt to recognize the story we are living or reliving in the retelling. This is where self observation comes in.

Then there is the attempt to step out of the story. This is self remembering. And the first way to attempt this is to move into the simple I Am Now. I Am, I Wish, I Can exercise. Inhale. I am. Feel it. Then let that vibration flow to the solar plexus. I Wish. And leave a pause while the vibration travels back up the spinal column. I can. Simpler: Same inhalation and exhalation with I Am Now.

This is simple Work and we can use it to move to a centered state. Using our recognition of the stories we tell ourselves, and then others, the stories we live in, using them as observed impetus to Work.

---

by Judy

Ah - stories! I could write a book on those.... smile.

We can get lost in them in 'waking' consciousness, and then while sleeping, doesn't the subconscious just love to make up fantastic stories in those "remains of the day" dreams! Yes indeed.
Of course I am usually lost in these. Occasionally I will recognise that I am dreaming though, which stops the story straight away. (I'm not referring to Work dreams or vivid ones with symbols and so forth here).

Thanks for the discussion, Harry. As you mention, there are many applications of this exercise.

Wouldn't it be great to not only recognise the dream story as a dream, but also to try to remember the "I Am, I wish, I can" exercise simultaneously.... The seed is planted. Now I at least have the intention...

Having sustained periods of mindfulness is also effective against losing myself in stories, and thus remaining somewhat present to the life. Perhaps I will open up the exercise to include any chosen method for either transforming a negative emotion, or even a favourite way to become more present to the moment. Feel free.

Best wishes,

Judy.

---

by Gururaj

Judy's "No replies? I want to say that this is basic Gurdjieff work." prodded me to see why I have nothing to report . The fact of the past week for me was that there was not much of Work in the midst of a lot of work ! .
One is bustling along from activity to activity with no sensitivity . Even the daily Nicoll "audio" listening and the visit to the ES site are more activities without their influence extending to what happens after I hit the road.

But today did remember to feel "I am " a few times and the quality of consciousness palpably differs for a while. The entity engrossed in the activity seperates out.

Listened today to a Ted Talk by Clayton Christensen , a renowned Management thinker for the corporate world. Unlike many Management Guru s he (a cancer survivor) is famous for dwelling on and expounding about the need to focus on what is truly meaningful .
He says God does not Account and measure success in terms of what one has achieved in terms of growth in an organisation and/or how much money you have made. Rather , what matters is how you have made the best of the situation life has put you into and how you have impacted others in your life to be better in their lives.
I guess , one can also extend this to include how much we have transformed ourselves in the process as well.

He says the traditional focus on immediate results in life makes our lives unsatisfactory in the long run because we do not , consequently , invest in things like relationships which , however yield results only in the long run.
Work , seems to me , is an investment in ourselves , the 'me' relationship - not for selfish reasons - because in truly understanding and relating to me ' essentially ' .
then alone the relationship with the others and the world is set right.

---

by Harry

Looked at G's exercise about the three fingers (about p 113 in third series) again. Interesting to really attempt to put feeling into one finger and sensing in another. The counting with the third is something that just puts a mental aspect in this. But how often do we confuse feeling and sensing. We think we know. But we have trained ourselves to confuse the two. And then we've trained ourselves to think that all of those formatory secretaries are good for something other then taking notes.

How often do we let the sensing influence that entry level thoughts?

I was also contemplating this forum some. We need at least a dozen active members here. We have to find a way to make that happen. The idea of this group, and the idea of an octave or a dozen members is that we need those different notes to sound. Some of us sound very similar notes. Others are enough stopinders away to have an influence back and forth. But we need to fill in the other notes.

---

by Cassandra

I am working still on attempting presence when in the presence of others and being aware when going through doors, for example. For me, these are important 'first steps but very important. I've been a member of this forum for sometime; still, these are things that need more attention from me. It's helpful for me to attempt to practice for a week or more, a particular exercise rather than moving to different ones more often.

---

by Gururaj

This is from "Jane Heap / Notes " which Tomas had offered many weeks ago to share with anyone interested in it and I have found it is a fount of practical wisdom for seekers on the 4th Way.

"In many cases one is struck by ideas very strongly - caught by the hope of finding something big - but this does not mean any search or demand coming from myself for myself. I either find my own aim - a reason that concerns me - or the impact of the ideas slackens down and I stop. If I find an aim - if I find in the study of myself that I am not exactly what I believed I was - then I try to find in the ideas something that has meaning for me - some aspect of my life I would like to know more about - that I would like to work on but not for the sake of quick change - some aspect that I know is not particularly positive.
See something in yourself not very desirable and identify less. Ask yourself if you will not find there something worth struggling for. Then want to do something for yourself, something simple, at first - that has meaning for you such as you are now. If not you will slacken - start again - slacken again - because it has no real meaning for you. If you can find it, there begins something like relationship that has not been taking place before."
Thanks, Harry and Cassandra for breaking the quiet spell . I would have forgotten the login password

Work Program 2 weeks beginning 2 December 2013

---

by JohnS

An abbreviated discussion by Ananda Coomeraswamy (director of fine art at the Boston Museum, master of Sanskrit and Indian and European mediaeval art):

"The possibilities in the individual is not unlimited; he cannot accomplish the impossible, ie, what is impossible for him. Notably, he cannot have been born otherwise than as he was actually born, or possessed of other possibilities than those which he is naturally (by nativity) endowed. He cannot realise ambitions for the realisation of which there exists no provision in his own nature.

Whatever happens to the individual is the reduction of a given possibility to act when the occasion presents itself, while whatever does not happen was not really a possibility, but only ignorantly conceived to have been so."

He goes on to show that regret is a dream state, as things could not have happened otherwise, given one's state at the time of the event, so regret is useless and non-productive. Regret is wishing the past was different, whereas remorse is consciously putting yourself in the event - reliving it - and attempting to give added consciousness to it.

Remorse is rare, as we know, and usually confused with regret.

Personally, I find that liberation from the chains of regret is cleansing, and helps to a closer foccussing on the possibilities of remorse.

John

---

by Harry

Nice sounding of another note for me, John. I just read G's description of "how to extend life" in that compilation book. And was struck by the concept, again, that we have springs given at birth. All we can do is change how quickly or slowly they unwind.

I've always been drawn to G's statement: "Do not do what can't be done." Even when I don't think I understand it. It still draws me.

---

by Judy

Most interesting, John. Nice differentiation of regret and remorse. Yes, I see Gurdjieff's use of the word "remorse" as being closer to the older definition than the usual modern one.

(re·morse:
noun
1.
deep and painful regret for wrongdoing; compunction.
2.
Obsolete . pity; compassion.)

Thus it makes sense to relive an event and give it more consciousness. This would be done in hindsight, when one's state was improved of course. And then one could have pity and compassion for the personality one was when in that old lesser state. I do agree that things happen as they must, and in the only was possible given a particular state and circumstances too.
This then gives some value to the remorse experienced.
This could simply be a motivation not to repeat earlier mistakes which took one to the lower state, on a practical level, up to, as Gurdjieff says, bearing a little of the burden of Endlessness.

Harry, just the other day I was thinking about those springs unwinding. (Mine seemed to be unwinding very slowly at the time.). I have always been drawn to that idea as well. It brings into question many aspects of modern life, such as compulsive gymnasium attendance, marathon running and the worshipping of and participation in so many contact sports, to name but a few.

Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by Harry

You gave a bunch of physical examples, Judy. What about emotional and mental? Theater. TV. Movies. Music.

---

by Gururaj

Seems to me , Regret is throwing good money after bad . Am slowly coming out of a spell of this 'indulgence' due to some recent disappointment on the job front.
And Is Remorse (in the sense indicated in this thread) making soiled money clean ?

Recollecting , objectively , as much as we can remember , all nuances of a past memory might be releasing all the 'charges' still tied to it.

Long years ago , on a journey by bus , I got into a mental mode of recollecting chronologically and without wavering, in as much detail as I could summon up , all my extant memories.

I was in this mode for at least 2 hours till my inner balance got disturbed due to some chance incident . There sure was a strange feeling at the end of that reverie.
(and I was very regretful later whenever I remembered the cause of the disturbance which broke the spell , since just a few more 'months' were left to be processed)

I've heard said about one Work task being to recollect all the days' memories, not just the painful ones , before hitting the hay .
Any corroboration of this from your experiences ?

---

by Judy

Yes of course, Harry.
Where I was coming from when I wrote the post was from a place where my physical body had been making itself known as slowing down with a painful and wobbly ankle. Jolly nuisance. I have an older cousin who says that old age is not for the faint-hearted, and I'm beginning to think she may be right.

That being said, I hadn't pondered the unwinding springs idea for the other centres at all much really, and will do so.
Thanks.

---

by JohnS

Regarding the difficulty of gaining true remorse vs remembrance / regret, its obvious from their feel and intent that different centres or parts of centres are involved in accessing each.
The difficulty and the intensity of the split between the two areas seems to me to be admirably expressed in Castaneda, read yesterday, where he says that every man is literally a dualism (read Genesis): There is an immense lake of true knowledge - all knowledge - overseen by a part of us that is calm, knowing, and does not care. Then there is the light, fluffy person who uses masks and denial to face the world.
The problem with accessing the inner person is that he does not speak, because he does not think, therefore his truths cannot be expressed, only experienced.
Thus true remorse is an experience of truth.

John

---

by Gururaj

Thanks ,John , for mentioning about Coomaraswamy. I had not read about him till now.

His article on Art available at this link http://www.studiesincomparativereligion.com/public/articles/Why_Exhibit_Worl

by_Ananda_Coomaraswamy.aspx made me understand a few things for the first time. A lot therein to ponder.

What G means by Objective Art is clearer now.

---

by JohnS

Yes, Gururaj, I have read and re-read many times some of his books on ancient art, and there are always descriptions of his which suddenly 'clear the clouds' - such as his essay "is art a superstition or a way of life?', and his conclusion at the end of it: "Art IS a superstition, and WAS a way of life".
There are also his discussions of us separating 'pedestrian art' from 'fine art'. and demonstrating that we do this through the easy way out of "I know what I like", and not "I like what I know." Which means we must strive to be educated, not passive.
I could go on....

John

Work Program 2 weeks beginning 16 December 2013

---

by Harry

I'm posting this early because I'd like to try an experiment.

Let's each of us post a new idea, a new concept or a question at least once or twice during the week. This is something you are personally pondering. Something you are working on. Something you'd like to understand better.

Then let us each respond back to everyone else with at least one observation or comment or answer or question on that original post.

Follow up then on the threads of each other. Try to establish a group dialogue on here.

---

by Gururaj

I see that Harry's 'experiment' can be applied on the present fortnight's thread itself as it still has a few days to be worked upon.

The statement in John's post " He cannot realise ambitions for the realisation of which there exists no provision in his own nature." also implies a positive aspect - that is - what is uniquely my nature must also result in realising something aligned to that nature.

Looking at my own life , I wonder whether this has in fact happened or whether I (my personality and programming) has not allowed my true nature to express and manifest results. Instead has there been a lot of energy diverted to what is not closer to my essence.

While each species of plant or animal is different , why do humans alone (thru' comparision, imitation and competition, etc.) try to measure each other with one or two conventional yardsticks only ?

This is particularly pertinent to me now as I remain undecided about leaving my job of many years.

---

by JohnS

Very timely, Gururaj, as I, too, am leaving my job, in six months.

Further on in the Coomeraswamy passage I quoted, he talks about us each being here for a particular purpose (a subject often discussed by us in the Gurdjieff context), a purpose decided by our unique natures. The possibilities available to us are limited by our own natures, but these limitations also help to define and focus our task, instead of dispersing them amongst our 'interests.'

It all comes down to the parable of using or wasting our talents. The main task seems to me to be able to know (feel) our true task, and have the certainty, clarity and space to be able to act primarily in that field. No easy task in a life defined by habits.

John

---

by Harry

I once had to lay myself off. (I generated the grant money that paid for my work.) So there can be a real quandary with some of these situations. I think, in talking about them, we need to avoid negative emotions and talk about the process and the moving on to something new.

---

by Gururaj

Dear folks :
Here is an article , by a 4th way person ,presumably, - Martha Heyneman - inspired by Coomaraswamy's works.

http://www.scribd.com/doc/191366159/19-Heynemans-Disenchantment-2004-07-03-1

---

by Harry

I need to come back and deal with the Heyneman article. Thanks for posting.

I have spent the last month or so living in crisis mode. My son became detached from reality, from his job, from his apartment and from his wife. The detachment from reality was probably the cumulative result of all of the rest. He spent almost two weeks driving the 2500 miles home. Through jail cells and snow storms.

Once here the situation became very violent emotionally. He was not sleeping, eating, drinking way too much, smoking way too much stronger herbs. And walking the streets in the middle of the night.

He had become lost in his own cracks. Taking touches of reality and turning them into very elaborate fantasies.

I spent working hours on octaves, trying to push his, trying to move it to a conclusion. I could not directly address him, because any talk about anything other than his delusions led to violent reactions, verbally. And an underlying hint of possible physical violence.

I lay in bed at night with a frightened cat curled against my leg. Went through I Am, I wish, I can. Holy higher intellectual, holy higher emotional, take control, maintain my life, maintain my perceptions. What excess energy I generated I sent in his direction. I kept looking for some outlet that I could use to bring the situation to a conclusion that could provide help.

This morning, six days after he returned home, I sent him on the road to a foul diatribe and the taking away of the house key. The Police found nothing wrong with his dementia. He ended up on one of his friend's porches. Two hours later his friend, who I hadn't seen in years, showed up at my door asking me to fill him in. There is no need to go through the multiple delusions here. The friend went to the same police I did and he ended up in a psychiatric hold for at least three days.

A couple of observations: At one point I embraced my own potential death in sending him energy. This was not really a conscious thought but the result of those work cycles and octaves. If he were to attack me in my bed, I would not fight with him. I sent this energy to him.

The confrontation was not easy. But I also think he knew he was out of control. He handed me the key and left. Later posting some vile comments.

Lack of sleep is just as dangerous as drugs. Combined they are near lethal.

I knew I had to use the energy that was going on. I also knew that direct confrontation was not going to work.

Each day I would pick a book from my sacred shelf and turn to random pages. I always found something I needed during that day to keep the process going.

Peace and Love and Breath and Guirdjieff.

---

by JohnS

Harry;

Not much I can say except to give you support from a distance in this extreme time.

Hang in there, good friend, and reflect on every bit of knowledge you can recall - if there's any left untapped by now - and don't ask "why?"

Take Care

John

---

by Harry

I was reading Collin this morning on the period just following O's death:

"Our job is not to invent Work for ourselves but to carry out his. . ."

Perhaps we can use this discussion period to reflect upon that.

John thank you for the support. My son, 33, is now in hospital care. That was the goal as I worked forward. Now I must work toward the next goal of helping him find himself, again.

---

by Gururaj

> Harry wrote:
> "Our job is not to invent Work for ourselves but to carry out his. . ."

" Is'nt His" work apparent to us largely or solely only thru' me (the individual) .
In other words, could it be that Working on ourselves ,rather than for ourselves may be the only domain available to us to "Carry out His work" ?

The way you are walking on stilts in this very serious storm is very appropriate.

May the storm blow over quickly , is my sincere wish, Harry.

---

by Harry

Gururaj,

Could you give us some of your insight into Coomaraswamy? I have read through the posted article. I find some of it insightful. But I find some curious. I'm not sure about the dragon and lady being one. Of course if we identify the dragon as just emotion. . .but what is the St. George's thread, then, that the princess can hold?

I feel, at the end, that I am in a situation where nothing can be done, per this article. It wants the power of the dragon but the ability of control. Is that really what is meant by the two ends of the stick?

---

by Judy

Dear Harry,

Just arrived home after some time away and caught up with the recent posts. I am sorry to hear of your son's illness and send my very best wishes and prayers towards a speedy and complete return to health for him. What an incredible blessing the Work is at a time such as this. You are being thought of.

Warm regards, Harry. Your son is as you say in the best place for him at the moment.
Judy.

---

by Cassandra

Dear Harry, my friend who has given me so much food for thought, may you be strengthened by the higher powers, continuously. The first thought that came to me was the parable of the Prodigal Son, which may seem trite, but may offer something for you and your blessed son.

---

by Ian

Has everyone seen the post about the new group site?

Has everyone registered at the new site?

Merry Christmas
Ian

---

by Harry

Judy, Casandra,

Thank you for your thoughts. This has been a trying time. But it has also been something that forced me to work. I wish I had some wonderful life type news, but we reached a third strike type of situation and my son is in the wind; both literally and figuratively. Alcohol is such an absurd drug. And self medication when there are other choices available. . .

. . .I guess one of the hardest things is to see him ignoring The Work; something he had grown up with and embraced. When he went into the cold last night he did carry Nicoll's books with him.

Again thanks all.

---

by Gururaj

That's a great Choice - Nicoll's commentaries.

A fine festive season to you Harry and all my Christian friends on this forum.

In India the kids have a week's holidays this last week. For the rest only today is a day off.

Here I am , mining thru' the old wisdom before this board is closed .

---

by Judy

Harry, I hear you.
Yes it is hard, but if your son has tough love plus Maurice Nicoll with him on his journey, then there is much hope of a return to health, sooner rather than later.
And yes the Work is such a blessing.

Like Cassandra, the prodigal son story came to mind.
All the best,
Judy.

P.S. See you on the new site.
J.