Work Program week beginning 17 May 2004

Current Theme: The Seven Deadly Egotisms
This weeks theme: Pride

Daily Pondering: Can one be free from Pride arising in ones daily life?

Morning exercise: As you arise from bed, repeat silently the following affirmation: "Today I will be aware of Pride manifesting itself in me" while sensing your feet as they touch the floor.

Daily exercise 1: Perform a menial task you would normally avoid due to Pride. Perform it willingly and with gusto, while sensing your hands and the face. Observe any tension that arises physically, emotionally or intellectually.

Daily exercise 2: Whenever you observe pride arising in your conciousness, remember your death is inevitable. Repeat silently, I wish, I can, I am. Sense head, solar plexus and heart.

Daily exercise 3: Whenever you become bored with your current task, continue to work at it for a further 15 minutes before taking a break. During that 15 minutes, sense the air as it passes your nostrils.

Eating exercise: Attend to the smell of your food. Ponder the question: "How does Pride influence my dietary preferences?"

Evening recapitulation: During which episodes of Pride did I become identified, and unable to perform the suggested affirmations?

by Guest

Did anybody else find it difficult to come up with a menial task every day? I did some things I hate, like house and car maintenance tasks that are dirty and messy, but I did not manage one every day. I also failed to do them with any enthusiasm. Then I realised, these things won't be unpleasant tasks next week, they are only unpleasant because I leave them too long in the first place, and they actually benefit me when I do them. After I had completed the tasks, I found myself taking pride in the fact I had done them!

So I pondered on what he nature of these tasks should be and decided they ought really be a kind of karmic yoga task; one that does not benefit oneself. That means making more of an effort to find such tasks. I shy away from this, but I realise that it is necessary. I put off such work on myself, and say I don't have enough time. I see it now for what it is, plain instintive self-importance. Does this means I am also avoiding the second concious shock?

by Jenlian

Perhaps menial tasks can also include smiling at those people we would normally judge according to our snobbish pride, sensing our hands and face as they try to grimace instead of produce that smile (consideration)?
then pride jumps in and says, see how wonderful 'i' am for granting these 'lowly' people a smile...

food for me is definitely influenced by pride - how it affects my physical weight is one way...

by Guest

Hi Jenlian

Thanks for your comments.
I had not considered smiling at people I don't like as a menial task. To me that is 'external considering'. I have to do that and more pretty much every day as part of my job, and therefore it is not 'work' for me. I must admit it took me years to get to this position of doing it easily though! I found it made life much easier if I dropped my self-importance in those situations.

I was looking for tasks that would be hard for me to do. I guess it all points out that we need to interpret the work program exercises in a way that is meaningful to ourselves personally. We should know better than anyone, from self-observation, what our strong and weak points are, and what we need to work on Hi All. I have posted below my observations on this particular weeks exercises.

Ken

Daily Pondering: Can one be free from Pride arising in ones daily life?

Morning exercise: As you arise from bed, repeat silently the following affirmation: "Today I will be aware of Pride manifesting itself in me" while sensing your feet as they touch the floor.

Comments: I found this morning exercise helpful as a reminding factor to initiate this exercise. The sensing of my feet on the floor, while repeating the above exercise, helped bring it into greater "focus" as a practical exercise. Its as if the "sensing" of my feet eliminated the "noise" within my own mind while contemplating my wish to do this exercise throughout the day. So this "sensing" helped me focus.
This "sensing" increased the signal to noise ratio so that I could better tune in to my own intent to do this exercise.

Daily exercise 1: Perform a menial task you would normally avoid due to Pride. Perform it willingly and with gusto, while sensing your hands and the face. Observe any tension that arises physically, emotionally or intellectually.

Comment: I failed to accomplish this particular exercise. It might be due to the fact that when I am experiencing pride I failed to remember.

Daily exercise 2: Whenever you observe pride arising in your consciousness, remember your death is inevitable. Repeat silently, I wish, I can, I am. Sense head, solar plexus and heart.

Comments: I had moments when I repeated silently "I wish, I can, I am," when I experienced pride (such as "feeling good" or "feeling bad" due to pride). This helped me to remember my aim (to be aware) and if I concentrated hard enough on what I said then something in me became "present" and the "good" and "bad" feelings that were primarily subjective states before became more transformed to "inner presence," that is a more objective state. But I only accomplished this a few times because, throughout the week, I kept forgetting the exercise.

Daily exercise 3: Whenever you become bored with your current task, continue to work at it for a further 15 minutes before taking a break. During that 15 minutes, sense the air as it passes your nostrils.

Comment: I failed consistently to "remember" the above exercise.

Eating exercise: Attend to the smell of your food. Ponder the question: "How does Pride influence my dietary preferences?"

Comment: See above

Evening recapitulation: During which episodes of Pride did I become identified, and unable to perform the suggested affirmations?

Comments: Upon recapitulation I realized that pride is tied into the sexual function. When my pride is complimented I feel a surge of sexual energy flow to my solar plexus. I "light up." Correspondingly, I feel an overall body sensation on the epidermis of my skin and in my outer musculature. It's a pleasant "feeling." Similarly when my pride is offended I "feel" this same flow of energy to my moving center, but its just the opposite polarity. But its the same "flow" and this flow stops short at my moving center (my outer musculature and skin) and goes no "higher."

But this flow it is not a feeling. It is a sensation (sensate) that masks itself as a feeling. This pride that I feel has no real feeling. It has no "heart." But, if I am "present" and catch this pride, at the exact moment when this sexual energy is being "switched" to my moving center, it flows

"up" (more conscious connections)? and flows to my heart and I can begin to "feel" people (in the sense of putting myself in another persons shoes). Its as if this awareness at this crucial moment creates a kind of vacuum and this flow of sexual energy will now bypasses the moving center and flows "up the tube" (so to speak) into my heart (emotional center) due to the pressure differential caused by this vacuum.

So, if I am present at this critical "switching point," then this energy of sensate becomes transformed into a feeling of compassion and it is my "head" which must wish or "intend" this desire to be present at that exact moment when I "feel" this pride. But it's NOT easy.

I must become more ABLE to "be present." If I am present at that crucial moment when I feel this surge of sexual energy, then this energy gets transformed into "heart." Then I "feel" heart and lose my SENSE of pride. Then I am more able to "put myself in another's shoes." But if I am not "present" I forget the exercise. And for the vast majority of the week I forgot most of the exercises. But I gathered enough "data" to at least make the above observations.

Current Theme: The Seven Deadly Egotisms
This weeks theme: Sloth

Daily Ponder: What difficulties does sloth bring to my life? What benefits?

Morning exercise: Get up 30 minutes before your customary rising time and perform some physical exercise beyond your usual practise. Sense the warmth and glow in whatever part the exercise brings your body.

Daily exercise 1: Identify a task you routinely procrastinate over and do it without delay. Breathe slowly and deeply before and during the task, sensing the diaphram as you do so.

Daily exercise 2: Add a task to perform during your usual rest and recreation time. Choose something that brings you no financial or emotional gain. Sense your throat.

Daily exercise 3: While performing a distasteful task, observe your emotions and label each emotion as it arises in you. Evoke its opposite while sensing your solar plexus.

Eating exercise: Cook a more elaborate meal than usual, or invite extra guests to partake. Counter any resistance to the extra work with this affirmation: "Today I will be challenged to become what I intend" while sensing an illuminated spine and skull.

Evening recapitulation: Did I become tired or energised by my extra efforts? Can I identify my habitual displacement activities? (false doing employed to avoid real doing)

by Ken

Daily Ponder: What difficulties does sloth bring to my life? What benefits?

Comments: These difficulties relate to the "terror of the situation," which relates to my "putting things off until tomorrow." This is "not doing" when I should be DOing and doing when I should be "not DOing." This might correspond to the null triad of "negative expansion" or -(1-2-3) of Bennett's. He called this "imagination" in which the non actual is substituted for the actual. Basically its an inverse reflection of the essential creative triad 1-2-3 that is reflected into "non existence" and takes the form of -(1-2-3). "Putting off until tomorrow" or Sloth is not really non-expansion but its really a negative expansion that has the appearance of expansion but without the "essential substance," (or so I think). In short it might correspond to the results of the organ kundabuffer resulting in negative creativity. Building castles in Spain...

Morning exercise: Get up 30 minutes before your customary rising time and perform some physical exercise beyond your usual practice. Sense the warmth and glow in whatever part the exercise brings your body.

Comments: I tried some of the Obligatory Movements when I woke up. This sensing of my overall body sensations after the movements kind of invigorated me. It appears that this "sensate" was collected somewhat and "fed" me. This is a good exercise to make me aware of how I have a source of energy (sensate) that I foolishly waste instead of collecting.

Daily exercise 1: Identify a task you routinely procrastinate over and do it without delay. Breathe slowly and deeply before and during the task, sensing the diaphragm as you do so.

Comments: I notice that when I start something that I procrastinate with I "deflect" from it due to unconscious programs that drain my initiative. One task in particular is organizing things in my apartment (such as books, paperwork, etc.). I start it but then I quickly lose initiative. Its as if I keep sounding DO...DO...DO...DO... and move no further to RE. I quickly lose the energy due to "programs" that direct me to do other things. These programs are connected to my haphazard breathing. When I sense my breathing, my breathing becomes more regular and I become more conscious of these unconscious programs. This becoming more conscious of my diaphragm helped me to breath normally and helped me to "collect" more energy to start this octave. But I still kept forgetting to remember to be aware of my diaphragm during this exercise.
I will post my observations of the resulting exercises (below) by the end of this week.

Ken

Daily exercise 2: Add a task to perform during your usual rest and recreation time. Choose something that brings you no financial or emotional gain. Sense your throat.

Daily exercise 3: While performing a distasteful task, observe your emotions and label each emotion as it arises in you. Evoke its opposite while sensing your solar plexus.

Eating exercise: Cook a more elaborate meal than usual, or invite extra guests to partake. Counter any resistance to the extra work with this affirmation: "Today I will be challenged to become what I intend" while sensing an illuminated spine and skull.

Evening recapitulation: Did I become tired or energised by my extra efforts? Can I identify my habitual displacement activities? (false doing employed to avoid real doing)

Current Theme: The Seven Deadly Egotisms
This weeks theme: Greed

Daily Ponder: What traits do I posess that betray emotional, physical or intellectual greed?

Morning exercise: 30 minute silent sitting.

Daily exercise 1: Walk down a street with expensive shops, sensing your feet as your walk; when any desire to posess unecessary luxury goods on show arises, ponder on "what do I want, and what do I really need?"

Daily exercise 2: As you walk to and from your employment, ponder on how greed has influenced your career choices. Sense your feet again.

Daily exercise 3: During your work day, observe your relations with your collegues and whether your behaviour towards them is motivated by your personal greed. When such greed is noticed, sense the spine and ponder "Am I a resource for something greater?"

Eating exercise: Serve yourself your usual food portion but eat only part of it. Throw away the part you don't eat. Observe your emotional reactions to food waste, while sensing your stomach.

Evening recapitulation: While sensing your eyes, ponder: "What did I over-indulge in today?"

Current Theme: The Seven Deadly Egotisms
This weeks theme: Envy

Daily Ponder: What do I covet and why do I want it?

Morning exercise: Ponder on "All suffering begins with desire". Sense the Solar plexus while pondering.

Daily exercise 1: Identify sources of envy and attempt to admire them without desire.

Daily exercise 2: Question all impulses of covetous envy that arise in you. What true benefit would they bring?
Every time you sense an envious thought or feeling, repeat the affirmation "I desire nothing save the essential needs of my planetary body and the love of higher knowledge"

Daily exercise 3: Whenever you are envious of someone, repeat silently "It is nothing - I will Be. It is nonsense - I can Do. It recedes - I Am." while sensing your heart.

Eating exercise: Eat with full attention to sound impressions. After eating, spend a few minutes breathing consciously.

Evening recapitulation: Recall the days envies. Ponder "Does envy serve a cosmic purpose?"

by Ken

Daily Ponder: What do I covet and why do I want it?

Comment: I covet attention. I want attention because it gives me energy. The part of me that is predatory DEMANDS attention. It does not ask. It demands. It feeds on others. It seeks to manipulate via SUBTLE manipulation so people will 'give' me their attention. It seeks to control people via deception by projecting a false image of myself. This image "feeds" on anothers attention to maintain itself. Thus I covet attention.

Morning exercise: Ponder on "All suffering begins with desire". Sense the Solar plexus while pondering.

Comment: I sense this suffering as a 'hole' in my solar plexus that 'needs' to be filled. But its not my suffering. Something is suffering through me. "It' suffers. But 'I' do not suffer. 'I' suffer from SEEING this whole and realizing my own helplessness. 'It' suffers by not having this hole 'filled.' It reminds me of a conversation from a movie that I once saw called 'Tombstone.' Doc Holiday was talking to Wyatt Earp about a psychopath by the name of Ringo. The conversation went like this:

Wyatt: What makes a man like Ringo, Doc? What makes him do the things he does?

Doc: A man like Ringo's got a great empty hole right through the middle of him and no matter what he does, he can't ever fill it. He can't steal enough or kill enough or inflict enough pain to ever fill it. And it drives him mad.

Wyatt: So what does he want?

Doc: What does he want? He wants revenge.

Wyatt: Revenge? For what?

Doc: Being born.

"Revenge for being born." So this is what my desire is like. Its like a 'hole' in my solar plexus that can never be filled.

Daily exercise 1: Identify sources of envy and attempt to admire them without desire.

Comment: When I attempted this I felt part of my 'self' disassociate from the object. I was more able to see that this source of envy "triggered" a program that feeds on my emotional energy. So this was a good exercise for me. It helped me see that I am 'in' these mechanical programs but not 'of' them. This might relate to the properties of the organ kunabuffer. It seems that my intellect "steals" energy from my emotional center (or perhaps its from the sex center). In short the horse (my emotions) drives the driver (my intellect) and the driver just dreams that he is driving the horse because of the energy of imagination.

Daily exercise 2: Question all impulses of covetous envy that arise in you. What true benefit would they bring?

Comment: None. Just satisfaction of an 'empty' desire.

Every time you sense an envious thought or feeling, repeat the affirmation "I desire nothing save the essential needs of my planetary body and the love of higher knowledge"

Comment: I tried this. I did not feel like "myself" since "myself" was the feeling of envy. But it helped me to not go with it and feed it. It helped me detach. But once I felt the envy I just had to wait for the feeling to run its course. But this helped me detach from the feeling.

Daily exercise 3: Whenever you are envious of someone, repeat silently "It is nothing - I will Be. It is nonsense - I can Do. It recedes - I Am." while sensing your heart.

Comment: I failed to do this exercise.

Eating exercise: Eat with full attention to sound impressions. After eating, spend a few minutes breathing consciously.

Comment: This exercise helped me to 'listen' to my body.

Evening recapitulation: Recall the days envies. Ponder "Does envy serve a cosmic purpose?"

Comment: Yes, I think it does. It seems to "feed" some big machine. The envy I feel is not 'my' envy. It is another mind that works through me that connects me to the collective group mental machine that goes by the name of "life." But it is not real "life." Its is simply a machine. My envy feeds the big machine.

Current Theme: The Seven Deadly Egotisms
This weeks theme: Anger

Daily Pondering: What lurks behind my anger?

Morning exercise: Spend five or ten minutes outside in the open air doing the Sightless Gaze exercise.

Sightless Gaze - one attends to ones total visual field as one diffuse, panoramic field of light, taking in everything without identifying or labelling the impressions as things or actions, good or bad, pleasant or unpleasant.

Daily exercise 1: While at your job, observe yourself during moments of anger. Make note of your postures, thoughts and sensations.

Daily exercise 2: After lunch, spend a few moments watching and sensing your breathing while Pondering - "Is there a connection between anger and remorse of conscience?"

Daily exercise 3: During the afternoon, whenever you feel angry at someone, visualize them radiating a brilliant light and ask yourself - "What can I learn from this person?"

Eating exercise: At each meal of the day, use the Heptachord Before Eating exercise.

Heptachord Before Eating - This exercise is to be done before eating. Each step may be accompanied by the inhalation and exhalation of a breath and the Repetition of a prayer.

1. Relax all three centers.
2. Attend to the sight or presentation of the food on the table and plates.
3. Attend to the sounds accompanying the meal situation.
4. Attend to the smell of the food.
5. Attend to the taste of the food by taking a small sample into the mouth.
6. Attend to the touch or physical sensations evoked by the food and setting.
7. Intone the phrase from Beelzebub's Tales - aieioiuoa.

Evening recapitulation: Recall the days angers. Recall the postures and sensations associated with anger.

Yesterday I went for a walk. I felt very peaceful and relaxed. I was on a country road, and walking facing the non-existent traffic. Then a van came up from behind me and swooped past me really close. Instantly a flash of anger and a negative thought about the driver. The anger was very fast, but remained just a thought and I did not show any expression. The feeling was, "No one's going to do that to ME!" Since it was so quick and didn't hurt me I was able to let it go pretty easily, and also remembered that I was trying to notice my anger this week.

In the past few months I have had other incidents when it took me a day or days to get over/through the anger. There was such an element of jusitfication, and of feeling wronged. If I had moments of forgetting the precipitating incident, then the memory of being wronged would come up again and try to rally up the angry "I"s again. The work "I"s tried to keep in mind that the earth is a pain factory and all this angry energy goes to feed the moon, and that the anger is NOT justified and to just keep putting it aside until the other side of the story becomes more clear.

by Guest

Anger is a tough one for me..have broken it down into irritation, frustration, etc - parts that are recognizable to observation within myself..
resentment - big part...totally ego...
my groin is tight, holding onto the resentment - is this related to basic survival instinct? which has evolved from protecting ourselves from caveman era critters to protecting our 'ego' in current culture? is certain emotions connected to certain areas? is this subjective to the person only or generalized among the many? doing relaxation exercise, relaxing the groin area while observing and sensing - feel a rage arising which is scary can anyone help me understand 'remorse of conscience' more?

by Guest

For me, the anger is felt as a tightness in my chest, right above the stomach. I think that is where I feel fear also.

As for a connection between remorse and anger.. because I am a passive type, I usually don't show a huge reaction to anger, so I usually don't feel remorse over feeling angry, specifically if I haven't hurt anyone.

But it does happen that when I feel remorse for something I said or did, it can sometimes turn into anger against myself. I would like to try to extend the moments of remorse so that the truth of my contradictory nature can penetrate. I would like to accept the contradictions without having anger rush in, which comes from "I"s that judge, and demand perfection.

by Jenlian

I had a great opportunity to observe myself in anger this week - how apposite to the program. I had someone lay into me about some work I had done, something I had never had happen before now. I had a moment of distress and self pity, but I managed to overcome my negative feelings about the situation, and countered it with laughter and good humour. I turned the meeting around by not reponding with negativity in return, but listening and being positive to everything they said. Phew! It was tough. I'm glad I managed to observe myself and my body and stay unidentified with my emotions. It made a big difference. I did not manage to visualise the person radiating light, but I did place myself in the position of trying to learn from them and it was a great joy to do so instead of wallowing in resentment and self-pity.

by Ken

Jenlian wrote: "feel a rage arising which is scary can anyone help me understand 'remorse of conscience' more"?

I think that as one becomes more conscious one's awareness expands beyond ones petty little life. One begins to experience ones inner contradictory desires, together, simultaneously, within the same present moment. Then, within this moment these contradictions are "weighed" and I begin to feel my hyprocrasy. I feel anquish. I think this may be the beginning of real conscience. This anguish is like a "slow heat" that can transform us. So I think that this suffering is the only way that we can come to see new possibilities. I think Orage called conscience the representative of God in our essence. Orage was asked, concerning voluntary suffering and conscious labour, the following:

"How would you put into words the technique by which free will can be acquired?".

His reply was: "The method can be summed up in the following phrase: voluntary suffering and conscious labour. Voluntary suffering is compelling oneself to bear the unpleasing manifestations of others; conscious labour is the effort to sense, remember, and observe oneself. It is the doing of small things consciously; the effort made against the inertia and mechanicity of the organism; not for personal gain, not for exercise, health, sport, pleasure, or science; and not out of like or dislike. Self-remembering never becomes a habit. It is always the result of a conscious effort, very small to begin with, but it increases with doing."

Also, below from http://www.promart.com/4EvewG-4.html

Mme N. - You have said many times that it would be necessary to repair the pastand, for this, to experience remorse of conscience. When I look into my childhood, I find only catastrophes; I lost my parents very early, and after that all kinds of misfortunes happened. Instead of experiencing remorse I startcomplaining. I find in me someone who pities, complains and justifies itself. I would like to know how can I free myself fro this self-pity and hoe to chase away form my thoughts these things that seem to me unjust.

G. - Justice, you know, it's a big word. It is a big thing in the world. It is not any thing: it is an objective thing. Objective things follow the Law, the way the Law made them work.Remember what I told you: what you sow you will reap. And this Law doesn't concern individuals only, but also families and nations.Therefore, the things that happen on Earth come frequently from what has been done at a certain time by the father or the grand father. And the consequences fall upon you, it is then you who have to face it.This is not an injustice. On the contrary, it is a very big chance for you. This responsibility will serve you as a factor for self-remembering. And in this way you will be able to redress the past for your father, grandfather and grand-grandfather. If this happened when you were young, it is because someone sowed it. Now, you reap. Somebody is dead and it is someone else that reaps.You should not think only of yourself. You are but a link in your bloodline: you cannot consider this selfishly. Or if you prefer, you can be selfish, but only in what concerns your blood and not in regards to your little life. It is an honor to occupy this place. Be proud of it.The more you will feel compelled to redress the consequences of the past, the more you will remember that, you also, did not do as you should have done. And so you can have ten times more remorse of conscience and the quality of your Being will increase accordingly. You are not a simple 'dog's tail'. You have a responsibility in your family's line.All your past and future family depend on you. All your family depends on how you repair the past. If you redress it for everybody, it is good. If not, it has no value. Do you see in what situation you find yourself in!Maybe you begin to understand now what justice is? Justice doesn't bother to solve your petty problems. Justice deals with big things. It is idiotic to think that God should deal with your small affairs. It is the same for justice.Justice doesn't touch all that, and at the same time, nothing happens on Earth without justice.

Ken

Current Theme: The Seven Deadly Egotisms
This weeks theme: Gluttony

Daily Pondering: What other things, besides food and drink, might we consume in excessive amounts?

Morning exercise: Have only water for breakfast. Drink it with a feeling of gratitude. Notice the taste and sensations as you drink. Ponder the statement: "Man cannot live by bread alone."

Daily exercise 1: While at your job, observe your desire for the attention and recognition of others. While sensing your face, Ponder: "Is the desire for the attention and recognition of others a form of Gluttony?"

Daily exercise 2: After a large lunch eaten with gusto, spend a few minutes watching and sensing your breathing while Pondering: "Why is Gluttony considered a sin?"

Daily exercise 3: Before eating dinner, say a prayer of thanks. While eating dinner, observe which foods you prefer to eat more of. Notice the tastes, smells and sensations of those foods. Ponder: "Why do I wish to eat more of those foods?"

Eating exercise: Fast for a day. Observe your intellectual, emotional and physical reactions. Whenever the desire to eat arises, repeat silently: "I Wish, I Can, I Am."

Evening recapitulation: Recall the days Gluttonys. Recall the sensations associated with them. Ponder: "Is Gluttony a substitute for a spiritual hunger?"

by Jmax

Greetings,

When I first read the week's assignment, I had already decided that I wasn't even going to try. I have had a pretty rocky relationship with my instinctive center, having had a weight problem when I was young, and I was not willing to risk the repercussions of threatening the instinctive center with missing breakfast. The instinctive center can be pretty sneaky and go way overboard later to make up for what it considers it has missed.

I have not been a compulsive eater for decades now, thanks to fourth way ideas. I know that someday I will have to deal with the attachment to regular meals, and I try to remember to be grateful and appreciative that I am fortunate to not be in a position of having to go without.

This is only my second week in this group, and I am already involved in other work-octaves. Perhaps if more "I"s verify the usefulness of this group there will be more motivation in me to take on a task such as fasting. For now I am trying not to create a lot of opposite "I"s that would undermine the work "I"s. I am still at the level of trying to remember to divide attention, self-observe, try to sense my body, and not express negative emotions.

by Jmax

Hi all

I also could not do the morning fast or the all-day fast because I have a severe hypo when I do not eat for that length of time. So I just paid attention to what I was eating and did the ponder instead.
We have to be discriminating and make our own decisions about any exercises that are not suitable for us.

I also failed to do the first exercise at all; I did manage to focus my attention on food and my emotions surrounding the act of eating though. I did give thanks to His Endlessness before eating in the evening.

This was a hard week for anyone trying to do all the exercises every day.
I don't think it is vital to do all of the exercises every day, just to attempt to do at least one thing to raise your conciousness during the day. We must do what we can.

by Ian

Hi Jmax,

I think that you made a wise descision with regard to the fasting. As neocrone says - We have to be discriminating and make our own decisions about any exercises that are not suitable for us.

It is not expected that everyone will be able to do all the exercises all the time. We are all at different places on our paths and some of the exercises may not address our current state or interests. One of the reasons for giving so many exercises each week is to try and offer something for everybody. I would suggest that we pick and choose from the exercises that resonate with us and attempt to work with them, even if it is only one. Also feel free to go back to the past programs and attempt previously neglected exercises.

by Ken

Hi everyone. I'd like to make some observations on two of the exercises.

Daily exercise 1: While at your job, observe your desire for the attention and recognition of others. While sensing your face, Ponder: "Is the desire for the attention and recognition of others a form of Gluttony?"

This desire for attention and recognition is indeed a form of gluttony. I seem to 'feed' on it. I remember my G teacher said to us (many years ago) that G once said that "all praise is poison." In this respect I guess we can indeed "eat ourselves to death" on praise just as if we overfeed a fish it will eat until it sinks.

The face exercise was good too. I notice that my facial expressions "morph" to the external situations around me much like a clowns face might change its various expressions to elicit reactions from the audience. In the case of a clown it does so to entertain. In my case, when interacting with the people around me, I find that my facial muscles (and body posture) goes through a kind of ever changing 'motif' to elicit from those around me reactions that will get them to conform to some image of myself. But how they objectively react I really can't be sure. I only try to (unconsciously) manipulate them with respect to how I THINK they will react. This preservation of these images that I have of myself has this need to 'feed' on the world around me These images are my chief obstacle to seeing the world around me as it really is (whatever that means). So I guess that the need to feed these images is also a kind of gluttony.

Evening recapitulation: Recall the days Gluttonys. Recall the sensations associated with them. Ponder: "Is Gluttony a substitute for a spiritual hunger?"

Yes. But this gluttony is a mechanical manifestation. If the manifestation is inhibited then it will simply take another form. I'm not so sure if it is a 'substitute' for spiritual hunger because that might be like saying that mechanicalness is a 'substitute' for consciousness. Mechanicalness is simply what it is. But the question above is a very good one and I'll try to ponder more on it. Thanks.

Hi Ken

> This desire for attention and recognition is indeed a form of gluttony. I seem to 'feed' on it. I remember my G teacher said to us (many years ago) that G once said that "all praise is poison."

> The face exercise was good too. I notice that my facial expressions "morph" to the external situations around me much like a clowns face might change its various expressions to elicit reactions from the audience.

Yes! I became acutely aware of myself doing these things mechanically last week at work. The desire for approval from others is strong in me. I was able to see myself in these acts but not able to change my mechanical behaviour. This is something I must put more effort into and work on in the future.

Current Theme: The Seven Deadly Egotisms
This weeks theme: Lust

Daily Pondering: "Will alteration of a seeker's habitual lustful behavior redirect the flow of force towards a calm of Being?"

Morning exercise: Perform this exercise from Beelzebub's Tales - "... every day, at sunrise, while watching the reflection of its splendor, you bring about a contact between your consciousness and the various unconscious parts of your general presence. Try to make this state last and to convince the unconscious parts--not as if they were conscious--that if they hinder your general functioning, they, in the period of your responsible age, not only cannot fulfill the good that befits them, but your general presence of which they are part, will not be able to be a good servant of our Common Endless Creator, and by that will not even be worthy to pay for your arising and existence."

Daily exercise: Whenever you experience lust, repeat the phrase from Beelzebub's Tales - "Only he may enter here who enters into the position of the other results of my labors."

Evening exercise: Intone out loud or silently, depending on the situation, "I AM", and try to Sense a reverberation or flow of energy in the solar plexus.

Lust, typically has for me a meaning that is associated with a physical desire that may over ride rational behavior.

However, looking at it this time, I can see a strong mental component, that looks like a desire for something that may take the form of irrational behavior if allowed to express itself. "Thinking" has a much bigger role in the emergence of lust than I expected. I need to look at that some more.

Rather than trying to change my thinking which can be endless justifications, I find that backing off of an irrational desire leaves a bit of space behind which I try not to fill with anything.

by Jmax

To me, the first, and narrowest meaning of lust is that of sexual lust. The way I understand pure genital sexual lust is that it is caused for the most part by hormones. There are definite stages in a person's life when the hormones are strongest. Certainly that was my experience. Although that is less of a burden now, it's not like any freedom comes mechanically, as other identifications are always ready to take over.

However, taking lust in the broader, nonsexual way, this past week events occurred in which a lust for money was apparent in me, as anxiety over having made mistakes and lost money due to inattentiveness. (an example: the cell phone bill). It afforded th eopportunity to be able to accept the loss as payment for a picture of myself asleep, and as payment for the opportunity to separate from the negative emotions evoked when my spouse was upset at me over it.

And thanks for last week's replies that lent some relativity to how one can approach the exercises.

by Faye

Having spent some time trying to understand how to make use of the morning exercise, I find that it is difficult to determine the line between the conscious parts of myself and the unconscious ones.

I see that I am not clear on what my goal or aim is that I am proposing. I think that I will need more attention in that area. For today I will propose simply that it is necessary to see what lust means to me. I am sure that there is much more to this exercise that I hope we will work on again sometime.

I am finding that I need more time to spend on each program, rather than just one week.

The aim of the weekly programs is to provide a context similar to a weekly group meeting. I would encourage anyone who wishes to work longer than a week with any of the suggested exercises to do so. Also if any of the weekly exercises don't resonate with your current situation, don't hesitate to go back to previous programs for inspiration.

Yes, I can relate to your above observation. There is something about sexual lust that seems to burn up the "finer matters" instantaneously. There is no emotion here but only sensation that masks itself and presents itself as emotion. For example when I experience lust I might act with "tenderness" but it is not emotional tenderness. It is really passion that masks itself as "affection." Affection is, I think, really a property of the (positive part) of the emotional center but with lust my "affection" becomes "passionate tenderness" which is really just the positive part of the moving center aping or mimicking the positive part of the emotional center (positive tenderness). It seems that we rarely feel any real real emotion at all because our moving centers saps these finer matters from us with its positive or negative reactions to external stimuli through aped imitation of the moving centers of those around us. It just all just feeds the "big machine" and there is nothing left for ourselves.
When I say 'I am," this helps me to center myself and not react in knee jerk reaction. Then I have better opportunity to "collect myself" (that is, to collect my "finer matters") and begin to feel (with emotion) myself PRESENT. So when I perform the 'I am' exercise, I begin to feel a certain detachment from my reaction machine and I feel a little more free. Castaneda said it well in his book "The Eagles Gift." He said he would repeat the below "formula" to himself to pull himself through an personal upheaval:

"I am already given to the Power that rules my fate.
And I cling to nothing, so I will have nothing to defend.
I have no thoughts so I will see.
I fear nothing, so I will remember myself.
Detached and at ease, I will dart past the Eagle to be Free."

Holy-Denying,
Holy-Reconciling,

Transubstantiate in me,

Current Theme: The Seven Deadly Egotisms

Daily Pondering: Which of the seven deadly egotisms - Pride, Envy, Anger, Sloth, Avarice, Gluttony, Lust - is a characteristic of my chief feature?

Morning exercise: Perform the Sightless Gaze exercise and sense your face. Repeat this exercise several times throughout the day.

Daily exercise 1: Throughout the week, whenever you observe one of the seven deadly egotisms arising, endure its emotional manifestation with an Inner Smile and sensed lips while repeating silently - I wish to Be.

Daily exercise 2: Each day choose one of the seven deadly egotisms and devise your own Affirmation to be performed while calmly enduring any manifestations of your chosen egotism during the day. The Affirmation may include a combination of a verbal formulation, a posture or gesture, a sensing exercise.

Daily exercise 3: With the daily egotism chosen above, ponder - What is its source in human life? From which center(s) does it arise? Does it serve any purpose? While pondering, move your attention to each of the three centers in turn.

Eating exercise: Take a conscious breath between each mouthful of food.

by Harry

The sightless gaze is almost like a Stop exercise for me.

Egotism: Pride. It cannot be wrong. Does pride serve a purpose? Yes. Motivational force. Taught from early childhood. Grandfather's favorite. Smart at school. Must be right to avoid punishment. Would say it arises from the moving part of emotional center.

Observation of pride. My boarder does wash on Cold. It sees this in the morning and thinks "How silly. Taught by commercials." But doing the wash on cold has no impact on my life. Wastes energy when I have this thought. Separating from it makes me smile.

by Harry

So it took four meals for me to remember the eating exercise. Each time I was cooking I told myself I'd remember. Of course I didn't. This morning I managed five bites of toast before remembering.

A little, annoying "i" quickly popped in. "Do I do this after each bite of toast or do I do it with each drink of tea as well?" Funny. I've practiced this before without that I jumping in, but it was there this morning.

I usually eat while doing something else. Modern world and the daily immersion. To be conscious of eating and to do something else is very difficult. Something else is usually ordinary. . .

See how I do at lunch, at work.

by Greg

The last two days, during my attempts to stop for the "sightless gaze", I have noticed how the whole of my face is pulled tight into a knot centering on the bridge of my nose. Dropping my face (like warm clay sliding slowly off an armature) I notice a corresponding drop at the back of my head reavealing a "knot" that has been held at the cerebellum.

Yesterday, I released my face and shook it out hard letting the skin flap off the skull. I allowed my face to center while the gaze spread into panoramic view. My face breated in and out as I took in.

by Harry

Eating more consciously succeeded at Breakfast again. But lunch and dinner were total failures.

Interesting experience yesterday: Spent much time tussling internally with that concept of Pride. And the work efforts. Work efforts seem to attract resistance and the resolution to resistance.

I had an "offered Pride conflict" yesterday. Recognized what was happening. Heard those little "i's" begin to marshall "you're better than that" arguments. And left them go. As soon as I did that I saw my machine and the other machine that was offering conflict to me. (Pushing buttons so to speak.) And so them as very much TinMen.

Last night I experienced great difficulty falling asleep. Realised there was "something" in my psychic atmosphere causing the problem and when I looked into it there it was --- alive.

Two days ago a totally benign situation had encouraged the chatter of many very destructive

"I"s --- the one's that center around the "Why haven't you dones". It had to do with a colleague sharing an accomplishment which is in a field where my talents lie. I put on the face of Genuine Interest and Support (I really did want that for that person) but of course, the "I"s began to chatter away destrutively.

I hadn't thought much of it, until last night. There it was in my psychic atmosphere: A disembodied, phosphorescent yellow hatchet shape swinging from just over my right shoulder, towards my heart-center, where it stops just short, intensifies in prescence, and disappearances. Envy --- palpable and real. The motion repeats continuously and mechanically, never changing. I feel the presence of anger and pride supporting it, but these are only "felt" not "seen". They also seem to come from a different place.

The Envy comes from "outside" as a result of the room made for it by the destructive "I"s. It's like an inverse yoga where asanas are taken to attract states of being. The "I"s created an anti-asana, if you will. The supporting anger and pride seemed to come up from me to support it.

I stood straight up on the floor with my arms extended into a "Y" until I felt myself return back into myself all the way back to the soles of my feet. Returning to bed I fell into deep sleep.

The odd thing about this, this envy "shape" has really always been there----for years. It's only since last night that I was willing to acknowledge its presence. There are conditioned "I's in me that will repeat over and over that such a thing is only my imagination. The retort is: Yes, it is my Imagination (my true Imagination) that allows me to see it ---- it is hardly a fantasy.

Yesterday, upon returning from work, I turned to close the front door, stepped into my entrance hall and was "stopped". I felt, simply, my membership as part of the group and then the group as a whole. An automatic inner smile welled -up.

Funny, how difficult it is to manifest the inner-smile consciously in the face of chattering "I"s. But, then I forget ---- and the aftermath reminds me to remember.

The past week I tried to self-observe and consider which of the seven appears the most in myself. They are all there, but I think that vanity is there the most. At one point last week I realized that an aspect of my vanity is an intellectual vanity of always needing to be right, but that I didn't mind making mistakes (unless they hurt other creatures), I just minded other people knowing about it. Then I realized that if other people didn't notice and point it out, I could and would still buffer from myself that I had made a mistake.

Another related thought is that "one learns through suffering". And to me I think it is the suffering that occurs as one feels one contradictions. And false personality would like to think that it has everything figured out and can deal with anything that comes along and then (pray) it gets deflated and both or other sides of the story appear and it is gray not just black or white.

by Harry

Eating is so obviously an unconscious activity for me. I intellectually comprehend the exercise. Even to the point of the octave shock for the food. And the observation is interesting:

Morning is no problem. (Less problem.) The one thing I did notice physically was that I maintained a level of energy throughout the morning better than usual. This side effect is intriguing, because it tends to indicate that even the ordinary use of food is increased by the oxygen shock. Conscious eating shock.

Lunch is almost always at my desk. I am writing right after lunch and didn't remember once. Dinner is let down time. Again very little success at evening meal. I'd even think, while preparing the food that this exercise had to come into play. . .and then it faded away.

I think that the first step is acknowledging our Denying Forces; that is accurate self observation. The next step is to intentionally suffer them - Don't try to supress the negative feelings, rather endure them intentionally without complaint and without manifesting them outwardly.
As G said, one of the greatest things we can accomplish is to bear the unpleasant manifestations of others. And, I suppose, of ourselves.

Theme: The Seven Virtues - Charity, Faith, Fortitude, Hope, Justice, Prudence, Temperance.

Daily Pondering: Are there pitfalls to acting virtuously?

Morning exercise: Before you arise from bed, deeply sense the body from the feet up to the head.

Monday: Perform all your daily activities as if they were an act of charity towards others while evoking a sense of gratitude to be able to serve.

Tuesday: Perform all your daily activities with the faith that they serve an unseen purpose.

Wednesday: Endure all the suffering that arises in you during the day with unflinching fortitude accompanied by sensing the legs and repeating an inner prayer, "It is nothing; I am."

Thursday: Perform all your daily activities with the hope of receiving no rewards. Once an hour sense the right hand and repeat three times, "The reward for Work is more Work."

Friday: Holy denying forces, such as the seven deadly egotisms, are lawful manifestations of the law of three. During the day, meet all denying forces with impartial justice by applying an equally lawful affirming force, such as sensing the left hand while repeating silently, "Holy Affirming, Holy Denying, Holy Reconciling, Transubstantiate in me, for my Being."

Saturday: During all your daily activities and encounters with others, act with prudence.

Sunday: Practice temperance by avoiding all vices and indulgances, be they physical, emotional or intellectual. Whenever a temptation arises, repeat "I Am" and sense the reverberation in the solar plexus.

Evening exercise: Ponder, without expecting an answer, "How can I act with (the daily virtue) towards myself and my denying forces?" Deeply sense the body from the head down to the feet.

Had a blood test scheduled for this morning. I'm a deep sufferer from White Coat Syndrome. (A visit to a doctor or nurse for myself can raise my blood pressure double digits.) I'm aware of this, and know it's silly, but that's life.

So this morning I applied the Faith part of the weekly exercise. As the tension began I simply said "Have faith this is what is to be; this is for the best."

Funny thing is that when I make an effort like this I'm often visited with some precognitions. Knew the person drawing blood would be someone different than I'm used to. Knew she would take it in the exact way that I find most disconcerting. These were like flash images.

Still Faith outed. In, out, no problems.

(I should note that I tend to dismiss precognitions. Too many i's have too many telephones and they can be as often wrong as they are right. However, they do seem more in line when the result of a work effort.)

Sensed body yesterday AM and this AM. I'm often amazed at how much tension it contains when I'm in bed.

Ate more consciously yesterday evening. But lost it this morning, because. Blood tests put my morning meal 3 hours further into the day.

Is anyone else out there?

by Greg

Precognitions in my Work efforts are always the sign-posts along the way, letting me know that "yes,yes, yes!" I am still headed in the right direction. They are affirmations of the Faith I lay in my intuitions and my sensings, that I am being led and am following in the correct (for me) direction. The danger comes in two ways: Not seeing them, a part of me is obsessing that I might be lost and therefore, energy leaks from the source I need for the trip. Secondly, I mistake the signposts for the destination and become entrapped in a glamour. In a nutshell, I acknowledge them but, don't give them so much weight.

A part of my waking-up process these days is trying to understand G's teaching in the context of the Time in which he taught, what the teachings mean to me today in my 21st century existence, and where they do intersect. G. seemed to always hound people for the more "fantastic" sides of spirtual existence. While all this was taking place not so very long ago, people did not have the context of things like bodymind, Feldenkrais, Alexander etc. to remind them of the importance of physical grounding. Without grounding, precognitive experiences and the like become flights of fancy to escape into, rather than embelishments of a developing conscience. G. was dealing with many people who had been engaged in intensely intellectual pursuits and/or some of the spiritualistic extravagances of the turn of the century (the need therefore to engage in intense physical labor ---- one wonders how many had even experienced a "second wind")

But enough out o' me. Just a poor silly dancer who is trying to piece together his experiences. Please, some senior member step in and clear things up! (Is any of this on track?) Thanks.

by Harry

Missed yesterday entirely. Can't say there was no suffering. Can only say that it remained asleep.

Have also missed the evening exercise. In fact, last night, for whatever reason did it backwards. Did the morning exercise again in the evening. Can only say that am adding this on to my usual "routines", or should I say "good habits".

Yesterday, though, was a strong working day. Spent much time contemplating dialogue in another area of this forum; did that while practicing the Iam, Iwish, Ican, exercise. This went on for two hours. Was interrupted twice during the process. Slight resentment at being interrupted, but let it go. Went right back til I was finished. Came to a much stronger understanding of air food octave and other related items. Practical.

by Greg

Have had alot of trouble with the body sensing in the morning. Interestingly, I have done this exercise on my own, in the past and it has worked like a dream. But, this time ---- this time, I have felt inert and heavy like a lump of lead. Does "it" feel resentful because "it " is being asked to do the exercise? Is "it" being difficult and stamping "its" feet and saying "NO". I wouldn't be at all surprised. (The curl of a smile stretches out the right side of my mouth as I write this --)

While sensing the right hand this morning the level of beauty/presence (this is so difficult because the words really fail what is going on!) --- anyway, the level of beauty/presence increases on the left hand. How could this be. I blinked twice to make sure I saw what I saw and there it was rising like the message in one of those fortune-telling magic "8" balls from my childhood (early 1960s).

Two nights ago, I was obsessing over a discussion taking place on another line. One of the things I really like about all this is my ability to enter all these other Gurdjieffan hallways all in one place. It's a comfort to know that there are others driven just as crazy by the "terror of the situation", people who feel as serious as I do. Even though that seriousness of THEIRS may manifest in attitudes which I-Yi-Yi-Yi-Yi get VERY upset about. Oh, well, my seed thought today --- more work. So, I have been watching this chatroom because the guidelines have asked that contributions be made ONLY by those with 10yrs + experience in an authentic school (and I expect with a seal of approval from Pair-ee!) By this time , I'm willing to put up with it but some "Is" are getting very hot under the collar indeed. And last night it broke thru a bit with the confession of a dead teacher and a sadness in the face of a vanishing world once known. And immediately, came the recognition of having been there too (in another context) that sense of loss and of falling through space and of having to catch and climb up onto the nearest ledge. That ledge, (in this case, being these forums)--- a strange world, an unknown territory. Reaching behind that armour of arrogance. I could feel all that hurt and fear at what his Endlessness has handed out. We've all been there. Another case where understanding comes to those who wait --- often difficult for me.

But, back to the morning exercise . . . it is also the padding I sleep on. I sleep straight on the floor as I have done for the past two and half years with a little padding of soft woolen blankets covered with a sheet. My bones like this alot ---- they go through a settling during the night and fall easily into place when I rise. Neat and instructive in "how it all works".

However, I am beginnning to feel that part of the resistance to the morning exercise might also be the need for a little more padding. We shall see.

Hello, my naime is Marina, i am from Russia and joined your group on Wednesday. On this day the task was: "Endure all the suffering that arises in you during the day with unflinching fortitude accompanied by sensing the legs and repeating an inner prayer, "It is nothing; I am."
So I started practise them. As far as during this day everything was very good for me and i had no troubles at work, in the evening, when I was going to bed I experienced the feeling of inner peace and in this state I tryied ponder with sensing "How can act with charity toward myself and others" First my sensations were very pleasant: they were even, warm like fluid and could be associates with motherly love. But then suddenly my muscles were strained and i saw image of maniac-killer, after them i coudn't get back these pleasant sensation, the inner dialogue was started and i tried mentally justify this killer, but it didn't brought any result...

Next morning laying in bed i've made "sensing" in a hurry and drived to my office. There I got to know that I acquired viruses in my computer. I was identified with misgiving that I'll lose many of important documents. This was accompanied with tensions of body and i tried exercise with task of previous day. I nfliching endured my suffering  But this is was not so as later I've abused and insulted my collaborator. Being very angry with her i went in my study and asked myself What's happened? Why can't I control my manifestations? And then I told myself look at this situation with working "I-s", "look at this remembering yourself" . First I experiedced a indifference and then this situation looked so ridiculous, I saw two fighting mashinery. And in this moment I've understood that I always take people and myself as if they were normal people and that i still not accept that we are all maschines. I am always negative when I or others act like mashinery. But this is so silly. This experience was very emotional. During this day more then once an hour I sensed the right hand and repeated "The reward for Work is more Work." But I didn't notice anything interesting. I think owing to my loose of energy because of negative emotions. In the evening I tryed ponder about Hope. But I was so tired and soon falled asleep.

So, I am very glad that in internet exist such a group like this (though I never believed that through internet people could work together) and in this exercises i feel taste of Gurdjieff's Work.

best regards,
Marina

I think the important part is the reference to the 3 holy forces.
One could just as easily say father, son, holy ghost... or tamas, rajas, sattva.
Of course if you find it difficult to change the words, remember G's grandmother's advice to always do otherwise. I will try using your version of the prayer next week. Thanks.

Welcome Marina,

The efforts we make do not always have immediate results.
Don't get discouraged too easily, keep trying and slowly you will get stronger. Everyone has trouble making efforts, so you are not alone!
(Where have you heard that before?)

Everyones situation is unique. The conditions of my life are different than yours. I can only offer suggestions based on my experience. Others in this group can offer suggestions from their experience. Take from those suggested Affirmations what you find useful to your situation and apply them against your mechanical denying forces. Do not be afraid to improvise new Affirmations for yourself. No one knows better what you need than you yourself. You must meet your mechanical Denying forces with whatever Intentional Affirmations that you can. Do not be afraid of your denying force - it is really your ally, your friend in disguise. With creative affirmation, you can turn your 'weakness' into strength. To acheive neutrality, the affirming and denying must be of equal force, so adjust your affirmations accordingly.

The last two evenings I more completely attempted to sense from head to foot. (My weeknight is a quick to sleep time, because of the hour I have to awaken at. Explanation. Not excuse.)

What I observed was a sticking at the solar plexus. This sticking was not "bad" or annoying. Rather it was as if the solar plexus was still tentacaling out. Larger. Not a smooth sensing. Not physical.

As to language: just noting it Ian. There all in the same chapter of Beelzebub, I believe. It's good to use them all. What I used had become fixed because of its Mantra like use.

Welcome, Marina! Glad to have you with us.

The daily parenthetical body sensings really became the focal point this week. I had such difficulty in terms of anything really happening but kept myself back and didn't intervene.

Then Saturday morning the ascent from the feet went like a dream. It was segmented clearly ---- actually not segmented , but part-to-part. First, the feet and ankles, then a BLEND into the lower legs, then a blend into the upper legs. As each part manifested, it incorporated the previously manifested part until the body as a whole was manifested with a strong upward-flow rising from the bottoms of the feet.

As the flow rose, I shifted, physically, just enough to remove any impediment. It was a delicious feeling with a hint of the Voluptuous----like a flame with one long ripple sent through it.

The evening's descent was rapid, thorough and not dramatic. Business-like and efficient. A closing -up of shop, so to speak.

By Sunday I couldn't repeat the experience. Going back through the Saturday experience I did realise that the blendings had taken place in eight segments----an experience of an octave? I don't mean to make all that of it, but I wonder.

As far as the pondered question, I picked up the Sunday newspaper's book review section and was lead to a review which (naturally, in an unrelated context) suggested re-reading William Blake's THE MARRIAGE OF HEAVEN AND HELL.

Work Program week beginning 19 July 2004

by Ian

Theme: Fear

Morning exercise: Greet the sun with a sense of gratitude for another day to experience fear and transform it.

There are many kinds and degrees of fear, such as fear of - losing the ego, losing self-importance, the unknown, uncertainty, ignorance, appearing stupid, boredom, being alone, others, intimacy, being manipulated, loosing control, pain, suffering, disease, death, God.
Make a list of your own fears. Sense the pen as you write.

When confronted by a fear, don't try to escape from it. Instead, endure it. Feel and sense the full force of the fear without giving in to it. Observe how deep it goes. Does it penetrate into your bones? Is there a place in you where fear does not penetrate? Is there a place in you beyond the reach of the object of your fear?

When a fear is experienced, visualize it as a pattern of energy. Absorb the energy, sense it in your body. Transform the fear by repeating affirmatively, "I am not my fear." Visualize the energy leaving your body with the out breath.

Evening exercise: Ponder, without expecting an answer, "Are fears an excuse to preserve self-importance and identification?" Deeply sense the body.

by Harry

When I received this one I said to myself "Damn, I've spent so much time dealing with fear, how's it going to bite me this time?"

Seriously, there was a time when I could barely walk out the door. Some of this is a genetic condition, and some built up over the years. Finally went to a doctor about a decade ago and got rid of the genetic part.

That's all ordinary life.

So I read this and set it aside. I hate making lists. And then about 10 AM I got that solar plexus thing. Something's going on and you don't know what it is, do you Mr. Harry. Don't know if anyone else experiences this sensation. Like your gut is under attack. Pre-sensing, if you wish.

So then I get the phone message from home, "Your doctor wants you to call."

Blood tests last week. I've already described that experience. So now we have a fear that's going to hang around until I get back in touch with the doctor's assistant (who is only a message girl).

Fear:
They're going to send me to the hospital. (Irrational. I haven't been to the hospital since 1974.)
I've got some big disease.
My life is going to be upset by a bunch of tests, etc.
Someone I don't know is in control.
I failed the test.

(This last one may sound silly, but it's an underlying one. Somehow going to the doctor, getting a blood test, is a School Test.)

So I finally get through and Missy, that's her real name, says "You've got diabetes."

OK, that hits a lot of them. My brother (half) has juvenile dibetes is on dialysis, etc. Is in a nursing home at age 40.

"What?"
"Your hemaglobin is at 7.5 and it's supposed to be between 3 and 5"

Ok, what does that mean? That's like telling me there's hydrogen on the Sun.

I fear not knowing.
I fear not understanding.
I fear losing control.

So I have a perscription coming to take some pills. Then I have to go to a two day diabetic workshop. Yes, I scheduled it. If I hadn't been Working through this time, I probably wouldn't have scheduled it.

I hate people assuming they know more than me. And I hate the way these things are taught. "OK, now class. . ." Damn, I'm almost sixty.
(So there are a lot of other negative emotions there. That vanity is a big one.)

It's real important for me to go to this class but I can't even go until August.

(I know it's a pill. And I'm not shooting insulin. And it shouldn't bother me, but it does. The appointment clerk says "Bring your blood test kit."
"Uhm I don't have one." "Oh. . . well I guess you'll have to come a half hour early then.")

Our world presents us with so many opportunities to get irritated, to lose energy, to become negative. For example, when I made this phone call to make this appointment: Choice 1: if this is a life threatening emergency dial "0". Choice 2: If you are a patient of Dr. A or Dr. B dail 1. Choice 3: If you are a patient of Dr. C or Dr. D. Dial 2.

And that's it. I don't fit any of the three choices. So I hang up. Willing to quite the whole thing. But I'm working on myself and see my irritation and know it's more resistance. (This place is called Patients First, and for whatever reason I always make my checks out to Physicians First.) So I call back and dial 0. So they patch me through to some appointment maker. And she hangs up on me. More resistance. Another chance to leave it go. But by now I'm working more and seeing the resistance and feeling the energy and I call back and get the conversation I've already quoted above. Make the appointment. And go about my business.

And still I walk around with this internal question mark. What the hell does hemaglobin of 7.5 mean. I'm pretty good at researching things. Spent two hours doing it. Found out all about adult onset diabetes. Found out about mental disease that have similar symptoms. Found out what the test was that gave the results. Finally found a medical journal article that said: "Hemaglobin rating of 7.5% is borderline, with 9% considered dangerous to organs."

And I still don't know anything. Except I don't want to go through this and I don't have any choice.

OK. . .too much ordinary life in here; but that's how it is, today. . .I am I wish I can

Among the many fears that manifest in me the most prevalent one, compex one, is the fear of existence...for in existing, REALLY existing one must accept responsiblity for all that comes with existing... but then, REALLY existing is part of what THIS is all about...yes?
love this stuff! frustrating and fascinating as always...

Standing on the metro platform waiting for the next train to whisk me off to work. I turn facing the rising sun. Long, vast field in front. Smoggy haze in front. Sky opaque, filthy gray. The sun (not my idea of a perfect sun at all --- a voice rings, "Clear it". I obey. Spine erect. Feet flat with complete contact. Flesh, facia, muscles slack. Skeleton standing, standing, standing . . . "Oh, burning Sun!" And an expression of gratitude for another day.

Train arrives and "I" seat "it". General pervasive fear as aninsinuating mass attempts to enter the front of my torso, fingering its way in between the clavicle and the "hara". SOMETHING JUST DOESN'T WANT ME TO WORK.

And the fear is everyday, will I be up to this? Am I ready? This is really hard. The spirit is willing, the flesh is weak, and then the spirit gets friendly and is devoured. It will take all day to bring it back. ("The spiritual resists embodiment so you have to coax it down. And the flesh is, well, so lazy. You must work it very hard" - George Balanchine, choreographer)

Tremendous fear regarding what Work will make me into. Will this make me into the Work equivalent of a Frankenstein-monster. A Golem. A socially acceptable nitwit? Spent the first 40 years KNOWING what I would become. At 40 it fell into a shambles. Now the only option as I see it is to Work and get Work-ed. But what will I become? Who or what is going to make it? Or is it all just as ridiculously simple as that second or two when I am in a vivid standing place? And when I am there isn't it really better or says the "I": "Isn't this just another form of escapism?"

The fear cloud tauntingly moves back and forth but never really enters. It enters more deeply at the stomach (which doesn't surprise me) but it never really gets in.

I breathe in and disturb it all holding it steady and offering it, a turd-like substance asking firmly to "Transsubstantiate for my being" and ex h a l e. Emptiness there now. Arid.

by Greg

A lot of ugliness.

Will this ever stop and is this what is meant by "it gets much, much worse before it ever gets better"

The fear comes up in response to pictures of myself that reflect shoddy behaviors and unwise decisions made. They just slip out like a rude comment in a formal social gathering. Dozens of ttimes I affirm that the fear is not me and more and more embarrasing pictures manifest. There is no "slaying of the dragon" there IS only an acceptance of the presence of these unpleasant manifestations. But in this, even if barely perceived, is a gift.

Last night during my sensing of the body before going off to sleep I witness the sensation that the lower left side of my body "belches" in s l o w motion. It begins in my butt and moves down in one huge bubble to my foot. The whole side is bloated and misshapen and registers a feeling of "cheapness". It does no good to send it away, it is here to stay for as long as it must. An "I" has tried to divert my attention from it, telling me it is simply a figment of my imagination. I don't argue with the "I", I just return to the thing. Eventually it fades but leaves dreck in its absence --- like the smell of rotten vegetation.

To write about this is something else. My language is so pitifully inept at convey what this is.

But once described, the reality of it is all too apparent.

The arid landscape I was left ona couple of days back had a snake enter it. All day long at work an uninteresting "nothingness" underlies everything I do --- not even a mirage to alleviate the tedium. After a dumbly active day at work, I return home to find a large white envelope from Behrain. "Behrain?" I say "Isn't that a bit exotic for me? The homebody?" Inside an announcement of a play written by someone I knew in school thirty yearts ago. He is the chief executive of a bank in Behrain. He has written a play which has been produced and is on its way to one of the world's major theatrical festival (the resentful inventory starts in me immediately---the snake hisses "See? He's going to a festival you should be present at. And not only that, he's made scads of money. So much for your Work.") The fear wells up ---- yesterday's arid desert is becomig todays snake pit and I will have to go through it. All day the next day, through all the fear of my being rendered a "nothing" by what I have committed myself to (and the fear that goes with that---The snake: "You're going out, sir, like a candle flame.") there is the metallic taste of venom behind my lower lip. Walking to work, an ever-growing lichen of anger takes over my torso. All I can do is say it's not me and offer it up for my being, but it is there and must be borne. Once arriving at work it has cleared.

Under all of this mess is Fear, undiluted and palpable Fear of no longer being able to hold up anything I have created for myself for most of my life and say with all honesty THIS IS ME.

As the anger and resentments began to subside, a dawning came. I intuit a feminine "presence" behind my right side, laying a gentle hand on my shoulder and speaking to me in a kind, but firm voice "But, dear, of course this had to happen"

This person who sent me the envelope with his notice, I had slandered him many years ago in a tersely delivered dollup of gossip. Feeling, at that time, the need to "take control" I had attempted to poison the well.

The snake slithers up the inside of my left leg, makes a home for himself stretched out for the full length of my torso. I inhale, he glows and gets comfortable. I exhale he disintegrates becoming a part of my "insides".

Greg,

Look at it as if it's outside of you. Those things which want to grab your attention. Just "observe" them. Separate.

Events are events. They float around like the colors in a lava lamp. And they can engulf you. They can surround it. Let the event flow. You can't stop an event any more than you can stop a tornado. But you can separate from the event. Don't feel the event, let it go.

Part of observing the event is feeling it, but not identifying with it.
Intentional suffering is the enduring of our denying forces, not avoiding them. Avoidance is self-calming. What good is remorse if we don't feel it?
To transform energy you have to work directly with it.

---

by Greg

Ian:

Thanks for the above. While I need the lava lamp to not identify I also need to go through the feelings I described (I don't want to NOT go thru those feelings)

Harry:

My posting, while I can see how it could be taken as a complaint, was simply meant as "reportage" of what was going thru me. There is alot of what we are conditioned to describe as awful going on with me. I don't see it as awful nor do I wish to remove myself from any of its so-called unpleasantness. "When will it end?" wasn't a cry for help --- it was a simple question asked. (Like: "How much longer is this trip?") By the way, it hasn't ended yet, so . . .

Greg.

---

by Harry

> Part of observing the event is feeling it, but not identifying with it.
> Intentional suffering is the enduring of our denying forces, not avoiding them.

I think we agree. The intentional suffering is suffering something different than if we were identified with the event. Example:

Street hustlers are a common event here. Con men who approach nearly everyone. I was walking to my car with a friend. I'm white. She's black. This dude we both know, whose story we both know is approaching us.

I see the event coming. I feel the irritation inside of me. Yes I experience it. But I just smile and shake my head. And suddenly, next to me, I hear my friend almost screaming: "No. Don't even goddamn think about it." Her released energy almost physically repulsed him and washed over me, almost making me laugh outloud.

I'm not talking about a different "reaction".

by Greg

Harry:

In my way of going about things (and I am not saying I am "Right" it is simply the way in which it is Work-ed out by me) If I experienced the irritation you spoke of in your re-counting, it is not enough for me to experience it and smile and shake my head. My formula, if you will, would be to experience the irritation, turn it over and take in the manifestations it creates in me for having manifested it (unpleasant), create inner smile as an affirmation of my mechanical irritation (denying), and ask for a transubstantiation.

And I dunno. Maybe I DON'T know what I'm talking about, too! There's always that possibility.

I have to find a way to work with the irritation.

Work Program week beginning 26 July 2004

by Ian

Morning exercise: Greet the morning sun by sensing its light as a presence that fills all space including the space within yourself.

Daily exercise 1: Throughout the week, whenever you observe a fearful 'I' arising, endure its emotional manifestation with an Inner Smile and sensed lips while repeating silently - I wish to Be.

Daily exercise 2: Each day choose one of the seven deadly egotisms and devise your own Affirmation to be performed while calmly enduring any manifestations of your chosen egotism. The Affirmation may include a combination of a verbal formulation, a posture or gesture, and a sensing exercise.

Evening exercise: With the daily egotism chosen above, ponder - What is its source in human life? From which center(s) does it arise? Does it serve any purpose? While pondering, move your attention to each of the three centers in turn.

Walking exercise: As you walk during the day, sense the spine and skull. Visualize them emitting a pulse of light with each step.

by Harry

Yesterday, sensing spine, skull; visualizing emitting light with each step was a perfectly fine, sensible exercise.

This morning walking to the office I felt like I had to slow down to do the exercise.

It's funny, because I know I don't walk to my car at a significantly different speed than I walk from it. So my internal, relative time was at a different speed.

Question that goes back to last week's exercises. Has anyone else noticed more physical energy from consciously eating and breathing?

---

by Greg

Yesterday's exercise with the skeleton threaded in and out of the day without problem(s).

Woke this morning securely centered. My twenty minute walk to work from the train was walked with a physical body operating as one unit --- one complete shape, like a cat (from head to toe).

Last week's sleep pattern was disrupted which, in retrospect DID happen as a result of increased energy due to the conscious breathing work.

by Marina

Yesterday I took Pride and made Affirmation to endure and accept manifestation of this egotism. During the day I was very calm and kept my balance. But in the evening I had my second movement-classes and expected to demonstrate how I've been trained one difficult movement myself at home. But unfortunately we started to study some new movement and I was again clumsy and awkward. From time to time I could remember myself about daily exercise, but one part of my attention was destracted with movements and therefore my pride could become stronger. After classes I started criticize my movements collegs and told that they have no notion about aim of gurdjieff's movements as almost everybody is a follower of Osho. And when my friend was telling me that nobody demands my presence there, I've tought "Ok, when I can do these movents well I'll leave this group" and in this moment some another "I" was adding in me : " with a proudly look?" And this helped me to separate myself from my self- importance or pride and I didn't knew should I cry or laugh. This was a very contradictory experience. I could see at once two conflicting sides of me, two of my natures. And this good "I" was going on " If you can't separate yourself in moment of identifying, you should go through daily's events trying non-identify with them and separating yourself from them" Ho, well ,this is not such a bad idea, this night I'll try to do it. But later I've forgot about this idea and started to ponder about pride. The intellectual center was talling: You should acknowledge your pride as this is a basis for true self-love, but sentsation shows that something very lively in me was crushed and squeezed with this pride and I saw how this lively thing is tired and ill from my pride. So this was my secondly contradictory experience of that day.

Marina,

What balances these two opposing forces? What is the third force that can allow these two forces in you to exist, together?

There is such a thing as beneficial pride. Not the pride you describe, which wishes to be seen of others.

Can you do the movement not worrying about being clumsy. Can you do the movement as a prayer?

Yesterday, I had a lot of time to Work and spent most of it on the "I wish to be" affirmation in the face of fear manifestations. There have been alot of these fear manifestations recently and if I remember to shift gears and slow down and do the affirmations and the inner smile methodically some real strength manifests. I also paid more conscious attention to breathing process.

Last night, as I was getting ready to "turn in for the night " I became awre of a "super-charged" energy rising from my feet and moving in a blending fashion towards my head. The process (unusual, but not frightening) toook me over. I found myself altering my physical posture a couple of times to allow the energy a clearer path. As it reached my neck and head area (held in by the top of the skull) I felt on the verge of a kind of nausea--- and yet it was not an unpleasant feeling, more like an "interesting-what -is-happening?" feeling. There was a tremendous blending action at the entire top of my skull that felt like it would "escape " at any minute but didn't (a related negative manifestation of this would be the need to crawl out of one's own skin-- let's say after a horrible hang-over). All of this was pleasant and unusual in the extreme--yet, it was balanced I would describe it as being energetically cleaned out. Very pure, clean energy. (I saw myself, in my mind's eye as being washed into solidly formed Transparency) All of this happened in 45 minutes steadily. Then rapidly fionished and I went to sleep.

Today, my body felt one- piece -moving again. While walking there reappeared an energetic upward-blending (less intense then last night but "There"). My eyesight notably clearer. During the walk I deliberately. touched my chin to my clavicle and there was a surprise release of the muscles at the back of my neck and a warm flowing feeling. Pleasant but a "shock". I had a complete sensory awareness of the muscles in the neck from the base of the skull running down and spreading out into the scapulae ---- one whole, complete 3-D feeling. It happened a second time and disappeared.

Anybody else have something related?

---

by Harry

Ian,

Following up on Greg's description.

I've found a similar knotting of energy in the evenings. Especially in the solar plexus. I believe I understand this. I guess my question is the relationship between the head to toe sensing exercise and the Draining Exercise which I've learned elsewhere. (Sitting, opening hands feet other areas, draining all energy not "necessary for my continued life and perceptions".) When I sense from head to toe in the evening I find this knotted solar plexus. My inclination is to drain, but I understand draining to be a periodic exercise.

Your comments?

---

by Greg

Harry,

Can you describe "knotting"? I don't understand the terminology. Also what is "draining", or is that something you can go into.

Last night was extraordinary for me.

Thanks.

Greg

---

by Greg

Sorry, Harry, I DO understand enough of what you are saying concerning draining. I wasn't paying attention. But the "knotting" -- I'm curious.

The blending, Harry is the rings moving up the body of the robot in METROPOLIS only inside, not outside and constantly moving in an upwards direction . . . not moving up and DOWN.

Strange, it's reactivating while I'm writing this.

What emotion is associated with the knot?

The drained energy might be useful to the planet which sustains us.
For example, every time we breath out we are energy expelling not necessary for our continued existance, but plants need CO2 so they can produce O2. G called it reciprocal maintenance.

It is good you have an opportunity to do movements, but are they only teaching Gurdjieff movements, or are they adding some of their own movements also?
It would probably be a good exercise not to argue with them, just go and put all your effort into learning the movements. You also have an opportunity to intentionally endure the unpleasant maifestations of the other people.

Part of the benefit of movements is going through the clumsy and awkward experience. Practicing movements at home robs you of that opportunity to learn something about yourself. Also, being clumsy and awkward gives you something to practice intentional suffering .

I think we all go through experiences like this at certain stages of our work. It seems to vary in manifestation and intensity form person to person. As we work on ourselves we release psychological 'knots' or blockages that have caused us unnecessary suffering in the past.

When we start to notice areas of tension we need (knead?) to work on them by placing our attention in those areas and observing the thoughts and feelings associated with them. We could also breath into those areas and exhale the tension or we could allow the tension to drain into the earth.

As the knots are released and we are more relaxed and fluid, we can experience an expansion of our awareness and sensation and feeling of ourselves and our surroundings.

This morning, riding on the train to work, the bones of my forearms (resting on my corresponding legs) simultaneously emit light and play out a musical tone which seems to reverberate in the marrow. This happens twice.

Yesterday, after my last posting , I leave work for home with what I will now refer to as the Process having reasserted itself while writing the posting. During the walk to the train, the Process intensifies and there is a return of the pressure under the top of the skull, the upward-blending (though now mainly located in the upper torso), and the feeling which is related to nausea, but without a feeling of sickness. I am intensely hungry, all of a sudden, a feel a furnace-like burning below my navel.

45 minutes later I am home headed for the grocery store. I enter the store and to my surprise the entire place is repugnant to me. Incredibly, though fiercely hungry, I can't imagine injgesting anything . . . but I know I must, as a voice inside is telling me the furnace needs feeding to continue the Process. And the Process clearly DOES have to go on. I "know" this.

I settle for two things bland Macro-Vegan "chinese" dumplings (with all the appeal of a jar of school paste) and a large package of Oreo cookies.
The check out lady who is accustomed to my purchases for the last two years, looks at these items strangely. I, just need to get out of there. The whole place and the idea of eating are so alien to me at this point, but I have to try.

I sit outside and slowly ingest the dumplings with equal helpings of air. They go down alright, it works, but my very saliva is inches away from not wishing to be involved in this whole ordeal. Dumplings finished, the furnace roars comfortably. While, I continue to be in this altered state (did somebody slip me hallucinagins?) I'm at a place where I can deal with it.

Returning to my apartment I realise it is going to be a long night without much in the way of sleep. (The last two nights have been sleep deprived but I have taken cat naps and I have this enormous energy) I make a comfortable little setting in my kitchen with the rocking chair and a lamp and place the Oreos within reach. (OREOS? Oh well.) I sit with a good book and read. The roaring in the furnace continues and the upward-blending intensifies. These feelings teeter on the edge of horrible, but this is all too interesting. The closest analogy is having an infection with a fever taking over the body ---- but even that is far, far away. I am aware that I am inhabiting the upperreaches of the thoracic cavity. I inhale deeply and ribs pop and rest back into place.

An hour passes and I eat an Oreo. I eat another. They have a cooling effect on the furnace. Before I know it I've eaten too many and they are "lumped" ontop of the furnace. An "I" has come up and convinced me to interfere with the Process --- to shut it down with a stern "It's time for you to go to bed. Stop this nonsense." I go to bed sweating profusely as the Process attempts to reassert itself and re-establish it's own peculiar balance. It takes all night.

By 4:00am I'm up and in the shower. Balance has been regained the Process continues on. In the shower I go over the past couple of days, grateful and mystified by all of this. I'm also so very glad to be able to write about it all.

I catch an early bus to work (Thank God I have work to go to). I open TALES and my reading begins on page 296 and begins the tale of Belcultassi. The correspondence with what is going on with me is not lost. In fact the narrative opens up with riches. An inner smile manifests. I read a few pages further about the creation of the Society and I think about our group.

I change trains. Sit. The tones and light in my arms manifest twice and subside.

In the recounting of this the Process has evaporated.

---

by Harry

Marina,

So if the neutralizing force is love, then do the movement with love. Love the movement.

Greg,

Knotting. The solar plexus interacts with the external world. Long strands of energy matter, if you will. (For illustrative purposes.) And this is what I find knotted up at the end of the day.

As to some of the experiences you've described: Is there some civil war involved?

Suffering: Intentional Suffering: I choose to go to work this morning. I don't suffer my "i's" who want to complain, who say turn over; I pay for my arising. I do what has to be done.

So take a step further: You don't want to eat. Your state creates an environment inside of you. So you eat consciously, you take in food, you take in air, but what impression are you taking in?

Sometimes you have cayenne pepper dumped in your dish. You eat it. But this is the exception.

In General:
"The Terror of the Situation" has been much present. Perhaps it is the increased work. My medical revelation. The fact that my step-father is slowly dying in a nursing home. Or that my son has been home and away and home during the last couple of weeks. But I sit here with 10, 15, maybe 20 years left. That's not depressing. It's just I'm not ready. I want to be a grandfather to my son's child(ren). I want to provide my son that help. Or course a child is at least 3 to 5 years away in his life. Ph.D comes first.

That's ordinary. But it is percolating in me for the first time in my life. I've always appeared younger than my almost 60 years and never much thought about it.

by Greg

Harry:

No. No civil war going on. I am not registering complaint I am describing an interior procedure that has been activated. And I am totally abandoning myself to it and intuitively "feeling" my way through. Nothing negative about it. Intense? Difficut? Yes, both those. It FEELS like creation/recreation. Phoenix-like. What is it finally? Alchemistical? I don't know or even care to know. There is this sense of a furnace in my belly heating a process of rising energy.It is totally interesting to me and very difficult to articulate and it has all been activated by coming into this group and attempting to do the exercises that seem right. But even that is a chicken and egg question.

One thing I can say ---- I wouldn't dare fight it. I wouldn't miss what is happening for all the World. The feelings are the most extraordinary food.

Greg

hello,
Harry, thank you, today I'll try to do movements in another way.

Last week I tried to ponder about my envy. And I've noticed that it always run away from my observation and its resistance shows its worth so that I always fall asleap by my pondering and it doesn't matter when I do my pondering: in morning, afternoon or in the evening. I've tried during three days and result is the same. I get tired and can't pay my attention on this thing. Why does it happen? and what can I undertake to overcome this?

Work Program week beginning 2 August 2004

by Ian

This weeks theme: All-Brains-Balanced-Being-Perception

The theme is a phrase that Gurdjieff used in Beelzebub's Tales to describe the state of a person with Being. Mr. Beidler described it like this : "We are "harmonized" when our three centers are coordinated in unison rather than "in chaos" when each center acts independantly of the others (our usual, normal, mechanical condition). We approach harmony when the three centers are each relaxed because then they are comfortably related to one another. In meditation we try to be as physically relaxed or loose as possible, to which is added a neutral emotional condition, to which is added a quiet mind (no thought). A goal is to do everything with the three centers harmoniously related."

Daily Pondering: Where is the Rememberer who harmonizes the three centers?

Morning exercise: Quiet meditation or sitting. Relax the three centers and watch the breath. Keep the eyes open and use the Sightless Gaze. Avoid focusing on objects within the visual field. Quiet the mind.

Daily exercise 1: Whenever you are walking during the day, use the 12 Joint Exercise. At every 6th step, move your attention from joint to joint following the sequence below. While sensing each joint repeat inwardly the corresponding word from the Holy Affirming Prayer. Silently Ponder the meaning of each word without expecting any answers.

12 Joint Sensing Sequence - Inner Prayer

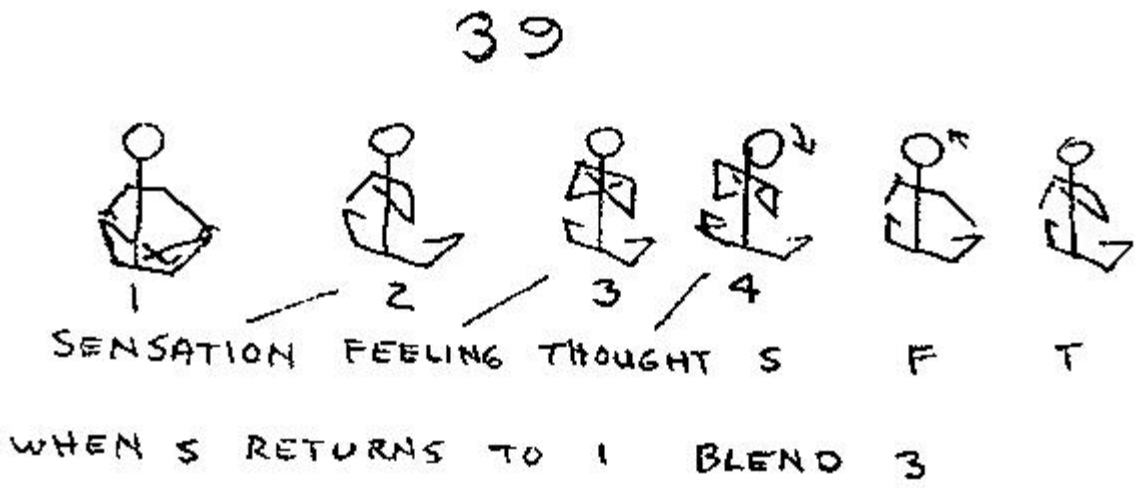
1. Right wrist - Holy
2. Right elbow - Affirming
3. Right shoulder - Holy
4. Left hip - Denying
5. Left knee - Holy
6. Left ankle - Reconciling
7. Right ankle - Transubstantiate
8. Right knee - In
9. Right hip - Me
10. Left shoulder - For
11. Left elbow - My
12. Left wrist - Being

Daily exercise 2: Take a routine task (eg. washing dishes, making bed, cooking) and perform it with great care, slowly and deliberately, being aware of each motion. Evoke a feeling of gratitude for having an opportunity to help lighten the burden of suffering of His Endlessness.

Mid-day exercise: Quiet meditation or sitting. Relax the three centers and watch the breath. Keep the eyes open and use the Sightless Gaze. Avoid focusing on objects within the visual field. Quiet the mind.

Eating exercise: Before eating, perform the Heptachord exercise.

Heptachord Before Eating



This exercise is to be done before eating. Each step may be accompanied by the inhalation and exhalation of a breath and the Repetition of a prayer.

1. Relax all three centers.
2. Attend to the sight or presentation of the food on the table and plates.
3. Attend to the sounds accompanying the meal situation.
4. Attend to the smell of the food.
5. Attend to the taste of the food by taking a small sample into the mouth.
6. Attend to the touch or physical sensations evoked by the food and setting.
7. Intone the phrase from Beelzebub's Tales - aieioiuoa.

During meals, relax and eat very slowly, chewing the the food well. Attend to the textures, odours and tastes of the food. Sense the energy from the food spreading to all parts of the organism. Observe the change in your emotional state before and after eating.

Evening exercise: Perform Movement #39 with the music. The outer movement consists of 4 positions repeated 3 times plus a beginning and ending posture which are the same. Each position is held for 6 counts of the music. The inner work sequence consists of 3 steps repeated 4 times, one step for each of the positions - (1) Sense the whole presence of the body with full attention. (2) Attention to the feelings in the emotional center. (3) Attention to the intellectual center. Quiet the mind but form a clear mental image of where you are and why.

At the end of the Movement, blend the experiences of all three centers into a global state of attention and sit quietly for a while. You may repeat the Movement several times.

More instructions and an MP3 of the music are available here :
http://www.endlesssearch.co.uk/movement_number39.htm
The music is also available on the CD by pianist Cecil Lytle called "The complete Piano Music of Georges I. Gurdjieff and Thomas De Hartmann", Volume 3, CD 1, Track 37.

I found that something in me "likes" the 12 Joint Excercise though it requires quite focused attention for me.

Nevertheless I found that some "I" in me says: "Doing this excercise you are just trying to move your attention from feeling your own nothingness and your recent failures in usual life, you are just trying to fool yourself and to forget your recent problems".

It has something to do with my wish to understand everything intellectually when I do something and to see what I (or at least someone else) will get from doing this or that. I just don't see how this excercise should work in me besides just training to focus and divide attention (I don't say that it's not enough) - while something in me seeks some understanding or some other results (change in my behaviour, thinking, getting more positive emotions or more control over my movements).

I know that it's silly to expect everything to come immediately but in my recent situation in life I often find myself considering the idea that my practise of Gurdjieff Work is just the distraction from "The Real Life". I also know that in some part such thoughts belong to my False Personality but I always thought that the desire to "know why" is a good desire...

I also can't connect emotionally with the words of the prayer in this excercise - I can't see emotionally and at the level of sensations what transubstantiation of three forces could be in my individual life and in my experience (what I would feel, would it feel good or bad, how it will be sensed in my body etc.). I just understand it intellectually (there is active force, there is passive force, there is neutralising, they meet and some new energy is produced) - but I don't understand intellectually how this excercise may lead to this.

But - as I said, - something in me likes the excercise!

quotation "Nevertheless I found that some "I" in me says: "Doing this excercise you are just trying to move your attention from feeling your own nothingness and your recent failures in usual life, you are just trying to fool yourself and to forget your recent problems".

I recognize the resistance of the mind to giving up thinking that is so so important. This is very familiar to me. In those moments, in that thinking, I am my thoughts; they are my anchor to the world or so I think.

Only after practicing the quiet mind, in spite of the insistence of the intellect, the crush of thoughts, can one see the purpose and experience its value.

Attention is a valuable tool and it becomes stronger with use, like a muscle.

One might think that the mind or thinking also becomes stronger with use, and that there is value in that. There may be, under some conditions. I am struggling to have an intentional life rather than an automatic one, I would rather know that I am not my thoughts and that my identity is not defined by what is running through my mind. I can know this when I am separate from my thoughts. Then I can ask "who is harmonizing the centres?"

I find the movement so inspiring. I look forward to doing it in the evening Forced my self to continue working several times yesterday. Not a thought, but a vague inclination: "Oh you've done this exercise enough." But kept on.

Last night a Vivid Dream. Won't go into details. Three story house. Often this same house is featured in my vivid dreams. This time I was aware that I was looking at it inside in the past. At a point a "voice" ---that's not what it was, but best way to describe it---said: "OK, this is what happened back then. What would you do differently?" So I did differently with today's I.

I then saw the internal condition of the house, particularly of the second floor. Saw what happened differently.

"Now you know you CAN change the past."

Can only say that this dream involved a crucial time in my life. That I couldn't do any differently then, but that I can now. Did do differently, last night.

I want to summarize the week, since there wasn't a lot of discussion. The "joint exercise" became a daily exercise. Some struggle to always continue. Some struggle to keep proper crossover.

Eating is coming along. A little harder in communal situations. Or when other activities are going on. The perceived "hit of energy" has dissipated.

Reijo's birthday message was close to home.

by Greg

Rough, rough week which I almost lost the opportunity to use the roughness for friction.

Got back on the bus halfway through, however. Still, I apologise to the group as a whole for not working for "Us" and not throwing my week's experiential hat in the ring.

Joint and No. 39 exercises seemed to contribute to awareness of two things: 1) An ongoing awareness of my essential "nothingness" and 2) and far more interesting, an awarenes of negative space inside the outline of my physical body. Are the two related? I have a sneaking suspicion they are.

No. 1 is a journey into self-pity and its accompanying drek if I don't shift into diving straight into the "nothingness". So, I dive ("Down, down, down---would the fall never come to an end?"- Alice's Adventures in Wonderland).

No. 2 only happens when the dive has taken place. So, I suppose they are connected in LINEAR fashion. Unusual feeling, No. 2----walking around with a pregnancy of Worlds inside of me while my physical body walks around in a (relatively) set world.

Watched Antonioni's L'ECLISSE which I must have seen a dozen times since I first set eyes on it at the age of 10. It's been years since I've seen it. The sense of the bodies in the landscape seemed so much on the edge of what I have been experiencing. Certainly, I noticed how Antonioni's way of flattening out everything and bringing everything into high visual relief is like the "sightless gaze" for me.

Work Program week beginning 9 August 2004

by Ian

Three times during the day sit quietly in meditation. Relax the three centers. Watch the breath. Use a sightless gaze and soundless sound to absorb impressions without identifying, labeling or judging them. Allow the impressions to collect in the marrow of the bones.

As you walk during the day, visualize the energy collected in the marrow. Ponder - "What is the source of my desire for answers, opinions and judgements?"

When you encounter the unpleasant manifestations of others during the day, try to absorb the impressions without identifying, labeling or judging them. Visualize the impressions collecting in the marrow of the bones.

When you react mechanically with anger, resentment, boredom or hopelessness, try to absorb the impressions without identifying, labeling or judging them. Visualize the impressions collecting in the marrow of the bones.

Evening exercise: While deeply sensing your body, Ponder, without expecting an answer, "Are questions more valuable to a seeker than answers?"

by Greg

Impresions flying like sheets of paper towards my bones and dematerializing as they become absorbed in the marrow. The marrow "beams" and swells momentarily in the absorption and then "deflates" to its usual place.

Why does the marrow inhale and exhale for me?

Why do I "see" things always in the process? For instance, while I am taking the impression in, Why? is it that I "see" it as sheets of paper flying towards the bone? Am I trying to define it by giving it a symbol? Is it sinmply the Artist I that can't help but do this? Is it the refuse of something deeper.

My concern at tiomes is that while it (the visualizing) may help to explain to other people, it may be something for me, at this point, that stands between the impression and its received nutrient.

The questions are more important than the answers as they stir the pot of possibilities ---- many directions not just one. Questions bring "air" into the situation.

triad? Questions-Answers-Journey
The answers of one triad are the questions of another.
What is the journey? Effort?

Every answer I've ever had, every understanding I've ever come to, has not been the result of a question as much as of an experience. I know and feel that I know. I understand.

These things I am hesitant to ever speak of, because yours have to belong to you.

by Guest

Being in agreeance with the 'questions bring air'... questions seem to come only after effort and with it they bring space, an attempt at orientation more than a desire for answers...a creeping along of understanding

by Greg

Practice of the sightless gaze with the relaxation of the three centers seems to be connected to an increase this week in the physical body's operating more and more as a single unit. (I'm just guessing at this).
One morning I jumped straight up from bed. The movemnt was clearly impulsed from a completely integrated abdominal muscular movement organically growing out of my waking state.

The collecting of the impressions in the marrow went without a hitch most of the week. Was pretty isolated most of the week, so didn't really have much interaction with others --- negative reactions were at a minimum.

The problem with immediately answering a situation is that it "kills" it. It immediately crystallises it and fixes it with a definition. Subtleties don't get any play, just the labels "black" or "white", and the situation is then placed in its appropriate pigeon-hole--- all very intellectual without any feeling. Tracing the path of an immediate answer shows me that the answer is self-engendered; egotistical. Asking questions stirs the air acting as an attracting force for answers to come from somewhere outside of myself.

by Greg

Woke this morning late (for me) from a deep dreamless sleep. This is the third time since the beginning of the exercises (early July) that I went to sleep feeling like I'd used up all the "daily bread" I had received.

Woke with a relaxed, yet energetic physical body. I registered the onset of a hurricane creeping up the coast by a pressure pressing in from the atmosphere around me. I ate breakfast carefully (attentively) and sparingly--- the body only needed so much and no more.

Having spent the night at my parents' house, I noticed their dog also laying low. I asked (anybody who'd answer) "What's up with him?". My father answered "Oh, your mother and I can always tell when a storm is afoot, because Niklausz (the dog) gets quiet." I thought to myself, "Him and me both". but said nothing other than "Oh? . . ." No one else ever seems to be aware of these changes in the atmosphere . . . or maybe it's the voice of "Well, you just don't pay attention to that . . ." I dunno.

Had to work extra today and since I had the office to myself I did my lunch hour three center balance while looking in the mirror. I just observed while the face dropped. Each tension-held place had such a story to tell. But, I tried not to listen as a lot of it was filled with judgement and classification.

by Harry

I had a doctor, once, who said he could tell by my blood pressure whether a storm was coming.

The bone marrow exercise was difficult for me. I attempted daily, but couldn't maintain any continuity. Perhaps the early association with something I'd previously experienced interferred. Made the exercise fall on it rather than I.

Is a very busy time, which usually means opportunities to Work, galore. Just seems busy right now. Though I'm not terribly overwhelmed. Just doing different things.

Work Program week beginning 16 August 2004

Daily Pondering: What is my Work aim?

Morning exercise: Sit quietly in meditation. Relax the three centers. Watch the breath. Use a sightless gaze and soundless sound to absorb impressions without identifying, labeling or judging them. Allow the impressions to collect in the marrow of the bones.

Daily exercise 1: "I have good leather to sell for those who wish to make shoes." (Gurdjieff) Take time to go for a 15 minute walk. While walking, Sense your feet and Ponder - What kind of 'shoes' do I wish to make?

Daily exercise 2: "I have good leather to sell for those who wish to make shoes." (Gurdjieff) Take time to sit quietly for 15 minutes. Sense your hands and Ponder - What 'currency' is used to acquire the leather?

Daily exercise 3: Visualize yourself having attained your aim. Whenever you encounter others during the day, try to manifest towards them as you would if you had attained your aim.

Evening recapitulation: What did I do today to further my progres towards my aim?

by Greg

This morning I was able to will the face into a complete drop. I knew "how" to do it, for some reason. I've tried dozens of times doing it bit by bit, but this was one full drop and then directly into the sightless gaze. Tried to continue the relaxation past the neck but it just wouldn't go any further.

Finding myself needing to do a deep, full inhaltion a couple of times during the day. Just one full intake, hold for a bit (sometimes the ribcage pops a bit) and then slowly let it out. I feel these inhalations all the way down behind the pubic bone--- well, the expansion the breath makes, actually.

Still toying with the "shoes" but boots keep coming up.

---

by Harry

Whenever I find myself really clogged I do the "draining exercise". I don't remember if it came from Mr. Nyland or elsewhere.

Imagine spigots on hands and feet. Open spigots. Drain everything that is unnecessary MAINTAINING LIFE AND PERCEPTIONS. It's like water flowing out of the body. Visualize a level in the body. This level drains down. Other parts of the body can open.

There are a couple of places I've always found a catch. The neck area is one. (chakra?) and the other the solar plexus.

To do this in full takes a while. . .and whoever taught me, emphasized that it was important to close everything at the end.

As to shoes, I started a book at one point which I entitled Archangel Shoes. Shoes have to be hand made. For the individual. Out of special materials.

I mentioned this back in Reijo's old forum. I opened the manuscript once after not having looked at it for six months and found this quote at the top of the page: "Loose thy shoe from off thy foot; for the place whereon thou standest is holy." To this day I have no idea how that quote was put into the manuscript.

by Greg

Harry

When you're saying "close everything at the end", do you mean once the water is drained you twist the fawcets completed off?

Thanks. This exercise really helps!

Fragments of thought of this excellent exercise Ian has given us.

Shoes that will permit me walking towards Him
"He who dresses the naked" – "form" a soul –"dress" it – "Malbish Arumim" shoes for Dancing for Him
Shoes to take off – "Shal Na-aleija" 'take off yr shoes because this is a hly place'
Shoes I can put on to walk towards Him –and take off when I am with him –

$$$Be ready to pay real currency for purchasing – including the postage.
$$$Be able to dispose of all false currency I have.
$$$Give my “soul “ for it – gain a soul for it.

Greg,

Yeah. Turn the fawcetts off. So you don't continue to drain energy.

Shoes and leather:

The material I need for construction is a strange leather. It must help me resist the rocks in the road. What are these rocks? They are the things which touch me beyond the surface of my feet. They are the things I respond to. They are also the events bigger than me.

But this leather must also help me from pushing my little toes into things I know they shouldn't be in. In a modern analogy, I'd say they have to have a built in GPS which keeps me out of the neighborhoods where I don't belong.

What is this GPS? It's my own observations of myself. I know that this argument or that event will touch me to respond and lead me to the wrong place. I have observed it. So my observation helps me construct my shoes, helps me keep from walking where I am not, yet, strong enough to go. But perhaps lets me skirt that area so I can work some. I can have the friction I can deal with to make newer substances for the next pair of shoes.

So this material must breath. It must allow in those elements necessary for the health of my body(feet). Sneakers without air holes produce athlete's foot. It would also be nice if it had a deodorizing insole, so that I could keep from stinking up what I shouldn't stink up.

Enough with the analogies. The leather I have purchase are instructions for my life. I must pay for it with my partkdolg duty.

Thoughts on the Work Program beginning 16th Aug 04 :-

What is my Aim ? -
To be here now, in the present, in order to participate more in my life

Daily Exercise (1)
Leather for shoes …..

Knowledge (for direction) – effort & will

Daily Exercise (2)
Currency to pay for Leather ....

Trying to serve something higher

Sacrificing identifications i.e.
Trying to give up :-
Abandoning myself to, and believing in, my inner dialogues – fears - obsessions - sedatives like T.V., self pity, - comforting delusions

Daily Exercise (3)
Daily exercise 3: Visualize yourself …….as if you had attained your aim

I try this.
But fail continually as the mechanical identifications 'gush forward' and drown my attempts in dreams.
But I try & try …the anticipation of the attempts stimulates me.
The attempts are improving with time.

by Greg

My shoes continue to be boots. Sturdy well wearing and heavy (weighted so that I remember groundedness and the muscular effort I really exert in walking. The laces should be tight enough so that there is no shifting around and lack of surety, yet loose enough to allow breathing and blood circulation. The leather should be relatively water tight so that there is not an excessive sloshing-around and seeping-in. Here, again there needs to be some breathability so that the insides don't turn rank and give themselves up to rot. Somehow, the soles of these boots (which wear like iron--it's a long journey, after all)) should allow my feet to sense the terrain on which I walk. Thus, I remain sensientely aware of the earth and stay awake to the needs of adjustment between my vulnerable foot and its "weights and balances" relationship to a constantly shifting surface underneath. These soles allow me to sense when to exert pressure, when to release, how much, how little, and when to feed the body with the energy of the earth, by pulling it up through the base of well-planted feet.

Work Programm for this Week was very much related with my thoughts about need to make a personal aim and a place for conscious Work. My work always goes by associations. And if I try to intent remember myself each hour or in a sertain situations as a rule I'll forget or my resistance will be so strong that I get very soon tired. It hapens also with other exercises. There is very little affirming force in me. If I set some aim I almost never achieve it. I've started two or three years ago to write all my aims in journal on purpose to observe and stimulate my doing-process and results of this observing are very striking. The biggest obstacle i see in our "forgetfulness". I know how powerfull are visualizing and selfremembering for strengthening of Affirming force, but I can use them only when I remember. I would like to ask: How can we increase our ability for remembering of our aims, or putting it in other words how can we increase strength of our " I wish"?

So this Week I started my Work Program with sufficient strength and I aimed to do all exercises in intented circumstances. First day I could accomplish this, the second I forgott to sense my feet with pondering about leather while walking, and on Thursday I done absolutely other exercises by associations continuing imagine a "conscious" work. Well, all this is manifistation of Low of Seven. But could we have a practicall use from knowledge of this Low? How can we recognize intervals? Where can we get help for overcoming these intervals?

regards,
Marina

Marina,

Heptaparaparshinokh: one stopinder was intentionally lengthened and this resulted in the dishormony of the other.

We also know that do-re-mi repeats itself if an external shock isn't applied.

We're told that we can overcome these with shocks. One shock comes from breathing and the other comes from impressions.

If you study the enneagram closely you'll see that it is really three triangles. Three equilateral triangles that have been disconnected. Once heptaparaparshinokh and triamazikamno were joined. And were a 9 pointed star. 9-gram.

We also know that each shock is at another octave.

Conscious Labors: meaning we're taking in intentional impressions Breathing

Look for the point when one thing flows easily into another, then see how it follows. If it turns back in outself then you know what point of the octave you're at.

Or if the movement from one step to another is taking forever, then you know you're at another point.

The three triangles can be restored. Which only leads to another set. But it builds the octave we're in.

Thanks for raising these points. To expand on them a little...

Yes, the enneagram is 3 interlocking octaves of the three 'foods' - food, air and impressions. This also relates to our three centers. Balancing the three leads to what G. called All-brains-balanced-being-perception.

Taking in and digesting Impressions consciously and objectively, without short-circuiting them with the habitual judgements of the formatory and lower emotional centers is an important Work practice. This is why exercises such as Sensing, the Sightless Gaze and the Soundless Sound are important practices.

There is a lot of confusion over the first and second conscious shocks.
Gurdjieff tells us that the mi-fa shock (air) is an automatic, mechanical shock. Of course, by breathing consciously, we can increase the effectiveness of this shock.

The first conscious shock is traditionally associated with taking in Impressions and the second conscious shock with transforming negative emotions into positive emotions. For me, these two shocks correspond to what G. called Conscious Labor and Intentional Suffering.

> Marina wrote:
> I would like to ask: How can we increase our ability for remembering of our aims, or putting it in other words how can we increase strength of our " I wish"?

Very important questions. These are things we all struggle with.

Of paramount importance in this area is the ability to sustain our Attention and Concentration. In many spiritual traditions, the preliminary exercises that are taught are exercises to strengthen our powers of attention and concentration. Without attention we will not be able to focus on the areas of ourselves that we wish to study. Without concentration we will not be able to maintain that attention for prolonged periods of time. These types of practices are not spiritually glamorous, but they are essential to developing our abilities - truly an exercise in Conscious Labour!
There are many simple exercises in this catagory. (See next weeks program where I will address these issues.)

We must be as forgiving to ourselves as we are to others.
We all have undeveloped potential - never underestimate yourself!

This week's work program seemed more hard for me than the previous. Trying to ponder on questions about "shoes" and "currency" I found some quite strong resistance in me that distracted my attention from focusing on these matters. I found out that while I can give many verbal expressions of my supposed "work aims" formulated on the intellectual level it's quite hard for me to sense these aims with my whole being.

I just spoke to myself all this words like "Real I", "real will", "ability to do" and so on but failed to feel what could it mean or just to sense, see a visual picture or other sensual image of these aims.

Later I remembered my experiences I had after Movements and practising the "three fingers" Excercise (4th excercise for "preparing the soil" from the Third Series) and this memory of much more clear view of myself and of inner calm gave me the feeling - "That's it!"

Later, on Thursday, I was just sitting in the evening and doing something quite casual like playing a game on a pocket PC and when I decided to smoke a cigarette - that interrupted what I was doing then - I just saw for a moment how automatic were all my movements, thoughts and feelings and how they required no attention and conscious effort at all. I told to myself: "That's OK but it doesn't requires me myself, I - maybe - can be more than just a responding-to-stimuli complicated thing, more than just a well-trained monkey". I think my efforts to concentrate on "shoes" and "currency" somehow were one of the causes of this "vision". It was just a very clear emotional feeling of what I am and what I lack, it had some very bitter taste but it was also a big delight to see it so clear. It was much more emotional experience than all that previous pondering on my aim I tried to do before on this week.

Ian, two questions:

If shocks are applied and re-mi and fa-sol, doesn't the transition from si to do happen automatically?
(One is lengthened and the other is intentionally disharmonized. . .)

There is a point which I can't quote which says (paraphrase) The second conscious shock must come from outside. (Believe it's in the Trogoautoegocratic process description.)

I guess the question then is doesn't Partkdolg Duty indicate that if you make a Conscious Labor you have Intentional Suffering, and if you Intentionally Suffer, you must experience Conscious Labor. One flows with the other?

"'being-partkdolg-duty,' that is to say, thanks to those factors which, from the very first arising of three - brained beings, were destined by our Uni-Being Common Father to be the means for self-perfecting."

It includes the practice of : Conscious Labor, Intentional Suffering, the Five Obligonian Strivings

There is a sense in which Intentional Suffering (IS) could be classed as a Conscious Labour (CL) since IS is an exercise. Performing a CL exercise does not necessarily involve suffering, in fact some of the CL exercises are very pleasant.

The two terms are distinct because the purpose of CL is to transform one type of energy and the purpose of IS is to transform another type -
"And so, my dear Hassein, when it became clear that there had entirely disappeared from the psyche of your favorites the instinctive need for conscious labor and intentional suffering in order to take in and transmute in themselves the sacred substances abrustdonis and helkdonis..."

Abrustdonis is air and helkdonis is impressions.

Regarding your first question, it all depends on which mi-fa shock you are talking about, because there are three of them. Always keep in mind that the enneagram is three overlapping octaves. Do not confuse the notes and shocks of one octave with another. The Do's of one octave provide the shocks for another. The Do of the Air octave provides the mi-fa shock to the food octave. That is a mechanical shock. The Do of the impressions octave provides the mi-fa shock to the air octave. That is the first conscious shock. It involves the conscious processing of our impressions by CL exercises.

What provides the shock for the mi-fa interval of the impressions octave? Another Do from another (4th?) octave has to be provided. Where does that come from?

You will notice that the si-do shock of the food octave coincides with the mi-fa shock of the impressions octave. When we talk about the food si-do shock, we are also talking about the mi-fa shock of the impressions and the disharmonized so-la interval of the air octave. Regarding the changed stopinders, one is lengthened (mi-fa, mechanical shock) another is shortened (si-do, intentional shock) and a third is disharmonized (so-la, harnel-aout - no shock is associated with this interval, it is not even mentioned in Ouspensky's writing, just in Beelzebub's Tales. The so-la shock in Ouspensky is really the mi-fa shock of the air octave. This will become clear on the diagram below.).

Air is associated with the emotional center. At the disharmonized so-la interval of the air octave, our emotions can become disharmonized, they can turn positive or negative. It is like a strange attractor in a chaotic system, where things can either spin out of control or proceed in an orderly manner. Our emotions depend on how we interpret our impressions. This is where IS and the second conscious shock comes in, to help things proceed smoothly.

Finally there is the si-do shock of the food octave to consider. As we all have heard, this has something to do with the transformation of sexual energy. I prefer to call it creative energy since it can be used creatively for purposes other than sex.
There are two possible outcomes here. If we engage in sex, Si can be transformed into the Do of a descending octave marking the conception of a new human being. If we engage in IS, Si can be transformed into the Do of an ascending octave marking the conception of an inner being embryo which becomes the Kesdjan body.

All of these energy transformations proceed according to the law of three.

Here is a diagram of the three octaves of the enneagram to help you visualize the process better. It is basically the Ouspensky Food Diagram rendered with enneagrams.

With you 98.6%. Have to contemplate some of that labelling. (I.e. Hydrogen 1s . . .)

LOL

Yes there is some speculative labelling. That was done to remind me of the anomalies and loose ends in the theory. For instance, is the growth of the kesdjan body and ascending or descending octave? I also completely left out any reference to the highest being body or soul or real I which G says grows or precipitates within the kesdjan body.

Work Program week beginning 23 August 2004

This weeks theme: Attention and Concentration

Daily Pondering: What distracts my attention?

Daily Exercises:

1. Sit and gaze at the flame of a candle for at least 15 minutes.

2. Count backwards from 100 to 1 by steps of 2. Repeat as often as possible.

3. As one breaths, count the exhalations from 1 to 10. Repeat as many times as you can.

4. Sense your left hand continuously. When you loose your attention, switch to the right hand.

5. As one walks, place your attention in the solar plexus.

6. As one eats, count the number of times you chew each mouthful of food.

7. Sit and gaze at a candle. For a count of 10 breaths, visualize the light of the flame in your left shoulder. Continue with the following sequence - left elbow, left wrist, right wrist, right elbow, right shoulder, left hip, left knee, left ankle, right ankle, right knee, right hip.

Hi all. This is my first time doing any kind of Gurdjieff work, so I hope my questions are not totally useless or pedantic.

Is there meant to be some kind of sequence or progression to these series of excersises, somehow connected with the law of octaves?
For instance does it matter how long one does each of them or at what point to stop and do the next one? With the counting from 100 this has the danger of becoming mechanical, so it seems, according to a similar exercise I read given by G. that it must be done consciously. Any suggestions.
Also, some of these exercises seem like they can be done at the same time. Is this useful or at all reccomended?

Where is the solar plexus supposed to be? I've heard that it is the region extending from the ears to the stomach, or from the chest or sternum to the stomach. My experience seems to say it is more in this central region.

I really have trouble watching my breath. The intention to do so interferes with its natural movement, and so either I can't sense the exhalations or they are predictable.

What disracts my attention? One big thing among a hundred and one other things is girls. The feminine beauty is so alluring and I'm always seeking to percieve it. And the thing is that it exists in all women, though, in the less physically attractive in subtler ways. I bring this up because some distractions might have very positive or valueable things in them. Things which can help strenghten attention, such as, or so I think, the appreciation of beauty. Anyone have any ideas (which would be especailly interesting to hear from any women here) how such a distraction can become an attraction of real, inner-attention.

Thanks.

My counting backwards this morning became mechanical. I fell asleep to its "drone" of rythmic familiarity and daydreamed and fantasized a psychological bnlanket to be pulled up over the mess . . .

And then the Observer said loudly "NO"

I reinstituted the counting giving each number a unique emotional coloration. Each number then counted for something in terms of my attention. The fantasizing receded. It had to as it had nothing to do with the exercise at hand which was simply counting --- nothing else.

Concentrating on the solar plexus (which for me generally spreads between sternum and stomach --- please someone step in if I am "off" here) I am aware of a flexible triangle of energy which has as its fixed points the middle of each foot (between the arch and the instep), apexing at the base of the sternum. Its lines are white light travelling from right to left and around.

Why is it right to left? Should I be doing something other?

Hi David,

I don't want anyone to think their questions are useless or pedantic.
I encourage everyone to question everything.

Is there a sequence to the exercises? Presuming you mean the 7 given this week - no, not in any formal sense, although I do think thay are arranged in order of increasing difficulty.

If you mean is there a sequence to spiritual exercises in general, I would say yes, with qualifications.

A fundamental prerequisite for any spiritual work (or any type of study where one wishes to excel) is the ability to direct our attention and maintain our concentration. The initial exercises in any valid tradition are geared to developing those faculties. If those issues aren't addressed, then there are probably ulterior motives - think cult; the last thing they want you to do is think long and hard about what they are teaching!

We all enter the Work with varying degrees of ability in those faculties. This weeks exercises are directed at those who recognize the need to develop those abilities. If you can't sustain each of these exercises for 5 minutes then you need to work on them until you can. You will never understand Kant with a 2 minute attention span.

There is nothing mystical and glamouous about these exercises - they are simply given to help develop attention and concentration; to develop areas of the brain that control those functions. It is really just basic neurophysiology.

Another area where attention is required in the Gurdjieff Work is in the practice of body sensing. We have to learn to become aware of every part of our body. Can you sense the middle joint of your left 4th toe?

Yes, there is a danger that these exercises become mechanical or habitual. After some practice they can become too easy. You also noted that some of these exercises can be done at the same time. Good. When you notice an exercise becoming mechanical, that is when you add to the complexity by layering another exercise on top. You can't do x and / until you can + and -. You will eventually start to see the required progressions on your own. But this stuff is not really all that complicated - it just requires persistance...and concentration.

Solar plexus - when I use the term, it refers to the area below the rib cage to the top of the pubic bone.

Watching your breath - again, practice. So what if it is predictable - its breathing afterall. Why not try watching/sensing your heart-beat instead? It is much harder to change consciously.

As to your comments about feminine beauty, I'm not sure that I can help you with that. I think this is a problem for most men. Gurdjieff himself wasn't immune to it. As a friend of mine once said - Every man should have at least one vice!
Seriously, though, I think this is an important question. It does bring in the aspect of transforming sexual energy for higher development. This question is probably equally relevant to men and women.
Can you use these moments of attraction/distraction as reminding factors? That is, as triggers to Remember Yourself? The first thing is of course to notice the moment of attraction/distraction. At this point you can substitute another consciously chosen activity, such as counting down from 100, or Pondering a question such as, What is beauty? or What lies behind the reflected light that I am seeing? while Sensing the middle joint of your left 4th toe...

Welcome David:

I share some of your attraction to physical beauty. As Ian has suggested, I try to see where the process begins. Then I track it point by point as it moves towards the object of attraction while simultaneously keeping an eye on what it is doing in terms of inner-wasting. More times then not (and out of choice) I am able to reel it back in. However, even though I am pretty successful at that "reeling", it doesn't immediately "rectify" itself.

Of course, all of this is being done while I am sensing the one thousanth fuzz behind my right ear. Of course!

Summarizing my experience with the excercises proposed for this week and my previous work with attention I can conclude that the main things that distracts my attention are internal considering and imaginary dialogues with people whom I internally consider most. I noticed that I have two "modes of functioning" - one of "living for others" (internal considering) and the other of "living for myself", in which it's possible for me to concentrate and divide attention, to remember myself, to think actively and so on.

by David

I wish I had more access to the internet, preferably at home, in order to repsond to you all more readily.
Anyway, thank you Gregroy and Ian for your generous and very helpful comments and advice.

Greg, I really like your idea-analogy of "reeling" in our attention, of course not only when it comes to physical (sexual-aesthetic) attraction but to all things that can waste our energy. Terribly forgetful though I am I tried to do what you said and it did seem to help lessen the effects of one's attentive energy being worn and torn, abused and mangled, or, on the other hand, stultified by so many trite, vain or unnecessary preoccupations, in this case, the often superificial and sometimes difficult love of beauty. "Reeling in" is a good analogy for it reminds one that one's attention is a line, or something unbroken proceeding from oneself and thus we are responsible for and will feel, for good or for bad, the effects of our attention. Indeed, "you are where your attention is."

Both your statements on the location of the solar plexus seem to be true -- I did sense something there, some kind of body, or only sensed some of its affects.

And Ian all your comments on the exercises were encouraging, especially the bit on sensing my breath which I can do for longer periods and in a slightly more relaxed way.

I'm glad you brought up the idea of "transforming sexual energy." I suppose no matter how refined one's appreciation of beauty is it is still sexual, at least, in so far as the emotional and sexual are ever so close. But that is the main reason I brought this problem of mine up -- because it seems that sexual energy is very powerful and can cause much damage if it is either suppressed, repressed or distorted. I've noticed that even when I get fet-up with or frustrated in this slight compulsion and try to be "better" than it, it has only led to a feeling of cold indifference or arrogance that is embittering. But that probably means more that I am trying to be free from it for the wrong reasons. As you said, I must use this as a reminder to remember myself, but am at a loss of how to go about doing that. I didn't quite get the connection between moments of "attraction/distraction" and "substituting another consciously chosen activity" in order to remember oneself. But this connects up with a very big, and, as I understand it, in some ways unanwerable question I have: how to go about self-remembering oneself?

I wonder if anyone would like to comment on something my little experience of these exercises has found pecuilar about myself and, I take it, many of us. Because of my interest and 'education' in philosophy, I've felt confident about my powers of attention and concentration. But now I see that for very simple things my attention and concentration is quite weak. Why is that it seems we can focus on complex things better than on the simple? In some ways, it does seem easier for me to focus on and try and penetrate the abstract ideas of Plato and Kant, than to be able to count backwards from 100 for five minutes? Could it be the emotional aspect of the intellectual center is lacking in the latter? And if so, then what is the value of these kinds of attention, or, what is more, how are these exercises in a way better than the intellectual focus on (I)ideas? (It probably doesn't matter, but, by idea, I have in mind Ouspensky's definiton of it in Tertium Organum -- the best I've ever read.) Or maybe this question is more basic: why is it important that, as you said Ian, one be able to sense every part of their body? I can understand very much the importance of sensing your body, but isn't that going too far?

Anyway, I've said too much...for now.

Peace...

by Greg

It is so interesting how these "simple" exercises offered for this week's Work, cannot be done simply by the likes of me. Other than the continual issue of the "I" that doesn't want me to Work is the "I" that simply doesn't want to do the exercise as stated.

Par example: Anything to do with sitting with a lit candle. The accrection of years of Romantic (as opposed to Classic) associations with me sitting in a room with a lit candle. The mind reels . . . I avoided those exercises at the beginning of the week because of the "Oh, no . . . not that Wuthering Heights/Heathcliff stuff for me." And then I went into it because IT IS THOSE VERY "ASSOCIATIVE" PROBLEMS which makes this the ideal exercise for me. So the problem became, in doing the exercise, to sit simply with the candle. And sit I did with the winds of Wuthering Heights howling AT BAY. Talk about not be able to Do. At least the winds were howling around my lower legs and not all up and over and around me.

This week's exercises as a whole were suprisingly affective for me. Because they were simple and direct for me, I was, after some initial mechanicalness, able to do them enough times throughout the day. The affect was the unearthing of some extremely unpleasant, though necessarily seen and felt, dreck of my own nothingness. This rates as a successful week for having gotten there. I cried, fussed, denied but ultimately laid claim to the whole stew and enunciated quite a bit of remorse in the process. Good stuff, all of this.

David:

Glad whatever said was of help. Perhaps an online-group discussion topic is forming out of this? Anyone? G. once said to one of the women of the Rope (his Parisian women's group) that a strong sex drive, properly channeled, could form the basis of strong inner development in the Work. (I'll try to find the exact quote [maybe, someone else remembers] ---- it was said to either Margaret Anderson or Solita Solano.) Certainly, there is a legacy of "sexy critters" attracted to the Work. A book could probably be written about that topic alone.

Anyway,what has always attracted me to the Work is its lack dogmatic directives concerning each individual's Path. G. said that we must verify things for ourselves, not do something simply because we're told to do it. Through observation, and inner weighing and balancing of our actions in relationship to what we can perceive of our Path do we come to what is personally Right or Wrong ---- and of course that changes. We are, after all, malfuntioning automobiles sent to the mechanics shop to get fixed. Each car has different problems, and no two cars can be fixed the same way. If we already thought of ourselves/our lives as okay as they are, we wouldn't be here as it is. There's beginning of freedom in the recognition of that.

Enough from me. Somebody else?

There has been an unusual level of awareness during hynogogic/daydreaming states all week. I am able to maintain a reasonably consistent awareness of myself within the state and make deliberate decisions which allow me to structure the dream rather than the dream taking control. Anyone else?

The above should read "hypnogogic/catnapping states". Daydreaming is something other.

I've been told that the term for what I am describing is "lucid dreaming".

Greg,

My association with the candle flame was also resistant; but for a different reason. This was one of the meditation exercise we practiced back in the day. It's a trigger for me.

Though I think I also remember O writing about it. I know he wrote about following the second hand on a watch.

Are we talking about appreciation of beauty or lust? Because lust seems to me a desire the the illusions of things. One can lust for a Corvette or a super model. One can also appreciate both. One can also depreciate both.

Of course it's easier to say the above as one gets older.

Applying more than one center is true attention. Mechanical attention only lasts as long as the spring is wound up. Or a stronger mechanical attention interfers.

Consider driving during an ice storm. Full attention is necessary. It must still drive the car, because it is much better at these things than any one center. It has been trained to drive. But the conditions require full attention. And the emotion is already there. . .

---

by Greg

Harry:

You're telling me, but you're not telling me about the candle flame exercise. Your language is cryptic. You're not letting me in.

As far as my personal attraction to physical beauty it would probably err on the side of lust, but that is not completely what I am talking about. It is a lust for obliteration by beauty (being "eaten" by it). From another viewpoint, what I perceive and experience as extreme physical beauty can put me on a knife's edge: I don't what to posess it or have congress with it, but my "innards" can be stunned and haunted by it (honestly, another way of being "eaten") The treatment, for me, is to restore self-remembrance and go into "sightless gaze". Then there is a chance for "being" with it, and perhaps to "eat".

Diminishment of the urge to merge? Well, at 44 (nearly five years ago) I experienced a marked increase. The intensification is something else. It IS something that provides me with Work. I don't know what this stuff was they called "sex-ed" in junior high --- but it never told me about this. I do know that in esoteric literature it IS confirmed as a herald to the merging with higher levels (if you are lucky enough to have that context --- otherwise one represses or acts on it.)

Greg

by David

Greg and Harry,
If its alright I'd like to share some thoughts and experiences on this topic of beauty.
I think we all agree that there is something objective in beauty, as opposed to lust which is very subjective, as you say well Harry, the "desire for the illusions of things." A philosopher-friend of mine once said, "Beauty is that which goes beyond itself." I take this to mean a kind of blossoming, which we might very well see in the flower's bloom -- a hint of its reaching outward beyond itself. Any kind of attraction might express, in essence, this idea of beauty, for if something attracts it seems it has extended beyond itself in some way -- attraction might be the primal scent of beauty itself.
Now, in what I've thought were real experiences of beauty, though rare, fleeting and too subtle for my awareness to really grasp, when gazing at some woman who has something special about her, this phenomena of the flower seems to apply too -- the perception and corresponding feeling of something within emerging outwards and, as it were, hovering closely above the physical form. This might be more simply put as an emanation of beauty. Its almost as if the physical form becomes more transparent, softer, maybe, though ever-so slightly, astral-like, finer. What makes this so interesting and so damned alluring is that this doesn't seem to be only a physical beauty that has slightly unveighled itself, but has qualities of the soul to it, that is, the difference between the beauty of body and beauty of soul begins to dissolve, and one is not sure whether this beauty is really of the body or not, at least, for me who is too attached to the physical beauty. Sometimes this can be perceived in women immediately, meaning, her objective beauty is more established or, more usually, it occurs in the excahnge of glances or gazes, in which I think the beholder of beauty reflects the beauty of the woman to herself whence in that moment this deeper beauty is seen.

Has anyone noticed that the women, as well as men, who are most attractive are ones romantically or even, and often especially, sexually involved with the opposite sex. Somehow it seems that beauty feeds and grows on feeling, knowing and recognizing its own beauty. This seems to be more natural and possible with the woman, or the feminine itself -- their beauty is objective, which the form of her body might even reflect, and they have the glorious right to know and love their beauty, to be consciously beautiful (though often a bunch of confusion gets involved and the physically attractive woman winds up conceited).
The more beauty is truly appreciated the more it uncovers itself. Even a kiss, a sensual touch, or a glance which recognizes beauty seems to make a woman more beautiful. I've noticed girls not so attractive to me become more so through these ways. Something alchemical seems to occur. This also means beauty is very seductive and demanding. Even in a strip bar money is required for the women to undress. And so with the aesthetic-spiritual or erotic-ethical beauty -- one must pay with selflessness and deeper insight.
I'd like to think that these ruminations are somehow connected with Keats' wondrous statement that "Truth is beauty and beauty is truth, and that is all ye need to know." Orage in another cryptic and wondrous aphorism says, "Common sense mellowed and experienced is wisdom, and wisdom in its ripeness is beauty." How I wish and fear to grasp these ideas. I can't seem to even get over their impact to be able to ponder them, but ponder them we must. But my love of beauty might suffer the delusions of the poet, of taint of the emotions and imagination -- something similar to what you said Greg, invovling a self-forgetful lust for beauty. Your thoughts here definitely resonated with me.
I'd hope that what I've said here might be useful. I've tried to articulate them so that our idea of beauty might be elevated, if indeed it needs to be, and thus serve as a source of inspiration and aspiration towards something higher, as you said, Greg, in relation to merging with higher levels.
Beauty seems to exist all around us, in the flowers, the sky, the gentility, grace and strength of animals, in our art and music, in the feminine, and of course, in each of us. Maybe if we can learn to apprecite objectively the beauty in other things, to see beyond the superficial, coarse and carnal (and maybe how even these things are confused aspirations of beauty), our own beauty might also emerge and even be revealed to us without vanity and self-love. Keats and Orage seem to have it figured out in the above statement.

Greg,

I've come to trust in my lucid dreams. I think I described a recent one in another post. It was clear to me in that one that I had "changed the past".

A three story house has been a common theme in many of my lucid dreams. Often I'm moving out of an old house and gathering what must go to the new one. It is also usually important what floor I'm on. The "old house" is often my grandfather's old farm house, in which I lived alone with my son for six of the first seven years of his life. It had three distinct floors.

In one recent lucid dream the walls had expanded so that they were no longer in touch with the floors, which remained suspended. It was very cold outside (often these feelings, like O describes, come from actual physical conditions). My son and I moved on to a new house. We invited my parents and brother to come with us, but they insisted on waiting in the snow outside.

I'm still pondering parts of that one.

David,

I think the film American Beauty dealt with what you are discussing very well. Suvari, the roses, the forbidden lust for the Lolita figure, etc.

Is the perception of beauty an event?

I enjoyed the event of Natalie Morales delivering the news this morning, because she is a gorgeous woman according to my conditioning. But she is also a controlled image: an image she has developed, but also an image MSNBC has refined. That image does not contain her husband or her child. The event of her beauty is used, almost as a seasoning, to make the event of the news more pleasant. Which is, then, used to sell insurance and automobiles.

I do not say that cynically. Rather that I think it is an important part of the Work to step outside of events. This is a way we can separate ourselves from the Law of Accidents. (Of course some events are under the Law of Fate. . .but I don't believe Natalie Morales is part of my Fate.)

Consider the cheering crowd at a sporting event. The beauty of a perfect play. The fan's elation. The physical sensation of the star who has just performed and feels that adulation pouring down. . .these "waves" of events. . .Is it feeding the Moon?

by Greg

Thank you both for both of your replies.

David: you remind me of my pre-Raphaelite past. Tennyson? Keats? Rossetti? et al. No one really talks about that stuff anymore. Thankyou for bringing that up.

HOWEVER that way of pursuing and seeing things began to turn for me. I found the rot underneath it all ("Every stick has two ends.") By age forty, exhausted by that kind of search, it was high time for me to begin an alignment with the Sun.

Beauty, contemplated, can become impressions food (see THE PHILOKALIA and THE ENNEADS of Plotinus). But as such, is onlysuch, as refined energy received --- not pictures or images. The sightless gaze neutralises the playing field for me. This is important because I tend to put beautiful people, places and things into a seperate and special category. I tend towards idolatry in those matters. For me this ends in food for the Moon and therefore worthless in terms of Work.(except, of course, for the friction it can help create when I am able to maintain consciousness of what's going on) The Work is bottomline an aescetic (as opposed to aesthetic) practise. Everything seen in blazing white sunlight , as much as I can bear. This has ruined my appetite for many things and has given me greater clarity as a replacement. The roseate view of my pre-Raphaelite past is now forever singed. Evereything must be paid for.

Harry, thanks for sharing the dream. Are the floors related to the storey you are operating from in your own three-storied house?

Greg,

Yes. I remember one lucid dream in particular in which I was trapped in the basement. Upon reflection it became clear that the message was that in the situation I was dealing with I was trapped in the basement of my house. . .sex and eating as G. said.

In the most recent that I breifly described I was sitting in a rocker on the third floor reading a book. The room was empty except for me and the rocker and the book. And it was time to leave. I knew it was time to leave but had no urgency.

Harry:

Very interesting. The minute I read about your house dreams I immediately thought "Oh, a Work dream." From a Jungian viewpoint all houses are about body or self. I believe this is reiiterated by Maurice Nicoll in COMMENTARIES.

I am always moved when you reference your son. Your concern for him and his welfare is clearly of great importance to you. Unfortunately, the presence of that kind of concern seems to be little in evidence these days. Good for you.

Greg,

My son is my work partner.

I've raised him alone since he was 1 and 1/2. He's now away working on his Ph.D. at Notre Dame.

I never asked him to study G. At one point I gave him Shah's Learning How to Learn. Probably changed his life. Of course the films we watched, the music we listened to, the books on the shelf were all open to him. I've also always fasted (been full vegan for advent and lent, per G's descriptions). Once he was about 7 or 8 he chose to do that, as well. Never made him. And earlier in his life I always cooked him other things when necessary.

The old statement "By teaching you shall be taught" certainly applies. His eyes have brought many things in a different light for me.

Harry and Greg:
Thanks for your replies.
Harry, I'm not sure how you mean American Beauty deals with these things on beauty I was talking about. It's been a while since I saw it and don't recall clearly enough to be able to comment. I know, though, that the movie left a very unfavorable impression on me, yet nonetheless interesting in the way it seemed to reflect our twisted perversion and contradiction of ideals. I saw it as a sympton of our, especially American, confused and ambiguous culture. But I shouldn't be saying anything without backing it up with content.
Your questioning of my sense or apprecition of beauty as an event under the law of accidents left me with an unpleasant feeling in my gut. Probably means such experienes are only "food for the moon", and all the while I could sense their hoodwinking seductiveness and lack of substance. The 'philosopher' in me, I suppose, was trying to preserve and articulate what I felt to be the essence or purity of the experience, and how it may serve a spiritual end. Indeed, as you say Greg, such experiences are only food, some finer energy to stimulate and help us be more awake.
"To go beyond events." I definitely agree with you here Harry. Your examples of our beloved gatherings of sport, theater, etc. are very good. Whatever little individuality one has becomes all the more mechanical, all the more absorbed and lost in the collective appetites of man, or, as for the famed actor, lost in the adualtion and praise of others, trapping him more in a contingent and, often false, image of himself. Yes, I can see, and from experience sense, how these events of becoming a single or collective object is "food for the moon." Thank you.
Greg, thank you for the idea, as I mentioned above, of beauty being a food-impression. Your remarks suggest to me that I not search for beauty but remain open to it. Again, I believe the experience of beauty is a source of inspiration and maybe even self-remembering in some way, but not an end in itself.
Please explain to me why you say "the Work is bottomline an ascetic practice, as opposed to an aesthetic one." Maybe I'm taking what you mean too far, but, as I see it, the ascetic part is in denying yourself what 'it' likes, in order to be free from it. But, as Kierkegaard says, the religious or spiritual mode of existence transfigures the aesthetic, so that eventually the aesthetic is seen in a new light, it becomes something greater, something also spiritual. In some ways this is the same idea as the Vedantist who says God exists in everything. Needless to say, it is true that a lot of asceticism is needed before one gets to that point, where everything is a luminous reflection and manifestation of the divine.
One thing I love about Gurdjieff's teaching is that, like Buddha's, he never pushes asceticism to an extreme, and if so, only temporarily. The ascetic and the asethetic always in the balance of each having their proper time and place. But I could be wrong here.
Harry, your comments on you and your son are wonderful. May your relationship with him be more and more a blessing.

David,

Consider the scene in American Beauty with all of the American Beauty Roses, and Mena Suvari on the bed with the appropriately placed blossoms, and the Lolita cheerleader lust. . .

Today's "pere aeternum" (sp?) Eternal Youth?

Remember that active-passive-reconciling is an every changing triangle. What is active in one manifestation is passive in another. So what is mechanical on one level can be tranformed to active on another.

We must feed the moon. Both the big one and our own. Paraphrase: The man without a personality is useless.

David:

I say the Work is bottomline aescetic because it requires a constant evaluation and questioning of our essentially glamourous (illusory) existence. While it does not insist that a proscribed, dogmatic way, is the answer, it does ask for a rigourous self-honesty: What gets in the way of my awakening?

I like your "blossoming" image . . . you look at some one or something in contemplation and the stunning effected by the Beauty exhibited causes a blossoming of the heart and mind to seek what the Laws are behind it--- an ongoingness.

I know this well.

Harry:

AMERICAN BEAUTY is about being trapped in the lair of Venus and not moving towards the Beautiful. That is lust, and is an entirely different topic----totally legit on its own terms, but has nothing to do with what is being talked about here.

Is an attractive, beautiful woman always an object of Lust? I find that strange.

Harry:
I think I know what you're saying now in relation to the movie American Beauty -- beauty as the fountain of eternal youth? If you like could you tell me what it is you see positive in these images you give here.
I hadn't thought or do I remeber a connection made between Personality and the feeding of the moon and I like that you point out the positive side to this. It makes more clear the necessity for the separation or being-discrimination between Essence and Personality -- the former feeding a higher source and the latter a lower, the moon, both of which are necessary individually and cosmically. I speculate that the more Essence and Personality are distinguished and developed accordingly, the more favorable the conditions in the higher and lower worlds will be. For it seems that, in the true sense, Personality is the medium of Essence, as Orage says, "the truth for other men", by which we can communicate what is more real in ways others can understand, or, as G. says, "to play the role that is appropriate for every time and circumstance," -- something like that.

Greg:
Yes, the asceticism you point to of "rigorous self-honesty" is indeed basic and most necessary -- without it nothing new can happen. Thank you for that very important definition.
Your comments on my comments of the experience of beauty bring something more to light for me. "Ongoingness," to look beyond, indeed seems the purpose of beauty and in some sense is beauty itself. I like, though, that you place this looking beyond in a more psycho-cosmological sense. Rather than staying with the contemplation and illumination of beauty in the particular object, this beauty is calling from beyond itself for us to seek this beyond out, which I take to mean the laws and nature of reality itself, or of the reality of this present experience. The beauty is but an instrument.

Saar:
My last comments here seem to connect up with the quote you gave from Bennett which I like a great deal: ..."Beauty is superhuman. It is an attribute of the demiurge. He creates beauty because he loves beauty..."
I don't know if this is where Bennett is getting it from, but my immediate association is with Gnostic cosmology. The demiurge (the 'half-maker') was born of Sophia, the feminine side of God. She wanted to create a being like herself and did so without permission from God. As a result, this being, the demiurge, was imperfect, Sophia was ashamed and the demiurge, possessing some power of God's, created the world, though, being imperfect created it imperfectly, one mistake of which was that the spirit in man was trapped in matter.
Because the demiurge still carries with him, to some extent, the pure power of the Spirit, beauty could then be an imperfect manifestation of the perfect laws or inner-workings of Nature, hence, seduction would be the veighling and unveighling of them at the same time. If we take beauty in the Greek sense to be the the presence of symmetry, proportion, order, etc. in its appearane, and, for the body, being balanced, flexible, self-attuned, coordinatied, etc. then maybe it is an approximation of some divine perfection. This wild and glorious imagination of the demiurge still carries with it the perfect will of God, just as the imagination of the child is, to some extent, sub-consciously informed by the reality of the world around him and even above him.

But why does Sophia want to create a being like herself, which might be the same question as why the demiurge loves beauty? This seems to be the crucial question in this cosmology. Is it vanity, self-love, or is Her beauty so objective and real that it can't resist the impulse to be seen or shared, and by none other than her, since there's really no one else? Why is that most beautiful women, and I guess men, always seem to have a romantic partner? Again, is it becuase beauty cannot remain self-contained, can't exist without the eye of the beholder? Even with my rambling, anyone have any thoughts here? At any rate, thank you Saar for this very stimulating quote.

David:

I do like the questions you posit and I am going to have to thinkfeel about them further.

I would add to my term "ongoingness" a tandem state of "inflowingness".
How's that? Like the title of that Joseph Campbell book: The Inner Reaches of Outer Space.

Rudolph Steiner said it best about me (and I know this isn't an Anthroposophical forum, but . . .) "When the ancient Greeks beheld physical beauty in another human being, something shuddered deep within them."

I really can't put it better myself --- that's it for me

Would there be life on earth without the moon?

A man must be equal to life, first. Form moon in himself. Then "eat it".

We must perform our obligations. (being obligarian strivings (sp?)) We need to feed the Earth, Sun, and Moon. Later, higher things on the food chain. (Chart of Hydrogens.)

To me this is part of being a good householder.

Greg,

While there is certainly Lust involved in American Beauty, plus the "being trapped" there are other aspects, as well.

I think the choice of title and the roses is crucial in this. American Beauty roses, plus the American Beauty (Miss America) combined with the cheerleader. . .pulls these various images of beauty together. The Lust is something Spacey's character succumbs to, but isn't necessary. I think we must see the beauty of Mena Suvari and the roses, etc. in order to feel the disgust we do at Spacey's character.

But this is probably only incidentally connected with The Work.

Harry:

I feel disinterest towards both of those characters. Neither interests me. The movie doesn't really interest me. Sorry. You like it and I don't. So I guess that's where we are.

I have been trying in this discussion to offer a possible explanation to the hold physical beauty has. As Ian was talking about earlier: what the physical beauty is reflecting for me. There is very little reflecting for me in Lust, just automatic down-pull.

I'm also a bit wary when somebody is telling me that "we" collectively must feel such-and-such about something happening in a work of art. All I can do is tell what I am feeling from it. And that constantly changes.

I do understand what you're saying about feeding the moon (et al). And I like the way you put it. It made me see it from a different angle.

Theme - Sensing

"When walking, the practitioner is aware, 'I am walking'; when standing, is aware, 'I am standing'; when sitting, is aware, 'I am sitting'; when lying down, is aware, 'I am lying down.' In whatever position one's body happens to be, one is aware of the position of the body. When one is going forward or backward, one applies one's full awareness to one's going forward or backward. When one looks in front or looks behind, bends down or stands up, one also applies full awareness to what one is doing. One applies full awareness to wearing the robe or carrying the alms bowl. When one eats or drinks, chews or savors the food, one applies full awareness to all this. When passing excrement or urinating, one applies full awareness to this. When one walks, stands, lies down, sleeps or wakes up, speaks or is silent, one shines his awareness on all this." So said the Buddha.

Full Body Sensing - Take a comfortable position and become aware of your feet. Imagine that you are being filled with a warm, thick, honey like liquid and that it is slowly filling your body, starting from the feet and moving up through your legs, the pelvis, the torso, down into the arms and hands, then into the head. Be aware of the sense of gravity pulling your body towards the ground. Be aware of the position of your limbs and back. Strive to maintain an awareness of Sensing in the whole body.

The Great Heart Sensing Exercise - Take a comfortable position and simply be aware of the sensations of the heart beating within the chest and the pressure of the pulse throughout the body, arms and legs.

Daily Life Sensing - when washing dishes, sense the hands; when walking, sense the feet; when writing or typing, sense the fingers; when reading, sense the eyes; when sitting, sense the buttocks; when talking, sense the face.

I AM Exercise - One intones out loud or silently, depending on the situation, "I AM", and tries to Sense a reverberation or flow of energy in the solar plexus.

Evening exercise: While deeply sensing your body, Ponder, without expecting an answer, "Can I exist without Sensation?"

by Greg

Several hours after receiving these exercises and attempting the "Buddha I am" awareness and the honey filling I had a capsule of extra-awareness. I say capsule because so many things came together and happened concentrated in one innocuous place.

I was walking home from the grocery finishing a popsicle and dropped the stick in a trashcan as I passed it. In that moment I felt the habituation of it. I felt My Training. A voice asked me "And why didn't you throw it on the ground?" And the answer was "I am well-trained." I felt that training muscularly, emotionally and mentally in an instant. All together. Civilized. While some habits are "good" (this being one from an ordinary context) the feeling of being so clearly being locked into a pattern was momentarily depressing.

I physically shook my hand out hard and shook my head hard. Returned to center and paid attention to my breathing.

Greg.

by Greg

Again, yesterday, another awareness of My Training. This time an inner detachment took place instantaneously where I was able to witness my sternum pop without an identification. Missing was the slight revulsion to this rare happening --- because it doesn't really need to be there. The revulsion is a conditioned Cultural response (probably with Puritanical underpinnings)

I've found myself returning to the body over the past 4 days with a sense of regret.
Each return reinforces the sense of helplessness with my identification with 'life'
I understand with my head that this regret is just another identification (and this helps)

I'm attracted to, and sense the legitimacy of, 'being present in my body', and wonder at the seductive power of 'sleep' which produces the opposite.
But I'm pleased to keep going

Absolutely no luck with the Heart sensing exercise. Perhaps a fear. I once had an attack of tachyardia which made this a remembered experience.

by Faye

Noticing that when attention is on the body, sensing the feet, the fingers, nose or whatever that there is a different kind of relationship to myself. The attention illuminates something, a part of my self that is usually in the dark to my consciousness. There are two major challenges for me, one to gather enough attention to sense (contra distraction) and the other is be willing (contra fear and judgment) to sense. The distractions usually are that my mind is too busy doing other things. The fear might be of seeing my enslavement or finding some disease, or generally having to acknowledge something that I don’t want to see.

In some few moments when I am able to withhold distraction, fear and judgment and sense the body, sometimes there arises gratitude for the miracle of it.

by Greg

Like Harry, I didn't have much luck with the heart exercise. Then all of a sudden (after a particularly long bike ride) I am sitting resting and I say to myself "Go into 'Great Heart'" and bango!, one huge complete pulse throb all the way down to my toes accompanied with an inner tone (don't know which one but below middle C, like a pluck on a bass ---low and fibrous)

Morning exercise: Sit quietly in meditation. Relax the three centers. Deeply sense the planetary body and follow the breath. Use a sightless gaze and soundless sound to absorb impressions without identifying, labeling or judging them.

During the day:

-Search for a glimpse of the significance behind repetitive compulsive strivings, attitudes, traits, roles, chief features.
-Meet desires with equanimity. Visualize them as grasshoppers hopping lightly onto the lotus pad of presence.
-Enjoy the joy of marveling at the splendor all around.
-Watch the flow of emotions, the rise, the fall, ...
-Watch the flow of thoughts, the rise, the fall, ...
-Watch the flow of sensations, the rise, the fall, ...
-Maintain lamness by following every movement of the right arm.

Evening exercise: Return to deep sensing of the planetary body and following the breath. Evoke a deep wish to Be. Repeat inwardly with each exhale - "I wish to Be."

Could you explain a bit more how it should be done and what "glimse of significance" mean? Some example could be helpful.

Could you explain a bit more how it should be done and what "glimpse of significance" mean? Some example could be helpful.

Good question, Glad you picked up on it.

This question of the why and how of suffering is the core teaching of the Gurdjieff Work - Intentional Suffering. This is a delicate subject.
From my website:

> It is the transformation of negative emotions into positive emotions. (TFW221)
>
> Intentional Suffering - The Second Conscious Shock
>
> "Intentional Suffering is the intentional acceptance of all suffering which is a part of all existence. To prepare us for this type of Holy Affirmation in our daily lives we are assigned special exercises including seeking out or welcoming suffering in all its forms, especially those forms which are overlooked or moved into different categories, such as "anxiety", "fear" or "depression". It is sometimes useful as a preparation to induce self-imposed suffering but this is to be abandoned when we learn how to meet the normal lot of humanity's suffering." (Paul Beidler)
> "We understand the ordinary pursuits of our lives responding to desires to be educated, well thought of, useful, admired, superior, wealthy or spiritual, as examples of Holy Denyings. We try to meet these denyings with our conscious efforts in our search which we call Holy Affirming. Both are of equal substance and importance." (Paul Beidler)
> ***
> The Second Conscious Shock is summarized by Gurdjieff in the Holy Affirming Prayer or the Holy Equation that is given in Beelzebub's Tales. It is based on the working of the two fundamental sacred cosmic laws called the sacred 'Heptaparaparshinokh' and the sacred 'Triamazikamno;' the Law of Seven and the Law of Three. The Second Conscious Shock follows a law conformable process and as such can be considered to be a formula or equation for transforming energy. We call this formula the Holy Equation. This may be what Gurdjieff was referring to when he mentioned the Sly Man's Pill.

The Second Conscious Shock is one of the great 'secrets' of the Work and knowledge of its working is usually kept hidden behind the closed doors at the top of the heirarchies of some of the various Fourth Way schools. The nature of the Second Conscious Shock is deliberately kept obscure in the books written about the Work. Ouspensky says that it involves transforming Negative Emotions into Positive Emotions.

"The effort which creates this 'shock' must consist in work on the emotions, in the transformation and transmutation of the emotions. This transmutation of the emotions will then help the transmutation of Si- 12 in the human organism. No serious growth, that is, no growth of higher bodies within the organism, is possible without this transmutation." (ISOM 195)

According to the Enneagram of the Three Foods given in In Search of the Miraculous by Ouspensky, the Second Conscious Shock is necessary for the transformation of our Food, Air and Impressions into higher energies. Self Remembering or being present to oneself is another aspect of the Second Conscious Shock since our ability to Self Remember grows with our ability to apply the Second Conscious Shock.

"There are two different things under different laws: 1) the organic body; 2) the psychic body. The organic body obeys its laws. It only wishes to satisfy its needs - eating, sleeping, sex. It knows nothing else. It wishes nothing else. It is a real animal. One must feel it as an animal. One must feel it as a stranger. One must subdue it, train it and make it obey, instead of obeying it."

"The psychic body knows something other than the organic body. It has other needs, other aspirations, other desires. It belongs to a different world. It is of a different nature. There is a conflict between these two bodies - one wishes, the other does not. It is a struggle which one must reinforce voluntarily. By our work; by our will. It is this fight which exists naturally, which is the specific state of man, which we must use to create a third thing, a third state different from the other two, which is the Master, which is united with something else."

"The task is therefore something precise which reinforces this struggle, because by struggle and ONLY by struggle can a new possibility of being be born. For instance, my organism is in the habit of smoking. That is its need. I do not wish to smoke - I eliminate this habit. The need is always there but I refuse to satisfy it. There is a struggle, a conscious voluntary struggle which calls the third force. It is the third force which will be the factor - "I" - which will conciliate and make the equilibrium."

"The body is an animal. The psyche is a child. One must educate the one and the other. Take the body, make it understand that it must obey, not command. Put each one in its place. One must know oneself. One must see what goes on. Take a task which is within your possibility, very small to begin with. On eating. On a habit. Each one knows himself and can find a task; it is his interior thing, a will which is opposed to a need and creates struggle."

"The only possibility of creating a second body is by an accumulation of a different substance. The only aim is that everything should serve this aim." (Gurdjieff)
"This binary is every person who looks into himself. We may live by these transitory dimensions, giving ourselves up to their current and allowing them to carry us away. But to the whole of this process going on within us apart from our will, to all these "it wishes" we may oppose our "I wish", bind together yes and no, provoke a dispute between two opposites, a struggle of two principles, and neutralize them by the tertiary. A great dispute, if it is not purposeless, must give a result, a conclusion and an effect, and then four elements will be available: yes, no, dispute, result; that is, the transmutation of the binary into the quaternary." (Gurdjieff, Enneagram Lecture)
"In other words, every wish of the planetary body is taken as undesirable for their higher divine part which has to be coated and perfected, and therefore all three-centered beings of our Great Megaloscosmos constantly carry on a relentless struggle against the wishes of their planetary bodies so that there should be formed in them, in this struggle from the what is called ‘Disputekrialnian-friction,’ those sacred crystallizations from which their higher Divine being-part arises and is perfected in them."
"In this constant struggle of theirs, the equilibrating harmonizing principle is their second being-body, which in their own individual law of Triamazikamno represents the neutralizing source; and therefore this second being-part always remains indifferent to their mechanical manifestations, but for all their active manifestations it always tends according to the second-grade cosmic law ‘Urdekhplifata’ to unite with those desires of which there are more whether in one or the other of the two mentioned opposite being-parts." (BT p. 802)
"Consequently, like all three-centered beings of our Great Universe, we men existing on the Earth, owing to the presence in us also of the factors for engendering the divine impulse of Objective Conscience, must always inevitably struggle with the two quite opposite functioning's arising and proceeding in our common presence, the results of which are always sensed by us either as "desires" or as "nondesires."
"And so, only he who consciously assists the process of this inner struggle, and consciously assists the "nondesires" to prevail over the "desires," behaves in accordance with the Being of our Common Father Creator Himself, whereas he who consciously assists the contrary only increases His sorrow." (BT p. 373)
"Every such conscious being well knows that his planetary body inexorably demands what his divine soul-body must not desire; and hence it is that they constantly engage in merciless combat with the desires of their planetary bodies, in order that in the struggle there may be formed in them from the friction substances of the divine Helkdonis, which is necessary and useful to their positive and divine soul-bodies."

"And as regards the desires of Kesdjan, that is, of the second body of the being, all conscious beings having understanding, very well understand that this body of theirs, which appears for their own Law of Triamonia to be the neutralizing source, must always remain indifferent in its mechanical manifestations; and as regards its active manifestations, this body, on the basis of the cosmic Law of Urdehaphat, always strives to desire only those desires of which there are more in one or the other of these two bodies, both opposite in their nature." (Unpublished BT, Chapter 39, page 24)

Without self-love a man can do nothing. There are two qualities of self-love. One is a dirty thing. The other, an impulse, love of the real "I". Without this, it is impossible to move. An ancient Hindu saying - "Happy is he who loves himself, for he can love me." I see from Mme. S's report that no one has understood me. One needs fire. Without fire, there will never be anything. This fire is suffering, voluntary suffering, without which it is impossible to create anything. One must prepare, must know what will make one suffer and when it is there, make use of it. Only you can prepare, only you know what makes you suffer, makes the fire which cooks, cements, crystallizes, DOES. Suffer by your defects, in your pride, in your egoism. Remind yourself of the aim. Without prepared suffering there is nothing, for by as much as one is conscious, there is no more suffering. No further process, nothing. That is why with your conscience you must prepare what is necessary. You owe to nature. The food you eat which nourishes your life. You must pay for these cosmic substances. You have a debt, an obligation, to repay by conscious work. Do not eat like an animal but render to nature for what she has given you, nature, your mother. Work - a drop, a drop, a drop - accumulated during days, months, years, centuries, perhaps will give results. (Gurdjieff. Meeting, December 7, 1941)

Gurdjieff teaches that suffering is an inescapable and indeed necessary and essential part of life and the process of Transformation.

Fourth Striving: "The striving from the beginning of their existence to pay for their arising and their individuality as quickly possible, in order afterwards to be free to lighten as much as possible the Sorrow of our Common Father."

Buddha teaches that the cause of suffering is desire. Eliminate desire and suffering ceases.

Buddha also teaches Compassion. We cannot have compassion without having suffered. Having compassion implies at least the remembrance and understanding of suffering. Suffering is an essential prerequisite. We need to approach suffering in a new way, with the right attitude.

Gurdjieff teaches about the law of three, the law of the transformation of energy - the higher blends with the lower to actualize the middle; the Holy Affirming force blends with the Holy Denying force to actualize the Holy Reconciling force. Notice that Gurdjieff calls it the Holy Denying force. That signifies that it is required and essential and divinely ordained to exist.

The Denying force is all our mechanical, habitual, instinctive and self-important reactions to life. These manifest as our compulsive strivings, attitudes, traits, roles, and chief features.

Our usual strategy is to try and avoid suffering - through justification, greed, anger, revenge, spitefulness, alcohol, drugs...
Opposing a Denying force with another Denying force only leads to a downward spiral into resentment, cynicism, hopelessness, self-hatred, depression, alcohol, drugs...

All these things are called negative emotions or suffering.

From my website:

> In the river of life suffering is not intentional. In conscious life suffering is intentional and of great value. To bear the manifestation of others is a big thing. The last thing for a man.
> Intentional Suffering Categories

> The essence of the idea of Karma-Yoga is to meet with unpleasant things equally with pleasant things. That is, in practicing Karma-Yoga, one does not seek always to avoid unpleasant things, as people ordinarily do. Life is to be met with non-identifying. When this is possible, life becomes one's teacher; in no other sense can life become a teacher, for life taken as itself is meaningless, but taken as an exercise it becomes a teacher. It is not life that is a teacher, but one's relation through non-identifying makes it become a teacher. Nothing can change being so much as this practice - namely, to take the unpleasant things in life as an exercise. (Maurice Nicoll, Commentaries, Vol. 1)

The following list of Holy Denying Sufferings and their Companions is intended to be used in conjunction with the exercises based on the Holy Equation.

These are only a suggested starting point and Seekers are encouraged to discover and add new categories and specific situations relevant to their personal situation.

•anger - agreement
•irritations - equanimity
•impatience -patience
•annoyances - placid
•fears - courage
•depression - happiness
•anxieties - resignation
•vanity - modest •jealousy - trust
•hate - like

Pondering on Intentional Suffering

•Who is Suffering?
•Why is Suffering necessary?
•Why does His Endlessness Suffer?
•How can I alleviate the Suffering of His Endlessness?
•What is my most disliked Suffering?
•What Sufferings do I habitually indulge in?
•In the practice of tolerance, is one's enemy the best teacher?

Instead we have to learn a new attitude and intention towards suffering, one that doesn't seek to eliminate suffering but instead accepts it, uses it and transforms it creatively, Intentionally and Affirmatively

The Denying force is an essential component of the working of the law of three. We have to learn to bring into the equation the Affirming force of Intentional Bearing or Enduring of Suffering.

In terms of Alchemy, the Denying force of suffering is the 'heat' that effects the Great Work of Transformation. The 'heat' is the significance and purpose of our Denying force. Mr Beidler called this process the Holy Equation.

From my website;

The Holy Equation - The Holy Affirming Prayer

Holy-Affirming,
Holy-Denying,
Holy-Reconciling,
Transubstantiate in me,
For my Being.

"This is a prayer given to us. In it I have found what I call the Holy Equation which provides us with a basic pattern for most of our work. Holy Denying equals our inherited mechanical "myself" manifested by our habits, traits, thoughts, feelings and actions in sleep. Holy Affirming is our conscious effort to accept, endure and to meet with objectivity all our Holy Denyings. Holy Reconciling is the resultant of them both leading automatically to a Transubstantiation. By self-observation we learn to recognize accurately our Holy Denyings to which we then eventually apply our Holy Affirming."

"We understand the ordinary pursuits of our lives responding to desires to be educated, well thought of, useful, admired, superior, wealthy or spiritual, as examples of Holy Denyings. We try to meet these denyings with our conscious efforts in our search which we call Holy Affirming. Both are of equal substance and importance." (Paul Beidler)

"This binary is every person who looks into himself. We may live by these transitory dimensions, giving ourselves up to their current and allowing them to carry us away. But to the whole of this process going on within us apart from our will, to all these "it wishes" we may oppose our "I wish", bind together yes and no, provoke a dispute between two opposites, a struggle of two principles, and neutralize them by the tertiary. A great dispute, if it is not purposeless, must give a result, a conclusion and an effect, and then four elements will be available: yes, no, dispute, result; that is, the transmutation of the binary into the quaternary." (Gurdjieff, Enneagram Lecture)

Gurdjieff did the world a great service when he wrote Beelzebub's Tales and included in it the Holy Affirming Prayer or as it was called by Paul Beidler, the Holy Equation. Unfortunately, not all of his students were taught this Legominism or even understood and grasped its significance if they were taught it. This is evident by the current state of affairs of division and secrecy in the Gurdjieff Community worldwide.

The Holy Equation could be said to be the Sly Man's Pill, since all exercises in the Work are based on this formula. Let me repeat that - All exercises in the Work are based on this formula. There are no exceptions; if there are, then the exercise is defective. When you understand how this exercise works, you will see that ALL spiritual practices, from ALL traditions, from ALL times, are based on it. When you understand how this exercise works, you will be able to Work on yourself any where, any time, creating your own exercises on the spur of the moment as required by the situation. You will no longer be dependant on the need for a teacher who resides at the top of a bureaucratic heirarchy to dispense exercises based on the degree of conformity and subservience of his pupils. Rather, Groups of Seekers can meet and share equitably their experiences and discoveries using this formula, provided they have a sound knowledge of Gurdjieff's philosophy as presented in his books.

The Holy Equation is based on the Law of Three as formulated by Gurdjieff - "The higher blends with the lower to actualize the middle, which becomes lower for the next higher or higher for the previous lower." This is the fundamental formula for all energy transformation in the universe. It is also the basis for all spiritual transformation which seeks to develop the higher energies required for self-realization and resonant contact with the Source of all energy.

The Holy Equation acts as a shock in the octave of evolution. It is the formula for the 1st and 2nd Conscious Shocks. As we know from studying the Ray of Creation, the shocks are composed of three notes of a Lateral Octave, each note representing one of the forces of the Law of Three. The Holy Equation, being based on the Law of Three, has the structure required for supplying the two Conscious Shocks.

Whenever anybody attempts to practice any spiritual exercise, they will meet with resistance from their Denying Force, which arises from their inherited instincts, drives, desires, laziness and egoism. The persistence to persevere with the exercises against the opposition of the Denying Forces is the Affirming Force of spiritual aspiration. The result of this meeting of Affirming and Denying forces is the Reconciling force. The Reconciling force is the medium of spiritual growth and its production is the primary aim of all spiritual practices. This aim is not always acknowledged or even understood and the secondary effects of the practices may be mistakenly claimed to be the primary purpose of the practice.

Whenever you observe a Denying force, resist it with an Affirmation. An Affirmation may be as simple as counting to ten when you are angry or Sensing your feet. A successful Reconciliation will curb the expression of the Denying force and the energy thus saved will result in a coating on your higher being bodies, in an increase in your Objective Reason of Understanding and a state of Being characterized by an inner calm unaffected by the turbulence of life. You may even see the Clear Light of His Endlessness suffusing the universe with its unobtrusive radiance and may even come to realize the ultimate datum of Objective Reason which is that you are that Light being conscious of itself.

"Try to understand that resistance is according to law. If there is no resistance, there can be no struggle; there can be no new energy. Without production of new energy, there can be no possible contact with higher levels in ourselves. Struggle has to be accepted as the only means that we have for producing energy. Each time that we have a little new possibility is that a spark of another kind of energy has linked us with a different level of ourselves. Every moment of our asleep life we are like a man shut in the basement of a very big house who has no idea there is anything else than that dark, bad smelling basement he is used to. As soon as that spark of energy is used up, he is bound to find himself again in that basement. Struggle is necessary - there is resistance - and then I affirm more." (Inside a Question: Works of Henriette Lannes, Pupil of G.I. Gurdjieff, p. 200)

"The essence of the idea of Karma-Yoga is to meet with unpleasant things equally with pleasant things. That is, in practising Karma-Yoga, one does not seek always to avoid unpleasant things, as people ordinarily do. Life is to be met with non-identifying. When this is possible, life becomes one's teacher; in no other sense can life become a teacher, for life taken as itself is meaningless, but taken as an exercise it becomes a teacher. It is not life that is a teacher, but one's relation through non-identifying makes it become a teacher. Nothing can change being so much as this practise - namely, to take the unpleasant things in life as an exercise." (Nicoll, Commentaries, Vol. 1)

Enduring suffering is connected to the non-Identification with negative emotions. The root of Identification is Self-Importance. We have to learn to feel and experience the 'heat' of our suffering without taking it personally. Objective consciousness.

The first step in this process is self-observation - getting to know our habitual reactions, thoughts, roles, traits, cheif features, and sufferings without Identifying with them.

The second step is Affirming against our Denying forces with various strategies such as by not expressing them or acting them out, or by bringing other affirmative actions to bear on them, so that we eventually, slowly, begin to experience the resulting Reconciling forces of positive emotions - joy, faith, hope, love, compassion, remorse of conscience.

The past weekly programs have given Affirming exercises, as will future ones. My website also has some suggested exercises:

The Holy Equation Exercise - The Fundamental Key To Inner Work

The Holy Equation is the basic pattern of all Inner Work and is based on the Law of Three - "The higher blends with the lower to actualize the middle, which becomes lower for the next higher or higher for the previous lower." The middle is the Reconciling energy which is coated on the Higher Being Bodies. This process is spoken of by Gurdjieff early in his Teaching career in the unpublished Enneagram Lecture, which was the basis for Chapter 14 of In Search of the Miraculous by Ouspensky :

"A great dispute, if it is not purposeless, must give a result, a conclusion and an effect, and then four elements will be available: yes, no, dispute, result; that is, the transmutation of the binary into the quaternary. That is the first half of the formula. The second part of it speaks for itself and thereby points out the direction of the solution."

Gurdjieff makes many references to this process in Beelzebub's Tales. Here is one of them :

"In other words, every wish of the planetary body is taken as undesirable for their higher divine part which has to be coated and perfected, and therefore all three-centered beings of our Great Megaloscosmos constantly carry on a relentless struggle against the wishes of their planetary bodies so that there should be formed in them, in this struggle from the what is called ‘Disputekrialnian-friction,’ those sacred crystallizations from which their higher Divine being-part arises and is perfected in them."

"In this constant struggle of theirs, the equilibrating harmonizing principle is their second being-body, which in their own individual law of Triamazikamno represents the neutralizing source; and therefore this second being-part always remains indifferent to their mechanical manifestations, but for all their active manifestations it always tends according to the second-grade cosmic law ‘Urdekhplifata’ to unite with those desires of which there are more whether in one or the other of the two mentioned opposite being-parts. (BT p. 802)

This is the Holy Equation, also known as the Holy Affirming Prayer, from Beelzebub's Tales :

Holy-Affirming,
Holy-Denying,
Holy-Reconciling,
Transubstantiate in me,
For my Being.

"This is a prayer given to us. In it I have found what I call the Holy Equation which provides us with a basic pattern for most of our work. Holy Denying equals our inherited mechanical "myself" manifested by our habits, traits, thoughts, feelings and actions in sleep. Holy Affirming is our conscious effort to accept, endure and to meet with objectivity all our Holy Denyings. Holy Reconciling is the resultant of them both leading automatically to a Transubstantiation. By self-observation we learn to recognize accurately our Holy Denyings to which we then eventually apply our Holy Affirming."

"We understand the ordinary pursuits of our lives responding to desires to be educated, well thought of, useful, admired, superior, wealthy or spiritual, as examples of Holy Denyings. We try to meet these denyings with our conscious efforts in our search which we call Holy Affirming. Both are of equal substance and importance." (Paul Beidler)

Step by Step Explanation

1. Observing a Holy Denying force of desire or suffering : During our daily life we will experience situations and desires that cause suffering. The basis of suffering is the Holy Denying Force of the planetary body, as manifested through its urges, instincts, desires, wishes, and psychological and social drives. Some of these are attributable to Kundabuffer or our inherent and acquired egoism and personality. Other Denying Forces may even derive from Essence. Some examples are given above and on this page.

When, by Self Observation, we notice or recognize the manifestation of a Holy Denying suffering or trait in the course of daily life, we need to acknowledge its presence by naming it, such as 'this is anger' or 'this is a denying force', etc. We need to Sense its energy in our body. We need to feel its emotional expression. We need to observe the thoughts that accompany it and justify it. In the beginning we may need to allow the Denying force to express itself in action in order to observe all its characteristics, but the ultimate goal is the non-expression of the negativity.

We are a living representation of the Law of Three and by this first step we are experiencing one of the expressions or terms, the Denying one, of the holy equation of energy transformation according to the Law of Three.

2. Holy Affirming of the energy spent by the Holy Denying force of desire or suffering : There are several aspects to this step of the equation, which involves bringing in the second expression or term of the equation, the Affirming one.

One way of Affirming this Holy Denying suffering is to acknowledge that the Holy Denying force is a law conformable and necessary aspect of the universe created by His Endlessness.

Another aspect of Affirmation of the Denying energy is to channel the energy into another activity. We can use the energy to exercise self-restraint to prevent the manifestation the Denying force. We can accept or bear the suffering without complaint. We can employ an Affirmation exercise such as Sensing a part of the body or repeating a mantra or verbal affirmation as suggested on the Affirmation Exercise page.

3. Holy Reconciled Transubstantiation of the energies of Affirming and Denying : This step is the third and final part of the equation of the transformation of energy according to the Law of Three. This step yields the Reconciled result of the blending of the higher Affirming with the lower Denying.

The result will depend on whether the higher and lower forces were equally balanced. If the Affirmation is not strong enough, the Denying force will predominate and we will be captured by our Identification with the suffering and its manifestation will proceed to varying degrees, depending on the strength of the Affirmation. In other words, the Reconciling energy will become higher for a succeeding lower purpose, that of allowing the physical manifestation of the denying force.

If the Affirmation is strong enough to counter the Denying force, a balanced impartiality will be the outcome and some of the Reconciling energy will gravitate towards the center of gravity of our higher being bodies. In other words, the Reconciling energy will become lower for a succeeding higher purpose of coating the higher being bodies.

From my website:

Affirmations

For use with Intentional Suffering and other manifestations of the Holy Denying Force.

"We understand the ordinary pursuits of our lives responding to desires to be educated, well thought of, useful, admired, superior, wealthy or spiritual, as examples of Holy Denyings. We try to meet these denyings with our conscious efforts in our search which we call Holy Affirming. Both are of equal substance and importance." (Paul Beidler)

"In other words, every wish of the planetary body is taken as undesirable for their higher divine part which has to be coated and perfected, and therefore all three-centered beings of our Great Megaloscosmos constantly carry on a relentless struggle against the wishes of their planetary bodies so that there should be formed in them, in this struggle from the what is called ‘Disputekrialnian-friction,’ those sacred crystallizations from which their higher Divine being-part arises and is perfected in them." (BT p. 802)

Only these sources can have this independence which transform the active elements which must serve for the Holy Triamazikamno as the ‘affirming' or ‘active principle.' (BT p. 692)

"...whatever the mind tells you, you are not that. It would be good to become more aware of those false voices so that they could become a reminder for us. It is useless fighting them or trying to stop them. What is possible is to make a small stop at the very moment of hearing a mind voice of this kind, then to collect one’s attention and make an affirmation—aloud when alone, under the breath if with others. An affirmation should be made many times every day. It becomes a source of strength, especially if I practice sensing at the same time. Only the real I can know “me.” But it needs to be called, the I needs to awaken. No one can do this for me." (Mrs. A. L. Staveley)

Affirmations can be intentional thoughts, attitudes and postures accompanied by Sensing.

The thoughts can be Aphorisms, Prayers, Repetitions, Ponderings, phrases, exclamations, exhortations that foster an affirmative enduring of the Suffering.

They should acknowledge and accept that Suffering is a lawful manifestation of the Holy Denying Force and that it is the lot of everyone to experience Suffering. Although much of our suffering is mechanical and can eventually be eliminated as we lose the egoism and Self Importance on which they are based, some forms of Suffering will remain until we die, such as the loss of loved ones, sickness, war and crime.

Affirmations for real Suffering should acknowledge its inevitability, indeed its necessity in the scheme of things as a means of developing Being.

Affirmations for mechanical suffering should stress their uselessness and waste of energy and their basis in egoistic self-love and Self Importance and all the other traits of the organ Kundabuffer.

Affirmations should be of equal intensity or force to the degree of suffering.

Affirmations

Note : These are only a suggested starting point and Seekers are encouraged to discover and add new Affirmations relevant to their personal sufferings •Affirming the small pleasures that lull us to sleep. Pride in our work, completing a task, picking up a small child - acknowledging that it is difficult to remember that these pleasures too can be a manifestation of Holy Denying.

•Applaud when certain distasteful tasks must be done.
•Affirm - Open up! Calm Down! Work! Live! Die!
•A joyful filling up of inwardness, illuminating a glowing marrow.
•Affirming (three steps forward) Holy Denying (one step back)Holy Reconciling (step sideways and back to place).
•Imagine sun's particles in the bone marrow.
•Affirm with the small muscles of the facethen relax your whole body.
•Affirm with an inner smilethen relax your emotions.
•Affirm by visualization you own place in the universethen relax your thinking center.
•Watch the breath.
•Affirm it with a calm, humble, humming affirmation.
•Relax the face, Sense the sole of the feet, Sense the hands ,Sense the base of the head, Sense the little finger of the right hand and the big toe of the left foot, Illuminate the bone marrow.
•Affirm Suffering with an inner smile.

•Affirm with peals of amused chuckles.
•When aware of thinking or judging, generate, from the center of the head, faith of Presence.
•When aware of feeling good or bad, generate, from the heart, love of Presence.
•Affirm by asking - Is this True Integrity?
•Deep within the seeker notices a corresponding Trinity.
•Affirm the Disease of Tomorrow by immediately doing whatever planned/needed/postponed task that comes to mind, especially an unpleasant task, with conscious participation.
•Affirmatively engage our own pressure of acquisition.
•Affirmation may begin with recognizing the subjective way with which laughter is usually considered justified.
•Affirm that you cannot be changed by what someone says to you.
•Affirm that you cannot be changed by anything outside you, but only by what you begin to see internally about yourself.
•Affirm with a Prayer : "Oh Source of everything that exists, help us to avoid the pitfalls of knowing, judging, concluding and finding. Oh Conscience, help us to remember to feed our Being".
•Affirm with a Repetition until the suffering subsides : Po Do Bo Ly Zo Va Ny •Asking the question: "Why must I suffer?"
•Affirming prayer sensing the bone marrow, while taking in impressions consciously and in prescribed sequence.
•If preparing food visualize processing these annoyances, for example cutting them up, as an Affirmation while chanting and inner prayer.
•Affirm any annoying regret for all the inner work not attempted, or pride of accomplishment ,by feeling a gratefulness for being allowed to be here in the present moment.
•Visualize a connectedness to the three being foods; air, food-water, sense impressions.
•Extend a feeling of connectedness outwards to those whom we wrongly accuse of causing our suffering.
•Affirm a satisfaction or dissatisfaction with the visualization of yourself as a corpse.
•When talking with others imagine that you are that person with all their good and bad qualities as you perceive them.
•Affirm each suffering with an audible "yes."
•Affirming a trivial pleasure be conscious of your imminent death of body and other future possibilities.
•At the end of the day note your most trivial satisfaction and ponder its triviality with 3 centers.
•Affirming by repeating the prayer : Holy Affirming, Holy Denying, Holy Reconciling, Transubstantiate in me for my Being. Also remember our ancestors: parents, grandparents and beyond and lastly remember co-seekers.
•Let no annoyance slip by without letting it alter the self image. Affirm it with a calm, still, poetic humming affirmation.

•Affirmed by an attitude of Love to everything that Nature has created.
•Affirm Suffering by saying : "I welcome this discomfort" or "I welcome this frustration."
•Float above the rut of habit.
•We are machines and react to react to external influences.
•We live a script that has already been written.
•Affirm that boredom exists.
•Be surprised and amused that you've been taken aback by the appearance of dislike.
•Affirm by putting attention to the seed of Being in your solar plexus area to help it to grow.
•Affirmative enduring to this lawful circumstance.
•Affirm by "eating" any peculiar habit and emit an inner essence glow.
•Affirm by considering the alternative, namely death. Repeat the mantra "Dust to dust".
•Affirmative enduring of the suffering that harasses explorers may be reinforced with vivid visions of a muddy bilge of envy, fear, pride, and egotism whenever it roils up in fervent Sorrow.
•Affirming effort to let go of Suffering and relax Awakening to Sensations. Become conscious of Tensions and Negative Emotions, Passive and Reactive, Identified and Dispersed. Evoke associations affirming a cosmic transcendental involvement in Being.
•When faced with the irritation of too much to do, look around and realize life's impermanence. See the fleeting nature of achievement. See the hidden reality around you.
•Trust everything that happens, even Suffering, is Affirming a cosmic transcendental involvement in Being; imagine your Suffering is the beginning of a musical score. The keys and strings are your movements, postures, gestures, facial expressions.
•Realized that you work surrounded "by mysteries beyond understanding."
•Target or pinpoint your most frequent annoyance, aim directly for it with the affirmation that it has awakened Being.
•Affirm annoyances by praying : Great Spirit! Thank you for those small annoyances that help me Remember Myself.
•Affirming the organism's haphazard frenzy of, I am this, I am that, this I did, that I was. The Seeker strives for a full sensing of "myself." Not, I am this that, but "I am."
•Affirmation "Faith of Being is Freedom." Sense the faith as emanating from different areas.
•Affirm your pervasive suffering of conditioning by asking : "I am Jesus, I am Buddha, I am Gurdjieff, I am (insert name), which one invokes less amusement?
•Affirm your Suffering by feeling all the energies within and without, their sameness and points of connection. Visualize all life-forms as conduits for the magnificent currents of energies connecting all and everything.

•Affirm the suffering of ego by periodically assuming the posture of a peacock, spreading an imaginary tail.
•Affirmation of petty attitudes - invoke a sense of gratitude for what we have been given, both of spiritual and ordinary nature. Attitudelessness and a connection to the greater things in life replace petty attitudes.
•When Suffering a remorse and continually murmur "AIEIOIUOA" while longing for a glimpse through the fog.
•When disagreeing with other's convictions, Affirm it by exercising a counter-conviction.
•Affirm that "I" has taken one step further from birth or one step closer to death. Simultaneously place an emphasis on existence of "now", by appreciating the uniqueness of each moment at each step.
•When your Beliefs conflict with other's, Affirm them using the following 5 steps. 1. Identify the belief. 2. Be present to it. How does it feel? What centers are affected? 3. Consider that belief as another lawful product of the organism,of the same order as feces, urine, Carbon Dioxide. 4. Laugh at the belief, especially those that seem "true" or "important". 5. Envision for a moment an inner space of profound quiet aloof from the beliefs of the organism.
•Affirming the force of a new Presence that observes, remembers, acts, is remorseful, endures, has aim, and lives.
•Ask "Who am I?" and visualize your spine and skull radiating light. Scan the body for areas of tension then direct your breath there.
•Affirm by asking : How far can I trust this emotion to lead me?

Heptachord of Enduring
This is similar to the Heptachord of Suffering Exercise Affirm the Holy Denying Force with seven steps :

1) recognizing the inner distress as a Holy Denying. (eg. pleasure)
2) naming it.
3) accepting it.
4) using it: using affirmations. (eg. Sensing plus sightless gaze, 3 deep breaths, repeating a mantra, etc.)
5) believing it to be a required function.
6) knowing that it falls on everyone.
7) peeling it from an inner core like the petals of an artichoke by recalling or Evoking its Companion. (eg. pain)

From my website:

We must endure patiently the life conditions that we cannot change.

Heptachord of Suffering Exercise

Second Conscious Shock - Intentional Suffering

This page explains the method of using the Heptachord Exercise for applying the Second Conscious Shock of Intentional Suffering to the 'higher intentionally actualizing mdnel-in' of the law of Heptaparaparshinokh. The Heptachord Exercise is used for transforming our suffering based Negative Emotions into the energies required to coat or grow our higher being bodies. It is based on the Holy Equation which is a law conformable process for transforming energy based on the Law of Three - "A new arising from the previously arisen through the "harnel-miatznel", the process of which is actualized thus The higher blends with the lower to actualize the middle, which becomes lower for the next higher or higher for the previous lower."

This Holy Equation is the basic pattern of all Inner Work.

When the Holy Equation Exercise is applied twice in succession, it completes the octave of the Heptachord of Suffering Exercise. This is the process that Gurdjieff claims will create our two Higher Being Bodies by transforming the energies of Impressions, Air and Food; electrical, chemical and molecular energies. Some of the Neutral or Reconciling energy resulting from first application of the Holy Equation is used as the input for the second application of the Holy Equation which completes the octave and the resulting Neutral or Reconciling energy is coated on the Higher Being Bodies. Gurdjieff makes many references to this process in Beelzebub's Tales.

This process is also spoken of by Gurdjieff in the unpublished Enneagram Lecture, which was the basis for Chapter 14 of In Search of the Miraculous by Ouspensky:

"This binary is every person who looks into himself. We may live by these transitory dimensions, giving ourselves up to their current and allowing them to carry us away. But to the whole of this process going on within us apart from our will, to all these "it wishes" we may oppose our "I wish", bind together yes and no, provoke a dispute between two opposites, a struggle of two principles, and neutralize them by the tertiary. A great dispute, if it is not purposeless, must give a result, a conclusion and an effect, and then four elements will be available: yes, no, dispute, result; that is, the transmutation of the binary into the quaternary."
"The seven basic tones of the octave express the law of the septenary and the "Do" of the next octave added to complete the process, gives the 8 steps of a complete octave, being the symbolical expression of the binary of the quaternaries: 'Do, re, mi, fa' - 'sol, la, si, do'."

"Thus we have: "harnel-miatznel" - "harnel-miatznel" or "yes, no, dispute, result" - "yes, no, dispute, result" or "Do, re, mi, fa" - "sol, la, si, do"."

Heptachord of Suffering Exercise

This exercise details the sequential process of applying the Holy Equation twice to form an Octave of Transubstantiation. Perceiving the suffering arising from our connection to a living system and suspecting that creative enduring of suffering may enhance conscience, we will apply the heptachord of suffering to our daily encounters with suffering.

For example, starting from :

0. Life experience of a personal Holy Denying suffering, followed by ...
1. citing or naming the personal Holy Denying suffering, followed by ...
2. a Holy Affirming of the energy spent in the suffering, resulting in ...
3. a Holy Reconciled "impartiality", making it possible to ...

4. curb the suffering's manifestation, then diverting the energy saved ...
5. to the expression of a companion characteristic such as joy, followed by ...
6. a savoring of a transubstantiated comprehension between the suffering and its companion, leading to ...
7. a coating on an inner-being embryo often surfacing as intellectual deprivation, a quiet mind.

Step by Step Explanation

0. Life experience of a personal Holy Denying suffering : During our daily life we will experience situations and desires that arouse suffering and negative emotions. The basis of suffering is the Holy Denying Force of the planetary body, as manifested through its urges, instincts, desires, wishes, and psychological and social drives. Some of these are attributable to Kundabuffer or our inherent and acquired egoism and personality. Other Denying Forces may even arise from Essence. Some examples are given above and on this page.

1. Citing or naming the personal Holy Denying suffering : When, by Self Observation, we notice or recognize the manifestation of a Holy Denying suffering or trait in the course of daily life, we need to acknowledge its presence by naming it, such as 'this is anger' or 'this is a denying force', etc. We need to Sense its energy in our body. We need to feel its emotional expression. We need to observe the thoughts that accompany it and justify it. In the beginning we may need to allow the Denying force to express itself in action in order to observe all its characteristics, but the ultimate goal is the non-expression of the negativity.

We are a living representation of the Law of Three and by this first step we are placing or entering one of the expressions or terms, the Denying one, into the holy equation of energy transformation according to the Law of Three.

2. Holy Affirming of the energy spent in the suffering : There are several aspects to this step of the equation, which involves placing or entering the second expression or term of the equation, the Affirming one.

One way of Affirming this Holy Denying suffering is to acknowledge that the Holy Denying force is a law conformable and necessary aspect of the universe created by His Endlessness. We can accept or bear the suffering without complaint.

Another aspect of Affirmation of the Denying energy is to oppose the Denying energy with another activity, called an Affirmation, to interfere with the manifestation the Denying force. We can employ an Affirmation exercise such as Sensing a part of the body or repeating a mantra or verbal affirmation as suggested on the Affirmation Exercise page. This is where the Affirmation is actually exercised. For example, if ones chosen Affirmation was Sensing ones hand, one would actually commence the Sensing here.

3. Holy Reconciled "impartiality" : This step is the third and final part of the equation of the transformation of energy according to the Law of Three. This step yields the Reconciled result of the blending of the higher Affirming with the lower Denying. We will experience this Reconciling energy as an inner state of impartiality or non-identification with the Denying force.

The strength of the result will depend on whether the higher and lower forces were equally balanced. If the Affirmation is not strong enough, the Denying force will predominate and we will be captured by our Identification with the suffering and its manifestation will proceed to varying degrees, depending on the strength of the Affirmation. In other words, the Reconciling energy will become higher for a succeeding lower purpose, that of allowing the physical manifestation of the denying force.

If the Affirmation is strong enough to counter the Denying force, a balanced impartiality will be the outcome and some of the Reconciling energy will gravitate towards the center of gravity of our higher being bodies. In other words, the Reconciling energy will become lower for a succeeding higher purpose of coating the higher being bodies.

4. Curb the suffering's manifestation : If the previous step of the equation had a balanced or positive output of Reconciling energy, we will have succeeded in transforming its energy and thereby curbing or stopping the expression of the Denying force by entering a state of impartiality or non-identification. Some of this Reconciling energy is now available to be diverted into a new second equation of the Law of Three as the Denying term. Note that this Denying energy of a higher quality than the original. It has become the lower for the succeeding higher. The succeeding higher is the next Affirmation that we apply to the new second equation by diverting the energy thus saved.

5. Expression of a companion characteristic : Here we apply an Affirmation which serves as the second term of the new second equation.

This Affirmation can be of several types as suggested above for the first Affirmation, plus the addition of another type of Affirmation, that of expressing companion or contrasting characteristic of the Denying force or suffering or of Evoking one of the Higher Emotions, such as Faith, Hope, Love, Compassion. A companion characteristic could be joy, generosity, acceptance, laughter, tenderness, etc.

6. Savoring of a transubstantiated comprehension between the suffering and its companion : This step is the third and final part of the new second equation of the transformation of energy according to the Law of Three. This step yields the Reconciled result of the blending of the higher Affirming with the lower Denying.

This step will yield a state that could be considered as a manifestation of the Voice of Conscience, wherein we experience the contrast and contradictions between the Affirming and Denying forces in us. It will help us see ourselves and others more objectively and will contribute to our level of Objective Reason or Reason of Understanding.

7. Coating on an inner-being embryo : The resulting Reconciling energy will gravitate towards the center of gravity of our higher being bodies and add a new coating on them for the growth of our Being.

One indication of a successful application of the Heptachord of Suffering will be an inner state of Being characterized by a calm inner silence, unaffected by the whirlwind of life and our atmosphere of Denying urges and desires. We should savor this state as long as possible. This would be a good time to Sense our body and take in Impressions using the Sightless Gaze exercise.

From my website:

Self Importance

Along the way towards developing Real I, efforts at overcoming our Egoism and Self Importance are necessary. Failure to do so will will result in the creation of a type of person Gurdjieff called a Hassnamus.

Self Importance is a consequence of the organ Kundabuffer. Other properties of the organ Kundabuffer are : arrogance, the need to provoke astonishment in others, bragging, cunning, the vice of eating, egoism, envy, hate, imagination, jealousy, lying, offensiveness, partiality, pride, wishing the death or weakness of others, self-conceit, self-love, swagger, vanity.

A traditional method of overcoming Self Importance is submitting yourself to a good Teacher, one who is able to see the core of your Self Importance and impose "tasks" or Intentional Sufferings that may help you destroy it. This involves humiliation and one has to have enough trust and foresight to see the benefits of being humiliated and the fortitude to see it through to the end. Many Teachers end up being reviled for their efforts simply because their students don't understand the intention that is behind their being humiliated. Their ego ends up becoming even more inflated and they ascribe all sorts of evil intentions to the Teacher who caused them so much existential pain. No wonder good Teachers are hard to find; try to do someone a favor and all they do is hate you for it. As Gurdjieff says :

"Such is the nature of man, that for your first gift - he prostrates himself; for your second - kisses your hand; for the third - fawns; for the fourth - just nods his head once; for the fifth - becomes too familiar; for the sixth - insults you; and for the seventh - sues you because he was not given enough."

Self Importance Exercises

These are only a suggested starting point and Seekers are encouraged to discover and add new categories and specific situations relevant to their personal situation.
•One exercise that can help us overcome Self Importance is the constant realization of our own inevitable Death.
•Another exercise is to do anything that anyone asks you to do, with unquestioning obedience.
•Role playing is also a useful exercise to help combat Self Importance. Take the Role of someone you dislike or that expresses behaviors opposite to your Chief Feature.
•Either agree with or desist from arguing with people when they express an opinion contrary to yours.
•Always tell the truth.
•Never justify or explain away your actions.
•Accept blame or responsibility for events that you have no control over or for actions that were committed by someone else.

***

Pondering on Self Importance

•Who is Self Important?
•Why does Self Importance exist?
•Where does my Self Importance originate from?
•How can I overcome my Self Importance?
•What is my chief Self Importance?
•What types of Self Importance do I dislike in others?
•What types of Self Importance do I dislike in myself?

Work Program week beginning 13 September 2004

---

by Ian

This weeks theme: Transition

Daily Pondering: Where does the air beyond my lungs start and finish? Where do I end and the world begin?

Morning exercise: Observe the change from night into day. Sense the pause between inhalation and exhalation.

Daily exercise 1: Whenever you change your posture from sitting to standing, sense the top of your skull.

Daily exercise 2: Sense the ceaseless flow of bio-activity within your body.

Daily exercise 3: Whenever you are irritated by the behaviour of others, sense the dis-ease and release it with each out-breath.

Eating exercise: After finishing each mouthful of food, pause a while before taking another. Silently give thanks for the food during each pause. Ponder - Where does the food on my plate become part of me?

Evening exercise: Observe the change from day into night, light to dark. Listen to the silence between sounds.

I feel remiss at not posting of late.

Morning transition is interesting. This morning I was driving to work. Fog shrouded river. There's a hill with a monastary on top. (The city's artsy district surrounds this monastary.) But as the sun was beginning to burn away the fog just the tower of this monastary was visible. Like I was transported back to an earlier era. . .

Light on buildings is key to mornings for me. Light and shadow. Light and shadow on chirch towers and condominium tower windows.

The transition between inhale and exhale, the pause always sounds in my head brain. Unless I intentionally direct it elsewhere. I've repeated I am, I wish, I can as a prayer/mantra/circle that it is almost instinctive now when I'm not unconsciously going about my life.

Feeling top of my head when standing sitting has been fitful, at best. Fully understood, just such an unconscious movement that it is difficult remembering myself. . .I'm already going someplace else or coming to rest. . .

Hi, its my first week with trying to follow the work program. It makes me understand with shame how sleepy I am. How many times I say to myself I want to do the exercises, but most of the time, I don't remember anything of it. The exercise at the beginning of the day is the one I did the most. The changing from night in to day was compared by a sun looked like a fireball. I felt different from normal when I saw that.
To feel my skull when I rise from my chair is evenso a hard one for me.
It seems if I irritated myself more then ever, I notice it makes me very identified even I know it makes me a stranger for myself, it seems if I cannot change it.
Even taking a pause after each mouthful of food is a hard thing to do. My so called thoughts are very triggering.

So it was vivid dream time again last night:

Same house as before. Walls even less evident. There was a wake going on. Someone was in the front yard in a rocking chair. Me? I don't know.

I was in the Kitchen. Middle story. Someone came with "work" or a "task" for me to do. I went to put on a pair of shoes because the task would call for me to walk a while. I put on a nearby pair. They felt comfortable. Then I realized they were my grandfather's. And I had them on the wrong feet. But still they were comfortable. I also noted that they were slippers and not shoes.

I then had the feeling of another presence in my actual room and awoke.

Those shoes, while comfortable, were shoes for sleep walking. They were not shoes for work. My emotional shoes? Backward from the emotional remoteness of my step-family? (second story)

Synchronicity and ESP have been up tenfold all week. They are standing in close support of one another. A kind of reciprocal maintanance going on between them. Besides doing the exercises, planetary body has been unusually worked this week. I make sure I do a relaxing upwards from the pubic bone up through slowly extended arms (while releasing the lower back). This not only prevents muscle-jambing, but clears the solar plexus of congestion

This week I am finding myself wanting to talk less and less in specific reference to these exercises but talk more and more about what it is they seem to be effecting for me.

I had a strong urge twice this week to walk into neighborhoods I hadn't visited in a long time ---- places I know well, but years ago made a conscious decision to leave because I needed a shock hurled into my life. The reciprocal 'shock' this week was to see the same habits being acted out under a changed surface. I drank it in.

More episodes of watching parts of myself fissure. A feeling will come up and I will feel my whole surface 'craze' like the glaze of an antique celadon vessel after decades of swings between heat and cold. Sometimes the crazing will hold and I will have to feel the rivulets running all over me and the strange accompanying embarrasment with it which ends up being no more than the Fool that I am once again "shewin' hees arse". Other times the crazing comes and falls shatters it slivers upon slivers of icy shales.

There is so much dreck here. Not that there's anything the matter. The good thing here is that it is being seen felt acknowledge for its worn-down worn-out irrelevancy. A skin no longer needed --- a skin shed.

Considerable drop in the outside temperature this morning. Gooseflesh on my short-sleeved arm, while riding my bike, reminded me to remember myself.

Went to see the movie HERO the other night and was so happy to be sitting in front of this visual feast. Went into the sightless gaze numerous times and drank in the color--- and amazzzing it is too! Something nagging in the back of my memory tells me the color keys used for each sequence relate to a Buddhist "Wheel of Existence"---- in other words on a color level the entire movie makes one complete cycle around the wheel. Yummy! Audience around me visibly restless and then bored. Complaints centered on "no storyline". For me the formal elements were plenty on their own. Good impressions food. Caused me to feel "all full-up". Went to work later to atentively fullfill ordinary tasks, "stopping myself' off and on.

I only recognised transition in the clouds this week. Really enjoyed it, the sun rising and descending. For the rest, I was to identificated in my work. A lot of irritating matters, tried to cool down it and letting it go, but thats hard work. I know Im just recognizing some things, but even that is only a glimpse of the beginning. But trying to stop negative thoughts is something that I can let myself do, and that is a good thing.

Theme: Annoyances

Daily Pondering: "Without annoyances would we have entered the Work? Would we keep on seeking?"

Morning Exercise: As you arise from bed, repeat silently the following affirmation: "Today I will dispell the fog of Annoyances with the sun of Being Affirmations." Sense a warmth radiating from the heart.

Monday: Whenever you become annoyed with physical objects, observe them with a sightless gaze.

Tuesday: Whenever you observe an annoyance, remember a previous satisfaction. Sense head, solar plexus and heart.

Wednesday: Whenever you become annoyed with someone, sense the air as it passes out of your nostrils carrying with it the dark cloud of annoyance.

Thursday: Whenever you become annoyed with yourself, try to find a place in yourself that can observe the annoyance objectively without indentification. Sense the energy of the annoyance in the body.

Friday: Whenever you observe an annoyance, ponder - "Why are we designed to believe that the end of the week is the most fun and desirable?"

Saturday: Play the role of a bad tempered person and express annoyance at everything. Observe your sensations, reactions and resistances to the role.

Sunday: Rest from annoyances. Let nothing annoy you. Sense a calm inner freedom deep in the bone marrow, unaffected by the annoyances of life. Ponder - "Can we accept equally our annoyances along with our satisfactions?"

Evening Recapitulation: Recall the days annoyances. Ponder - "What personal traits do my annoyances represent?"

by Wilma

Annoyance has influence in my whole way of being, its making a very clear call to my personality. It says: "something is happening inside you". Is it a shock? I've learned somehow that it is a signal for me. But most of the times, Im angry about those signals, I dont wont to feel them, they are not pleasant. Maybe its good to see them as signals of awakenig and learn to watch them and welcome them as a gesture to recal my being. The negative part of annoyance will shade then, this I noticed this day.

I didn't notice it enough, because in me: annoyance is working hard to get me identificated. Its spending my time, mostly its wasted time and therefore wasted energy. I want to learn to turn annoyance everytime its coming up, into a signal to wake up.
Is there someone who wants to help me and give me a reply?
Hope my english is understandable.

by Wilma

I think my annoyances represent my feelings of responsability even to things I shouldn't be responsable to. Why do I feel myself responsable? Because I think everybody have to do thing in my way. Maybe its because I think deep inside that this way must be the best, because I cant play other roles? Im afraid to play other roles? Or Im afraid that if I want do my best, people disqualify me? Or is it just dominating behaviour?
Maybe I am to identified to responsibility and to the theme that I wont look just a stupid, dumb woman.

Hi Wilma

You can find a description here -

by Harry

Doing today's (Tuesday's) task left me with a question:

In setting up this positive-negative balance: annoyance-satisfaction. . .with the sensing of my three centers. . .I'm neutralizing?

But this is the question: am I creating an association of the annoyance with the satisfaction as well? I just answered the phone. No one there. Dial tone. Empty phone calls are an annoyance. Balanced with the satisfaction of a perfect cup of Darjeeling this morning.

Am I creating a reciprocal equation? Cause I don't want annoyance with my tea.

I'm not really annoyed with the empty line. I'm really annoyed I'm answering the phone because the secretary is on vacation. But that has its benefits, as well. Don't have to rally off at lunch time. That's a different kind of balance. I'm practiced at this, because we lose a receptionist every six months. Which is annoying. It is also annoying that I'm a good receptionist. . .which I don't mind being on another level.

Here comes Ouspensky with his copper ash tray. . .

Annoyances at another this week covered a deep annoyance at myself for simply backing down and not asking a legitimate question. I remedied that by asking the question which seemed to activate annoyance from the person being questioned. His response was to flee. I felt censored.

Do I return to silence? Do I fight? Do I alchemise a new stance which keeps me from disappearing, yet keeps me from self-justifying?

I alchemised a new stance.

My annoyances at the World and how I imagined the World was treating me certainly have contributed to my entering the Work. My annoyance at myself for having all too often been willing to silently "take shit" became grounds for my entering the Work. My annoyance at myself for being willing to become a blank piece of paper for other people to scribble their definitions of me on, make Work necessary.

Today, I took a stand, a small stand, but a stand with vigor, humour and gravity. Today, at least, I kept annoyance at bay, by attempting to see and feel things as thoroughly as they are and to respond appropriately without diminishment of Presence.

That is hard.

That is Work.

Its seven o clock in the morning and I've just read your message.

So recognisable, now this day I will try to take stand calmly and meanwhile sensing the body. I said no yesterday to a person and he felt used like a little boy, he told me. I had to said no, I felt to say it a little loud, because I saw him trying to play indignation. When he, afterwards told me how he felt, I stayed calm but it costs me lots of uselesstime to get this out of my head.
I think I am to much justifying. So yes, there is work to do.

have a nice day Greg

First an answer to Wilma then something about my own experiences with this week program.

Wilma, I would advise exploring the differences between centers and their interconnections. In my experience it somehow made me more sensitive to my emotional reactions - seems that before I was quite "emotionally dumb" and could express quite a strong emotion without even noticing it. Try to do something with all your three centers, intentionally "turning them on" (it is easier to do when doing some physical work) - in this situation your annoyances will become much more "visible" to you. Then you will sooner or later memorize the "inner taste" of annoyance which can become a factor for remembering your aim. You will also remember that some types of situations cause annoyance almost always so you will be able to "catch" the glimpses of annoyances very fast in these situations. And one more thing: if you oppose an annoyance with conscious impartiality (which is easy to get trying to divide attention to all three centers) and stop the reaction to it, it becomes easier to notice annoyance next time.

This week's excercises seemed very "interesting" for me. It seemed to me that I have calmed down recently and it was quite surprising for me to find out how many annoyances I have for each day. It was funny to look at the annoyance and see how it pushes me to different thoughts and actions and how it requires an additional effort not to express it. I felt that my reactions have some "energetic" component and successful stopping the reaction to annoyance leads to an interesting effect when my body feels "lighter", easier to move for a short time.

by Harry

I find this discussion interesting because I come from the opposite end of the spectrum. I grew up an "angry young man". Like G, I always had a facility to find someone else's corns and step on them. Only I did it for the sheer perversity of stepping on someone else's corns.

So, for example, in the incident Greg speaks of, my effort is not to respond. I actually begin a response, and try to balance centers in making that response, but soon (or not so soon) close up, because no one is gaining from my further response. Greg has already said what I want to say.

One of the freeing concepts in the Work for me is that if I'm negative it is always my fault. That doesn't eliminate righteous indignation. Christ did expel the money changers from the temple. (A tale which, of course, has more than one symbolic meaning.) But if I'm negative I need to find which of my corns has been stepped on. Which of my "i's" is upset?

Christ expelling the money changers, I would submit, was an example of conscious acting. Playing the appropriate role.

It would be interesting to have enough individuals active here so that different types were able to express their own Work.

by Greg

I was thinking about Christ and the moneychangers all the way home yesterday --- thank you, Harry, for affirming that.

I was wishing in and out all day yesterday that I knew how many people were really part of this group and wishing that they would begin to express there "whatevers". Sometimes, here, I feel like I'm talking to a blank wall (or boring Harry to death!) As Harry remarked, a variety of viewpoints and experiences shared makes this a more interesting engagement. It certainly helps my own Work. Every experience shared helps Work. Without it, there is no friction.

Laid on bed last night to watch my multitude of annoyances (growling at the pit of my stomach). Picked them in my mind up one by one to examine them. No judgement, just acknowledgement and taking snap-shots of them from all vantage points. As this was happening I noticed my heartbeat slowing down and my entire body receiving each heartbeat as one total, full-bodied beat. (Just like it had once, awhile back after the bike ride). There was a strong energy outline of my body from left to right --- pulsing and tight. Good, solid feeling. My mind perceived it colored emerald green.

Work Program week beginning 27 September 2004

by Ian

Morning exercise: Sit quietly and relax the three centers. Repeat each of the first 6 lines of the following affirmation 3 times, bringing attention to the head (thoughts), heart (feelings) and solar plexus (sensations) in turn with each repetition. When repeating the last line, attend to all 3 centers at once, leading to a state of all-brains-balanced-being-perception.

I rejoice in annoyance.
I rejoice in the suffering of irritation.
I rejoice in the enduring of impatience.
I rejoice in these corns that make work possible.
I rejoice in holding on while letting go.
I rejoice in the gift of the work.
I rejoice in the stars that sing when the eye sees briefly into itself.

During the day: Observe the emotions that characterise annoyances. Meet all the annoyances with a calm indifference firmly rooted in a full sensation of the planetary body. Rejoice in the reconciliation.

Evening exercise: While deeply sensing the planetary body and following the breath, ponder - "Is being what arises when we hold both affirmation and denying at once in this pitched battle for our attention?"

Experience of week 27th Sept

I have been finding that this week so far, I am returning to myself with greater frequency than usual.
I think this is connected with the ‘exercises’ for this week. (focusing on irritation)
I see that I am a ferris wheel of irritation; one basket of annoyance disappears only to be replaced by another …. And so on, and so on.
This has gave me the opportunity to use these ‘throbbing corns’ as alarm clocks awakening me many times a day
With this awakening, I go to my body, and the result is a feeling of calm spaciousness, which allows me to participate more in my life.
I find this heartening.
Sometimes when I catch the irritation too late, and just see it’s vapour trail, and feel the tension it has manufactured while I slept, I laugh out loud.
It seems ridiculous to be so mechanical, but it is just how it is most of the time…… for now.

All the best - Stuart

Annoyed? You bet! Count on it!

This week "even steven" though. Took myselves in hand and had them do this week's exercise. We also sat ourselves down and wrote out in long hand------ (because "handwriting" always engages my heart center more than keyboarding) ----we wrote out in long hand "our grievences".

What we found out:

1). Our annoyances take up lots and lots of time arguing abstracts and minutae so we don't have to Work.

2). We are annoyed with other people because we are essentially in deep fear that they might know something more than we do and thus whittle away at our self-esteem (read: PRIDE. hear: "You know I've worked so HARD at all of this! I must KNOW it all! It's quite an investment after all!."
The (only sane) answer to that: "Yeah, 'whatever' . . . Next?!?!")

3). If we stay annoyed long enough and hard enough at other people, we keep THEM in fear.

4). We remain annoyed at our own, personally manufactured, and conditioned perception of reality which recent investigation (with more and more "sightless gaze" and "soundless sound") is beginning to suggest might have been majorly, if not totally, an illusion for the past (almost) 49 years!

All, however, has not been lost. I knew when I needed to do the exercise this week. I knew that I needed to sit down and write it out. I kept my mouth closed (and maybe leaked less energy).

Today, each center, like a bell bouy, rode its own gently lapping body of water. A space existed between each and no body of water tried to over-ride another.

Hi Wilma,

I smile with you - I also found this message board hard to navigate at first.
Your comment about being a feris wheel of irritation is very perceptive and certainly resonates with my experience!
The positive aspect of this realization is that these irritations can act as reminders to Work. We can Work by countering our irritations with Affirmations. Affirmations are the weekly suggestions in the programs. One goal of this Work is to learn how to create your own Affirmations.
When we Affirm against the Denying irritations, the result is the Reconciling. Or a G says - the higher blends with the lower to actualize the middle.
The first step is self observation - recognizing the irritations.
The second step is to bring an Affirmation to bear on the irritations - enduring the suffering with a positive attitude.
The third step is to savour the Reconciliations which nourish our Being.

Yes, this week a lot of irritations and I see them more clearly now. So much time spending with things that can't be changed because they have passed. But I've tried very often to calm down and beginning to sense the planetary body a little. Still much work to do. My way of being has become yet a lot more positive, because I refuse the negative thinking when its coming over me. I trie to stop it and work.

Today I've made a list with affirmations, when i read it, I will remember it. Yesterday there was something very dissappointing, I recognized my negative reaction and suffered afterall with a positive attitude. My light feelings came back en so I could nourish my Being again. But it was hard work, I had to be stern to myself.

Work Program week beginning 4 October 2004

by Ian

The seeker now suspects something lurking behind the manifestations of annoyances and Ponders on the nourishment that could derive from an affirming of a more sustained effort when faced by a deeper facet of annoyance. The seeker dares to consider perhaps the source of annoyance - the undeclared hidden source that lingers in the shadow. Can the seeker draw these elements into the light of conscious duty and intentional suffering? Can the seeker accept the irritation of annoyance while applying an appropriate affirmation springing from their hope for consciousness?

During the week, Ponder: Like the pearl coated from the irritation of a grain of sand, is Being created by our struggle to sustain Holy Denying and Holy Affirming?

Also, during the week, the seeker Ponders their willingness to consciously put their functional parts into the path of annoyance, so that they may practice further, deepening their acumen for impartial observation while in the throes of mechanical and habitual reactions to daily annoyances.

During the week, seek out the situations where you know you will be annoyed. Observe your predictable, mechanical emotions and reactions to those situations while sensing the spinal column.

The seeker may have discovered a fleeting joy experienced in this task of combat with their petty annoyances - but resolves not to be distracted by the rewards of Work.

During the week, when one experiences the rewards of effort, use the energy thus gained to enter a deep inner calm of Being, free from emotional polarity but grounded in a deep sensing of the physical presence.

The seeker rejoices that great nature and the Endless Creator have provided organs that respond to these intentional initiatives - which he believes spring from the beckoning of higher forces - beckoning for the need for actualization and service rejoicefully undertaken.

During the week, the seeker will set aside moments to listen to the voice of Conscience, the voice of His Endlessness within, accompanied with a deep sensing of the physical body.

Upon awakening in the morning, the seeker will leap to their feet and take 7 deep breaths into the abdomen while sensing the diaphram, the ribs and the clavicle, and on exhalation, sensing in the reverse order, while praying for an inner calm of Being. Thus prepared the seeker will dance out into the world seeking to participate in the adventure that awaits, where they will seek opportunity to expand their search through the convenience of annoyance, keeping to the task in order to peer behind the mask of a mechanically lived life.

In the evening, while sensing the left baby finger, the seeker Ponders: "What is my Chief Annoyance?" - expecting no reply but harkening onward.

by Guest

Today there where a lot of "me" 's. Just before I went into a meeting I told myself to listen to my voice and to calm down with expected irritations. Guess what happened? For 99% I just forgot what I wanted to do and where getting very mechanical. And if that wasn't enough, about that fact I still grouch and in my mind I try to point my finger on "guilty" persons. Yet still negative, cause I am thinking and humbling about my own reactions. Why can't I drop it and just relax and put tho the Denying Force, the ....I even don't remember this word.
Nothing is calm in me, but I know my biggest irritation: its dissapointment. And that has to do with wanting others to justify me, because I'm so hard working at least 60 hours in a week. Tipically, because I like my work and its just my own decision to bring quality into my daily work. Nobody asks me to do so.
It's better for me know to work a while and pick up some repeating practise from last week.

In the past, I have often resorted to prayers and other self-calming measures to get me through the shit. Tomorrow, I will live with it and alongside it 'til Death us do part (which in this case means 5:00 pm!)

The morning exercise has made me feel like a Wild Man (read: Green Man). Rather than rising from my bed in a kind well-ordered good night's sleep arising, I jump, pull each breath in in wide awake strength (difficult) and start the day wild with energy.

to peer behind the mask of a mechanically lived life

This week I saw how mechanical I am, shocking, but also hints to work for reconciling the affirming and denying force.
I saw myself walking and talking to myself: most of the time identificated with my job, too much care for my children (15 and 17 years) and the biggest part: judging allmost everything which came on my way.
The me is trying to let disappear the I.

The work is getting more and more an ingredient of my life, but still I forget it for an immense great part.

Typical how the week before I could do more with being calm and watching myself.

We seek finality, certainty and closure with 'answers'. We stop looking and questioning deeper. By keeping a question open ended, we go against that tendancy in ourselves and also provide an opportunity to see deeper.

Work Program week beginning 11 October 2004

by Ian

This weeks theme: Attachments

Begin the day by entering a deep state of detachment through meditation. Relax the physical, emotional and intellectual centers. Notice any sensations, feelings and thoughts that may disturb the relaxation and ask what attachments lie behind them.

During the morning, observe the emotional center. What emotional states are you attached to? What things or people are you emotionally attached to? What emotions do you feel at the loss of your attachments? What needs to my attachments serve? Sense the solar plexus and chest.

During the afternoon, observe the intellectual center. What thoughts are you attached to? What ideas, things or people are you intellectually attached to? What thoughts do you have at the loss of your attachments? What opinions to my attachments serve? Sense the head and face.

During the evening, observe the physical center. What sensations are you attached to? What things are you physically attached to? What sensations do you have at the loss of your attachments? What sensations to my attachments serve? Sense the arms and legs.

In the evening, after entering a state of all-brains-balanced-being-perception, Ponder - "How are my attachments related to my self-importance?"

Ian says:

> What opinions to my attachments serve?

I dont understand these form/grammar of sentences, please can you help me?

My attachments related to my self-importance: today I felt acting like I am nobody, that I imagine myself being subjugated to judgements of other people, but it only exists in myself. I create whole stories and a world existing in the opposition of good and bad. I have the need to be a nice person, acting like I am not good enough. It makes me walking on soft shambles, very silent, I dont want to be seen.

Its like I am shaming myself for being a person and just that makes me nobody.
I know everything I noticed today had to do with how I am preoccupied with myself. It keeps me mechanical and busy. I wonder how to diminish this.

I have been doing exercises the last two or three weeks. Observing individual centers, morning afternoon and evening is an exercise I'm capable of.

But I'm at a quandry with something like "enter a deep state of meditation in the morning". Practically, as a good householder, I know I can't do this. I would love to do it. (Those are two i's. . .a third says objecting is absurd. . .your future is in this. . .)

I usually awake before the alarm. I did this morning as well. Remembered the exercise. Laid in bed moving toward meditative state. . .(not a great idea, but an attempt). Not much else there. Solid deep breathing. . .Centers almost quiet. . .except that nagging presence in the back of my mind "It's off to work we go, hi ho hi ho." Medicate my diseases. Shower. Dress. Eat breakfast, fix lunch. Check weather. And then I'm gone for almost ten hours. . .

Am I attached to my job? I'm attached to my paycheck. I'm attached to the roof over my head, the three meals a day. The ameneties I've built so that my apartment can be a refuge. . .emotionally attached? Not to the job. In fact I've been contemplating that of late. I don't want to be "involved". . .I've lived every day for the last three or four years not knowing if there is enough grant money available to keep paying myself. My boss is constantly "upset" that I'm not more upset about this. But I turn sixty in less than half a year. . .with not enough to retire on. . .

These are all ordinary things. Could I survive like one of these men I walk past on the streets in the mornings? Not for long, not without medication. Not on their diets.

I'm still attached to this life. Yet I contemplate my mortality. . .I find that time expiring for me has become a factor in many decisions I make. Yet it is not omnipresent. . .as G. suggests. . .

I have squeezed wine from the grapes of meditation solaced in the jade green flashing golden refuge may heal may separate is it Work?

Well this question was unneccesary after all, yet, I understand. Sometimes pointing too much on grammar and then loss the feeling for intuition and common sense.
Its like getting too much attached and therefore loss clearness and transparancy.

Inventory

Monday - Observe the machines postures. In the evening make a list of the machines likes.

Tuesday - Observe the machines movements. In the evening make a list of the machines dislikes.

Wednesday - Observe the machines gestures. In the evening make a list of the machines traits or personality characteristics.

Thursday - Observe the machines tone of voice. In the evening make a list of the machines wishes.

Friday - Observe the machines facial expressions. In the evening make a list of the machines fears.

Saturday - Observe the machines thoughts. In the evening make a list of the machines deeply held beliefs.

Sunday - Observe the machines emotions. In the evening make a list of the machines happiest and unhappiest moments.

Observe objectively, without judging, without analysing, without criticising.
While writing the lists, sense the writing hand and arm.

Start every day with an affirmation such as - I Wish To Be.

Every evening before sleep, review the days activities as if playing back a movie.

In the last month (or so) I've noticed a distanct turn in the "results" of the exercises. Previously, results were more or less tied thematically to the content of the exercises themselves. This week a nervous laughter habit pushed glaringly to the forefront. I've been doing it for years more or less knowingly without concern. This week, everytime I manifested it, I perceived it standing out in high relief. It produced the same effect as accidently letting out a huge belch in someone's face as they talked to me. It was an alien feeling. The awkwardness of the situation didn't diminish with each (automatic) repetition, but seemed to stay at exactly the same level of strangeness.

My response has been to feel its approach and immediately contain it before expression.

While I can't prove this as a direct outcome of the exercises, I feel a connection.

Greg

by Faye

After wanting to observe the different parts of myself during the week I found consistently that even if I remembered to observe my machine in action that I rarely could. I suspect strongly that the "I couldn't" part is also part of my habits and personality.
Pronouncing with committment "I wish to be" seems to loosen up the "I can't" mode somewhat. When questions come up such as "how could one do this?", possibility opens up. The questioning mode has a lot more energy in it than the complacent one.
In the rare times when I was able to gain enough separation from myself bound in its endless acitivities, there were a couple of cracks that let in very brief insights. I noticed how I use smiling to make people comfortable, at work, at the grocery store etc.. I don't intend to stop smiling but I intend to enquire more into the meaning of sincerity. Perhaps smiling is a good candidate for observation because it has a strong connection to feeling that I think that I require in order to observe.

While walking, sense each foot as it touches the ground.

Everyday, consider the opposite of a deeply held belief.

Make a list of all your "little I's".

Make a list of all the Roles you play in your life.

Make a list of all your sufferings.

Ponder - What prevents me from seeing the points of view of others? What prevents me from putting myself in their shoes?

by Greg

While walking I feel the self-righteous defense of all my little "I"s that keeps me from walking in another person's shoes. That defense keeps me from feeling the inevitable rips and tears of the terror of my situation --- a cleansing known as "the experience of my own Nothingness."

by Greg

Monday morning woke late for work --- exhausted. Took an assesment and called in for a personal day. Took laundry I was going to take to the laundry room and placed it in the bath tub. If I was exhausted then I all the better. I filled the tub with water as hot as I could stand it, soap, peroxide and kneeling on the floor became the agitator --- the conscious agitator. Within minutes my energy problem revealed itself: all vital energy had damned up in the left side of my lower abdomen. As I churned away with a present force, the energy spread laterally and then rose towards my shoulders and arms. Besides the physical activating, was the vitality attracted towards the heat of the water coming through my hands?

When I tired I stood with full-bottom-of-the-foot contact with the floor and inhaled deep complete breaths drawing them all the way down into the pelvis. The air autumn-crisp coming through the window, intermingled with the rising steam from the tub. I drank in the witness of the walls through my eyes.

Last night, returned to a practise of inhalation with each bite of dinner.

Slept like a rock in dreamless sleep.

Woke 15 minutes before my usual with an inner voice in my right ear. "Time to Wake" (Indeed). Took register of larger than usual portion of "daily bread" and felt happy. Was Monday's activity manifesting in Wednesday morning feeling of balance.

Walked with attention to my feet stepping to the train platform for this morning's train. Stood waiting with feet firmly planted and a complete sensation from the bottoms of my feet to the top of my head. I feel as one complete curve in space, the sense of weightedness in direct proportion to the sense of curvilinear "rise".

In the morning dark, walking from the train to work, I duck under a bush to make a shortcut through a thicket. An awakened bird shreiks behind me I look back over my shoulder.

The clouded sky, with the manifesting light of the rising sun registers "torn, ripped shredded" -- - a picture of yesterday's described "cleansing".

Greg:
"There's a crack in the World That's how the light gets in"
Leonard Cohen

Great song for sunrise.

Also "Sunrise Surprise". . .Incredible String Band.

I like such B influences, because they can be reminders when they suddenly arise on the CD player:

Cohen, again: "Repent, repent, repent
What do they mean by repent?"

Consciously sensing foot and unconsciously sensing foot. Such a quandry at times. I'm mechanically aware of my feet very often. . .side effect of diabetes. Even a curled up sock can be both a reminder and a health hazard.

But I like the simple tasks like "feet hitting ground".

I don't like making lists. Or "it" doesn't like making lists. I taught myself not to make lists. Because I found lists becoming grievances.

Putting myself in other's shoes has been a habit. Started in my college years, very unconsciously. I sat at a party arguing about the Vietnam War. Was arguing with an ROTC colonel. (I.e. a gung ho military student type.) I had no conviction, but argued against just to be arguing. Convinced myself, if not him. Often have to put myself in my boss's shoes. He often asks for a work product and then begins asking for changes in it without fully reading the results. I understand this is his machines Attention Deficit Disorder, but it always tends to produce the beginning of a negative emotion in me. (If I let that emotion develop it says: "I already did that, dummy, if you'd only have read the first page.") But that statement never gets made.

Again a B influence song always helps: "You must serve someone. . ." So I serve him, ordinarilly.

Boss brought a new toy to work. New phone/blackberry. Wants it to Work Right Now! At 4PM.

I don't use these things, but I'm the tech expert.

Irritated.

Put myself in his shoes. I get a new toy. New mouse. (cause my old one got eaten by a cat. . .actually wasn't working well). Had to plug it in right away. Same impatience.

I'm in his shoes. His impatience is mine.

What is this impatience? Because I expect it not to work. I want to eat the disappointment early. Yet, inwardly, I always expect it to work. And others see my skills as able to walk in a room, touch a computer and it happens.

Which comes back to Anticipation. (Rolling Stones)
Anticipation is the ordinary pleasure and pain of the world. I prepare for these events. So I anticipate the worst possible outcome. What a stupid way to create fear. I've fought this battle over and over and over again. If I anticipate everything I can never be wrong, can never be caught by surprise, am always almost slightly disappointed.

I know all of this. I've dealt with it on much bigger issues. Yet I still do it with a little thing like a mouse. Which means I've made it an elephant.

Hing, my son's girlfriend, had a phrase from her Chinese father. Don't make big elephant out of flea. I was reading the notes from G. meetings here, and found Don't make elephant of mouse. Coincidence.

Stream of consciousness turned off.

Walking to the office this morning it was as if each step drew energy from the earth. Well grounded?

---

by Greg

Harry:

I've had the drawing of energy from the earth in the past ---- many times. Funny . . . this week none of that for me. I almost expected it to happen because of the nature of the exercise.

What I did have once (and powerfully) was "Tin Man" feet and legs. It could be related. A pulling up and through hollow feet and legs of a sound, like a pair of trumpets in reverse: the sound produced by a pulling from the bottoms of the feet up through the legs. The sound absorbed, integrated (mixed?) at the "hara" A pleasant experience accompanied by Strength.

The directions this week brought me back to my first forays into modern dance. My teachers' annoyed, firm, but ultimately supportive voice "Greg: the movement is beautiful. Now will you please follow my directions and make sure your feet always make complete contact with the floor." It has been "My exercise" from her for 31 years and I am still re-remembering it. It taught me relationship with gravity rather than escape from it --- the ramifications of that other than only a physical act are clear to anyone in the Work.

Disturbed person attemted to unbalance me the night of the eclipsed full moon. I managed to toughen my skin.

Years ago, I kept an emotional life journal tracking the rising and falling of feelings. I tracked this for several months. Only after this did I check it against an ephemeris. Verdict: Highly suseptible to the traveling of the moon through the psycho/astrological houses. Exercise: to keep watch and will opposite emotional atmosphere to deflect and/or balance. Result: more choices.

Strong precognitive experiences through the week. It dawned on me today: Is precognition mechanical?

Three peculiar (and in one case, also, tragic) events played forth around the perimeters of my life this week. I was able to maintain a steadiness of attention on the exercises in spite of them. It was a struggle. In the past, I have used self-calming through prayer. That doesn't work anymore ---- not in terms of what I perceive is needed as far as my self-transformism.

Yesterday, a friend called asking what I knew about the Wicker Man/Green Man iconography.

Our discussion led into the foliate sculpting on the facade of Chartres Cathedral and eventually into a discussion of the Cathedral as a whole. I told him that while I had walked the labyrinth and paid attention to interior shifts of weight I knew nothing else about it.

That was yesterday.

while touching the ground with my feet, i feel in touch with the earth, the reality in which i live; also in touch with every other person who is living on this earth, especially those who are in my mind at the moment of touch.

the opposite of a deep belief is let loose and release all of my images; thats hard work, especially when I am very tight up with my worries and my lips are compressed and my head makes full steam.

my little i's are all connected with what i see in my mind, my little eyes; it all has been linked to my judgements and way of comparisons:
they don't understand me, so therefore they underestimate me / i want to be appreciated they are not like me, so therefore my way of living is better / the proudly me which really isnt something to be proud of the me who is continuing all the time and can't stop, rest / the neglecter of the nature of movements the me whom is shy / modest in a way that i forget my deepest aims and then afterwards feel anger towards other people, they didn't help me; as though i cant get a life for myself the me who is feeling disturbed by other people when I am working and so on..

roles I have played in my life:
me as the proud one me as the helpless one me as the helper, the saviour me as the sociable one me as the black sheep

sufferings:
to feel stupidly, to feel the need of showing my ego in my job, postpone my housekeeping work, having too much aims to see the point of view of other people i have to let go my own view on that moment, its impossible to see twice at once; i'm afraid that if i do so, i will forget who i am what prevents me from putting myself in their shoes? the action of taking off my own shoes? the fear someone will steal my shoes, the concern their shoes dont fit me?

> Harry wrote:
> Cohen, again: "Repent, repent, repent

I was pondering this earlier in the week in connection with the reputed statement by Jesus - repent; take up your cross and follow the way.

repent - turn around, turn inward and remember yourself.

take up your cross - take up and bear your suffering.

This saying of Jesus seems to resonate with Gurdjieff's statement that the work involves two things - conscious labour and intentional suffering.

Buddha taught meditation, a form of self remembering, and the Four Noble Truths of Suffering.

Is it possible to 'forget' personality and 'remember' essence?

Thanks for sharing some of the items from your lists.

Anyone else have any to add?

---

by Harry

Ian,

Nicol has a long discussion about the translation of the word "Repent". . .his indication is "Change of Mind". Or, as you say, Conscious Labors, as that is "Change of Mind".

by Marina

I always forget to sense any parts of my body while walking. And I don't know why...

It was also very difficult for me to consider the opposite of my beliefs. While pondering about what prevents me from seeing the points of view of others, I had very unpleasant sensations in my chest and was forced to stop my pondering.

And task about making a list of all my " little I-s" was easy since I did it several times before. Here are some of my"I-s"
"I", which capable to feel, understand and feel compassion for other.
"I", which thirst and loves knowledge in any form.
"I" which is very persistent and sometimes capable to do
"I" which seek for order and harmony.
"I" -musician (I play piano)
"I"-which likes comfort and money
"I" which loves to teach all
"I" which criticize all and everything (It is very strong in me)
"I- poor girl" which likes to say: " I'am so tired, let me alone, I can't any more"
"I"- which likes be please especially when it expects any kind of profit.
"suspicious I" - really mad and very dangerous for me.
"I"-little girl, which likes joke, flirt and giggle... But this "I" is completely false and takes me much force and energy.

Sorry, I would write about my Roles and sufferings but I am pressed for time now. May be tomorrow I can write a little more .

Marina

Ponder daily, without expecting an answer: Everywhere two forces are at work, one attracting, another repelling. What is the third force?

Choose one of your "little I's" from the list made previously. During the week, whenever you notice that "little I" manifesting, use it as a reminder to Stop and remember yourself in all three centers.

Choose one of your deeply held beliefs from the list made previously. During the week, try to believe, feel and sense the opposite.

Choose one of your sufferings from the list made previously, one that you are likely to experience during the week. When in the grip of that suffering, try to endure it without complaining inwardly, without justifying it or making excuses for it.

During the week, whenever you encounter something that you dislike, evoke an inner smile and an attitude of thankfulness for another opportunity to remember yourself.

Spend five minutes each day doing the sightless gaze - one attends to ones total visual field as a panoramic field of light, taking in everything without identifying or labeling the impressions as things or actions, good or bad. Sense the back of the head.

Every evening before sleep, review the days activities as if playing back a movie.

It's gray weather, and I'm in a depressed mood and find myself falling asleep again and again. The work I want to do is far away. How can I sense myself in the three centers? Who wants to help me get awake?

Wil

by Harry

Wil,

You can only help yourself get awake.

Not being snide.

Perfect description you give to begin with. Depressed. Grey weather.

Ok. You've got two negatives going there. So what other forces are involved? Is your depression emotional? Physical? Mental? If Gene Kelly could sing in the rain, then is grey always negative?

One of the things about the Law of Three is that what's negative on one level is affirming on another and neutralizing on a third.

So how do you rotate that triangle? Or move from one seven deflections to the next octave?

Remember, as well, that when the machine is depressed, it is a machine. And that's what you're trying to separate from.

Try to just 'be' with your depression. Don't run away from it, don't feed it, just try to endure it and observe it and sense it.

Thanks Ian

Its for sure, such a depressive mood, learns me a lot of my character, my little I's.
It took only two days and after that I could send away my negative emotions more easily. This past week, I saw how much selfjustifying I am using, the using is the thing that it turns me down.

Have a nice week,

Last week was one of those which show me how I'm unable to do. I've fallen to a deep sleep trying to go away from my life appointments but still having to do all these casual things - my job in the first place. Drunk more wine than the usual average, failing to refuse my friends' offers.

Working with the list of "Little I's" showed how I'm almost always in all these inner considerations and dialogues and personality concerns. The list continued to grow. I've noticed some states that are hard for me to name - trying to do that I came to definitions like "a little bit of envy with much fear and a little attachment to the emotional memories". Found out that I don't want to be sentimental though something in me wants.

by Marina

Last week I either forgot or fall asleep while my attempts of pondering about the third force.And the task with small “I” as reminder I found very useful and it stimulated my self-observation. I chose my “poor I” as reminder and was very surprised about how much I have pity for myself. It was like something break through in me. I was almost non stop complaining about difficulties of life. And this was shocking! But meanwhile one of my I-s was indifferent and could observe everything what was going with me. This was very strong sensation of my duality. And I felt a great panic of my “poor I” and its resistance from self-observation. This was as if something was saying in me: “Stop this, so you can get a schizophrenic “ This was very interesting experience. I’ve never seen this “poor I” so well and how it was strong in me. Then I could confirm how afraid is it of self-observation. And then it went out slowly and I was not wasted, on the contrary I felt burst of energy and a small triumph.As to my work with deeply held beliefs here I must confess that this was very hard for me. Some times I tried to make list of my deeply held beliefs, but couldn’t progress. I could find out just two of my convictions, and when I was going to choose one of them to feel and sense the opposite I felt such a hate for myself. I know this was my false personality which resist and hate the Work, but this was so strong! I tried work with one of my sufferings, but also not succeeded in this.During last week several times I could evoke an inner smile and an attitude of thankfulness for another opportunity to remember myself. May be I was not sincerely enough because I felt a after-taste. But this task helped me to stop my automatic reactions and that why I found this practice very useful.As to sightless gaze, this task I always do with pleasure because in a such way I always get very much power from impressions. I find this practice magical. There is nothing for it, but to learn to keep this power and not to dissipate for negative states 😀

While walking, sense the pull of gravity along the spine.

Practice the sightless gaze for ten minutes each day.

Sightless Gaze - one attends to ones total visual field as one diffuse, panoramic field of light, taking in everything without identifying or labelling the impressions as things or actions, good or bad, pleasant or unpleasant.

When in the grip of a negative emotion such as anger or resentment, instead of manifesting outwardly, count to ten while performing the ten bone illumination exercise.

10 Bone Illumination Exercise - Direct the Attention deep into the marrow of the major elements of the bone structure in the following manner. Whenever the force of attention permits, visualize a brilliant light emanating from the marrow of the bones where magnetic center possibly resides. The Seeker is encouraged to research what is presently known by the medical community about the structure and function of the bones and bone marrow. The Seeker may also repeat a prayer in conjunction with each bone, such as : Holy God, Holy Firm, Holy Immortal, Have Mercy Upon Us, or by repeating a counting sequence. The length of time that the attention is held on each bone can be varied.

1. Lower right leg bone.
2. Upper right leg bone.
3. Pelvic bone.
4. Upper left leg bone.
5. Lower left leg bone.
6. Spinal column and skull.
7. Upper right arm bone.
8. Lower right arm bone.
10. Lower left arm bone.

Express a childlike wonder or delight at familiar things.

---

by Harry

the ten bone illumination is interesting. A dispersion of energy from the solar plexus. . .energy feels the same. Helps keep the energy from fermenting.

Walking and spine: I seem to get lost at my hips. Feel the gravity more in my hips than spine.

Yet when I come to rest I feel a negative pain at the base of my spine.

Much coming back from past weeks inadvertently. Eating and breathing. Feet touching ground.

Have had some moments of childlike wonder, without any intention.

Worked much yesterday.

by Harry

Used the ten bone illumination while driving to work this morning. Usual irritation. I always feel so stupid for being irritated when drivers do the same things I do or did for years. Moving the energy around and out is beneficial.

by Anton

Ten bone illumination somehow caused me to notice my negative emotions much more often. It really helps to dis-identify at such moments.

Expressing the "childlike wonder" gave much pleasure and some energy which I didn't expect from this excercise. It was quite astonishing to find out that I'm able to make such emotion in me consciously.

by Marina

Last week I regular did all exercises, except weekend. And I was very frightened with ten bone ilumination, as I took notice of very strange and not peculiar to me spasms in my muscles. This was unexpected. What may it mean and should I continue or it will be better to stop?

Every time you walk through a doorway, repeat I AM and sense the reverberation throughout the body.

On one day, agree with everybody and observe the organisms resistance to expressing contrary opinions. Be aware of the "heat" this produces in you. Visualize this heat burning away your self-importance.

On another day, disagree with everybody and observe the organisms resistance to expressing contrary opinions. Be aware of the "heat" this produces in you. Visualize this heat burning away your self-importance.

Later in the week, review the different effects these exercises produced and report any interesting observations to the group forum.

Ponder - Do I see my own faults in others?

by Greg

It's Monday and I've been agreeing with everybody. There seems to be a tremendous amount of anger towards me. I also took a few days off to run to the beach this past weekend (are they resentful because I got "away"?) I am acutely aware of being more awake today --- I've already deliberately added a couple of previous exercises to the proceedings. Everyone else seems in deeper slumber. A cold snap came in last Wednesday and the weather's been colder than usual. Do we mechanically draw-in more and get cosier during the first chill?

The beach was wild with wind --- bone chillingly cold. The ocean a Romantic oil painting of swelling grey-green trussedc with frothy irregular white caps. I kept tight inside myself observing, cooling with an ever widening "sightless gaze". The question came up "What emotional state is this describing?"

Afterwards, drawn into "Incredible Sales" at the local Factory Outlets I go on a rampage. A slithery "I" convinces me that everthing is fine because I am taking time carefully looking at everything and buying only things I really need. The return home has turned the tables 180 degrees.
Things never used or worn still sitting--- unused and not worn.

Fortunately, I will easily be able to return things here at home. But the action remains. A gnawing, inside-out pulling at my innards. An irritating guilt. A grey-green deadness.

I succumbed to an undertow.

To disagree within the workplace (where I spend and overwhelming amount of time) would not be a smart idea. Being run on a cult of niceness, I learned a long time ago that if I wished to keep my job, I'd better heel to. The niceness workplace persona is so interesting --- so much razor-edged anger simmers barely beneath the surface. On occasion, my own does as well.

When affirming I AM in the doorway, I resonates early in the day from my throat, later closser to the heart. AM drops and spirals down in the solar plexus. finally rolling and centering like a marble in the base of my belly.

Doorways always (for as far back as I can remember) effect a transformative power on the Emotional body --- energizing it more or less. For film buffs in our group, Jean Cocteau provides the perfect visual metaphor (for me) for this experience: when a fainted Beauty is carried by her Beast through a doorway, her ordinary travelling clothes are transformed into silks and satins during the passage from one room to the other.

I have always had the "felt" experience of multiple "line drawn" (Platonic?) doorways rushing past me in the opposite direction as I pass through the actual door. It unexceptionally carries a pleasant sensation. While doing the I AM it came to me that I have never counted the number of these multiple doorways --- there seem to be seven or eight, but it's just out of capture.

Agreeing at the workplace gets me looked at funny!

Doorways have proven harder to "remember" for me than walking, breathing, etc. If they open and close it's easier. But so many of my doorways are never closed. I dislike closed doors. Could probably find a Freudian reason for that, if Freud meant anything.

Am has always resonated in the solar plexus for me. Wish in throat, heart, genitals. Can spine. I head brain.

A circular motion. Donovan "Happiness is a circular motion." though I fear he meant something else.

How does a culture that created visions like Beauty and the Beast end up not understanding anything? I know the answer to that. I just find that the Disney-a-fication of everything will leave our descendents without anything to keep them out of senseless conflicts and useless sufferings.

by Greg

Harry's repeated statements down through the months concerning solar orientations hit home in a big way this week. It entered through a book I read (A SYSTEM OF CAUCASIAN YOGA) and in bits and pieces in other places. So, I listened for once, and started incorporating an awareness of it today ---- am I facing the sun or am I into my shadow?

Freud --- life lived and oriented around and defined by Instinctive Center (?) Certainly, sex center. Freud ---- an accurate description of life lived in Nicoll's basement of our house? I guess he's worth that illumination.

Harry, wouldn't you say that an INDIVIDUAL created Jean Cocteau's BEAUTY AND THE BEAST in the midst of a culture? Certainly, the later Disney version is a trashing/product of a culture. Cocteau's film: such an awakener for me at a certain point of my life.

by Harry

Cocteau was certainly attempting at least B level art. . .the taste is totally different. From that era of my life I remember Beauty and the Beast and Children of Paradise. Guess I watched a lot of French films in college.

Much more aware of doorways today. Hope I can continue.

Work language is Work.

Fortunately I have not had to watch much Disney. Even when my son was young he didn't like Disney. Though my nieces are all addicted.

I put Freud in the same category as Rimbaud. Someone I had to experience, but eventually saw as self-indulgent. (Damn that statement sounds like it's full of conceit.)

I've been struggling with the idea of introducing Work to people. This is not something that has bothered me in the past. I've known when to do or say something. How far to go. More directly, now, I feel that my sister could benefit; but don't even know if there's a way to reach her. She sees the differences Work has made in my life, though she doesn't know anything about what I believe or practice.

Also wish I could help my step father die. He's been struggling to do that for six months now. Know it's his fate, what he has to work out. . .

Too much of myself in this post.

Disney's SLEEPING BEAUTY is an exception (perhaps) Golden Section underlies much of its widescreen design. Always loved the look of it anyway. But then I'm a sucker for the Pre-Raphealite paintings of Burne-Jones (which BEAUTY resembles) Cocteau alledgedly entered an esoteric society . . . still have trouble cracking THE TESTAMENT TO ORPHEUS ---- uneven film with gems.

Also struggle with my sister over intro to Work. She was early on turned off by Ouspensky (couldn't get past his presentation to the absorb the ideas) Tried volume one of COMMMENTARIES. Don't think it "happened" for her. Have introduced a handful of people down through the years via THE NEW MAN. Don't know how many saw it through to the next step . . .

It is always difficult to watch the pain (Boy, that also feels full of conceit)

Watched Gwyneth Paltrow's SYLVIA movieand purely from the Work psychological standpoint (i.e. not to trivialise Plath's actual complexities, although I do wonder about some of that too) it is good to know that I have ways that lead me away from those "neighborhoods" she rersided in.
While I not always successful, I am fortunate to have been introduced to the Work --- it is a great gift.

At end of busy work day, while taking inventory of some equipment I use, as I made notation of some overstock I received what appeared to be a glimpose of Recurrence which added to my understanding of it. Spurred by the feeling that the overstock was "residue" from a previous occurence an opening occured in my consciousness, in a glimpse, that cannot be described.

Think I've been to sleepy to do the work. To negative too. In my job, lots of trouble, to many hours at work, tired and down. This day I persuaded myself not being so negative. It went better. Laughed a lot this evening, feeling all three parts of being again.
I have to find the clue again, why doing work. To master myself and get a life.

by Greg

Wilma:

When I am too sleepy that is a reminding factor in my Work that I must get to Work. That is a super-effort to go beyond the pale of my sleepiness.

When I am too negative that is a reminding factor that I am falling back into Sleep and I must make a super-effort, go the extra mile to "act" my way into a new orientation towards the thing/person I am negative towards. Other wise it has won and robbed me of some energy ---- it is eating me rather than me devouring it.

There are no more clues to find for me about my Work. There is the simple fact that I am lazy, negative and sleepy by Nature and all these things rob me of my energy (if I give into them) and rob me of my birthright to efrfect Work.

Work as practised reveals itself as the "new life" I want to get.

This morning I pronounced a series of steady and firm I AMs in the direction of the Sun after jumping out of bed immediately when my eyes opened. (Thank you, Harry !) When I got to the job I immediately addressed a situation (interpersonal) that I had allowed to flounder for weeks ----- something which I was "owning" which I never should have "owned" to begin with. I stated firmly (and with tact) what I would do and what I no longer would do in relationship to it. It was finally taken care of but (I believe) only because I was manifesting my I AMness in the face of something which was eating away at my presence.

Greg,

Mr. Nyland, or one of his associates, made me do it over 20 years ago. So thank him.

My reading this morning seems pertinent to both of you, Greg and Wilma: See the pendulum in your self. Everything swings back and forth. And here's the big secret, extremes lead to extremes.

Extremely important, as well, to remember that it is a machine. Made up of multiple imaginary "i's", each a gear in the way the machine works. That I that can separate will see that the anger or sadness or tiredness isn't I.

Anger is an event. It only happens if something says "i" to it. Some anger is necessary. But that anger is usually an act. Raising my son I'd find myself in situations where "I" had to be angry or vexed or whatever. Though I was really laughing inside. He'd punched out the school bully and was suspended. I couldn't congratulate him until years later. (Which I did.) Because he had to understand that suspension wasn't beneficial to his later life. So I was "upset". But I was damn proud of him inside. And had to keep myself from laughing at the assistant principal who kept saying "It takes two to tangle." It's also funny how those events then work out. When I brought him back to be readmitted to school. . .a seventh grader who'd punched out the 8th grade bully, the high school cheerleaders said hello to him. Unheard of. And I couldn't tell him until years later how cool that was. (Though he knew, in his own way.)

Sacrifice suffering. And what is anger but suffering. . .

Harry

by Greg

Harry:

I am not sure of all you are driving at here.

As per "extremes" : if you are refering to the answering of a situation with a super-effort (and I am not saying that you did) I thought as far as Work is concerned only super-efforts counted. I need to know the reason for your referring to extremes.

Also, who mentioned "anger"? I mentioned firmness, which is qualitative for me. "Anger" is something else. Again, maybe you weren't referring to that.

Part of the problem with the computer dialogue, as mentioned in another forum on this site, is that it abstracts the commmunication process --- we miss each other's presence. Like what Orson Welles siad concerning film that it was essentially a dead medium and therefore he had to "fuss-up" the images to create an effect of aliveness.

So I need clarification as to what you are recognizing as extreme and of anger in our statements.

Thanks.

---

by Harry

Extreme is meant, only, as the ends of the swing of the pendulum. If I see one end of the swing, I need to try to see the other.

I mentioned anger only as an example.

Thank you Greg, you are supporting me!

Last few days I had more energy. I now know that I have to give appearance to the body. Doing instead of only living through head and heart. So this days I'm cleaning up my house, doing things I don't like; it gives me energy and helps to wipe away my negative thoughts.

Yes. I allso think that everything will eventually work out in its opposite. Sometimes (maybe even often) I'm forgetting this and feel myself drowning in temporary emotions:incorporating one of my so called i's.

I liked how you delt with your son. I have allso two kids, 15 and 17. Thank you for sharing.

I can't say that I was asleep during last week, I could regular remember about my aims, but nevertheless I found myself absolutly incapable to fulfil work exercises. It was as if my work "I-s" were uncoordinated and coudn't oppose my false I-s, they were too week. Last week I had no energy and this state has showed me that if I won't make supper efforts for saving and making more energy I'll get nowhere. How is possible to unit good "I-s"? How is possible to increase energy for separating myself from negative states?

Damn why I can't do anything even very small things? Why I do my Work in that way What "It" wishes and when "It" wishes and not what "I" wish?

regards,
Marina

by Greg

Harry:

Thanks! I gotcha!

Wilma:

When "I" do housework (which "It" never wants to do) "I" must keep an eye out to make sure "I" am not falling asleep in the housework. I have to convince "It" bit by tiny bit that scrubbing the floor will "feel" better --- a sly manuveur. "I" does housework with as much attention as "I" can bear with the intention of accumulating more energy. Part of this process is the releasing rather than the quieting of negativity. As the solar plexus gets activated, what we call Good, Bad, and Indifferent manifests. I try to affirm each as it makes an appearance. (And I get a clean floor in the bargain!)

Ponder daily, without expecting an answer: Are the aims of external considering in conflict with the aims of internal considering?

During the week, when you experience a disagreement with the beliefs of others, instead of reacting, try to experience yourself as a three centered being, present to your physical, emotional and intellectual states.

When driving in a car, whenever you see a speed limit sign, slow down and repeat inwardly 'I AM' while sensing your hands on the steering wheel. Ponder - What determines how fast I react to the unpleasant suggestions of others?

Every evening before sleep, review and sense and feel the days activities as if playing back a movie.

by Harry

That distaste for the mechanical in others and in myself is such a part of that three centered approach to disagreement.

My boss gives many opportunities. Left work 25 minutes early on Wednesday to get a jump on holiday traffic (Thanksgiving here, for those who live in countries other than the States). Got an email from my boss 30 minutes later chastizing each of the three staff for leaving the office uncovered for 25 minutes. He called from out of town and no one answered.

My mechanical self dislikes sitting around. So I decided to leave. His mechanical self, which I know, feels betrayed when anyone does anything he doesn't want done. "Clients are going unserved. . ."

This email was sent to irritate and maintain power. I struggled with it all evening Wednesday, mostly because I told the secretary she could leave with me. Irradiated my bones. Felt all three centers.

There is a mechanical i in me that dislikes being treated as a slave or child. I know this is all mechanical. I know this is all an event playing out. I don't want to give it any power. I know there is ego involved. I also know there is the comfort of a continued paycheck involved.

Hard work to leave go. Irradiating bones helps, but this little boy in my mind still wants to please mommy and daddy. And yet is rebellious enough to go "its" own way. . .

very recognisable Harry. In my job everthing is wrong, it drives me to a part of myself as being a little child again: feeling victmised, dumb, not smart enough, suffering by dismanagement of a whole organisation. And it takes my whole being, it eats me because i cant be objective and instead of im just blaming alternately myself and the others. Falling asleep and feeling disintegrated. Its a mess over here.

My son sent me the following experience via email this morning. Thought I'd share it:

This morning, I woke up at around 6am, I was still pretty tired but I decided I would straighten up the apartment while I was only halfway in it, and then catch up on my work after a short nap. I realized that I had not cleared my cats' litter box in over two days, and they were probably none to happy about it. So I cleaned it out, gathered together the other garbage that had been accumulating in my kitchen, and carried it down to the trash.
I was wearing black shorts and a long sleeved shirt, with loafers but no socks. It wasn't that cold, but it had been raining the night before, and everything was soggy in the dim dawn light. I carried all the trash in one hand, with my elbow bent - it was about 20 lbs, and surprisingly taxing to maintain in a single position. After dropping it in the trash, I heard barking behind the apartment, pretty close to where I was. I wondered if it was my neighbors' dog that I had just recently complained about. Anyway, I turned around and started walking to get my mail, which I had neglected for several days as well.
A few steps from the garbage cans, the dog bounded out, barking a challenge. It was a black lab, I think, with its head coming up maybe to my belly button. In any case, it was a big black dog, at least 150lbs, and maybe breaking two bills and passing my own weight. It was shiny, very loud, very black, and had two tattered handkerchiefs tied around its neck. Its tail was not wagging, and it was running towards me.

Everything inside me fell away. Two thousand years of civilization rolled back, and the only trouble worth thinking about was the fact that I had no weapon readily available to me. I was a tribesman caught by a wolf at the watering hole. I was afraid. A hundred different images passed through my mind, all in the space of two tenths of a second. Somewhere in a part of my brain I didn't even know I had, I was figuring out if I could grab it by the head and break its neck if it jumped on me, deciding if it was stronger or faster than me. I knew instinctively that if I turned and ran it would pursue me. There were no words involved in any of it.
In the third tenth of a second, I was calm, centered, in control. I remembered a story my father had told me about a dog, and something Gurdjieff had done. I stared at the dog and extended my left hand. It was probably 3 feet away from the tips of my fingers at that point. It stopped. It looked at me. I looked back. There was no thinking. I swallowed my fear, and the most external parts of my mind emanated good thoughts out from my mind, through my finger towards the dog. I realized that I was talking then.
"Good boy... good dog... we're friends... be calm..."
The exact words are a blur to me now, 20 minutes later, as the whole experience loses the crisp crystal clarity that I tried to capture here before it was lost inside the rest of life. My words were flat, monotone, and concealing caveman calculations going on in older parts of my self.
The dog ran back towards the back. A wise man would have walked into the house, and gotten the mail later, after this dog was leashed by its owner. But then, I never claimed to be a wise man. I was still in a clear calm and empty state of mind, and I did not want to give in to a primal fear, whether it was justified or not. I would continue with my goal, no longer for the goals sake, but simply to do it against my own desire.

As I walked towards the mailbox, the dog ran back out, and stood in front of me. I was still talking to it, the same basic processes at work, but I knew that this time it was different. It was still a domesticated dog, and I was in control of the situation. Its tail was down, moving slowly side to side, not really wagging, more twitching. It blocked my way to the mailbox. I slowly walked towards it, extending my hand so it could smell me if it wanted - and incidentally so I could grab it if it jumped. I never took my eyes off of its. I knew that I could not let it hurt me then. As I took a few steps forward, it barked one more time and ran off, to watch me from a distance. Never letting confidence overcome prudence, I turned around and backed my way towards the mailbox, not taking my eyes off of it for more than a moment. If I had done so, I would have been letting the control in the situation change.

After I picked up my mail, it was gone and my heart was beating. I was now 100% awake, and more had occurred in those few minutes than had in the last few days. I walked into the house, my mind still empty. As soon as the door was latched behind me, I felt the world come back onto me, and I knew that I would forget as soon as I got involved in whatever event came at me next. That's why I decided to write this down, so that someday maybe I could use this to remember.

Thanks for sharing your son's experience with the dog, Harry, it was very much to the point. We can come to ourselves at the most 'in-opportune' times - whether it be a dog; our Boss; or a petal falling from a rose that takes an eternity before it falls gently on the ground.

Last week was not a good one on the Work side. To be honest, I began doing excercises only on Sunday at the end of the week. Except the excercise I chose to continue instead of when-driving-a-car excercise (I don't drive a car) - the excercise from the previous week with saying "I am" while stepping through doors. We (Marina, me and our friend with whom we meet weekly to discuss our work) couldn't get good results with this excercise on the week it was supposed to be done so we decided to continue practising it last week. By the end of the week I automatised to remember that "I am" almost every time I walk through any door. The excercise turned out to be very useful for attaing quite a good (more conscious than usually) state throughout the day.

I also managed to do the excercise with "playing back the day's activities" yesterday (I completely forgot to do it last week) and it ended with quite a profound experience of myself as a very weak, unconscious man, lacking insight in what is happening with my fellows (accusing everyone for the smallest things while not noticing the good attitude expressed to me and expressing anger and anxiety almost always). I'm grateful to Marina ("Marina" on this forum) for reminding me of this excercise. I'll try to continue doing it.

I would say that it's not the first time when the excercises given on the previous week are practised the next week. It takes time to me to include a new excercise to my "inner schedule". Well, it's lack of inner discipline, I understand, but the pace that is set in this work group seems sometimes somewhat too fast for me. The excercises I make use of most are those I practise for the long time. Our small group with Marina and our friend has practised the "soil preparing" excercise from the Third series (we call it the "three fingers excercise") for half a year and we continue to do it and this excercise gave me some very unexpected results on the work of emotional center and of the state when all three centers work simultaneously. Well I don't propose to slow down the pace of our work just want to ask for an advice what to do in this situation.

You may use any of the exercises from past weeks for your current Work. Past exercises are not meant to be discarded; if you find them useful continue to use them. We are in the process of building up a repertoir of exercises that can be used in all situations that we encounter in our lives. Take what you need and Work at your own pace.

All exercises are based on the law of three.
In general there are two major catagories of exercises -
The first type, Conscious Labour, work with balancing the three centers.

The second type, Intentional Suffering, work with a resistance or denying Force in one of the centers.

While walking, practice the sightless gaze and sense the center of gravity in the solar plexus/hara.

When in the grip of a negative emotion such as anger or resentment, instead of manifesting outwardly, count to ten while sensing the turmoil in your abdomen.

When in the grip of a negative emotion such as annoyance or depression, express gratitude by adopting an intentional yet unusual posture and repeating silently -

Oh Endlessness,
Help me on the way -
To enjoy the unenjoyable,
To like the unlikeable,
To love the unlovable.

End each day with a hearty laugh.

by Harry

It's amazing how we've been conditioned to turn our 3D+ World into a 2D or less world. Walking with sightless gaze brings back the third and maybe even more dimensions. . .it also brings back the sense of motion.

Was this so when we were younger? Remember learning to ride a bike? Were we taught to become focused and body centered and lost our normal vision?

What about pictures and TV?

Have we turned our lives flat as a piece of paper? (Remember O's description of dot, line, plane, etc.)

If we are to become like unto little children (I almost type like unto light) then we must pull energy back in from the outside where we've attached it. Or we must create much much more energy. . .

by Anton

> Harry wrote:

This question reminded me of some experiences when I was working on myself more than usual (maybe really working instead of pretending to do so)- I often at these times notice that my perception of outer and inner world becomes more rich and at these moment I question myself - if I lost such a perception while growing up or it's just an illusion that "Life was richer in the childhood".

Well the first answer is supported by experiencing often at these moments some emotions (which are quite hard to express in words - they are too gentle and complicated) that remind me of my childhood. I don't remember my childhood very well - I tend to forget even the events in my life that happened several months ago. And also I don't remember that in my childhood I was so astonished with the emotions I had then. Maybe the connections of the centers grew with the Work so I began to notice the emotions and sensual experiences I always had...

This week's exercises seemed to have effected an encapsulation of self-protection. The feeling has been of walking around inside a translucent, but inpenetrable (from the outside) sheilding device. There is a strong feeling of security. This feeling came in yesterday and I went out to get my hair cut in a slightly different fashion to help bolster the feeling and see what would happen.

Responses to and around me are subtly different than usual.

Two days of solid and apparently dreamless sleep. The goodnight "guffaw" brings a final clearing out of the days poisons. State of being previously described has evaporated but has left a residue of something uncovered about myself. Hi Melissa Welcome and glad you're here.

Nobody says anything here that is "off" (or we all say things that are sometimes "off") --- we just say what what we need to say as we chart what's going on. And you have very clearly stated just that.

When I worry, second-guess, prognosticate, diagnose (and I catch myself doing and/or attempting to do those things many times) I have a reminding principle for myself --- "Greg, your_____ (fill-in "worry", "second- guessing", etc. etc etc.) is subverting your Presence". Now, when I come back to my "centers", and check on my state of being it is, after that, like a big chest of drawers with each drawer pulled out to some degree and the clothes haphazardly thrown in, this way and that. My Work at that point is how to restore order and bring this three-centered-being, into a state of harmony, or "stillness" if you like. When I get there its like the fish we see in an aquarium just "hanging there while flurries of motion from "schools" and other groups of water creatures rush past. That one fish with the constant fluttering of its fins, hangs still, quiet, eyes wide open.

Melissa,

I spent many years, and still occassional days or even weeks, with that dreaded hydra "anticipation".

One of the biggest helps to me was something someone said: "You can only change yourself. . ." Or, as Grace Slick sang "Don't ever change people, even if you can."

Your life, your work, your I. . .

Greg,

I don't know whether Keefe would join or not. We've talked about it and he's been sent the link. I think he needs to make that choice himself. That's been my way with everything. Never gave him a Gurdjieff book. Of course he saw Pop reading every morning. He's bought his own copies of everything. In many ways he's beyond me.

Thanks, Harry and Greg. After writing that last nite, and thinking on things today I felt better, lighter even, without solving anything. The issues are still there. But, just that attitude change changed my whole day. I used my commute time to recite "make the unbearable bearable" and it was. I had more opportunities present themselves at work, previously uncommunicative apt. mates communicated and became motivated for the first time in weeks. I am leaning toward wondering how long this will last, etc, but why should I let the unknown future mar my wonderful present. I read somewhere that statistically a miracle happens every day for everyone everywhere . We just have to learn to see them.

The "good" times have lasted a long time this week. They too have a lifespan and will be over with . Of course, the "good, the bad, and the ugly" are as Harry has a couple of times reminded us here "events passing" --- certainly not anything to glom onto, or identify with.

Went to see film on Alfred Kinsey and his "good intentions" last night and afterwards pondered those who stand up in the world for what they perceive as right and what it all ultimately means really. Even G. and his "urgency" about "the terrror of the situation" and what that means for me , today . . . Now. Many questions. No answers. No definite ones . . . just an abundance of atmospheres and clouds of "states" in response to that. At 19 years of age full of beans idealism and Isadora Duncan I had a head obsessed with the Art That Saves Humanity. Truely, I am glad to have been able to have had those thoughts and feelings, but its a surefire recipe as I see it for a confused Mind and a broken Heart --- it doesn't work that way, "It" certainly doesn't Work that way.

The miracle is that anyone is able to make anything this far down the scale of Creation. But it can, indeed does happen . . .

Hi Melissa,

Welcome aboard!

What prevented you from meeting your expectations?
Are your expectations the same as your aims?
Do you accept your self as you are now?
Understanding your current position is the firm footing from which you step forward. Until you know the dis-ease, you can't prescribe a cure.

Every day do one thing that 'it' does not want to do. Experience any suffering that arises and bear it without complaint. Afterwards, Ponder - Does Being transform the suffering through which it arises?

Once a day sit quietly and try to enter a state of All-Brains-Balanced-Being-Perception. When all three centers are relaxed, Ponder - If everything is connected, who am I?

by Harry

"Does Being transform the suffering through which it arises?"

I'm not sure what this sentence means.

My inclination is to say yes. One of the tasks I've given myself over the years is to not leave little things undone. If I drop something, I pick it up rather than kick it aside. If something is out of place I put it in place rather than leave it. If I encounter something left by another that inconveniences me, I go about doing what I need to do without cursing the inconvenience.

A practical example: I'm generally the person who makes ice at work. Because others don't seem to be able to put water in trays. Making ice often results in an ice cube falling on the floor. It's so easy to kick an ice cube aside. Because ice melts and would disappear.
I make the ice without worrying who didn't make ice. If I drop a cube on the floor when opening a tray, I pick it up rather than kicking it under the sink. If the water bottle is empty I change it. Just because it has to be changed.

I don't do these things for others or for recognition. I do them to do them. I take them as a Work activity. Silently.

Suffering doesn't arrise much. But the experience is different. That internal resentment spot doesn't get tended with new fuel. Over something small.

Hello everyone. I was away for awhile and now am making a renewed committment to participate in this forum that I value dearly.

Asking myself to do things that it does not like, just for the sake of doing it, has an immediate impact on how I see that I am fixed to my attachments. For example when I make a phone call that I really don't want to make I see how I already have an expectation of how I want that person to respond and I fear that there will be another outcome that I cannot handle. Fear seems to be behind a lot of those things that I do not like to do. If I choose to make the phonecall for another reason that is not dependent on the outcome, I feel a lot more freedom in the activity. Making the phone call is still uncomfortable but the expectation shifts to something that welcomes the unexpected. This experience is directly related to the exercise of getting myself to do what it does not want to do with the spirit of enquiry.

Funny you should mention a phone call Faye. One of the first things I did that it didn't want to do this week was make a phone call. Didn't think of it as negative anticipation, but you're right. I didn't want to make it because I wanted to delay the inevitable. Conflict. And yet "it" is really proficient at conflict. . .

Nothing much happened. Went into voicemail, as usual. And the entire conflict is delayed, another day.

I noticed just the same thing with phone calls.

I had a difficulty finding what my machine doesn't like to do and so thank you for the reminder.

Many times i too have had problem finding something that the machine does not want to do ('cuz of buffers...?) but ask and it comes! - am covering for someone at work which means doing my job and theirs. am quite frazzled after a week of doing this, but as tears and frustration are churning within i chant the chant of last week or i wish this to be used for the presence of my presence in the present....
then lo and behold, (after an eternity of effort) space....

Does being transform the suffering through which it arises.
Or does suffering transform the being it inhabits?
As a person who lives with a painful chronic condition I have to ask myself everyday and sometimes every hour which will will win. How does one transform the suffering? Accept it, make friends with it, invite it in for a drink and a chat? or wrestle with it like it's a ferocious bear coming for your loved ones? Ignore it like the elephant in the middle of the room and keep going; saying to yourself "it's not here, not real, only minor really, don't be such a lazy cow?
I've seen what happens when the suffering does the transforming, the bitterness, the loss of hope.
Who's in charge of the machine? I am
Now for my dumb newbie question - In quick search of my growing notes I did not find reference to All-Brains-Balanced-Being-Perception can someone help me out? Seems I read it somewhere but didn't note it. Thanks, Melissa

Melissa,

Usually we inhabit only one brain, and at that the outer center of that brain. Most of us are inclined, or trained, to function best in a certain center.

Take driving a car. It is an instinctive center task. Because you are actually moving very fast and the car is an extension of your body. But to learn this task you need the head to teach the body. But now some danger is sensed, and it becomes emotional; and things are done that neither your brain or trained body could imagine.

Same with hitting a ball. Be it golf, baseball, tennis ball, etc.

Music begins with the head teaching the body to perform specific motions. But only transcends when emotions are invoked in the skilled playing. It's easy for many to see a technically skilled player who has no emotion, or a head player. Or an unskilled emotional genius.

All brains balanced means bringing all three of those brains together on the same focus. One of the first steps is to have any one center observe another. When all three are brought to bear then there is a balance.

There is an internal taste to this. It's almost a quiet. But it's very alive. I believe it's at the end of Life is Real where G describes everything that is going on in him at that moment.

My favorite secular description is from Tom Rapp (Pearls Before Swine):
"We are all prayers of action on our way to God."

by Faye

Yes, Harry, I think that I function most of the time from just one centre. It rather feels flat even when it might be functioning well, such as when driving a car. There can be some satisfaction from that.

If I am looking for something that I do not like to do, it works well to do something that I think that I do well such as driving a car and adjust it so that it does no longer feed the sense of satisfaction. One significant effort for me was to drive a couple of kilometers below the speed limit when I felt like sailing along the usual 10 over, for an extended period of time, (at least five or ten minutes). Something that may seem silly that takes an effort for me is to go out with messy hair or poorly dressed.

It seems that there is another dimension when I do something that it does not want to do. Perhaps, it is the observing of another centre, that Harry mentioned. There is a separation that feels like depth and distance from an automatic one brained action.

Actually it is a very good question. It is a phrase that Gurdjieff used in his book Beelzebub's Tales to His Grandson to describe a state of unified Being or Self Remembering that can arise when all our three centers are balanced and harmonized and working together.

Here is a very succinct and to the point quote from my Teacher about this -
"We are "harmonized" when our three centers are coordinated in unison rather than "in chaos" when each center acts independantly of the others (our usual, normal, mechanical condition). We approach harmony when the three centers are each relaxed because then they are comfortably related to one another. In meditation we try to be as physically relaxed or loose as possible, to which is added a neutral emotional condition, to which is added a quiet mind (no thought). A goal is to do everything with the three centers harmoniously related."
"We must work toward a constant state of self-observation where we become more and more connected with the observer who is objectively observing "it" (the observed). Self-observing requires conscious effort; the observer is the rememberer, who becomes the doer, who becomes." (Paul Beidler)

To Work towards this goal I would recommend a daily regime of at least 20 minutes of meditation. This will form a base of three-centeredness which can be extended into all situations of our daily life.

I liked your rephrasing of the question - "Or does suffering transform the being it inhabits?"

Work with Suffering is a big part of the Gurdjieff Work. In fact Intentional Suffering (IS) is one of the two pillars of the WorK, along with Conscious Labour.
It took me many years of struggle to get a handle on the idea of IS. The Buddha's teaching of the Four Noble Truths of Suffering can shed some light on this subject. Gurdjieff surely indicated that IS was the royal road to transformation.

The way to Work with it is as you say - "Accept it, make friends with it, invite it in for a drink and a chat."

The attitude behind those strategies is called Affirmation. When we Affirm our suffering, we can transform the energy for a higher purpose. Of utmost importance in any strategy with any suffering is the Intention.

I also suffer from a painful chronic condition - RA. I denied it in the beginning but eventually came to accept it as a friend. At the very least it helps me to maintain a constant awareness and Sensing of my body - one of the prerequisites involved in All-Brained-Balanced-Being-Perception.

Other valid candidates for IS are the unpleasant manifestations of others and the confilcts with our expectations.

Here are a couple of quotes that may shed some light on the idea of IS -

Intentional Suffering is the intentional acceptance of all suffering which is a part of all existence. To prepare us for this type of Holy Affirmation in our daily lives we are assigned special exercises, including seeking out or welcoming suffering in all its forms, especially those forms which are overlooked or moved into different categories, such as "anxiety", "fear" or "depression". It is sometimes useful as a preparation to induce self-imposed suffering but this is to be abandoned when we learn how to meet the normal lot of humanity's suffering. (Paul Beidler)

The essence of the idea of Karma-Yoga is to meet with unpleasant things equally with pleasant things. That is, in practicing Karma-Yoga, one does not seek always to avoid unpleasant things, as people ordinarily do. Life is to be met with non-identifying. When this is possible, life becomes one's teacher; in no other sense can life become a teacher, for life taken as itself is meaningless, but taken as an exercise it becomes a teacher. It is not life that is a teacher, but one's relation through non-identifying makes it become a teacher. Nothing can change being so much as this practice - namely, to take the unpleasant things in life as an exercise. (Maurice Nicoll, Commentaries, Vol. 1)

You have been Blessed with that experience - many people spend their whole lives seeking for such experiences.
There is nothing to fear - you are coming closer to understanding what you really are.
We get frightened because our Ego feels threatened with the loss of identity. Feel the fear but don't let it hold you back. Go beyond it. A whole new understanding of life and consciousness and inter-connectedness is opening up to you.

Well Ian, I read the word - meditate - and suddenly felt afraid. I don't know why, I use to meditate often when I was younger. I've got some real work to do, I have forgotten my quiet spaces, I keep my mind overly occupied, I have become afraid and didn't even know. Thanks.

It is, Melissa, as you say; the quiet and how we want to avoid it.

The quiet can be a meeting with sheer terror ---- there's an awfulness once that personality is actually "looked behind". For me it was learning the steps to take to find the place behind the mask

. . . it is a drop off a precipice.

Ponder : Is Being woven in the heavy curtains of pain, irritations, and annoyances?

Every morning, during periods of three-centered relaxation, try to find a sense of oneness with everything by gravitating toward the one central point in the middle of the earth.

Observe and name which 'I' is the subject in each phrase spoken during the day.

Before sleep, evoke a Joy of Being.

Let's get this week started.

Perhaps something in me anticipated the week's exercize. Sunday morning I awoke rather unnaturally early. (For a weekend.) I didn't want to arrise and I didn't want to let that formatory brain start planning, so I moved into a meditative state. A very strong quiet morning.

The same thing occurred on Monday. Couldn't give it as much time, but stayed in a meditative state until I had to get up. Very alive morning, very strong walk to the office.

Then the pendulum swang back, but I managed to keep too much negative from swinging in. . .let it swing by and what entered to radiate from my bones.

Have been doing my Solistice Fast (fully vegan until Christmas). Have noticed more energy. Waking much earlier than normal.

by Guest

I will face the fear, now that I know it is there, cause that's what I do. I turned off my radio for the commute home tonite. Granted, I did drive a little faster. I have many thoughts I did not realize were in the background, behind the noise. A lot more anxiety than I realized. I was almost believing the smiling, easygoing personae I portray. I haved moved through so much of my public life with that smile I thought it was who I was. I am much more than that, and more than the anxiety. The pendulum swings and somewhere in there is the total me. Is this what is meant by the holy equation?

Funny you should mention the mornings, Harry. My plan was to spend some time in the quiet of the mornings trying to relearn meditating (hope it's like riding a bicycle) Mornings have always been special times for me, before the day has a chance to intrude.

Sat in front of the television last evening, watching an intense three hour biography of Charles Dickens. Was playing a game with myself seeing if half of me could objectively watch the show while the other part of me connected mySelf with the all-point part of the middle of the Earth. Was successful almost immediately and stayed that way in the sturdy armchair, in front of the telly in an all-encompassing superawareness. I hesitate to but must describe the state as " 'Being', In Love" (and yes, I do like the double entendre --- it fits curiously). I stayed that way from the show's near beginning to end. I watched the show, I watched myself watching the show, I watched my breath, and I felt this powerful deep down into the Earth going waaaaaaaaaay down and boomeranging back up through my bodypast my face under the skin, under and over the skull, down my neck, spine , dividing equally at the buttocks, down both legs to feet as flat as a Pharoah's. and finally returning to the Earth again. Meanwhile above my head, the dim , almost-out-of-reach perception of two whirring energy wheels above my head, spinning evenly continuously as fast running ceiling fans.

There I was grounded, solid. And that incredible sense of not a care in the World and "Why do I ever worry---it is all so simple."

But, then "I" never really does, or has to . . .

Awake each morning as if you were entering the world for the first time. An unfocused, sightless gaze might be found useful for merging with an inter-connected universe free of the habitual labeling and identifying processes of the organism.

During the week, set aside your habitual likes and dislikes. Instead, try to experience those things or events as if for the first time, with an innocence not tainted by preconceptions.

In the evening, Ponder on how the weeks exercises might nourish the growth of an inner-being embryo.

---

by Harry

Ahh, the resistance.

I've awakened each morning with the exercize in mind. Can get to sightless gaze. . .

But slips away from me.

Probably something to do with waking earlier than usual. This season's fast has had the unusual effect of heightening my energy. The near elimination of sugar from my diet due to the diabetes is probably also a contributing factor. I've slept well. . .either dreamless or some significant lucid dreams. . .but have found myself waking an hour earlier than normal, at least.

Too much energy to go back to sleep, too much comfort to get out of bed. Were I Nicoll I'd probably pick up that novel he talks about. Instead I attempt meditation, usually slipping into warmth. . .Snowing outside. Freezing.

Reading the book I described early for my morning reading. Today's proposition: we cannot seek enlightenment; we must prepare ourselves to experience what we don't know. Then we can accept its coming. . .

Seems apt with this week's exercizes.

Also seems apt with the season.

Joy to All.

Upon arising in the morning, ponder: From where does resistance to work arise?

During the day, as you walk, sense the body by scanning from the feet up to the head on the in breath and scanning from the head down to the feet on the out breath. Try to observe the still point between breaths.

In the evening, perform a three centered relaxation to prepare a quiet place where the voice of conscience may be heard. Ponder: What course should I set for the future?

by Greg

With the dry, frigid air about these parts for the last 4 or 5 days my 20 minute walk from the train to work and back has been filled with watching the breath as I walk. I added this week's exercise of breathing. The quiet space in between inhalationm and exhalation reminds me once again (in sensory fashion) that it is truely the breathing process that SUPPORTS the planetary body's position of verticality. While there is (without a doubt) a complex muscularity involved, the question remains "What impulses that?". The answer: breathing. It is really miraculous, not to say, a little daunting.

I could say "sleep" is what produces the resistance to Work. I could say "Laziness" (both physical and metaphysical) Both are certainly true. But, what is it that lies beyond those action/inactions? Fear. Not wanting to face the changes and transformations. A sly devil-"i" wants to thieve from heaven ---- he wants the results but doesn't want to make the efforts. Even the short-cuts of the Sly Man (or the "Ruse") aren't good enough for him. It must be cheaper, easier effected by something like a halluinatory pill to be swallowed.

The dry frigid air ---- so full of electricity! Does this build the New Me? Last night on my way to my parents' I draw long, deep breaths, holding for a moment to absorb the chill (like food). When I arrive at their doorstep (30 minutes later) Niklausz their Polish sheepdog runs up to me, burning with affection. I rub my hands down his fur and am taken aback as his hair stands on end from the static. Was my INTENTIONAL breathing of the cold air a contributer to this small pheonomena?

The dry cold air and dry hot air I've found to be the best for breathing. In quasi (or perhaps Actual) alchemical terms: It is wise for this "feeling-centered" ("wet") person to introduce as much "dry" to Balance.

THE COSMIC FRAGMENTS of Heraclitus comes to mind: "A dry soul is best". That bit has rung in my head for years. Perhaps since the 5th century B.C. . . . ? Ouspensky? Are you out there?

Best Wishes and Warm Feelings to All.

I could quickly think of things that cause resistanct to work. It seems that the whole world is set up to cause resistance, to lull us to sleep. The TV, the radio, family issues that make you want to escape into sleep. But as I tried the breathing exercise I realize that forgetfullness and the "next thing you have to do" also cause resistance.
I try to keep in my mind every time I walk to do the exercise. When I remembered fully and felt able to try, I felt it for a few seconds, a lightness, then I saw the elevator doors and immediately thought of the job I had to do upstairs. Talking to people, helping people, doing what I do for my meat and veggies. That also can cause resistance. For me it is even other peoples requirement of my time. If there is a problem at the job, an issue, or whatever, I am blessed to hear it all, over and over again.
Since I am such a newbie, and feeling like I am groping for the light that will fully wake me, the resistance is forgetfullness. Perhaps a little fear. How will this change me, what will I become? More than I am.
A very long time ago, in another life I realized that what I had been searching for was ME. I come full circle after losing me yet again. I am still searching for me.

Was off for the week and without computer. Having a minor problem fixed while under warranty. Had a dozen inches of snow the 23rd. The same night my step father had a heart attack. Surviving for some reason. He's 89 and seeing his body lying in bed struggling for breath for life. . .

My son is in town and of course it's the holidays. Finally got computer back yesterday. Bueracracy is so much fun.

Work is different when I'm not out facing the world. Less resistance to face. Or a different kind.

Received Gurdjieff's Harmonium Music. Put it on in the morning. My son's two cats are visiting. Strangely they both sat attentively while the harmonium music was playing. Both together, heads moving from right to left. Definitely sitting and listening to the music.

by Greg

The still point between the inhalation and exhalation as produced an interesting result (image). I am ideokinetically (I "see" [in my Mind's eye} and simultaneously am aware of tactally) a thin silver thread hanging vertically in an whitish interior space. The white moves cilindrically from right to left. It is the insides of my outsides. This thread connects me with my "me-ness".

The inhalation brings a pulling up to the top of my head the "bagginess" of my planetary body. The exhalation allows the body to "sag" again with the addition of a strongly vertical skkeleton shing forth.

My resistance to Work includes my entrenchment in seeing and feeling my "presence" in only one or two familiar ways --- HABIT.

Videos of G? Hmm. . .never turned the TV on while I was playing the music. Or are you speaking of the photos in the accompanying book?

I've been reading the accompanying observations. Most are just curiosity pieces. Likewise, while the harmonium music is interesting, and contains some asides by G. the better investment is the DeHartman two disc set.

Speaking of harmonious cats: The day after our snow storm my son decided to go out in the evening to visit an old school buddy. Being a father I simply said: "You're a man, you have to make your own decisions; but I wouldn't go out unless it's a necessity." (Cincinnati had declared a level 3 emergency. Possible to be arrested for driving.) Anyway, he went to get his shoes on, pulled on his coat and headed for the door: There were his two cats, sitting on their hind paws in front of the door with their front paws in the air; blocking his way. (Not a usual event.) His cats convinced him to stay in.

Much much resistance to coming back to work today. Last night sleeping was unsound. After four hours, had to meditate to stop my head. Nothing really happening. . .just head preparing for being back on the job.

Today was an example of why it is important for me to be sharing my experiences within the context of a group. Ian's suggestion of marrow for my image cracked through the narcisissm of my own limited repetoire of reference points. Myself, alone would never have found the marrow image. It took an outside holding up of a mirror to get me to see it. The domino effect of relationships continued on through the day. Placing myself back in that place with what Ian suggested it could be, trying it out effected a whole series of new relationships. The simplest (and by no means the only one) What does the world look like from the viewpoint of the marrow? What indeed! A real, felt, as opposed to an intellectualised, conceptual approach. Who am I there --- in that place?

Distantly, though I feel relatededly, I began to wear more white a couple of weeks ago (mid-December). I have not been able to be without it since, and a great deal of it. It's not an everyday thing for me usually by any stretch. It has gotten to the point that I feel odd without it on. And then we get the permeating chalky whiteness of the image. I won't go on and on about it --- but then BLAM

Then describing it here the REAL Truth of it all. Was it white, what shade "Antique", "Ashen", "Chalky" ? It took me until right here to get to it. The silver Thread? String? Piano wire? What? So hard.

The difficulty? My narcissism . . . my ownership ... my possesivenes ... My resistance to Work Without my sharing the experience there is no response and there is no Change.

The Seeker asks, "Where has my Search for the real stuff of existence taken me?"

To take stock, the Seeker will devote the first few weeks of the new year to a reaffirmation of some confirmed advances that are deemed of sound value.

Each day the Seeker will occasionally pause to declare the following Affirmations:

Monday: "I am at times aware of, amused by, and separated from the organism's identifications, attractions, interests, and goals."
Relax the three centers and remember your Death.

Tuesday: "I often experience two forces: the Denying force of the organism that automatically reacts, accomplishes, feels, thinks, suffers, sleeps, dies; and the parallel Affirming force of a new presence that observes, remembers, acts, is remorseful, endures, has aim, and lives."
Relax into a Three Centered Float of Being.

Wednesday: "I am often present when the organism excretes the transformed product from the food it eats; when it exhales the transformed product from the inhaled atmosphere; and when the organism wiseacres the transformed product from the sense impressions it takes in."
When excreting, arrest the flow of waste products three times.
When exhaling abdominally, arrest the flow three times, once between each exclamation of "I wish, I can, I am", pause and inhale.
When wiseacreing, occasionally arrest the flow of words and attend to the spaces between words.

Thursday: "I understand that the personal satisfactions the organism gets from yielding to the demands of eating, breathing, and wiseacreing are the means by which certain cosmic needs may be met."
Perform a monks walk and Ponder, "What cosmic needs are served by Working on ourselves? "

Friday: "I sometimes experience a deep inner calm while the organism is caught in heavy turmoil or sorrow."
Relax the three centers deeply, leading to a Three Centered Float of Being.

Saturday: "I interpret the organism's considering of what others may think as a force that binds humanity together."
Say something that makes you appear foolish and savour the result of not yielding to inner considering.

Sunday: "I have a profound sense of membership in and responsibility to humanity as a prime factor in the earth's connections."
Perform a monks walk and Ponder, "What are my responsibilities?"

Mindful of the Merciless Heropass the Seeker must ask each evening before sleep, "What can I give up - the absence of which will serve as a constant reminder to remember myself - while groping through the veil of illusion behind which I am otherwise destined to remain?"

Well, I have difficulty to understand if imagining I am a 3-centered float of being floating on the sky would suffice, and for how much time? Does anyone have hints on relaxation or does it just suffice to "switch off" the centres?

> Perform a monks walk and Ponder

How do you define a monks walk? I used to do walks in the town (fortunately my town still looks like a countryside town, even if they are building small houses all around)... is there any rule to "walk like a monk"?

Think of it like being in a quiet, central place in yourself where you are aware of the different I's and centers and also of the events going on around you.

> Perform a monks walk and Ponder

A Monk's Walk is a walking meditation such as a Zen Buddhist monk might do. It is the same as the above inner state but done while walking instead of sitting. It is usually done with slow, deliberate steps, being aware of the feet contacting the ground. Also may be added to it an attentive 'watching' or non-interfering awareness of the out breath at the nose. To help quiet down the restlessness of the intellectual center, a question may be Pondered while walking. Pondering is described on the website...

Davide,

In addition to what Ian has stated above about the Monk's walk

When I first learned this practice I was given an affirmation from the zen books of Paul Reps: Silently or aloud while you watch yourself make a step, and feel the muscular skeletal movement of making the step and feel the complete contact of the sole of the foot to the ground (as you are doing it)

"I am stepping NOW", I am stepping NOW, I am stepping NOW . . ."

"NOW" is stated in tandem with the sole's complete contact with the ground.

I have been extremely sick this week and have only just come "back around".
Sickness is a peculiar state for me --- not usual or regular. Even rare (knock on wood). It doesn't happen that often, but, when it does, I get walloped.

While I borrowed exercises from this week's program, I generally did what I needed to do to get my self rebalanced. I did this holding-off the beginnings of the flu just inside of myself. I had to take care of myself while maintaining a "relationship" with sickness.

A situation came up in another of the exchange rooms on this forum where I made a decision to re-enter some "old territory" (which had never been resolved). I realised that if I could Work this time in a different way, I might be able to come to a resolution for myself (emphasis, decidedly mine) and come to a constructive resolution for myself (emphasis, again, MOST decidedly mine --- )

I had to give up convincing anyone of anything --- a tiresome and wasteful habit of mine. I had to give up listening to self-destructive "i's" who tell me I don't know what I am talking about. I had to stand clear in the light of what I legitimately do know and (to a certain extent) "own" because I legitimately earned that knowledge through effort of research. Of course, it is only based on what I know (mechanically) and is worth only that.

The whole while, I was accutely aware of the appearance of the hideous Kundabuffer (!) wanting me to self-justify, self-congratulate, and "take the kingdom", as it were. It is always there, I am convinced, and it is during these times when I must walk a knife's edge that I most accutely sense it's reality.

The "situation" is not over (it may never be requiring submissions that probably will not happen). However, through Work I have been able to follow through on an honest line more or less honestly.

And --- ooohhhhhh ---- the three-brains-balanced balancing act! Watching the centers as I move one slightly forward to "cover" for one which has "slipped back" until I can get them into relative alignment again.

The off-shoot of all of this is that I have been able to use this challenge to "push" the sickness further out of me. As I write, it is almost gone.

I just have missed that week's program as post-NewYear vacations got me completely identified. So I began doing the exercises in parallel with that given for January, 10-16.

It seems to be a very good idea to recollect all the basic feelings about the work in the beginning of the year.

"I am at times aware of, amused by, and separated from the organism's identifications, attractions, interests, and goals."

This alone could be taken as an aim when I'm lost in identification. There are often some moments when I'm trying to remember my aim but feel that my memory is just intellectual. Yes, separation from organism's (me and my friend call it simply "the robot") urges rings the bell. I can remember some taste of doing that and at the same time feel the lack of such a separation.

Yesterday I tried to recollect the experiences with Affirming and Denying force. The conclusion I came to is that while I have many experiences of what has to be the Affirming force, it is too weak in me. Observation happens more often while open struggle with Denying force happens too rarely. I notice the Denying force (for example, a desire to smoke or a laziness while doing my job pushing me to surf the Internet instead of working) and even name it, but as Affirming force doesn't enter into play, the "Denyings" continue to rule what I do without any interruption.

It seems to be my inner task for several next years - to learn to bring the Affirmation into play and to initiate the dispute.

When confronted with an opposing opinion, go against the organisms urge to disagree.

Ponder on the law of three - What in us is a denying force? What in us is an affirming force? What in us is a reconcilling force?

Try to observe the working of the law of three in everyday events.

Try to observe the working of the law of three in our perceptions.

Whenever you are walking during the day, use the 12 Joint Exercise. At every 7th step, move your attention to the next joint given in the sequence below. While sensing each joint, repeat inwardly the corresponding word from the Holy Affirming Prayer. Silently Ponder the meaning of each word without expecting any answers.

Sensing Sequence - Inner Prayer

1. Right wrist - Holy
2. Right elbow - Affirming
3. Right shoulder - Holy
4. Left hip - Denying
5. Left knee - Holy
6. Left ankle - Reconciling

8. Right knee - In
9. Right hip - Me
10. Left shoulder - For
11. Left elbow - My
12. Left wrist - Being

Performed the 12 joint exercise while walking to the office this morning. Ended in a totally different frame of being by the time I got to the door. What a difference two blocks can make. Asleep to Awake.

Energy waned in the office. Will reinvigorate.

Counting to 7 is a pain in the automatic joint. (Not a negative comment.)

by Anton

Did the 12-joint exercise. Quite hard for me as I am used to do it with sensing at each 6th step, not 7th (practised it for ~3 months since it was given here). Today I tried to do it while walking and chatting with my friend and managed to do it from the beginning to the end once. Wow! Takes quite an amount of attention...

The exercise with noticing the Law of Three in perceptions seems to hard for me. I can only intellectually speculate on it. But I'll try to do this - maybe it takes time to notice anything. For me the perception is quite simple and fully automatic act. By the way, "perceptions" means "all the perceptions" or "conscious/voluntary ones"?

It's hard for me to notice the 3rd force - the Reconciling one. As expected... Maybe a couple of examples from Ian or someone who is more experienced could help...

Mochain:

I took a very long time and careful re-reading of Ouspensky to understand it... so keep up studying, working and you will eventually come to good conclusions

I also tried to make examples and counterexamples until the concept sticked... now no-one can stop me, I even see the law of three when the coffee machine steals my money

Ok, jokes aside... I suggest you to look Ouspensky's index (in his book: "The Fourth Way") and find references to the Law of Three, the Triads and Forces and their interaction within the "ray of creation" (the cosmic dance).

I also hope this thread will help you as well:

I've found another way though it could be some sort of "cheating". Practising Movements I noticed that often a pattern of movements of legs (usually very rhytmic, and that's exactly the case with walking) can replace counting - that pattern dwells somewhere in the moving center and can count to 8, 10 and maybe more (we learned "October the 8th Multiplication" where you have to count 10 steps while moving forward and backwards and it wasn't a problem when I found out that it can be felt as one pattern of 10 steps). So 7 steps are for me one pattern beginning and ending with the same leg, and the next 7-step pattern begins and ends with another leg. I just imagine that pattern as some sort of visual image like:

Left
-----Right
Left
-----Right
Left
-----Right
Left
---end of the cycle--- - Sensing the joint and repeating a word (for example - "Holy") and then

Left
-----Right
Left
-----Right
Left
-----Right
---end of the cycle--- - Sensing and repeating a word (for example - "Affirming") and so on.

So I can sense the joint and ponder on the meaning of the word while keeping up with the legs' pattern. It is just an inner pattern, you don't have to move with silly walking style

This is the part of the exercise that is harder for me, but occasionally I manage to do it.

by Guest

I am still using the twelve-joints exercise when I am walking to and from work, and inside the building. I cannot feel well the joints of the bones however, even if I try to imagine them (the kind of imagination you may have when you think "human skeleton", only a bit in more detail). I only have a faint recognition that they are there.

I feel to be using it also during lunchtime, trying to keep the 7-step rythm while eating and listening to the dialogues of my colleagues... is there a risk if I overdo it? I also feel to be using it

By the way, do you remember the three-fingers exercise in the third conference in "Life is Real"? (well, last week I read that book on the bus, but I have took again the habit to bring Belzebubs's Tales). I am doing it sometimes, but I still have some doubts on the two different feelings you should try to feel with the two non-moving fingers... I am trying to visualize one of the two as I would do for the 12-joints exercise, while I am trying to feel the superficial skin of the other one. By the way, even there I am tapping the other counting up to 7 and then back again to 1.

Take on the task of being humble, of not giving voice to your rightiousness, opinions or actions. Instead, observe your inner attitude from above.

Make an offering or sacrifice that is from the heart, unconditionally and without expectation of return.

Identify where your opinions are coming from - within or from without. Ponder whether you are projecting your knowledge or experience or trauma onto others.

Turn the other cheek, even when you are sure that you are justified. Transform the energy saved into a state of three centered Being.

Go beyond or give more than what is asked of you by others. Conversley, do not ask of others more than they are able to give. Do both without complaint or inner justification.

Last month I've had a very hard period, a real hell and battle with my husband and my self-love. I could observe many "I-s" in myself with all their condradictions and conflicts between them. And I must confess that without Work I couldn't carry this out. Now Ouspenskiy's words "To take nothing seriously except the Work" have much deeper meaning for me than before. Now I have very emotional relation to Work and to all people which are in Work. I am very grateful to Work and also to your help for without some exercises and reminder from our week programms I couldn't see my identification with extreme sides of my pendulum and so couldn't never catch a gleam of Third Forse, wich I would define as beauty of Work.

Now I'am very afraid to lose this relation to Work, as it is a Truth- nothing is more important than Work.

I want to say that my not contributing to this thread has been partially due to this week's exercise.

I have stopped numerous small "i's" from being embroiled in broohahas since Monday. As most of you are aware I tend to be, as my boss says, ornery. A personality trait that I learned early in life, that has often served me ill and often served me well.

I have "stopped" myself many times this week before expressing the best-not-expressed (that's "best-not" according to this week's exercise --- of course! --- that it dove-tails with what's probably "best-not" in terms of the public "acting" of my persona is secondary to me.

It is always difficult for me to inner-stop the wish to challenge the shit that passes as acceptable quality in the everyday world.

I have a deep appreciation of orneriness, Harry --- yours and mine. Thanks for that statement.

Ok, only one hour before this exercise-week ends... since I will wake up tomorrow early I cannot wait for another long hour before posting this. Also, unfortunately, for many combinations this week-end I violated the main exercise (I gave voice to my opinion while talking to my friends and my family, I hope you will excuse me because it is difficult to me to spend some quality time with them, Work is ok, but I already spent five sevenths of my week on Work and job... and I tried to take it in a lighter way this weekend).

I must say a big, deep thankyou to Ian. People: you made a really really really right exercise.

This exercise came to me right the time when at my daily job I should have done the contrary: it has been a week full of meetings and of interaction with colleagues, I had to work strenuously even if (before, that is) I did not care too much about the well-being of my project (now I care... help!!!!), and of choices to be made for the sake of the project... by letting everyone else decide instead of picking out fights on style and technologies, and by trying to do better than my best effort I could see clearly things in a way as I did not see before...

First: I am a really crappy programmer! A lousy one!  I know what is the state of the art in programming, but I always procrastinate the time where I stick to my word to write it well the first time.

A big thankyou Ian, you dealt a really big blow to my ego 😁

Second: I could see that in truth at my corporation, even if the corporation itself taken on the whole does not seem to care about quality, people in my office and around me instead really care... and maybe in the corporation there are also many other people that really DO care...

I used to think to be like if I was constrained to be a robot in a factory, but instead I could see clearly people trying to make things better for themselves and for the others, and in order to survive I had to remember that I was human like the others... like if my grey governemntal corporation instead was a very lively battlefield... (this complements what I tried to do last week as well, or better, to accept the workplace as intentional suffering 😁).

I have also seen the value of some people behind their apparent lack of communication skills (yes... there is still people around who think one correct thing and say one wrong other... having patience with them was a big friction).

Third: Marina... I was going to reply as a pm to your post, but I re-read the exercise and refrained from pm-ing. What I was going to say is not important anymore... what is really important is this: refraining myself from posting I could see that my reply subsisted, but that your message stood up as well. It was like if "black" and "white" (where black and white are my opinion and your opinion, choosing which colour is one and which one is the other is left to the reader) were not two faces of one coin, but like if they were part of a woven tapestry. While seeing this I felt very very very well. I owe you one beer. 😁

And now three hurras! I have 6.30 hours to sleep and tomorrow morning I will work.

Good night everyone!

Sense Impression Exercise

During the week, observe the 2 modes of processing or 'eating' 3rd Being Food - Sense Impressions - from the 5 senses.

Mode 1: Focused Impressions
Observe the process of taking in specific sense impressions by focusing your attention on specific sights, sounds, smells, sensations, tastes. How does your mind identify these impressions? What expectations are associated with them? What reactions do they evoke in you?
Do any of them cause you to suffer?
How are impressions converted from raw data into information or understanding?

Mode 2: Unfocused Impressions
Observe the process of taking in all sense impressions without discrimination by unfocusing or panoramically widening your attention using the Sightless Gaze, Soundless Sound, Smelless Smell, Whole Body Sensing, Tasteless Taste. Does your mind try to mechanically identify these impressions? Do your expectations and reactions try to assert themselves against your Wish to remain unfocused? Does this cause you suffering?
Does the unfocused state lead to a Cloud of Unknowing or a Cloud of All Knowing?

Constructive Rest Exercise

Upon awakening, move directly from the bed to the floor. Lie on your back. Bring your legs up, bent at the knees, with the soles of your feet flat on the floor, in a comfortable position for you, 8-12 inches apart; let the knees fall in towards each other for support. Some of you may wish to tie a scarf, belt, or some other material below the knees to keep them together. Others may wish to place the lower legs and feet up on the seat of a solid seated chair, situating the upper legs at a right angle to the torso. Just make sure the lower back isn't "lifted" and is allowed to maintain a relaxed relationship to the supporting floor.

Shift the pelvis a bit from side to side until you sense a comfortable "settling" place.

With your arms alongside your torso, lengthen your spine back away from your pelvis towards your head. Shift the torso from side to side allowing the head to rock in response until you sense a comfortable "settling" place.

Lift your arms slowly with a moment-by-moment awareness of the shift of weight in them as they move. Fold the arms over the chest, right over left, allowing the forearms and hands to "pour" towards the floor. The hands should be thought of as being very heavy as if they were made of cast iron. Allow all tension in the arms to pour towards the floor.

Keep the eyes open with a Sightless Gaze towards the ceiling. Do not fall back into sleep but stay awake.

Concentrate on sending an uncounted breath deeper and deeper into an increasingly relaxed torso. You may want to think of the torso as a balloon which fills up and deflates with each breath cycle.

As you breathe, allow the entire back to spread out in two directions from the spine. Feel the "spread" particularly between the shoulder blades and in the lower back. Allow gravity to take over your Planetary Body and relax it down into the ground.

Shift and shake out any tension areas that. Relax and stay awake.

After 5 minutes or so, unfold your arms straight up and allow them to fold again, this time left over right.

Repeat the same procedure as above for another 5 minutes.

During the 5 minute intervals, in order to help relax and still the mind and emotions, you may Ponder on a Work question.

When finished, allow the body to "fall" to one side, right or left. Sense the shift of the weight. In your own way, sensing the "way" of your body, move from this laying on the side position to a standing position. Keep it as simple, and as body logical as possible.

When standing allow the planetary body and its weight to melt towards the floor. Allow the arms to hang. Maintain an erect spine (which relaxes upwards). Be aware of the continuuous upwardness of the spine, and the downwardness of the body's gravitiy. Make sure the feet are planted firmly on the ground. A triangle of contact should be evident across the ball of the foot, down the from the big toe (across the instep) to the heel, and from the heel back up to the smallest toe.

Move your Attention around the triangle by sensing the contact with the floor. As you do so, repeat the inner prayer - I Wish, I Can, I Am - 3 times for each foot.

When you are ready take your first step out into the day. Take it slowly and be aware of and sense the muscular action engaged.

The above exercise should be done upon awakening and before retiring in the evening. Optionally, it may be done upon returning home from work. It is important to keep the eyes open with a Sightless Gaze and not drift into sleep. Keep up a sensed awareness and increased fullness of the breath.
Those who can may wish to consciously stand at 12 Noon and scan/sense the body taking note of where tensions have accumulated shaking them out and/or sending a dispelling breath into them.

Practiced the relaxation exercise this morning with the following result:

After the change the the arms my mind drifted into daydream (hard to resist with this position). I "saw" Jay Leno eulogizing Johnny Carson for the opportunities he had afforded others during his career as host of the TONIGHT SHOW. I cleared it but then thought "Hmm . . . Carson's gettin' 'up there'. I wonder what his funeral will be like?" I then cleared that thought and got back to the business at hand --- the exercise.

I then finished my exercise, got myself ready for work, and hopped on the bus to my train. The person seated in front of me is avidly reading the newspaper. It is Johnny Carson's obituary.

Now, granted the context (apologies to Mr. Carson---nothing personal Johnny) is well, Junky! It is the flow of it all that interests me --- the synchronicity of events. My emotional center has been at a higher than usual pitch during the last 24 hours. I remember O.s statements regarding the need for support from emotional center for authentic clairvoyant experience. Now this event is probably "small potatoes" to what he is referencing . . . still, this is interesting.

Harry,

I should have been more specific. I was "trapped " in a daydream level. I needed to wake myself out of that. Going with the flow with a daydream means for me deeper involvement with sleep. I am losing my "amness" in my physical surroundings.

Greg,

Didn't really mean "go with the flow". Rather, observe the flow.

This is from my experience only: thoughts and day dreams are often coming from outside. If I can observe this I can choose not to pay attention to the "flow".

At times I must go with the flow, simply because that's what's required by paying for my existence. That, of course, isn't this situation.

Sorry to foster the confusion.

Harry,

That's okay, discussion of these things is important. That's one of the reasons why we are here instead of only working alone.

David,

The way I receive mode 2 is that I'm like an infant. I'm attempting perception without preconception. . .

What this is doing is "turning personality off". All of those "i's" you learned. . .and which help you through ordinary life. Mom, Dad, Teacher, Minister, Sister, Friend, TV, etc. etc. taught us how to perceive. And yet those filters predispose us to see, hear, think, smelll, etc. . .

To. Be. Aware.

There's more than one brain. There are other modes of perception. (Interesting that this week's issue of New Scientist now posits 21 modes of perception. Also includes an article on a blind main who paints realistic scenes, having never visually seen anything.)

If counting helps keep the formatory apparatus busy. . .

But you want to get out of the head brain and into the rest of your "being".

That sounds very interesting. I will have to get to the library and read that article.

I did a bit of research once into the types of sensory nerves in the human nervous system.
If one classified each type of specialized sensory nerve as a 'sense', there would be a lot more than 21:

There are magnetic sensors in our brain.
There are 5 types of taste buds.
There are 1000 different types of smell receptors.
There are 4 types of light sensors.
There are about 12 types of sensors in our skin, muscles and joints for sensing temperature, pressure, muscle tension, and limb position.

One can begin to appreciate the importance Gurdjieff placed on learning the Sensing exercises.

The senses are our gateway to the world around us. Learning to Sense without preconceptions and predilections is a very important part of our inner development.

I will leave the question open as to whether there are other modes of perceiving the world besides the sensory nerves.

> Davide Inglima wrote:
> Is "turning the personality off" useful for meditation as well?

Essential, yes.
The more you practice, the easier it will get.
It won't happen immediately - just glimmers and flashes to begin with.

In the beginning, the personality will always be intruding. At this stage we have to observe its manifestations and get to know it and understand it.
Then we learn to let it go; to ignore it.
Training the mind to be quite at will is like training a dog to 'sit'.
As Patanjali says - Yoga is the cessation of the fluctuations of the mind-stuff.

What is left when personality is subdued is Being.
Tat Tvam Asi. (Thou art That) or as God said to Moses - I Am That I Am.
or as Popeye said - I yam what I yam.

In Gurdjieffian terms, this is a movement from self-observation towards self-remembering.

In meditation we learn to relax all 3 centers and have them working for a common aim - of being relaxed - to eventually acheive the state Gurdjieff called All-Brains-Balanced-Being-Perception.

Using the 3 centers relaxed as a base state, after we get a taste for it, we can move towards balancing and harmonizing the 3 centers during more active states in our daily life.

I have read the New Scientist article about 21 senses. They don't mention magnetic sensors in humans, although there is some speculation that we do have them. Some animals have magnetic sensors as well as electric field sensors.

There was a list of senses in the article which I have put on my web site.

Had a complete sensing experience of the centres this morning. There have been glimpses of this down through the last several months but this morning it came together in a complete event lasting about a quarter of an hour.

After the resting exercise, I curled over to my left side and decided to stay there and not move further. The head-heart-motive centers slipped and slid like buoys in a perpetual give and take relationship. When I closed my physical eyes I could see it while feeling it. The centers were frisbee-like in shape, whitish, translucent and whirring in various harmonies. My skeleton, just sketched out in transparent white. The whole interior space in which this occured, which trespassed ordinary "rational" boundaries, was an aquaecous (nearly gelatinous) "area". The prevailing hue --- ultramarine. A very thin, rubbery "umbilical cord" held the centers together towards the back (near the spine?) although not in any fixed way. I was amazed at how easy it was for me to hold all of this (by a certain attention) for such a long time without loosing "sight" of it other than momentarily. All sensations were "pleasant" though only by my holding a detached stance

This week I did not properly follow the exercises: I had many difficulties in grasping the whole of the creative rest exercise (I was tempted to say "creative rest isn't"), I forgot in bringing on my life-picture all the other sensing exercises and it was also time for me to refocus about the Work.

Anyway, I noticed some interesting things:

- if you are trying to sightless gaze while meditating and there is some familiar noise trying to take your attention (for example my poor cat... she wanted company as we were alone at home, and she meowed creatively to get my attention...) everything turns bluish for a moment and it's like if you feel some kind of "painless pain".

- Letting yourself go while meditating. I've seen interesting things (yes, I had my eyes open): yellow clouds and something like "smoke" coming out from an electric outlet. This lasted only until I attempted to stop all the useless mind-wanderings that were sprouting after looking the clouds... like the I's in my mind said "oooh! clouds!" "yes! that's fantastic!" "I have to tell all the people in north europe that we are passing a concentration of Okidanokh right now, as it is going in their direction!" but the most impolite that broke the concentration of the whole theatre was the one that "shhhh"-ed the group of rebel I's 😁

Now I am trying to grasp how to make all the rogue thoughts to float away... It came to my mind that the process of floating out versus chasing bad thoughts out should be attempted like attemtping (as I read somewhere in this forum or on a Gurdjieff website) the Movements and the Sacred Dance: that is, smoothly, relaxedly. Am I correct? Someone wishes to comment?

Like if I needed to take a single drop of water and drop it in the right spot to counter all the ripples of all the other thoughts... how can I exercise for doing this?

- After finding one good form for expressing my own Personal aim (thanks Ian, I already had a personal aim, but it was not expressed well in the form that was before...) it occurred to me that I can and should start work on losing some of my energy-wasting habits...

Quitting daydreaming is quite easy once I identify them as I can do more work, Work and enjoy more the pleasant and unpleasant (FRICTION!) presence of people around me... but some others are difficult to follow.

Quitting having negative thoughts: well, I still have negative thougths but at least results of trying to not identify in negative thoughts in occasions that are in out of contexts (like going by bus, realizing that bad thing X could happen at work so arriving to the office negative) are showing up.

Now, ladies and gentlemen, please sit down as this will come to you as a shock as you surely know that I always had an angelic tenure and extremely good mannerism, and my conduct and my peer should have confirmed by now that I am a gentleman as there never were in this country of rednecks... but I must confess you all that if I were a monk, by now I would be the thinnest man on earth.

G said: "You can take force from your animal and give it to Being." I am beginning to see this, but with difficulty. And I would really really love to pave my way to transition so that I can change without problems. I cannot really remember what worked before, if it was me realizing something, an affirmation, or something else. Any good literature on this?

I forgot the most important thing
This morning I attempted the "creative rest".

Using the "let yourself go" attitude and shaking my legs torso and head after laying down I felt like if my whole torso (before the belly, then the whole torso) began to resonate. I must admit I have been in a jumbled mood that already woke me up (see above), but at least that made change.

It is constructive rest meaning something active is happening while you lie in a passive position.

by Guest

Greg and others: if it is passive, is there a risk in overdoing it?

---

by Ian

I would say that intentional passivity is of a different quality than mechanical passivity.

Intentional passivity has an element of discrimination. If a thought intrudes, we notice it, set it aside and return to silence. It is an ongoing process. The brain excretes thoughts; that is its function. At best we can merely quite it down for varying periods of time.

Visual phenomenon during meditation are eye candy in most cases. Retinal noise from staring at the same thing for a protracted period of time. Avoid focusing on particular things. Try to keep attention on the whole visual field at once.

Daydreaming - Sensing a part of the body (eg. left foot) helps keep our attention from getting absorbed.

Davide

In addition to what Ian has so clearly laid out above you can shift and move the spine to "help" it in its way towards lengthening out. I do it by contracting my abdominal muscles gently (actually "knitting" the muscles together is more accurate) while lifting my head up by putting my hands together at the back of my head (interlacing the fingers as in a "sit-up"), and then allowing the spine to drop vetebrae by vertebrae back down to the floor. There's alot to "pay attention" to in this. Particulary, How the Body Works (which we never pay much attention to. I, also pay close attention to how the stomach muscles lengthen as I return to the recline.

If you pay close attention to the actual muscular and skeletal action you will begin to see how much memory can control and condition our planetary bodies.

do you imply some process like "thinking of being like algae", as Ruthy Alon says in her book "Mindful Spontaneity"?

Work Program week beginning 31 January 2005

by Ian

Humans are transformers of energy - food, air, impressions. Some of this energy is available for inner Work, provided we make efforts instead of wasting it mechanically. For example, we may waste energy by - uncoordinated functioning of the centers, worrying, daydreaming, fidgiting, inner-considering. Seekers are encouraged to observe themselves during the next week and look for the ways that they mechanically waste their energy. Ponder: Is there a connection between suffering and wasting energy?

Energy from impressions is one of the most vital foods needed for inner Work. During a 15 minute period each day, the seeker may sit and practice taking in impressions using the Sightless Gaze and Soundless Sound exercises, combined with a full body Sensing. Avoid catagorising the impressions with the formatory center. At the end of the sitting, observe and sense whether your inner state is more or less energisied than when you started.

During a 15 minute walk once a day, use the 12 Joint Sensing Exercise, as given in the sequence below. At every 'x' number of steps, move your attention to the sensation of the next joint. On Monday, use x = 7 steps; on Tuesday, use 6 steps, then 5, 4, 3, 2 and finally on Sunday, move your attention with every step. At the end of the walk, observe and sense whether your inner state is more or less energisied than when you started.

Sensing Sequence
1. Right wrist
2. Right elbow
3. Right shoulder
4. Left hip
5. Left knee
6. Left ankle
7. Right ankle
8. Right knee
9. Right hip
10. Left shoulder
11. Left elbow
12. Left wrist

Ponder: How does the law of three work in relation to the amount of energy we have available for inner Work?

---

by Harry

Good reminder to take that 15 minutes during the day. Tied with it is relaxing tensions. Was reading Collin yesterday and the two tied very much together.

Took time yesterday at my desk. My posture changed. My perceptions changed. Usually so little awareness. So tied to individual senses. Sometimes this type of "single minded concentration" is good. But it isn't an accident that being "single minded" is considered a put down.

Another fasting period starts next week. Part of that is, I'm sure, to make sensation more prevelant. The body feels different. Foods taste different. Even the air becomes different.

Is there more energy? Not if I use it. Often there isn't enough energy to maintain the full fifteen minutes. Must return to relaxing muscles. Watching posture. Etc.

by Guest

Ok, I do not want a spoilsport, but here what's happened to me this week.

This is not by far a complete recount, because Week hasn't ended yet.

On Monday I woke up early, did the Creative Rest exercise. Something after it happened as I felt energized. The day was interesting since many strange things happened after it.

A sound "NO" to my father, then I began to see repeating numbers and number plates with "meaningful symbols", even 24 (which is 42 inverted and has an eerie parallelism with the date 24.12.2004 (which is important to me).

The day after I was pondering for a minute "ok, strange things happen, but how I can be really sure of the existance of God?"

Bang! An infinite string of parallel white triangles with small triangles at their corners flashed in front of me. By the way: invert the light like a negative image so you have black triangles and a white background. If you used negatives for photograps.

The day before yesterday: At the train station I felt bad after trying to sense something... so I exited, saw the moon and began singing "The Great GIG in the Sky" to it. BANG! Something kicked in... I felt dying, and a person in front of me asked "are you dying?" me: "no!" (I was not lying if you know what I mean). Then all the people began talking strangely... someone cited the fact that Galileo stared at the sun and burnt his retina, that someone tried to solve the I-don't-know-which-theorem and suicided himself in failing it, and everyone at my workplace told me "good morning!" one after another.

Now I take the second esseric food as a conveyor belt, if you know what I mean. I also felt intoxicated. I was scared because I felt like I had no breathe whatsoever, but in truth this is like if breathing disappeared.

Yesterday: many symbolic things happened. I was encaged in a giant-boot-like-esoteric-day, everything that I know bumped me here, there and everywhere. In the evening I was going to meet some friends. You will never believe me what happened at the train station + train (and on the bus this morning), so I will skip it. Yesterday on the train I was also reading "Mostly Harmless" by Douglas Adams, and people... this was the first time that a D.A. book scared me for the parallels. I also felt pushed by that train experience to skip ahead from the first chapters and read the chapter of the Bistro on Planet Bob. I resisted. I felt bad about it anyway...

This night I could not sleep, and I understood that this drowning by number feeling was trying to make me push the "panic button".
Oh, by the way, yesterday I put the "Don't Panic" gif on my desktop at work, and it

This morning, just after emailing someone about this problem (ah ah people, nice move to leave me there alone :p) I realized something: I WAS DROWNING BY NUMBERS! Yes!

People, there is no such a thing as man number 1-2-3... there do exist men 4, 5, and maybe 6 and 7 as well, but numbers is a false way ... also people aren't mechanical all the day, but people do have the power to Act even if they don't Seek. When I realized this I felt good about what I did yesterday evening.

Anyway, I felt a jumbled energy-feeling, as I was "intoxicated" by something or simply discharged. And I did not sleep.

This morning on the train: I noticed that watching a girl's face I felt better... soon everything collapsed: I am eating impressions! A bus "experience" confirmed that I was on the right track. The 12-joints exercise again confirmed it.

Now, how can I eat more impressions to satiate me?
Neon lights are eating my retina...

When I can recollect all the things I learned in these two days I will post them in this thread. See you.

by Marina

I don't know why, but last week I felt very well that "we are transformers of energy - food, air, impressions. " And I could see that this is very connected with conscious labor. By eating I sent positive energy to all people wich have lack of health, happyness and money and I also felt that I bring a real help to them. The same was with impressions when I was negative with a person, I tried send him (her) energy of love, emotional balance etc, This was like miracle. Last time I had problems with my domestic help. She has spoiled a lot of our clothes, meat-chopper, vacuum cleaner. I felt that the reason of this is her envy, and I tried to see this envy in myself, and though I could see how I was envy with my customers this didn't brought essential results in my relations with house-maid. Then I tried imagine her wealthy and happy and after them I felt a free. This is real miracle. At last I understand how to sacrifice suffering! 12 Joint Sensing Exercise - is very powerfull exercise which helped me very much in struggle against my machinary. It was very difficult in week-end to move attention with every step. I was permanent out of time. Then I began count one, two, three, one, two, three ... with every step and Joint sensing and in such way I could move my attention very quickly without slow down tempo of my steps.

best regards to all,
Marina

by Harry

Funny Marina, my response to the exercise is almost exactly opposite. I want to sense on each step rather than count between steps. I pondered on this some. Don't know whether this is right, wrong, black, white, or just my own peculiar i's.

Counting bothers some i in me. Holy Rejoicing etc. is fine. But 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7 bugs this i.

Who is the character in Remarkable Men? Ekim Bay? Who became the shipping magnate? And he always had to keep his mind busy learning languages, etc. I've always taken that description as one of a "successful man". . .man in the ordinary sense. Remarkable. But Ordinary.

And counting reminds me of mind busy activities.

I think my resentment is the struggle with the well educated secretary that I've fought for so long. Interesting observation: as a student I was always chastised by instructors for the use of "feel", of "emotion". As I grew older I became a 3-1-2 man, in O's terms. Too much an intellectual secretary. . .

(stream of consciousness ended)

by Ian

The counting is a peripheral issue in the exercise. What is important is the Sensing. The counting only determines how long or how many steps one Senses each joint for before moving the Sensing to the next joint. The length of time one spends Sensing each joint will depend on ones needs and energy level at the time, and may well vary from day to day. The Count can just as well be a determined by the number of lines in a prayer as it can be by a counting of predetermined sequence of numbers. Limiting oneself to a particular counting sequence is an added Affirmative Discipline of the exercise. One may find it beneficial to vary the 'Count' between each joint depending on the difficulty that one has for Sensing the various joints. Some joints may be easier to sense than others.
As in all the exercises, ones personal evaluation of ones needs and requirements at the time should be taken into account when determining what efforts need to be applied.
We should be cognizant of the fact that the Law of 3 is operative in all our efforts. In general, the strength of ones Affirming force should be at least be equal to the strength of ones Denying force. As it is said in Physics - For every action there is an equal and opposite reaction.
To find the mid-course, the Reconciliation, the extremes must be balanced.

All the exercises given out are conditional on our needs at the moment. If a certain exercise resonates with our current state, it may be beneficial to try and Work with it. It is not expected that everyone practice all the exercises all of the time. Take what you need and can handle in the present and keep the others for possible use in the furure.

> Counting bothers some i in me. Holy Rejoicing etc. is fine. But 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7 bugs this i.

I don't understand how counting may bug rejoicing i-s... I think that one aim of this exercise consist in stopping our mechanical wasting of energy, and if you will occupy your formatory center (secretary) with any activities it won't bother you with its mechanically associations and you may sooner get in contact with your more conscious i-s.
But this is my opinion. Sometimes by cleaning my house or working in garden I also count and in this way I can better concentrate on my work and do it better and quickly. The trouble is that I often forget counting and do my work like a robot.

Inner considering and its companions Identification, Self-justification and Self-importance are behaviors that waste our vital energies. Could any benefit be gained for ourself and others if we took in our Impressions Objectively rather than Subjectively?

When any of these behaviors, unbecoming to a man without quotation marks, are noticed, the seeker may try to evoke a feeling of Remorse whilst Sensing the right hand and repeating silently "It is nothing; I wish Be".

Ponder on the seeming contradiction between developing a Real I and realising our Nothingness.

by Harry

Interesting timing this exercise. . .

My step-father has been back in the hospital. Plus I've been reading all of the accounts of G's death that accompanied the music discs. I'm watching a man approach the end of his life and reading the descriptions of another. . .

And then I read this ceremony of the Russian Orthodox Church at G's funeral.

This crystal clear awareness of what we are taught to believe of Life and Death is such utter Science Fiction Nonsense. I mean, I've known that. And the description in All and Everything is crystal clear.

Why does this belong here? Well I was sitting in the hospital. My dad was sleeping in a very fetal position. Eyes open on occassion. And I moved into a balanced state. . .objectively watching the experience. I am. . .I wish. . .I can. Then I come home and read this Church Ceremony. Very similar to what will come in the next six months or a year or next week. . .

And it's clear. Life and Death. Heaven. Hell. All of this rigamarole. . .we make things up to satisify our "selves".

Like clockwork, I had no sooner read this week's exercise, then the office sociopath sruck yet again and told a lie concerning me in order to cover his own rear end.

I went straight into my right hand, grinning and bearing it all.

Is it worth the tearing, ripping and shredding of my psyche to get even and self-justify?

NO. My being is worth more than somebody else's "stuff".

How nice to been able to go directly to a Remove and again remind myself to stay under the radar.

We're getting better.

Let me pose this question to others:

My solar plexus becomes active in turmoil. This is often "pre-event". And certainly continues during turmoil periods. For example, my continued livelihood is often dependent upon getting another grant. This is external life, but my internal feelings are there.

I don't want to "self calm". This seems suffering that I must experience. It is almost a means of perception.

Is this perspective peculiar?

No, I don't think this perspective is at all peculiar. I think it is necessary!

How does one acknowledge the Suffering without Identifying with it?
What is the difference between 'self-calming' and non-Identification?

Where does non-identification end?
Should we, can we, Identify with Real I?
Gurdjieff talks about realizing our Nothingness.
What is our Nothingness?
Is it realizing what is left when we leave our Ego and self-importance behind?
What is the value of Remorse unless we Identify with it and take it to heart?
Can we experience Remorse without Identifying with it or without self-calming?

---

by Harry

Today is Ash Wednesday. Also Chinese New Year. And corresponds, approximately, to the beginning of many other period in many other cultures.

Today starts one of those periods Gurdjieff discusses when it is beneficial to fast. Abstain from all animal products.

Under the Christian calendar, this period lasts until Easter. Under Pagan practices, until the Spring Equinox. Not unusual, as the date of Easter and Passover are both determined by the pascal moon.

It may seem a simple exercise. Avoid all foods containing cholesterol. (Anything that used to breath, through nose or gills, produces cholesterol.) This makes shopping an exercise, especially in our pre-packaged food era. It can also mean the end of eating in almost all Restaraunts.

40 days without meat, eggs, milk, fish. 40 days of vegan eating.

Why "give something up for Lent"? G. says this is the wise man's way of fasting. That we shouldn't eat other beings. But due to our weaknesses, we can't avoid it always. So we do it at certain times, when it is most necessary.

Back when I first started following this practice I picked up a hitchhiker going to college. She noticed All and Everything in the back seat. She asked: "Why is it you people believe in being vegetarians, but then eat meat?" My answer was: "When I go to mom's house for Thanksgiving Dinner, it's easier to eat the turkey than make a scene. But when I'm at home, I practice what is necessary."

The object of the exercise is to prepare contact with the higher centers, so they can have an influence in our lives. It could be taken as an evening prayer, at the end of the day, when preparing to sleep. This exercise can also be done as a prelude to meditation or as a meditation mantra.

Sense the body and relax its tensions. Let the breathing become deeper, slower. Let the thoughts and cares of the day flow out.

As you prepare to sleep, attempt to make contact with the higher centers:
Try to be aware of a higher intellectual center. Try to contact that center.
Intoning internally, on an out breath: "Holy Higher Intellectual."
Try to be aware of a higher emotional center. Try to contact that center.
Intoning internally, on an out breath: "Holy Higher Emotional."

Let control pass from your ordinary self to those higher centers:
Intoning internally, on an out breath: "Take control."
Intoning internally, on an out breath: "Maintain my life."
Intoning internally, on an out breath: "Maintain my perceptions."
Intoning internally, on an out breath: "Awake in the morning refreshed and revitalized."

Ponder: Does sleep come easier? Does the day's cares pass differently? Is sleep different? Do you awake differently in the morning?

I started the exercise piecemeal last evening as I was at the office doing weekend work. I just started to introduce the affirmations g r a a a a a dually into what I was doing, By the time I returned home I was ready to "sink" my physical body.

Woke, ready to get up, feeling a distinct slide of some organs inside as I sat on the edge of the bed.

these --- they go against my "Nature"

by Harry

Counting exercises are also difficult for me. Sensing is fine, but the counting somehow irks an "i", so I'll count.

Walking with vision is good. But as I'm into the "Lenten" fast, think I'll do breathing with eating. Will reinforce those efforts.

by Ian

Gurdjieff used counting exercises. Orage wrote a book called Psychological Exercises with many counting exercises in it.
Instead of counting, one can just as easily use a prayer or mantra. I think the main point is to give the mind an intentional activity to keep it from wandering. All 3 centers need to be involved and coordinated in an exercise. This is training for All-Brains-Balanced-Being-Perception.

Sectioned sensing exercises are good in the beginning as they help us learn to move and direct attention and to become more intimately familiar with all parts of our bodies. Later we can put the parts together in full body sensing.

We present a smorgasbord of exercises here. No one is expected to eat from every dish all the time.

If something irks you, it could be a point of Identification, a corn.

I didn't succeeded with this exercise though, when I was reading about this task I felt, this is a real work task as I read now Beelzebub's tales, about Ashiata Shiemah, which connected his work with awakening of conscience and Remorse is a sign of conscience. But in spite of my intention of doing this exersice and permanent attempts I didn't feel any change in my perception, feeling or mind. Neverthenless I am sure that this is a very important exercise and so I'll continue do it.

Question:

By doing the same exercise together we enhance the individual results of each of us?

by Anton

I have chosen the exercise from the previous week - with sensing the right hand and trying to feel remorse - as "liked" and the exercise:

as "disliked". The latter just escaped my attempts of remembering it when communicating with people, and only on this week I've managed to remember about it and to do it several times. I had quite an interesting feeling of "release" when doing it while something in me disliked it very much and tried to push me into depressive state. I have also noticed how often I try to get my opinions heard and how I stick with them. It is so strong in me and it escapes my attention so easily that I suspect it have something to do with my chief feature.

It is quite hard to find the place in me that can connect or even imagine the connection with higher centers. My attempts to do it didn't add anything to the quality of my sleep, but the exercise seemed quite interesting for me so I'm going to continue my attempts.

by Harry

Anton,

Try the exercise as "deputy steward". I.e. use positive imagination to "connect" with the two higher centers. You can't verify. Because if they are higher centers. . .the lower doesn't know the higher.

Harry

by Anton

I had some success with the exercise "be humble - don't give voice to your righteousness - observe what happens from above". I tried to do it with my colleagues at my workplace and with my family members.

I failed to remember about it when the situations came but later I remembered how I was responding automatically to others giving voice to my opinions. The period between such responding and remembering the exercise shrinked and finally I was able to do it.

I found out that when refraining from expression of my opinions I feel that something gets softer in me, even "melts" - as if my automatical reactions were some "hard" things, that have to be softened, melted so that I could change them.

At the same time something in me resisted this "melting" trying to push me into depressive state. But my ability to see what happens didn't allow them to do this - I told to myself "I wish to be" trying to find the affirming force for this denying.

I continue to do the exercise chosen for this week as "liked" - feeling remorse and sensing the right hand and telling to myself "I wish to be" when I noticed inner considering and identification. There were many situations this week that provoked inner considering - I have a lot of work to do at my job and I sometimes fail to do it appropriately fast. When I do this exercise it gives very strong and deep self-remembering and feel that something in me becomes "wider" and "opens" and at the same time I clearly see myself in what surrounds me. I'm going to keep on doing this exercise next week - it really help to identify less (and I'm in need of this as this identification takes too much energy that I need for doing my job).

I've also tried to "pray" to the higher centers and while I really felt that I'm passing control to something "higher" I haven't noticed any changes in the quality of my sleep. But after I did it on Friday before I went to sleep I had a very bright and "meaningful" dream - as I suspect that it can have something to do with this practise (I see or remember dreams very rarely) I'm going to share it with you.

Me and my friends are walking on the streets of some Russian town (not Moscow) and we are approaching the place where we should meet another group of our friends. But at this moment a group of Chechen bandits appears that is going to capture us as hostages. I feel that they are going to kill one of us so that we could see that "their intentions are serious", and it's me who will be killed. I see the pistol pointing to my head in a stretched arm of bandits' leader - I say to myself: "I am" - and wake up.

To Ian: Sasha has joined our small group in Moscow that is using the practices presented here (we make reports on doing them and meet weekly at Saturdays and discuss our experiences and also set some additional tasks for inner work). She found the exercises very interesting and gave us new energy we were lacking so we began to work much more intensively. We felt how some strong energy is generated in our communication, the energy that could be used by each of us when it is needed. We value the practices given here very much as they provide a very good support for our search - and we really feel the atmosphere of the search when we work as if we were some group of scientists working on one common task and each of us brings something into the process and helps others. I feel quite a delight with this and would like to thank Ian for this very much.

by Greg

Thanks to everyone who has contributed here this week.

I want to bring something up in a manner which I hope is constructive to this group and does not come off sounding "self righteous". I've thought a while about it and initially wanted to put it in the discussion area but thought that since I was addressing this group, this is where it should be placed.

Three things, to my understanding, were required as "payment" to this Group as a part of membership.

1) (the most mundane) That upon agreeing to a year long membership I paid a (very small) subscription rate to help maintain this on-line presence.

2) That after a certain while of checking out the overall "drift" of the group (which I was allowed to do silently without contribution, if I so chose) that I was encouraged to contribute and discouraged to continue "lurking". This was so (in my understanding of the Work) that my experience could be added to the basic mix and provide material for others to Work with (if they chose) and for me to gain an objectification of my experience/procedure and to aid in the processes of "clarification".

As a result of a general resistance to sharing, I have no clear idea of who is here at any given time. Who is here? What age, gender, etc. etc. are you? Or am I indeed just jettisoning the majority of my "stuff" into boring ole cyberspace?

At one point I started to receive personal messages from someone commenting on my shares here, not even realising they had been a member of this group all along! People, this makes me nervous! Building a sense of Trust seems essential with Workers. In virtual reality that is some piece of Work. The only antidote to that I can see, is more and more blogging here --- kind of making up for the lack of physical presence with more writing. Lest you think I'm brave about these matters, I am not. Trust (here and other places) is an act of Will for me, I must push myself into doing it. I

If you think what you have to offer isn't worth being heard: There is no such thing as a "bad" share--there are shares which manifest and shares which do not. Any share starts the thing going. Presence, in my mind, is about manifestation. Even a ghost has a presence. But then we are attempting to be human beings--- leave the ghosts to Hades-- Land of the Invisibles (Why does that sound like Cyberspace?). How do you get started? In the words of the King of Hearts in ALICE's ADVENTURES IN WONDERLAND when asked the same question) "Begin at the beginning, go on through the middle and when you come to the end, STOP" ---- in other words, as I tell myself, "Just DO IT." There's that danged Fear of oh-I-won't be -perfect-enough always standing in the way.

3) That weekly programs and exercises were to be kept within the context of our group here and not given out to others on the outside. To my understanding (based on previous experiences with Work) this is for two reasons: First, maintaining the Hermetic character is not for reasons of secrecy, but as a Work exercise, for discipline reasons. Second, when people come to Work together they are building a concentration of energy -- a kind of food for each others transformism. When that food is given out, the energy disapates.

When Anton describes the group he is Working with using our exercises, I am feeling cheated because that group is not contributing and making efforts HERE.

Please, do not get me wrong, Anton (and others) the fact that you have been able to get a physically present group is a good thing --- I am all for it. I think it would be a good, even a Great thing, if small groups could form satellite fashion around this group. Just think what might happen if all those people could converge here weekly concentrating on the same thing. But where are these people and why are the rest of us here not benefiting from their insights? Not to be possessive, but the exercises are (and please correct me if I misunderstood your statements, Anton--- my apologies to you ahead of time) the exercises, are "Ours" here in the context of this Group. We all agreed to try this experiment of coming here to help in our/each others "Self-transformism". If this isn't a private group, then why bother with password protection? At the very least, as a member of this group I would want to be addressed before a change like that is made.

So, I am challenging all lurkers to reveal themselves and all borrowers to share in what you have availed yourselves of. I think we will all agree that Ian has a brought us a marvelous thing here. I happen to think that this experiment can work but that requires the one payment all of us must make to make it happen-- Manifestation.

Ian, if you feel this was out of line, my apologies --- no harm was meant. If you think this needs to be in the protected discussion area, let's move it.

To everyone else, I'd like to hear from you. If I irresponsibly offended you, I apologize.

However, if I stepped on a corn . . . well . . .

Best to All in Your Work,

Greg

I feel quite a delight with this and would like to thank Ian for this very much.

Thank you for posting this. I am heartened that you and the group in Moscow find the exercises useful. A lot of effort goes into making them available. I am sure the rest of the group here would also find your group reports useful. I, for one, would really like to hear some feedback from the other members of your Moscow group.
One of the conditions of membership in this group is that feedback is required. Please understand that it is necessary for your group to participate in the feedback loop, since you are all using the resources presented here. The task of composing a report could be an opportunity for a group effort where every member contributes to a report, which is then posted here, for the benefit of all. This may be an Endless Search but it is not an endless source without a complimentary 'return-to-source-force' to renew it. Think of this effort as a manifestation of reciprocal maintenance - the Trogoautoegocrat in action.

Thank you.

PS - There are a lot of others here who are silent - make an effort - speak up! It is more blessed to give than to receive.

Hi Greg,

No, you are not out of line at all. I have the same concerns. I wish more people would express their feelings and thoughts here like you do. I realize that it is not always an easy thing to do - I also have to push myself sometimes to post comments here. The effort usually proves beneficial later on.

It is almost a year since I started this online group. It is an experiment to see what elements of the Work can be transmitted and shared in cyber-space. I have received criticism as well as encouragement in this effort. Some times I wonder whether it is worth continuing. Posts such as Gregs and a few others give me encouragement that it is not all in vain.
In many ways this is a continuation of the oral tradition, but with a different medium of expression. We cannot see and hear each other and this poses many problems. I suppose we could try video conferencing, but that would require everyone to have a broadband internet connection and those that didn't would be missing out. So we are limited for now to sharing by text messages.
Maybe we should have everyone post a picture and a biography of their Work history and experience in the general discussion area?
I have posted my picture and bio for everyone to see - http://www.endlesssearch.co.uk/northeon4.htm
Maybe the rest of us should do the same? Maybe this should become a condition of membership? Since we can't interact personally, maybe it would be the next best thing? Should I add this to the Terms and Conditions of Membership? What do you all think?

Another problem is the method of payment for membership. Not everyone feels secure using PayPal or sending a cheque. On the other hand, I just can't let everyone have access to the discussions and Work exercises presented here without some level of committment and sincerity. I am all for open access to the Work ideas but I also want to filter out disruptive elements. This is one of the problems with internet discussion groups. Does anyone have some ideas of another way to implement this?

How to encourage more participation in the group? This is a tough question. It is no less a problem in 'real' groups. A certain level of confidence and experience are needed before people feel that they can actively participate. Some people lurk for a while and then disappear. No one can control that and allowances have to be made.
This can be a problem for more committed members - how much personal stuff do they want to reveal to someone they may never see again? Email is such a personal thing and inappropriate comments can hang around on the internet a long time after the fact. This imposes an extra level of caution on the things we say here.

The formation of satellite groups is a great idea, provided it is acknowledged here and the members participate in the discussions here.
There has to be give and take in all of this. There also has to be some level of oversight and feedback, lest things get misconstrued. Of course I have no control over this; I am relying on peoples honesty and good will.
Two of the people from the Moscow group post here fairly regularly and I appreciate that. I would hope that anyone else that wants to do that would let me know.

by Greg

Thanks, Ian.

I like the idea of having the pictures and bios posted somewhere so that we know who is involved at any given time. In lieu of sitting together in a room this gives us some form of human identity to one another.

The difficulty, the challenge (and I also think the creative gift) is to find ways of translating the Work group experience into the terms of the internet. While it certainly can't be seen as a replacement for face to face contact, we can come up with closer approximations. (I already like the feel of the challenge of this while I am writing!)

I do think that in order to make this work there has to be some sort of overcompensating going on. It's like blind people who have reported that other senses developed extraordinarily in order to make up for the lack of sight. There probably needs to be more in the way of personalising since the medium (internet) is intrinsictly a cold and impersonal one. Perhaps, too, the answering up is going to have to be tighter. If you aren't contributing something after a certain amount of time then; You have to move on? . . . I dunno. There is a gift in the sharing process. Anybody who has followed Harry and myself around these Forums for awhile has witnessed some of the synchronicity that has opened up between the two of us. It is small, but it is there and I have to believe that it is coming about because of the efforts we've made in sharing and communicating. In other words, it isn't that he and I are any kind of "special" and that the Higher Powers are smiling on us uniquely--- it is that we have tried. The "connection" made is self-evident: the Working.

I don't mean to go into preacher "I" mode BUT, in all the spiritual/creative/theraputic/group work I have done there is one common denominator for my relative success in any of those venues: "generosity with the truth of what is happening with me". It is understandable that I may not feel comfortable sharing EVERY little thing, but there are ways to talk about things in a kind of symbolic code and still reveals a truth. That need for a code is one of the reasons a "Work language" is given.

Enough from me.

For now.

Ian, Greg, thanks for your replies!

I have passed some information on your opinions regarding our group in Moscow to the members of the group and I believe we'll begin to repay you for your help very soon. We are really very thankful for this support we get from this forum and we are ready to pay for this. The other members of our small group who are not present here - Evgeniy and Sasha - are really working and show very much respect for the exercises which are given here.

UPD: I have got the comments from Evgeniy and Sasha - we'll prepare our first report by the end of this week. If you want more from us - please don't hesitate to let us know about this.

I agree with what's been said above. I also think that it's important to realize that right now we're in a time of resistance. I'm talking about Earth time here. . .

There are periods of time which offer more resistance than others. I've spoken before about this being a period of Fasting time. . .While I firmly think there is a physical reason for this, I also believe that it is an exercise in "conscious suffering". By choosing a type of suffering that has another beneficial result, we are choosing to step aside from the accidental suffering. We can't avoid it, but we can let it wash by.

As to Online Group: Being an Internet Baby. . .someone who started exploring this media when it was necessary to "telenet" to various places. . .I find it less "cold". I feel connections with Greg, Ian, Reijo, Aggie. . .to me this is a benefit. Reijo and Aggie are in Switzerland. Ian in England. Greg, I guess I'm not sure where you are, but my feeling is NYC or somewhere there about. We have the Russian contingent. I feel any of those who can communicate in English should directly join us. If not then those who can, can certainly speak for them.

I've been struggling with ordinary resistance during the past week. Dropped the resistance in to my hand a couple of times. Managed very infrequently to remember breathing while eating.

Dreams of a different quality are always interesting. If you can wake yourself out of a dream such as the one describe, I suspect it is a higher level dream. Watch your own symbols. I can tell when I'm in one almost immediately. But have been sleeping more dreamlessly this past week. In fact one night I made it through the entire night. If you're over 50 you know that's unusual indeed.

I'll have to have hing (my son's friend who lives with me) take my picture. Haven't had one taken except at family gatherings in decades.

Thanks for everyone's posts above. I look forward to the contributions of Anton and his friends and what they are coming up with.

As a replacement for a lack of physical presence, which even in a non-talking person sitting in a room produces a definite quantity of energy, the only equivalent here seems to be an affirmative posting legacy. That becomes the closest equivalent in my mind to the actual physical presence of sitting in a room. And all we can really do here is find equivalences ---- there is no replacement for the physical presence of another body. It seems in my mind, that the act of "conscious suffering" here is making the push to place ourselves online (whether "It " likes it or not) more and more. I know I have to do this to maintain my presence here. There is an odd off-shoot of this, too: I have to be more and more articulate about what it is I am talking about. I also, personally, have to find a way to "fuss-up" the language to get across subtleties of "color" and "feeling" without obfuscating the basic meaning.

Then there's my habit of editing to the max ---- to Work it all down to say exactly what needs to be said ---- so it reads the way it needs to be read. One Monitor installed a log posting of the editing proceedure after I had edited one posting more than 5 times on his forum! In that case, after the "mess", I needed to get the "irked" out of it -- all non-essentials. Clearly, this describes a procedure of Work-ing that in and of itself can happen here within this medium.

But, this is icing on the cake. The main thing now is to present ourselves and to do it more and more often so that we become accustomed to each other. I'd like to be able to say to Anton, "So, Anton you know about 'X,Y,& Z" how did that last exercise impinge on you?" If no one is willing to introduce themselves, no conversation gets started. Barring basic familiarity (the thing we are all a G. often intimated, the most afraid of) , this becomes a Black Hole --- which is by the very nature of this medium, is as close as the first refusal to show up and affirm ourselves.

Work Program week beginning 21 February 2005

by Ian

Every day this week after work try the following exercise -

The Draining Exercise

This exercise is given to assist in separating from the daily turmoil. The purpose is to drain from the body everything that is unnecessary. It is best undertaken when there is little pressure of time. One should begin seated in a not too comfortable chair. The spine should be straight. Feet on the floor. Hands resting in lap or dangling from the side. Alternatively, one can use the lotus position if one can hold that position for an extended period of time without excessive strain. Eyes may be opened in an unfocused stare, or closed in a similar stare. (Sightless gaze)

Begin the exercise by invoking the higher centers, intentionally, internally:

Holy Higher Intellectual
Holy Higher Emotional
Take control
Maintain my life
Maintain my impressions.

Drain Everything that is Unnecessary. This draining begins by opening 'valves' in the soles of the feet and the hands. Let the 'unnecessary' drain from these opened valves. Feel internally how the level of the 'unnecessary' begins to drain, first from the head, then down through the face, the neck, the shoulders, down the arms, down the torso. This is 'as if' a vat of 'unnecessary' is draining from the valves in the hands and feet. '
Thoughts will intercede. I's will attempt to gain attention. Events will flit by. When this happens go back and continue from the level where the interference occurred. Notice when the flow is slower. Let it unravel, become uncongealed. It is important to maintain impressions. But to not pay undue attention to intrusion.

Once all of the 'unnecessary' has drained from the bodies, close the opened valves. Maintain that state of 'nothingness' as long as beneficial. As you move away from the exercise, shake the hands and feet to break the threads of 'unnecessary.' Try to maintain the simpleness as you enter back into day to day existence.

Note: This is a powerful exercise and should be taken on as a 'holy event' or an act of service to His Endlessness. It is especially beneficial in 'times of trouble.'

During the week, when in the thrall of irritation, suffering or desire - Ponder: Are there are other valves that one can discover? Sense the base of the spine.
Ponder: Can we ever completely drain ourselves of suffering? Sense the chest.

Review the previous collection of weekly programs and pick 2 exercises to use during the week:
One that you really liked and one that you disliked. Share your choices with the group.

Worked late last night and had the entire place to myself. This is a busy time of the year for me (from now until end of April) and I try to do the majority of my work on either side of the work day.

So I have the whole big cavernous place to meself and I sit on the Aeron chair like a bullfrog on a big fat lily pad. Very comfy. And a coaxing voice inside of me says, "Now it's nice and quiet and private so why don't you try the exercise." So I did.

The pas s s s s s s ss s s s s s s s sagggggge of alert time. At one point the definite flash-feeling "am I really here? I mean what is this place called 'office' and, I mean . . . what is it really?" Just a flash mind you, not even enough to say the words just written. But what a flash!

I've really liked the journey towards this which started two weeks ago lying on the floor. The sneaking into modes of submission while walking to work when nobody is looking. The Way of the Sly Man. Hush!

Exercise done I challenged myself to stay up and work straight through the night. Invigorated by new energy, I know I can make it. And I do watching every little move in every little action. Fifteen different things need my attention so all night long I move in perpetual motion through and around and in each on. Never stopping but "dancing". My work is efficient. Clean. Thorough. My emotions run on one throughline os action straight through the night --- in one determined line.

By morning, the Little Boy emerges from the deeply drowsy man. The eight year old. Still there, the same one, from all those years ago --- essentially unchanged. So the 49year old body allows itself to be occupied by the eight year old, to put it's coat on, to walk outside in an awakening day, to react with slight personal offense to the first slap of the cold, damp air.

"It "wanders down the long lane as the drizzzling rain washes the last hangings of colour into dun - coloured ?

My experiences have likewise been heightened. Have more than once had the "remembering" experience of seeing myself present, doing something.

Again, the resistance this period is strong. So many ordinary things pushing against. This can provide energy. The ordinary can't be "escaped" but it can be "surfed". I think of the walking through the desert on stilts in Remarkable Men.

Even the little event of getting a picture on here. I know a lot of computer by 80x80 with a size of 6K is hard. Except Adobe allows a "publish for web" option. Hing knew this. I didn't. So it ended up 80x80 and only about 3K! On my own the lowest I could achieve was about 12K.

Know when to ask for help or accept it when it is vounteered.

Highly explosive erruption at work at the earlier stated site of my work area where I had practiced this week's exercise. I stayed tight inside myself while everything else went into disarray.

I can't say I'm suprised. Really expected it. All gaining ground in any spiritual work I have been involved in or creative work I have effected brings this intense resistence from the outside at some point. (I'm also, keeping Harry's reminder regarding the time of the year in mind).

Vivid lucid dream last night which lasted all night long. A taunting and extremely carnal femme fatale who constantly changed personae challenged me in one scenario after another. Recognized her position as my "internal energy robber" immediately and maintained consciousness within the dream throughout the night. It 's dirty work but somebody has to do it

The earlier stated work experience did result in my defining new boundaries in my definition there (the shifting personae of the Dream anima?)

In experiences like these, the relationship of the Inner and Outer (like the Gothic Cathedral) seems as close as close as can be. Any real division seems an illusion, a moot point.

When draining I can find where I'm blocked. If I'm full of this "liquid of the unnecessary" and start to try to drain it by gravity. . .remember the law of falling applies to everything. . .then I can find where I'm blocked.

I find knots in the throat area and in the solar plexus. These tightnesses don't want to be drained away. Thoughts, associations also like to pop in. Especially in the external head brain. Restarting is a resistance, but restarting the draining seems necessary.

There are definitely other valves. Almost seem to correspond to chakras, as they are taught. It seems these should be closed once the draining has passed that area.

For example, in the given exercise, when the draining has passed the hands, then the hands should probably be closed, and let the draining continue through the feet. But this may only be a personal experience.

When i'm emptied, I am.

---

by Greg

In addition to the above:

Knots also in between my shoulder blades and relatedly in the small of my back, all resistant to the release. Had a friend karate-chop the area between the shoulder blades. Went home to "drain" then went out dancing (which I haven't done in years!) Worked out the knot in the lower back and through a fluid, snaking spine, restored the flow of energy throughout the body. Kept everything self contained (as valves were shut off)

Returned home after several hours of dancing.

Deep, dreamless solid black, nine hour sleep.

This weeks particular exercise has been quite helpful for me personally as I returned from a hectic weekend in England having visited our esteemed host, Ian  . The releasing drains the excess, frenetic energy I generally store up and use for mostly mindless activities. Thus the final relaxing takes a sharp and distinctive turn for the different-from-usual.

However the machine knows how to start up again and today while vacuuming the house I went upstairs and tripped against the cord, barely containing myself from falling over. My four-year old daughter, standing in the hallway looked at me and said quite simply, "Papa, you have to relax, you know?" Much more Work to be done...

Below I post the Moscow group report as I promised before. I'm speaking here for three of its members - Sasha, Zhenya and myself. I would like to ask Marina to speak for herself as she has access to this discussion forum and didn't join our meetings recently.

I would like to make some things clear so you could understand our reports better. The "3 fingers exercise" is the Soil Preparing exercise from the 3rd Series and "the exercise with breath" is another exercise from that book in which the attention should be divided between our thoughts and the results of breathing accumulated in lungs.

We have visited the Dzogchen center near Moscow where we took part in the initiation into the practice of "White A" which is supposed to make students acquainted with the "Initial State" (I don't know the exact English equivalent of this Dzogchen term) - the state of mind behind its impurities.

Zhenya's report:
"Feb 14-18 '05
I fell into sleep several first times when trying to do the exercise with calling to the higher centers. Later when I succeeded in practicing it I noticed that it got easier to wake up at morning. Regarding the exercises chosen as "liked" and "disliked" the former - 12 joints - I did all the week while the latter - choosing two days: one to disagree with everyone and one to agree with everyone - I was constantly and automatically forgetting.

I practiced regularly other exercises - "3 fingers", "doorways" (saying "I am" while stepping through a door and noticing reverberations), "exercise with breathing" from the 3rd Series. 12 joints helped me to practise them.

Feb 21-27 '05
On practicing the "Draining Exercise" I felt the level of what was going out through palms and feet. When automatic associations distracted the attention, I went back to the previous level and continued doing the exercise. At the end of it I was getting the feeling of emptyness and stillness.

The week was divided into two parts: before Feb 23 (when we visited Dzogchen center) and after. After returning from Kunsangar I felt that the robot is swithing to the mode of illness and on Friday I began coughing and became ill.

When practicing 12 joints I began to feel that Holy Reconciling and rigpa - the Initial state - are just the same thing. In spite of decline of energy after Feb, 23 I've got the feeling that something very important has happened.

Regards,
Evgeniy Sergeevich Prokofieff"

Sasha's report:
"1. Draining excersise in very powerful for my body. I realised that draining can only happen, I cannot make it: my body has to be totaly still in order to let all impurities and everything unnessesary to drain out. I let the draining happpen through the opened palms and feet and sometimes the right and left sides of the head was opening too. The biggest sensation is happening in he palms. The most difficult is to drain from the assosiations and comments of the mind.
2. 12 joints excercise is beeing made on my way to subway in the moning and back home in the evening. It is not so strongly effecting me as at the beginning. I find it very energising and disciplinising.
3. Talking to Higher Centers leads to peaceful night sleep and better rest. At first I could not sence the words "Holly Higher Emoional", could not find contact. Now I start sensing these words. Higher Intellectual is sensed from behind my shoulders up and Higher Emotional is sensed in me like wasting from within, more sideways.
During the day I also practice "I am" excercise with doors and 3 fingers (which I have never done before and find it very difficult and strong I need to practice it more).
My main topics now are to learn to speak with awareness and to watch inner considerings."

Speaking for myself:
I found out that draining exercise makes me feel really empty (but not depressively) and that emptyness has some little taste of remorse of conscience as if what was drained out was hiding feeling of conscience from me. I've found out that there's two places in my body where the level stops for a while - in the middle of the breast (3 or 4 inches higher than solar plexus) and under the knees. I have also found out that after doing this exercise I need less time to sleep - I feel ok after 6,5-7 hours of sleep while not so long ago (on the previous week for example) I needed 7.5-6 hours, and I wouldn't say that my circumstances have changed much.

I continued to practise the exercises chosen as "liked" and "disliked" for the previous week (1. sensing right hand and feeling remorse when finding myself in identification and 2. trying to be humble and not expressing my opinions), and I got less success in them than on the previous week. I felt that I had less ability to find Holy Affirming for those exercises in me this week.
I have also practised "3 fingers" and I often got quite interesting experience in it when the rise of energy that happened after 5 or 10 minutes of dividing my attention was "covering" the perceptions of sensing and feeling in my fingers and distracting my attention to the rise of energy so that I needed additional effort of attention to break through this sensation to constating what was happening in my fingers. That "rise of energy" is felt as inflating that begins in solar plexus and spreading to all sides from there. I experienced just the same while doing Sightless Gaze with Whole Body Sensing this week and before.
Practising 12 joints I tried to feel what I mean when I say "Holy Affirming" and "Holy Denying".

I found out that my representation of them is like that: Holy Affirming somehow "breaks the structure" of Holy Denying (like cracking a nutshell) and the energy that was bind in this structure is freed and can be used. I ask myself whether this energy is Holy Reconciling or not - currently, I am not sure. It is not my firm opinion, what I've just said is my inner representation of what I experience while doing the exercises.

Topics we discussed on our last meeting were:
- what is Holy Reconciling (before going to Dzogchen center Zhenya told us that he thinks that Self-Remembering is manifestation of Reconciling force),
- my representation of Holy Affirming and Holy Denying (Zhenya agreed with me and told us that he was seeing the process just like that).
- how feeling can be constated in a finger (Sasha began to practise the "3 fingers" and we returned to the discussion that we had with Zhenya 9 or 10 months before when we were beginning to practise the same exercise).
- the "rise of energy" from solar plexus while doing several exercises - Zhenya thinks that it's the sign of correct practice and I'm not sure - it could be just a side effect that does't necessarily come with correct practice.

With warm regards,
Anton

P.S.It's nice to see Jose here - am I correct that it's Reio's interview with him is posted on gurdjieff-internet.com main site? I liked the interview very much.

A description of Self Remembering attributed to Gurdjieff - "What is the first characteristic of self-remembering? In this state (the individual person) is not the center. He or she is not 'separate'. Sitting in a room... they are aware of the WHOLE ROOM, of them-self as only one of the objects in it. They are likewise aware of others and do not put them-self above others, or criticize or judge. This is not love but is the beginning of love. In this state a person has no 'self' as they usually are aware of it. It is quite impossible for them to consider or become negative, for the moment they do, the state will vanish."

Hello Anton, et. al.,
Thank you for your kind words and yes, it is me you may have seen in the interview with Reijo. I hope to learn from all of you more senior Fourth Way students and perhaps offer up a little of what I have learned over the years. Perhaps I may even visit you in Russia sometime this year?

I did Draining exercise, first time I did them in the morning and noticed some interesting effects – during fulfilment of this exercise I was remembering many events –both recent unimportant and old traumatic. Right after completing of this exercise I felt my “simpleness”. But soon I noticed how I get irritable, and then the whole day I was very week and empty. Then I noticed a thought in my head : “ It is wrong to let impressions drain, it will be much better transform neagative ipmprssions” Nevertheless I decided to proceed with this exercise, and tried three times, but not once could carry out them to the end. My resistance was too strong.Why have I such resistanse by this exercise?

Jose,

we are glad to invite you to Russia. You can contact me directly through my email so we can discuss the details.

To everyone here:

>We are also going to visit 2005 Armenian Gurdjieff Conference (10.06.2005 - 12.06.2005) in Armenia (I have found the link on gurdjieffian.net: http://gurdjieffian.net/page.php?id=7). It can also be a good place to meet.

We could also discuss other time and possibilities to invite all of you to Russia or to meet somewhere else.

Marina:

The exercise is not to "drain impressions" as you intuited. That's why the prayer is there to begin with "Maintain my life; maintain my impressions". Can't live without impressions.

From Sasha(?): "That "rise of energy" is felt as inflating that begins in solar plexus and spreading to all sides from there." Try re-reading the I am now exercise from Life is Real. The "rise of energy" is described there. But that description is not exactly the same as yours, from my experience; anyway.

I too find recurring associations, often out of the blue or out of the past while draining. Usually, upon reflection, these are things I've not properly dealt with. And the draining lets them surface.

Harry,

And how would you defenite this 'unnecessary' ? What should we let drain?
May be I realy false understand this execise?

> Usually, upon reflection, these are things I've not properly dealt with. And the draining lets them surface.

The same was with me. I was very surprised about some associations in wich I was sure they were correct, and after this exercise I became doubt in them.
Yesterday I tried to curry out this exercise again, and suddenly I felt me sick so that I was forced to break. I can't understand why I have such a resistance both emotional and organic ?

The exercise is to drain unnecessary tensions from the body, unnecessary negative emotions and unnecessary thoughts.
We want to end up with all 3 centers relaxed and quiet and harmonized.
Those unnecessary things are fertilizer that the earth can transform in the process of reciprocal maintenance, so draining is an act of service as well as beneficial for us personally.

Can you endure the sickness a little bit each time you do the exercise, long enough to let some of it drain out with each attempt?

On the way to objective reason, many ideas we thought were correct will come into doubt. All conclusions should be provisional. Stay on the questioning side of things.

Try to be flexable - bending with the wind instead of breaking.

"And as regards the second fundamental primordial cosmic law, namely the sacred Triamazikamno, cosmic Objective Science formulates it in these terms. A new arising from the previously arisen through the 'harnel-miatznel', the process of which is actualized thus - the higher blends with the lower in order together to actualize the middle, and thus to become either higher for the preceding lower or lower for the succeeding higher." (Gurdjieff, Beelzebubs Tales)

While watching the breath, Ponder:
What is the reconciling force?
What are its affirming and denying aspects?
How does it manifest physically; emotionally; intellectually?
Can it be sensed; felt; conceptualized?
Where is the Rememberer who harmonizes the three forces?

For every opinion you express, silently consider its opposite.
Only ask questions; turn every statement or opinion into a question.
Pay attention to the 5 senses without labeling or conceptualizing them.
Fill the body with sensation often.

I think that each "force" can be active, passive or neutralizing, depending upon the octave. For example:

I am currently out of funding for my job. I live by grants, and our dear President has slashed grants that help people learn new jobs.

On a very ordinary level this is a negative force. I feel it in my solar plexus. It radiates through my body. My emotions surface. Usually lower emotions.

On a higher level this is a positive force. If the Work is part of the triangle instead of life, then this is giving me something to work on.

(What is unusual here is that it is clear that this is a repeating event for my life. Eleven years ago I went through a similar separation from my ordinary job. And it occurred to the Day at the same time. I was employed at that job for nine years. I was employed at this job for nine years. There is a taste to the event.)

On another level this event reconciles. I am in a position, for example, to help out both Hing, my son's girlfriend who still lives here; and my son, who lives in South Bend. I can help resolve issue that otherwise I wouldn't have time to resolve.

I remain edgy, simply because it isn't fully over. The job hasn't fully gone away. And a future isn't there. Yet. But I'm in a much better position than I was 11 years ago. This event is something I'm much more aware of.

Breathing is crucial, especially in dealing with the negative octave. That energy developed in the solar plexus needs to be transformed. This also gives energy for other octaves.

I've spent my week living Gurdjieff's discourse on the death of Orage. My step-father died on Tuesday. I won't rediscuss everything, except to note that mechanical emotions are very distasteful.

The funeral was yesterday, which also happened to be my birthday. About half way through the service I found myself needing to do the draining exercise described last week. I went into the week knowing that I would have many emotions to transform. But I was filled with so much that was mechanical that I had to leave it there, in the Church. As I drained they went through their rote prayers.

I have stayed away from organized religion for many years. But was almost aghast at how little was left. The music, which previously had, at least, been a mechanical "lift"; was now cacophanous. Even familiar songs, such as the Ave Marie, were presented in such a way as to be no food.

The night before dad died, I woke to a very strange lucent dream. A baby had been left in our care: that baby was shrinking away. My greatest dreamed fear was that we would harm the child as he became embryonic. I feared my mother might vacumn the child. . .

I need to also indicate that I lost my job on Monday of the week. No more funds. As I said in another post, I've lived on grants, and our American government has made those harder and harder to get if they are to help people. This, too, became lucent dream material. One of those Nicoll dreams, of being in a dangerous neighborhood. My being there, in this case, kept my internal communications from proceeding properly. (A mob was dashing my cell phone--something I don't even own--) I woke myself realising I was dreaming.

In terms of the week's exercises, I am even more aware of levels. I saw my father's passing as something positive, something he had been struggling to do, but was unable to find the means to do. When he died he died peacefully with his two full sons with him. I saw my mother working on nervous energy. I'm not sure she wept the entire week. She was more concerned with the "doing" and with making sure that all of the "family" was politically satisfied with her arrangements. This strong secretary always more concerned with what others think is something I've struggled with most of my life. . .

As I've said in these forums before, my step father was a good householder. An ordinarilly good man, who did what life demanded of him, always. But the notice in the paper remembered him for being "a fun dad and grandpa". Hardly something I recognized.

When the mechanical prayers were being offered, when the mechanical duties were required, I worked. Much I am, I wish, I can.

Thanks for sharing that with us Harry. I extend my condolences to you and your family.

Both my parents have passed on, so I can understand a bit of what you are experiencing. I also found the Work to be helpful at that time.

I hope you are successful in finding a new job.

Sorry for being a bit late - below I will post the reports of our Moscow group members.

Sasha:
"Working this week was smooth and peacefull, which is new for me. Excercise of the week lead me towards better attention on the oposites within events. Very often saying some opinion and watching the breathing I could also accept its oposite.

Found no clear unswerers for myself on ponderings, and rather questioning itself was a reminding factor.
During 3-fingers-excersise I could clearly separate counting and sencing. This devision lasting for some time, leads to clarity and the feeling of inner freedom. Whenever during excercise the mind assosiation comes - this division between centers disapears. It sences like an inner shrinking.
Draining excersise in the evenings like the last week is the process which is happening when I am steping aside and let the process happen. This excersise is much stronger for me then the daily-reviewing which I used to make in the evenings.
This week I attended Dzogchen ceminar. There I learned that the clear experience and participation in practice sometimes has nothing to do with the intellectual understanding of this practice. I did not have the understanding of words and images they used, but found that I can nevertheless fully participate in the practice together with others and have a streight experience of what is happening."

Zhenya:
"What is the reconciling force?
- In me the reconciling force is connected with awareness of the two others. When the Affirming Force (in form of Work Ideas) is affecting the Denying force (automatisms), the Reconciling force appears at the moment when I'm not identified with any of the two forces. In my opinion the Reconciling force appears as awereness of myself as a whole, in which the opposition of the two forces takes place. I'm not sure if the Reconciling force is connected with any particular emotion, though I had such a thought several times.

Where is the Rememberer who harmonizes the three forces?
- The Rememberer has something to do with the intellectual center, as the command to harmonize comes from the intellectual center, but at the moments when the centers are harmonized (for example after Movements or after the exetcise with breathing [from the Third series]) it seems that the Rememberer is between the centers or outside them.

Once before going to sleep I did the series of exercises - first the 3 fingers, then the exercise with awareness of breathing [both are from the 3rd Series], then the exercise with arms stretched [a Gurdjieff's advice for those who wish to sleep well, from Voices in the Dark], then calling to higher centers. There were an interesting moment on transition from "3 fingers" to the exercise with breathing - the latter was done much easier than usually. "

Speaking for myself:

Strange things happened. When I tried to ponder on the question about the Rememberer, I had quite a strange sensation between the shoulder-blades and lower - the place on the spine just back from solar plexus. It was like as if something very hot was placed under my skin there. I found out that my knowledge of the three forces is not in my intellectual center - I have to push myself into some state to remember how I experience the three forces and how I understand them and that state seems to include in some degree the functioning of all the three centers. I don't know how to answer this question but I have an intuition that I have no means to verify that this Rememberer could be God or Being. I understand that I talk about strange things and that looks like a Sufi or a madman but the question for pondering was really a shock for me.

It seems to me that all the three forces can be in all the three centers and yes, they can be sensed, felt and conceptualized.

For me the Reconciling force is in the relations of all sorts - between things, people, ideas and so on. I had a "vision" or an insight of everything I know as one huge net of relations that have hierarchical structure.

Some experiences with doing the 12 joints exercise seem to be remembered as a "taste" that I cannot attribute to one center or another - they don't look like thoughts, feelings or sensations. My understanding of what are the three forces in me is an example of that.

I really speak like a madman but I feel that I should share it with you so that you could help me. It's the situation when I cannot label what happens to me but I want to understand somehow what happens.

Theme: Abstract Purpose

We act out our business in the world each day. We perform rituals of social behaviour in order to play our roles in our family or worklife. Nothing that we do or say has any meaning or importance, unless we do it in the right spirit, for a greater good rather than selfish reasons. It is a tiny thing that makes all the difference. To carry out a task with gusto, to ones fullest ability, whether it be Work on self or work in the world, is to feel joy in the humblest task; this is only possible if we do it in the spirit of a higher abstract purpose - selfless service without expectation of reward.

During the week try to perform all tasks, whether they be Work on self or work in the world, with abstract purpose in mind. This may be coupled with an abstract attention to ones breath; ones sensations; ones impressions; ones emotions.

The payment for periods of joy, compassion, love, reverance, or awe shall be to evoke an abstract humility.

Ponder: What is the alure of abstract purpose?

Last week I had some insight into the Law of Three. While pondering on the the dynamics of the this law, and the relationship between triads it became apparent how when one is creating visual art, for example, that it is absolutely necessary to have the artist, the form of expression and the observer. The artist cannot create the form without considering the perspective of the observer. My personal interest in learning to understand the function of art slipped into the pondering on the law of three. It was not my intention to combine them. Although this insight became part of my experience, I cannot really say for sure which position is taken by which role. It could be that it changes depending upon the consciousness and the intention of the artist and the observer.
Now that I have written these coments on the Law of 3, perhaps there is a clue somewhere as to how to approach this weeks practice of "abstract attention". Usually I would think that I would be acting upon my environment and thus creating the reconciling force. It is more likely that the environment is acting upon me and I am just part of the denying force. How is my part in any process altered when I have abstract purpose? How is it possible to make the shift from action for self-satisfaction to selfless action? How do I make myself available to be acted upon by a higher purpose?

Could abstract attention = affirming force?

Interesting that you pose "purpose". Because "end" has been a big reading. Nicoll's essay on the two priests, both raised in the same neighborhood, trained in the same seminary, but each has different ends. . .one becomes a Bishop; the other helps the poor.

"Not my will, but thine be done." This is giving over to abstract purpose. The idea of being able "to do" is trained into us so early in life. It's part of what our ordinary training is about.

Not my will. . .

I have tried over the last several years to allow the work, or My Work, to be positive. Mostly this is not thought. It is breath. It is unfocused acceptance. It is active passivity. And the events of life come differently. . .or the same.

Events still occur: on February 22nd, 1994 I walked away from a job in a state of anxiety. Eventually I quit. . .after getting ordinary help for the genetic anxiety I had developed over the years. Grin and bear it.

On February 22nd, 2005, I walked away from a job I'd held for 9 years because I ran out of grant money. I had accumulated over six weeks of vacation, but didn't have enough money left to pay myself but for four days. . .Very little anxiety. But the event was recurring.

My job search, and ordinary life search is abstract. Not my will, but thine be done. . .

Ian, I tried to label somehow what is affirming force in me and your suggestion quoted above seems to be quite close to what I experienced but - I feel that there's more in it.

It's again a difficulty to formulate the experience that is hard even to attribute to any particular center.

by Faye

> Could abstract attention = affirming force?

Yes, if I can look at abstract purpose as an active equation, the effort moves from trying to understand its definition (in which my mind became lost) to being present with and accepting the not knowing of it or whatever else is happening at the time.

And I find too, as Harry mentioned, that we are trained and conditioned to do, or to think that we can do, which is a great hindrance for me in this exercise. It takes an enormous shift in me to move away from believing that.

by Harry

Concluding the week was summed up in a reading from Nicoll: events recur; what changes is how i interact in the event. If I don't see the event happening, I've not observed anything. . .what becomes important is how I come to that event.

Some of these events come on long cycles. Others can happen very frequently. Observation is both internal and external. But external observation means seeing things differently. Metanoia. Change of mind. External observation changes when inner changes.

Work Program week beginning 14 March 2005

In the morning, upon arising stand in front of a mirror (preferably full-length). Begin each exercise with a "moment of silence", simply standing and collecting yourself. Breathe easily, deeply and fully, sending the breath towards the pelvic basin. Regard your reflected image by going into "sightless gaze".

Once settled, take the day's prescribed "body gesture"

For the first five minutes, (silently) hold the gesture. Visually, take in the gesture's shape. Become aware of the air's temperature on the skin. Coax the musles into relaxation and watch the process in your reflected image. Sense the perpetual dance of energy which supports the bones as they maintain the lines of the gesture's structure.

When you have a come to a complete sense of your entire organism holding the gesture, intone the acompanying vowel sound on the exhalation.

MONDAY/ Vowel sound "A"
From a standing position, legs together, turn the feet out. With the left leg, open to the left so that your heels have about a foot's space between them. Open the arms angled straight out to the side. In the mirror you should your body describing a triangle; its apex just above your head, the sides indicated by the jutting out of the arms (palms facing inwards).
Intone vowel sound.

TUESDAY/ Vowel sound "E"
From standing position, legs together, left foot steps slightly forward. Legs straight. Right arm arcs in front of the face towards the left with palm down. Left arm "undercurves" in front of the belly towards the right with palm facing upwards. It should look like the arms are inscribing/holding a large "ying/yang" symbol in front of the torso.
Intone vowel sound.

WEDNESDAY/Vowel Sound "I"
Stand with legs together. Feet pointing forward. Bring arms fully straightened, out through the fingertips, palms facing each other, up over the head, shoulders dropped. Face forward. You should see your body as one straight line.
Intone vowel sound.

THURSDAY/Vowel Sound "O"
Stand with legs together. Feet pointing forward. Right foot steps slightly behind. Both arms curve, palms facing up, fingertips almost touching. Arms are inscribing a ring shape in front of the torso.
Intone vowel sound.

FRIDAY/Vowel Sound "U"
Stand with legs together. Feet together pointing forward. Arms openly curved to the sides. Turn arms up over the head palms open upwards in a gesture of reception from Above. Intone vowel sound.

SATURDAY and SUNDAY/Vowel Sounds "A", "E', "I", "O", "U".
Put the weeks gestures together moving from one to the next to the next progressing towards one continuous motion. Always return to neutral standing after each gesture before moving to the next. If you have a partner, face and mirror each other. If you are in a group, do perform your Vowel Dance in a circle wide enough for movement and so that you can see each other.

Keep all of the movement simple. Try not to complicate things. Each body gesture is mirroring the graphic shape of the letter, a type of semiphore. Hold gesture past the "uncomfortable" point. Where is the tension, the hurt? What can be done to change it? If it becomes too unbearable simply "drop" the shape, shake out your body and return to the gesture.

When intoning the sound, play with it. Sound it loudly, softly, highly pitched, lower pitched. Where does that particular tone originate and where does it end? Does it travel? Where? Does it stay in one place?

A couple of times, during the day "Stop" yourself in the middle of an activity and take a quick inventory. What position are you in? Where are the tensions? Is your breathing aftected (positively or negatively)? Are you "in" your body or "out"? Are there adjustments that need to be made? How much energy is being used?

Upon retiring, send yourself directly into sleep.

Today's "I" was exactly needed. The physical shape of it, that is.

My center of gravity rolled shattershot all over without settling most of the day. Extra efforts were needed tom get ANYthing done. Complete inability to focus. Worked against the chaos as a platform. Did my routine "dance" on top of it. Accepted (at times grudgingly, I have to admit) that the chaos was there and tried (mostly) to make the best of it.

My work situation has been overwhelming the last couple weeks. Changes (interiorly) are taking place with me and balancing with others (habitual) expectations of the exterior me is some piece of work. What is happening to me on the inside is of no concern to them, nor should it be. I am paid to play a role and that's that. But . . .

This doesn't follow the week's program, but I'm placing it here.

As you all know my step-father died on the 1st. Wednesday morning I had an extreme lucent dream.

In this dream my mother had died. When I went to see her in the coffin she sat up. All of the step family were praising God for the miracle. My mind was saying "This contradicts everything I know." There was much commotion. Long lines were filing through the room to visit her in her coffin. I handed her a crucifix and she laid back down to her rest. The people in line were angry with me. I had taken away their miracle. Then I confronted my step-father. He was clearly much younger, probably younger than I had ever known him. "You can't do this. You can't take her away." We grasped hands in front of us, as a test of power. "But you only have an hour," I told him. I then forced his body down. Again anger from all those around.

I awoke. Hing awoke in the next room and went to the rest room. I was pleased to be awake and hear her, because I knew I was alive. I went to the restroom myself. I was fully, completely awake.

When I laid back down the presence of the dream remained. A half hour of the breathing exercise brought me back to semi normal. During this period I wished my father rest in peace. This seemed necessary.

When I reawoke, it was clear that I was dealing with the idea that we pass into a "heaven" (or hell) which is like this body going to a new place. I was also, somehow, dealing with my step-father's spirit.

While different in their characters and portrayals, both Hing and Keefe, who is back in South Bend, had similar dreams at the same time. Both dealing with life and death situations. Both lucent.

An event? The equinox?

Certainly the subconscious (a word I don't like) which has been discussed elsewhere in these forums. --I prefer communications from higher centers, or from external sources, than subconscious--

I have felt "strong in body " all week. It has been a gradual thing, a growing fullness of presence particularly in the thoracic area. All organs illuminating with a steady glow, neatly "stacking" themselves into gushy place. By Friday my body is moving all of a piece from ahead to toe, energy running from the base of the spine, up across the top of the head. spilling down over my face, my chest, my heart my belly, into the pelvis, under my groin, and completing the circuit. I didn't make this happen. I facilitated the journey.

By day's end, I take a "night walk" through the city as a person (I am soon to realise) "under cover" There is the shocking feeling that I have died somewhere along the line and wasn't aware of it. Aligned with this "oddness" is a deep satisfaction in the sensual unity I am experiencing. So here I am secure in this physicality while mentally reviewing "snapshots" taken at various locations over a thirty year time period --- many of them "i"s I haven't considered for a while. Some I had forgotten had even existed ---- burnt out, extinguished, used up (I do think that's possible with some ---- so extreme in their manifestation they couldn't hope to draw another breath)

Suddenly, as I'm standing near a corner watching the weekend crowds pass a SHOCK in the form of a person from my past saying "Where have YOU been?" Someone, frightening, someone I must play a conscious role with. His wolf so close to the surface. I smile sweetly. Tell him "Well, what a suprise." And watch, watch, watch. In spots like this every ounce of physical, mental, and emotional accuity are needed. The situation passes with success. No damage, to either party. Another test. Another passage. And I am on my way home.

I wake again "strong in body" and go through the vowels. The body hums. Again, the ease and completeness physically --- the circuit of energy. A tight spot, the size of a lima bean "floats" in my back one inch to the left of my spine. I try to ride it out on the bicycle but it's stubborn and wont "let go". So I let it be. Odd, this tiny spot, a door not ready to open, stands between the Present, and the succeeding sensation.

Greg,

Funny you should mention Bergman. . .as a matter of fact I just pulled out the collected works; started with Shame. . .

As to being "dead" in the streets: my son's response to the funeral experience was "I was an alien, I was raised differently than these others." I had a similar experience to yours at the funeral. Suddenly I hear "H.J?" Having not been known by that moniker since I was 18. . .I had to search for high school "i's"

Much of my early preperation I attribute to cummings and his "undead".

As we had some difficulty to prepare the report for the previous week I provide the report for two past weeks below.

Sasha:
Abstract goals work in the way that each act in the world, even small one, is becoming meaningfull and in service of something highr. It is easier to comunicate with people at work for the sake of the abstract goal (such as : my own enlightenment, or Realisation of my parents, or Harmony).

At the end of the day I do draining. Sometimes it happens during my walk home.

Last week I was missing doorways all the time and then I asked myself Why do we use doorways for that excersise? I realised that the door is a border, the line between one and another spaces. Then this excersise started working again.

Excersise with sound-postures were creating tensions in my body, I could not do them for 5 minutes. I sence the energising effect from correspondence of the sound and the gesture.

Sometimes in the mornings there was not enough time to go deep ito this excersise.
Whenever an emotion was coming - I find that either an emotion takes the body in its hands and uses it to become bigger, or during fear or enxiety .I could sence that I am disapearing from the body. Usually when I find that I am out of my body - I find myself in my intellectual center, thinking or analising or commenting.

Zhenya:

Abstract Purpose.
March 7-13: Remembering of abstact purpose is not a new task for me. At Autumn'2004 I decided to fulfill my obligations on my job for an abstract purpose. At that moment it helped me very much and the problems that appeared on my workplace stopped to bother me. A good moment for remembering of abstract purpose came last Saturday when we were at restaurant where we meet for weekly reports and discussions of our work on ourselves - I realised that my wallet with almost all my money, passport and driving license was just stolen.

What is the alure of abstract purpose?
If the remembering of it is kept in mind, a higher abstract purpose can become an active force in triad of forces where the robot with all its automatisms acts as a passive force. Then as a result of transubstantiation the third force emerges, that reconciles the other two. For me it is a particular state of consciousness, such that while being in it I can be conscious of all the three forces acting me and my own presence, without identifying with either active force (abstract purpose) or passive force (robot). In my opinion the point of Work is in this process, when we prepare the robot in such way that it begins to conform the higher abstract purpose with its structure and when this happens the abstract purpose begins to affect the robot and as a result of this influence something emerges that is higher than robot and lower than the abstract purpose.

I did the obligatory exercises [that we practise continuously - from week to week] quite regularly except standing with arms stretched and calling to higher centers before sleep. As I did before, I forget about them and don't remember them at the appropriate moments.

I had an interesting experience at Thursday night - I went to sleep at about 1:30 and remembered that I hadn't practised the 'three fingers exercise'. As it was quite late at night I decided not to get up and practise it laying in bed. After 'three fingers' I went on to the exercise with attention to breathing [from the Third Series] and as a result I began to feel the reverberations - like waves. They were not intensive in the beginning but then they began to be felt everywhere in the body and I felt myself as consisting of reverberations. After that there were sensations of hovering and later when the reverberations moved to my head I was percepting my mind as something divdided from me and hanging in emptyness. I heard some words pronounced in my head in some unknown language - I couldn't understand a single word.

March 14-20

The exercise with sounds and postures I did at all the days except Monday. The exercise brought pleasure to the Moving center but I have nothing else to say on this.

There is a point about all the exercises. I have noticed that while practising the exercises I often switch to automatical associations and cease to do the exercise or do it automatically. It is more so with obligatory [practised by us from week to week]. An automatism appeared and the free attention that was less before is automatically drawn to these associations. For example, when I am stepping through a doorway and pronounce "I am" I do it autimatically and can be at the same time identified with my thoughts. I see only one solution to this - to direct the attention on being conscious of whole me and do the exercise with the remaining part of attention.

Anton (i.e. me myself)

March 7-13
With abstract purpose it is easier to concentrate and divide the attention in exercises. Several times I managed to turn the abstract attention on. I liked Ian's idea that the abstract attention could be the Affirming force though for me Holy Affirming is something larger.

It is hard to fulfill my obligations on my workplace for abstract purpose and to work with all my abilities - the identifying with inner considering like "I am out of time" or "I am lazy" is too strong in me.

The other exercises I did not so often, the week was quite weak in general.

March 14-20
I did the exercise with sounds and postures only once on Wednesday with "i". Some strange sensations but nothing unusual, I'm going to explore the exercise until I find out the point of it.

I had two quite unexpected "lucid dreams" (when one is conscious of the fact that he is sleeping and what he sees is a dream) after practising draining and calling to higher centers.

I found out that it is quite easy to get the "reverberations" in my solar plexus if while doing something that requires visual attention (like reading or editing text documents) I divided my attention on two parts: 1) what I am looking at and 2) the whole visual field (like in sightless gaze).

I had much inner considering and episodes of strong rising negative emotions this week, usually I couldn't deal with them though several times I managed to "break" the state and calm down my thoughts and feelings. At that moments keeping my attention on understanding of my nothingness and mechanicalness helped much.

I had a feeling that that vision of the aim of our Moscow group is replaced gradually by automatisms and inner considering, so I proposed the members of our group to discuss the situation in Work that everyone of us have and motives and aims for his or her own Work and the aims of the group. If you wish I could post our reports on this as I get them from other members of our Moscow group.

Thank you Anton and your group for all your postings in the last couple weeks. They have been of great value!

I, too have had the lucid dreaming. My suspicion is a well-activated solar plexus, brought into alignment helps to support this. Stomach, being the seat of Will, will help to maintain "place" even within the dreamtime.

Anybody else agree or disagree?

Greg,

Your idea about solar plexus is of great interest to me. I have noticed that my solar plexus activated recently much more often than before. Could anyone here explain why the solar plexus reverberates at particular situations (when practising divided attention, for example), and what it has to do with the whole process of work on ourselves?

---

by Harry

Anton,

I want to answer indirectly, because my experience was that it was necessary to discover some of this on my own. The best direction is given in Life Is Real. G. describes a breathing exercise, with I am, I wish, I can. Part of that exercise deals with the solar plexus.

Our eyes, ears, and nose aren't our only organs of perception.

As to lucid dreams, I firmly believe that there is a taste to certain dreams; dreams coming from other sources. Inside of ourselves. O. talks about a number of types of dreams. I'm in a snowstorm and wake to find I've kicked the covers off. Or dreams that resolve ordinary everyday conflicts, which we can't resolve in our day to day lives. And then there is another level that comes from another level of consciousness. Be that what Freud described as the subconscious. Or as someone suggested here, the unconscious. Nicoll has described a lot of this. And his connection with Jung is probably important in that description.

by Marina

Hi Anton,
I get my first solar pelxus reverberation many years ago and it worried me very much. I asked our exteacher -Anatoliy Romanovich about reason of this strange sensation, but you sertainly know his answer: I should ask about this matter by saints near bonfiar
After few years I get other kind of sensations, they were more fine and hardly perceptible and at the same time very pleasant. With this sensations I had very quiet and balanced state and this always lead to selfremembering.
So I can definite and have two kind of reverberations in solar plexus and I am sure that both are stimulated by our Work
1. pressed one, This sensation resembles me remorse of conscience.

2. and very fine one, wich always lead to selfremembering.

from your post I coudn't definite what kind of "reverberations" did you had?

As to lucid dreams, may be you can remember I've wrote this in our russian forum, as I think they always show change in our consciousness and I practised this dreams some time. If you before sleeping will bring you in balanced state, which G. recommended for taking a decision, and formulate your intend for having such dream, you for sure get lucid dreams. But in spite of my interesting experience with these dreams - in few dreams I asked G. about my Work and get real help, or you know about Zhenyas experiences, may beit will be very interesting for all. When we started with our small group, I asked in my dreams about our search for teacher and help in Work, and my look was directed to USA, but in my dreams I get answer - Europe - France or England. And I phoned Zhenya to tell him about my dream and he told me, that in his dream (lucid one) he met a strange man who gave him website address, but all what Zhenya could remember was ending ".UK"

But in the same time, I noticed that I loose my force in such kind of dreams, and stoped any practise with dreams. Now I am in full agree with Gurdjieff's opinion, that dreams are cheap things and to Work well you should sleep well, without dreaming
And if you have a lucid dream you should have a conscious, here I mean intended dream, with purpouse, but you schould also know that in such kind of dreams you will inevitable loose your consciousness and excessive passion for lucid dreams will make you tired and when such kind of dreams happen to you this shows that you can't hold your substance it is the same with men's spermatorrhea in sleep.

I repeate " To work well one need sleep well"

best regards,
Marina

Both types of sensations in solar plexus seem to be familiar to me though most often my sensations there can be described as a "fire" or "heat" in the solar plexus. I have noticed that recently this sensations began to come much more often, and they are usually connected with moments of (semi-)conscious effort and the moments when I try to divide my attention.

I don't see big value in dreams also but I'm quite interested why the exercises had such a side effect.

Interesting statement, Marina. I've pondered it now for a while. I ttend to agree with the statements that dreams are a cheap thing and that if you are truely Working you descend into dreamless sleep. I've had a few instances where my attention was at an unusually high pitch for most of the day and there were no dreams to be had at night --- the machine was spent.

Many of my lucid dreams center around how my "moral core" happens to respond at that given time. I am given situations where I am being asked to "stand up for what I stand for". In these, I definitely "hold my substance" --- I have to. Although, I sometimes wake in a sweat for all the effort it takes. Now, maybe the sweating could be regarded as the loss of substance in a sweat --- I dunno. Perhaps the real trick is to go through this process "cooly".

Dreams from higher centers have a special taste and often some teaching is being conveyed that I have not been able to absorb any other way. AND perhaps that, in itself is indicative of a wrong working of centers.

Anton,

I don't know why we have this side effect. Perhaps these are "impressions" lodged in the musculature, loosened up by physical movemnt and as in meditation float up into consciousness.

Did Harry answer your question regarding solar plexus or do you need to hear more from me?

Greg

by Harry

I'll agree that totally dreamless, totally sound sleep is most complete. But reality is that we are rarely in that position. REM sleep has to occur. We know that scientifically. We also know that REM sleep corresponds with dreaming from experiments done by waking people during REM sleep.

So we dream. I believe someone even said we dream most of the time we're "awake".

Lucid dreams are of a different flavor. They can be encouraged, but I'd agree that this can be use of energy we don't understand. I have few ordinary dreams. But will have lucid dreams at times when I'm in need of a message from some level.

When I do the exercise of contacting higher centers before sleep, as described several weeks ago, there is a sensation of "maintain my life" and there is a sensation of "maintain my perceptions". . .I've also used I am, I wish, I can as an evening prayer, balancing of centers before sleep for many years. . .so perhaps this takes my sleep to a different place.

by Ian

Many interesting comments about dreams. They are another tool in our Work and can at times reveal important things to us or remind us that we have unfinished business. A good nights sleep is also important. The amount of sleep required probably varies from person to person. Balance.

by Marina

Greg,

> Perhaps the real trick is to go through this process "cooly".

exactly

Ian,
there is a other kind of dreams, i would definite them as prophetic dreams. Probably this kind of dreams meant Harry by writting: "this can be use of energy we don't understand".
I noticed some "lunatuc's features" by people practising "lucid dreams" excessive and I didn't see how lucid dreams do assist me in my self-remembering, quite the contrary- after lucid dreams I get tired. In W. Patterson's"Voices in the dark" I've read that G. say "later you can use dreams for self-suggestion, but not now" And I accept such way for "lucid dreams" with purpose. When me myself decide to have a lucid dream to get an answer or to strengthen my Affirming Force and not because it just has happened to me.

Anyway it is my own conclusion and everyone should observe oneself to see either have his "lucid dreams" some value or not.

best regards,
Marina

---

by Ian

Marina,

Yes, prophetic dreams - among those that reveal important things to us.

Self-suggestion is interesting. Could this be similar to self-hypnotism?
Visualising an action before we do it is a form of self-suggestion.
Saying - I wish, I can, I am, is a form of self-suggestion.
There are 'As-If' exercises in the Work such as acting as-if one were enlightened, or a real woman, or a person with Being.
A related type of exercise is Role playing.

by Marina

Ian,

> Self-suggestion is interesting. Could this be similar to self-hypnotism?

I don't like word " self-hypnotism"because of my associations with one "sacred practice" of our ex-teacher. And as I think this is the best tool for making psychopaths. But if I try to go beyond my bad associations connected with this word, I'll agree with your statements. This is all different kinds of self-hypnotism. But how can we use all this in our dreams? Will be it more effective when I pronounce my "I wish, I can, I am" in my dream, sertainly in lucid one?

The planetary body is the foundation for what rises above. The desires of the planetary body may be guided by our wish to be. The midcourse eddies between two streams; between extremes.
During the week, when struck by the slings and arrows of desire, an opposing wish from above may include a remorsefully rising refrain of a-i-e-i-o-i-u-o-a sounded and sensed deep in the marrow of the spine and skull.

In a relaxed three centered state, the seeker may ponder - What is the midcourse between question and answer?

Ahh. . .time to contemplate the vowel word, again!

That which comes between consanants to supply meaning.

And there are no vowels in an Arabic dictionary.

The vowel word!

by Anton

This week I continued to practise the exercise from the previous week - with postures and vowels. Each posture has its inner sensation in me though it is quite hard for me to express what is different. The vibration of the sound travels from solar plexus to breast, throat and back side of my head - up and down. Going to explore the exercise a bit more.

Practised the aieioiuoa exercise, it seemed that the exercise from the previous week was a preparation for aieioiuoa - now when I refrain the vowels they are associated with the inner sensations of the postures given on the previous week. The sound of aieioiuoa helps to detach from body and automatic "I"s' desires.

Solar plexus now "responds" much more often to situations of effort and divided attention.

In general the week, and several previous ones, passed in identifying with inner considering and negative emotions. At that moments when I managed to disidentify with them the main help came from remembering my nothingness and from trying to feel humility. This was leading to the rise of energy, more intense perception of circumstances, more clear thoughts and ability to organize my actions.

---

by Greg

The slings and arrows of Desire have "slung and arrowed" all over the place this week! Well, there's no complaint about nothing to work with---that is certain.

Something I continue to forget to share here: Since the end of last summer I have been aware of an increase of attention towards my hands and feet. The predominate attention is in the hands but both "require" a more than usual direction of attention. It is of increasing importance where my feet are placed and that becoms a reminder of a sensory awareness of the soles contact with the ground. This in turn sometimes leads to a feeling of pulling energy from the Earth , up thru the feet and legs, ending with a "felt" recipriocity between the soles and the top of the head (as if the head were "sole" to the air). The bone structure and alignment in my hands and fingers has become more sensitive---often feel that I am X-Raying into them.

I like that!

We humans are like walking lightening rods, always conducting electricity between the earth and the sky.

Have you ever got a shock off of a door knob after walking on a carpet in the winter? We are conducting environmental electricity through our bodies all the time. We are embedded within the electric field of the earth, which has a voltage gradient between the ground and the ionosphere, measured at hundreds of volts per metre.

Our nervous system also works with electricity - everything we think, feel and sense is based on electricity. Gurdjieff spoke of electricity in our bodies. There is a chapter in Beelzebub's Tales about Electricity. Keith Buzzell goes into this in his new book - Perspectives on Beelzebub's Tales. He relates electricity and electromagnetic fields to H48, H24, H12 and H6 of the Table of Hydrogens.
This is a very interesting area for study.

Four Point Exercise

Gurdjieff (From a Meeting in Paris, Thursday, July 13, 1944):

"Yahne, what you ask, what you want, I understand it. You do not have internal psychism of feeling. You want to strength this. I am going to give you two exercises which are for you only, no one else. It is necessary to separate your organic functions from your individuality. At the moment when you are working, when you self-remember, you have another state from the usual. It is necessary to separate these two states. For this there is an exercise, a whole series of exercises even. Here is the first: you do it, for example, seated, leaning comfortably installed in an arm-chair or on a couch. There is a spot where the arms are attached to the body, (region of the shoulders) and a spot where the legs are attached to the body, (hip-joint); feel and control these four spots all the time. All your attention must be concentrated there. Send everything else to the devil. When you say "I am" imagine that these four spots are like four pillars on which is supported your "I am". Focus your attention; not on the extremities nor to the interior of the body. All your concentration is fixed on these four places. Do this for your future real "me". To begin, learn to know this state; it is like a measure, a clue. You will self-remember when you can feel well these four places. Leave all the rest. Live life as before. This is your only exercise, but do it very seriously so that all of the most concentrated moments of your work be based on those spots. After, you shall have title to a real individuality. These things could only serve as a barrier between your individuality and your ex-functions. I say "ex" because you must have a new quality of functions. The whole world must have a new quality of functions - because of an abnormal life in the past. It is necessary to create a barrier. For you, it shall be the result of this exercise. When you feel and are conscious of this definite barrier, your ground shall be prepared for a new exercise; then you will be able to have a new interior, independent, and a new exterior, independent. You shall have a normal body and a normal psychism, without the abnormal ex-functions. This is solely for her and for no one else. Do not try to do it out of curiosity. It is a very dangerous thing."

> Ian wrote:
> I am going to give you two exercises which are for you only, no one else. . . This is solely for her and for no one else. Do not try to do it out of curiosity. It is a very dangerous thing."

Ian,

I wonder about this. I understand the exercise, but this seems particularly designed for a single person, for a special reason. As you are the senior person here, I'd be interested in your response to this concern?

---

by Ian

Harry and all,

Although G said this exercise was only for Yahne, he also mentions that it is one of a series of exercises, even. Gurdjieff had a whole repertoir of exercises to draw upon - sensing, counting, attention, will, observing, movements, etc... In Life Is Real there is a series of Soil Preparing Exercises.

This weeks exercise is a relatively simple sensing exercise. There are simpler ones such as sensing the left hand and more complex ones such as Gurdjieff's 3 Finger Soil Preparing exercise or Bennett's 100 point exercise. From Paul Beidler we have the 10 Bone exercise and the 12 Joint exercise.

Layered upon the base of Sensing can be added other tasks such as attention to I Am, observing the 3 centers, visualizations, prayers/mantras, breath, evoking higher emotions, etc...

The level of difficulty of these exercises is determined by the number of things between which one has to divide ones attention. Developing Attention is one of the main things in this Work. As G said, the higher centers are active in us but we are not aware of them - we haven't connected to them, so they are operating sub-consciously. Attention is the bridge that can connect our 3 lower centers to our 2 to higher centers. Our Attention needs to become deeper, wider, and longer.

Exercises like the one this week are to help us to divide our attention during self-observation, to sense our body and to develop a sense of I AM or self-remembering. If it is too hard, try using 1 or 2 joints instead and slowly work your way up to 4.

The only 'danger' in this type of exercise is trying to do too much at first and thus becoming discouraged by failure and losing will power. Another possibility is that we may develop fantasies about experiencings that arise during the exercise. We need to keep a critical mind and measure our progress in slow and steady steps.

We are our own best book - get to know yourself page by page.

by Anton

Ian, I want several details of the exercise to be made clear:

1st: G. says that

> Here is the first: you do it, for example, seated, leaning comfortably installed in an arm-chair or on a couch.

and then he says > feel and control these four spots all the time.

So I would like to know whether we do the exercise really all the time (i.e. walking, sitting by the computer on the workplace, talking with people etc) or just at special prepared moments when we can be seated and "comfortably installed"?

2nd:

> Focus your attention; not on the extremities nor to the interior of the body.

what does this mean?

And the 3rd:

> These things could only serve as a barrier between your individuality and your ex-functions. I say "ex" because you must have a new quality of functions. The whole world must have a new quality of functions - because of an abnormal life in the past. It is necessary to create a barrier. For you, it shall be the result of this exercise.

Should we pay some special attention to creating this barrier or it will be created by this exercise without our paying attention to this process?

---

by Ian

Anton

He means to sense the 4 spots all the time during the exercise. It may take some practice to acheive that.

The so called barrier will be a result of doing these types of exercises. Just let it happen; keep attention on the 4 points and on I Am.
Instead of barrier, one could think of it as a separation or distinction or attitude of objectivity between I and It, between I and your functions.

by Anton

Ian, thank you for your answers. I tried the exercise today and it seems very interesting.

Could you shed some light upon my 2nd question - about extremities/interior of the body? Sasha thinks that 4 points should be sensed not in the body at all but I don't know anything besides my body to sense them in...

by Jose

In practicing this week´s four point exercise I have felt little of the "higher" feelings or sensations I hear described in these forums. As with all the sensing exercises however, I find that as I move back "into" the world during the day, that there is a more stable but somewhat ungraspable something connected to the "I am." This something is a positive but elusive feeling. Any thoughts?
José

---

by Harry

Jose,

Good to here from you.

You speak of moving back into life. I'd say, try not to move out of life. Work is there when you're doing ordinary activities. This type of sensing activity can be a part of your normal routine. You're sitting at a desk, or at the dinner table, you can practice this exercise.

The twelve points exercise, for example, can be engaged any time you're walking or moving.

The breathing exercise are present any time. As someone once said, God doesn't live in a Church.

Yes, there is a greater stability. And other benefits.

Harry

---

by Jose

Thanks Harry.
That´s "simple" and exactly the baby step kind of guidance I can use right now...
Another question I had regarding the intonation of the vowels. Has the order ever been changed? Does anyone know where it originated from and if it´s always been the same?
Again, it brings little of the "extraordinary" to me but the resonance has more than just a calming effect on me.
José

---

by Greg

Jose,

Ditto Harry's "Nice to hear from you".

I don't know the origins although I have seen its being used in the occult circles of the late 19th- early 20 th century esoteric/occult circles (Eliaphas Levi, Julius Evola, etc.)

I was completely dumbfounded one evening returning from work, riding the train home last week. I put this "chain of vowels" between myself and one particularly beautiful creature I was (yes, Harry) lusting over. It created an intense vibrational cylindar of sound which helped "place" me back inside of myself. The "hum" of this vibration is in my head even as I write about this.

Greg

PS It's always "baby steps" Jose

---

by Jose

Thank you Greg...baby steps...
I have found during the course of this difficult week that this four-point exercise is helpful. As I said before, nothing "special" or "extraordinary" but a solidity that is calming and an awareness is space of the position I occupy. This is restful. It does not clarify any particular difficulties, however, it serves to ground me into myself...does that make sense?
José

by Anton

I am very thankful for this week's exercise. Seems that it could be best for me to concentrate on it for next several months. Or years.

No "effects" but some very clear understanding. I understood that it is possible to begin to build in me something that has a future. And that I want it. That "I wish to have being". And that everything else can be just a matter of external considering.

There was a reaction of my automatic and disbalanced side to this exercise. I was more "hysterical" this week. Many little automatic thoughts and feelings that I had difficulty to stop. Much automatical speaking to draw others' attention. And the feeling of hate towards myself as I saw that I'm doing things that have no value and are unnecessary at all - even in terms of external considering.

But at the same time there is a feeling that freedom is possible. Hope.

Jose said:

The boldface which I inserted in the quotation from you, Jose, is what is extraordinary in your experience this week. If it had been ordinary, well, you would have missed all of that. Maurice Nicoll in his COMMENTARIES stated that the way to the Higher was by going with more depth inwards (I call that the "Right-Angled Path" )

G. said that he taught nothing more than when it rains, the pavement gets wet.

Four points excersises made me clearly sence what is constant attention. I have a big question in me - what lies inside a sensation? Who is the one who senses?
I feel that this excersise is a door to the answers. I will keep on with it.
I had a birthday this week and worked on re-viewals and draining the unnessesarities.

I've had similar to Jose's effects, after doing four points exersice I was more awaken, more present in my daily activities. I can't describe my sentations or feeling to this exersice - there was nothing extraordinary but at the same time I've felt something important happen with me by doing this exersice, wich i can't definite. I've also noticed another effect - I felt remorse during all week and saw that i have no time at all and this stimulated my workefforts.

I believe that the attention and sensing are two sides of one process (there are other sides). It is the process of communication between centers. Does anyone here has something to say on this?

by Jose

Anton,
You raise a very interesting question about the difference between sensing and attention. I would love to hear from Ian or the other senior members here how they have been taught this within Mr. Beidler´s lineage or through other Work lineages they have been part of.

From my training in Buddhism, I have been taught, and teach the differences to be like this:

Attention is the conscious direction of one´s wakefulness towards an object. This object can be with form (like an Icon, image, statue, flower, etc.) or without form (like a mantra, thought, phrase, feeling,etc.)
Sensing is the use of pre-conceptual awareness to participate in an active reaction to stimuli. Sensing one´s feet, ones hands, or sensing the stimuli of wind on the back of one´s neck, for ex., are types of sensing exercises in Buddhist practice. One does not, however, form an idea or thought about the object of sensation. One merely senses.

This is different than the attention exercises which often involve consideration of what one is directing one´s attention towards (what does this mantra mean? what are the qualities of this object? etc.).

This is the way I understand the differences.
Best

Happy birth-day Sasha.

Jose, I first encountered the "vowel word" in All and Everything. In English there's a certain interesting duality to the word. Because of dipthongs. . .joint vowels that sound as a new sound: i.e. "ai" can sound as "i", "oi" as "ohw"; "ei" can also sound as "i" or "a"

Sense-ation. To start with there are recognition of "senses". . .these receptive organs that are placed between us and the world. But we also have internal "sense" organs. . . middle division of centers if you will. . .that are placed between the internal and external.

And because of these things called buffers we don't really sense what we experience. We have to unknow what was taught to us, first. Because we don't really know those things that we do by imitation.

Still there is knowledge. "Where there's smoke there's fire." that is disguised in simple imitation.

by Greg

I felt "nailed to a cross" at each of the four points. Not pain --- just a physical sense of being fixed at those points. Each time I brought the "idea" up, the torso turned into a sheet of paper and I was on display, pinned like a mounted butterfly. I was aware (vaguely) of a thin silvery line of energy crossing from right leg socket, to left arm socket, across chest to right arm socket crossing to left leg socket, across pelvis and running the circuit again.

There wasn't anything limiting or creepy about any of this, it was similar to a strong spotlight being focussed on my torso.

My head often manifested the image of a square with an eqilateral triangle setting on top (associative thinking? --- maybe)

"It" really liked this exercise and knew immediately how to do it --- well, on a certain level "it" knew how to do it. I must confess to not having pushed it any further.

Could anyone here who has an English text of Life is Real post the definition of attention given by Gurdjieff there? I have only the Russian translation. It could be interesting to compare that definition with the one provided by Jose.

---

by Harry

From my digital copy:

For the definition of this property in man, which is called "attention," there is, by the way, found also in ancient science the following verbal formulation:
"THE DEGREE OF BLENDING OF THAT WHICH IS THE SAME IN THE IMPULSES OF OBSERVATION AND CONSTATATION IN ONE TOTALITY'S PROCESSES WITH THAT OCCURRING IN OTHER TOTALITIES."
This above-mentioned "gradation of the total state" of man extends, as science formulates it, from the strongest subjective intensity of "self-sensation" to the greatest established "self-losing."
That totality always becomes the initiating factor for the realization of a common function of the three separate totalities which represent the general psyche of man in which at the given moment this "gradation of the total state" has its center of gravity.

I would like others on this forum to provide their opinions on what those "totalities" are. I had an idea that they are thought, sensation and feeling as they are discussed by G. in the same chapter just after the definition of attention. But I'm not sure.

And - how you understand that excerpt provided above? I think if we could make it clearer for us this would make many things much more clear.

Sensing one´s feet, ones hands, or sensing the stimuli of wind on the back of one´s neck, for ex., are types of sensing exercises in Buddhist practice. One does not, however, form an idea or thought about the object of sensation. One merely senses.

I would agree with those definitions.
Attention is the focusing of our awareness or consciousness.
Sensing is focusing our attention on the sensations of the body.

Attention can be 'divided' or focused on several things at once. To put it another way, the focus of attention can be widened and narrowed.

In Work, first, attention has to be divided between the 3 centers, or widened to encompass the experiences of the 3 centers; later we can bring attention to the higher centers.

Control of attention is one of the most important aspects of the Work.
Many of the exercises we do are really just attention exercises in disguise.

Those Totalities are the 3 centers. As the quote that Harry provided goes on to say - three separate totalities which represent the general psyche of man.

Attention - When the awareness and understanding of the 3 centers (3 totalities) are blended into one awareness.

If our intellectual center has the center of gravity, it acts as the affirming force; if the emotional or physical center has the center of gravity, it acts as the affirming force.

Constatation - An assumption that is basic to an argument; a basic assumption; a self-evident truth.
Constate - To ascertain; to verify; to establish; to prove.

Theme: Spring Cleaning

Spring is the time of year when we get down on our hands and knees and clean all the nooks and crannies in our homes that we have ignored for the rest of the year. Seekers might begin all spring cleaning tasks with a prayer to Endlessness.

Seekers could Ponder now and then: What sufferings have I ignored or justified by moving them into other catagories, such as chores, pressure at work, worry?

Seekers might choose a household spring cleaning task and use it as an outward activity to accompany inner work such as sensing a part of the body while Pondering what nooks and crannies of our being need cleaning out.

Seekers may choose a household spring cleaning task and use it as an outward activity to accompany inner work such as sensing a part of the body while taking in impressions impartially and chanting an inner prayer, such as "I wish to cleanse my being of all things unnecessary"

Seekers could choose a household spring cleaning task and use it as an outward activity to accompany inner work such as sensing a part of the body while evoking a sense of gratitude and offering their work to a higher purpose.

Evening Recapitulation: While sensing your feet, Ponder: "What task did I avoid doing today?"

by Guest

This week showed me how much I actually avoid being where i am, being totally with what is in front of me. Avoiding the meeting with what is needed now. While cleaning and washing I watched the separation of the centers. Prayer and sensation of the backbone were the attempts to bring them together.
Cleaning is really a good bridge between inner and outer, transforming action into service.

by Anton

I haven't managed to do the cleaning exercise as I was coming home late at night.

The 4 points exercise seems to have some strange unconscious effect. It became easier to divide myself internally, but that's not all - the process of dviding got some additional 'taste' that I didn't feel before.

I had several experiences of the "emotional body" that "grew" from the solar plexus to fill all my body from inside.

On Sunday I went to my family's suburban summer house and there was much physical work that somehow stimulated me to remember myself and at the end of the day I had a very interesting emotional state - an emotion that has some very close relation to my childhood and that awakens often when I'm out of the city. At this time the feeling was very clear, I was able to investigate it. It was very "bright", light and had a taste of "emotional wonder". Seems to be a feeling from essence. It returned several times this week.

---

by Harry

Took on floor cleaning yesterday. A task I continually put off. Funny thing is that in working on it in this manner the task was much less than normal.

Cleaning the floors, then led to repairing the vacumn. Used to be able to just run the vacumn over anything on the floor, but these new "modern" machines have such twisting and turning insides, that picking up anything bigger than a crumb causes a congestion that requires unhooking all of the hoses.

I'd think I had it fixed, went to put it away, and the dirt would come falling out again.

I think this is more than a reporting of a physical event that happened. If we are to cleanse our selves, it has to be more than automatic. It has to be a task that goes almost section by section.

Today I'll take on another section of the apartment.

Whenever seekers observe that they are lost in idle imagination, they may direct their attention to their sensations and imagine their bone marrow emitting white light.

When walking or sitting, a seeker might direct their attention to the three centers in turn for a count of 9 and then widen attention to include all three centers. A prayer could also be recited.

Pick a simple physical task. Before doing the task, visualize yourself doing it with as much detail as possible.
Include sensations, feelings and thoughts that might occur during the task. When the task is complete, compare your performance with your visualization.

Ponder: Is there a connection between our procreative energies and our bone marrow?

---

by Harry

Somehow this week and last week got mixed in my mind. The curse of not having a "job" to go to. (If only that were a possible continued reality. . .)

My second spring cleaning task was visualized as filling pots with soil, for future transplants and potting. Even visualized potentially spilling the soil and disturbing the little old lady who lives downstairs. (I'm in a third floor apartment.)

Probably the most unusual thing was the post comparison regarding the carpenter bees who abound around my balcony. I don't care for these mostly harmless though annoying beasts. They are nearly impossible to get rid of. But during my potting exercise I was aware of their presence, I was aware that they were buzzing me, but I continued to work until I finished the task. It was as if I was surrounded by a bubble of the task.

Only spilled a small amount of soil.

The last question I need to continue to ponder.

by Anton

Attention to three centers for a count of 9 gave a state of "openness", more bright perception of what is around me. This state for me is similar to the state when I'm saying "I am" to myself. Quite hard to describe this state for me now. Good exercise, I'm going to continue practising it.

Visualising the details of performing the task gave the ability to see much more details while actually doing the tasks. I saw how my moving center is able to organise very complicated movements without any effort. The state of "openness" came in this exercise too.

Imagining the light in bone marrow in the moments of imagination didn't give any new experiences or understanding. Maybe I should practise this more.

Nothing to say about the connection between procreative energies and bone marrow.

I had several experiences of emotional center "turning on" very intensively this week (with strong "reverberations" expanding from the solar plexus to the whole body) and also noticed how I'm attached to my need of communication with others.

by Jose

This past weeks´exercise were very positive for me.
The counting to 9 was good, if only for revealing how little Ican sense all three centers at any one time! This one is mine, I will continue it.

The bone marrow light exercise felt the most powerful for me. As "Infinite Light" is Amida Buddha and I am a Shin priest, to visualize light from so deeply within myself was to connect myself to a subtle but magnificent energy. This exercise is also similar to the Dzogchen practice of observing the "luminosity" of ones mind and as I have experience in that tradition as well I think you hit a wonderful one here!

The physical task exercise I get connected to off and on. But the placement of attention to the detail and the effort I put to see each detail clearly grants a power to each moment that was not there before.
A great set of exercises Ian! Thank you for the week!

This week went in silent invisible work. Counting excersise has similar effect on me as 3 fingers excersise. The moments of expansion and openness from within while sensing the three together. And then the fourth one is the one who senses.
There is a lot about light while doing excersises.
In the evenings befor going to sleep i kept on with Four Points from the last week. It is like four rays of light going outwards in four directions, or like four ropes that hold my body connected to something which is beyond.

Sensing the bone marrow while catching myself on being lost in imagination brings me back to here and now, but also makes some invisible work within the body deep inside. It makes me feel that these exsersises, apart from training attention and will, are also making some work themselves within me, althouhg this work cannot be catched by my ordinary senses and understanding.

Thank you, Ien!
Warm greetings to everyone.

Ponder: Can joy and sorrow co-exist within the seeker?

If you criticise someones behaviour, use it as an opportunity to sense your physical presence while trying to understand the other persons point of view. Notice any change in your emotional state. From where does the urge to criticise others originate?

When using a computer, every time you hit the enter key, sense your hand and say 'I wish to be'.

Before sleep, relax the body and review the days activities. Look for moments when you were Identified. What was the chief characteristic of those moments?

by Harry

The chief characteristic of identification seems to be lost in a small "i". There is also an aura of fantasy involved. This is imagination at its worst. When I'm identified I seem to be most deeply rooted in some part of my personality. Often that is a petty, negative emotion.

As to considering others: External consideration. Most of the time it is a good task in separation to try to determine what the other person is acting upon. However, there are times when I can only go so far. I can see the beginning of an action. I can understand a motivation, or how something starts. How it carries out I find myself getting lost. Because that's where the similarity ends.

Still, I've found that putting myself in the other's position is beneficial. It's hard to create enemies and develop grudges. It's also easier to understand how events play out. Seeing that I'm not the star of every scene in every movie that is my life.

by Faye

When joy and sorrow are not attached to events then these two companions can exist together. When I am having a preference for an outcome to go my way, and am feeling miserable because of it, then if it is really bad I move my attention from thinking about what I would like to happen to attention on sensation and the sadness or suffering no longer has predominance. Even if my emotions are not balanced, they are closer to balance than when I am thinking about what I would like to happen. Specifically for an example, when I am feeling physical pain, rather than thinking about feeling bad, I try to just sense it and be there with it. If I wish that it wasn’t there my thinking makes it worse by imagining into the future. I am still, however, not able to find gratitude for physical illness.

Regarding the criticism of others, it seems that everything is about me. I see myself in a weak position and then my mind looks in its archives to find reasons to justify the reaction that is taking place through the criticism. Going back to the source of criticism is a good way for me to become more responsible for what is happening to me. For example, when recently when my mother did not do something that she said that she would do I was frustrated and angry and said that she was irresponsible. Because this looked absurd, particularly at my age, expecting my mother to be a particular way, when I looked closer I saw a deep sense of feeling abandoned. This was an old experience that I have been reliving in different situations. I can feel victimized when someone does not support me as I expect them to. It is me who creates the victim. This task seems like it has endless possibilities as criticism comes up again and again bringing surprises with it.

Theme: Gravity

"On the level of matter, love is expressed as gravity" (Agnes Hidveghy)

Daily Exercise: Giving in to gravity

As matter, we all resist the pull of gravity in our daily lives. This causes us to hold tension in our bodies. During this exercise, we shall allow each body part to feel the pull of gravity without resistance.

Morning: Stand with bare feet 2-3 inches apart. Align the inner sides of your feet so they are parallel. Work upwards through your body, starting from the arches of your feet, and very slowly allow any feeling of 'up' to become 'down'. Pay particular attention to the fascia, the tissues cloest to your bones, and command it to give in to gravity. Include not only your large muscles, bones and joints, but also sense your internal organs, one by one, and give the command to them too. On each out breath, sound a slow uuuuuhhh of release. Take as long as you can to do this exercise - the longer and slower the better. At the end, take a few minutes to Ponder: Can love exist on all levels, from quantum to planetary?

Evening: Repeat the exercise, but this time practise it lying down on your back. At the end, take a few minutes to Ponder: How do I express love? Can I evoke love at will?

by Harry

I will continue to do the exercise, which seems similar to others.

I've been contemplating the idea that gravity is love on the material level. As I have great respect for Agnes, let me apply the "walking in another shoes exercise" first.

We say that we "gravitate toward what we love". The "embrace of gravity" is a common analogy. We need gravity. We can't move without gravity. Without gravity, or the level of gravity that exists on Earth, there wouldn't be enough air for us to breath. Gravity is responsible for atmosphere, and, therefore, weather. Gravity is crucial to life on Earth. It is part of that thin film that we are part of. While gravity is not organic, gravity allows organic matter to exist.

Next step:

Grave and gravity come from the same root. If something is grave, it is dense, it has heavy implications. Gravity pulls down.

So we have, then, Icarus. Some have the "Fear of Flying", but Icarus was determined, in his ego, to escape gravity. And he succeeded. But he wasn't ready for the Sun. It's often missed that Icarus succeeded in escaping gravity. Icarus flew.

The Wright Brothers flew.

The Law of Falling is that a body falls to the nearest center of gravity. Physically we are on Earth, so we have "fallen" here. To fall into the Sun we'd have to escape the multiple gravities of our planetary system. And, as we know from comets, falling into the Sun is no simple matter.

We are present, here, in an ascending and descending octave. Which are we traveling?

A black hole is the greatest source of gravity we know; and it is emptyness; pure emptiness. It sucks in everything.

If gravity on Earth is one of 48, or more likely 96 orders of law. . .because without the Moon gravity wouldn't be nearly the force we're dealing with. . .then a Black Hole must be somewhere around 384 orders of Laws. Or, the opposite of One.

Can Love be a Law?

---

by Harry

This weeks exercise seems an exercise in octaves. . .ascending and descending.

When I stand, the effects of gravity are much stronger in my lower legs, particularly the muscles around the calves. Transitionally, gravity pulls more on thighs and back muscles.

Interestingly, while laying down the effects of gravity seem strongest in the shoulder, and head area. (Sitting is the buttocks and thighs.) While the feet and calves seem resting.

As I follow up and down movement it is clear that my instinctive moving center has been trained to be an anti-gravity machine. The further I move away from the point of contact. . .feet when standing, shoulders while reclined. . .the more there is an opposite force in action.

We have learned this anti-gravity machine. When we pulled ourselves up from our hands and knees. And we can feel full gravity when we fall, or have to get down on hands and knees, again. Falling is interesting, because the center of gravity moves, and percipitates the fall, because the learned balance has been disrupted.

To stand there must be and up and down, both at the same time. The "up" can be trained to move against the inexorable "down". Nuryev and Michael Jordan can be seen as examples. They have learned, for a second, to fly. (It is interesting to watch this in Altman's film, Company. I'm sure Greg can say more about that. But even the ballerinas learn to fly. . . if with the help of the "holder".)

As to evoking Love: Conscious Love, yes. But it is an act of evoking consciousness. And sometimes that feels more like an invocation rather than an evocation. I think it may be dangerous to evoke Love in the wrong circumstances. But that's an initial response. Conscious Love can, perhaps, trigger emotional love. Physical Love seems a wholly different animal, once again.

Which brings full circle. Is physical love related to gravity? Certainly it's more difficult on a water bed. Wonder what that weightless act is like? (Yes, I know that physical love is at a different level, but I couldn't resist the connection to Love and gravity.)

by Guest

“…but not one of the ten could describe even remotely, the sensation of genuine Love.
“ ‘And none of them would, because in none of the ordinary beings-men here has there ever been for a long time, any sensation of the sacred being-impulse of genuine Love. And without this “taste” they cannot even vaguely describe that most beatific sacred being-impulse in the presence of every three-centered being of the whole Universe…” BT p. 357

“ ‘But never do beings-men here love with genuine, impartial and non-egoistic love. BT p. 358

Love does not manifest on the level, where I am. There is like and dislike, there is stronger like and stronger dislike, but not love.
How is it that I “love” and “hate” at one and the same time. If love is true wouldn’t one love, in spite of or because of flaws?
To evoke love would require one to be able to do, to have will, to be present, have conscience.

The remarkable people in my life have evoked what I believe is love in me, something much different from self-love, conceit, pride, vanity.
Love is evoked in me, it is not something to be done or that I do. It is like the door. It opens to me. I do not open it. Something in me opens and love comes in.

by Guest

What is the relationship of love to suffering?
Is suffering [in the form of bearing the unpleasant manifestions of others] a form of love. Does this suffering when accumulated build love??
What is the relationship of love to conscience? Can I evoke love by bearing the unpleasant manifestations of others? It seems as though this may be so.

The relaxation of the body, when working with allowing gravity (love?) to have its way, opens something in me, or rather allows something to open.

Maybe a "taste" of what it could mean to evoke love??

by Guest

Thank you, Onlysaytheword, for your ponderings. I have just came back from 10 days Movements retreat. These days i followed the exsercise with gravity.
My observations are similar to what you are writing.
Whenever I allow myself to open towards the force of gravity (which in fact brings deep relaxation to the physical and emotional centers) the other, inner force invisibly starts rising up from within. This inner lifting has a taste of longing and a wish to Be.
And greatfulness.
Is this the beginning of love?

Greetings to all.

The ballet is an art of aspiration. It perceives the Creative (God) as something to be aspired towards. Therefore it has sought to escape the laws of gravity by moving "upwards more and more. It moves from two centers: One in the lower back, one in the upper chest.

The modern dance springing from the Lutherian (!!!!!) reaction against ballet by Isadora Duncan, places the Creative (God) in the human body. Its center is the solar plexus.

It is no mistake that the ballet was developed in the Roman Catholic court of Catherine DeMedici --- the body reflects that particular philosophy.

When I trained to dance my teacher Erick Hawkins went further than Duncan and placed the point specifically at the hara. He had been studiying Aikido at the time. Like Duncan he found that the body works best when it cooperates with gravity. Therefore in order to leap, I had to intuit simultaneously the downpull of gravity. In a word there is no going up without a going down.

The Kirov Ballet Dancers also dance with this kind of full bodied motion. They developed seperately from the DeMedici School of Ballet. Photos of Nijinsky in profile reveal this friendly cooperation of a dropped chest with a upflowing thoracic area. Duncan ditto. Martha Graham ditto. Interestingly at the end of the twentieth century we are moving out of the body again.

Are we uncomfortable inour own skin?

Greg[/quote]

by Greg

In addition to the above:

The "aspiring" attitude of the early development of ballet is seen in a "lifted and presented" upper ribcage. Again, denoteing a yearning for something outside oneself.

Early twentieth century Kirov dancers were deeply interested in Duncan's presentation of the body as a presentation of kineseologicalcal/psychological/spiritual Truth. It spoke of "being in the body" as being enough.

Many others, of the same time period in other Western physical explorations were also intent on a properly, efficient alignment of pelvis/ribcage/head (three-brains-balanced-being?)linked by a fluid responsive spine. Delsarte who train Jeanne de Salzmann certainly was. It was Delsarte's school G. considered buying.

Jeanne de Salzmann's dancers in the glimpse at the end of REMARKABLE MEN display all of these qualities in their physical manifestations. Unfortunately, the demonstrator in the recent van Dulleman CD-Rom conveys little sense of weight and responsiveness to gravity. The value of this CD-Rom is to give us the "shape" of the movement.

It is an upward flowing skeletal structure with a downward flowing musculature that truely designates being between heaven and earth (man as transformer/transmitter).

Of course, the above is from my own investigations.

Verify everything yourself for yourself.

Greg

by Ian

Interesting observations, Greg.

Gurdjieff talked about efficient walking as a falling forward, rather than a pushing with the legs. The legs merely serve to keep the momentum directed forwards.

---

by Greg

The "Falling forward" is also shared in the Duncan technique and the Delsarte work. Delsarte emphasizes "rolling through the foot: in the stepping process. There is a wonderful website (beautifully presented) on Delsarte's historic production of Gluck's ORPHEUS. Alexandre de Salzmann was it's lighting designer.

http://www.humnet.ucla.edu/echo/Volume3-issue2/levitz/levitz1.html

Hawkins had us lift the weight up through the pelvic floor allowing the legs to "drop back down into the gravitational pull" like hanging in a pelvic harness. Movement of the legs is initiated through a "tossing forward" from the hip socket. This manifested in a gliding walk with less (unnecessary) muscular tension.

by Greg

Sorry. The above should read "Dalcroze" not "Delsarte". They are two contemporaries with related ideas. Delsarte divided the body into "spiritual zones" for expressive purposes. He was interested in "three foldedness" --- I don't know about seven-foldedness" but wouldn't be suprised. His work probably influenced by HB Blavatsky.

Ponder: Is love only something that I can receive?

Observe how the organism talks. What sounds, words, ideas, does it give weight to or take too lightly? Sense the mouth and vocal cords.

Observe how the organism listens. What sounds, words, ideas, does it give weight to or take too lightly? Sense the ears.

Pause several times a day to relax and sense the body while performing a sightless gaze. Observe any emotions that arise.

While walking, sense the pull of gravity and repeat an inner prayer such as: It is nothing; I am.

I am!

To be honest, I was (and am) too identified with 1) my obligations on my job 2) emotional (and sometimes physical) disturbances brought by the spring.

As I didn't practise the previous week's exercise I had nothing to report.

The only thing I practised last week was the "counting-to-nine-and-observing-the-three-centers" exercise given several weeks ago. I did it when sawing the apple-trees branches and digging the soil near our suburban house, and also while walking in the city. It somehow changed my inner state as if my centers began to "talk" to each other in their languages. I really felt the "three persons" in me.

This week I'm trying to practise the "It-is-nothing-I-am" exercise. Something in me is "shocked" by this prayer.

P.S. I also practise sightless gaze in different situations (at the workplace, while walking to underground station, in undergroud train etc). I have a hypothesis that this practise somehow "activates" the emotional center in me. Did anyone here have a similar experience?

I have a question to Ian: what do you think about the dynamics of energies and connections of centers during the sightless gaze exercise? What happens when a person (for example, me) practices it?

---

by Harry

> To be honest, I was (and am) too identified with . . .2) emotional (and sometimes physical) disturbances brought by the spring.

Over the years I've become more and more aware of these disturbances. It's why I fast, as G. recommends, during that period. Same thing with Winter. . .By practicing this "intentional suffering" of diet change I find it easier to step aside from those disturbances when they occur. Also it's good to clear the body.

I don't think it's a coincidence that these periods of time were those set aside for fasting by major churches. Lent, Advent, Passover, Ramadan. . .I was raised Roman Catholic. There were also similar periods of fasting during the both equinox periods and solistice periods.

It's also interesting to observe lunar people during full moons.

> P.S. I also practise sightless gaze in different situations (at the workplace, while walking to underground station, in undergroud train etc). I have a hypothesis that this practise somehow "activates" the emotional center in me. Did anyone here have a similar experience?

My experience is that I move toward a more balanced state. I leave go of fantasies and imaginations. I drop phony emotions. I do become more aware of the emotional center; but I also become more aware of the moving center; because I tend to be a 321 person, to use O's terminology. (Funny that this changes during life. Started 123; then was probably 213, 231, and then 321)

I would also like to comment on Ian's question: "Ponder: Is love only something that I can receive?"

I hear an echo to last week. Love is given. Love is a positive emotion of the real emotional center. Consciousness is necessary. We are taught to receive things like lust, affection, pity, concern, affinity, sympathy, empathy, etc. And we call these things love. We have all probably experienced parental love. Which comes closer.

agape.

by Guest

I find that different sensations of the mouth, jaw and cheeks accompany different emotional inner responses/reactions, that more often than not are unrelated to the words that come from my mouth. The postures/emotions noticed were, what one would consider, overwhelmingly negative. Some noted were prejudice, insecurity, apologetic, NJ accent, insincerity, take charge-ness, firmness, nervousness, seductive, patronizing, anger, pompous, don't take criticism well, hurt, disgust, frustration, justification, defensiveness.

It was reinforced in me how difficult it is to divide one's attention while performing complex tasks. I tried this exercise while working. At times, my job requires a high degree of focused, complex, automatic behaviors which have become second nature to me. Dividing my attention with a task as the one that was given was very fruitful and produced a great deal of material. The exercise raised several questions in me. How are centers divided? Is it possible to see, different parts of centers? What part am I seeing now? Is it clear that these associated postures/emotional complexes are fully automatic?

Gurdjieff refers to the "sensation of the sacred being-impulse of genuine Love." One must have consciousness to sense love. Mustn't it be equally necessary to have consciousness to give love, if it is at all possible to do so? Are you asking us to ponder if it is possible to give love? Perhaps I am not clear on this.

While practicing the exercise of feeling gravity when walking there was at one moment the distinct impression of being gently caressed. Relaxing the body rather than opposing the force of gravity seemed to permit this rare and unexpected sensation. Could this be love?

> Anton wrote:
> I have a question to Ian: what do you think about the dynamics of energies and connections of centers during the sightless gaze exercise? What happens when a person (for example, me) practices it?

I think the exercise has the potential to unblock our energies and connect the centers. The energy of impressions usually only penetrates superficially or is only partially digested. Impressions usually stop at the formatory center and trigger habitual associations of thoughts and emotions, likes and dislikes. We are separated from the real world by a veil or cocoon composed of the mechanical associations of the formatory center.

By widening and unfocusing our gaze and trying to avoid labeling or naming the impressions, we are attempting to bypass the formatory center and let the impressions penetrate deeper, beyond the veil, to be digested more fully and allow the extraction of finer perceptions.

By widening and unfocusing our gaze, it is easier to quiet our mind because the formatory center has nothing to focus on and fewer associations will be evoked. By quieting the mind of our inner dialogue of thoughts and emotions, less energy is wasted by the functioning of the formatory center.

By widening and unfocusing our gaze we are also taking in more impressions than if our attention is focused on one small area of the world that our formatory center has identified as an object. The extra energy can recharge our accumulators so we will have more energy for Work on ourselves.

By widening and unfocusing our gaze, by taking in the panorama of impressions, it is easier to become aware of the wholeness or oneness of the world. The activity of the formatory center creates a subject-object, self-other duality; it places a veil of associations and opinions between us and the world. By removing the veil, we begin to see that Endlessness is not only all around us , but also inside us.

The principle of widening and unfocusing our gaze of attention can be applied to all the senses.

Can we also add to your statement above, Ian, that the "sightless gaze" is manifested through a continual softening and relaxing of the eyeball itself? The eyeball needs to rest, floating in the socket, giving up its automatic need to focus in pinpoint fashion.

Living near an urban environment, which is sometimes dangerous, my pinpointed focussing on people and things around me is a way "i" imagine "i" am keeping everything under control.

I let the gaze slide out in both directions, like moving from old square proportioned motion picture images to 1950s Cinerama or widescreen (right, Harry?)

Pondering on some of the sculpted Pharaonic sculptures from Egypt (those few still manifesting original painted surfaces with glass enamelled eyes intact) reveals this state of sightless gaze.

Softening of the eyeball, gradual widening of the visual field. No one thing in the field takes presidence ---- all are of equal and varied interest.

Definitely WideScreen.

Interesting. I tend to use the same technique in walking in the urban environment. While Cincinnati is hardly New York or LA, the central core of the City is hardly safe. Watched a couple of murders take place in the middle of the street from my office window a couple of years back.

---

by Greg

Harry,

I don't know whether or not you know this (and it may be of interest to others here), in the 1950s when the widescreen process was in development it was found that the human gaze responded more naturally to this wider screen --- it could take in more with greater ease. Through my own small investigations I have found that a square shape makes the eye wish to circulate round and round ad infinitum. An architect friend of mine says (in the same vein) "Squares make the eye 'happy'".

by Harry

Widescreen TV is interesting experience along the same lines. HDTV is as much about shape as it is definition.

Is there something we should learn from that?

---

by Greg

Probably so. Will have to ponder that one.

While sensing the genital area, ponder: Does the flow of creative energy have a purpose beyond reproduction?

While walking, sense the springyness of an illuminated spine resonating to the sound of a hummed Om.

During your time at your job, whenever your corn of self-importance is stepped on, use it as a reminder to see the situation from the other person's point of view. If remorse arises, sense it throughout the body.

by Guest

Does the flow of creative energy have a purpose beyond reproduction?

The question presupposes that the sex center is the seat of creativity. Is this necessarily so? I'm not so sure about this. In 'Search' Ouspensky relates G speaking of the energy of the sex center and how other centers may steal the energy of the sex center and when they do, this "can be recognized by a particular 'taste,' by a particular fervor, by a vehemence which the nature of the affair concerned does not call for." He goes on to say, "Neither the thinking nor the emotional nor the moving centers can ever create anything useful with the energy of the sex center. This is an example of the 'abuse of sex.'" (p. 258)

I have personally evidence of this. In particular, how the thinking center steals energy from the sex center and results in "too great an imagination on the subject of sex, and in addition a tendency to be satisfied with this imagination."

It seems to me that "the flow of creative energy" (true creative energy) must be from a balance of the energy of all centers, working in concert. The flow of creative energy does have a pupose beyond reproduction. It produced legominisms that continue to transmit information to the present day. I have not, as of yet, experienced this level of creativity in my life, but have had a taste of what it might be when working intensively at different times.

At my job there was an uncanny and unexpected moment of having one of my corns stepped on. I can't say that it was a corn of self-importance, but more like a corn of self-perception (they are related). It was the self-perception of being a "good father" to my children. I deal with many people on the telephone each day. As I was speaking to one customer, I needed information from her "adult" daughter. The mother called the daughter to the phone, verbally abusing her in a violent way. I recalled how I, at times had verbally abused my children. I immediately felt a strong sense of remorse. I sensed this remorse throughout my body. Later, I spoke with my wife about this and asked, "How can I ever make it up to them?" My wife, who is very wise, replied, "You must resolve to never do it again."

by Harry

I resisted part of this exercise, because of the word "om". Took me back to the om mani padme hum era of my life. Something I washed away because of all of the "occult" connection.

I did sense the spine on occassion. But can't say springyness. Though that does make intellectual sense.

As to sexual energy: I understand onlysaytheword's comments about imagination. But I'm not sure that this is intellectual. Sexual energy seems closer connected to emotional energy. Or, perhaps, it is a separate center between intellectual and emotional.

My hope is that what is happening with GIG has not decreased the participation here. This is a valuable resource, and could be more with regular particpation from so many different cultures.

by Jose

Hi Harry,
I remain here and though participation is slight these days (online anyway) because of being back in school, I continue to follow the exercises and discussions.

You raise a good point about GIG, one that I have been suggesting to Ian for a little while now. Though our Russian friends seem to have a formal group, many of us here don´t. I have suggested to Ian that as we are formed into an informal, online Working group here at Endless Search, perhaps it´s time to try to make it a bit more "formal" perhaps? I am thinking that maybe once a year we can meet in England for a few days, share experiences, learn Movements and become a bit tighter of a community. I would certainly help organize anything we came up with but I know that living here in Iceland and being so close and yet so far from personal contacts in the Work makes some attempt to repair that appealing. Anybody interested in working on this with me?

Several other things:
I was quite surprised to hear of your "om mani padme hum" characterization as "occult". For those who are unsure of its meaning, it is most likely (there are several schools of thought around old Sanskrit or hybrid Pali-Sanskrit terms) "Om! The jewel in the Lotus, Hum!" and probably refers to a concept in Buddhism that within the closed-off and mired in the mud Lotus, in the center of this flower that blooms from a root deeply embedded in shit basically, is a jewel of great preciousness--our Awakening. The mantra is associated with Avalokiteshvara (The Lord Who Hears or Looks Down Upon[The Cries of the World]) aka Kannon (where "he" became feminized), Kuan-yin, and Chenresig. From a Mahayana Buddhist perspective, absolutely nothing "occult" or esoteric there, just a manifestation of Compassion through a universal image.

Re: the sex center. I have understood this as you, in being associated more with the emotional center. From a strictly (Buddhist) tantric p.o.v. it is an energy most powerful and its transmutation into something "higher" is a goal albeit an extremely difficult one. The Buddha is reported to have said that if there were only one other spiritual obstacle even remotely as difficult he never would have Awakened...

by Harry

Jose,

My response to "Om" stems more from the "meditation culture" and the "occult culture" of the late sixties and early seventies. I understand the spiritual significance.

In my generation this "mantra" became mental noise. Somewhat similar to what is happening to the kabbalah today. There is much significance there, but it gets lost in the dillution.

I do draining. I do endless gaze. I do breathing. I do relaxation.

Yet there is this thing about "meditation" which was almost drug like during that era. Or at least in the way it was transmitted to many of us. Non-action became passivity. Trees of Life. Tarot Cards. Mandalas.

Not that there isn't significance in all of those things. Books of Kell. Etc.

My own response is one of having to learn to be "a prayer of action" rather than a passivity. Unlearning.

To take this a step further: the emphasis on sensation also is something I struggle with. Be Here Now is not "I am, I wish, I can". Yet it was/is an introduction many of us used. But after using it we have to leave it go. This harkens back to the discussion we had a while back about drugs. Would Ram Dass have become Ram Dass had he and Leary not dropped acid?

The answer doesn't matter. Be Here Now. Meditation as the Beatles brought it. Blavatsky. Crowley. Wiccan. Castenada. None were sly men ways. They were and still are necessary in any individual's path. (Even the X-filish Crowley and Blavatsky could open doors, just as Leary and Kesey and Company did. But then they hire the Rolling Stones to police Altamont.)

Dear All,

My deepest apologies for having "checked-out" for the last six weeks. Life issues tsunami-ed. And now I am really sick. Did not forget myself in any of it and continued to Work but forgot all of you --- again my apologies.

Will be trinkling back in as I am able. Very little energy but a great deal of opening.

Until later,

Greg

PS How does one get hold of GURDJIEFF UNVEILED in the USA? By the Way doesn't list it.

Harry: To take this a step further: the emphasis on sensation also is something I struggle with. Be Here Now is not "I am, I wish, I can".

Hi, I am a new member and I do not know the way of things regarding this online group so I'm not sure if I am approaching in the right way, but I would like to say something about sensation in relation to Harry's comment.

It is my experience and understanding that establishing a contact, and becoming familiar with, the fine sensation that exists within the body is necessary if I wish to be real. If "I am", I must be in my body, and it is via sensation that I can learn to do this, that is learn to bring the attention into the body and involve it in the process of awakening. Sensation, like the breath, can be an aid to establishing and maintaining an attentive connection with the body. To engage life consciously, even if only for the moment, I must be in the body.

by Jose

Hello Harry,
I think you detail something very well about the appropriation of spirituality for trivial or superficial purposes. It certainly happened to Buddhism and Hinduism for many people during the time you mention. But this is common to all traditions and the Fourth Way as well. Trungpa Rinpoche coined a wonderful phrase called "spiritual materialism" all about it and he was a master at meditation as well as breaking the superficiality that permeated the "alternative spirituality" scene in the late 60´s through the early 80´s. We have seen how the enneagram and other 4th Way Work has crept into the "mass consciousness" and diluted the amazing possibilities that remain within them. But as an old friend from those days (who is now a Vajrayana Lama) reminded me--"The secret takes care of itself", i.e., we don´t have to worry too much about the improper appropriation of great teachings or high practices; swine don´t recognize or appreciate pearls, but they remain pearls nonetheless.

The "sightless gaze" you mention is also one of my favorites but it too has an analog within Tibetan Buddhism, "sky gazing" which is a Dzogchen and Mahamudra practice. As I mentioned in my article on GIG, "Gurdjieff´s Possible Buddhist Influences" it is quite possible that that´s where this practice originated. But you also speak of the physical sensing Work and, as John´s post speaks to it also, I tend to agree about their usefulness and regard this as one of the most important contributions to meditative practices and spiritual literature in general that Gurdjieff gave the world. They are called *proprioception exercise*s and the variety and depth of 4th Way uses and configurations astounds me. But most importantly they root us within this body-mind complex and if used well, can increase Being. I certainly believe so.

By the way, I loved the Altamont reference!
Also, has anyone thought of a gathering of Endless Searchers as I suggested in my earlier post? I appreciate the learning and input I get here online but believe much more could be achieved if we met together, if only for a short time personally and Worked. I remain interested in hearing from others on this and if it is something people are keen on doing, say, next summer, then I would work at helping to make it happen. Ian, you listening?
Jósé

by Harry

Jose,

Getting together is a great idea; but electronically is probably about all that's possible for the time being. America, Australia, Iceland, England. . .

Certainly Gurdjieff has been co-opted as well. Fortunately that wasn't my introduction to Work. I believe in mantras, or prayers, or breathing. . .sometimes we each have to fight different associations. Those are out little i's. And I was owning up to one of mine. Yes, I should Work on it.

John,

Welcome.

Beyond Ian's guidelines, I think we're a Work In Progress.

Much of my experience says that focusing on sensation is a means of helping me understand exactly how asleep I am. It's crucial that there be more than one center involved. We breath unconsciously. . .or mostly automatically. . .which is generally a good thing. We walk without thought or emotion. Once we've learned. Even this typing is an automaton that is put into action, something I learned decades ago.

One of the observations I've had since venturing into this mutual exchange is that the sensation exercises nearly always have responses. But the intellectual or emotional exercises tend to be left unanswered. That may be a wrong impression, but it's my impression.

Balancing the three centers, and perhaps awakening others, or invoking others, seems what Work is about. . .

by Greg

Jose,

At the risk of appearing rude (and "it" likes to please people, therefore making "it" affront constructively becomes a Work exercise) until I see more of a commited effort here to share personal experience in relation to the weekly exercise, the effort (for me) and expense (for me) of flying off to wherever to experience more of the same dynamic comes off as just a bit of a variation of a Fourth Way "Summer of Love"!!!!!

Honestly, I am always glad to see you here and you always have alot good to say. Really. I also, know that you are new at this --- so this all takes some time and getting used to.

As far as issues of school, family, etc. etc.---- I have them too and I have found that continued Work brings an intensification of these things. In a word, the "ordinary" in life gets more and more in the way! Hence, the need for super-efforts. Why else call this Work?

To be honest I have stayed away from here somewhat deliberately the last few weeks to see what would happen. "It" loves to give it all away and share all the time. And it is as you see "very verbal". I have a history of being the cathartic agent in most groups and to get things "jump started", so . . .

What will you offer me in England and in here (even before) to keep me interested?

Harry,

Before answering this, let's hear from some of the others. I know you will answer.

Faye,

Haven't heard from you in a long time. You always speak so directly to me --- where are you?

Russian Group,

We've been here before?

John,

Welcome aboard! I am not really the growly old bear I appear to be. Your business about the body I am all for. Maybe more later.

Ian,

Again, anything you feel inappropriately expressed I expect you to publicly correct/remove.

This morning I woke up sicker than the day before. I have responsibilities to two physically incapacitated parents (whoi I would like to see able to continue living in their familiar environs as long as possible), a job to show-up for that takes and takes and takes, an apartment that I cleaned from top to bottom today (because "it" likes to neglect "itself and daydream) and a payment to be made to this Group (as I am now doing). It isn't that I am a Good person (I'm not), it's that "it" likes to shirk --- and all of the above met makes Work.

My sexual energy gets put to use in support of creative work through a transmutation process which begins around the heart and "figure 8s" crossing at the throat to complete circulation around the "third eye". Without sufficient sexual energy this doesn't take place. My suspicion, down through the years, is that the throat and clavicle play a large part in this process. The breast bone/clavicle in my experience, are the receptive area for "daily bread" (higher energy). Without daily bread there is no leavening of the sexual energy into finer stuff.

by Harry

Interesting. My experience has genitals-heart-throat connected. The transformation, though, seems to be one that happens best when all of the centers function in a circular motion.

Task: "During your time at your job, whenever your corn of self-importance is stepped on, use it as a reminder to see the situation from the other person's point of view. If remorse arises, sense it throughout the body."

When I am able and not too identified with a reaction I have found this (seeing the situation from the other person's point of view), and a remembering, at the time, that we are all reactionary beings, useful in a way that helps dispel some negativity. That is if I am prepared and closer to that in me that wishes to work.

At other times...

I recently had an encounter with a young lad at work, (who thought he could angrily tell me what to do), which brought to the surface an aspect of my self-importance and false pride, and the inner considering that comes when they are questioned or stepped on. All in the defence of self-image.

It is not often that I am questioned or confronted and I observed an inner struggle between yes and no, between an aspect of my personality, based on an aspect of self-image and fed by self-importance, that wanted to confront the boy, and another aspect that wanted to stay in front of the inner struggle and work with the feelings that boy's comments stirred.

At first I let it be, externally anyway, reasoning that the lad knows no better and realising his "attack" wasn't necessarily against me personally, as he generally acts in this manner to nearly everyone at work. As the boss's son it seems he may have developed an attitude, and may even have an image of himself, as being rightfully able to express himself in this way.

Although I tried, to some extent, to consider him and to see the situation through him, the hurt image, with it's wounded importance, wouldn't rest, "it" wanted expression in its defence. So "it" justified, and "reasoned",...if I let him get away with this he'll think he can do it to me when ever it pleases him. Feeling satisfied in my justification I went to the boy and had a few words, to "put him in his place", so to speak.

Although I justified the reason for putting the boy in his place, in the background of all the internal noise I knew that my confronting him was more about restoring the self-image to it's place, a place of imagined importance, than anything to do with him or his comment. This image will not have a 17 year old speak to it in such a way whether he be the boss's son or not.

Shortly after the incident I started to feel uneasy about my reaction, not in relation to the boy and what I said to him but because I had given in to a lower aspect of my nature, even though I saw it coming. I stayed with this uneasy feeling for the day and tried to observe the thoughts, emotions and tensions it brought about. After work I apologised to him and although he would have nothing of it, it didn't matter as my self-image was again restored to it rightful place of imagined importance, and by way of an apology a self-calming was performed on the uneasy feeling.

John,
welcome!!!

Jose,
I support your suggestion of our possible meetings in England with all my "I-s"  But i think that not everyone will be able to afford travelling expenses. Perhaps it will be better to alternate locations of meetings.
Let's see what think Ian about your offer.

As to my personal work, I was identified lately and haven't done any exercises except "sightless gaze" and exercise of "three fingers"and in addition there is a problem with internet connection in our firm, but i hope next week we'll solve this problem. But i feel more and more be connected with everybody of you.

by Jose

Welcome John, hell Marina!
Hello all!
greg...You raise some important things. First, what do I offer you?
Answer: Nothing.

Nothing.
If you become interested in joining those who might want real contact, face-to-face, then you would probably do so for your own Work reasons. I would think that would be enough.
Personally, I desire to see people´s faces, to feel the energies they display in person, to eat and drink with them, to laugh and engage them and don´t feel that this medium works all that well.
Flying to the UK from here in Iceland is relatively cheap and I am suggesting a once a year thing beginning NEXT year. I would also love to visit Russia and see our friends there and have planned a personal tip to Switzerland in November to visit Reijo andAgi. Now, I am not rich, but this Work means alot to me and I want to meet people, not print.
It remains only a suggestion but I would like to meet all of you and sit down and Work and talk about how we can proceed to making this site work better and helping the wonderful benefactor who provides it for us--you listening Ian?--
As for "seeing more of the same" or "Fourth Way Summer of Love" those represent your own projections and I need not comment. My participation here extends precisely into the areas that "grab" me therefore if I don´t comment on something, its probably because I am not affected by it. I have been quite upfront about declaring the sensing exercises to be a huge contributor to my own spirituality and the combination between them and my understanding of Work in life, partly thru the lense of my Buddhist practice and partly thru the lense of my understanding of the 4th Way teachings is what has brought me here. I frankly have not had any of the titillating or "magical" experiences vis-a-vis the other exercises and if you want me to make some up, well, I just can´t. But I remain open to this methodology and appreciate the deeper and finer attention that has developed in me as a result of using them. And certianly if something develops, you will hear about it. But no, so far, I am rooted rather deeply within the body and these exercises are the ones that have helped me the most.
Best,
José

by Greg

Dear Jose,

Thank you for your response.

I do agree that seeing everyone face-to-face would be a helpful adition to what goes on here.

What concerns me, however, is that after nearly one year here there is an ambiguous commmitment at best to what goes on on-line. So, I guess what I am saying is "Why are we bothering with the icing, when there no cake finished yet."

When you tell me, as you just now did, that for certain exercises nothing happened for you, you are at least letting me know what is going on. When you say nothing, you leave me, as a member of this group, out of the picture.

My "Summer of Love" statement refers (albeit somewhat sacastically --- I'll admit 😉) to a danger of a trip to get together to somehow be the "fixit" for what doesn't go on here. If it isn't happening now, why will it happen when we all get back home. (You know, "Oh, I had such a wonderful time ---- I promise I'll keep in touch!" 😁) Flakiness --- the scourge of many a spiritual practice!--- it is certainly the scourge of mine! I live in horror of it.

When I've had dance pupils tell me how much they love my classes, how important they are to them, etc. etc. and then show up for a third of them, they are doing one thing, and one thing only (in Work terms) they are lying to me (and to themselves!) Of course, that is ordinary life and nothing can be (or better be) said. Here, in the Work, there is a responsibility to "show-up" --- it helps the waking-up process. I come to the Work to Work --- not socialise.

One of the challenges (let's call it a re-definbition of a Work effort) is to make myself articulate as clearly as possibile, as often as possible what is going on. It is part of the Work scheme of things to encourage as much group sharing as possible. We are in a sense helping each other up a ladder. When people decide they have nothing to share and don't share anything they are doing so without consideration to their place in the group's scheme of things.

Many years ago my life was on the line and the salvation of it was based on one thing and one thing only (and, yes, I did have only this choice or the abyss, at the time) --- sharing my experience within a group. Not only did it work in it's saving my life but it made me aware of a serious roadblock to inner development which I share with the rest of humanity ---- my essential Narcissism. The sharing, continued and sometimes forced (on my part) sharing is what started the process of shattering the mirror and clearing the horseshit out of the stables. Your own byline 😈 , Jose, carries the very message I am talking about!
Without continued, ongoing progress reports by everyone here, and a commitment to it this becomes a narrow, non-reflexive procedure. It remains singular, self-absorbed, withdrawn and hardly Work.

Of course, all of the above is based only on my experience and Understanding, and as with everything else: Verify it for yourself.

Best to you,

Greg

PS You don't offer me "nothing" --- You offer me your Presence.

---

by Greg

JohnG,

Thank you for your thoughtful, detailed recount. You held a mirror to an "i" for me today.

Greg

by Jose

Greg,
Thanks for clarifying. Several small points:
I have been "here" since Dec. and at least half of my posts concern trying to understand what goes on here. I don´t understand what you mean by "a year".
You also say that "seeing everyone face-to-face would be a helpful adition to what goes on here. " I contend that it is far more than a "helpful addition", that in fact, is IS the Work. However you are wrong in suggesting that nothing done together can change the dynamic of what we do here. What we do here is partly a function of how we define "here" and "here" for me is print. You want my "Presence"? Well that will never be apprehended in print. It is far too easy to lie, manipulate, fake, disceive and mislead. Faces and personal study count far more to getting an accurate picture. I believe so anyway.
You also said"When you tell me, as you just now did, that for certain exercises nothing happened for you, you are at least letting me know what is going on. When you say nothing, you leave me, as a member of this group, out of the picture. "
But I have said repeatedly that I did not get any "experience" or sense of this or that from a certain exercise. I have said this before.
We are all "flaky" to a degree and I agree about the fakeness possible in having one big experience together that might result in a false bonhommie. But shoot, one good experience together might also be a wonderful catalyst for some to Work more and trust more. Think about it. And with all due respect to the earnestness of your reply about "showing up", I agree but I think about G. and he loved life, ate, drank and lived with a gusto closer to Zorba the Greek than Thomas Beckett. Give me Zorba any day.
I am also reminded of one Zen Master´s quote about the seriousness Westerners attacked Zen practice, "The work we do is far too important to take too seriously."
I accept the challenge to post more, and do hear you when you say," Without continued, ongoing progress reports by everyone here, and a commitment to it this becomes a narrow, non-reflexive procedure. It remains singular, self-absorbed, withdrawn and hardly Work. " That is right. Perhaps a bit more Grace from your end and more Effort from mine? I´m in...

Perhaps the best result of this discussion would be to define what "here" is. When I come here, onto this board, at this site, I am present. I am writing to you, Jose; or to Greg; or Ian; or whoever else is listening. We didn't come to be in this "room" just by knocking on the door.

Your sound basis in Eastern mysticism is a benefit to me, Jose. I've spent much time on comparative study; but from your post I know that you are a genuine article.

"Here" we should be present to each other. "Here" there should be no posturing. When we answer a post "here" it should be as if we were in the presence of each other.

As If. . .
As If we were together. . .
In a village. . .
Walking across a mountain. . .

Because this is different. I've visited other sites. Have been invited to go to other online discussion groups. And left very quickly.

"Here" is not just a chat. It is as if we were together. . .because we are together. . .

---

by Jose

Thank you Harry.
Yes, I certainly try to be "here" when I reply. But as I type these words right now, you are an idea, not even your image shows on my screen and I have to think about what I say. Face to face, I might need say nothing and you would understand.
Maybe.
But yes, I do try, and will continue to try.
Your advice should be heard by all and taken about how we can make "here", here.
I still think it would be good to meet everyone, and one story to add.
I met Leonard Cohen in 1983 in Ithaca New York at a retreat sponsored by Joshu Sasaki Roshi who was my teacher then and his too.
I didn´t know he was some famous singer and though he seemed initially peeved that I didn´t, he appeared to enjoy later that I was able to relate to him as just another Zen student, struggling with long hours of sitting, lots of intensive koans and regular metings with Sasaki Roshi where he basically kicked our asses if we pretended to have a "Zen" answer. Those memories are invaluable for me for many reasons:
One, no koan could be "answered " online, in print or in any other way but in person, face to face.
Two, this man, Leonard Cohen did not impress me as anything but a seeker, like I was, only I was 24 at the time, a bit younger than he.
Three, he and I got drunk on ouzo afterwards, which he taught me to drink for the very first time.
Sometimes that face to face encounter brings surprises we may never have had an opportunity to touch.
Thank you all for bearing with me, perhaps I am a bit too "ordinary" for the "magical" to occur. At my age now though, it is "magical" just being with people and struggling with them and maybe sharing a drink or more with them.
To Harry and Greg, Marina, Sasha and all the others who listen here, I believe this is a valuable and worthwhile "place" to be.

Really.

Dear Jose,

When I was speaking about the year spent here I was speaking about the life-span of Endless Search and my own tenure here. Nothing else. I' m sorry that I did not make that clear. You see what I am talking about? It is a difficult and worthwhile Work effort to make ourselves understood under the very limited expressive terrain of "online"

Before, I go any further ---- I did not mean complete one pointed attack on you. I have been speaking more generally about a commmon problem with a lot of people here. You do share. And as I have stated before, much of what you bring here, particularly from your background is of great value. If I sounded only a personal attack towards you, I do apologize.

I also, am trying to encourage you to Work hard. You may not be the best judgement of the value of your own shares. Sorry, it's true! To paraphase something somebody said to me a while back "What you may think about the value of your own experiences may be none of your business". Think about it. You don't know whether or not what it is you have to say here might "jog" someone in a certain direction.

My feeling from what you write (and again I may be wrong) is that you think the results of these exercises are in the realm of the "magical" or the "occult". It is understandable that you understand it that way because of some of the language used in the literature, particularly that used by G. and O. It is helpful to remember that they were talking to people who were coming out of things like Theosophy, so they were using the language that they understood. I think it would be helpful to remember that we are "waking up", we are in a process of coaxing our thinking, feeling and sensory capacities into a wider and wider context. That is all. If you are refering to what it is I say in my shares and responses: I do use alot of poetic language, metaphor and imagery to experience the "states" I am experiencing from the exercises. Our language fails at being able to succinctly describe these, so I have to find equivalences. I have been also working in this way daily since 1974. And all I can say is that the height of your Work is always equivalent to the depth of your Work. The Work is preeminently Real. It is my opinion that we are always attempting to escape our Real Lives; the Real Thoughts, the Real Feelings, the Real Sensations. We even use the ideas and concepts and practices of various spiritual paths to do this. And that is the absolute tragic shocker. It is a sure road to fantasy and, for some, insanity. That's why G. "stepped on the corns" on so many spiritual traditions. It isn't that they didn't have important things, it is that they as practiced, could become refuge for further escapism.

So, Mr. Jose, you can't (i'm sorry) tell me, unless you're dead as a doornail off to the funeral parlour or crematorium that you felt nothing or had no experience from any exercise. That's crapola. You must must must begin! You must tell us things like:

" I held my hands high above my head for a quarter of an hour and I felt an ache develope in my left shoulder which met a pain developing down my raised left arm. I tried to disapate that pain by breathing into it but nothing happened. My mind was preoccupied with 'why am I doing this idiotic exercise and am I in the right place? . . ."

You must tell us as precisely, as possible, where you are now. What is the truth of your experience right now. That is how one builds a foundation for deeper experiences of reality.

As far as my Grace or lack of it --- I will make that decision (or Ian or Harry will tell remind me I have gone over the line). I have consciously stepped on your corns, and through my talking with you stepped on a few others out there in cyberspace. It is done with only love in mind --- conscious love. My initiator into this Work was a slight ethereal, very lady-like-appearing older woman. A member of the upper classes. Highly cultivated. Extremely well read. Creative. Intuitive. Ultra-feminine. Loving, Consciously-loving. When I "crossed a line" and needed an adjustment she could deliver an attack to that buffer that would've made a cussin' truck driver run as fast he could. She reduced me to tears in nano seconds --- many times --- out of "love, conscious love"

I am not here to sweet-talk you or beg you. I am here to help you in the best way I know how. I am, as an intimate once described me to a friend "an acquired taste like anchovies" That is one of the highest I've ever received. I've also been called by pupils "A Royal Pain, who is well Worth It". Another Great Compliment. I can't be bothered with whether people like me or do not like me. I am here to see that I get my w/Work done and to see to it that I help others, in the best way that I can do that for themselves too. I am a stickler for Quality. It is the best defense in a world which slides so quickly down the scale.

When you brought up the point of creating the get-together next summer to "thank Ian for his efforts" my response is based on the fact that little has been done to give Ian what he asked for in the first place. While I can't speak for Ian (and won't), there is no better way to thank him then to give him the responses to the exercises that he has asked for, regularly. That would affirm an establishment of what it is he has placed here. Without it, Endless Search will disappear into cyberspace without "thanks".

I don't think it is too much to ask every individual here to make (at least) one contribution a week towards "what happened to me during this week's exercise: This is what I experienced". It's not a competition. It's an effort, and yes, it's Work. It exists against the course of Life.

I don't know what you've read about the Work, Jose, but I think it is important to steep yourself in as much of the literature as possible. The early memoirs of Ouspensky, Nott, DeHartmanns, Hulme, Andersen and books such as Nicoll's COMMENTARIES are an important steeping. They develop a "taste" for what this was and is. It is , to my estimation, wonderful, terrifying, unusual, challenging, protean, unique and most fine rare --- I love it all dearly.

I thank you for your time and I hope this cleared things up some more. And I look forward to your continued contributions. I do indeed!

Respectfully,

Greg

Harry: Much of my experience says that focusing on sensation is a means of helping me understand exactly how asleep I am. It's crucial that there be more than one center involved.

In relation to centers this is how it seems to me, by directing the attention to the body and coming to sensation two centers are actively engaged. Through the intellectual center attention is gathered and directed, through the moving/instinctive center sensation assists that attention into the body. And a third center is involved as it is via a valuation that the emotional center brings them together, reconciling the head and body. In relation to centers this may or may not be, it doesn't matter. What matters to me is that there is a verifiable process working there and it is working with a quality and type of attention that I do not normally use.

When working with sensation I found, in the beginning, and for a while, it was necessary to intentionally direct the attention to a part of the body in order to touch the sensation there. But once sensation was well recognised and accustomed to throughout the body, in parts and as a whole, then, for me, it became more a matter of becoming open to it and, in a way, allowing the sensation to take the attention rather than directing it there. It may be that when awareness of sensation is established another type of attention is awoken, as it seems as if there are now two attentions, one from the head and the other in the body, looking at it in this way sensation can be seen as the body's attention. The energy from a certain quality of attention coming from the head enters into, or blends with, the energy of attention within the body and works with/through it. Or so it seems. There is a simple exercise that can help in establishing a contact with sensation, with Ian's permission I will post it to him to have a look at, if he thinks it's apropitate and may be useful I'll post it here.

Hello Greg,
I did not consider anything you said as a personal attack on me. I did think you were intentionally "stepping on corns" and in this case it was fine. I do not mind. Neither the encouragement nor the pushing of few buttons. That is part of the reason I am here.

You are right about some of the 4th Way language obstacles for me. I do not think it "occult" or "magical" but yes, it does use such language. It is an obstacle mainly because I am unfamiliar with it. Since 1973 I have been involved in Buddhism and therefore what we call Western esotericism and all its outgrowths and roots I did not learn about until much much later. Some it it grates on my nerves because I think Buddhism covers some of that territory far better. Some of the followers grate on my nerves because I find a distinct lack of seriousness. But the 4th Way provides an extra "something" that I had not connected with before and provides me a perfectly complementary discipline to go along with my Buddhist background (I am a Buddhist priest you know.)
Re: 4th Way reading: I have read in the primary lit "In Search of..." (which deliciously took me 7 months to finish, even though I am a fast reader I was fascinated and took extensive notes); "Life is real" The Herald of Coming Good"; "Meetings With..:"; "Views From the Real World"; "Beelzebub´s Tales"; In the Secondary lit I have read Needleman and Bakers "Gurdjieff: Essays and Reflection"; Pogson´s "The Work Life"; Speeth´s "The Gurdjieff Work""; the de Hartman´s "Our Life with..." Nicoll´s "Living Time" and a few others.
Books mean almost nothing. I can read and digest them easily. Like the physical sensing exercises when compared to the other less "concrete" ones, I regard books as a delicate and loosely connected rope to the Source. People connect me to that Source better. Thus my suggestions for a meeting. One story:
I met Ian a few months back. I had been in contact with Reijo who suggested I connect with Ian´s group. I did and we corresponded for a bit. But until I SAW him and felt his efforts to integrate himself personally, until I was in the Presence of someone who Worked and struggled and didn´t fall behind words or print, who was not only a man who Worked but one who drank wine and ate food and laughed and seriously and appropriately "considered", until this happened I remained unconvinced of the 4th Way potentials for personal growth. What I saw and felt, in many ways was far more valuable than all those books. Really. Meeting together is more than just to "thank Ian". It is to absorb that same or similar energy from others (yourself included) to continue the Work here alone.
I accepted the challenge to try harder, to post more already. That´s my committment. Particularly the more exacting descriptions of how I am affected (or not) with exercises. I will in a later post be more specific as well about why it is the sensing exercises particularly "grab me", I feel a bit misunderstood there; it provides something that buddhism lost would be the simplest explanantion (and likewise Buddhism retains much of what the 4th Way lost in my opinion)
I thank you for your involvement with me here. I suspect there will be much more ahead.

Best!

If I would have run in to Leonard Cohen, I'd have probably not asked him about The Master's Song. . .which appears only on his first album and is his master work. I "discovered" Cohen on the back cover of Evergreen Review, with an ad that featured that painting of Joan of Arc. Speaking of an esoteric song. . .

As to reading being an easy thing. . .All and Everything 3 times is reading. Shah's Learning how to Learn and Knowing how to Know is reading.

John,

I think we're in agreement about sensing exercises. That fully balanced state is the goal.

Speaking of which, it's something I try to do while I'm writing on this board. I try to find that inner silence. Feel my feet on the floor. Feel my fingers moving from key to key. (Realize as I type that, that much of my typing is only with four fingers. But the designer of touch typing created that.) Feel my spine. Gaze at this screen in a semi-unfocused gaze. Try to connect with that space where legomonisms reside.

I'm a firm believer that contact can be had without physical presence. It's less certain and has a different taste; but I've known it too many times in my life.

Harry

---

by Jose

Harry,
I never heard of that Cohen song, still have heard only the occasional piece here or there.
As for reading, I mentioned a while back that I will be beginning my second "obligatory" reading of the primary texts this year. Beelzebub´s Tales was amazing and there are many things there worth re-reading and Working on. (The notion of reading or studying a text 3 times is also regularly invoked in Tibetan Buddhism; Pönlop Rinpoche, my old teacher, told us this many times)
Shah however I regard as a fraud, having read many of his books including the one you mentioned.
I still say that for me, reading anything is an "easy" thing. And watching the "information" go straight to my brain where it has plenty of musty company from a whole number of disciplines is no longer the enjoyable enterprise it used to be. I no longer value "knowledge", it is Understanding I seek and I do not believe I can get that from reading anything, whether written by G., "God" or the good people here online. But that is me and my opinion and my way of learning.
In the Presence of people, in their foibles and failings, wisdom and wit lives the Truth. That´s what I believe and that is why I have suggested a meeting of as many of those of us who use this site as possible, once a year, beginning next year, to Work together and to make a face-to-face attempt at Understanding the Work we do.
José

by Greg

Thanks Jose!

I am already getting to know you better. Keep writing. Writing clearly demands more Truth-telling --- none of us here can ever work enough at that!

And to those of you who rarely (if ever) write: if you would place your experiences out here more, a serious and valuable person like Jose may have more to glom(sic?) onto, feeling less at a loss in his own experiences.

I totally agree with you, Jose, that physical presence is absolutely "it". Nothing can replace it --- no way, shape, or form.

Harry says:

> I'm a firm believer that contact can be had without physical presence. It's less certain and has a different taste; but I've known it too many times in my life.

And Harry, it can only be a "poor relation" to the real thing. Case in point: the Movements CD-ROM. As a dancer I can tell you what's missing and it is alot --- and it all has to do with the fact that it's abstracted (as our experience here is). I am, of course, glad it's there (very glad!) --- but the whole interior business of physical movemernt is lacking in the extreme. It is an esoteric (inner) movement art, after all. It is a good teaching aid --- there is little or no conveyence of movement of chi or shifting of weight

All the above stated, Jose, the trick here (and --- yes as a Work exercise/effort) is to translate the real experience as much as possible into this medium. For instance (to once again get on my favorite "nag") "How do I come up with a sense of Presence on this Forum?" The only way possible: By writing more and more often. It creates the effect of being here. "How to create the sense of Vividness I am Experiencing on this Forum?" One possible way: By choosing words that playing off each other create a certain collective "color" or "hue". Remember, Ian has presented this as an experiment, to see what might happen --- nothing more. Certainly, he has said earlier that it is not to be seen as a replacement for physical presence.

I, too, was "sold" on this Way by the Presence and the qualities of the person I first met who introduced me to the Fourth Way. I feel that that is a most important exchange. I've also met a handful of the "stars" of this Work and wished I'd gone to the movies, instead! (And some of them probably felt the same about me ;))

I came here to ENDLESS SEARCH through a series of synchronicities! (another thing that will "sell" me on something) Almost exactly 2 years to today I went to visit Northeon Forest over Memorial Day weekend. It is not only a physically beautiful place, its quality of integrity hits you immediately (Or it did me.) I was also impressed by the sincerety and the seriousness exhibited by the people I met there. When I made the connection with Ian over the internet and found that that had been his "training-ground" I was more than pleased.

The books you've read are all good. I hope you read the deHartmann's final Definitive Edition (Arkana, 1980s)--- it is altogether different from the other editions. Make sure you avail yourself of Kathryn Hulme's UNDISCOVERED COUNTRY and the two Fritz Peter's memoirs. In reading, try to use it to connect with "feeling" as well. Make it also a valuable effort for yourself. ORAGEAN VERSION, down the road, can actually get you "sitting in the room" if read in the proper way. While it may not be "information" that you seek (I think that may me the word you meant to use to Harry?), you want as much Knowledge and Being as possible. Those two ingredients, mixed appropriately, can bring Understanding.

Keep an open mind about G. (it is my suggestion). The "Zorba" aspect is there but only a tiny part and perhaps part of a construct of his anyway. Remember that "acting" is a part of this practice. We will probably never know who G. really was or what any of his motivations really were. Sometimes, I think he was a reprobate sleep-walker who became a channel for a teaching. It is, after all the teaching that matters, not the teacher. (Lord knows, I personally find Ouspensky onerous --- can't stand the man or his 'style' for a second! ---- I am grateful for what he put down.)

Look forward to meeting you "in the Presence" one of these days. Until then, I'm certainly glad you're here.

Greg

by Greg

PS (to the above)

On the reading, Jose: Watch the practice of taking notes. You want to learn to read and allow the knowledge to "soak in" whole. You will r e m e m b e r better what is being said. Note-taking stands in the way of that. It also abstracts what you are receiving towards "information" and further away from the possibility of the same statements becoming "knowledge".

When you are in the position of being read to (you can do this with a recorded book, although a real human voice is best ;)) sit aligned, with attention and "receive" the text with your entire body --- as if your body is one huge ear.

You are in the Work. You are going to be trying things in a way, sometimes, that you may not be used to.

Habit, unchallenged, stands in the way of waking up.

G.

Funny thing that understanding, and the change of being that can possibly follow.

I watched Persona yesterday. (To me film is like a book.) (Yes, Greg, I'm still doing my Bergman retrospective.) What is contained in that film is beyond what Bergman and Anderson and Ullman put into it. Being and Nothingness. How we learn. God. Symbols. Life and Death. little i's. Big little i's. Big little I"i"es. Not just knowledge. But understanding beyond that of the creators. And a chance to change being.

Back when I was being artsy fartsy I once made the claim, made by many others I've subsequently discovered, that "I'd rather my life be my art". Such Pre-tensions.

But a work of Art, be it a Botticelli painting, an Antonioni film, or a Cohen song goes being "experience".

Get the Essential Leonard Cohen. Listen just to his version of Hallelujah. Or First We Take Manhattan. Suzanne. ("he's touched your perfect body with his mind.") "Repent, repent. . .I wonder what they mean by 'repent'."

Transcendence doesn't need company.

All and Everything is close to being an objective work of Art; far beyond anything else I've mentioned here.

Harry and Greg,
Thanks to you both for clarifying and adding. The examples are helpful and will keep me busy.
Harry, I love Bergman too and don´t recall Persona, I will get it asap.
Greg, the Zorba thing is used by me lightly though seriously. Not to make too much of a fictional character, but there was no buffonery in Zorba, there was however, a relationship to Life, direct and simple, with no b.s. This is what I was referring to. I know many Armenians and Greeks and we cannot dismiss the cultural milieu in which G. grew up in. Life and the appreciation of it is a richly enjoyed enterprise and often is far more valuable than the stiff pretensions to "consciousness" but such pretensions exist everywhere, East and West.
Re the books, I have the Oragean Version and if you think it worthwhile to begin, I will. I have bee na bit focusing more on learning through this medium but as I have said, I feel a bit stuck. Your posts have helped. Also the de Hatmann book I have IS the Arkana version and I loved it. So much there.
I feel sated with this thread and rather than talking about why or how things don´t or do work for me, I will move on and begin to address some specific exercises I have been doing from the selection offered here. One format question is whether I should just post that here or in the other areas. Ian, clarification?
Otherwise again, thanks, the give and take has cleared up some of the fuzziness for me and the engagement has been rich

> Ian could you expand on this a little please, I am unsure what you mean by the springyness of an illuminated spine.

As we walk the spine will compress and expand slightly.
There was an exercise given at Northeon Forest called the 10 Bone Illumination Exercise:

Direct the Attention deep into the marrow of the major elements of the bone structure in the following manner. Whenever the force of Attention permits, Visualize a brilliant light emanating from the marrow of the bones where magnetic center resides. The Seeker is encouraged to research what is presently known by the medical community about the structure and function of the bones and bone marrow. The Seeker may also repeat the following prayer in conjunction with each bone : Holy God, Holy Firm, Holy Immortal, Have Mercy Upon Us.

1. Lower right leg bone.
2. Upper right leg bone.
3. Pelvic bone.
4. Upper left leg bone.
5. Lower left leg bone.
6. Spinal column and skull.
7. Upper right arm bone.
8. Lower right arm bone.
10. Lower left arm bone.

The exercise can be done sitting or walking. The number of steps for each bone can be varied. The inner prayer can be changed to one of personal preference. A variation of the exercise is to focus on one bone, as in this weeks exercise.

Interesting question - Can we sense our bones?

> The "sightless gaze" you mention is also one of my favorites but it too has an analog within Tibetan Buddhism, "sky gazing" which is a Dzogchen and Mahamudra practice. As I mentioned in my article on GIG, "Gurdjieff´s Possible Buddhist Influences" it is quite possible that that´s where this practice originated. But you also speak of the physical sensing Work and, as John´s post speaks to it also, I tend to agree about their usefulness and regard this as one of the most important contributions to meditative practices and spiritual literature in general that Gurdjieff gave the world. They are called *proprioception exercise*s and the variety and depth of 4th Way uses and configurations astounds me. But most importantly they root us within this body-mind complex and if used well, can increase Being. I certainly believe so. Ian, you listening?

José

The "sightless gaze" is one type of Trataka exercise used in various Yoga schools. It is considered a very high practice. It is a bridge between external and internal practices. Visualization could be considered a form of internal Trataka.
Sensing also has Hindu roots in the practices of Tantra Nyasa.

The 10 Bone Illumination exercise combines elements of both practices.

Actually, the question was not meant to presuppose the sex center. I deliberately used the term Creative rather than Sex to donote the difference. I am glad you mentioned this. The rest of your comments on the subject are appreciated.

Harry,

Back there a few posts back re: PERSONA: you are a braver man than I, Gunga Din!

Truly, though I need to watch PERSONA again. All copies I've seen are poor quality, anyway, so for that reason alone.

Make sure you catch the complete FANNY AND ALEXANDER now out on DVD which is such a different film than the version than what was released here theatrically.

Also, if you haven't caught them: PRIVATE CONVERSATIONS which completes the trilogy started by F&A and continued by THE BEST INTENTIONS.
and
Liv Ullmann has masterfully taken up the director's mantle with FAITHLESS (2001). Actually, she has one-upped the master with her own take on the infidelity issue. But then being a woman, she adds the missing half to his half --- it's quite the movie.

Though they are difficult films (from all kinds of angles) they are worth the "trouble". Nobody watches this stuff anymore --- it's such a shame! I can remember when a release of a Bergman or Antonioni or Fellini was considered a major event . . . tiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiiime passssssssssses . . . .

---

by Harry

Greg,

The DVD release of Persona is in very good shape, and includes some wonderful interviews with Bergman, Anderson, and Ullman. It's included in The Bergman Collection, which includes Shame, Hour of the Wolf, Passion of Anna and Serpent's Egg. Also a complete disc of extras. I also have Fanny and Alexander, including both the theatrical release and the ten episode TV release that was originally done.

Persona starts out almost as a Work document. The interviews prove it isn't, but certainly speak to what Bergman was exploring in his own psyche. That Religious background he had so infested his life.

Interestingly, after watching Persona, I turned on the Cannes Awards Show on IFC and caught a Lifetime Achievement Award that was given by Liv to her daughter Linn, who accepted on behalf of her father. Probably a clip from last year's ceremony.

The closest we have in this era are people like Atom Egoyan and Mamet. If you haven't seen the film of Mamet's The Spartan, it is another at least "B" influence.

Had started greeting the day in the aforementioned way last Saturday. Funny, and here I thought I had lost my connections.

By Tuesday, a newly (for me) developed allergy had taken over and it was more than energy flowing downwards. The difficulty of seperating what is happening to my planetary body with what needs to be done for the exercise is some piece of work: Its sinuses drain, Its eyes water, Its throat scratches --- I brace and "stand" through it over and over again attempting a seperation out from physical circumstances.

This morning I wake slowly, checking carefully as a sneaky "i" tries to convince the "others" things are better. This "i" tries to cheat its way out of any possibility of illness by "waking up a certain way --- a supertitious trick, benign in and of itself, but here implemented in a dubious manner. "If only I roll this way, in such a manner in such a speed," (the "i" says) "well, I can just inch pasty this thing, if not totally nix it!"

I stand, arms outstretched, and the allergic response foliates extravagantly.

Maintaining inner clarity while admitting this even worse than before dis-ease. "The Sleeping Beauty" comes to mind. Peaceful, regular breath held inside the citadel body, taunted teased by an evergrowing thorny thicket of discomfort.

Greg,

I've had some success using the I Am exercise to work with dis-ease. I Am, let the breath exhale, and feel the reverberation. . .then direct that reverberation to the site of dis-ease. I Wish. . . different reverberation, but still direct it to the site of dis-ease. I Can. . .on inhalation. . .again direct to site of dis-ease. NOW. Full ballanaced recognition.

There is a question of when to use this, in my mind. Like not using a cannon to kill a fly. But I've had some success with it in the past. G gives the exercise someplace.

Thanks, Harry!

Just before falling into sleep I uttered strong "I AMs" into my fever. I woke straight up at 3:00 AS THE FEVER BROKE. I will try the rest of what you have suggested here.

We continue to be connected.

Best,

The week's pondering remains a bit tricky (as it should?)

The stars live deeply, vastly inside me. When I stand in a field and look up and out there is a corresponding deepening within me.

---

by Harry

Stars are hard in the City. I live four miles from a center of light. So most of my stars move back and forth to the airport that is ten miles away.

I'd love to see stars as I did as a youth. Laying on my back and gazing up. Small.

I've been "stopping" many of my routines during this last couple of months. On purpose stopping my morning reading. Changing my breakfast routine. (Being without a job makes this easier. Though anxiety about money adds a different environment.) But greeting the morning sun is such an ingrained act. (I use the word "act" on purpose.) As is my evening prayer. . .I Am, etc.

The last week has been intriguing because I've been working toward some grants that may refund my existence. Which has taken me back into that world three or four times. For only brief stints. I don't want to go back to that, but it is how I've made my 'living'. I'm good at what I "do", but find the demands absurd at times. I understand that this is what I need; this is the environment in which I am meant to work. But I wish it weren't.

Two steps back in physical energy today.

G.

Harry, I'd say I wish you a solid resolution to your "situation", but I'm careful these days about what I wish for for others as well as for myself. I send you "a sincereity of Support" with a Hope that you get removed from that "edge" ---- I've been there many times and know what you're feeling.

How's that?

Pretty good. Though my contemplation after your post says I'm trying to avoid having my corns stepped on. It is habitual for me to burn my bridges. Going back is keeping bridges from being burned.

Bridges are usually burnt during a retreat?

by Jose

I have been adjusting the morning suns greeting a bit because we are nearing the point here in Iceland of basically 24 hour a day sunshine. When I go to sleep it is still out and when I awake it is bright. Thus no stars these days.
But every day when I go for a long walk I wander to the fields near my home and raise my arms. At times I am pancaked, sandwiched in between this marvelous clear sky and the moss covered earth. It feels stable, as if I were a link between the two. Other times I find myself almost shy, not that I might be "seen" but that I am not "deserving" of any "downward" flow. I found that both interesting and sad.
I consider this sadness and search for its origins and see how old it really is, how I have so often deprived myself not only of the Blessings around me, but even worse, of the allowing myself to believe I deserve them.

Morning Pondering: Can a 'telepathic' connection be made with other Seekers through the Internet?

When using your computer : Sense your spine. Sense your feet on the floor. Sense your fingers moving from key to key. Watch your breath. Gaze at the screen with a sightless gaze. Try to find an inner silence. Try to connect with the space between the words, the meaning beyond the words.

Pick an exercise from the prevoiusly posted repertoir and practice it during the following week. Report the exercise to the Group along with your reasons for choosing it and listing your observations about the practice of the exercise.

Evening Pondering: What do I deserve?

by Faye

Thank you sincerely to all of you who reminded me recently about my obligations to posting. The timing and the energy was right to make an impact.

Communicating by forum is difficult for me, however the suggestions in this week's exercises are exactly what contribute to the possibility of being present to the task. If I can at minimum be sensing and breathing intentionally while posting then at least I will be contributing my attention. From my experience, it is attention that connects people over time and space. Whether it is a letter, phone call, or a forum, i think one of the glues is attention. This glue with the openess of sincere questioning can lead to new possibilities.

I have chosen the exercise of working with the Law of 3, Holy Affirming, Holy Denying, Holy Reconciling. It brings me to question what is going on in ordinary things during my day. My hope is that it will enrich other efforts.

by Harry

I think "telepathic" exists beyond the realm of the Internet. This is just a means of opening doors. "Telepathic" takes more contact. I think that we can form a bond which goes beyond what is typed here.

I've chosen 12 joints, as it is a strong exercise for me. Funny thing is that as I did it, I also modified it to include the spine. As I was practicing this in the past I always inserted an "Amen" at the end of the sequence. The "Amen" came with a sensing energy flowing up the spine to the head brain "I". Very similar to the spine sensing exercise here. This addition flowed from the exercise and my past efforts.

by Harry

What do I deserve? Nothing.

But 'i've' a whole bunch of "deservers" who are always popping up. There are fewer of these today than there were in my youth. Because in my youth "i's" felt I deserved everything good and nothing bad. Of course that's under the definition of good equals what some i wants.

The last couple of months have been interesting in observing i's. I haven't had a job for distraction, and it's interesting how much flows away. There are still people there, and I still have i's that can drop into those situations; but as I'm about to return for a short term grant, there's a civil war going on. There are i's in me that just want to be left alone and do not want to face those same daily struggles. Other i's realize that a living must be earned and the amount I've collected on unemployment only increases my debt.

I'm not sure we're supposed to have "jobs". I'm pretty sure we're supposed to have work. But we've substituted what someone else needs for what would benefit the individual, in most cases. Very few people labor in anything that is beneficial for their selves. G. called us (Americans) producers of dollars. And that's true.

What should be the taste of our struggle?

Morning Pondering: Can a 'telepathic' connection be made with other Seekers through the Internet?

I have not really pondered on this and I have noticed there is a resistance in me to this type of enquiry. There is a part of me, a bigger part, that believes it doubtful and fanciful, telepathic connection is one thing but via the internet..come on. And yet there is another smaller part that says why not and remains somewhat open to the possibility. It's just not something I work towards. I do think a connection of sorts can be made in a group situation such as this but it needs to be mutual and sincere otherwise imagination comes into play.

I remember a couple of experiences in relation to my mother when I was a boy, such as, one time I got up to put the kettle on for tea, when I got back my mother asked me why I did that, when I told her that she had just asked me to, she replied that she didn't although she was about to. This type of thing happened a number of times between my mother and I but I never really thought about it in anyway, certainly not as "telepathy", and as I grew the experiences diminished.

Task: Pick an exercise from the prevoiusly posted repertoir and practice it during the following week. Report the exercise to the Group along with your reasons for choosing it and listing your observations about the practice of the exercise.

I decided to continue to work with the 10 bone exercise. I find this exercise difficult to come to and stay with. It's very penetrating and I find I need to come to a quieter place in myself, a more collected state in order to work with it, I have added it to my morning sitting. At times the addition of the prayer, when in the fleeting moments when I am able to sincerely feel it, opens me to something else.

Holy God, Holy Firm, Holy Immortal, Have Mercy Upon Us.

by Greg

There is a teleological connection both here (and formerly) at GIG. This has led to a certain amount of telepathic communication. I have almost been able to tell when an answer is posted and (more or less) what it's contents will be. But, this takes a subtle three -brains -balanced being and is the offshoot of "interest" (a form of "love") and other Work. I would never at this statge in my life concern myself with developing it exclusively --- that I see as lop-sided. In other words, I am not looking for it to happen it just does.

Interestingly, along the same lines, I too, chose the 10 bone illumination. It is distasteful to a part of me. It's like dance techniques I've been introduced to which have focussed on isolating parts of the body or sections. Why do that when you can work the body as a complete whole?

Why? Because even if I don't ultimately "believe" in that way of doing things, it challenges my self-centered (and therefore, probably) "habitual" view. It causes me to stretch in the effort against my nature. Ultimately, I learn SOMEthing.

Back to the beginning, there is a "way" to sit at the keyboard to attune to the Group as a whole. An attitude of head-heart-gut tuned to a frequency.

There's a point where this realization happens. Nicoll discussing his idea of becoming a "magician" and then learning that in leaving that fantasy go the real magic somehow happens.

Can we get to the point where we intentionally do such things? I have with my son; but only when I considered it extremely important. And then I'm surprised that there is such a telepathy or telelogy or whatever.

by Jose

This week I have continued with the upraised arms, feeling the dual flows of energy. I have intentionally remained longer than usual in this position trying to express through feeling, what the hesitation was made up of from the previous week. This relates to the "what do I deserve? " question and I can say only a few little things.

When I remain standing with my arms outstretched, I look up and notice two parts of me-one that rejects the posture because of some negative feeling, akin to unworthiness. But the other is positive in a grand way. I feel a connecting bond between me and the earth and a more ethereal connection to the sky above, filled with pregnant possibilities. I breathe this in and the two sides fight it out. I stay still, holding the posture, breathing and sensing the subtle turmoil. It never gets resolved; I leave before anything like resolution occurs. But I have noticed these two conflicting "energies", more like memories of some kind.

Re: "telepathy." I am much too much of a cynic in regards electronic communication to accept it as a possibility. I know a bit too much about language and the artful way it can be employed by me or others to lie or deceive to believe any "connection" can take place telepathically thru this medium. Like Harry, I have had expressions of deep, non-local connections with family members though and believe it is certainly possible. This happens usually when deaths occur or some major event has taken place somewhere distant from me. Dreams have also confirmed such a connection and the occasional lucid dream has me convinced a part of consciousness can move about and acquire information otherwise not accessible. Certain long meditation periods as well have opened up deeper connections between myself and those absent.

Something new happens on a forum when many individuals have the same sincere intention, thoughts and questioning. With people who are close to me I freqently know when they are thinking about me. It is common for the phone to be busy because we are calling each other at the same time. However, I too prefer not to make any conclusions about it or to develop the idea of it.

I found myself doing the 10 bone exercise many times this week when I found my attention being dragged away by different situations. I noticed today that the focusing on the inner, in this task instead of the outer of the external distractions was strengthening to my attention.

Evening Pondering: What do I deserve?[/quote]
I am really struggling with this. My questioning more has to do with thinking that I do not deserve some hardship that is coming my way. My antidote is to be grateful for the current moment. It helps.

by Ian

Maybe telepathic isn't the best word to use in this context. Perhaps other words might be better, such as meaningful, deep, sincere. The internet is a microcosm of life, and the possibilities for honesty and dishonesty exist in both realms. Is it the lack of visual cues and tone of voice on the internet that makes us more suspicious of what others 'say'?

Another aspect might relate to a sense of presence. Can we sense the presence of others who are not physically present? Sometimes in group meetings, a very strong sense of presence seems to connect everyone. Can this be extended? To strangers? To inanimate objects? To the universe? I suppose being aware of our own presence first would be a prerequisite.

BTW, thanks to Harry for the inspiration for the computer exercise last week and to John for the pebble exercise.

---

by Jose

Excellent questions Ian!
You said, "Is it the lack of visual cues and tone of voice on the internet that makes us more suspicious of what others 'say'? "

Yes. I think that´s precisely it. At least for me. Without the whole set of clues, the experience is reduced to one dimensional intellectuality--a bunch of words scrolled onto an electronic medium which itself is single dimensional in its flatness and coldness.

The "sense of Presence" is also quite important. I can feel it among "inanimate objects", Iceland is profoundly full of Presences, animate and inanimate, but I believe everywhere is as well. Even within city landscapes there are Presences, though having lived most of my life in New York, Miami, Los Angeles, Nagoya, Japan and San Francisco, with a few smaller places (Boulder, Colorado, Madison Wisconsin and Concord New Hapshire in between) I can say the non-city Presences are far more appealing to me and feel much healthier.

Yes, we are all connected to that Presence which has many names and I can sense that amongst us here. However, again, the medium of language, sans those very cues you refer to, limits the depth of Presence felt and therefore the deeper connection possible.
José

by Harry

Presence can be in words.

I recognize cummings, Cohen, Hemingway, Fowles, Barth, etc. I've never met any of them.

Language is, of course, magic. And some are better magicians.

Being an "internet baby", relatively (I just began to use the computer 2 years ago!) I was very much "let's wait and see" with a tightly closed mouth and ONE raised eyebrow. (Did I mention a cold, glaring stare at the monitor)

My attitude has been pleasantly challenged and pretty much negated. While there is no replacement for the living flesh presence, I have come to know the "presences" of Ian and Harry through the style of their postings. In the last few weeks I am coming to know others.

As I remember myself, I always intentionally have a "place" in the day where I remember this group and myself as a member of it. It is a quasi-visualisation: a quiet circle of everyone seated in chairs in a relaxed Egyptian style, breathing a violet circle of energy which circles counter-clockwise (quite energetically). It just began to make an appearance about 2 months into this group and has always been a safe, envigorating "place". I didn't do anything to "make" this happen, or to project this image on this group. It is, I'll somewhat embarassingly confess, partly borrowed from a book I received from my parents and sister for my birthday in 1961 --- THE VISITORS FROM OZ strikingly illustrated by Dick Martin with a text hobbled together from a newspaper serialisation by L. Frank Baum. Bless them all --- it was my first taste of Other (along with Disney 3-D effected SLEEPING BEAUTY) within the context of MY everyday life.

The more Harry and Ian and I share with each other, the more personal (in a constructive way) the interchange becomes, the more I Trust them and the greater the sense of their individual Presences. That is happening with others here to. I feel this weeks posting opened a crack in the cyberspace "wall".

I want to apologize for my having been remiss in posting my photo. That action taken would , of course add, for the rest of you and additional something to becoming familiar with me. The unfortunate circumstance is that a week shy of two years ago a stalker entered my life --- and I am still having to deal with the situation. I have to live in semi-seclusion, have to be constantly on guard, and therefore feel skittish about going any further forward with identification, here. It has felt good to finally be able to place that here --- and while I hope none of you takes this as a projection on this group (I in no way mean that) I have wanted to explain and apologize.

I do look forward to a time when we might truly be able to meet and I want to thank everybody for coming forth this week. I've learned alot.

While sensing and feeling your heart, ponder: Can a machine be sincere?

When looking at other people, sense your eyes; when listening, sense your ears; when talking, sense your mouth; when communicating over the internet, sense the other persons presence.

Pebble Exercise

From this pebble exercise you can begin to gain a taste of what sensation is and eventually, with persistent practice, a whole body sensation can be experienced.

Find a pebble, not a big one but one with some weight, that will rest in the small depression in the centre of the palm. Place the pebble in the depression in the centre of your palm and let it rest there for a moment or two. Try to come to an awareness of the weight of the pebble in your hand, work with this for a couple of days, that is placing the pebble in the centre of the palm and just place the attention on the weight of the pebble resting in the centre of your hand.

When you are clearly familiar with the sense of the weight, then by using the weight of the pebble bring your attention to where it connects with the palm, just there. In other words, try to become aware of the area just beneath the pebble where it touches the skin, don't force anything just allow your attention to be taken there by the weight of the pebble. It is not the weight we are looking for but the sensation at the interface of the pebble and the area it touches.

When you find that you are able to place the attention on the area beneath the pebble and can clearly come to the sensation it produces as it rests in the hand, remove the pebble while maintaining the sensation that lingers, don't imagine it, be sure you know you are sensing something. You may find that you'll need to work with this part over and again until you really know you have and are able to stay with the sensation once the pebble is removed.

When you know that you have come to it and can hold the sensation without the pebble, then, with the attention, come to the sensation in to the index finger, when a connection is established there and you know you are sensing that finger, again with attention come to sensation in to the next finger and so on, then bring the attention to the hand and come to a sensation of the whole hand.

Really so

It is interesting how focusing on sensing the pebble's surface then helps to sense the hand when the pebble is removed.

---

by Harry

The pebble begins to pick up warmth from my hand. The warmth remains when removed. Then that sensation cools. Size and shape fade to contact points.

Interesting to sense different parts when seeing, hearing, etc. I almost automatically do it with seeing, probably because of various exercises over the years. But hearing and sensing vibrations at the ears, I realize that hearing has been a chest-heart related process in the past, rather than an ear process; even though I know the sounds come from the ears.

This can go further. We've talked about eating in the past. But the concept of biting, of moving food in the mouth. We've all probably had some experience with this from dental problems. (Though my son's girlfriend belies this. Has never had a cavity in her 24 years! Chinese genes? --Does Levi have a plant in Shanghai?--) But to do it intentionally. . not just with breathing and sensing food, but the movements of the mouth.

Retrospective comment: back in the day when such things were vogue I'd carry a quartz crystal in my pocket. The warmth is familiar from that. But the sensation is different. Back in the day the sensation was focused on and through the crysal.

Interesting observations this week, so far. I'm back on the "job" for about a month, doing some research. Observing the change in my being is intriguing. I'm not sure I'd see the things I'm seeing if I weren't doing some of the exercises here.

Just going back to employment has changed my sleep. For the last couple of months I've slept comfortably, with few intrusions. Sound, refreshing sleep. This has fed into a similar day time experience. With an occassional "oh my god when will more money come in". But the last couple of nights my sleep has started out as a "dead sleep". And I find my self awakening at 2 or 3 AM and not falling immediately back to sleep.

My head brain is working on the research I'm doing. This is at times beneficial. It finds solutions and trends that I can use. But it then continues to repeat those same things over and over again; keeping sleep away.

I'm back in the same office, with the same people, talking to people I already know; for the most part. Yet this change in routine changes my machine very much.

I'm good at what I do during the day. I'm not facing conflicts. I've taken this task on as a passive task. I.e., it was proposed to me and I accepted it. Still the machine that I use to interact with this "job world" is so much different once it is turned on.

In a sense this makes Work somewhat easier to "recall". There is more resistance, so there is more remembering. What G. talked about when he talked about making Moon in himself; about stopping using hypnotism.

As to sense exercises: Smoking! Sensing smoke with the nose. Having quit smoking about a decade ago I haven't been around it over the last three months. But the lawyers next door to my office are allowed to smoke. Feeling the smoke in my nose is like hearing the sound in my ears.

Haven't managed sensing mouth speaking yet. Though I do hear tone of voice. Damn I've got that professional speaking machine down pat!

The pebble was a small yet palpable reminder for me that this organism is so full of sensations and impressions that to unlock them all at once would leave my head reeling (or feel like many of those acid trips way back when!)
I did enjoy it and kept a sense of it as I moved this week towards sensing with the organs of sense. After certain discussions, particularly loaded with hidden conflicts at home, my mouth retains the dryness and the awkwardness my heart feels. In joyous conversations like with my 4 year old daughter, I feel my eyes flittering, my ears sensitive and my mouth ready to say more...
Can a machine be sincere...Well, in those circumstances, I think the best part of the machine comes through and this usually for me means one that is far more relaxed and open to experience than otherwise.

Can an automobile be sincere? A television? A toaster?

A machine is a machine.

A toaster doesn't know it's a toaster.

I Robot is a myth.

Artificial intelligence is a fantasy.

Except for that we humans embrace as our own.

"Don't Disrespect Me!"

Or Rodney Dangerfield has programed an enitre subculture.

by Guest

As it is, I can unequivocally say that it cannot be sincere. I have not been here for a few weeks and there is a very specific reason. First of all let me say that I'm not completely sure what sincerity is. Having said that, the reasons for my absence stem in large part from it's insincerity. So, maybe I can try to be sincere here, now. It suffers from several addictive behaviors. Over the past few weeks, I disappeared into those behaviors. The most difficult behavior it has is the habit of compulsive overeating. When it is involved in that occupation, there is nothing else in the world, only food. All else becomes secondary, tertiary to the motive of the eating, procuring, hiding of food. I am beginning to come out of the haze. At the moment that is all I can say about that.

When in this addictive behavior all sensation disappears. I have tried to work with the pebble exercise and have started to be able to sense part of my body again. This seems to be helping me to emerge from the pit I have been in.

This complex of I's believes that Onlysaytheword is the only one with this kind of problem, is ashamed of it, so it doesn't want you to know. But I, David, in an attempt to be sincere want to tell you this.

---

by Jose

Thank you David,
If there were not the possibility of Awakening, then all the great and lesser Paths would mean nothing.

The machine, is that, a machine, so yes, Harry a toaster is a toaster.
But Awakening is possible. Otherwise we should all hang it up.

What pulls us to try, to seek to become awake is, as I have verified within myself, Awakening itself. The Fourth Way is an amazing tool, an amazing set of exercises and analyses to appeal to the Awakened nature within. Call this the machine´s soul if you will. But those moments of terrible honesty or terrifying tenderness like I was referring to earlier are precisely the truly awakened nature of the machine. The machine then, is merely a series of habitual patterns. "I" am not. Love is not. True compassion and tenderness are not. Thus the impetus to crawl out of my own habitual patterns comes from the already Awake aspects of the true "I".
This is how I understand it.

Yes, I can become.

But the toaster doesn't become I.

The butterfly and chysalis know nothing of each other. And who knows what happens to that part of the Monarchs that do reach the South of the Continent.

Perhaps the toaster can make toast.

That is not meant as a negative comment.

Bread is the staff of life.

And while the "toaster is a toaster" it will never have an awareness of itself as "a toaster" --- much less anything other

Task: While sensing and feeling your heart, ponder: Can a machine be sincere?

Sensing and feeling the heart brought this question closer to home, it help in relating it to myself. Am I a machine? Can I be sincere when am I a machine?

A machine is acted upon and when I am identified I am acted upon, so I am a machine. Anything that a machine does is done because something acts through it, animates it. By this definition a machine can not be sincere. But I can be more than just a machine, as I am a machine designed with certain possibilities. One of the possibilities in this design is that something in this organism is able to pull itself out of identification and, even if only for a moment, cease to be a machine. When "I am" not there i am "it", identified, a machine of self-love, self-importance and self-indulgence, with these at the controls there can be no sincerity. I think it is only when I am closer to "I am", closer to something more real in myself, less identified, does there lie any real possibility to be sincere.

Sincerity has the flavour of being related to external considering, it is, in a way, an act of placing another before myself, to be sincere is to act justly toward another and I can not do this if I'm identified with placing myself first. In relation to being sincere to myself, it is placing a higher or finer aspect of my nature before the lower mechanical part. The finer aspect of my nature that hears the faint call of conscience can be sincere, the coarser, lower part of my nature is deaf to all but itself.

I see a connection between this question and the resent discussion about where I am in myself when I come here to respond to others or the task. If I come here with mud on my shoes can I really respond from a place of sincerity? Sincerity requires a separation from identification with myself, otherwise it is just another word.

[quote="Ian"]Work Program week beginning 30 May 2005

While sensing and feeling your heart, ponder: Can a machine be sincere?

In my relationships to others I have been watching my attempts at sincerity. As real as I try to be it seems that it is the machine that is trying to be sincere most of the time. My usual thing is to look at the past and judge my self as a fool or otherwise. It is rare that I can actually sense my heart or the sincerity that it is capable of. I wish to just look on without judgement. Focusing on the sensing of the eyes, ears, nose and mouth instead of the object of impressions, helps me to gain some distance that I need from the event, even if it is for a few seconds. There is a gentleness in just sensing the organ of perception that is so different from the pain of self-judgement. Often I am as flat and cold as a toaster but if I can look at it objectively, just look at it moving about, saying things, kindly, without judgement, even for a few seconds, the toaster changes from some flat cold shiny thing into something capable of noticing the presence or needs of others.

Regarding the pebble, the sensation has so far enveloped my whole left arm. To go further than that right now seems overwhelming and complicated so I will stick to that. From the attention, my left arm feels bigger and more muscular than my right arm which is not the case.

---

by Jose

It seems we are beginning to understand a bit about language here.

A "machine" is a metaphor of how we usually are. We are machines in the sense we always respond the same ways to the same stimuli. But we are not "machines". we are potentialities that are latent. I think this is becoming clearer and is good.

I am full of foolishness, this day the "teaching fool", that day the "student fool", another day the "intellectual fool"etc. Each day brings more foolishness and more false identities that behave robotically. As well, the older "I"´s , the small machines that regularly take this or that as something to cling to and live by, become stronger by habit.

But freedom too is a habit.

I can only free myself when I change the patterns. This happens when I observe, when I remember myself and when I do not identify with the activities normally associated with my actions and responses.

Thus both statements, "I am a machine" and "I am not a machine" are true. They have truth "provisionally"[neyartha]. They are not "definitive" [nitartha] Truth and this is where I believe Buddhist logic is of great usefulness here.

When I can uncover the freedom already existent beneath the veneer of whatever identity I am identified with today or this moment, then I can tap into that freedom already present and feel my identity as something much bigger. This is what I believe the 4th Way is trying to teach us--how to uncover this in our day-to-day lives, in the middle of all our false identifications and false attachments.

Thank you Faye.
This is of course and always, as I see it.

A machine is not a metaphor.

That is the secret pill of the Fourth Way.

---

by Jose

Sorry, Harry.

If you are a machine, then you can´t awaken. Period.

If there is a possibility of Awakening, then "machine" is a metaphor for something.

What is that "something"?

That is the secret pill.

Dear All,

Not to compound this discussion, but no one really answered the question I put forth in the other discussion regarding what I witnessed regarding "the swallowing of a pill" --- and it still hasn't really been answered.

But, then perhaps this questions answer is of no real interest? No import? And/Or (legitimately) none of my business.

The pebble exercise oddly reflects a recurring sensation dream I've had since childhood. In retrospect, it was probably a hypnogogic episode rather than a full-blown dream. A "weight" of indeterminate origin, (I could never see the object) sat in the palm of my outstretched left hand. Slowly, the object would move out towards my index finger, onto the finger and then out to the tip where it would balance. At that point the object became enormously weighty verrrrrrrrrrrrry slowwwwwwwwwwwwwwly. I would sit inside myself thinking "How much can one finger hold?" And then it would be over. The sensation of the weight on the end of the finger could be brought back over and over.

This happened over and over in childhood. Its happened a handful of times since adolescence (and not in recent memory)

One day in 1993 I visited the museum studio of Isamu Noguchi in Long Island City, New York. I turned a corner into a long narrow room where manqets for large-scale work sat neatly periodically placed on a platform in the middle of the room. The third one in line racapitulated in uncanny precision my recurring sensation / image. What is strange is that it didn't look anything like the image. But like a talisman, it unlocked a replayed the image --- it manifested the experience's volumetrics.

On the third day's practice of the pebble exercise this week, I realised that I had come full circle with an "Ah so!" recognition.

Faye, I too experienced the heaviness and lopsidedness you describe.

Hi Greg
I just didn´t understand the question and as I said before, if I don´t get it, I don´t address it.
José

Jose,

Gotcha!

BTW, just to "rib" you a little, for someone who felt he didn't have always that much to share in the past, you have really been letting us in quite a bit. Seriously, I really appreciate all of your coming forth here in the last couple of weeks.

I hope it has opened a channel for you.

Take care,

Greg

---

by Jose

Thank you Greg,

I do not mind the "ribbing".

As I said, I remain new to the 4th Way but not new to thinking about Awakening in different "languages". I believe there are some things that might be useful from my own involvement within 3 different Buddhist traditions and I actually enjoy sharing them here. But there are many things I don´t fully understand and I accept that here as well. Thus the reference to "teacher" and "student". I am both.

Re: "machines". I think this is important because we each of us need to bring more than just our "faith" or belief in the 4th Way. We must bring our brains in as well. Sure, I accept the machinery images and teachings that G. offered us. Buddhism says the same, only in different ways. Such as the phrase "habitual patterns" for ex. But there is an opening too. That opening is our innate intelligence, a bright, already awake, pristine awareness that is antecedent to the accretions of junk and silliness we attach to ourselves and call "I". If we respond to the Call, that yearning from Awakening itself to get past the accumulated junk of ego, then we have the possibility of achieving something remarkable. This is Being as I understand it. This is acquiring a "soul" or becoming a "true man of no rank" as is used in Buddhism. But that takes ork...or, as is more commonly used here, Work. And here in the 4th Way is a system that begins and ends in the ordinariness, in the orneriness of being stuck into behaving like a machine. I stick it out here because I believe the 4th Way preserved something Buddhism basically lost, not every form and not entirely but basically, in the way it teaches us to "be." That is what I can learn here--to listen to those who have Worked at Being. I thank YOU and the rest for sharing THAT with me...

Dear Jose,

I believe, for myself, that the awareness of my essential mechanicalness comes when I have loosened my musulature and opened my heart and mind to a greater than usual degree. This is why I do believe, as I've heard stated, that the Movements are the sacred heart of the Work. I think it takes that extraordinary effort towards something out-of-the-ordinary (and dancing is that thing in relation to ordinary movement) to detach enough to see how held down we are by mechanical habit.

Trained as a dancer in a technique which intensely emphasized many of the ideas expressed here I can't tell you how much it takes to get "above my self" (the space between "my" and "self"). There is a place in dancing where a unitive something takes over. Is this the start of "I"? But, to get there has required of me relinquishment of excessive muscular control, intensification of moment by moment self-observation, and the quiet ongoingness of Self-Remembering (even in the heat of furious movement). There have been times when I have been able, after arduous dancing, to sit at a table, maintaing this sensation of Unitive Something and go directly into ambidexterous handwriting ---- and I am a comfirmed "right-hander". The sensation in the brain when this happens can only be described as a "delicious Clarity". The resistance in my left forearm and hand (a sense of crippling really) is an awarenes of "dryness", "under-use", and (most shockingly) "Fear". The Fear runs through the musculature out of a resistance of that arm to simply Be in a physical presence. Once I Will it to be there (coaxing it bit by bit) it becomes shocking to me immediately how little of myself is ever used. How much of myself is given over to "habit". How much of a machine I am almost all of the time. And I am sure that my little experience is a tiny step into all of this.

I believe it was Ouspensky who stated that what the Work is trying to achieve is "tasted" in the experience of a "second wind". Rather, thean passing it off as a strange pheonomena, it is indicative of a "place" in achievable consciousness. We are in a sense trying to make it last in longer and longer stretches for it is in that place that we truly begin to awake.

I have had the same experience in bike riding (though, that, also easily becomes mechanical). My "awareness" is heighten upon return home. The familiar is filled with details and sensations I hadn't noticed before.

I hope this was clear enough. These are difficult things to put down into words.

I really believe it is our fear of our earthly existence and the accompanying response of all of our faculties refusal to completely "embody" that keeps us from truly Being.

Best to you,

Greg

My understanding of "the pill"

It comes in a discussion of "ways". The fakir creates a disciplined body; the monk a disciplined "emotion", the intellectual the "mind".

The Fourth Way is to be balanced. By working on all three at once the pill is swallowed. Partkdolg Duty is a the "pill". Because it leads to the balance.

That's my understanding, anyway.

One might take the pill metaphor a step further and focus on a particular aspect of Being Partkdolg Duty - Intentional Suffering.
From another angle - 'doing otherwise' or 'going against the desires of the planetary body'.

Ian states:

> From another angle - 'doing otherwise' or 'going against the desires of the planetary body'.

Yes! It is so! How to compound the bitter pill. I can balance in certain ways with ease. Such facility! Such finesse! Such showmanship! KUNDABUFFER --- it looks like Work, but am I for mySelf reallly Working?

At age 12, "5x5", in other words "as big around as I was tall", I was obsessing (mentally and emotionally ONLY) about the life of a handsome actor/dancer. I had a great inspirational facility in those areas but I would do anything to avoid technique. ("Inspiration" G. tells us is a cheap thing, easily bought) Without technique the wine is poured into a thin-walled vessel, subject to easy breakage. I had to swallow the bitter pill and PRACTICE.

Once dancing became facile, and I had become alot of what was once so far off in the distance (but what WAS mine) it was time to compound a different bitter pill --- time to upset the beautifully arranged apple cart.

And so it goes . . .

Hello Greg,
Your comments about dance are so right on and refer to what I said was lost in Buddhism.

There was a time when Buddhist viharas and solitary forest dwellers with their smaller groups combined all the traditional (and some not-so-traditional but continually developing) physical exercises to be done in conjunction with their daily lives filled with study and practice. Just note how plentiful the "meditation centers" are and the "yoga" centers nowadays and reflect how separate they feel from one another. Buddhism lost this aspect which was then preserved and picked up again from the "Hinduism" which became formulated and codified partly as a response to Buddhism.

The 4th Way kept it.

I have desired so much to learn the Movements and believe, based solely on my 4th Way studies that they are a necessary component. That is, the body must be brought in line with the teachings for their to be a proper melding of the two to occur for Being.

This involves much "intentional suffering" as the body is the first place and the most obvious one where the stiffness of the "machine´s" attitudes get locked (I by the way really appreciated the Feldenkrais link and knew many people involved in it when I lived in Boulder Colorado) For the 6 years I practiced Tai Chi Chuan I knew this intimately and lament this aspect (not having/being part of a Movements group) of my 4th Way studies terribly.
Thanks.

Yes, Jose, all that seperation that you refer to going on is strange. The longer I am in the Work the more I am convinced that it is related to one of several/many complete (whole) Teachings --- that almost all of what we are left with today are shards and fragmentations.

My dance teacher's college roomate and lifelong friend was Lincoln Kirstein who headed up NYC Ballet. He also was taught by G. at the Prieure. Undoubtedly, lunchtime conversations between Kirstein and Erick Hawkins (my teacher) centered around many Work ideas. We read Krishnamurti and Zen Buddhism (the "ground" was softened by RH Blyth afterwhich DT Suzuki's writings took over). Sometimes, Joseph Campbell (whose wife had a dance studio on the floor below) would come upstairs to talk extemporaneously on mythology. Strange to say, and it could be my falling for one of his intentional buffers, I never felt that Campbell had a handle on the esoteric level of myth in an exact way. He was always rather vague and seemed to answer in a verbosity that was covering up a lack. I find that in the Moyers interviews, too. But, as I said, this may have been intentional. All physical technical work was on a count of 8 with "felt" subdivisions of 8s (I believe that's called a "mattra" in Indian Classical music.)

As an aside, did you know that Suzuki was quite taken with the Work? He attended quite a few Movements sessions and is alleged to have declared the Work "Zen for the Westerners"

I agree, without the engagement of the body, the Work remains largely theoretical. And, I believe, for many Westerners, engagement with thrashing, expressive movement is the way towards inner quiet with the appropriate intention. I am a little suspect of too much refinement in the beginning --- our cultural conditioning already requires us to be inordinately repressed. It reminds me of Ouspensky's admonition of "Do not express negative emotions" --- well, yes, but, if you repress (which many of us will "culturally" do) you miss out on some good ole Transubstantiation material. How complete would that be? So, I think it wise for Western Workers to spend some well-Intentioned Disco Time expressing themselves before "settling in".

I am so glad you appreciated the Feldenkrais. It is interesting, that bio was the first really public mention I've seen made of the Work connection. Without the Lannes' Group sponsorship and engagements by Peter Brook for his theater groups his work may never really seen the light of day. The presentations in the 1950s by the London Gurdjieff Groups were a crucial turning point. It is good, nourishing, plain, solid stuff --- to the point.

What does Vihara mean? My first intro to Buddhism (back in the day) was an interview with the Venerable Piananda who headed the Buddhist Vihara Society. A deep, sweet, patient and compassionate soul who spent a couple of morning hours helping to untie some twisted knots of a confused, searching teenager. That was a long time ago --- I remeber his image well . . .

---

by Jose

Hello again Greg,
Your reply had so much to respond to and I am afraid I can only refer to a few of the very important things said there.

First of all, "vihara" means "abode" and refers to several things: a place of rest for a collection of monastics (which became the world´s first "monasteries") during (in India) the rainy season; and the "home" of something, as in Brahma-vihara, i.e., the Abode of Brahma(the Gods) which are listed as: Love, Compassion, Sympathetic Joy and Equanimity.

I had heard that DT Suzuki was familiar with the Work but that was about it. Thanks so much for filling me in on that and the dance "lineage" you are part of.

Re: "thrashing, repress and express" That is a books worth of ideas there.
In Tibetan Buddhism there is an exercise...a very "esoteric" one, that encourages the practitioner to thrash about expressing every single thought and emotion that arises, as they arise, in some physical form. Then they can settle down and begin the day´s meditative practice. These teachings are not all that widely talked about basically for fear of their being misunderstood, as for example monks participating in the eating of meat or drinking of alcohol during a Vajrayana "feast."

I think we in the West need to express and you are right about the tight-assed repressiveness that so characterizes Western society (but then again, I lived in Japan which has its own version). I think Movements of some kind are necessary. My understanding of 4th Way Movements leads me to accept that there are powerful teachings contained inside of them and this has me saddened. I believe that we are at a point in our "group" vs. "no group" or "get together in person" vs. "first do the Work online" discussion threads where we hit an impasse.

If we agree the Movements are "necessary" then without a group or alot of money to travel and attend "Movement workshops" (whose legitimacy I have no way of verifying), we are standing on one weak leg so to speak. I am here in Iceland, involved in poetryand writing (my artistic explorations), discussions online, applying myself to readings and 4th Way studying and I know this is still not enough. I have suggested to the members here that we meet next year and perhaps develop something, perhaps a yearly gathering where we can Work together and possibly learn some of the Movements. I still desire this and am hoping something fruitful can take shape around this soon.

But yes, as in Buddhism, Body, Speech and Mind must all be harmonized before any "Awakenign" can be complete.

Thank you for this thread...

Repression. . .

Movement. . .

As someone who found this "Work" during the great Summer of Love, I spent much time and Jungian internal debate dealing with "negative emotions". And postures. Being in Theater posture made a lot of sense to me. Being in Communications, body language was not a new idea.

I think much of this goes back to Machine.

The first step is to know the machine. To know the carriage. Driver. Horse. And even Inn Keeper.

Not expressing "negative emotions" was a struggle for me, until I came to the acceptance that most of my so-called emotions were negative. The not "expressing" didn't mean to repress them. But to externally consider. Because in doing that the Machine's normal operation was changed.

What is a "negative" emotion? Anger may not be negative. But Glee could be.

Movements. Tai Chi. Dance. Sports. Digging a ditch. Sitting at a desk. Any of these activities can be conscious. Some can simply be programing a different part of the machine, to act in a different way.

But simple: How do I sit in a chair? How do I walk down the street? How do I eat my meal? Brush my hair? What is my tone of voice? Those are the attempts to move to "conscious labors". The first steps. And these kinds of conscious labors become "intentional sufferings". Because if "I" choose not to sit like a machine, but to attempt to be aware, to remember, to note, then there is suffering. Because the friction creates heat that allows something to grow and something else to die.

What is the psychology of a machine?
What is the mechanics of a man?

AI may not be the greatest film ever made, but it does deal with much of these very well.

---

by Greg

Harry,

AI is a much better film than it is given credit for --- it just didn't know when to stop. (there's a bad Work joke there somewhere)

Kris Kristopherson connected us this week. His sister called me for employment last Thursday. That night I walked into a Borders' Bookshop where HEAVEN'S GATE was on prominent display in the video section. Saturday evening, on a lark, I went to the local film Rep theater and what do you think was playing?: Sam Peckinpah's restored PAT GARRETT AND BILLY THE KID with Bob Dylan, James Coburn and . . . Kris Kristopherson ! (It's a good film, BTW --- so is ALFREDO GARCIA)

And so it goes! What is this all about . . .

G.

---

by Greg

Jose,

Sorry, to you (and others) about my untied tongue --- I'd rather be talking to you in person! And we are to keep things simple in the Work, BUT . . .

Yes, I too believe that there is something in the Movements. I feel they are an exact Yoga practice (what with G.s medical training in congress with his esoteric understanding). I am highly suspect of Movements Congresses or Workshops --- not that I don't think some of them are extremely well-intentioned (as I think a handful are), but if the CD-ROM put out is an indication of all that's passed, I dunno . . . it is like the ground-softening I spoke of in previous post of RH Blyth in relation to Zen. What is presented has that value. It is preminently EXoteric.

I am convinced the Movements are an Objective Art form --- that there are precise placements gesturally coinciding with precise breathing and locomotive patterns that activate glands, etc. the way Yoga does. The BharataNatyam dance of India does this (as do many other Eastern forms).

Isn't there someone out there in our group who has attended these Workshops who can fill us in? I seem to remember . . .

Greg

PS BTW: I thrash, cuss, and fume and great deal during vigorous bikeriding --- it brings me to a quiet space. I also practice stretches and upper body movement sequences to bring me into center during locomotion.

by Jose

"Sorry" for what?
The information and insights you have given are helpful for me.
I think there is a special "something" in the Movements, as there is in Yoga or Tai Chi that is different Qualitatively from learning to sit at a computer or walking or any other movement suggested by Harry. But of course he is 100% right in this aspect: sacred movements done without awareness are not better at all than bringing one awareness to any daily task. So both positions are "right".
My needs are to study the System more in depth and to do that I believe I need to participate in the Movements in an appropriate setting. Of course, that would be best done with a Working group. Sans that, "seminars" or Workshops" are all I have. (Though for the very reasons you cite Greg I haven´t attended any yet.)
It would be good if someone who has participated maybe chime in here and help me out: ANybody know whose Movements workshops are "good" or "legit"? I know its a loaded question but I am looking for options...

Jose and Harry,

> I think there is a special "something" in the Movements, as there is in Yoga or Tai Chi that is different Qualitatively from learning to sit at a computer or walking or any other movement suggested by Harry. But of course he is 100% right in this aspect: sacred movements done without awareness are not better at all than bringing one awareness to any daily task. So both positions are "right".

Yes, I agree with all of this and I want to thank you Harry for reminding us of scale --- I always need to be reminded.

However . . .

When after deep conscious physical working through the body reaching a point where I have a complete sensory awareness of the 3 dimensionality of my bony structure nestling in the gush of my body with a directed attention along the front of the spine feeling its roundedness and its support of the skull in its "float" --- and I have been there a couple of times --- I have crossed a line in terms of consciousness. Everything, EVERYTHING is different from that vantage point. While continuing to do the everyday with increased and increasing awareness is equally as important, it doesn't get me "there". I think its the Good (Secondary) Book (ISOTM) which states "Only super-efforts count".

Repression IS part of the problem. Puritianism IS part of the problem. It will not allow you to feel down that deeply. I think the Ouspenkian overlay in the way the Work is taught (and it is largely taught that way) IS part of that problem. There is, to my mind, a not so subtle streak of Puritianism which runs through all his writings. And this is where, to my mind, he misses the boat. The physical body and the emotional body were not his strong suit. The intellect is where he excelled.

My own long term reticience about joining a Work Group has been based on years long contact with members of a local Foundation- connected group who would come to classes to learn how to sit, how to stand, how to move. I intuited a great deal of Fear in the bodies, generally and an unwillingness to bend (physically and psychologically). This manifested in a surface physical relaxation which often (though not always) covered deep, inner tension; there wasn't a complete relaxation. There often wasn't thorough sensation. It wasn't an issue of Formality (I haven't an issue with that), it was an issue of acquired, surface formality put on like a coat, not arising as a reflection of inner organisation and ease.

For extremely repressed cultures (and we are that) large, expressive cutting-through action is often needed. No one wants a Work-pill compounded without sensation. It is a deep, serious and ever so subtle issue.

It is interesting to me that in my repeated questioning about swallowing the pill everybody who has been able to describe the pill, what I have been asking about is "What is swallowing the pill?" --- an action.

You see? We still want to avoid the physical --- we'd rather stay in the concept, the intellectual. We still feel that's safer.

So "What is swallowing the pill?" There is an important Work secret there. As I said before, I don't expect an immediate answer (or any at all) But, I ask you to ponder it.

I thank you for your attention. Please remember, all the above is based on my observation and my Truth --- I don't consider it the Truth --- which to my mind is an evolving , flexible thing.

Greg

---

by Greg

> It is interesting to me that in my repeated questioning about swallowing the pill everybody who has been able to describe the pill, what I have been asking about is "What is swallowing the pill?" --- an action.

the above should read:

"It is interesting to me, that in my repeated questioning about swallowing the pill, everyone who answers describes the pill. What I have been asking about is 'What is swallowing the pill?' --- an action."

To Greg,
Your mention of the Foundation approach to moving and these discussions triggered some thoughts:

What if Seekers gathered together, those senoir teaching the junior, but those junior, possibly skilled in something else also taught...

What if the Movements were reinvigorated with Seekers yearning for living Depth and not Languid Tradition...

What if Seekers worked within a matrix of traditions, guided by their peers and rooted within a 4th Way lineage we have all access to right here, right now?

Sounds like something we have begun here, no?

Perhaps...just perhaps we can continue, going deeper together and begin to Do something that will make this Way, a Fourth Way, a living, breathing, accessible Path for those other Seekers who likewise have been exposed to these teachings but like you, have felt that "somethhing lacking" thing the Foundation(s) preserved...

I personally am very grateful that Ian has given us this space to Work in and the ties to connect us. Can we deepen those ties?
José
p.s. Slaughterhouse Five huh? The time period was rich, wasn´t it?

---

by Greg

Jose,

Much of what you mention here has crossed my mind many times. It was G.'s (reported) disappointment at the end of his life that no one had really "gotten" it. One of the reason's (allegedly) for his having written BT was for the future to catch it and piece it all together.

And please, for clarity, (and so I don't get fried on a Foundation Grill!), all of those people I met were well intentioned and were doing the best they could within their Understanding. What was strange to me was that very basic information wasn't within their grasp --- and some of them had been at it for years! Even my dance teacher, who I had mentioned before, had very rigid strictures on not investigating certain outside stuff. There is what the 12-step programs refer to as a built-in "terminal uniqueness" which settles into these groups and individuals --- a need to "keep the lines Pure".

For a Teaching to remain alive and vital it must become better than it was before. Its basis should be the maintainance of the bones of what it has set up (not the destruction of any of that) and the encouragement of more and more "fresh air" and increasingly varietal viewpoints. There is a mid-point between the refrigerations of a Foundation and the excesses of a JG Bennett.

Robin Skynner, who is in your GURDJIEFF anthology, has said that the Work is a giant general road map. The filling-in of the details is up to each invidual's needs and there are many "outside" supports which can aid in elucidation as long as the search is rigourously self honest.

My concern with the movements workshops is that I feel there is probably alot of "interpretation" going on and that is an eroding force with respect to Objective Art (which I believe the Movements to be). There is a structure to be maintained because I sense that physical Laws are being evoked. It's like what has happened to the Roman Ritual --- no understanding of the geometry of Forces and the body's relationship/response to them. Again Laws invoked and evoked. It has been rendered an insipid pablum through years of "interpretation".

It is interesting to me the way the Foundations have held onto the Movements and kept them in hiding. G. presented public demonstrations during his life. The Foundations have films shot by the great cinematographer Claude Renoir, no less! (The colour must be beautiful). The only screenings are by invitation only. I find it all so strange.

And when I saw in a dance studio what all the secrecy had done --- well . . .

Depth is always the antidote in my book. It makes me feel good to hear somebody bring that word up.

> I personally am very grateful that Ian has given us this space to Work in and the ties to connect us.

Yes, aren't we lucky . . .such a gracious gift!

by Jose

There is much food for thought there...as usual...

On the one hand "Traditions" must be maintained to get the Essence...on the other hand, too much clinging to material "form" loses the deeper, usually more subtle message contained.

Persoanlly I really like Bennett--not necessarily the Subud, etc. but his research into the Sufic roots of many of G.´s teachings. But I here you on the tension between innovation and proper preservation.

So what to do?

We are given something (the 4th Way) which, in my humble opinion, means we must carefully examine it, apply it and verify its relevance to our own lives.

We must also respect our intuitions and personal judgements as they pertain to that which touches us most deeply (many of the most effective "cultists" were people whose integrity was sincere but got locked into a prison of their own narrowness and clinging to their own "insight": Rajneesh, AdiDa, etc.) So wariness over the many "Fourth Way Teachers" is in order.

As I understand the System--albeit a very thin and fragile understanding--the application of the principles, including the Movements should be tended to carefully and methodically. And then, we must verify, verify and verify.

In Buddhism, particularly Tibetan Vajrayana, the personal teacher, with ALL their faults is considered as high as the Buddha. Why? Because the Buddha is dead and his closest disciples are dead and the only "direct" connection I have to the Buddha and that lineage of Awakening is my teacher.

In the case of the 4th Way, Gurdjieff is dead and apparently there have not been many extremely powerful individuals who have "mastered" his System to his "level". But apparenetly as well, I have been in the Presence of a few individuals on this Path (Needleman, MacFarlane, for ex.) both in and out of the Foundations, whose earnestness has touched and impressed me. Contact with persons whose sincerity is felt and whose practice is flawed but obviously deeply connected to their Tradition (whatever tradition it is) is a reason to be near them, to learn from them and to apply what they have to my own life. Thus...I stay here, using what for me is this terrible medium but still, yes, I admit it, some Presence s felt. I trust that. So now what...?

Where do we go? As I have said many times, I want us to "meet". To Work together and to maybe begin a "new configuration" of Work groups that survives this medium and still attempts to get together when possible to do in-person, in-your-face, honest Work. This is my aim.

As well, to find a proper balance between the head stuff (G-d I am sick of head stuff) and the emotional and Body stuff. Putting it ALL together. After all...this is the FOURTH Way...

by Ian

This weeks theme: Tolerance, Impartiality

Daily Pondering: That ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust.

Daily Exercise 1: Observe your intolerant reactions to the opinions and behaviour of others. Be aware of the sensations, feelings and thoughts associated with your intolerance. Then, while sensing your chest, Remorsefully Remember the Daily Pondering.

Daily Exercise 2: While walking, sense your feet and watch your breath. Remember the Daily Pondering.

Daily exercise 3: Before each meal, sense your hands, evoke a feeling of gratitude and say the following prayer: Oh Endlessness, Help me on the way - To enjoy the unenjoyable, To like the unlikeable, To love the unlovable.

Evening Recapitulation: Recall the days intolerances while in a relaxed, three centered state. Recall the sensations, feelings and thoughts associated with them. Ponder: "Does intolerance serve any function within the scheme of reciprocal maintenance?"

Sitting on the bus, two people who knew each other met and engaged in a loud conversation using course language on subjects that I did not want to hear about. I found it difficult to identify exactly the reactions in my body, excepf for a tension and a wish not to hear. I tried to focus on my ears receiving the sound with no comprehension. Even thought that did not work entirely I did get some emotional distance. With that the conversation ceased to be a source of irritation and even seemed to be quieter.

Later, pondering the event, I noticed that these people were not trying to aggravate me personally. They probably did not even notice me in particular. As with the rain and the sun things come to us. It is how I receive them, interepret them or react to them that defines my life. While recapitulating and recalling the days experience, I am unable to recognize if I am in a 3 centered state. The most I can do at this time, is to relax all parts of me that I can recognize as being tense.

This is exactly how I've come to understand events, as well. And much of my reception is learning how to receive rather than being artifically active. How much energy do we all waste trying to control tornados. Or their emotional equivalent.

Harry writes:

Yes. Indeed. Mulling over this week's exercise while waiting for a train in a recently descended heat blast: I am completely intolerant of three big intolerances: Rasicsm, Sexism, and Homophobia. And how much, in the long run DOES my intolerance towards these intoerance matter. Well . . . not a gnat's "squeak", really!

Of, course, as far as my attitude . . .

I'M RIGHT. Grrrrrrrrrrrrrrr . . .

> And much of my reception is learning how to receive rather than being artifically active. How much energy do we all waste trying to control tornados. Or their emotional equivalent"

Good point Harry, I think that it is the receiving that I really have trouble with. My response mostly is "please not that". Resistance becomes the mode of operation. Gratitude and the present go out the door. I am looking at that in particular this week. This weeks exercises have great potential for assistance in this effort.

Two things: Events can wash past you. You don't have to receive. Of course, if you choose to receive then you have taken a conscious step.

Resistance. . .holy revolting. This is the point. You need to change the holy revolting. Something will still revolt. But it won't be the ordinary.

To follow up on the tornado example: Nothing says you can't get out of the way. In fact, if you see a tornado coming and don't seek shelter, then you're foolish. But emotionally trying to change the path of the tornado is more foolish. (Though for some it may be possible!) --just had to throw that last bit in parenthetically, because Magic is possible--

When I watch myself "revolt", I sometimes create a newer "something".
But more often than I not the same pattern begins again.

The tornado can be moved, I think you are right Harry, there IS magic, but getting out of the way seems more prudent for me, for now.
I am leaving for a trip to San Francisco for 10 days and have watched myself be so intolerant to those whose intolerance drives me crazy. Talk about "reciprocal maintenance"! This week during the exercises, particularly walking, I have sensed myself fly off long before I have taken off the ground and these talks have helped stop! things a bit and settle me into myself again.

The Mother Theresa quote is right on!

I will try to participate here when and if possible from SF, if not, I am with you all in spirit!

Using the analogy of the tornado or hurricane I wish to, if it is possible, to experience myself in the eye of the storm where is it quiet and somewhat still, relative to the surroundings. This is an image from Paul Beidler's teaching that I find particulary useful. This way is neither running away from the difficulty, nor being torn apart by its power.

While encountering intolerance while driving, among “bad” drivers, I noticed a holding of the breath, the feeling of irritation and a thoughts of condemnation. In order for these minor things to irritate me I am already out of balance and then easily fall one way or another. It is easier to observe and to talk about the resistances that are very minor.

---

by Greg

A talkative woman who appeared at work yesterday cornered me and talked and talked and talked . . . about NOTHING. Simply, put, she likes me, feels comfortable with me and this is her way of showing it --- her friendliness. I pushed my intolerance down and "made" it into a cube right below my ribcage, turned it on one point and whirled it out of exsistence. Or so I thought. I played her friend all day and ate the intolerance.

In the evening before dinner, I placed my hands in a conventional "praying hands" position carefully sensing them the whole way. A deep ache had embedded itself in the wrists. An indeterminate "throb" echoed in each upper arm.

Greg

Faye, The eye of a storm is a very good image. That is the intentional passivity. And working on relaxing breath, etc. is helpful. The most helpful thing I found when I find myself in that kind of tension is to relax the muscles of my faces.

Greg, Don't resent her. That tension is your tension. Not hers. Breathing. . .I am now. Or the twelve joint exercise are great in such situations. Her energy is a gift to you, as long as it doesn't turn sour.

Daily Exercise 1: Observe your intolerant reactions to the opinions and behaviour of others. Be aware of the sensations, feelings and thoughts associated with your intolerance. Then, while sensing your chest, Remorsefully Remember the Daily Pondering.

Intolerance is a heavy word. It indicates an unwillingness to accept others for what they are and a narrow-mindedness in regards to my own opinions. It seems to me to be based, in part, on self-love.

Cruelty and obvious stupidity are two main impressions that bring about a reaction of intolerance in me.

When I observe cruelty to others, especially to children, whether it be physical, emotional or intellectual, and whether it be seen in person or on TV, always brings with it feelings of intolerance towards the oppressor as well as a sympathetic suffering for the oppressed. Even cruelty to animals, from insects to elephants, is something I can not abide. From memory I have always been like this, it hurts me to see other creatures suffer.

I also find I have an intolerance, in degrees, to what I perceive as obvious stupidity due to lack of thought or foresight. This perception is of course subjective and is based on a projection of what I think is right thinking or action. It is linked to impatience. 'Idiot' is a common word in my vocabulary associated with my intolerance towards stupidity, be it my own or someone else's.

"That ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust."

This is a beautiful quote and pondering on it has lead me to questions. Can I be such a child of our heavenly Father? Is there something in me, a particle of this child, that can be impartial in the way our Father is? Stand apart from the reaction of the machine? See myself in others and others in myself? Be impartial toward myself and others?

"Only he can be just who is able to put himself in the position of others."

Hello.
I joined the online work group early this month, so this is my first post.
Mostly I have been finding my way around the site, plus doing the exercises for week beginning June 6th.

Comments;
I have found quite a few "intolerant I's".
Noticed a tightening in the chest and an overall slight nervousness when the negative inner talking began. This was relieved by using the daily pondering, though mostly in retrospect.
Daily exercise 2; This also was helpful when walking away from my intolerant I's, as it successfully directed attention elsewhere so that the negative inner talking was no longer noticed. While watching the breathing, and sensing the air going in and out, there was an impression of something very small being left behind. This was a new impression for me.
Daily exercise 3; The result which surprised me a little was that, even though I committed to doing this at every meal, 3 times out of the 18, I forgot..... Didn't remember till after beginning to eat. I am continuing with this exercise, as it is a good habit to form for me.

Re "Does intolerance serve any function within the scheme of Reciprocal Maintenance?"; Intolerance is a Holy Denying or Second Force for me. So it sets up the friction of struggle for tolerance/impartiality, which is resolved by bringing in The Work as a Reconciling Force, which for me involved right knowledge, some external considering and prayers /affirmations, which brought me closer to acceptance. My aim here is intentional joyous acceptance brought about by this struggle which is an example of Intentional Suffering I think. At present, it works for the intolerances I can observe. No doubt there are lots more hidden ones to find.
So my answer to the question is yes. How to refer it to the doctrin of Reciprocal Maintenance ? If you like, intolerance in me is "eaten up" by Work which brings acceptance, which is tolerance really.
I think this would be an example of duality to quaternity, but have more study to do on that yet.

To conclude, I'm finding doing this mini-report quite useful in that having to put the ponderings on paper is a good way to find out what I do (or don't) understand.

Sincerely,
Judy.

Hello

I'd like to thank all of you for such amazing postings.

Conscious acting is very special technique that can lead to transformation of our daily lives. We become smaller in this world, leaving fewer traces, relating to other people not on the level of our conditioning, but with the deepening understanding that there is only one real relationship, and that is one of love.

I am grateful to have been allowed to view this conversation - it is something quite special.

O. spent much of his teach dealing with "negative emotions".

The triad is positive-negative-neutralizing.

For every action there is an equal and opposite reaction.

The negative needs to be changed.

The negative can't be repressed.

Being Active is not a solution, because it elicits the opposite.

Thus we come to neutral
Or The Neutralizing . . .
Or The Budda. . .

---

by Jose

Hi Harry,
I tend to view the Buddha (since it means Awake) as a Higher Neutralizing force, one that takes the action and transforms it into a higher level. Thus Affirming-Positive, Denying-Negative, Neutralizing-Reconciling=the transubstantiation into a new configuration which begins again. Similar to the dialectic. Eventually a Higher view is obtained where all "actions" come from a Higher (read: awakened) "I".

Jose

---

by Harry

Jose,

I realized when I pushed the send button that I had mistyped my thought.

Neutralizing Force is exactly what I meant.
The Reasoning was crystal clear to me. Part of it becomes lost in the normal use of language active and negative + and - are clear. We don't think in terms of neutrons.

The whole point of the syllogism was to reason down to Neutralizing as the position we must take. Perhaps Ian will edit it.

Harry

---

by Guest

Hello Harry

I may be asking the impossible here, but I'm not going to let that stop me.
Could/would you describe the actual human experience of becoming this Neutralizing position?

Thanks.

HS

by Harry

Life exists. I'm alive. But life, events, the world exists. And these events come at my being. In some cases these events are active.
A man sticks his hand out and asks me for money. Life is doing something. A storm blows through town. This event occurs. It is an active force.

There are responses to each of thse things. If I curse the bum, then I become negative. I can give him money. Which may be any form of response. I may be supporting his habit, or saving his life, or putting myself in a State of Pride.

The storm comes. I hide in the bathroom. That may be supporting my fear of storms, and is negative. Or it may save my life. In which case I may have taken the active position and a new triad starts.

The question is "How do I make these decisions?" And the answer is: "I can't." The machine will react as the machine is taught, programed to react. And that puts the machine under the law of accident.

So I have to take the machine out of the event. Let it do what it has to do. I have to keep life from being the Active force.

If I Work, if I am balanced, If I am observing, then the machine can do whatever it does. But I'm not involved in the situation. I'm balancing.

There's a guy who works the area around my office. He always has car problems. A bad tire. Needs a tow. Has to get his kids to school. Get to some nearby city. Sometimes two or three times a day. When I'm walking in this area I make myself unavailable. I Work as I walk. I was walking to the parking lot with a friend one day. I was unavailable. She was there. I saw the guy in my peripheral vision. Then I heard her screaming: "Don't you even think about coming near me!" She reacted. And I had to laugh. Because I saw her fear, her resentment, her strength, and the whole situation all at once. The guy has never approached me again. By the way, at one point I actually gave this guy five bucks. I guess he needed it that day.

By letting the machine do the machine's job, and not becoming IN-VOLVED with it, the equation is changed. Life cease to be active. And the machine is only reactive when necessary.

Hello Harry

Thank you. I think I understand what you mean by neutralizing now.
I hope you don't mind the comparison I am about to make; your description resembles in part the approach of some non-duality teachers, for example, Nisargadata.

The human expression of the work ideas, the everyday embodiment of the principles amid the mundane, is an area I am very interested in.

Thank you for helping me to understand the triad in a way that is emotional and practical for me.

Morning exercise: Perform this exercise from Beelzebub's Tales - "... every day, at sunrise, while watching the reflection of its splendor, you bring about a contact between your consciousness and the various unconscious parts of your general presence. Try to make this state last and to convince the unconscious parts - (not*) as if they were conscious - that if they hinder your general functioning, they, in the period of your responsible age, not only cannot fulfill the good that befits them, but your general presence of which they are part, will not be able to be a good servant of our Common Endless Creator, and by that will not even be worthy to pay for your arising and existence."

Daily exercise: Whenever you experience lust, redirect the energies towards relaxing and sensing the body and visualizing the object of lust as a rotting corpse while pondering the phrase from Beelzebub's Tales - "Only he may enter here who enters into the position of the other results of my labors."

Evening exercise: In a relaxed, three centered state, Ponder: "Can alteration of a seeker's habitual lustful behavior redirect the flow of force towards a calm of Being?"

* - "not" is a mistake in the 1950 version and was removed in subsequent versions.

---

by Greg

Lust towards people/places/things begins as a leakage of a kind of ectoplasmic goo which issues from my hara. It is an "outer limits" kind of creeping death substance which urges towards the object, seeks to encase it and pull it back towards my center as perceived "food" for Being. A sense of emptiness sets this most accutely in motion. The mark on the planetary body is an abdomen which like a drawbridge, or drop-front desk opens outwards. It is a subtle yet observable action in physical reality. The sacral center, in the lower back, sags in collusion.

Bringing this back-in can take hours. Can take days. The craving thoughts/feelings sizzle behind a socially acceptable mask of faked containment.

Actual self-containment, a hallmark of true being is after one of these episodes, difficult to maintain. The vividness of a sense of Being restablished is at times to much to bear and requires "cooling".

Certain Indian/Egyptian/Greek/Japanese sculptures of the human figure in their use of the Golden Ratio remind us of the normative stance of Being. I am often so far from it. Brancusi, for those who are comfortable in more (so-called) abstract realities conveys the shape of Inner Calm.

Rodin, in an opposite mode, places the planetary body in service to the Passions, twisting and torquing it expressively.

A transubstantiated Lust adds one more atom of food to the Inner tone of my Being.

Sat outside this morning during the sunrise. Sat on a low step with a lish green lawn spread out in front of me and trees and rising sun beyond that. As golden light touched tops of the blades of grass I went into sightless gaze to take in what I usually miss. Not only the complete progression of the sun's ongoing illumination of the grass (and the accompanying gradations of green from dark to light, but the awareness of a webbing of the top of the lawn by multitudes of larvae making their way from right to left. An entire small World. The counting of five different birdcalls nearby. And the something-inside-me unfurling like a fiddlehead fern.

Greg

by Harry

The morning exercise is a crucial work step. No question.

Lust needs to be understood before redirecting. We have to eliminate the lawful urge to reproduce from lust. Too often we classify this as lust, because we animals don't allow such normal reproduction in our culture.

I'm not advocating random sexual activity. Many species of animals are monogomous. However, physical love depends on type. It's chemical. My first three serious relationships were with women born within two days of each other. . .(not year, birthdays were essentially the same.) The other day I was watching a show and said to Hing (my son's girlfriend) "I don't know why I find that actress attractive." She hit imdb and announced "Well her birthday is the same as your ex-wife's."

Lust, on the other hand, is fantasy run amuck. If I wanted that actress who had the same birthday as my ex, then I would be creating lust. This is negative imagination. And our culture is great at creating it. The double mint twins equal double your lust. Your automobile will gain you the admiration of women you will never even meet in your life.

Releasing our selves from this type of negative imagination is a prime work activity. And will produce much energy.

Watched the larvae again. Did I mention that they moved (relatively) en masse? Their entire reason for being each morning? One all-consuming movement.

Last night watching a buffalo run on TV series about the movement West in the US. The buffalo ran left to right en masse. Other than the obvious descrepencies in scale how different are the buffalo and the larvae?

Just so I am sure I understand, you are using "lawful" to refer to the Laws which we live under?

> However, physical love depends on type.

Comraderie, also. I can depend on Pisces to show me, by indirection, what I have missed and to bring needed "rain" to my desert.

There is something to astrology (as we know it) and it's indication of "types". Of course, that is only one small part of what was known as astrology. Didn't G. tell Fritz Peters that what we understand of it is "Medieval psychology"?

Escaped from intense humidity of Saturday afternoon into an emerald glade. Sat on worn teak bench reading THE MANY LIVES OF MARILYN MONROE (2005). In it, the author states that the most preferred (and most reproduced) image of Marilyn Monroe is her standing on the grate in THE SEVEN YEAR ITCH. The least preferred (in fact reproduced only once, to the author's knowledge) is the last picture of her --- her (in the words of the text) "numerically-identified rotting corpse".

---

by Harry

To clarify my statement, Greg:

We can not include the "lawful urge to reproduce" from the discussionof "lust". The lawful urge to reproduce is a separate activity. We are all subject to this in one degree or another.

Unfortunately in our society, the urge to reproduce is defined as lust. But Lust is something else. It is an urging beyond the normal reaction.

By the way, I was born March 5th, just to shed some water on a number of subjects.

---

by Greg

Harry,

I "felt" the Piscean quality from you about three months into my beginning here (confirmed later by the statement of your birthday)

I originally thought "Taurean, maybe . . ."

But, that could be March 5. I am November 5. Some literature states the 5th day as relating to the Hierophant in the cards. So perhaps that's what I felt as Taurus.

Does the High Preist ring True in your life? It unequivocally does in mine.

Re the sunrise meditation, my edition says " - as if they were conscious - " rather than " - not as if they were conscious -", so I referred back to a copy of the manuscript which I have on hard disc, and found it quite a bit different, so thought I'd post. The manuscript copy says:
"So in the meantime, exist as you exist. Only do not forget one thing, and that is,very often with the consciousness you already have, persuade the unconscious parts of your general 'presence' that if these unconscious parts hinder their whole presence, then this whole presence when it becomes a responsible cosmic individuum, will be unable to pay for its existence as it should,and in consequence unable to be a good servant to our Common Endless Creator.
The word "sunrise" was replaced by "very often", also. Interesting.

Any comments ?
Judy.

by Harry

Greg,

Certainly there's some Hierophant there. Though when I was practicing the Tarot regularly, I tended to be identified as the Knight of Cups. Haven't touched a deck in a long long time, though.

Harry

by Greg

Harry,

I don't touch them either --- there was a period where I was interested in them on a Jungian archetypal level.

I, too, had the experience of "burn" from the Crowley deck. I warned a friend of mine against them and of course he went straight to them --- another reminder to mind my own business. He met a horrible end. While I try to stay back away from the superstitious, I think in that case there was a connection.

The Prince of Cups was a big pull for me.

BTW, UNEQUIVOCABLY! should have had quotations(being a Chico Marx-ism!)

This part is particularly different and interesting for me as it is conditional upon becoming responsible, whereas the other version does not make such a reference .

There are many versions of Beelzebub's Tales out there. Some versions were edited by Gurdjieff himself and then later, more than once, the Gurdjieff Foundation in Toronto revised the English, and other translations based upon further discoveries of meanings of words that Gurdjieff used and other studies. I find it very useful to read different versions, as each can reveal a new aspect or potential understanding.

Greg,
If you wish, you could have a look at www.slsknet.org
There is lot of Gurdjieff music,books,home movies etc available there. That is where I obtained the manuscript copy I have. I downloaded from a Canadian user who scanned it to make it freely available.
You might even end up downloading from me..... ha...
If you do check it out, when you have the program, just click on "Search Files" and type in "gurdjieff" to bring up what's available from users online at that time.
Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by Faye

Greg,
There is a transcript available from before the 1950 copyrighted edition. It could be the same one that you and Judy are talking about. The version to which I am referring was passed on to some Canadians including me, from Fritz Peters in the 70's.

Judy, I could not find the reference to the manuscript on the sisknet.org web-site that you mentioned.

---

by Greg

Thanks, Faye.

I'd like to see the Peters' transcript. I have the 1931 manuscript which is probably the one Judy is talking about.

Judy,

I, too, can't find the stuff according to your directions. I joined the site but every time I type in "gurdjieff" I nothing comes up. Can you give more explicit directions (step-by-step). My computer knowledge fits inside of a walnut shell, but I do try (a Work-ewffort!)

Thanks,

Faye and Greg,
Re the website; Soulseek is a free file-sharing application, so one has to download the soulseek software and establish as a user (just a username and password) to find anything. If you have already done that, then clicking on the "search files" tab should bring up a window which allows you to type in the request, and typing "gurdjieff" from where I am brings up several pages of entries.
Sorry if my directions aren't very good. I'm no computer whizz either. Maybe if you still have trouble, Ian could give you my email, and I could help that way, rather than use our online work site ? Anyway, see how you go.
Hope this clarifies a little.
Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by Judy

Greg,
If you joined the site, it's version 156 you want, not the new Soulseek 157 which is really only in a testing phase, and hardly any users yet. This could explain why when you type in, nothing is coming up. Maybe that will solve ..
Just thought of this. Hope it helps.
Let's know how you go.
I'm a newbie to the Endless Search site, and am loving it. I guess the posts are Work on the Second and Third lines ?

Hi All,

In the exercise, the "not" in the quote from BT was an error in the original 1950 version, and was corrected in subsequent publications. The original 1950 version is no longer under copyright.

There is a short publishing history of BT at Traditional Studies Press - http://www.traditionalstudiespress.com/TSPBeelzebubsTales-History.htm
There you will also find a PDF which lists the errata in the 1950 version as well as two omitted paragraphs and page correlation tables.

The 1931 version mentioned can be downloaded here -

When you observe tensions in the body, make an effort to return to a relaxed state.

When you observe yourself in an extreme emotional state, follow your breath until you return to a neutral emotional state.

When you observe strong opinions or criticism of others behaviour, consider the opposite point of view. Then use a sightless gaze to help quiet the thinking center.

At sunrise and sunset, take time to enter a state of all-brains-balanced-being-perception.

Let's be precise.

Solstice: Days are at there extreme. On June 21st, in the northern Hemisphere, the day is longest and night is shortest of any time in year. (Opposite is true in Southern Hemisphere.)

Equinox is Equal: Corresponds with Easter and Harvest Festivals.

I make this statement of precision, because it's crucial to this subject. Each of these points tend to be change points. We're all aware of Winter. We have Christmas, and a number of other celebrations to celebrate the lengthening of days again. We feel the loss most in winter, perhaps.

The diurnal period is an interesting study. When do we sleep best? Etc. How early do you wake up during the summer. Go to bed in the winter?

I was not aware that the instructions had changed however the week manifested as maintaing verticality physically and emotionally while in daytime operations.

Even whirring of a barely tilting gyroscope in a white space in my skull. This pleasant sensation was accesible all week long.

Day by day brought my consciousness further and further into the skeleton as an efficiently moving vehicle, Everything else dripped down around that like a meltiing candle.

By yesterday I walked two hours in 90 degree dry heat within a continuous being of Presence.

Nothing substantial, outside of me, gained entrance for five days. The ability to see to this all week amazed me.

As I returned to Iceland at the beginning of the week, to perform a Buddhist Blessing ceremony for a child, then to the next day´s celebration of my daighter´s fifth birthday, I found myself trying to maintain a centered-ness in the midst of the "whirring" as Greg described. The breath remained the only constant, a friend I remembered most on my solitary walks. With no sunset these days, I awaken to Light and sleep to Light and have tried to reflect on this and the past two weeks Work exercises. When I am surrounded by Light, am I filled with Light? And when (as is inevitable here where I live) I am surrounded by darkness, will that be all I have within?

But when, in the middle of these moments and exercises I looked around me, jiggled the keys in my pocket and breathed the air around me, I sensed a Quality of Being so Pure as to be simple, almost able to be unnoticed if I allowed my normal self to return. But when instead I held onto those keys, breathed and listened, opening myself up to a Rhythm that generally is quite beyond me, then I felt that I was, that "I am" and as usual, the moment passed.

Sitting here, listening to "Body & Soul" by Coleman Hawkins, I cannot distinguish between the way that music makes me feel and the impact of the last two postings.
It's beautiful of you both to share such personal experiences and to express them so lightly and so clearly, like jazz, like The Blues...transforming.

Thank you.

Commitment

Our Work requires commitment - commitment to our Aim, commitment to sustained Work efforts to acheive our Aim, commitment to be honest with ourselves, commitment to serve Nature and Endlessness.

Each morning from Monday to Friday, enter an All-Brains-Balanced state and Ponder on the meaning of one of the Five Being Obligolnian Strivings.

On Saturday, enter an All-Brains-Balanced state and Ponder on the meaning of Conscious Labor.

On Sunday, enter an All-Brains-Balanced state and Ponder on the meaning of Intentional Suffering.

During the day, make a committed effort to maintain a constant sensation of air entering and leaving the nostrils.

Every evening, enter an All-Brains-Balanced state and do a re-capitulation of the days events. Ponder - Did I give my best efforts towards fulfilling my commitments?

---

by Harry

Breath is in two places. The nostrils and the solar plexus. I wonder if breath was always in the solar plexus? I remember directing breath there. So it must not have been. I remember pain in my lungs when I used to athleticly exert myself. But there is nothing comparable to the experience of breathing in cool air on a glorious morning.

Just breath, breathing is everything. Breath is the connector.

I want to ask others about recapitulation at the end of the day. I've always resisted these recapitulation exercises. I think, because that's the way I used to function. I'd lay awake and replay the entire day, without any focus. Just replay. The exercises add focus. However I still resist recapitulation. Perhaps there's a connection to the Catholic confession. (Real confession is always to yourself. Save what we do here.)

I've come to want to sleep quickly. If anything, I end up pre-capitulating at about 4:30 in the morning. After my sleep has digested the day, the next is prepared for. I don't like when this happens, either.

Somehow it seems better to work in the moment. But that may just be me trying to escape my intellectual center.

---

by Jose

Hello Harry,
The recapitulation works best for me (historically a very light sleeper) when I do it for a prescribed period of time, away from the bed, just before sleeping. In my case, I sit in my office/library, downstairs and let the events wash me, as I try to notice where a specific image "occurs" in my body. I usually do this for 15 minutes or so, then decide to stop and allow my Self to rest for the night. It has helped me in both seeing what was and was not done during the day as well as keeping me from obsessing about things during the course of my rest time.

Me too Recapitulation is a very important thing. First it touches me very much when i recollect all events of the day in 20 - 30 minutes, and what have i done and where I've been the rest of time?!! Then I can observe the resistance of mind, how it always want to escape or stop this practise. This is very remarkable. Why do we resist so much this recapitulation? By Orage I read that this practise is comparable with death. Many people who have had experience of death say that they saw events of their life as if on screen. You know by Castaneda this practise is crucial. But what wonders me is why, if i know all this about importance of this practise i still resist to fulfil it !!! As to me I didn't make this practise yet and just belive that TOMORROW i'll do this.

Instead of recapitulation i tryied ponder about one of the Five Strivings, the first one. I've noticed in the statement "To have in their ordinary being-existence everything satisfying and really necessary for their planetary body." really necessaryWhat is really necessary for my body?
And I saw that what i connect with body necessities is not this at all. I saw that i don't take care of my body. Then another aspect which can be connected with this statement - MONEY. How much need I really?! Why troubles me too much my future? How can I stop this? I saw that my cares about future make me to take risks und stupid deals. Then I tried to image a good householder, and i noticed again a resistance of my mind, it doesn't want to think about money at all. And image of a good householder was very vague. I get tired and fall asleep.

I am not sure I understand the distinction you are making between recapitulation and replay. I suppose that a replay could be much more detailed. In the context of the exercise, I think either word could be used.

Work notes.
(a) Committment to awareness of breath entering and leaving nostrils; some success when walking, cooking, driving and reading; also sensation not completely lost when mild emotional activity. However, the divided awareness didn't work well when intellectual centre required actively. I tried it for rhythmic intellectual token work, and this OK, but anything extra and awareness gone, so much of the week was spent going back and forth into awareness. Experimented with understanding (when reading Nicoll), and that was an "Aha!" for me. It was as if I was reading with different I's (pun unintended).. .. don't know how else to express.
(b)Ponderings; these proceeded usually until the Fourth Striving, when found that my intellectual grasp of this quite vague.Similar knowledge gaps evident with the weekend ponderings.
These experiences have resulted in my changing priority of current study text from Nicoll's Commentaries to Beelzebub's Tales.
(c) When added the breath awareness to the morning meditation (Vedic, with mantra), "timed out" twice. No memory of the extra half-hour or so. Just disappeared.
(d) Recapitulations brief, but did do. Added prayers of gratitude for the "awake" moments the practice of the Work brings.

My reason for a "work report" every so often is simply to share, as if our Group meets face-to-face. So, as at a meeting, any comments you wish to make, will of course be welcomed, in the Spirit of the Work.

Best wishes,
Judy.

What a hard week...
I have been following the breath fairly well and regularly but again the machine wants to be distracted and avoid any any deeper consideration of what is occurring.
Why?
Why is it that I flow so nicely, so well, with Being luminously shining at moments that are magnificent at times, and at others I see a piece of shit that is lazy and easily distracted?
Not a good Work week...alot to Work on though...

Greetings, please receive my apologies for not joining your discussion for so much time.

I had just an interesting observation - I'd known the technique of constant sensation of breath for a long time before I joined this group and even tried it several times but failed to keep the attention for more than half a minute. When the exercise was given here, I tried again and by the end of the week I had several periods of keeping the attention for 10-15 minutes or more - yes, the attention was distracted but I was able to return it to the breath quite soon. Seems that the group really serves as an "external intellectual center" for me.

I had a difficulty understanding what the Fourth Obligonian Striving means:
"The striving from the beginning of their existence to pay for their arising and their individuality as quickly possible, in order afterwards to be free to lighten as much as possible the Sorrow of our Common Father."

What should I do to pay for my existence? I try to pay my debt to my mother helping her, but - what should I do to pay to Nature and God?

I have also noticed that the Fifth Striving is too weak in me - I pay too much attention to my own attempts of being conscious and often refuse to see and respect similar attempts in others, even in those in our small group who practise the same exercises.

Seems that something in me chooses the strivings 1-3 because they are more egoistical.

Commitment means very much to my work "I"s - and thanks to this group and Ian who gave us the exercise on abstract purpose before this understanding of what commitment means has grown very much in me recently. But I feel that more automatic "I"s in me reject the idea of commitment trying to insist on what they want. Seems that this contradiction of commitment and self-will becomes the main point of inner struggle in me - not only in Work efforts but in ordinary life affairs also.

by Harry

"The striving from the beginning of their existence to pay for their arising and their individuality as quickly possible, in order afterwards to be free to lighten as much as possible the Sorrow of our Common Father."

Not just our physical parents. . .in one sense this means to become a good householder as quickly as possible. But every day we have to pay off our arrising. To Mother Earth, Grandfather Sky, those around us. . .even our bosses and teachers. The Earth and Moon and Sun need our support. Realistically and metaphorically.

---

by Jose

Harry,
I really like your way of putting things. Thanks.
For me, who remains with so many questions about some of the particulars regarding the cosmological teachings of the 4th Way, I need only look around me and wonder: what am I contributing to make this all more beautiful, more authentic, more of a Real place rather than a library of ludicrousness? And I realize that my efforts really do elevate this all, if they are real efforts. That´s why I love that this is called, after all, Work.
Anton, that quote is one of those that remains hard for me too, but when I examine it in the fashion I mentioned above, it makes sense. Alot of sense.

Start the day by sensing the flow of breath in and out of the solar plexus.
Add to that a Pondering: What prevents commitment from leading to efforts?
Be open to any Reconciliations in the emotional center.

At mid-day, re-commit to the effort of sensing the flow of breath in and out of the solar plexus.
Add to that a Pondering: What function does Remorse of Conscience serve?
Be open to any Reconciliations in the emotional center.

Before bed, replay the days events impartially. What personal traits precipitate lapses into identification and sleep?

Before sleep, sense the breath as if it were entering and leaving through the soles of the feet.
Add to that a Pondering: Is Remorse of Conscience a Reconciling force?

---

by Jose

A few observations:

At the beginning of the day, as I breathe from the solar plexus and ponder, I notice how the breath wishes to originate either higher (in the heart center) or lower (in the abdomen). Keeping it in the solar plexus seems to add an element I had never noticed before, more "refined" and neutral.

The midday practice leads to much of the same, though I notice that the resistance to breathing from the solar plexus is lessened and attention can be more easily maintained there. Remorse of Conscience as a pondering factor leads to the pull of the breath towards the heart again.

At night, the personal traits of laziness and impatience are seen clearly. Not a pretty sight. But in the last few days at least they are seen. The breath fom the soles is wonderful for me--it extends the "body" outwards and promotes a deep sleep. Remorse of Conscience has been seen as a Reconciling force if it is linked to the breath of another center (other than abdomen or upper chest/heart) Otherwise it lapses into maudlin sadness or self-pity.

The three centers need to be involved.

---

by Jose

That´s helpful Ian.

What I was referring to was the sense that if only on the physical level the breath stayed in the abdomen, then sadness was felt, and if it stayed within the heart center, self-pity.

What I have noticed is, on those soft occasions when the three centers are involved, then a rush of Being (I have no other words to describe it) seems to arise and a tingling throughout the body, an aliveness that is not harshly drawn as separate from "normal" ways of exising in the world, but "soft" as in freshly alive and capable of Living, taking in all impressions Wisely is felt.

While in a three centered state, sensing the body and following the breath, Ponder this statement by Gurdjieff: "What a man has received he must immediately give back; only then he can receive more."

What do we give back?
How do we give back?
If we are alone, who or what do we immediately give back to?
Are there appropriate and inappropriate situations for giving back?
Is it possible to give back everything that one receives?
How does this relate to the Fourth Obligolnian Striving of paying for our arising?
How does this relate to the Fifth Obligolnian Striving of assisting others?
How does this relate to the three lines of Work?
Is giving back only concerned with our immediate Group?

---

by Harry

Lots of questions to ponder.

Giving back is Being Partkdolg Duty. Conscious Labors. Intentional Sufferings. We give back to everyone.

Last Saturday my mother wanted to have a 50th Anniversary Mass and Brunch. Dad died in March, but this would have been their 50th. Giving back to her was attending this event and enjoying her pleasure for her.

That's ordinary. But it is also Work.

Can we try to give back to those who we shouldn't give to? Certainly. Pearls Before Swine. To give back to those who haven't paid for anything is a sin. It's doing what we know is wrong. Usually for selfish reasons.

Right now I'm debating the assisting of others. The young secretary at my former employer may be able to benefit from this Work. But I need to find the way to present it to her. She sees me as a father figure. And I need to find the balance and the right means to that effort. It may never happen. But I recognize the possibility now, as only a possibility.

I have a very good friend who has known about my Work for over 30 years. He actually had formerly taught with a woman who had studied directly under Gurdjieff. And yet, the Work remains an intellectual exercise for him. We speak occassionally. I lend him books. (Not Work books. But B influence books. I don't believe in lending Work books. . .except to my son, early in his life. He then quickly understood he had to own his own.)

Sometimes our paying for our arrising can come in other forms, as well. My sister will never be able to approach this work. But I've given to her on numerous occassions. She was diagnosed Type II diabetic about a month after I was. Since then I've lost 95 pounds, lowered my blood sugar and blood pressure. Partially from will power I've gained through Work. Fasting twice a year for the last 30+ years developed that ability. She sees the will power. It is something she can use. And I spend time encouraging her. But to give her a Work book would be something that would be wasted. Once I gave her a tape on Tai Chi. It was never watched.

part of the meaning (the 'WHY') I believe relates to the old zen story of "Emptying your cup":

The master listened patiently and then began to make tea. When it was ready, she poured the tea into the scholar's cup until it began to overflow and run all over the floor. The scholar saw what was happening and shouted, "Stop, stop! The cup is full; you can't get anymore in."

The master stopped pouring and said: "You are like this cup; you are full of ideas about Buddha's Way. You come and ask for teaching, but your cup is full; I can't put anything in. Before I can teach you, you'll have to empty your cup."
EXTRACT FROM - http://www.prairiewindzen.org/cup.html

The 'HOW' is putting into action the Work excercises, embodiment of that which we understand.

The 'WHO' to give to...that's a bit trickier without drifting off into fantasy and myth...maybe it is the sense of gratitude that is already the 'giving back' - like skimming a stone across the water, performed for the sheer pleasure and beauty of the experience. The receiver is not seperate from the giver, and the giving connects them, dissolving the imagined boundaries.

A sunlit scene by the sea.

I ask myself how to respond to these questions from my understanding rather than from my usual thoughts and theories. Coincidentally I saw a short presentation on public television, titled "giving back". It was about a man who recently made some leap in the design and manufacture of violins, increasing the quality of the sound.. The intention of his work as he described it was to give back to society, even if it was to one person. I was struck by his sincerity and modesty.

One aspect of giving back would be when a person recognizes his/her talents or capabilties and makes use of them somehow for the benefit of more than just himself. This cannot be limited to The Work or this Forum although of course this is a good place to observe it.

It has been easiler for me this week, to recognize what others give rather than what I do. This week, when I was in need, I noticed how several different people gave me whatever they could from their talent, each one a unique contribution; one gave kind and understanding words; another some advice on breathing; another contributed his capability in acupuncture.

This is a very big question for me and I believe that it has many more sides.

Each morning, prepare to greet the day's allotment of suffering and joy with equanimity by slowly chanting "aieioiuoa" seven times and sensing the reverberations throughout the body.

Perceiving the suffering arising from our connection to a living universe, and suspecting that creative enduring of suffering may enhance conscience, we will apply the heptachord of suffering to our daily encounters with suffering. For example, starting from :

1. observing and naming a personal holy denying suffering, followed by
2. a holy affirming of the energy spent in the suffering, resulting in
3. a holy reconciled "impartiality", making it possible to
4. curb the suffering's manifestation, then diverting the energy saved
5. to the expression of a companion characteristic such as joy, followed by
6. a savouring of a transubstantiated comprehension between the suffering and its companion, leading to
7. a coating on an inner-being embryo often surfacing as a calm, quite inner state.

Each evening, in order to promote the role of a reverant seeker of the universes' interconnectedness, the seeker will compose a prayer of gratitude and praise to be offered seven times to the endless source while in a state of three centered relaxation.

by Anton

Heptachord is a very useful exercise for me as I am in the midst of doubts and fears - I'm quitting my job recently and I haven't found another job yet.

I have difficulty in sustaining my attention while doing the heptachord - often I stop between steps 3 and 4 or 4 and 5 because of the lack of attention.

These are not games we play here--at least not I.
I am in a loveless marriage but will not leave because I will not leave my children, I am back in school, although I turn 46 in a month and have 2 degrees already, and I have little money, though I benefit from a State system that supports spouses of citizens...

In contemplating suffering, and the denying, affirming and reconciling forces that are part of the suffering we endure, I am taken into a place of depth that knows few words. This Work is my Life and keeps me sane...and hopefully, on a Holy track.

To endure for a Higher cause, to persist and to attempt transformation of such in order to benefit something Greater is no stranger to my Life. How I do that is benefitted by the "exercises" presented here. But I tell you that there are times when this is most difficult...

I'm always stuck that G. said that the only thing we have to sacrafice is our suffering.

By choosing conscious labors and intentional suffering we sacrifice our mechanical suffering.

As to ordinary life: The only thing that can happen does happen. That we see options is part of the illusion. And that is part of what needs to be sacraficed.

Sacra ficed. Because sacra comes from holy.

I need it's dead summer. In fact we're facing a heat inversion here the next couple of days. I wish activity here were greater.

Harry

by Faye

Using the heptachord on suffering seems complex right now and requires my constant referring to the steps. I have been using it whenever I notice a substantial emotional reaction or suffering that I can identify. One example was on one day this week when I waited for a medical appointment for more than two hours. Everytime the irritation came up provoked by the thought about how it should be I would notice the tension caused by my thinking and that it should be otherwise. A reasonable amount of impartiality was attained. An opposite manifestation was barely noticeable. At most I remembered to breathe, stayed calm, refocused on my crossword puzzle and stopped thinking about it.

For highly charged emotional suffering such as acute worry, I am able to bring some attention to the process and to gain some impartiality but I do not have the sufficient amount of Holy Affirming force just now, to move past that to the companion characteristic.

Holy Prayer for this week.
Oh Endlessness, Most Benificent and Loving Father.
thankyou for all Thou has given me.
Blessed Source of Everything,
I understand that the intentional bearing of suffering may lead to Conscience and I pray for Your help in this effort.
Amen

by Jose

Hello Harry,
I don´t know if you were directing some of what you wrote to me, and I hear you deeply if you did, but I was merely trying to make plain my pain.

Too often I get caught up in the jargon and forget that Work takes place on the level of Life--my life. My suffering in that regard, is quite "intentional" and I benefit greatly from it (the daily and continued exposure to the magical lives of my children) but whether it is transformed into a Higher purpose remains to be seen.

At the end of the day my prayer is this:

Grant Your Blessings that I might find strength, not in my "self" but in Remembering my "Self".

---

by Ian

Sacrifice means "to make sacred".
So to sacrifice our suffering, we have to make our suffering sacred, or in other words, intentional suffering.
We offer up our mechanical suffering, our holy denying suffering, by transforming it, not by denying it and trying to make it go away - that is self-calming. We cannot go around our suffering, we have to got through the eye of the needle with it.
Other aspects of sacrifice have to do with the destruction of a valuable thing for a higher good and with burnt offerings; more references to transformation.
Our mechanical suffering is valuable (indeed, it is a lawful part of the Holy Denying force) and we can intentionally transform or burn its energy into something higher.
The Fourth Striving calls us to - lighten as much as possible the Sorrow of our Common Father. We can only do that by taking on suffering and transforming it. As it says in the Bible - your suffering shall be turned into joy.
As Gurdjieff says -
"One needs fire. Without fire, there will never be anything. This fire is suffering, intentional suffering, without which it is impossible to create anything. One must prepare, must know what will make one suffer and when it is there, make use of it. Only you can prepare, only you know what makes you suffer, makes the fire which cooks, cements, crystallizes, DOES. Suffer by your defects, in your pride, in your egoism. Remind yourself of the aim. Without prepared suffering there is nothing, for by as much as one is conscious, there is no more suffering. No further process, nothing. That is why with your conscience you must prepare what is necessary. You owe to nature. The food you eat which nourishes your life. You must pay for these cosmic substances. You have a duty, an obligation, to repay by conscious work."

Whenever you experience a Holy Denying Suffering such as anger, fear, jealousy, hatred, annoyance, exasperation, depression, etc., bring that suffering into your solar plexus on the in-breath and let the fire of the suffering warm your heart, transforming it into a blazing sun, whose heat and light are carried by your out-breath, illuminating you to the marrow of your bones and filling you with joy.

Ian,
This is such a beautiful exercise, that I could keep it as my primary one for years...

This week has been fairly even but this exercise has made a profound difference in my approach to my difficulties. I breathe in Trouble and fill myself to the bones with Light, can´t beat that one!

Now to specifics...breathing into the solar plexus changes my attention and grants a Quality I am still working on. It feels "solid"and stabilizing, though I wonder if I can hold it for long periods. Still it centers me emotionally in a similar way that breathing from deep in my abdomen (the hara I learned in martial arts) centers me physically. Will continue this through the long weekend when there is much work to be done in my house as I prepare to sell it.
Jose

---

by Judy

I too am finding much beauty in this week's exercise, plus a couple of results not quite expected viz; in attempting to transform annoyance and impatience into joy, the resultant felt more like humility. This is a useful indirect observation of pride in me. Maybe the immediate next task is to go deeper, to see where these unwanted qualities are coming from ? Perhaps recalling past experiences which may have praised pride/self-love (such as parental encouragement of a high self-esteem etc.) may shed some light. Or am I rationalising here..... ?
Thanks, Ian, for this exercise. It is most helpful.

Sincerely,
Judy.

---

by James F

when I first read this exercise, I thought this seems like a good idea, but why? In order for me to do something consciously I need to understand, at least theoretically, why I am doing it. For years I have used breathing as a method of relaxation and have seen its positive effects. But this exercise speaks of transforming, not relaxing. So most of the week I have been pondering on understanding how this exercise causes a transformation. None of my thoughts on this question clicked until this morning. I was reading Chapter nine (Chemical Factory) in Ouspensky's "Fourth Way." In that chapter, he speaks of the transformation of negative emotions into positive ones in our chemical factories. Then something in me said "aha, that's it."

I often struggle with feelings of fear, anxiety, and depression, and when I felt this understanding this morning, I also remembered one of my aims in the Work: The fruits of love, joy, peace, patience, compassion, self-control, mentioned in the Bible (Galations). Perhaps this exercise is one tool for me to obtain that aim by "chemically" transforming my fear, anxiety, and depression into joy and peace, etc.

So how does the solar plexus fit in? More pondering....

The "centers" are located in various places in the body. The Solar Plexus is one of those areas. My own experience is it is best to discover these for one's self. But there are plenty of works out there that give for strong hints.

That's good advice - to discover these for one's self.

The Solar Plexus is used in the exercise as a focal point for our attention. It is the traditional site for sacrifice and transformation by fire (Work Program week beginning 18 July 2005) and is called Manipura Chakra in yoga. The attention is then moved to the Heart and expanded to encompass the whole body. These locations are given as general indications; each person will have to discover what feels best for themselves.

The various emotions that we feel, both positive and negative, are experienced at various locations in the torso, from the groin to the throat. These are also locations that one should discover for oneself.

Thanks Harry, Ian. I never really gave much thought to different emotions or sensations being located in different parts of the body, but now that I think about it, this would certainly explain why everytime I "fell in love" (about once a week when I was younger; glad that's over), I felt a pain in my stomach area, and why when I do any kind of public speaking I like to loosen my tie.

Ian: I read "The Second Conscious Shock," but perhaps I should read it again.

This exercise was a variation of the previous weeks exercise. A companion characteristic to annoyance and impatience might be equanimity. Joy was a suggestion; it could be any of the higher emotions, and I think that humility would be an aspect of them all.

Yes, this type of exercise is very important and human life is such that there are endless opportunities to practice it.
Keep in mind that there are variations and various ways of expressing the instructions.
It is an octave of transformation. It is based on the laws of three and seven. See last weeks exercise.

Here are two simple questions for everyone -
How does Gurdjieff describe the process of the law of three in Beelzebub's Tales?
What other name does he give to that process?

Something to keep in mind when using visualizations is that they are mental constructions and do not necessarily correspond to reality. We must guard against our propensity to be hypnotised and to believe 'any-old-thing'. Fantasy and imagination are alluring traps.
'As-if' exercises can be useful but eventually we must go beyond 'as-if' to the place where we are; where I Am.
Use these techniques carefully, without any illusions that they are effective in and of themselves. The medium is not the message. Efforts are more important than results. The journey is more important than the goal. This is an Endless Search.

> Something to keep in mind when using visualizations is that they are mental constructions and do not necessarily correspond to reality.

Ian, the warning is a good reminder. This, then, seems an example of the use of psychological thinking, as distinct from sensory/literal thinking.

I do the exercise, utilising mental/psychological constructing, and inner visual imaging, in an attempt to transform unwanted negative emotions into positive ones. At present, this works very well for me in a relatively short time, so maybe I am "tricking" my machine into behaving more consciously? Then, in time, I'll be able to go beyond the "as if" trainer-wheels trick, and simply be what "I Am". ?

Nicoll (Commentaries vol v, pp 1570-1576) gives strong warnings and some hints regarding the necessity for keeping pschological thinking and literal thinking quite separate.
He talks of the Work being "psycho-transformism", and says that mixing pychological thinking with literal thinking is akin to getting mud on our Work-shoes, and smearing it in our eyes (to use his code-words).

So, to put the "as if" tachniques into perspective, I am using them as aids in transforming negative emotions, which of course must be used together with Self-observation, non-considering, non-identifying and Self-Remembering. These Work-ideas (plus others) are good leather for my Work-shoes, which I then have to try to walk through life in.(more code-words).

I am reminded here of a member's enlightening comments (thanks John) during the discussion of the sun in Chap 17 Beelzebub's Tales, where you Ian, also mentioned that this allegorical thinking useful. In that case too, what to the literal mind was obviously nonsense, became transformed when considered from the level of the psychological mind. What surprised me in that discussion was that I didn't remember to use psychological thinking from the start. Nicoll says we so often use the sensory mind that constant reminders are needed until our psychological mind gains strength, and that this state continues for many years until a reversal of priority becomes possible.

Judy,

Consider, also, that what seems nonsense might not be non-sense.

It's the middle of winter. A bright day. Temperature, oh let's say 10 degrees F. And you've parked your car out of the shade. So outside it's 10, but what is it in your car that has sat in the sun?

So what has heated in the car? Did the Sun heat the car? Or was the sun "activating" something else, which heated the car.

Then take this to the psychological level.

Harry

---

by Judy

Hi Harry,
Thanks for your reply. Is what you are hinting at something like this ?

Just as the planetary sun cannot heat by itself, that is, it has to "activate" the molecules of the atmosphere and then the metal etc. of the car, which then by various processes (radiation, conduction, convection to name a few) causes the actual heat, so, without the production of the required finer molecules from the action of the Work as conscious labour and intentional suffering, the sun in me has nothing to "activate", and so cannot heat to cause growth, or heat to melt the "icy" places on the surface of my being ?

Interesting dialog...

English anyone?
José

by James F

I agree Jose. Interesting. Wouldn't it be nice if we did have one universal language?

Interpretting words always seems to be a challenge. When I read Tales, I saw many parts that I thought made sense literally and other parts that made more sense allegorically. In New Man, Nicoll interprets the bible as a parable, with a hidden message. On the other hand, in ISM, Ouspensky describes a talk Gurdjieff gave about "sleep" in the New Testament. According to Ouspensky, Gurdjieff said people don't understand that when the New Testament mentions sleep, it is meant to be taken literally. So the question for me remains, when do I interpret words literally, and when do I look for a deeper meaning.

---

by Greg

James

The question might also be "How do I marry Heart and Mind to receive a word's/phrases deeper meaning"

Greg

---

by Jose

The "One language" I desire is clarity.

Too often the architectural density of jargon gets in the way of expressing what is Truth ("Hand wash hand" for ex.) Over the years I have learned many jargons specific to different "Truths" and frankly I have found, as I grow older, that if it cannot be expressed simply, it isn´t worth much of my time.

How do we "translate" 4th Way Work language into something practical where, especially in a realm like cyber space, clarity shines rather than the puffed-up pride of specialization?
José

p.s. Good to see you´re back Greg!

---

by James F

Yeah Jose, I'd definitely settle for clarity. And I do like simple. When I was heavily into studying christian theology, i came under the influence of one teacher/theologian who really impressed me. He liked to say: If you can't explain the meaning of the cross to a child, then you're missing it. Instead of all the fancy theological words like propitiation, expiation, and atonement, he preferred ideas such as reconcile. To him, the cross was a shock to wake us up. It's goal was to reconcile, or harmonize, us with God. He broke down atonement to mean: "at-one-ment," or being "One" with God. when I look back on that teacher's influence on me, I see how it helped me to continue seeking and eventually stumble onto the Fourth Way.

Greg, your heart/mind suggestion is perfect for me. Today I was reading something Gurdjieff said about having one center watch another, and how we should learn to listen with our feelings. I quote: "Begin to watch your mind: feel what you think. * * * You will never understand what I wish to convey if you merely listen." VFTRW, p. 264. Unfortunately though,

I'm in the same boat as before. How do I feel what I think!! lol. I can grasp the concept of having my thinking center watch my emotions, or thinking while I'm feeling. But how do I think, listen, or read with my emotions? When I ponder, it has always been with my mind, which I have always associated with thinking. I don't have a clue as to how to go about pondering/contemplating emotionally. Obviously, I have a long road to hoe.

Hi Harry,
It is certainly the surface of my being (psychological skin if you like), and the false part is rigid and cold etc.... In considering a solar system analogy, the possible idea of "planets" arose, and this fits quite well into the idea of lawful subservience of personality to essence etc. The ponderings continue..

Thank you very much for picking up on my limited understanding of Chapter 17 of Beelzebub's Tales, and taking the time to offer a couple of most helpful hints.

Try to become aware of the emotional import around what you're reading. My heart center filters/processes what I read by perceived intonation/tone/colorations of the text --- a product of the author's word choices/groupings. And keep an open heart and mind to all of this. Don't identify with those passing feelings but do register their "inflections" as they pass. Those feelings are a kind of food.

Jose

Thank you. Nice to be back.

I am in Brooklyn waaaaanderrrrrrrrrrrrrrring around. It's like being in a marvelous dream. After blocks and blocks of 19th century buildings and warehouses and very few people I came upon a yellow brick monster of a Russian Orthodox Church. It was quite a shock! The rock-solid yellow (with a shining copper dome newly refurbished) against an endless blue summer sky. It took my breath away. It all imposed quite a strong feeling (I can't tell you what it was, James F, in fact I don't want to fix it in a definition ----- feeling its power of Presence was enough) A tiny old woman smiled broadly and urged me to come inside. A Mass in preparation for the Feast of the Transfiguration had just begun. Clean smelling incense, nearly too much to bear, dusty old chandeliers, glittering icons. The summer day was way outside --- inside an Eternity.

The tentacles of my nervous system, first in retraction, now Reached.

Jose wrote:

We want to do the opposite. We want to translate our ordinary practical into the Work.

Why is All and Everything full of such complex language and strange formulations? Revisionist history? G. tells you in the beginning. Three things. "Destroy everything you thought you knew was true." (paraphrase)

That's where we begin.

And if you say Triamazikamno, then you have to think about it. You have to sound it out in your mind. Tri(a) three. Mazi. I don't know. Maze. make. Kamno. Came. ?.

I'm not sure. I read Holy Affirming. Holy Denying. Holy Reconciling.

Now I have three new ideas.

If I say God the Father. God the Son. God the Holy Spirit. What have I said? I've said: Here's this formulation all you good catholics learned as children on the priest's knee. You know what it means.

And of course you don't. Because they'd long ago forgotten what it meant.

Even if I say the Law of Three I begin to have "Aha, I know what that means." Like I know why a triangle is more important than a line? Or why those weirdos built pyramids?

The clarity is to make what G. and others have given into our personal Work. Not to translate it to our understanding. Because that's thinking about the Work from life. When we want to think about Life from the Work.

Heptaparaparshinokh is perfectly clear. Really. It is. As clear as a crucifix. Or a pyramid.

---

by Jose

Hello Harry,
I hear what you are saying but I still disagree.

G. tweaked the noses of some of Europe and the US´s finest intellectuals and used language deliberately to confound them (and us) and to force all to draw out the gold from the dross. But he repeatedly went back to examples from Mullah Nasser Eddin in order to show a more direct way of seeing and living. That I believe is no coincidence. In addition, he was a Greek-Armenian and had a wonderful sense of humor and loved Life zestfully,. Having known many Greeks and Armenians, none would say that the wooden, pompous air given G. as a "Master" reflected anything but the projections of others. No, I believe vitality and fullness were a greater part of his life and teachings and the deliberate obfuscation by technical jargon used by later generations of "Gurdjieffans" and seen here often as well, has nothing to do with the creation of greater Being and more to do with the flatulent self-inflation of "spiritual materialism."

Words are important but when they are used to differentiate those "in the inner circle" from those "out of the inner circle" then we are decidedly not talking about Awakening here. By the way, as I am sure you know, Bennett, who spoke Turkish did an admirable job of discerning where many of these words came from. But that is not the real point. I don´t Awaken to a Life that is separate from "Hand wash hand". No, I am to Awaken to a Higher way of living this life in all its messiness. That is one reason G. had these intellectuals (like Orage) dig ditches or tear down props and buildings they´s just completed, to get them in touch with the Real intersecting the plain and ordinary.

As I mentioned, I am here to learn and have benefitted immensely, but when we get wrapped up in the minutiæ of jargon, we are not Being or striving for such.
José

by Greg

I don't know whether or not I am on topic or off (I never am sure)

The visual shock received by the "unannounced" cathedral reminded me to "get through the looking-glass" onto the other side of the experience. Sure, from ordinary life standpoint I could tell you the names and the progression of what I saw, but that would be Ordinary (not Work standpoint)

The effort was to penetrate with all faculties of my organism an event of a solid -grounded-yellow-ness situated in moving -away -from- blueness encapsulating an acridly- perfumed-fragile -interior.

And even that is too specific

But the point: not the conditionally defined reaction (church and service) but the sensory journey. What is the "What" underneath/behind/beyond it all.

I hope this is not too obtuse or abstract.

Have you tried widening the spotlight of your attention to include your chest and belly?

---

by Jose

Right Ian...

What happens when my attentiveness rests in my belly? What "thoughts" come up? Or what happens when my attentiveness is focused from (not "on") my heart, or solar plexus, or throat? The what happens can be enormously powerful reminders of another way of "knowing". And, like Greg alluded to cannot be described within the framework of the regular thinking "self". THIS, and these kinds of "insights" remain for me among the most valuable 4th Way teachings.
José

by James F

"Widening the spotlight of my attention" is a thought provoking suggestion. It reminds me of a time I was trying to describe to a friend some experiences of heightened self-awareness I have had. I told him that after practicing observing myself and dividing my attention, I began to have experiences in which I felt like I like I was no longer seeing/living in "tunnel vision."

Maybe one day I will be able to widen my spotlight (divide my attention) to such a degree that I will have a field of awareness around myself all of the time. To be so aware of myself and the world around me, to be so conscious, that i could feel the subtlest vibrations of energy that came into contact with me, would be amazing. If I could only stop identifying so much!

Where is the location of the focal point or the source point of attention? Scientifically, it would seem to be the brain. Is it a 'point' or an area, or a volume? Can we move the focal point outside the body? Or would that be imagination, an 'as-if' outside the body? Does this have something to do with seeing ourselves objectively? Of not being identified?

---

by Jose

Excellent Ian!
Exactly...Is the "outside" world "out there" because "I" am "in here"? Is there a fundamental difference? Why do I feel it so?

These are basic Buddhist psychology questions--basic not as in simple but as in fundamental and we studied this over and over again, combining it with exercises to attempt to answer such.

Some of the Dzogchen/Mahamudra "pointing out" exercises are direct attempts to shake us into opening up to a Realization that is pre-ontological, pre-conceptual. Is this "imagination"? Based on my own experiences, no. What can it do for me, or how can it aid me in my life?---these are Work questions and why I feel the two systems complementary...

English anyone?
José

Hello Jose,
As I was involved in the dialogue, a brief reply is in order.
This dialogue was legitimate work on Knowledge for me; more specifically, it concerns acquiring understanding of material left for us by G regarding "World-Creation and World-Maintenance". I appreciate Harry's help very much. It not only assisted me with the knowledge itself, but also pointed a way for me to apply it to myself. Knowledge and Being unite to form understanding, we are told (Nicoll).
This is new knowledge, and it is huge. Of course I would love it to be simple, but clarity for me is by working through its complexities (I'm not sure to which words you refer, but, yes, it is like learning a new language.) Then the words have crystal-clear meaning for me.
Re the limitations of cyberspace, I mention that our Online Work Group is my only Group at present, and really, don't you think that it will be what we make it ? I am finding it a safe place to allow myself to be a little vulnerable, and ask questions which may be extremely basic to other members. At least by sharing, we are "giving back" as best we can.
This is pretty-much where I was coming from.

Best wishes,
Judy.

by Jose

Hello Judy,
And welcome aboard! There is no need to explain to me nor to feel defensive. I was simply yawning...

You see, I too am a beginner and this is my only Work Group as well. I believe that if this group is to Work successfully then we must see ourselves not merely facing a screen alone and seing a small picture of the one person we are "talking" to, but as if we were in a room all together with comments being shared and others around us witnessing the exchange. Some threads of discussion will be immensely satisfying to me and not to others. Other threads will be quite helpful for you and provide little of substance for me. In that case, I would probably just yawn...

And if asked about it I would state clearly that though I have spent an inordinate amount of my time in the past 5 years studying the Work and writings of G., and that includes trying to master the intricacies of a specialized language, because of my previous life exposure to Buddhism (over 30 years now) I am desirous of something that not only engages me practically but that can do so in a manner directly and with some clarity. I object when discussions get to "far out there" because I do not find them helpful over all and frequently get the sense that they are being used to show off one´s familiarity with the jargon of 4th Way esoteric thought.

Certainly I could be wrong and you and all are welcome to object--this Group is for ALL of us, after all. But by bearing the unpleasant (for me, for you, etc.) manifestations of others we can transform our own little understandings into something Higher and the conflict, the little tension that does occur may prove helpful to those witnessing the disagreements. There is nothing "personal" in that sense, each of us bring to this Group a set of skills and interests, backgrounds and styles and when something goes "wrong", like one of my "corns" get stepped on, then I need to pay attention even more. I may still yawn, however...

Hello Jose,
Oh,yawning.....

Now, Harry, perhaps this is me and my limitations but all this is mud to me. To assert a bit of what I hope will be taken as constructive criticism: sometimes when you are explaining from that incredibly reflexive Mind of yours, I feel that you are talking in terms that you understand (plainly enough), but the rest of us are a bit in the dark. In the above, you lose me.

When JG Bennett offers "I put three together" that's giving me something.

Are you saying "I=Holy Affirming, MAKE=Holy Denying, THREE=Holy Reconciling"?

I am not asking you to dumb things down, I need more clarity. The above is, for me, explaning a code with another code. Your Understanding of all of this deserves a clearer statement.

All of us on this Forum probably have some difficulty with talking "from a bubble" --- our Isolation (more or less). It behooves us to try to be as clear as possible. (There's a Work exercise for us all There!)

When I am referencing the Arts (my background), I have to remember that I cannot assume there to be an immediate understanding when I bring up a name or art movement --- that is largely a marginalised and (therefore) culturally arcane world in and of itself. That is the corner I come from and I have to remember to translate generically as much as is possible. If I do not do that, in any form, I would hope that someone stops me. I do wish to be understood as much as is humanly possible.

Judy, thank you for your intelligent questioning. I much appreciate it.

Jose, I'll yawn a bit with you ---- the obfuscating language wears me out a bit too. It sometimes smacks of a lack of Trust (to me) and I feel we need to help each other to GET ON WITH IT. And most of the time, we do.

As always, with such subjective statements , the above is simply, personal feeling and opinion.

Thank you.

I'm new to this board and the Fourth Way, so maybe I'm talking too much. Though considering there are over 200 members and only a small number of those post regularly, I think I can safely conclude that isn't the case.

I also don't know enough to understand when the discussion is too technical or too abstract, or too whatever. But I do know that if you all don't share your thoughts about Fourth Way ideas in some form or another, I'm not going to profit. I like to profit. And I have profitted from this discussion. I have gained something from everyone's comments, ideas, and suggestions. So I just hope you all continue to post in the future, and that those who are viewing, but not discussing, start to contribute to the discussions.

James

by Harry

Greg, Jose,

My explanation is "stream of consciousness". Reflexive, if you will.

All and Everything is written in a complete language. It is not dour and boring. In fact it is often quite funny and too the point. (I.e. Mr. BellyButton and his fellow "money" makers.)

My primary point is that we can not take the Work and translate it into our life. Yes that is the temptation. But we are given this as an experience. Even the reading is an experience, something that must be "worked through".

We are given what O. calls the Law of 3. G. calls it Triamazikamno. Why didn't G. just call it the Law of 3? I believe that the word is created on purpose. It's created as a "stop exercise". It forces the reader to stop and sound out the word, and, hopefully find a meaning beyond just a word.

If we study these words we begin to see G's thinking. Much like reading some of cummings' poetry, which must be read aloud or pieced together. These "concrete" and "sound" poems have to be experienced. Because it is only in putting them together in our own minds that we experience cummings' mind.

Sure saying the Law of 7 may be practical. Or calling it the Law of the Octave. Or the Color Wheel, if you will. Yet Heptaparaparshinokh is the word G. uses. I'm not saying that it doesn't help to understand by reading about the Law of 7 or the Law of Octaves in other sources. But G. is clear that Heptaparaparshinokh and Triamazikamno belong together.

I remember when I first started this. I got into all of O's descriptions about Hydrogens and Carbons and Oxygens and started drawing up massive tables trying to fit those descriptions into what I knew as a one time Chemistry major who abandoned the Science for Theatre. Mr. Nyland responded that all of my calculations wouldn't get me anywhere.

Later I comprehended that I was pouring new wine into old barrels.

The practicality is breathing. And seeing when there are three forces at work. And stepping aside. Stepping outside. And G. starts that by forcing us to step aside when we read his descriptions.

I'm very drawn to Nicoll, because I was previously drawn to Jung, before I ever met this Work. Nicoll will answer me, by reading his commentaries at random. But when I really contemplate I find more and more that I must go back to what G was describing. Sometimes just the image of the enneagram. 3+7=9?

I'm not trying to be ellusive. But my experience is that the experience is important.

Hopefully this is clearer obsfucation.

Harry

---

by Greg

Thank you, Harry. That is all extremely clear.

I personally feel you need to think about writing a book. "I know, I know" there are ENOUGH Work books out there. Unlike many of them, you have a particularly valuable way of guiding.

When FINNEGAN'S WAKE's code was initially cracked (TALK about the realm of free association!!!) Joseph Campbell had to use very grounded, very earthbound language to help the reader in. Of course, it still remained Joseph Campbell's viewpoint --- and it could be argued, therefore, another obfuscation.

I tend to agree with Jose (if this is indeed his point) that too many writers in the Fourth Way literature put up more roadblocks of their own in the name of "explanation". To me it comes off as just alot of "spiritual cockteasing"

But, when you, Harry, told me that the words conjured by Gurdjieff are "stops" you added to my knowledge. Of course, they are --- what could be clearer? And yet, until you said it I never realised what was right in front of my face.

Thanks for clearing things up.

I must point out that though there are over 200 registered members, the great majority of those are not subscribed to the on-line work group, but merely have access to the public forum.

The on-line work group has a small core of regular posters. We also have a transient population of people who sign up for a trial period and then leave without becoming a permanent member. ---

by Jose

Hello Harry, et.al.,
I have carefully read the recent posts again and thought I´d try to reply from the heart...

As I see it, when we try hard to understand something, the effort we put in can grant us an Understanding far deeper than that contained ostensibly in the words we read or ideas we attempt to fathom. I get that. As well, there are works, like Beelzebub´s Tales, that contain within them deep Truths about humankind, human nature and the possibilities of Higher Being.

But I still disagree.

The Work must be made for humans and not humans for the Work (ala Jesus´"the sabbath..." etc.). When certain "Truths" are made too difficult then they become suspect as Truths.

My original point is partly that Law of Octaves and Law of Three (or Seven) works fine. Triamazikamno, it is said, simply means "I put three together" in colloquial Greek (Bennett, Gurdjieff: Making A New World, page135). I gain nothing by clutchintg onto this word (or others like it) as if it were some mantra infused with magical properties.

Beelzebub´s Tales, in my opinion, is sometimes boring and dull and terribly turgid. So what? It is also filled with meaning and Higher Truth. Same can be said for any number of sacred texts, simply because they were written by humans, who are both capable of the sublime as well as the slimy.

The Stop! exercise aspect to BT is a lovely way to put it and I think therein lies our common understanding. Were I to give you the Truth as I know it based on my own feeble understanding of it, it might sound silly, trite or meaningless. Seeing my 5 year old daughter today play soccer outside, in all her awkward glory drew from me tears of joy that are inexpressible...and has more Meaning and impact for me...and Love...than any sacred text I have ever read. Why? Because it evoked from me something of the Higher, something that I could never have reached on my own.

Yes, BT, and other writings have that capacity as well. But when we now, while speaking to each other, use language too encoded with anothers meaning and too specialized then neither my head nor my heart are really reached. And, this is not the case, all the time. My point is that in attempting to arrive at Higher Truth we remember that one hand must wash the other and part of the meaning of that simple story G. gave was that WE must help each other.

I hope that clarifies what I was trying to say...
José

by James F

[quote="Ian

Here are two simple questions for everyone -
How does Gurdjieff describe the process of the law of three in Beelzebub's Tales?
What other name does he give to that process?[/quote]

Ian, I haven't found these questions simple.

From the chapter "The Holy Planet Purgatory" I get the following: First, the law of three is a continual process in which the higher desires(?) in me blend with the lower to actualize in me a new lower that is a little higher than the previous lower desire(?). I take this to mean that I grow by steps, very gradually. So much for the Way of the Sly Man where I just swallow a pill.

Second, a complete understanding of the law of three (and the law of seven) in myself enables me to ponder on the true sense, meaning, purpose of my existence, and existence in general, in the midst of both favorable and unfavorable outside influences (irritations, disappointments).

Third, the end result is that I obtain the "Divine property" of impartiality.
I see some kind of a connection between Impartiality and not identifying and not considering.

This is my take. I can definitely see a connection between the law of three and the breathing exercise.

James

by James F

Well that attempt at "quoting" didn't turn out like I thought it would.

---

by Harry

James,

The Higher blends with the Lower to actualize the Middle, thus becoming either Higher for the subsequent Lower; or Lower for the Subsequent Higher. (paraphrased from memory) This is something to meditate on. I'm not sure it is ever understandable in Words, except when I have an "ah ha moment" and realize that something or someone has been a reconciling force or an active force.

The important point here is that three forces are involved in any "event". There has to be a third side for something to exist beyond a line.

They aren't all always within you. In fact many of the forces we live with have nothing to do with our "being". That's the point of Self-Observation.

One reason to try to see an opposite is to realize that forces aren't exactly what we think they are. For example: Is Hate the opposite of Love? Is Anger the opposite of Affection?

How does understanding the Law of Three and the Law of Seven lead to impartiality? I think that understanding helps push us in that direction. But how? Not for an answer, but again for thought.

by James F

Thanks Harry. Perhaps I should have written that I read G. to say: an understanding of the laws WILL enable me to ponder the true sense of existence while in the midst of favorable or unfavorable outside influences. Right now, I don't really understand the meaning/purpose of my existence or the laws. For instance, how exactly does my self-perfecting lighten the burden of the suffering of his ENDLESSNESS. I have some vague intellectual ideas, but emotionally, I'm not really getting it. I tend to agree that understanding the words (intellectually) isn't going to do it.

Sometimes reading G. is (for me) like reading Kant. Very abstract. From what I remember, (it's been a while), Kant was not much for giving concrete examples of his ideas. Frustrated the heck out of me. So right now, I'm looking for examples of the law of three in life. For instance, I have a friend I go out to eat with. I like a particular restaurant and she doesn't like it. So we usually don't go there. Tonight I said let's ask your daughter if she wants to go to this place to eat. I knew she would want to. And we did. Her daughter was another (third?) force entering in and influencing the result. Is this an example of the law of three? I don't know.

As for how does understanding the laws lead us to impartiality? It's interesting that you brought that up, because that is exactly the question I was left with when I ended my inquiry. I equate impartiality with being all-centers balanced in the midst of praise or criticism, pleasure or pain, happiness or sadness, courage or fear, etc. But how does understanding the laws lead to impartiality? Perhaps it is like this: when I TRULY understand the laws, I will understand the sense of my existence. And when I understand the reason for my existence, I will know how to stay impartial. And when the Divine Property of Imparitality is part of my being, maybe then I will understand how I lighten the suffering of his Endlessness. Whew! That was a mouthful.

In any event, I'm still not really sensing the significance of these fundamental Cosmic Laws.

James,

You quoted a series of dichotomies. What is the "third point" in each of those conflicts?

This isn't really in response to your post, but to the thread in general: The enneagram is a diagram of a machine. It is an intentionally broken machine. And it represents both individual life, and life on earth. (Pain Factory).

What part are you in the machine at any given moment?

It's also beneficial to meditate on the form of the enneagram. It is really a nine pointed star. But it has been altered. G. describes how it was altered. One point dishormanized, the other shortened. Which had another effect. Meditate on it and find the pentagram. There is a five point star in there as well.

I believe Jose mentioned something about the mechanical. Much of this is mechanics. What we call psychology is really mechanics. It may even be that what we call Love is mechanics. (G. describes this as well.)

Sometimes it is easier to see others' mechanics. Our boss. Our spouse. Our children. But we have to see our own. And then the World's. Is George W. Bush an "evil man" or just another "cog in the machine"? But what is that machine? And should I even care?

Harry

---

by Jose

Harry, I enjoyed your responses here.

Lately I have been seriously contemplating the enneagram and desirous of more study and you are helping keep that question of what does it mean/signify close to the bone, so to speak.

The use of the "incomplete" enneagram, the 6 points only as represented in the movie Meetings...also has pulled me. I have thought that WE are to complete it. We insert the final triangle with the development of our Being. The "machine" works only when we Work and then the machine begins to be transformed, away from a so called "man" in quotes, to a Real wo/man. But that effort is up to us.

James, re: how does our efforts lighten the burden of His Endlessness? Well, who is His Endlessness? What does That mean? And what happens when, in any system, the one part not working properly begins to suddenly fulfill its "mission" and work well? The whole begins to work well, no? You might want to check out the Bennett book I referred to in an earlier post (Gurdjieff, Making A New World)which (in addition to High Priests, Quantum Genes by Michael Hayes) explained this process well to me.

I like the idea that the enneagram is a diagram of a cosmos, or of a living being. Not every type of machines can be described with the enneagram.

---

by Harry

Anton,

A cosmos is a machine.

All physical things function according to certain laws. The two primary laws are The Law of Three and The Law of Seven. The enneagram is a diagram of how these laws function together. And how they were altered.

Most machines never get beyond Mi.

But that is already part of the Law of Seven.

A shock is necessary.

I must first recognize the machine. I must first put the carriage, horse and driver in order.

I don't know where else to put this . Since it goes along with my gratitude to Harry for his contributions (not to embarass him) ---

Harry mentioned a book to all of us awhile back called THE CIPHER OF GENESIS by Carlo Suares. I am happy to report that Samuel Weiser's has just reprinted it.

It is, as Harry suggested, an excellent companion for those of us who are interested in the material in Maurice Nicoll's THE NEW MAN and THE MARK. Unlike those two books, I find this denser and more difficult to fathom ---- both pluses.

Thanks, Harry. What a book!

Whenever you find yourself hypnotised by an identification with a trait or an attitude, sense the presence of your body and breath. Consider an opposite trait or attitude. Float into the midcourse of an all-centers-encompassed calm, quite inner state.

---

Ian,

Would you say that eventually you skip the "opposite"?
Or, perhaps, it really doesn't matter to see the "opposite", as much as reaching that balanced state? Breath.

Harry

What I´ve done Ian, is, as I understood it, floated the "opposite" trait into my center and held it there. This has had two effects: comforting at times, at other times confusing...
José

Harry,

Certainly the balanced state is the goal. Whether one has to always consider the 'opposite' would depend ones self knowledge and experience in the Work and the ease with which one can see their unbalanced states. One wouldn't recognize their unbalanced state unless at some level there was a contrast.
In any case, the act of considering the opposite is a small affirmative effort that can assist in floating us above being identified.
Breath? Yes, always.

That can be good, because it means we are experiencing a conflict that needs to be resolved, reconciled.

Right...I think what you say has Truth in it. So as I "wrestle" with the confusion piece I have not yet figured out a way to "resolve" it. Do I merely wait? What I have noticed is how quickly into the confusion times I retreat into forgetfulness again. Tricky...

Morning exercise: Quiet meditation or sitting. Relax and quiet the three centers and watch the breath. Keep the eyes open and use the Sightless Gaze.

Daily exercise 1: Whenever you are walking during the day, use the 12 Joint Exercise. At every outbreath step, move your attention to the next joint in the sequence below. While sensing each joint, intone inwardly or gently under the breath, the AIEIOIUOA.

1. Right wrist
2. Right elbow
3. Right shoulder
4. Left hip
5. Left knee
6. Left ankle
7. Right ankle
8. Right knee
9. Right hip
10. Left shoulder
12. Left wrist

Daily exercise 2: Take a routine task (eg. washing dishes, making bed, cooking, eating) and perform it with great care, slowly and deliberately, being aware of each motion. Allow a feeling of gratitude to arise for having an opportunity to help lighten the burden of suffering of His Endlessness.

---

by Greg

The joint exercise ---- "The Horror, the Horror" ---- talk about doing what It doesn't want to do!

When I began formal training in modern dance I started in a technique devised by Merce Cunningham. Part of its training is to over and over again isolate body parts by rotating joints in succession. "This isn't Dance" It used to state adamently! "This is mechanics! Machinery! Intellectual crap imposed on the body!"

I went for a technique that encourage flow and dealing with my body as an organic Whole.

While I still believe in the value of what I went for (and that is my Ordinary life --- no matter how extraordinary the Dance can be) the STOP induced by the joint exercise is an excellent Work effort for me. It challenges me down to my very "belief system" to work against the grain.

Try this exercise walking Uptown 5th Avenue in Manhattan during evening rush hour!

Greg

I like the twelve joint exercises, because there is a flow there. I don't know if I've mentioned this before, but it always seems natural to me to move from the twelve joints to the spine to finish each sequence.

Yesterday I had loads of stuff to carry up the steps. Used this exercise to transform the phsyical task. Very helpful.

As to AIEIOIUOA, again I'm not sure if I've mentioned this before, but does anyone else find this as three dipthongs followed by three vowels? I. I. (or A) "oi". U. O. A. ?

---

by Judy

> As to AIEIOIUOA, again I'm not sure if I've mentioned this before, but does anyone else find this as three dipthongs followed by three vowels? I. I. (or A) "oi". U. O. A. ?

Interesting, Harry.
I used this exercise while struggling with an infected tooth on Tuesday night. Together with the 12 joint exercise, and substituting alternately-moving index and middle-finger for walking steps (I was lying down), and the way it happened for me, was;

A*-I-E*-I-O*-I-U*-O-A* (the * indicates the letter with the accent).

This worked very well indeed to separate from the pain, so much so that I used it till I slept.

So I'm wondering if there is a recommended way to sound this, or if it is as you find it, maybe varying with different rates of breathing ?

Judy.

by Greg

Judy,

I am accenting in the same way as yourself with the exception of a slight rise on the final O-A, with a "hold" before beginning again.

Last night, sitting in a lecture, I noticed that my eyesight was beginning to sharpen. Details not noticed before were coming into focus. Towards the end of the lecture I apprehended a well-defined energy field outlining the bodies of each of the presenters. I wasn't looking at them dead-on straight but slightly off to the side. This "dawned" on my visual sense and I held it my maintaining a certain state of vision. One field was barely there. The other was approximately 5 inches wide and firm. Both a neon white-gold in color (the men were sitting against a grass-cloth covered background with spotlights from a high ceiling above). Interestingly, the lecturer with the narrower field had psychologically taken command of the proceedings in the beginning. In retrospect, he may have used up most of his energy in the first 15 minutes as well. The presentation in the last half by the other speaker was measured and "present".

Returning home, I continued investigation of this taking in details of cloth binding on a book, grain in paper, light on surface of the wall across the room. I allowed my sight to "reside" in the object in front of me.

All of the above is related to a relaxation of the eyeball through the Sightless Gaze.

So much of this Work has been for me stopping and taking in at a more deliberate rate. There is nothing out-of-the-ordinary about the above --- it came out of a natural progression. My suspicion is that mechanical habit blocks this kind of seeing.

Any comments would be appreciated.

Greg

by James F

I've been pronouncing each letter separately as follows: " A*I - E*I - O*I - U*OA " (accent on *). I've also noticed that every third or fourth exhale is shorter than the others. On the short exhale breath, I feel the need to inhale again quicker than on the other breaths.

At first it was hard to get a rhythm going, it seemed like I was trying to learn how to play the drums. But after some practice, things began to flow. On the negative side, I found "AIEIOIUOA" mechanically flowing through my mind even when I wasn't walking, like when I hear music and it continually reverberates in my mind long after I'm no longer in contact with it.

Greg: Your experience inspired me to do some quick research on human vision. I found some interesting stuff concerning the cones and rods and how science views their operation. I believe G. talks about sensitivity to color in Tales as well. On the psychological side, and I think Nicoll brought this out, if I look directly at life, it is absurd. (The curse of Medussa?) Looking away from all the hypnotic attractions in (desires of my senses/physical body) enables me to see a different view.

I have tried slowing down while doing things such as making coffee, and wow, painful. James already "knows" how to make coffee very quickly and efficiently.

As for meditating in the morning: groggy. I'm in the habit of meditating in the evening. I'm pondering if meditating in the morning is more beneficial than meditating in the afternoon.

James

---

by Harry

Greg,

I've had some similar experiences. In fact, going into a meditative state I can pretty well repeat the visual experiences. I'm not sure the significance. Sometimes I think the light show can be a distraction. Sort of watching fireworks. Perhaps it is preparation for the future.

My son was recently in Seattle at a conference and described somewhat the same thing you've described. In addition he described watching the emanations of the beings below as he looked down from the Space Needle.

For me, one way to slow down is cooking. It's interesting to chop vegetables, etc. Cutting tomatos, for example, according to how the cells are divided. Slicing with precision.

As to the concept of James knows how to make coffee, I think that's a pretty good description. And when James needs to make coffee, or drive a car, or negotiate a contract. . .then James should do those things. Stepping outside of them can help with growth. But James shouldn't stop using the mechanical skills that have been developed. Babe Ruth would never have hit 60 home runs if he thought about his swing. (And hot dogs are better than steroids.)

I think there are times when we should allow the machine to do what it has been trained to do. Instinctive/moving center is far quicker than our ability to intervene. But we shouldn't make coffee with our emotions. Or while thinking about Iraq.

Harry

---

by Greg

Harry,

Yes, I agree it really is mostly a "distraction" --- of what use is it for me Today and Now. Not much.

Greg

by James F

I understand, from experience, the danger of distractions, but isn't there also the danger of dismissing phenoma that could be valuable in one's search? In the chapter on Art, G says:

"Before continuing to speak about in which way those terrestrial learned beings then indicated various fragments of knowledge in their combinations of various colors, one fact concerning what I am just relating must be noticed--a fact definitely distressing for those favorites of yours and which was also obtained in their presences on account of the same abnormal forms of their daily existence established by them themselves." * * * "But if the three-brained beings complete the perfecting of their highest part, their perceiving organ of visibility thereby acquires the sensibility of what is called 'Olooestesnokhnian sight,' then they can already distinguish two-thirds of the total number of tonalities existing in the Universe, which number * * *." BT, p. 468 - 470.

According to the modern science I have read, the cones of our eyes are in the center and the rods on the sides. The cones are more sensitive to color. Could not the lower sensitivity to color that modern science measures in our eye's rods be due to a mechanical use of our sense of vision? And could not the practice of a sightless gaze possibly increase the rod's sensitivy? Just a thought.

James

---

by Greg

James writes:

> And could not the practice of a sightless gaze possibly increase the rod's sensitivy? Just a thought.

Yes, James. That is along the lines of what I am wondering about, too. And thank you for bringing up the cones and rods in the first place --- that "shocks" me back into a more constructive viewpoint.

You see, left to my own habits, I will forget the wastefulness of my Daydreamer who likes to repeat the experience over and over again ALL DAY LONG.

What I liked the other night was being able to follow the process (relatively) point by point. Like sensing a muscle as it slowly contracts or releases. That "following" taught me something about a different way the eye might perceive.

Hi

Biochemically speaking, the pigments within our eys are bleached by light and this bleaching is part of the initial nerve impulse that sends the image to be processed within the brain.
this is a massive over-simplification.
the bleaching of the pigments and their return to the original non-bleached state is gradual and thus creates a superimposition over new images entering (stare at a bright scene and then close your eyes for a couple minutes to watch the pigments change spectrally). This is a little like a visual echo - very srong under the influence of psychedelics - and can partially explain many visual (and hallucinatory) phenomena.

There are however other explanantions - some of which are described by marshall mcluhan - to do with the evolution of mankind, and how sight and hearing have swapped roles. basically, when we perform 'sightless gaze', our eyes act like ears, they begin to listen, become passive/receptive - and this is directly linked to a similar shift psychologically and a definite expansion of consciousness. we become more open to finer influences, supesceding the survival instinct that normally dominates the senses - we 'tune in', ironically, by losing focus we no longer contract around a single object.

By intentionally increasing our peripheral visual perceptions, focusing our hearing on the mix of environmental sounds, and placing awarness on our bodies in physical space, whilst following the breath, a natural reallignment of the centers occurs.

This weeks 12 joints exercise I have worked on regularly and still find it the most challenging of the ones posted. Though initially I hated it (!) I now enjoy the struggle, but I remain in the "counting" mode, that is, I just can´t find a "simple" way to do it and feel as if I am always counting off the joints, one at a time and not having anything "higher" involved.

The "sightless gaze", and the discussions that followed, I have enjoyed immensely. It is more "easily" done for me as it is almost exactly the same as a Tibetan meditation I have done and taught for a number of years called "sky gazing". It´s used to train the mind at relinquishing it´s self-centered-ness and establishing an openness (another name for it) which enables us to participate in a much "wider" consciousness. I am less fixated on the little slings and arrows "I" feel normally subjected to and insteadsense a greater transparency to the tightly constructed "I" I normally live with. Linking it with physical sensing again makes it a unique 4th Way contribution and I learn much about how rarely I was ever truly "in my body".

Cooking and washing dishes were a big part of this week anyway and I chose them as my slowly and deliberately activities, much to the pleasure of the "I" who is patient and to the distress of the "I" who isn´t...

These visual effects are quite common with the sightless gaze. I agree with the scientific explanation of the effect based on how the eye works. Basically, staring in one direction for a long time is like over exposing a film.
Some people will try to tell you that you are seeing auras. I am rather sceptical of that, but it could be possible for some people. (After all, some animals can see infra red and ultra violet.)

The effect can be seen around in-animate objects as well as people. It works best if there is a lot of contrast between figure and ground. If one persists, the world can appear to turn into a blaze of light.

Another interesting effect can be had if one does the sightless gaze on a lawn. The blades of grass will coalesce into little clumps arranged in a geometric grid, most likely determined by the arrangement of rods and cones.

Equally, meditating with closed eyes can yield its own show of light and images.

I liked the exercise with performing a small task slowly and accurately. My machine ("the robot", as we call it in our Moscow group) has its own pace for any automatical action and slowing it down creates friction. I noticed the "reverberations" in my solar plexus almost any time I tried to do this exercise.

My thinking center has some problem with the aieioiuoa sound as it doesn't understand it. Is it some type of mantra that has to work on my subconscious mind, or is it anything else? I found this word in Beelzebub but there it is a name for one of cosmic processes or laws...

Aieioiuoa is a word G used in the Tales to refer to Remorse of Conscience ---
""As regards the second peculiarity of the 'Omnipresent-Okidanokh,' equally proper to it alone, and which it is also necessary for us to elucidate just now for the given theme of our talk, you will be able to understand about that, only if you know something concerning one fundamental cosmic second-degree law, existing in the Universe, under the denomination of the 'Sacred Aieioiuoa.'
"And this cosmic law is, that there proceeds within every arising large and small, when in direct touch with the emanations either of the Sun Absolute itself or of any other sun, what is called 'Remorse,' that is, a process when every part that has arisen from the results of any one Holy Source of the Sacred Triamazikamno, as it were, 'revolts' and 'criticizes' the former unbecoming perceptions and the manifestations at the moment of another part of its whole-a part obtained from the results of another Holy Source of the same fundamental sacred Cosmic Law of Triamazikamno.
"And this sacred process Aieioiuoa or 'Remorse' always proceeds with the 'Omnipresent-Active-Element-Okidanokh' also." BT page 141

The word Aieioiuoa is sometimes used in exercises as a chant to help divert the mind from its usual habitual inner talk. I am not sure that G intended it to be used as a mantra or that its sound frequencies have any particular effect on our subconscious mind - (I think G prefered to call it the unconscious) - at least no more effect than any other mantra has. They all serve to quiet down our usual inner talk and emotions. If one contemplates the meaning of a mantra while one chants it, it may lead the mind and emotions towards and understanding and feeling of the meaning. In the case of Aieioiuoa, this has to do with Remorse of Conscience.
In ancient times, vowell sounds were sacred and were not written down. In Hindu mantra yoga it is believed that the sounds of mantras do have a spiritual effect quite apart from any intellectual understanding of the mantra.

Eat one meal a day in silence. Be mindful of the tastes, smells, sensations, sights and sounds of eating.
When the meal is finished, give thanks with a consciously breathed AIEIOIUOA.

When bathing, sense the water on the skin. Imagine washing away your physical, emotional and mental tensions. Visualize them flowing down the drain. Ponder - What use do my tensions serve?

When using your computer, be aware of your finger tips and your breathing.

Periodically practice the Sightless Gaze 'as-if' you had no head.

In the evening, sit quietly in meditation. Relax the three centers. Watch the breath. Use a sightless gaze and soundless sound to absorb impressions without identifying, labeling or judging them. Allow the impressions to collect in the marrow of the bones.

by James F

Ok Ian, I give. What purpose do tensions serve? When I first thought about this question, my initial thought was "absolutely none." I'm equating tension with stress/disharmony, and I find stress to be harmful to my organism.

As I pondered further, however, it occurred to me that tension often alerts me of danger. So that is one beneficial purpose I can see for tension. At least when the danger is physical, I think tension is useful. But I've also noticed that most of the tension I feel results from dangers my ego perceives. For example, James doesn't like to be treated "unjustly." When someone acts "unjustly" towards James, tension arises. It is astonishing how I feel tension now. I used to believe my tension was in my thinking center, but now I see it is my emotional center reacting to these perceived injustices. This tension is usually accompanied/followed by "internal considering."

I have pondered considering a lot this week, and I'm beginning to become convinced that if I did not internally consider under any and ALL circumstances, not only would I be more at peace, but I would also BE more. This might sound very basic, but for me it has been an incredibly profound realization. I'm also optimistic about advancing in this area because I am able to see it happening most times now right when it starts.

Considering in me usually starts with a shock, when someone says or does something that I don't expect and don't think is right/just. I'm thankful that I can at least see this much.

As an aid to combat considering, I have been consciously breathing and mentally repeating to myself: "You are in prison and condemned to death. The only thing that you need to concern yourself with is escaping from prison before the Executioner comes to get you!" The Executioner could come at any time. When I remember this, It puts my silly considering into perspective.

Visualizing my tensions going down the drain while showering has been relaxing. At the same time, however, I have been amazed at how quickly my attention starts drifting down the drain as well. It doesn't take long before my thoughts are way off somewhere else, and "I" am no longer there taking a shower.

James

---

by Greg

My tensions serve a great deal of "armouring" (physically/mentally/emotionally) against a World I'd rather not deal with. That is the one that exists just outside of my skin. ALL of it. I am in deep "hatredfear" of it. It is alien --- strange and unfamiliar to the Core Me. It is primarily offensive to (any shred of) a sense of Unity that "It" insists on subverting by pigeonholing everything in the subdivision of Five Senses. Therefore, the reality outside of my skin is perceived as scattershot, partial, abstracted, frightening, un-Real. My survival instinct, rather than take the Time to sense towards an underlying cohesiveness of these parts "hardens" against it. And of course, many many times, in this mechanical act, "It" has to.

Do I need tensions? Yes. Tensions by themselves are a neutral thing. Physically, muscularly, I need states of tension to move, express myself gesturally. Verily, I need a certain about to simply stand up straight.

Psychologically, in the shower, sensing the tensions of the mechanical self rinse and wash down the drain, I must maintain a tension of a rising Attention which moves up through the Down-flowing.

Without the above-mentioned tension, there isn't any friction. Without Friction? There isn't any Work.

Periodically practice the Sightless Gaze 'as-if' you had no head.

Hello All,
The other parts of this week's exercise went as expected, so I'll simply comment on the above.

I had zero expectations with this. Just gave it a try. Focus moved itself immediately to the solar plexus area with a noticeable "thump", and images of swirlings in a sort of sphere occurred. Then the thoughts took over again. This happened every time attempted. Once, the body kicked in with some tingling before the head took focus back.
I had it in mind to take no notice of this, as the machine did it; no conscious action from me. However, on reflecting, this exercise seems to have "woken-up" the emotional center for me, and perhaps even stirred the moving/instinctive. Looks like the subconscious/unconscious took very little notice of the "as if". This is useful, as head likes to be the boss in me.
Thanks Ian.

As always, comments welcome.
Best wishes,
Judy.

Hello James,
As this is my first reply to you, welcome. I am enjoying your posts. As always, we all benefit from other's questions and points of view, as I'm sure you've found.

I have been working on this facet of internal considering, negative emotions, non-identifying etc. for about three years (using Nicoll as the primary guide). He answered me in these areas, and gave enough hints to allow safe work (I was working alone then.) This was perhaps the main reason for choosing this area initially. It was something I could pursue alone without harm.
What has happened for me is that I certainly have more energy since that leak is less, and I feel a kind of dryness and indifference where a lot of these negatives are concerned. As if I am not much interested in being negative anymore. Situations where I felt I had every right to be upset, now seem gaudy and not worth taking personally. This means I am better able to see if the situation warrants attention without getting emotionally involved. I use awareness of the breath, plus the Holy Affirming prayer, so quite a similarity to your method. Another choice was to look at these events objectively (considered in relation to the object), rather than subjectively (existing in the mind), and this takes a lot of the sting out of them for me. Mostly, though not always, I just watch them passing by.

So your optimism here is well-founded. It has been a very useful facet of the Work for me. It's quite liberating to know one has a right not to be negative.
Nicoll is not the current primary study. I've switched back to BT now that help is available, though I still read one or two Commentaries daily.

Best wishes,
Judy.

Thanks Judy. I am enjoying your posts as well. I have been pondering the analogy you made between essence/personality and the sun/planets in a discussion with Harry on another thread. Good stuff!

As to "considering," it is astonishing to me how I came into contact with the Fourth Way at the perfect time in my life. Briefly: I have always been a seeker, and about a year ago, all my philosophical, scientific, and religious musings were leading me to the conclusion that everything I ever thought I knew was, well, maybe not correct.  I was deeply questioning my convictions about EVERYTHING. And I was sick, sick, sick of always deferring my judgment to my philosophical, religious, and scientific "teachers." I finally said to myself: "You know what James. These "teachers" and "professors" are no smarter than you (and if academic accomplishments are any indicator, you are smarter than most of them), and they are only men, just like you. From now on, your final authority is your own judgment/experiences/reason/observations."

Around the same time, a friend gave me Nicoll's New Man to read and I was astonished at his profound understanding of the New Testament. I had never heard anything that rang so true. My friend then suggested O's "Fourth Way." After thinking about the Work for a while I decided to try doing it, as O suggested. I verified my own sleep. I verified my own mechanicalness. All this through self-observation. After a couple of months of conscious labor at self-observation, I had some very, very intense experiences of self-remembering. (Both exciting and terribly frightening at the same time). I literally felt as if I awoke from a dream world! There was James, and there "I" was watching him! The whole world looked different. As O described his experience in ISM, it seemed to me that when I walked down the street, the buildings were alive. After that I was off and running, trying to verify all the ideas of the Fourth Way for myself. And here I am.

As I said, this was the perfect time for me to find this teaching/Way. I was ready. Before my contact with the Work, I came to the conclusion that I was not an altruist. I only thought I was. In reality, I was an egoist, and I began living like one. I owed the world nothing, and the world owed me nothing. That conclusion was liberating, to say the least. No more pity parties, not on a regular basis anyway.

When I read in Tales that in order to become an altruist it is necessary to first become an egoist, I thought: wow!! This is so right. This is exactly what I was beginning to think! It also dawned on me then, as I looked back on my life, that I had already subconciously began to understand ideas such as "considering," and "identifying." The identifying concept I got from studying the Buddhist idea of attachment (Jose, feel free to correct me here) But I had never verbalized these ideas in a systematic way. Now that these ideas are consciously a part of my thinking in a systematic fashion, I can see how I have the opportunity to develop much faster than before I stumbled upon this Way. I see how I am truly becoming an individual, and I see how the Fourth Way is a FAST way to reaching that goal, for me anyway. Right now, I am an egoist. My hope is that one day I can be an altruist for real.

Sorry about the long "testimony." For a minute there, I felt like I was back in church. lol.

I don't think any of us stumble on the Work, James. Your testimony is very similar to many others. One thing I've found interesting is going back and looking at the influences that led me to be receptive to G. All of those cummings' poems; o'neill plays; James Joyce; and those professors who taught me about symbolism and introduced me to writers who had at least had a hint. I even remember names of instructors. . .who probably never heard of The Work.

The week´s exercises have been a powerful reminder for me to open up to sensing. It is not the case that sensing comes easily and stopping while eating or showering or using the computer have helped keep this week grounded. The computer has been the most difficult as it remains a huge obstacle in trying to relate to a human face in the Work.

James. along the attachment lines, identifying is also related to what is called "tanha" or grasping. Attachment comes later. We constantly grasp onto things, believing from the beginning that they are us, or that they can help us. When they are seen to not be, we suffer the dis-ease of existence ("sufffering" or Dukkha in Buddhism)

The 4th Way has been a most welcome entry for me into the realm of the practical, the places away from the cushion where I normally lead my life. When I first began searching for something like it, I found out that, unbeknownst to me despite almost 4 years of living there, Jacob Needleman lived within walking distance from my house in Oakland. No...there are no coincidences here...

Is there a soundfile on the sacred vowels to learn its right pronunciation?

---

by James F

Harry: any idea who wrote: "Row, row, row your boat, gently down the stream, * * *, life is but a dream." I wonder if they had a clue, or if it was just a lucky guess.

Judy: When practicing the "as if no head" exercise, I feel a noticable shift into my chest/solar plexus area as well.

To all: Upon further pondering on tension: I have a guitar. If the strings on it are too loose, I can't get a harmonious sound. If I wind the strings too tightly, they break. And I have broken enough of them. Scares the heck out of me everytime.

James,

Row Row Row your boat. . .
The Sunny Side of the Street. . .
High Hopes. . .

You can't always get what you want. . .

etc.

These are the influences that have made their way into our culture. They give us little pushes while we're growing. They may be very one sided, but they, like most adages, tend to have some truth in them.

Just like the Bible.

No. Just sound out each letter. Its up to you how you want to do it. High, low, fast, slow, silent, out loud. Maybe listen to some of Gurdjieff's music for inspiration.

Apart from all your other good observations, another aspect to consider is that tensions serve some cosmic purpose; that they are a debt or a source of 'food' that we owe or provide to Nature. Although I am not sure how one could verify such a thing.

When life doesn't meet your expectations or beliefs and you react with behavior such as - impatience, annoyance, anger, frustration, criticism, sadness, resentment - Curb the reactive behavior and use the saved energy to remember your Aim, and to establish a state of inner quiet.

When a 'corn' of self-importance is stepped on and you react with behavior such as - indignation, anger, vengeance. self-pity, envy, shame, embarrassment - Curb the reactive behavior and use the saved energy to remember your Death, and to establish a state of inner quiet.

While reading a Work related book, retain a sense of your presence through sensing and breathing.

Last week after the umpteenth 'boss response' "I'll be right back with you and don't have time to talk with you right now". I stated in a firm voice "When ARE we going to get together on this?".

I have a very deep (deeper than James Earl Jones, I am told) voice which was cultivated through actor training exercises when I was in my early teens. I had no voice breaking. I was eased by extremely attentive vocal coaches from a "boy's descant" to "basso profundo" over a week's time. I have maintained, thanks to their care, a great flexibility in vocal range. I also, have an acute awareness of it's tone, vibration and register. In "normal" circumstances, it has to be "operated" at half capacity --- no more. That is done out of "external consideration". At 6 foot 4 --- with intense heavy-browed eyes MOST things about me operate at half-capacity due to "External Considering" Much about "It" is too much for most.

I have waited 5 months for the boss to answer any email of importance.

Scheduled meetings are "forgotten".

"This Week's New Plan" is conveyed verbally.

As in many work situations: "What we have here, sir, is a failure to communicate."

Yesterday, I was called to the principal's office for my punishment. My charge: Insubordination. (Translation:attempting to do my job).

So, remembering our exercise, I placed myself "just behind my eyeballs" and made a pact with myself to stay right there no matter what. I put the professional smile on, "thanked" the boss for making time for us getting together and placed both feet firmly on the ground with palms down on each knee. Then the screaming started ---- her screaming. I reminded myself "No self-justification, no over the top explanations, no nothing 'for you' --- just agree, maintain center, and (for heaven's sake, give nothing away!). Stay under the line of fire!

Immediately, I apologized, when I was reminded, for my totally "inappropriate way of talking" (In fact, I apologized three times during the course of the "discussion". Of course, Queen Bee must get what Queen Bee asks for, even if it is three times over! I'm a worker in her hive, after all)

"It's" apology "threw her". "It" got down "apologetically low", "It" agreed. "It" did every thing I told "It" to from my place of operations from behind my eyeballs. When, "It" felt frustration, self-justification, etc. etc. I coaxed "It" to stop or transubstantiate. "It" nodded in agreement and said little to nothing.

All of this was interesting. Here I am being chastised by someone who looks like Paula Zahn (EVERYDAY) and from the start has lied, cheated, and stolen. I have witnessed little other than sychophantic and sociopathic behavior. And I don't expect anything other, ever. She sees me as one of her best employees.

In observing her through all her mess, I was party to her deep fear of me. I was party to her sense of her own inadequacy at the job she progressively stole for herself over the course of a year. And I was party to the condition of her center of being.

Years ago Brookstone, Sharper Image (and such places) offered one of those Executive Passtime Games. It was a labyrinth set in a box with dials on the side to tilt the maze. The trick was to send a steel marble through the labyrinth without it's falling through any of the strategically placed holes. This is her center of being, as I observed it. It runs wildly, frantically, gaspingly in fear of rolling into the abyss.

All words used towards me were self-justifications composed of a crazy-quilt of catch phrases and moralisings.

After the meeting (and the mono-drama "MY AUTHORITY") finished, "It" shook her hand, thank her, assured her. There was no real resolution. (Of course, not) No real answer to my question. (Of course, not) There was the presentation of the "New and Improved" same old, same old. The reinstatment of office management by Ouija Board. Everybody coddled, tucked in, cooed over --- back to beddy-bye.

I passed through this without self-destruction (most important). In fact, I felt a flush of new energy at day's end and took a twenty mile ride on the bike on a 100 degree day --- loosening my muscles, consciously breathing in pine infused air.

When, I finally returned home ---- all was "aglow". I poured myself onto the cool floor and fell into deep, dreamless sleep.

As I'm also a bit over 6' 4" and I'm certain heavier than you, that deep voice is a familiar issue.

But so is the "fear" of the Bureaucrat.

The inadequacy that disguises itself by bravado.

I know these things because I once was these things.

This type of Work has been very valuable for me in the past. My general inclination is to begin Working as soon as my solar plexus tells me something is up. Transforming energy. And it becomes very clear what is happening. Seeing that event transpire in front of me.

But the thing is that people in these positions understand that Knowledge is Power. And they recognize knowledge instinctively, even if they don't understand it. And because they don't understand it, they fear it.

What I've learned is useful in such situations is to remember "you gotta serve someone". I thank Bob Dylan for that reminder. Truly a beneficial saying.

How very interesting. This morning, before stepping into the shower, an "i" had begun the decimation of an earlier decision to ride my bike to the train. I like the bike ride first thing in the day because it plants the day's Work-seed. This begins to germinate the solar plexus sphere which expands if fed by attentive, purposeful breathing.

All last evening, while cleaning-up before retiring,
I jujitsued (successfully) a self destructive black-green dreck which threatened to envelope my head and shoulders. I saw it in my Mind's eye replicating itself over and over again. The above posting of mine haunted me in terms of its describing where I am in (if not of). A caring voice reminded me continuously that "As a result of the 'Terror of the Situation', it is all (as you already know) really like that".

It is true, after a little more than one year here at ENDLESS SEARCH, I am "suffering" from Princess-and-the-Pea Syndrome --- I am accutely pained by things which previously barely escaped notice.

Greg: I appreciate your humor (sarcasm is my middle name), and the way you paint such a vivid picture with your words. At 6 feet 1 inches, I guess I'm one of the short ones around here. James is also perceived by the world as having a commanding presence and he is often intimidating. It took me a long time to realize the need to "tone it down." It also astonishes me how I can feel sick with fear/anxiety/nervousness, and no one seems to notice. On the outside, James always appears as cool as ice.

I have similar tensions with "authority." But this is what I really like about the Fourth Way. All MY tensions boil down, when I think through long enough, to "internal considering." In "The Fourth Way," O identified two types of internal considering: (1) When others don't think highly enough of me, and (2) when I don't think highly enough of others. For me, when I internally consider in the first way, I feel anger, resentment, bitterness. When I internally consider in the second way, I feel shame, self-loathing, unworthiness, etc...

Accepting myself, (a long, long process before finding the Fourth Way, in which I found out that societies "standards" are absurd and no one CAN live up to them) with all of my faults seems to have eliminated most of my internal considering that leads to shame, guilt, etc. Although, it is interesting because there are still times when I unexpectedly have feelings of shame in the presence of some types of authority figures. Mechanical rolls triggered by surrounding forces? Not sure.

Not thinking too highly of myself seems to be a remedy when I internally consider in the first way. This is a big challenge for me. I spent the last 15 or so years of my life nurturing myself with the kind of "love" I did not get in childhood, which is fine, but now I have too much self-confidence, vanity, etc. By accepting myself, I realized "hey, I'm not so bad." Then, however, it transformed from "I'm ok" into "hey, I'm downright awesome!" And therein lies the irony of the FW, as I see it. I first have to learn to love myself. Then, when I really, really think I am "the bomb," I have to kill me.... Step 1: Awake. Step 2: Die Step 3: Be Born.

Yes Harry. So right on that a lot of my bravado is a disguised sense of inferiority. I heard or read somewhere that an addict (drugs, alcohol, etc.) is an egomaniac with an inferiority complex. I think there is some truth in that phrase. It astonishes me sometimes how I can feel proud and insecure at the same time.

James

Correction: I can't attribute my above division of internal considering into two categories to O. I checked myself and couldn't find that thought in FW. In any event, for what it's worth, it has been useful for me to divide my own internal considering in that fashion. I'll attempt to edit that, and more importantly, make a conscious effort to be less mechanical when posting.

Sat up reading Gerald Massey's THE HISTORICAL JESUS, THE MYTHICAL CHRIST maintaining my presence by sitting upright on a hard seated wooden chair. Kept a visualisation going of myself seated. Kept a check on the ongoing relaxation sensation (dripping-candle-wax-like) of muscles dropping down away from my skeleton. Read and breathed steadily, easily.

Interesting intimacy began to develop between my inner self and the ongoing narrative. It brought to mind the King and Queen naked in their coffin in Nuptial Embrace in alchemical engravings. I don't . . . no why . . .
Extremely pleasing sensation this reading experience. Like tender, sweet kissing . . .

While reading this hundred and 70 something year old lecture was struck by it's contemporary style. Seemed close in style and content to JG Bennett (whose DRAMATIC UNIVERSE I had recently been reading) Found a painted portrait of Massey on the internet and . . . lo and behold! . . . if you took away the beard he looked exactly like JG Bennett. Same direction of gaze, same tilt of the head. I looked up his birthday. Gemini. Same as JG Bennett. Massey a precursor and critic of HP Blavatsky and early Theosophy was bent on de-mystifying the Mysteries. Like Bennett. While his scholarship may be suspect these days, I admire his quest for the Truth.

The entwined alchemical couple continues to make flash appearances on the outside edge of my consciousness. Two nights back after an hour reading with maintainance of awareness exercise, I retire. A cobalt dime sized circle manifest, corrupts into powder and disappears.

I roll over. The couple appears. She is now fully fleshed and detailed while the rest of the picture remains its woodcut essence. She is three dimensional. Her skin, a bluish-white, is as slick and slippery as a fish's scales. Hair: Pre-Raphaelite red (of course!). Her body heaves momentarily, pauses, and then relaxes into a more comfortable relation to her husband. All at one time she emits the world weariness of being lover/wife/mother/sister --- one sensation composed of all these subdivisions. Her body "oils" into pearlesence and it all disappears.

It is clear that my Artist/Painter "I" has become attracted to this image and is Work-ing it.

Without slowing down I would completely miss these inner processes which go on all the time.

I thought your observations on internal considering were very good and are close to what is said near the end of Chapter 8 in In Search of the Miraculous -

There are several different kinds of considering.
On the most prevalent occasions a man is identified with what others think about him, how they treat him, what attitude they show towards him. He always thinks that people do not value him enough, are not sufficiently polite and courteous. All this torments him, makes him think and suspect and lose an immense amount of energy on guesswork, on suppositions, develops in him a distrustful and hostile attitude towards people. How somebody looked at him, what somebody thought of him, what somebody said of him — all this acquires for him an immense significance.

...
There is still another form of considering which can take a great deal of energy from a man. This form starts with a man beginning to think that he is not considering another person enough, that this other person is offended with him for not considering him sufficiently. And he begins to think himself that perhaps he does not think enough about this other, does not pay him enough attention, does not give way to him enough. All this is simply weakness. People are afraid of one another.

by James F

Thanks Ian. I knew it! I was right all along. Seriously though, the emphasis on work on the emotions is one thing that really attracted me to the Fourth Way. In part, because I had already experienced some of the truth of not internally considering. So I could verify its truth for myself. Also what attracted me is that the Work isn't about words, it is about transformation and being. For instance, the freedom that comes with not internally considering can't really be explained to someone, they have to experience it, or "be" it, for themselves. I can try to explain it all day long to no avail.

For example, I have a friend who constantly wants to please others. And he is a slave because of it. I can tell him til I'm blue in the face: "don't worry about what other people think so much," but my words just fall to the ground. So I think, now how did I get beyond that? I used to be like that. What caused the transformation, or "transubstantiation," in me? It is all so subtle; I have to really pay attention and observe.

Thinking about my death as part of this week's exercise has been a breeze for me. I have been thinking about it everyday for the last year. Life is so fast. Time is merciless. I will be dust soon. When I want to remember my death, I like to ponder Marcus Aurelius's "Meditations," so I began reading it again this week. When I read Marcus, I really feel the meaning of the words--so powerful. And Greg's analogy to the alchemical King and Queen has been a great visual reminder to me to marry my heart and mind while reading.

Having a birthday this week with all the ancient slights and memories was an excellent reminder about what is called here considering. I watched myself as I expected this or that person to remember, this or that one to not to, how much I resented so-and-so forgetting or not even sending a card, etc., etc., etc. It was all so gratuitous! In Buddhism these are known as "habitual patterns" and identifying with them is a source of endless (and unneeded suffering). By avoiding the trap of clinging too closely, of letting go and neither externally nor internally considering; instead watching on those occasions when I remembered myself to do so, made the events of those moments simple, beautifully simple.

I've been reading the posts on various aspects of "considering" with interest.

Nicoll comments on this in some detail also, including some quotes of "what Mr O said".

Basically it seems that external considering is to be done right from the beginning of the work.

It is a very important part of the second line of work; also as an aid to work on oneself, in that, in trying to observe (find) similar things in me to what I am objecting to in another, I often have clear inner glimpses of things which I had not previously even suspected, and so have good new material to work on. Seeing even a small similarity has the "cancelling-out" effect of real forgiveness.

On the other hand, internal considering, in all its forms, is to be stopped.

And, yes, identifying in many of its forms, rears its head here. The most common form for me goes something like this;
(a) I identify with an aspect of myself; eg; my punctuality.
(b) I feel offended that the other person doesn't recognise that quality enough; eg; He said I was late again, and surely he must have realised that only something earth-shattering could have made me late. Therefore he should not have commented.
(c) So then I begin to make internal accounts; eg; He clearly has absolutely no idea of the traffic on my side of town, which goes to Well, he's often rude, that person; etc etc and so forth..

The interesting thing is that (b) and (c) have occurred in less than a second - and I haven't expressed any negativity outwardly, yet all this drains lots of force which would otherwise have been available for work.

So detachment is a necessary first step for me too.
Sometimes I manage it in time, sometimes not..

This is where I am at on this topic at present.
Best wishes,
Judy.

P.S. When I do see in me something similar to that which I am objecting to in someone else, it is almost comical to notice how parts of me try to self-justify, as if those I's are being attacked, which in fact they are.

J.

Judy,

As usual, "thank you" for your thorough and clear tracking of what you are finding along your way. Your postings always exhibit a great deal of care.

The following extract is from Terry Winter Owens A REMEMBRANCE OF WA NYLAND. I have found it to be an important piece of additional information on negative emotions, etc. as presented by certain explicators of Gurdjieff's Work. I have spent a great deal of time with Nicoll's COMMENTARIES and am, as many are, grateful for his erudite insights. I have, however, had a few questions about certain of his viewpoints. This paragraph answered some of that and affirmed some of my personal search.

I offer it to you for your consideration, and hope you will find some value in it. The emphasis in boldface is my own, and is not part of the original text:

"Notwithstanding the fact that lectures and writings of Orage and notes from other of Gurdjieff students make pointed reference to the value of saving energy by not expressing negative emotions, Mr. Nyland strongly promoted the point of view that the non-expression of negative emotions was an invention, or at least an exaggeration, of Ouspensky's. The subject came up often, perhaps because many people were attracted to the Work or remained connected to it because of their intense desire to get the better of their so called negative emotions. Nyland suggested that all emotions issuing from a sleeping state were of the same relative value. He explained that the material produced by strong emotional reactions was too coarse to be used for Work. The transformer, intentional effort, was the critical element rather than the saving or storing of energy. Better, he said, to observe the emotional reaction in the "playground" of the body and perhaps, were one awake and impartial enough, to intentionally participate in the outward manifestation—of course within the bounds of common sense. His examples were persuasive and were coupled with many practical approaches to work that did not involve self-manipulation or the violation of the principle of objective self-acceptance. He was concerned that one could suppress one's negative emotions and remain as dead-asleep and identified as a poker-faced card player. Along similar lines, he also criticized Ouspensky's description of the double arrow of divided attention and other concepts presented in Fragments of an Unknown Teaching. (The Nylands referred to Ouspensky's magnum opus as Fragments, its original working title, rather than the publisher's eventual title, In Search of the Miraculous)."

It took a long time for me to realise that Ouspensky was involved with "systematising" something (the Work) which never was presented by G. in that format. Each Worker, of course, finds which procedure works best for him/her ---- so, it isn't a question of one being right or one being wrong. Personally, I often felt under the "whiplash" of O. and felt more intimidated/chastised than challenged. It wasn't until many years later when I read Orage and about Nyland that I began to truely feel my "orientation" in the Work. I also, for the first time began to understand G.

Again, it is a matter of how we 'see/understand'. Some of us start from the outside and move inwards, some start from the inside and move out. As Shakespeare said, "There is no Right or Wrong, Only thinking makes it so."

---

by Judy

Hi Greg,
Thank you for your detailed post. Much appreciated, and quite useful for me.

Mr Nyland's suggestion makes sense. I have had vague reservations re the non-expression of negative emotions for some time. Certainly I haven't been able to verify the use regarding the saving of energy, except in the obvious life-sense. What I do, in fact, is to u-s-e the impulse towards expressing negativity as a "reminding-factor" to remember myself and be present. ("Use everything")... So I am most interested in reading the rest of the article mentioned. (I searched on Google for Terry Winter Owens, and found a Commentary on BT as well as A Remembrance of Mr Nyland, and will look at later today.)

Re your comments on Nicoll and Ouspensky, yes, I see where you are coming from and agree. I must constantly go back to G himself, plus verify by actual work where possible. Having said that, BT was simply too difficult for me initially, and is taking time to assimilate, and Ouspensky and Nicoll have given me lots to go on with in the meantime, so much gratitude to them both. My reservations are not so much their view-points, but rather the dryness of the intellectualism,(especially Ouspensky). With G's writings, and transcripts of war-time meetings, just reading them always touches the heart as well, even though the ideas are huge. So we've arrived at similar intuitions from slightly different starting-points.

Re "right and wrong" in one's method of working, I think they exist, and are valuable. Admittedly, there's often not a clear-cut boundary, it's more a matter of giving something a higher or lower priority. In this case, your post is reminding me of the higher priority that awakening has, far over and above any non-expression etc, which has confirmed its lower priority distinctly. It is a bit like being guided back to the main path, instead of gathering daisies somewhere in the nearby woods. This is where the Online Group is a big help. This Work is far too complex for me to "re-invent the wheel", and my personal work is progressing much better since I've joined. After all, there is limited time.....

Best wishes,
Judy.

Here is what is said about external considering in ISOTM -
"External considering is based upon an entirely different relationship towards people than internal considering. It is adaptation towards people, to their understanding, to their requirements. By considering externally a man does that which makes life easy for other people and for himself. External considering requires a knowledge of men, an understanding of their tastes, habits, and prejudices. At the same time external considering requires a great power over oneself, a great control over oneself."

One might ask - What is the difference between external considering and simply being courteous and civil to others?

> Along similar lines, he also criticized Ouspensky's description of the double arrow of divided attention

What was his criticism?

There are certainly many things to object to in Ouspensky's accounts. He did however also describe attention with the analogy of a searchlight whose beam could be widened or narrowed. This is to my mind a much better analogy than the double arrow and other references to dividing attention. Attention is of a whole; speaking of dividing it is contradictory.

I like to think of attention as an encompassing sphere that can be expanded and contracted as required.

> The transformer, intentional effort, was the critical element rather than the saving or storing of energy. ... He was concerned that one could suppress one's negative emotions and remain as dead-asleep and identified as a poker-faced card player.

Working with negative emotions is a delicate subject, and is complicated by its association with the second conscious shock and intentional suffering. Certainly one doesn't want to suppress ones negative emotions - that is what G called 'self-calming' - rather one wants to experience them long enough to see what their source is (ego, self-importance) and to engage them in a transforming struggle with ones affirming force, out of which a reconciling energy will emerge.

One could almost say that the whole reason that the Work exists is to address the problem of negative emotions or the 'consequences of the organ Kundabuffer'. Of course the Work has other purposes, such as helping us return to the Sun Absolute and unity with Endlessness. And while negative emotions are without a doubt the main obstacle to acheiving that goal, never-the-less, the right use or transformation of negative emotions is also a principle means of acheiving that goal. Gurdjieff makes this plain in BT -

Holy-Affirming,
Holy-Denying,
Holy-Reconciling,
Transubstantiate in me,
For my Being.

and -

"In other words, every wish of the planetary body is taken as undesirable for their higher divine part which has to be coated and perfected, and therefore all three-centered beings of our Great Megaloscosmos constantly carry on a relentless struggle against the wishes of their planetary bodies so that there should be formed in them, in this struggle from the what is called ‘Disputekrialnian-friction,’ those sacred crystallizations from which their higher Divine being-part arises and is perfected in them."
"In this constant struggle of theirs, the equilibrating harmonizing principle is their second being-body, which in their own individual law of Triamazikamno represents the neutralizing source; and therefore this second being-part always remains indifferent to their mechanical manifestations, but for all their active manifestations it always tends according to the second-grade cosmic law ‘Urdekhplifata’ to unite with those desires of which there are more whether in one or the other of the two mentioned opposite being-parts."

Gurdjieff is also reported to have said in a meeting on December 7, 1941 -

"One needs fire. Without fire, there will never be anything. This fire is suffering, voluntary (Intentional) suffering, without which it is impossible to create anything. One must prepare, must know what will make one suffer and when it is there, make use of it. Only you can prepare, only you know what makes you suffer, makes the fire which cooks, cements, crystallizes, DOES. Suffer by your defects, in your pride, in your egoism. Remind yourself of the aim. Without prepared suffering there is nothing, for by as much as one is conscious, there is no more suffering. No further process, nothing."

"The essence of the idea of Karma-Yoga is to meet with unpleasant things equally with pleasant things. That is, in practising Karma-Yoga, one does not seek always to avoid unpleasant things, as people ordinarily do. Life is to be met with non-identifying. When this is possible, life becomes one's teacher; in no other sense can life become a teacher, for life taken as itself is meaningless, but taken as an exercise it becomes a teacher. It is not life that is a teacher, but one's relation through non-identifying makes it become a teacher. Nothing can change being so much as this practise - namely, to take the unpleasant things in life as an exercise."

Hello Judy and Greg,
Ditto on all of that!

Judy, your explanation was very helpful to me and clarified much that was a bit misleading in my post. The details made it real.Thanks.

Greg, as usual you post something that opens my eyes to a new dimension and I have to go check out the information. Mr. Nyland had one of those faces that pulled me into the Work when I first started looking and I can see why...I will try to find the book. Perhaps we can start a new Topic and post some of our favorite Work or Work-related books?

Ian, your posts add to the mix.
Attention, as I have understood it, must be wide for it to be a "spiritual" practice. Otherwise it remains "concentration" which has its own uses. And I am glad that you and Judy cleared up the "external considering" piece that I mistakenly referenced away from Work definitions. Right.

Civility and courtesy...All indications are that G. was both almost always and with everyone--that does not, contrary to the later hagiographers, diminish his standing. I practiced with many illustrious teachers and the best were quite "nice" though there was no misunderstanding their role when it came to teaching in a teacher-student relationship. And I have always had deep reservations about this "non-expression" quote. I have suggested in my article on "Gurdjieff´s Possible Buddhist Influences", that this may be derived from Shantideva. Who knows? But in its original context, this was a discipline primarily designed for monastics for whom harmonius living conditions were required (partly a function of close quarter living and partly a cultural phenomenon.) I think as Judy put it so nicely, we must use everything and though we may eventually come to a place where we can release the egoic hurts and slights and not express our anger or irritation, say, but removing ourselves and witnessing the robotic impulses must come first. At least that is the way I see it...

I second Jose's work-related-book-thread idea. I have Nicoll's New Man; O's Fourth Way and ISM; Views From the Real World; and all three books in the All and Everything Series. And that's it. I have no clue who Mr. Nyland is.

I have temporarily resisted the urge to buy more books at present, knowing my tendency (and I suspect I'm not alone here) to devour theoretical knowledge, and forget all about practice. But when I do decide to give Amazon.com some more of my hard-earned money, I wouldn't mind some of your all's opinions on what is out there. As Judy said, there is only so much time, and that includes time for reading. Most of the good books I've come across through the years came to me by way of word of mouth.

It sounds like Nicoll's Commentaries are interesting, but I'm asking myself if they are worth the cost (in both time and money). Also, I like to read other points of view as well, so if anyone has read any book that has greatly impacted them through the years, I would be interested in knowing what it is.

James,

Mr. Nyland did not "publish" anything. He formed a Work Group just outside of New York, with branches in other parts of the US. He corresponded with many of us via recorded tapes which were made at his weekly lectures. These were chosen by a person who responded back and forth via recorded tape. That era's Internet?

As to Nicoll. . .the Commentaries have been one of the most valuable Work books that I own. They contain copies of recorded meetings. All five volumes. Nicoll studied under Jung before meeting G.

I have a personal preference for volumes three through five; but the first two are also valuable. If I had to grab books on my way out the door, I'd grab All and Everything and the last two volumes from Nicoll.

Quote:
Along similar lines, he also criticized Ouspensky’s description of the double arrow of divided attention

Ian responds:

> What was his criticism?

As I remember, Nyland's criticism of this and other diagrams offered by Ouspensky, was its rendering of the act of Attention into a singular, particular, rigidly defined, intellectual, head-centered activity as opposed to an act of the entire organism. He also leveled this criticsm against O's depiction of self-remembering, that it became in O's hands an exercise from the neck up. I would have to agree whole-heartedly (and full bodily ) Nyland was preeminently concerned that people validate the results of their own sincere efforts and follow that lead, rather attempt to cookie-cut their experiences according to a picto-gram in a book. He felt that much of O. got in the way of that direct experience --- I do too. There is, from my perception, an authoritarian tone in O. that all but states unequivocal definitions of what "such-and-such" and experience is.

O's Puritanism made the Work into something else entirely in terms of practice.

While, in NYC recently I had occasion to sit and talk with some very elderly members of a reformist group of Theosophists from way back. They hold Ouspensky in extremely high esteem ---- they keep referring to his "Incredible Mind". My opinion is that O., no matter what his Work-affliations remains a Victorian Theosophist through and through. Everything is seen and expressed through that particular filter and he never really shakes it.

BTW, that meeting I had was a complete revelation ---- but that is an entirely different topic.

Thanks everyone. This thread has been a big help to me.

In my own experience, with respect to negative emotions, I have seen a pattern that goes something like (1) suppression; (2) expression; (3) non-expression. For example, I grew up in a "matriarchical" environment. My father died when I was 7, and I was raised by my mother and three older sisters. My mother died about 4 years ago, leaving the three sisters to battle over who would be queen. At a family dinner a year or so ago, I used the socially frowned-upon "f" word in front of one of my sisters. My sister, a very "religious" women, then "asked" me not to talk like that in front of her. I immediately responded with "f you, I'll talk any way I please." Well, that was a shock. After a few minutes of silence, she left the gathering and went home. Years ago, I would have suppressed that desire (because of the fear of feeling shame afterwards) to express such an emotion. In that instance, I expressed the negative emotion, and in a big sense, I felt liberated in doing so. Now, however, given the same circumstances, I wouldn't even feel the desire to respond like I did. I see how my sister is now, and I pity her. Now I would feel free enough to externally consider her by controlling the words that come out of my mouth. But I don't know if I would have ever gotten to this place of freedom to not express that negative emotion if I had not first gone through the step of expressing that negative emotion. All I can truthfully say is that it worked for me.

James-

This is a good thread, isn't it? I'm learning alot and being helped as well. We are all creating "food" for each other.

Your honesty, undiluted candor, and earnestness are truely remarkable ---hold onto all of that.

I am going to ask you to consider an exercise for yourself: You have stated that you have felt "pity" for your sister. I am going to ask you to try taking that to another step. Try to see your Sister's life (as you have observed it) her choices, her emotional tenor, her speech patterns, her gestures, her "right" turns, her "wrong" turns, etc ----- try to see it, try to see all of it, as much as you are able. When you have accumulated enough material (on your own time), begin to think of all of this "stuff" as building material. With that material begin to construct an environment which is composed of HER, of all of your sister's qualities and dynamics. You are constructing a structure (a house, if you will) that you can walk into as well as appreciate from the outside. The structure should emenate and resonate with everything you have observed about her --- everything you like, don't like, feel neutral about. Make this a "place" in yourself to visit whenever you are able and take note (in your mind and/or on paper what "comes up" --- whatever it is) Take your time with this. Keep this on a back-burner for awhile.

I am not asking you to agree with her, or even accept her at this point . . . but can you, James, begin to approach an Understanding of your Sister? I'm not asking you to answer that --- just "be" with that for however long and see what comes up.

One of the things asked for us in this Work is to cultivate the ability to stand in another person's shoes, to see the Other Person as clearly and Objectively as one can against the Sky.

This is always a very difficult thing for me: I have so many wants, so many needs, so many hurts, so many desires. I often want all that taken care of by the Other Person. What I forget, is that they are often "there", too.

Take care,

G.

---

by Greg

Judy,

I'm glad that the different viewpoint was of value to you.

Jose,

I find my eyes get opened more and more. There are (hopefully) as many Understandings of the Work as there are people in it (and some not in it, too!) I see the Ideas as triggers. What is of highest value to me is hearing a person articulate the result of that "trigger", that "shock". The experience of the 3 Stooges (Joe, Mary, and Curley) are just as interesting as G., O., N., P. Q. R. X. T. etc. etc. etc. as long as the effort is sincere.

As Ian said, within another context: "There are no sacred cows"

Greg

---

by Harry

Greg wrote: "...head-centered activity as opposed to an act of the entire organism. "

An interesting observation. My night "prayer" always ends with ". . .maintain my life, maintain my perceptions." As part of this prayer is a sensing throughout and around the "body", over the years I have noted that the sensing for "my perceptions" is my entire body. That While I may center in a particular location, perceptions is a total being experience.

Harry

---

by James F

Greg,

Thank you for your compliments. You are very kind. Though you are not helping deflate my ego any. Whenever I hear praise now, it is a "shock" for me. I try to immediately remind myself that all the opposite qualities are present in me as well. I am a liar, lazy, and often downright deceitful to myself and others. And believe me, I am also often rude, obnoxious, and selfish. There....that should cancel that out. lol.

Thank you, as well, for your suggestion. It amazes me how you are able to construct and convey such vivid images that give a deeper meaning to words. My mind works very logically, so when I explain something like simple addition, I say 2+2=4. While you, on the other hand, might tell a colorful story about apples, witches and the cosmos. Your style reminds me of the value of parables, symbols, and stories as a way to convey meaning.

I agree with you that understanding others is important. With respect to my sister, we have spoken since then. There was a long silence, but when a mutual friend of ours died recently, she contacted me to let me know, and I could sense that she knew life was too short to hold a grudge.

I mentioned that story because it was an example of how both suppression and expression are equally harmful, in my opinion. I also mentioned that incident because the process I went through with those types of situations created a tremendous amount of freedom for me. I used to live under the slavery of what I call the "Three Ps." Parents, Priests, and Politicians. They all told me what to think, when to feel shame, what was true, what my duty to humanity was, etc, etc, etc. And it was without a doubt the single, greatest, struggle of my life to break free from that bondage. That struggle eventually led me to adopt a libertarian political stance, and an ethical stance of egoism. But I soon found that even there, life was still absurd, meaningless, and vanity. And so, at the perfect moment in my life, I ran smack into the Fourth Way. Where I go from here? Well, as one blind man said at the blind man convention on hope: We shall see.

As far as needs and desires go: I've found that my emotional "needs" are really just the disquised "desires" of my ego. For instance, I have a desire for human companionship, but do I need it? I'm starting to think no. I certainly experience pleasure from it. I also sometimes experience a fear of being without human companionship. But I don't equate fearing aloneness with needing others. In fact, the opposite might be the case. I might be better off confronting my fear, exploring it, investigating it, by purposely spending time alone. At the same time, I am in prison. And God knows I can't dig this tunnel by myself! So yeah, in that sense, I need others. But that's all I know at this point. Though I also suspect there are rare ones who can escape alone. As with every general law, there are exceptions.

I will definitely attempt use your suggestion when trying to understand others in the future.

James

by James F

Correction: I meant to say above that I see both suppression and expression as harmful, but I do see expression of negative emotions as sometimes useful to get one to the place where non-expression naturally flows. I don't see how suppression is ever helpful. That was my main point in describing that experience. It was my experience. And it helped me.

Makes perfect sense to me. Prayer is really becoming three centered balanced. I still love Tom Rapp's definition. (Rapp had a group in the early 70's called Pearls Before Swine.)

"We're all prayers of action on our way to God."

Fortunately some of those old albums are now being re-released. I've got the originals, but no longer have a "record player".

Work Program week beginning 29 August 2005

At least once a day, perform a quiet meditation or sitting. Relax the three centers and watch the breath. Keep the eyes open and use the Sightless Gaze.

Whenever you get angry or impatient, count to 10 while Sensing the following 10 bones:
1. Lower right leg bone. 2. Upper right leg bone. 3. Pelvic bone. 4. Upper left leg bone. 5. Lower left leg bone. 6. Spinal column and skull. 7. Upper right arm bone. 8. Lower right arm bone. 9. Upper left arm bone. 10. Lower left arm bone.

Whenever you are happy, recall a time when you were sad. Reside in the mid-course.

Observe your thoughts and try to trace them to their source.

Ian,

Observing negative reactions and using the energy for the aim, instead of explosions was a very useful goal for the week (and a lifetime's work).

I found that instead of the grandiose aims I had tried in the past, I focused on something specific and doable. I had some amazing if only beginning results.

How do I carry the benefits of these weekly tasks strongly forward, without forgetting them when attempting the new task?

---

by Harry

One interesting observation is the difference between controlled and natural breathing.

I've gone back to exercising immediately upon getting up. I used to do this regularly, but work scheduled beat it up. But back in it, I noticed that when I'm exercising and observing my body I end up with a natural breathing. I try to push that exercise until I'm breathing fairly heavily. This is a natural breathing pattern. At times I've tried to apply the "I am now" to that exercised breathing. It's not good to do so. The machine is doing what it's supposed to do. It's providing more oxygen and it doesn't want that controlled.

At the same time, as I type this I remain aware of my breathing. That remains natural, as well. But the observation is different.

Why is it more satisfying to observe breathing cool air than heated air?

kdumphrey writes:

> How do I carry the benefits of these weekly tasks strongly forward, without forgetting them when attempting the new task?

In my own practice, I simply do bring them forward with emotional memory. And I do forget, over and over. The recognition of forgetting helps to create a thorn in my side "To Remember". I do it, bit by bit, over and over again. It's like riding a bike or learning to play the piano --- it requires repetition from me and a willingness to shift the vantage point of that repetition constantly. (AND to throw a well-aimed wrench into the bottleworks when I intuit it is needed)

In the beginning of my relationship with the Work (many many years ago) I Imagined it was about doing everything perfect, about aligning myself with what somebody else wrote in a book, about doing a copy of what (I perceived) a teacher did "better" than I did.

It has been (and continues to be) a long road of accepting that the Work begins all over again in the morning.

When I shave in front of the mirror the most difficult thing (still) to accept is the utter banality of what is reflected. How long will the Inner Chatter continue? What will I do with it? How much am I willing to risk today? Will I make all necessary 'Stops'? Indeed, Can I?--- is my Will up to it? Where am I "placed" at this moment? Do I know? Must that "place" be shifted? How?

Still, even with efforts, a momentary, incremental drop in the temperature (Attention) can ruin my day's Work "souffle". And the remembrance to "forgive myself" for that. As I do when I've expressed myself totally inappropriately. It all adds to the thorn.

If this all sounds "morbid", it isn't.

There IS verifiable evidence of progress: finding the way (again) to inner quiet, knowing how and when to make the "extra push", creation of cubits of Awareness, knowing when to get out of the way, knowing when to talk and when to keep silent.

Work-ing, is for me, the real meaning behind the statement of "getting a life"

The perfections, the imperfections, the heights, the depths, the conquests, the failures ----- all One, all Same, the thorn of Awareness to be.

G.

> kdumphrey wrote:

In my experience the benefits are cumulative and may not become overtly apparent for a long time. Repeated attempts at efforts will build up a momentum, a strength of will, a reservoir of energy, a power of attention, a coordination of the centers, an embrace of impartiality, a decrease in self-importance, a quietness of mind, a calmness of emotion, a presence in the body. Drop by drop an inner core of being will accumulate. The results will take care of themselves; the thing that needs to be carried forward is the remembrance to make efforts.

Perhaps part of my problem is that I somewhere expect mystical or emotional intensity, rather than impartial mentation and living in the real now. Just being aware of the moment, without imagination and identification. Starting to learn what it means to be objective.

---

by Harry

If your being is present in the "real now" isn't this mystical and intense?

---

by Guest

Unfortunately there are still many "I"s in me that still are attached to such things as "future", or as W.C. Fields said "Sobriety is highly over-rated," etc.

I read Maurice Nicoll this morning about the pendulum. He said that we most lose our consciousness when the pendulum begins to swing from one extreme to another. The moments we think we are conscious (but really are not just asleep asleep, are at the extremes of the pendulum). I think that "following the middle course", and not identifying with the happy was a good task. I think it makes me aware of those "I"s and parts of centers that like titilation, and keep Mr. Pride and Ms. Vanity happily in control.

by Anton

The hardest thing for me this week (as for the previous week) is to remember the task when the appropriate moments come - for example to remember about 10 Bone when I'm angry. I've found out that remembering about the task between the moments helps - for example, I've just been angry and have forgotten about the exercise and I recall the situation and say to myself "Then I had to do the 10 Bone and I'll try not to forget about it next time I'll be angry" and after several failures I suceed.

Morning sitting changes all the day. On the days when it is done well, with good effort of attention, I have more free attention to stop identifying with events and people and to remember my Work tasks. I also tend to fall into anxiety (usually about not growing professionally fast enough) just after I wake up and sitting helps to become more collected and calm.

Tracing the thoughts to their sources - seems to be a very difficult exercise. I begin thinking about thoughts instead of observing where could they begin. Seems that for me a special time should be set for this exercise to learn it, and only after that it can be used in the midst of everyday events.

As for "results" - I believe the first results are becoming more sensitive to what happens inside in what G. called "inner world" - mechanics of our machines - and seeing more connections between things which we observe in ourselves. And the results really come after a period of practice. I think a large part of the results remain in our uncoscious and we have to become more sensitive and establish good connections between the centres and Work I's to notice that results.

Other results that come quite quickly are usually the ability to relax the centres, to bring together different I's and to divide attention. I believe that such abilities should become really excellent before we can go further. It is like scales and etudes that musicians play before they begin to learn difficult pieces or to improvise.

Many good observations in your post. In regards to the above, what you say about 'scales and etudes of musicians' is very important. There are aspects to this Work that are not glamouous or mystical or emotionally intense; rather they are the 'nuts and bolts' or the ground work of integration. Things such as the development of attention, will, concentration, sensing, and observing the mind can be rather dull and tedious, but are infact the basis of all that can develop later. Many of the 'soil preparing' exercises in many Traditions are nothing but exercises of this sort. They may be presented as 'glamouous' practices but they are really only laying the foundation.
Orage wrote a book of Psychological Exercises, many of which are simple repetitions of number sequences. Bennett had a series of Will exercises. Self observation is very similar to Buddhist Vipassana. These are all essential core skills that, just like a musician learning scales, must be in place before we can become spiritual virtuosos.
Heaven is all around us, indeed within us, but for lack of persistant attention we fail to see, feel, and touch it.

Yes, this desire for intensity is strong. Perhaps this is why 'masters' are no less prone to various vices than the rest of us.

It's funny how I was just outside trying the "Pebble Exercise" from an earlier week's program, and when I ended, it was with thoughts like "why am I doing all this?" "What are all these sensing exercises about?" Then I came in and read this thread, and I couldn't help but smile.

I often have difficulty visualizing what all my efforts are leading to. In learning music, it was easier because whenever I got bored with practicing scales, I could just menatlly visualize what I was headed towards, I could see my goal--to be a "musical virtuoso." But I can't see what it means to be more conscious. I don't know what a spiritual virtuoso is. I know that I hunger for "something," only I can't see it to visualize it.

I remember learning how to type in school. All the repetition. over and over. Everyday we did those tedious exercises. It was very monotonous. But eventually it all clicked. I can think of other physical acts and school subjects I've learned as well. juggling, multiplying, reading. In the beginning, it is always a struggle. Learning the pieces and how to put them together. Until it clicks. I just hope the guy giving the lessons around here knows what he's doing.

> Why is it more satisfying to observe breathing cool air than heated air?

Hi Harry,
This reminded me of something I noticed while observing the breath. It is; I noticed that the sensation of the in-breath is often more intense (satisfying?) than the sensation of the out-breath. Then noticed that the in-breath was always cooler than the out-breath (which has been in the body for a few seconds), so I've put it down to the larger difference in temperature between the atmosphere and the body-heat giving rise to the more definite impressions. This certainly seems to be a part of it anyway.

Best wishes,
Judy.

A couple of comments on this week's exercises..

I haven't had much success with sensing the bones as yet, though this week noticed my posture involuntarily straightened up each time I tried it. That is a start. Also, the exercise worked very well on impatience. I was too busy counting and sensing to be impatient. So, effective here.

Re observing the thoughts and their sources;
Had a break-through this week with this. Separated distinctly from the multitude of associations/thoughts, and actually observed hordes of them clamouring for attention, and interacting with each other. Even had a couple of what I'll call "imposter Observing I's", as each of these insisted that it was doing the observing, and yet I was watching it at the same time. Saw whole hierarchies of these things, in other words. This was an intensely interesting experience which I haven't yet been able to repeat so clearly and vividly. Still, the memory vivid, so, as Anton observed, more good work needed here.
Re tracing to origin, most were definitely associations from either external or internal impressions, rather than thoughts around any idea. The only idea in mind at the time was, afterall, to observe these thoughts. They came from different centers. Ones from the same center collected together a bit, which seems to be how the imposter Observing I's sprang up. During this process, without intending to, I also observed several slight emotions (such as surprise when a door closed, and a mild startle when a ladybird crawled on to my foot) very vividly. These emotions were felt in the solar plexus, as well as a sort of electricity from the point of contact of the insect, up to the solar plexus. This in turn caused associative thoughts to do with lines from Whitman (such as "the body electric" and "song of myself") to dance about , and it was easy to observe the time-line of "external impression to emotion to thought" while I was simply noticing it all.

So, in passing, I'd like to say to the following quote of Harry's;

If your being is present in the "real now" isn't this mystical and intense?

Yes. Absolutely!

(of interest to me is the etymology of mystical, which is "spiritually allegorical") That reminds me of a book we all know...
The various dialogues on this subject have been useful reminders to not forget the mystical nature of the Work, while working on It's practical aspects. Both are necessary.
As for intensity (extreme depth of feeling), yes, that is there also, a continual increasing valuation. It is this beauty and truth which re-energises me to do more of the practical, which is indeed, a bit monotonous sometimes.

Judy.

> . I think a large part of the results remain in our uncoscious and we have to become more sensitive and establish good connections between the centres and Work I's to notice that results.

Yes, Anton, this is interesting, and makes sense.

I also like to think of it as the opening of centers, which allows access to parts of "rolls" which were not accessable before. For example, after a recent week of attempting to self-remember on the hour each day, I had a flood of "new" early childhood memories before going to sleep. To continue your excellent "scales and etudes" analogy, to me this result was a reward of a new grade 1 piece to play, after learning a simple scale.

Although there may be long periods of work without many results sometimes, the little results along the way are energising, and a part of the "Verify everything" process for me.

I enjoyed your post.

Judy,

Thanks for some very strong posts. In particular your post about conflicting i's fighting for attention.

I'm not sure I sense bones, per se. The idea of bone marrow was foreign to me to begin with, but began to make sense when I Worked with it for a while. The joint exercise, on the other hand, seems almost second nature.

All of those seem to silence the mind from those chattering i's and focus the attention. . .focus by widening and becoming fish eye. . .

This week´s exercises were again, useful. The anger and impatience that are a normal part of a "normal" week went as usual and yet the counting serves to stop that in its tracks--though I still find these types of exercises difficult. I get confused as to the order and often find myself going back along the same track.

The meditation is quite typical of a normal day anyway; I begin and end my days with a period of quiet sitting, with no attempt to "do" anything but to observe--classic Buddhist meditation.

Re: "mystical" or special experiences. My understanding has led me to ignore any particular "special" manifestation of a practice. They are traditionally said to get in the way of any true awakening and I can see why--we get so attached to the extraordinary and the special that we fail to see those experiences as merely the flip side of the typical boredom and listlessness that characterize "normal" life. Both keep us locked into a Life that is lived neither here nor now. Available to me right now is an awareness that precedes such and to rest in t h a t is, as I understand it, far closer to awakening than anything extraordinary...

marrow

> O.E. mearg "marrow," earlier mærh, from P.Gmc. *mazga- (cf. O.N. mergr, Du. merg, Ger. Marh "marrow"), from PIE *mozgho- "marrow, brains" (cf. Skt. majjan-, Avestan mazga- "marrow," O.C.S. mozgu, Lith. smagenes "brain"). Fig. sense of "inmost or central part" is attested from c.1400.

(from online etymology dictionary through Google)

Thanks Harry for your reminder about working with the bone marrow. I used Ian's search bar on our home page and found the hints /instructions for the 10 bone exercise, which is of course what I should have done in the first place.
There I found other hints (re going over the anatomy of the bones, in the process of which I found a definition of bones as "discrete organs of living tissue" etc etc), and the illumination of the marrow suggestion. Thanks Ian. This website is a wealth of practical and valuable work ideas.
From the above quote, we find that the root of the word "marrow" comes from a word meaning "brains".
And from www.dictionary.com we find words like essential pith innermost part.
Then there is the suggestion of magnetic center being in the bone marrow..

Now I have a much improved attitude to the exercise, and so of course have a much better connection with it.
What a difference !

Judy.

And Judy, you have very early on, figured out a most important aspect of the Work: etymology. The "secrets" are often right in front of our faces. As a well-known esotericist once said "If you want to hide something place it out in the open --- discreetly."

Attempt the following at least once each day:

Prayer of the mind - Ponder: What is silence?

Prayer of the Body - Sense the tingle of energy coursing throughout the body.

Prayer of the Heart - Oh Endlessness,
Immersed in the embrace of Your Breath,
Your Currents frictions of joy and sorrow Consume Your Conduit for Wish to Be.

Self-gathering Prayer - Self-gathering is the Orthodox work. There are three elements in self-gathering. First: the gathering of the mind in the heart, called attention. Second: to be alert in the body, called vigilance. Third: to come to the senses, called soberness. To be self-gathered you descend within your heart with the help of these three elements. When you are within, the work is to remain there as long as you are conscious. When you are outside, your repeat the self-gathering and go on renewing it, as it is not something that continues without the effort. When you have gathered yourself, you are within; missing even one of the elements puts you outside. St. Theophan writes: "...the ascetic laborer is in a minute-by-minute struggle... Therefore he is in a state of perpetual beginning..."

Hello, everyone,

I am a newer, could you tell me about following question?
1, Is this a single exercise or two?
2, Are we supposed to do one of them or the whole pack?
3, I don't quite understand the meaning of "prayer", since English is not a mother language for me, does "prayer" mean to speak silently to myself to remind the excercise?

Thanks.

by Harry

oshee,

Welcome.

Can you translate prayer as Work Effort? Or activity?

Do what you can. Or, try to do what you can.

We're all newer, in one way or another.

Thank you Harry.

what is "Consume Your Conduit for Wish to Be."? I don't understand it.

---

by Harry

A question for those in the US in particular.

Has anyone else noted any particularly negative feelings, dreams, etc. over the last week? I'm not usually a negative or heavy dreamer, but of late my dreams have been very dark. Wondering if my subconscious mind is connecting to the disaster in New Orleans? Or is it just Equinox related?

Or perhaps I'm just dealing with my own self.

Oshee,

I'd suggest that you ponder what Ian has posted. That's a very good phrase to ponder on.

Harry

oshee asks what prayer means. A Maronite Archbishop, Joseph Raya, tought me that in Eastern Christianity, prayer is listening to God, never talking to him. We have to be silent to listen.

I think the exercises, especially those of Theophan the Recluse, are designed to make us a conduit for the higher centers, so we can listen.

Krishnamurti said, "We can never build a bridge from here to There. But there can be a bridge from There to here."

Yes, I woke up talking in my sleep with a terrible dream. My wife says it is the only time that has ever happened. The Mensa workgroup on parapsychology is filled with similar reports.

This morning:

"What is silence?"
The overscore/underscore, the sides, the anterior/posterior, the Heart of 'The Buzz' of noise.

Late morning:

Standing on the train platform I released the bones of my arms straight up, shoulders dropped. Different than stretching, the skeleton follows a command of "Extend" ---- the muscles drop, back away from that and fall into gravity's pull. This is a Body Prayer of "I". Sun "drops" (similar to raindrops) absorbed into my fingertips, roll into my arms, and are absorbed into the marrow.

Slowly I descend arms, interlacing the fingers, over (and then resting on top of) my head.

TINGLES starting in the tips of my fingers, network their way through my forearms in a Jackson Pollack "field" of impulses. Slowly, arms come down to my side. In my body "I" stand.

Following something I came across from Mantak Chia yesterday I send a smile into my heart. As it fades I re-institute it.

Found myself becoming angry with New Orleans and it reminded me to up the ante on bike riding, straightening my apartment and effecting super-efforts (i.e. balancing the check-book BEFORE going to bed, even though it didn't need to take place before the next day)

Deep dreamless sleep through the whole week.

Friend from another Work group spoke to me of the "heaviness" he and his wife have been feeling around New Orleans. I have felt it but made a decision to acknowledge it and Work against it (which is not the same as denying its existence)

My presence has been greater than average.

My pondering from last night:

It's clear to me there's an energy out there right now. That was verified in here yesterday. Greg's response led to a deep insight.

We are to transform that energy. That's part of The Work. We are transformers for that energy. And it's going to move through us, one way or another. Many people process this through giving money and mourning at what they see. This is automatic suffering.

Greg's response talks about Intentional Suffering, I think. Or, one way of Intentional Suffering. That is using the same energy for a different purpose. And there is a gain from that use.

I want to take this a step further. I think that this forum is a benefit for just this reason. I had an experience. Something unusual for me. Dark, disturbing dreams that had no relation to my normal patterns. kdumphrey indicated that this wasn't me, alone. And Greg followed up with his response. This led to my pondering yesterday. Because I felt the instinctive truth of Greg's response, though my means would be different than his.

A hurricane is an event. I'm not sure that the hurricane is a cause. It's an energy that is releasing other energies. And I'm not talking just about watching devestation on the news, because I don't do that. (Though it is patently clear that America is a third world country populated by 97% poor Blacks, if you watch that coverage!--and we claim not to be racist.) And we are tied into these energies. What we do with them is our choice. That's freedom of choice. That's choosing to Work. And that's Working for something beyond our own "selves".

---

by Greg

Harry,

Thanks for your post.

BTW, each morning I have awakened, I HAVE felt an intense weightiness in my thighs on down through my calves. I sleep on a blanket directly on the floor (as I have done for the last 3.5 years). This has taught me how to rest my planetary body.

I recommend it to anyone who can stand it ---- not all of us can, and certainly, none of us "should".

Will write more later.

Harry writes:

> We are to transform that energy. That's part of The Work. We are transformers for that energy. And it's going to move through us, one way or another.

Yes, indeed. I think it was old Teilhard de Chardin who used to talk of the "re-spiritualisation of the Earth". Rudolph Steiner, too. It is a reality I have experienced in dancing. And G.s business of us being transformers of energies means that we can help "lift" the electrical charge.

Tragic disasters, such as New Orleans, are an alarm clock for me to watch my "stupid saint". I grew up in a household where altruism was the name of the game. Of course, the blinding reality of the fact was that none of us really had much to base altruism on to begin with --- often the case in those who wish to "be of help". so many who have so much to offer in such circumstances won't. But, that, of course, is part of the "Terror of the Situation"

As I got older, I learned that my (automatic) altruism was a convenient way to hide myself. Related to Work ("Hiding your light under a bushel")but really in the realm of "ordinary life" psychology.

Intentional Suffering is accepting the fact that I cannot do everything --- that I came into the Work as an Energetic Degenerate --- a Bad Machine. That alone limits me whether the "i"s like that or not (Did yours gasp in horror at the term Energetic Degenerate? Mine did! )

Having spent a great deal/most of my life in creative work as a serious path, I know only too well the "drag" of the earth and its affairs. It's a knife's edge, I don't want to fall into the pit of Narcissism yet I absolutely must "self-protect". This particular time does not want serious artists anymore than it wants sincere Workers. It wants entertainment ----- tap dancing while the earth cracks.

Transformation of energy through my activities, and the quality of those activities c a n help to raise the energy level. That is service I c a n "safely" and realistically do. And I believe in it. When I get a student devoted to the dance and see that moment where his/her body and mind intersect in the heat of movement, the consciousness has raised a notch, the vibrational level has increased. And in that moment there is the possibility that a taste for the higher has been touched.

I've been reading the posts re the hurricane disaster with interest.

Just wanted to add;
Here on the far side of the world (Australia), the effects are still clearly felt, so distance is not the complete story. The numbers of calls to crisis-line centers are up considerably, although most people tend to internalise the energy and believe their own problems are causing the distress.
It's not surprising really. The people affected are fellow human-beings, and we're all living in the same atmosphere.

So what am I looking at ?
Distress, concern, worry, sadness - the more subtle forms of negative emotions. And they linger.

And,yes, I can work. That is my best way of helping.
An example of what Nicoll calls "psycho-transformism" perhaps.

The "heaviness" is a Holy Denying. So I affirm the wish to Be, and the Work is the Reconciling force as I "make holy" the intentional suffering.
And we all have a prayerful weekly exercise too.

Best wishes,
Judy.

All I can think about when I hear about New Orleans is my own pain at being forced at gunpoint to leave my pet. I could not. I have had a canine friend for the last nine years who has taught me things I never could learn from a human relationship. She is the best friend I have ever had.

I have been awed while watching her accept my constant rejection, only to return an hour later without a shred of resentment or bitterness. If only I could act so when my "needs" are not met by other humans when and how I desire them to be.

I have felt the deepest emotions of affection for her when I have returned home late at night after being gone all day and watched her greet me only with her tail wagging, and a ball or some other toy in her mouth, never with a shameful "where have you been!" Never once has she judged me for any of my acts of arrogance, pride, or vanity.

She is wholly just in my eyes. Yes, her understanding of just is different then mine. In her mind, if I, or any other "dog," sets something down, it belongs to her as soon as she establishes control over it. Dog laws don't always coincide with human laws. But not once has she ever made an unjust demand on me. If her water bowl is empty, she doesn't expect me to fill it. She simply patiently waits. No human has ever treated me so fair.

How, then, could I just leave her to painfully starve to death, or to be devoured by some other creature? And for her to frantically watch me leave, not understanding why. I could not bear it. Am I attached to her? Am I no longer impartial? Why do I not feel the pain of those humans down there I do not know? Should I? And what normal man would not defend those he loves? If I did fight the authorities to protect my "child," would I merely be doing it mechanically? And wouldn't I kill an animal similar to my dog if I were starving? My "world" is so small and egotistical. These are the thoughts that have troubled me this week.

In my silence, I have found innumerable places of high hope and heaviness too. There are spaces between the different emotions there that resonate with Being but mainly I find that the Silence is its own Meaning.

Judy, your last post was quite inspiring. For me the Denying force remains my quite judgements and all-too-quick anger. I "temper" this with the Affirming Work and as I sense it, the outcomes, the pauses in my normal reactions become my Reconciling.

To remain deep within my own heart as I see distant and not-so-distant suffering is an awe-full practice. Helpful or not, it has Power and has touched me this week.

And I have worried non-stop all week. For all my efforts this simply does not go away --- it duplicates like the brooms in the SORCERER's APPRENTICE. "Worry" : a subtle egocentricity which seeks to disrupt Cosmic Law.

James writes:

My parents concern all week "What do with do with Niklausz (their Polish sheepdog) should such a thing happen here?" We decided we all simply all go wherever together.

Nicoll has said in LIVING TIME that dogs look to us as a kind of god/goddess since we can, according to our Laws, open boxes, cans, windows doors.

If they only knew.

Hi Oshee,

1. There were 4 exercises. (Although I suppose with some effort the first 3 could be done together.)

2. Basically do what you can. Ideally one could do all of the exercises on a daily basis. You could pick one and work with it all day, say for 1 minute an hour to start with. Or you could try each exercise once or twice a day. Try them in different life situations.

3. There are different kinds of prayer. Inner silence is one kind of prayer, and it could also be called silent meditation. The Self-gathering Prayer is that type.
There is also a practice called Prayer of the Heart, which involves silently repeating words or phrases. In yoga, it is called Jappa, and it is sort of like a silent mantra.
Another form of prayer is Contemplation - in the Work we tend to call it Pondering. That is where one puts a question or a spiritual concept before the mind and dwells on it without expectation of receiving an answer.

[quote="oshee what is "Consume Your Conduit for Wish to Be."? I don't understand it.[/quote]

The breath of Endlessness is the Ray of Creation.
Your Currents frictions of joy and sorrow could be thought of as ascending and descending octaves of energies in the Ray of Creation.
These currents created us and nourish us and consume us in the process of reciprocal maintenance. We are conduits through which these energies flow. A Wish to Be from Endlessness also flows through these conduits.
This all has something to do with understanding Who we are.

Ian,

your answer made my mind clear about the excises and what prayer mean in this exercises.

One more question about "Consume Your Conduit for Wish to Be.": what is "wish to be"? to be myself? to be essence or personality?Is "wish to be" an energy?

Anybody could answer me the above question? Thanks.

May I share this?

Behind the words is the thought
Behind the thought is the experience
Behind the experience is that which we search for
That which we search for is found in Silence?

A friend in the Work sent me this recently. He also reminded me that silence is not isolation, quite the opposite.

Jose,
Thanks for your comment. You mentioned "sitting in the silence" in your post, and so I thought you may like the above, as I do.

It seems to me that this prayer has a similar meaning to the Holy Equation prayer. It uses an electric (or electronic) analogy, but isn't the last line basically saying "Transubstantiate in me, for my Being"?

Also, where does this prayer come from please ?
It is very beautiful.

A woman had a dog and a cat as pets. One evening, as usual, she was preparing dinner for them while they sat and watched. The dog thought: wow. this person feeds me everyday, and takes care of me, and always treats me wonderfully. She must be a god! The cat thought: wow. this person feeds me everyday, and takes care of me, and always treats me wonderfully. I must be a god!

A joke I heard somewhere along the way.

Wish to Be - yes, to be yourself - essence; Being; Real I;
Life is real only then, when I am.

Is wish to be energy? Hmmm? I suppose it could be. That is actually a very tough question to answer; one of those questions that is good for Pondering on.
Is desire energy? Is thought energy? Is information energy?
Gurdjieff said everything is material, except time. We know that e=mc2.

Maybe wish is more like time?

"Only Time alone has no sense of objectivity because it is not the result of the fractioning of any definite cosmic phenomena. And it does not issue from anything, but blends always with everything and becomes self-sufficiently independent; therefore, in the whole of the Universe, it alone can be called and extolled as the 'Ideally-Unique-Subjective-Phenomenon.'"

"Thus, my boy, uniquely Time alone, or, as it is sometimes called, the 'Heropass,' has no source from which its arising should depend, but like 'Divine-Love' flows always as I have already told you, independently by itself, and blends proportionately with all the phenomena present in the given place and in the given arisings of our Great Universe."

I have tried to ponder that quote on time as the "uniquely subjective."

I have no real experience of what it means. But I think maybe it means that when you truly remember yourself, you are in the eternal present. You are not using filters or buffers from past experiences or pre-conceptions. You are objective, and not in time.

I wonder if it is related to the comments I recently read in Introducing Neuro-Linguistic Programming: Psychological Skills for Understanding and Influencing People by Joseph O'Connor. I don't have the book in front of me now, but he says that the way we form the perception of time varies by culture. He states Western Man experiences time as a Timeline from left to right. He alludes to tests that are done where we involuntarily look to the left when remembering the past, and to the right when imagining the future. Eastern Man experiences Now. And for him there is an endless series of Nows that are all immediatley behind us (the past) or in front of us (the future).

If we are immediately present in Now, we are less prone to ruminate the past or fantasize the future. We have to make a conscious decision to ponder an experience or thought, or to focus on an aim.

We are also less absorbed in the spectrum of time from past regrets to future worries.

Maybe you can help me understand more about this Merciless Heropass.

I liked Judy's rewording. I find the Work gives great depth to my religion. To use her rewording gives insight the passage similar to the following "Objective Truth":

"For the Bread of God is That Which comes down from Heaven and gives life to the world" (Jn. 6: 33)

I think others in the Work have pointed out that the Latin Vulgate translation of St. Mathew's version of the Lord's Prayer states:

6:11 Give us this day our supersubstantial bread (Douay-Rheims translation).

The Ray of Creation, Step Diagram, the friction in the retort, Conscious Shocks... all of these can to me be seen in these words.

by Judy

kdumphrey wrote;

> I have tried to ponder that quote on time as the "uniquely subjective."

A couple of comments as to what occurs to me here; subjective (existing in the mind) Here the idea of "interpretation by the mind" enters also.

Therefore perception of time may alter every time the mind alters.
This then covers not only different people (let alone species), but different ages/states etc. in the same person.
We thus have a curious situation where one's perception of time may change continually. (an interesting loop, isn't it ?)

"Uniquely subjective" then would indicate that nothing else is as subjective as time.

Of course these comments barely scratch the surface of a huge topic, but may add something to your pondering..

Best wishes.
Judy.

by Guest

I was thinking about Judy's comments, and have the following questions.

Is it possible to consciously manipulate time?

Do buffers serve as a way to "kill time?"

Milton Erikson used hypnosis with cancer patients. He told them to consciously experience the intense pain without avoiding any of it for one moment, and then for the next hour they would feel nothing. Is this a way of using the subjectivity of time?

I think J.G. Bennet said that Consciousness was an ocean we were part of or floated upon, but that an even finer energy was Will. If we have been graced with moments when we feel outside of time, have we been touched by these higher energies?

---

by Harry

Time is uniquely subjective because each and every entity experiences time differently. As O said, 84 years is but a breath for the earth. And we all know that time is subjective even for us, given the circumstances. We're into what we're doing and time passes quickly. But time passes slowly up here in the mountains.

Time enters into every entity according to the entity and that particular slice of the time space continuum.

To a one year old, a whole life time is lived by the next birth day.
To an 80 year old, that next birthday is 1/80th away.
And certain insects live but a few hours.
Certain microbes perhaps seconds.
And the human name doesn't mean shit to a tree.

Work Program week beginning 12 September 2005

by Ian

In the morning, upon arising, evoke an inner smile. Keep this smile within you as you go about your daily life.

During the day at work, observe the emotions that characterise annoyances. Meet all the annoyances with a calm indifference firmly rooted in the marrow of the bones. Rejoice in the reconciliation by evoking an inner smile.

Once or twice a day, sit quietly until the body is still and comfortable, the emotions open and receptive and the mind calm. Then allow the eyes to move from one object to the next within your sight. As soon as you notice a label popping up in your mind,("This is a - chair, lamp, papers, pen, carpet", etc.) shift your gaze to another object. Do not allow the eyes to rest too long on any object, merely notice the effects this has.

In the evening, while deeply relaxing and sensing the planetary body and following the breath, ponder or contemplate on this question - "Is Being what arises when we hold both affirmation and denying at once in this pitched battle for our attention?"

by James F

I have had mixed results with allowing my eyes to move from one object to another. When I can put a check on automatic labeling, I have experienced a distinct separation from myself as an observer and the machine observing. Most times though, I have found myself labeling an object before I even move my eyes to it. To counter this, I have been mentally repeating a phrase or counting. It seems my mind can't label as quickly if it is already concentrating on repeating words.

In the evening, pondering "Is Being what arises when we hold both affirmation and denying at once in this pitched battle for our attention?" has shown me that I really don't understand "affirming" and "denying" yet. So, I started navigating the site for help. And this has been very fruitful. Ian, your site is a goldmine. Thank you for not hiding what you have learned, or treating your knowledge and experience as "trade secrets" that only a chosen few are privileged to access.

Interesting observations. I would have to concur. Keep the mind busy with a 'mantra' and it is less likely to be diverted. The question is - by using these diversionary tactics, what are we missing? Could those diverted resources be better used if we were able to just keep the mind silent?

Thanks. This stuff isn't rocket science. Much of it has been known for centuries. Those who try to keep these things as trade secrets are only trying to 'trade' them for their own self importance. As G once supposedly said (slightly paraphrased) - What I teach is very simple - When it rains, the streets get wet.

A good understanding of the 3 forces is essential for this Work.
Look at the Ray of Creation. What is Si? It has 3 laws - or is that the law of 3? Everything below that is a multiple of 3. Understand the law of 3 and you are no longer under the 48-96-192 or whatever laws. Or at least you can 'Si' through them.

Ian wrote:

> Could those diverted resources be better used if we were able to just keep the mind silent?

If I could only do so! When I sit in meditation, I am able to relax my body and keep my emotions neutral, but the most I can silence my thoughts for is about 15 seconds. Then, when there are no thoughts, I think something like: "this is good." Or "yes, now you're getting it." And alas! I'm thinking again. Does anyone have any suggestions for how I can get beyond this? Is it actually possible to keep one's thoughts silent for minutes or hours at a time?

I really like this exercise of moving from object to object without labeling. I sense that with practice, it could really help me to not automatically label impressions from the external world as "irritating" or "annoying" or whatever. Practicing this exercise might help me to remember that external events, interactions with others, and places I visit, are really just impressions, and that my labeling/interpreting of those impressions transforms them either negatively, or positively, inside me.

In any event, the more I try not to label, the more I label. Tell the machine not to do something, and it immediately wants to do it.

Observe the thoughts and let them pass. Soon thoughts can be seen as things which pass through us, for the most part. You think something when you say yes to it.

This makes sense to me Harry. And I can see how by saying "Yes" to the thoughts as they pass through, I could be identifying with them. But does there ever come a point in meditation where there are no thoughts passing through? Does the flow ever stop? I hear of people reaching very emotional states during meditation; I never have. When I end a period of meditation I have a heightened sense of awareness and calmness, but I've never felt very emotional. Do these emotional states people talk about follow a prolonged period (several minutes) of no thoughts passing through? I'm asking basic meditation questions, I guess. Really just wondering if I need to practice more, or if having a flow of thoughts that I should "observe" is normal. And I would like to get more out of this "non-labeling" exercise.

Just noticed that inner smile for me is a quite interesting thing - I can do it without a smile on my face and it easily evokes those sensations in my solar plexus.

> During the day at work, observe the emotions that characterise annoyances. Meet all the annoyances with a calm indifference firmly rooted in the marrow of the bones. Rejoice in the reconciliation by evoking an inner smile.

Seems that it's the best way for me not to identify with annoyances. Quite sinple but really works. Going to use that. Thanks again, Ian!

> Once or twice a day, sit quietly until the body is still and comfortable, the emotions open and receptive and the mind calm. Then allow the eyes to move from one object to the next within your sight. As soon as you notice a label popping up in your mind,("This is a - chair, lamp, papers, pen, carpet", etc.) shift your gaze to another object. Do not allow the eyes to rest too long on any object, merely notice the effects this has.

For me the effect was like that I have when remembering myself - I felt that everything around me is important - not because it is part of one or another of my activities but important by itself.

> In the evening, while deeply relaxing and sensing the planetary body and following the breath, ponder or contemplate on this question - "Is Being what arises when we hold both affirmation and denying at once in this pitched battle for our attention?"

For me the answer I came to is: "Yes, but maybe not only that"
This theme began to return not only in evenings - I began to notice those moments of "this pitched battle for my attention" saying to myself: "That's it!" Yes, those are the moments that are important - most of other time is just mechanical functioning.

The Moving Eye Meditation is designed to produce just the effects you have mentioned James--the quick jumping to another thought or idea (in this case a mantra) in order to try to quiet the mind or to simply give up in frustration. But try to do neither. Harry was quite right in this regard and it might be helpful to continue using this exercise regularly (I have been doing it for about 5 years now.)

By keeping our eyes moving we are already engaged in all the activity we need do for taht 15 minute period. The rest is to watch how quickly we jump to a label and to observe exactly how we do that. With discipline and practice, we can learn much about ourselves--that the very act of quieting does not really do that but instead releases a tremendous amount of energy that we are only now beginning to see. But we can see it and that is the charm! For we can observe the machine at its most subtlest: the actual labelling process. By stepping back and sort of tricking the mind by moving from one object to the next, we can eventually anticipate exactly how long it takes to label a thing from that first, non-conceptual awareness to a name. (1/64th of a second according to one old Buddhist meditation manual--designed 2000 years ago!)We can as well make note of where in our bodies we tense up or flinch or whatever and instead learn to rest in the Awareness that is anterior to thoughts and labels. See where that takes you...

Re: smiling. This week has provided much material forr inner smiling and coupled with the Moving Eye Meditation has mead this week very sharp, open and precise. Instead of lunging towards my usual compulsions, I have stepped back and watched as I could Witness the movement to label them such and smile instead, creating a warmth within the body that seems past trivialities. Very helpful...

James,

You can't stop perceptions. You can avoid unnecessary thoughts. Or avoid identifying with them. You are a perception machine. You eat perceptions the same way you eat food. The trick is to choose your food. If you eat at McDonalds. . .well you get the idea.

As to altered state, yes you move into altered states. But the states aren't so much a goal as another state. If you make the altered state a goal, then you stop when you reach that goal.

Thanks Harry, Jose. Yes, this pesky labeling. I need to just simply observe it. Observe the labeling. I do it all day long. My judging, my efforts to classify people, things, ideas. Maybe at the root of my questions about the exercise there was just another attempt by my mind to label--to label the exercise. Then, of course, once I could safely attach a label to it, I would be able to just stick it on a shelf somewhere and forget about it, like I do with everything else I have "figured out."

James

by Jose

Hi James,
Labeling and doing the exercise are both activities of the mind. The difference is that the activity of the exercise is to watch as the mind works; as it labels things. It ends up revealing that BEFORE labeling exists an open Awareness, lucid, clear and free from obscurations. Resting in that is the "goal" one might say. This is tough at first but when it happens it creates a marvelous space, without a sense of time or urgency to simply observe the variegated processes of the machine. You can either then, 1. enjoy the show, or 2. keep some of the impressions of what you witness in mind in order to later Work on them. That is where for me, the nexus of this exercise (Buddhist derivative/oriented) and the 4th Way come quite in handy. If you choose to Work on what you have "seen" then this involves Efforts, big Efforts if you want to change. but you can´t change what you don´t see and even still, as an old friend and mentor put it, "Discovery is not recovery." It takes Work...

Right. The function of the intellectual brain is to produce thoughts. We can stop them temporarily, but I don't think we can stop thoughts permanently. Like with fasting from eating, we can go on short 'mental fasts'. I think the trick is to observe but not identify.

The same would apply to our emotions.

Good point about altered states. There is a saying - You can never step into the same river twice - that I think is good to consider in relation to various altered states we may enter.

I think in the long run that a heightened sense of awareness and calmness would be sort of a baseline state that we should aim to develop.
Contentedness might be a way to describe this emotionally. An inner smile. Bemused contentment. Or laughter at the absurdity of it all.

Someone who is emotionally centered might experience stronger emotions during meditation. I certainly don't think the purpose of meditation is to acheive some sort of emotional orgasm. What kind of emotions did the people you mentioned experience?

Some emotional experiences during meditation might actually be buffers, defense mechanisms against some deeper understanding.

One may want to distinguish between intense emotion and physical ecstacy. If one experiences an uprush of prana (kundalini) there may be physical sensations as well as 'insights'. The Ah-ha experience can have its own emotional charge accompanyied by physical sensations. This may be what some mystics report as states of ecstacy. Usually these states are temporary. If they become pathological, something is wrong, unbalanced.

Once the initial 'rush' of discovery and insight has passed, these realizations simply become 'the way it is.' Chop wood, carry water.

G talks about higher emotions such as faith, hope, love, compassion and remorse.

There is an episode in the Tales where Hussein cries and one in Meetings where Skridlove cries.

There is also several passages in Life is Real where G describes some of his emotional states. Here are a couple -

"And this whispering of theirs and their complete understanding of each other always caused in me this feeling of being deeply touched."

and

"I remember very well that because of my just-mentioned conviction my whole being was filled as if by some singular, never till now experienced, feeling of joy.
Simultaneously with this, in me of itself, and without any manipulation on my part, there appeared the sensation of so to say "self remembering," also of a never-before-experienced vigor."

Ian, you pretty well described the emotional experiences I've heard/read about. I've also read descriptions of people having sudden gushes of tears. In any event, the thoughts you've shared make a lot of sense to me. And I think you've answered a lot of other questions that have been floating around inside me as well. Thanks.

Harry, you wrote:

> You eat perceptions the same way you eat food. The trick is to choose your food. If you eat at McDonalds. . .well you get the idea.

It sounds like you're saying we should carefully choose our perceptions (impressions?). Would you say that how we interpret the perceptions/impressions we "eat" is even more important than which perceptions/impressions we eat? I kind of think of impressions in and of themselves as neutral, and that how I "digest" them depends on how I receive them.

James

---

by Harry

James,

Is food neutral? Yes, what we do with any input is important. But if you open a can and it has a bad aroma, you aren't going to eat it. Different i's feed on different perceptions. And if we feed an i we're trying to separate from, then we are "eating" that food with a bad aroma.

What we do with it is important. We can transform negative emotions, for example. We can benefit from the energy others waste. But we have to be sure we can use that energy.

Jose, I'm not sure what you mean here by 'keeping some of the impressions to work on them later'. I see that my mind labels impressions, and I see the labels my mind assigns to the impressions. How, or in what way, do I work on what I have "seen?" In other words, if I focus on a lamp, here is what I "see": (1) an impression of an object in space existing "outside" me, (2) a label pops in my head (lamp) as a thought, and (3) an awareness that my mind has attached a label (lamp) to the the impression. What do you keep to work on later?

James

---

by Jose

Excellent questions James,

For example, I move my eyes and notice how there is an amazingly quick moment of recognition "Object on floor", then "carpet pattern"
then it gets even more detailed "red/blue"
then even more "dog hairs, poop stain", then there is a slight movement within my belly or abdomen area which seems connected to the next "observation": "God I hate that F%&$ing dog!"

When I refer to keeping the impression for later I can reflect on my anger, how it gets triggered, how I need to take responsibility for the dog´s actions, etc, etc. This is just one example.

Another, in the lamp case, might be to watch as the associations with the lamp arise and in what order. The main purpose during the 15 minute session (a pretty good session) is to simply observe HOW the mind works. Once you are aware of this (it appears you have now done this a few times to get that part) then you can begin to "notice" the specific labels, their origins and the areas that perhaps you might want to return to later.

If you caught the stomach/abdoment reference I gave above, you will see how the mere act of relaxing and becoming aware can expand into areas that I might gain some control over later on. I can notice how each time I get upset or angry at not having control over aspects of my life (the dog pooping or some such) I tense up at the belly and instead of acting on the anger I can relax the belly, not identifying with the impulse and change the behavior. Or I can make note of that as one of the many "I"´s involved in my Life and reflect on how other emotions and actions are triggered in different parts of my body and how that becomes the beginnign of understanding how this machine really works. Does that make sense?

Once an hour, make an effort to return to the still-point in the centre of the whirlwind of thoughts, emotions and sensations.

When annoyances of thought, emotion or sensation draw us into identification, counter them with a conscious affirmation, a 'doing otherwise', such as, instead of trying to banish the annoyance immediately, dwell upon it, observe it, examine it, experience its energy deeply. Then send its energy into the earth and return to your still-point.

External consider always; internal consider never.

---

by Harry

I have worked much this week, but have to admit that I didn't follow the exercises. I like the idea of "sending into the earth".

Have been spending much time talking with my son. . .dealing with his discoveries, struggles. By teaching I shall be taught.

One interesting side night: I posted about my response to the last hurricane landing. This time both my son, who is 250 miles from my, and I woke at the exact moment of landfall. We both had the same experience. As if an alarm was going off next to our heads.

If such events carry a communication connection, then how wise were our ancestors to talk about Nature Gods. Some tribal witch doctor in northern Indiana responding to a hurricane hitting Texas predicts storms a couple days later. . .and to him it was mystical.

---

by Jose

I found this week how easy it is to "do" things that are important and yet how when I do return to that stillpoint, the things I do are so much better.

This week I have been struggling with studies and limited time while doing the usual house father routine I have been in since returning to school. Papers, voluminous reading and the routines of studying are things I always enjoyed but now I do them with small children and little assistance from my wife. I have felt overburdened all week long and yet the hours I stopped and returned within, locating that stillpoint, energized me.

The affirmations section was difficult, I tried and tried but found instead I was led to ignoring the upset and attempted to bury myself into another activity. Hiking, I returned to earth what was originally Hers and this helped somewhat. Today I hiked for several miles with my son on my back, climbed a small mountain near my house with a friend and then worked out at the gym for 2 hours. Physically I have pushed the weeks´annoyances away. Mentally and emotionally, they remain, though a bit in the background.

Just a quick post to say hello to everyone. I, too, am in the middle of a few unusually busy weeks.

> Once an hour, make an effort to return to the still-point in the centre of the whirlwind of thoughts, emotions and sensations.

This is actually the way I prefer to work (apart from two quiet times daily).
I've noticed that during the daily inventory (review), these times stand out in vivid detail in the memory. Very distinct. The rest of the day seems pale by comparison. Good confirmation of slight increase in consciousness level.

Best wishes,
Judy.

There is a tendency in my to make a negative reaction less intensive when I remember to work with it - it required additional effort not to interfere with a reaction and to remain in still point not trying to change anything. I have also liked the idea of "sending that to the earth".

Remembering a still point seemed like some trick for me - though I'm not sure that such a point exists in me trying to "hear the silence" stilled all the inner associations. I found out that it's not very difficult to remain with that "listening to silence" while doing several things, even while talking. As always, the main point is to remember about that, and I had quite a lucky week in this regard - my associations reminded me about the exercise quite often. The result was much more calm and collected state that I usually have.

I read the exercises and forget to make effort afterwards, my machine always care for something else which it always care for. What I did this week(and almost the same for the four week since I joined this forum) is just reading, but reading is a habitual mode of my intellectual centre. The machine is reluctant to do something with which it were not so familiar. I could hear an inner voice saying: this is somewhat unnatural, maybe not suitable for me, etc.

Anyway, after reading 13 chapters related with internal and external considering of commentaries by maurice nicoll again, knowing that you must make some of your "i"s passive to the machanical reactions, then you could consider externally, I did make some efforts of making myself more passive to all the reactions, and found this create a space to breath fresh air, meaning some new possibilities to response more conciously to others, althrough the efforts is still not intense.

Bell Meditation.

Sit quietly. Ring a bell. Follow the sound until it fades completely. Then ring it again. Follow the sound until nothing is heard.

Now follow the mind that is trying to follow the sound. Where is this "mind"? Who is listening? What is listening? Notice as the "mind" develops a core, an "I", it becomes - "I am doing this exercise," or "This is stupid and I don´t get it," or any of a million other opinionated "I's".

Now that you have watched your mind go back into action and begin to do its "I" dance again, STOP! and ring the bell again. Follow the sound until it fades. Now follow the mind that is trying to follow that sound.

The subtle aspect here is that there is never a moment when you are not participating and thus are the Creator of all your experience. The Watcher IS the Creator, at least the aspect of it we can, while embodied partake in. But as you do this more and more often even the Watcher can be "seen thru" and you are left with...

by Anton

Seems like a Buddhist meditation. I'm reading Tartang Tulku's "Time, Space and Knowledge" now and there are very similar exercises there, one of the aims of which are to build an ability to "see through" mental constructions and let them become "space" while still remaining what they are.

Nevertheless, going to try that.

---

by Harry

I found this week's exercise an interesting choice. I had just begun experiencing the vibration of sounds differently. Hearing with my whole body, if you will.

This morning as I lay in bed I was thinking about the exercise. The only bell I have in the house hangs in my bedroom window. But I was listening to the birds. Following their sounds. I remember doing this as a youth.

Birds start and stop. But birds mostly seemed mostly in my head. Vibrations from music seems to cover my entire body. The bell fades and then picks up a sort of intensity before fully fading away. I could only locate the bell in ears.

Following the sounds is something I began balanced. So there were no stupid i's involved.

Is mechanical stupid? Or is mechanical just mechanical?

---

by Greg

This is an interesting exercise to have come up.

Three weeks ago while working against/with the awareness of the hurricane I became accutely aware of a continuous bell-tone which was ringing 10-12 inches above by head (I am 6' 4" to give you a proportion picture) This was actually a re-aquaintance with ths tone as I had first "heard" it while breathing during reading. This time I was able to access it "on call". Let me make this clear, that I am referring to an "inner-hearing". It is a bell tone that is always there but must be uncovered through a particular searching attitude on my part. During the "hurricane episode" it very much became "food" and as Harry has stated this week, it resonated and filled my entire body. I was able to sustain my awareness of it while deep in conversation with people --- a kind of divided attention. It's presence linked me with a kind of "Joy". It was most definitely there as an affirmation of higher thought and feeling going on. After a little over a week, it faded. I've accessed it once since then for about an hour and a half. What was nice about this was how it enhanced the dailiness of my life --- their was no escapism in it. In fact, my deeper involvement in the "everyday" seemed to increase it's "ringingness". Their was that kind of rerciprocality going on.

I hope this doesn't sound too flakey . . . it's Realness unfortunately eludes the best of description.

Anton,
The meditation is quite influenced by Buddhism and especially from the Tibetan Dzogchen tradition form which Tarthang Tulku Rinpoche is from. I developed this practice for the meditation classes and courses I teach and apparently it has gotten a positive response from the people who have used it.

His TSK book is a wonderful and very "simple" introduction to Dzogchen without the use of specialized language. I have enjoyed his teachings for many years (Of course, one may find a number of parallel practices in Nisargadatta´s work, or Ramana Maharshi, as well as Andrew Cohen, Ken Wilber, Kiran and Ramesh Balsekar--all influenced by advaita.)

The object is to Witness the way one co-creates every impression, every thought, wevery impulse by attempting to trace back the beginnings of the actual process. Who is listening? But perhaps most importantly, who is asking? When we rest there a far greater openness is Present and accessible to us for we are in the midst of it all the time--only we rarely, if ever notice. On a practical, physical level, the 4th Way Stop! exercises achieve an embodied awareness similar.

I noticed the same thing with my guitar. I didn't think much of it until you mentioned it Harry. I don't have a bell at the moment, so I decided to try strumming one note (low E) on my six-string acoustic (actually it is a classical that I put steel strings on). I don't hear it every time, and it seems to depend on how much force I apply when I "pluck" the note.

Tried the exercise twice. For me an answer I have for the recent moment is that behind the Watcher is a "state". It can be not in accord with Buddhist tradition but there's much of body and feelings in that state, but without a sense of I, just "wheels turning".

To Jose: could you try to summarize what in Dzogchen can be of interest for someone who follows the path of Gurdjieff Work? Recently I often hear about Dzogchen from my friends in the Work, I have even attended a "video initiation" by Namkhai Norbu Rinpoche this Spring. As far as I know there's not much similarity between these two traditions but there are still some points where Dzogchen could help to understand something better. As for Tarthang Tulku's TSK book I myself felt that it has to be something like an introduction to Dzogchen, and I feel that such an introduction is much better for me as I don't have to learn anything about Dzogchen teachers, symbolism and so on - the things I wouldn't like to concentrate much on as I'm trying to put most of my free energy into Gurdjieff Work. Did you try to express Dzogchen terms and techniques in Work terms? For example, after the retreat I mentioned above I felt that the "Initial State" in Dzogchen can be somehow connected with H12 or even H6 energies.

---

by Jose

Hello Anton,
I will try to be brief here since I am unsure how much others are interested in this topic.

Dzogchen is short for Dzogpa Chenpo and means "Great Perfection". It is also referred to as "Ati-Yoga" in the nine yana scheme of the Nyingma sect of Tibetan Buddhism introduced by Padmasambhava who entered Tibet from an area that was probably Iran or Pakistan. Its main pupose is to direct the practitioner to "see" the nature of Mind, which is said to be pure, without obstructions and luminous. It requires an authentic teacher to give one "pointing out instructions" and no video "initiation" can substitute. It requires no particular symbols since it is the inherent nature of Mind that is pointed towards.

Once a student has, if only for a few moments experienced such, then the remaining "practice" is to always rest in that state, continuously, in whatever activity one is engaged in. Householders, solitary practitioners and monastics alike are traditionally regarded as Masters within the Dzogchen tradtion and, as I mentioned before, it is entirely possible that Gurdjieff, who claimed he was married to a Tibetan woman, had access to these teachings through her. As well, the "Sarmung" Monastery might be a simple reversal of a few vowels from Surmang, which is a famous set of temples in Tibet known for their exotic dances and Mahamudra teachings which are similar to Dzogchen.

As far as I am concerned, all "paths" are a bunch of words designed to break our habits into a real knowing. If we presume, from a 4th Way context, that the real "I", or the moment when we can say with conviction "I am", is one where we can take our egos with us, we are fundamentally mistaken. That "I" has to die first--and this is in every tradition. Thus the attainment of some insight is merely a first step onto real Awakening, in Dzogchen or the 4th Way.

Where the 4th Way fits for me is in the constant and regular examination of all mechanicalness throught the use of exercises, contemplations, affirmations, etc., that can be used quite well and "easily" in daily life. It is also a path eminently suited for Westerners for whom many of the trappings of other ideas might not fit.

It is not necessary to attempt comparisons and I find the Hydrogens talk impenetrable and obscure. (But I found an excellent set of explanations in "High Priests, Quantum Genes") What is most important is the progressive stripping away of all the false "I"´s until the radiance of who-we-really-are shines. Thus I find a complementary practice between the 4th Way and Dzogchen. (I studied for many years with one of the highest ranking Dzogchen teachers-- Dzogchen Ponlop Rinpoche. If you would like more info. you can contact me personally.)

I, too, found this quite a deep exercise.

A momentary happening whilst observing sensations.
It doesn't seem necessary to go on about it. Basically it was a view of my form from the inside, where it appeared translucent, almost like flexible glass.

I'm finding that these weekly exercises are increasing my ability to look at life from the Work, rather than looking at the Work from life; in fact they are helping this reversal, which is a subsidiary aim for me. So they are indeed helpful. Thanks Ian.

Each time in order to move on to more work, I seek an attituse of " Well, so glad I attempted that. I hope I can do it again." Otherwise too easy to be caught up in searching for details, which doesn't usually succeed anyway.

During the week, in conjunction with observing and sensing your breathing, Ponder:

Breakfast - What happens to impressions after we 'eat and digest' them?
Coffee Break - Can we become the ringing of the bell, the sense of sensation, the feeling of emotion?
Lunch - Is there a silence or space in the center of the sound, sensation, feeling?
Tea Break - What remains constant in the midst of the changing flow of perceptions?
Dinner - What is the third force in the subject-object equation?

End each Pondering with an Inner Smile.

My first participation here. I was put off by the complexity of the task, multiple times of day with different directives per each. How many of you actually have any intention of actually carrying that out? carrying arround a piece of paper with all those details.
However, giving it a try I rapidly discovered a step beyond my usual depth. It appears I have a habit to going to a vertical place, the silence, noting its wonder and my success and then drifting back and forth, to and fro. Following this task, I was called to look further. We'll see.

Tim,

I think Ian would agree. Start with something. Start with what part first appeals to you. Then add the next. And one will begin to remind you of the other.

There is a resistance to Work. Period. That resistance exists because many "things" want us to remain as we are. Mechanical devices that serve purposes not our own.

So Work a step at a time. If you get one or two you've started. If you get all five then next week will be harder. . .perhaps.

Harry, what about the insurmountable hurdle of taking a "tea break?" Who does that? Seriously though, very deep stuff this week and last. I've been meaning to share some things and hopefully I'll get a chance soon to gather more of my thoughts. In short, everytime I think I'm starting to grasp my task, I find I'm just grasping at air....

Hello Tim, and Welcome!

Ditto to everything everyone upstairs has said.

Even if you "Stop" and visualize the process at each of those prescribed points during the day you will have begun to change your habit/s and laid some groundwork.

Best to you,

"Being transforms the suffering through which it arises". This quote, found here, is for me the most profound short phrase synopsis of the Work I have ever run into. Is Ian its author? I very often use, "I wish the result of this suffering to be mine, for being" (G. - Undiscovered Country).

I agree Tim, that is an awesome quote.

Two weeks ago we rang the bell. One suggestion was that we might observe how we participate in everything we do. I could not. Perhaps I was too identified with myself during the exercise to see “me” participating. Last week, we watched everything fade like the ringing of the bell. I managed to observe myself relatively constantly over a period of about 4 hours one day at work. I watched everything fade away during this period. As the time went by, I started saying: ok, that’s gone, so I guess that wasn’t me. The next thought or emotion or opinion would arise and I would momentarily think ahhh, this is me, but then it would fade away too.

After a couple of hours of seeing that none of my thoughts, moods, sensations, or feelings remained (everything faded away), I thought, well maybe I’m the one observing all this fading away? But alas, the exercise called for watching our observations fade away as well, and true to form, even my observations faded away. It seemed that nothing was permanent in me. I could observe, but even the observer couldn’t hold onto any of his observations, and at that point, in all seriousness, I became a bit frightened. I began to feel as if I didn’t exist. Even when I identified myself with the observer, there wasn't anything to him because everything he observed faded away as well. (sorry if this is confusing).

I only glimpsed this realization (the feeling that I don’t exist) for a few moments. Then it seems it was too much for me and I backed away from it and let some aspect of my personality take over.

This week: a series of ponderings.

What happens to impressions after we 'eat and digest' them?

I felt like I made some progress here. I made a mental note to return to this often.

Can we become the ringing of the bell, the sense of sensation, the feeling of emotion?

I saw myself as the ringing of the bell—arising with a “dong” then fading away.

Is there a silence or space in the center of the sound, sensation, feeling?

Yes, but it scared the hell out of me.

What remains constant in the midst of the changing flow of perceptions?

Nothingness?

Dinner - What is the third force in the subject-object equation?

Totally lost here.

James

by Jose

James,
You raise some fantastic points here and some very classical questions as well. the big one for me is the fright you got when you felt that there you didn´t exist.

You don´t.

What is classically called in Buddhism, an "experience of emptiness" is a fair description and yes, it does threaten all that you conceive of yourself. But then think about the word. Emptiness. From a Buddhsit take it has two meanings--empty of substance (what you felt that was scary) and completely open and full of potentiality (what you can sense if you continue onward.) Most of us stay in the first fear position without exploring any further what it really means to experience "emptiness."

When we Work past the mechanical "I"´s that 100% dominate our normal, waking lives (bringing this back to 4th Way terms) we might catch a glimpse of a truer consciousness, one that is not locked into our identifications, our lies, our habits, our machine-like operations. We can move within the world then openly, (slyly shall we say?) withour fear or hesitation since we can take in all the impressions and turn them into a food for Awakening. Ans who awakens? Why the "you" that is not the "you" that is conventionally talked about. I hope you keep it up, fear is a powerful motivator for regression or progress. It´s up to you.

For me, what remains constant is this Observing consciousness that is free. If I gained anything this week it was confirmation of that. And I don´t even drink nthat much tea!

Hi Tim,

Welcome!

The quote comes from Paul Beidler. Whether or not he originated it I don't know. It certainly seems to sum things up. The quote you give expresses a similar sentiment and is a good Affirmation to use during moments of suffering.

The 'problem' of suffering and how to deal with it seems to be one of the main influences behind to development of most Religions and Ways. Christianity and Buddhism especially seem to address this problem, but in different ways. Christianity solves the problem by a God who sacrifices Himself on our behalf. Buddhism, which has no supreme deity, solves it by sacrificing the very concept of an individual self. Maybe the truth lies somewhere in the middle?

Suffering is mentioned 28 times in In Search of the Miraculous. Suffering is dealt with extensively in Beelzebub's Tales in terms of Intentional Suffering and in Life is Real in terms of Gurdjieff's own suffering and the value he placed upon it. Ouspensky quotes G as saying we must sacrifice our suffering. Sacrifice can have two meanings: generally we take it to mean to give up something. In its original meaning, it means 'to make sacred'. A close reading of O and G will show that both approaches are appropriate in the proper context. Some suffering is trivial and petty and can be given up. There is other suffering that must be made sacred, like a burnt offering, that produces a fire in the heart that burns away egoism...

"This conscience is not suffering; on the contrary it is joy of a totally new character which we are unable to understand. But even a momentary awakening of conscience in a man who has thousands of different I's is bound to involve suffering. And if these moments of conscience become longer and if a man does not fear them but on the contrary cooperates with them and tries to keep and prolong them, an element of very subtle joy, a foretaste of the future 'clear consciousness' will gradually enter into these moments." ISOM, Chapter 7.

It is a difficult subject and one that is not dealt with in depth in most 4th way literature. I would have to say that in my Work with Paul Beidler, it was the central issue around which our Work revolved.

---

by Ian

> It seemed that nothing was permanent in me.

James,

I think Jose's comments are right on.
This is something we all will have to go through eventually.

Gurdjieff once said: “A man may be born, but in order to be born he must first die, and in order to die he must first awake.”
He also said we have to remember our death and realize our nothingness. There are sayings of a similar vein in the Bible and other sacred literature. Many of the ancient Mysteries involved rituals of death and rebirth. Today we might speak in terms of the death of the ego or our many I's.

This all ties in with Intentional Suffering. Yes, it can be painful and scary.
But there is a flip side to it - when everything is stripped away and nothing remains, in the twinkling of an eye... All and Everything!

by Guest

This has the sound of truth but may be unknow to me. I mentioned my profitable use of, "I wish the result of this suffering be mine for being". I have been experimenting with using it also with pleasure, with what seems to be a similar (to use with suffering) impression of an inner change on the spot. this experiment is directed at a wish for any handle on an extreme form of pleasure which can last for many minutes, when I carefully tend to the "silence". I can readilly "call" this pleasure and am doing it more often. I have no idea weather this is like taking cocaine or hororing God. Am I a drug addict or finding my way into some positive new "place". "You can tell by your experience of it", I hear some wise one say. My questions shows that I cannot. My sence is that Jose's quote is related to my question but I don't have a starting point on how that might "go". We focus, properly, so much on suffering. What about pleasure? Thanks for any insight.

Seeing your situation is the beginning of development of will. Try to take it in such way like it's better to value more your seeing - the observer - the Witness - and value less your old view of yourself as some "existing" entity. Feeling my own nothingness is the beginning of real Work. You have to find a still point in yourself for this witness to live.

Tim

My opinion is that suffering and pleasure are aspects of the denying force. They are fleeting experiences that we either try to escape from or cling to. From a Work point of view, one wants to be free of the like/dislike and enter a more impartial state. Being impartial doesn't necessarily mean having a bland inner life, maybe more like being much less identified or hypnotised; being less 'focused' on certain experiences. Deep pleasure or suffering can induce us into a trance-like state of extreme focus and the exclusion of an awareness of what is around us or the context of our current situation. These states of 'self-abandon' can certainly be liberating in certain contexts and indeed there are religious practices that cultivate both extremes. These states can certainly become addictive - one simply has to look at the neuro transmitters that are released by those practices and compare that with what is known about other addictions.

All our inner experiences are based on hormones and neuro transmitters and electromagnetic energies. These are the higher hydrogens in the food diagram. They ebb and flow through us like the tide and trying to cling to the experiences or escape from them is a fruitless task. We have to learn to bear (or be non-identified) with our suffering as well as our pleasure. "He who kisses the joy as it flies, lives in eternity's sunrise." - William Blake

Gurdjieff talks about objective reason and levels of understanding as being related to higher states of consciousness. Impartiality and non-identification are definitely related more to understanding than to raw physical or emotional pleasure or pain. Break-throughs of understanding are often accompanied by intensly pleasurable sensations (ah-ha experiences) but once you have had a realization you can't have it again - it has become a part of your understanding - unless you somehow unlearn it. That is different from sex, for example, which is a repeatable pleasurable experience. So one has to be careful not to confuse pleasure with understanding.

It is certainly posible to induce or evoke pleasurable experiences in ourselves. But do they also convey understanding or are they simply self indulgent? Higher states of consciousness are associated with so called higher emotions and understanding and there is a certain 'satisfaction' involved with that. (Satisfaction - contentment, equanimity, a sense of finality, of having arrived, that things are perfect as they are, and end to grasping for more.)
So one has to be careful not to confuse pleasure with satisfaction.

by Judy

> All our inner experiences are based on hormones and neuro transmitters and electromagnetic energies. These are the higher hydrogens in the food diagram.

Ian,
Thanks for that reminder. It became quite fruitful pondering material for me.
From higher hydrogens, to working out an octave of digestion, where I have tentatively placed my sample neurotransmitter (serotonin) at la. Do (food) to re (chyme) to mi (venous blood) into the lungs where the first conscious shock from Mother Nature is oxygen from the air breathed, to arterial blood (fa) , to release of the putative precursor to serotonin (the amino-acid tryptophan from our food) (sol) ; thence to serotonin (la), then (very tentatively from here on) to the inherent electromagnetic energy (si), and with the second conscious shock provided through the visual sense, of the impression (eg; a beautiful sunset), the neurons fire and the resulting feeling of (eg; pleasure) is the upper do of this octave.

This may not be correct , yet still represents an improvement, in that the various parts of the System are beginning to fit together and become my own, even if in a small way.

Your comment also reminded me that all these inner experiences are subject to the existence of the physical body, so it's feeling like whatever is relatively conscious in me is very tiny indeed. Maybe just magnetic centre plus the totality of the moments of awareness That is pretty scary; a personal " terror of the situation".
And probably nothing permanent yet.(as James mentioned). If this isn't strong motivation for work, I can't think what would be.

Kind regards,
Judy.

---

by Judy

All pondered out for today..
A little further thought brought the realisation that I probably needed to be looking at separate octaves for each change in the hydrogen value. So the early ponderings had blithely condensed and mismatched notes of one octave with notes of higher octaves.
Time to quit, and head towards some experts like Ouspensky or Rodney Collin, to find out what they say.

It's going to be easier to follow, now that a kindergarten attempt has been made.
Interesting .....

by Guest

So Harry is correct, "Not my will, but thine be done".
And the Nuns, "Offer it up".
G's version, "I wish the results of this suffering be mine, for being", better stops me and invites the minds interest.

More questions flood in. The meaning of the word "mine" is becomming unclear.

Work Program week beginning 17 October 2005

by Ian

Through experience we have seen that our feeble efforts towards inner work stunts the growth of our Inner Being Embryo. Having realized this, we commit ourselves to an intensified struggle with energetic responsibility, stronger self-reliance and increased resourcefulness.

Monday
A seeker in modern times uses many tools regularly - telephone, car, computer, dishwasher, light fixture, etc. A small affirmation, blessing, or prayer of thanks may be devised, to be remembered along with a deeply sensed conscious breath whenever one puts key into ignition, or turns on computer, or is about to pick up ringing phone, or 'feeds' the dishwasher, or turns on a light.

Seekers will attempt to maintain periods of silence several times during the day for thirty seconds, trying to suspend all thoughts and emotions and reach a point of complete three centered relaxation.

Tuesday
We shall try to find a place of trust within ourselves other than our thoughts, emotions and sense impressions. To begin we can question what arises automatically: in the realm of emotions, we can work with all of them, both positive and negative. An affirmation might be - "How far can I trust this emotion to lead me?" In the realm of thought, we might use a question like - "Where did this thought come from?" or "Am I identified with it?" or "Does egoism lurk behind it?" The realm of our physical actions and habits can be affirmed by a sensing of ourselves in our typical poses, postures, gestures, and movements, followed by the taking of a predetermined pose, such as a Movements posture.

When lost in self-pitied grief or proud self-contentment, be still and find your inner voice and follow it to your inmost self.

Wednesday
In the morning, as soon as possible after opening the eyes, thank His Endlessness for the responsibility of another day to continue the struggle towards Being.

When encountering someone who engenders in oneself feelings of dislike, try to see that person as the small child they once were and make a sincere effort to be kind to them as another sentient being walking the road of life.

If feelings arise, such as self-importance, superiorty, self-pitied grief, proud self-contentment or self-congratulations, try to relax the face and mind while intoning - "Oh Endlessness, Immersed in the embrace of Your Breath, Your Current's frictions of joy and sorrow, Consume Your Conduit for Wish to Be."

Thursday
Speculating that the seeker's best chance of success of sensing their place in the doingness of the cosmic dance might be when the tide of energy is at its peak, the seeker decides that in the morning upon awakening and before engaging in any activity, to go outside and for a few moments to play the part of a cosmic conduit by sensing the flow of energy passing through between the heaven and the earth.

Recognizing that the float of doingness may be a worthy vessel to navigate the turmoil of ordinary life, the seeker makes efforts to enter this float. The question "What am I really doing now?" may be used periodically to remind the seeker to become conscious of the activity at hand - physical, mental and emotional. A three step process will then be engaged to: 1) accept the activity, 2) consciously perform the it, 3) move attention to the 'float of Being' to objectively engage the process without identification.

Friday
Life is a struggle. Remember this when you are lying awake in bed. Try to really accept it.

In a further attempt to gravitate towards objectivity, the seeker can attempt to see and discover opposite aspects of ordinary events : e.g. death of the autumn leaves is a prerequisite for their beauty; indulging in pleasure is becoming a slave to that pleasure; luck is deprivation of opportunity.

Saturday
Whenever a seeker looks at a clock they may ponder - "Will my death always happen tomorrow?" At the same time, sense the entirety of the machine, take one last calm breath and 'die' to the cacophany of conflicting thoughts and emotions.

Do one thing today that you often think of doing but never do. Plan it carefully and carry it out accordingly while refocusing part of your attention inside yourself. Rejoice in a float of doingness.

Sunday
Affirm all thoughts and emotions towards others - be they joyful or critical - with a prayer of : Holy Affirming, Holy Denying, Holy Reconciling, Transubstantiate in us, for our Being.

The sun striking, wind touching, rain watering, disappointment grumbling, alarm ringing, siren singing, bamboo arching, heart shimmering, leaves coloring, and coseekers seeking, may all ignite the slow steady flame of compassion.

May our inner efforts contribute toward our goal of developing our inner being embryo into a remarkable human being.

Monday I was thankful to my car every time it started. Mainly because I cannot afford a new one, but I did actually feel thankful to the car as if it were alive.

Tuesday I woke up early with an emptiness or ache in the "pit of my stomach" to the left of my navel. I felt intuitively it was identifying with the emotional part of my sensing/moving center.

A derisive comment by me to a Work member while in the process of describing a "high" moment, left me shocked and in fear. This dramatic "snap shot" was so disconcerting that my sittings have in the two days since been given greater "care".

by Guest

Is it necessary to understand such phrases or are they self contained. When I began using, " I wish the result of this suffering be mine for being" I didn't know what it meant but it seems to be teaching me about itself, in addition to a positive wave which usually passes through me when I say it. I have been experimenting with a shorter version of it, "Suffering for Being" because I have become aware that the whole point appears to have been covered by the Catholic Nuns of my youth telling us to, "offer it up". A bee stung me. "offer it up." Ed hit me. "Offer it up". Stay after school and clean the blackboards and "offer it up".

Tim's discernment is quite limited.
Any help appreciated.

---

by Harry

Tim's discernment seems pretty good to me.

There are very many things that were taught in Catholicism that the meaning of was forgotten before they were passed on to us. Confession, for example, between a pupil and a teacher. But in this secret Church with penance involved. Not that penance is bad. It is offering up.

The inner feeling of most of the Churches of my youth were designed for an inner silence. That architecture was purposeful. As was the inner sanctum, sanctuary, etc.

My current favorite is "Not my will but thine be done." Makes very much sense when thinking in terms of active passive and reconciling. By having the higher center's will be done, the up flowing force is channeled.

“We shall try to find a place of trust within ourselves other than our thoughts, emotions and sense impressions.”

A Work friend of mine and I were discussing Observing I and the “voices” of all the inner small “I”s this week. Some thoughts/voices seem helpful, some harmful. My observing I doesn’t trust any of them.

“When encountering someone who engenders in oneself feelings of dislike, try to see that person as the small child they once were”

A month or two ago, Greg suggested a very vivid way for me to try to understand others, a way of trying to put myself in their place by creating a “structure” that is them. Adding seeing others as small children has helped me to remember myself when feelings of irritation threaten to overpower me.

“Whenever a seeker looks at a clock they may ponder - "Will my death always happen tomorrow?" At the same time, sense the entirety of the machine, take one last calm breath and 'die' to the cacophany of conflicting thoughts and emotions.”

I’m often overwhelmed with conflicting feelings about the Work, the meaning of my existence, and my search for ultimate answers. This week was no exception. Taking one last breath and dying to the cacophany of conflicting thoughts and emotions has helped during these times.

“Do one thing today that you often think of doing but never do. Plan it carefully and carry it out accordingly while refocusing part of your attention inside yourself. Rejoice in a float of doingness.”

I shined my shoes.

“Affirm all thoughts and emotions towards others - be they joyful or critical - with a prayer of : Holy Affirming, Holy Denying, Holy Reconciling, Transubstantiate in us, for our Being.”

I recently entered into a business agreement with a friend of mine. Over the weekend, my friend unilaterally changed the terms of our agreement. I prayed this prayer while talking with my friend about the change. Beautiful.

Thank you to everyone above.

I finally back on the bandwagon Sunday. My father, who is heavily medicated these days, began obsessing about things of mine that needed to be moved off the back porch. A box or two (in reality) which hid a requisition that I clean up a packed -to -the gills back porch -- a job well beyond him at this point in his life. I have noticed increasingly (and painfully, tangentally) that his motive center is placed in "hold" (paralyzed) by the drugs proscribed to him. Fall cleaning is not what "i" had in mind for a beautiful Sunday. I had worked six days straight and "i" wanted the day-off. Dammit!

I immediately acquieseced to my father's wishes and the opportunity afforded --- I do know that much, at this point in my Work, but, of course, "It" still whines and complains (like a possessed, tied-down Linda Blair writhing and pseudo-agonizing in manipulative [is there any other kind?] self-pity)

"God, how can they (my parents) hold onto all this crap year in year out."

Holy Affirming . . .

"If I don't keep up the bike practice I'll end up just like him"

Holy Denying . . .

"Why isn't my sister here helping me-- she's only around for the 'fun' stuff"

Holy Reconciling . . .

"As soon as I get this all into order, they're going to mess it up again"

Transubstantiate IN US, for OUR Being . . .

The sun struck, wind touched, rain watered, disappointment grumbed, alarm rang, siren sang, bamboo arched, heart shimmered (FINALLY), leaves colored, and coseekers sought, Deed done, my father's face lit up and an apology that he had taken up my day and should have asked me another time. I countered that I had procrastinated long enough on getting my things out of there and it was much better to get it done before the cold settles in.

" . . .may all ignite the slow steady flame of compassion."

By the look on his face I had given him gold. By the intense visual vividness I perceived in the backyard and everything outside my skin, I'd received gold, too.

I went home, and for the next couple of hours, put my house back in order once again.

Begin each day by collecting oneself in a three centered state of awareness, suffused with an inner smile.

Each day, offer the products of digestion back to the planet with an attitude and prayer of thanks for participating in the process of reciprocal maintenance.

Each day, adopt an unnatural or unusual posture. Sense the strain on the organism. Observe any change in the tempo of the breath, emotions and thoughts.

Each day, when you open a door, observe with a sightless gaze what is on the other side, without preconceptions or expectations.

Each day, observe your disagreements with the actions and beliefs of others for clues about your own chief features.

Each day, indentify, accept and endure your inescapable sufferings by entering a calm, quiet inner state and pondering - What is compassion?

End each day in a three centered state of awareness. Review the day's activities and efforts.

It gave quite a turn in mind. The most important point for me was my inability to answer that question quickly in those states. Not because sufferings distracted me - that was simply an understanding that compassion needed by people in an inner situation like mine (just daily sufferings, nothing quite "serious") is far from usual quite sentimental view on the meaning of that word.

Just a reminder -
Pondering is a three centered state in which the intellect is actively involved. A question or idea is held before ones mind and any answers are deliberately set aside or at minimum held as provisional pending new information. Stray thoughts are gently put aside. Pondering can be performed in any circumstance. Any question can be asked or idea entertained. The body must be Sensed. The emotions should be initially neutral, although any of the higher emotions may become manifest in the course of the Pondering. Answers, insights and revelations should be merely noted and the Pondering returned to. The goal is not answers to the question, but an endless deepening or rephrasing of the question itself.

This week, beginning and ending each day tri-centered has been a saving Grace. I have been rushed to move into a new house (Dec. 1) am working feverishly on a number of academic papers and remain a full-time father. I have held unto the tri-state whole-body/mind complex sense of warmth and peace in these times like a life preserver.

Entering doorways with the sightless gaze I have felt opens me up on a level akin to being prepared for Death. I dont know what I will see and I dont know what to expect but the Openness there is bracing.

I have also noticed that the unnatural posture is simply fascinating; I feel my irritation rise or my frustration or anger and notice the sensations as they move from body area to body area, sometimes unrelated physically to the tensions areas in the posture.

Excellent exercises this week Ian! I will retain them and return to them often.

Use of unnatural posture
I found the unnatural posture made it easier to not identify with my body, with Tim.
Apparantely, there was no attachment to that posture and thus less attachment to the body as a whole. Attempts at a more subtle, unnatural posture for use in public. diminished the effect.
The more unnatural, the greater the ease of seperation.

During the week, in all that you do, and in conjunction with observing and sensing your breathing, Ponder:
"Know you not that your bodies are the temples of God and that the Spirit of God dwells within you?" (1 Cor.3:16)

Pick a personality trait or behaviour that you find objectionable in others and try to observe it in yourself. Practice non-judgement when you observe it in yourself or others.

Let non-desires predominate over desires.

by James F

"Let non-desires predominate over desires."

My whole life has been about 'winning'. In everything I've ever done, the objective has been to win. In school, be at the top of the class. In sports, win the game. In romance, get the "pretty" girl before the other guy does.

This week, various events spurred me on to try the opposite. I was playing billiards at a local tavern against a guy I had never met before or played against. I'm a good player, relatively speaking. I've beaten some of the better players in the local geographic area. I felt the typical desire to win, and show the other guy how "great" I was. Instead, I lost on purpose. Three games in a row. I lost bad. On top of it, I kept telling him how great of a shooter he was. In truth, he was a decent shooter, but probably at a skill level below mine. It was interesting to observe his behavior and mine. The changing energy as I would compliment him. The feeling of satisfaction he was getting with each win.

I also spent a couple of hours talking to a woman I wasn't attracted to. I learned a lot.

1. As you arise from bed, repeat silently the following affirmation: "Today I will dispell the fog of egotism with the sun of Being Affirmations." Sense a warmth radiating from the heart.

2. Which of the seven deadly egotisms - Pride, Envy, Anger, Sloth, Avarice, Gluttony, Lust - is a characteristic of my chief feature?

3. Each day choose one of the seven deadly egotisms and devise your own Affirmation to be performed while calmly enduring any manifestations of your chosen egotism during the day. The Affirmation may include a combination of a verbal formulation, a posture or gesture, a sensing exercise, an evoked emotion, etc.

4. The seeker may have discovered a fleeting joy experienced in this task of combat with their petty egotism - but resolves not to be distracted by the rewards of Work. We all seem to have been remiss this week.

For my part I've logged on a couple of times and could intellectualize about some of this. But that seemed inappropriate.

My own efforts have been focused on the bones exercise and joints exercise. Along with my usual evening "prayers" and breathing.

Hope others are working.

1. First Taste Exercise. Make an octave of firsts at the very start of the day even when your eyes just open in bed:

1st Breath You Take
1st Sound You Hear
1st Thing You Touch
1st Taste You Have 1st Smell You Have 1st Thing You See
1st Smile You Have

At the end of the day, try to review or see mentally this Octave of Efforts as it took place.

2. 12 Joint Exercise. Walking or sitting, Sensing each joint, Incanting one word for each joint: 1. Right wrist 2. Right elbow 3. Right shoulder 4. Left hip 5. Left knee 6. Left ankle 7. Right ankle 8. Right knee 9. Right hip 10. Left shoulder 11.Left elbow 12. Left wrist

Everyman I meet!
Everywoman I greet!
Will someday die!
AS WILL I!

Then 'Fill' an inner smile with compassion, and breath out: Have mercy on us all.

3. Before eating, collect yourself and repeat silently on an outbreath: I give thanks for my conception, my birth, my life, my struggle, my transubstantiation, my death, and my Being.

4. Before interacting with others, collect yourself and repeat silently on an outbreath: Oh Endlessness, Help me to avoid the pitfalls of knowing, judging, finding and concluding.

Everyman I meet!
Everywoman I greet!
Will someday die!
AS WILL I!

I've silently spoken the above poem(?) this week whenever I have caught James acting like he is someone great or trying to impress someone. Doing so deflates the machine real fast.... I can see using this mantra for the rest of my life. Thanks Ian.

The power of this "simple" practice is remarkable. Each of these "firsts" arrive as a great gift. A string of gifts, producing in me affirmations. Thank you.

by Anton

The new text for 12 Joints gave me the understanding that I can't feel or sense the future death of me or neighbors - I can only think about it but can't feel the significance of that. I still have moments when I'm afraid of death but not doing this exercise. Just the Is that can feel about that aren't present. That is most difficult when trying to understand what the death of other people could mean for me.

Missed the exercise with firsts - too much identified in the morning. I'll try to keep that as a task for several more weeks.

Ponder : What are the crucial messages that guide your life, that you find sacred?

Ponder : If whatever I think, feel or do is just "merde de la merde" according to Gurdjieff, then why not Affirm it with an inner smile and a Sensed skull?

Ponder : Can I take each breath as if it were my last?

Ponder : Is suffering one of our most under utilized resources?

Ponder : How much time do we spend in unconscious suffering?

Ponder : What spiritual challenges can we develop at our job? How can we transform influences undesirable for spiritual exercise into an impulse or means for seeking?

Ponder : What is gained by some form of conscious affirmation applied to such handy mechanical impulses as sociable remarks, gossiping, complaining, friendliness, etc?

Look without seeing.
Listen without hearing.
Taste without flavoring.
Smell without odouring
Sense without gravitating.
Ponder without thinking.
Feel without emoting.

Thanks for checking in, folks.

The Work ebbs and flows for all of us, and I think this is a very busy time of year for everyone.

I woke up this moring and did the First Taste exercise.

by Harry

A suggestion, or comment:

There are times I don't feel like "new". Recently I've been dealing with another person's emotional disturbance. So my work has been those things I can rely upon. Some are exercises I brought with me, but others like the 12 bones and 12 joints I've been using regularly.

Turning daily energy into useable energy is a strong force. Life brings things at us. These must be used. At times they are difficult to use. But that's when Work's, perhaps, most beneficial.

by Jose

Hello all,
Ditto for me...

I am moving into a new house Dec 1 and have been swamped with that and will continue to be out of commission for another week or so. I do check in and take one exercise to Work on since that seems the most realistic expectation I can make on myself for now. For me, its the inner smile, when exhausted, when anxious, when overwhelmed that one seems to harness a new energy and sustain me for another day. As well, I begin each day with a walk and allow the dark sky (1700 miles from the North Pole here!) to speak to me. If I listen hard enough...

It appears that when push comes to shove the online work world is the first to go. Then the local group takes precedence. I have only been participating in this group for 2 months but feel a real connection to it (you). I have found both here and in my local group strong agreement with G's, "I love him who loves work". I am in an altogether new phase of my work. There is movement and I am somewhat overwhelmed by the new questions, feelings and perhaps, being. Suddenly, anything I read in the work has new clarity but there is a sort of shotgun sense of a lot going on a once.

I am very drawn to this weeks task. It points a new way at a new level.

by JohnG

It is hard to remember to work, not only are the requirements of life strong and tend to swamp us, take all our time, there is also a resistance, the organism has no wish to work. Yet it is in the very activities of life, and in the resistance, where the work lies.

Why is it I can remember an appointment in life but not one I make for myself in relation to this work? The organism has no wish to work. The organism is governed by habit and association, it is on the path of least resistance and it's wish is to remain there. It is association.

The wish to work. What does it mean? Where does it come from? What in me wishes to work? These are questions I sometimes ponder.

I think my wish to work is connected to value and my value is connected to verification. The more I verify the more I value, the more I value the stronger my wish becomes.

As a reminder of the tasks that Ian gives I have found that writing them down and taking them with me as I go about my day has been helpful. Although I look at what is written throughout the day even just feeling the piece of paper in my breast pocket can help in bring me back.

I may not participate much here but I do appreciate the weekly tasks Ian gives and I am thankful.

Hi all. Just wanted to let you know I'm still here as well. Still working. I wish to know who I am, why I am here. That wish drives me, like a constant companion, or should I say "demon?" I don't know why. And I don't know why it doesn't drive 99% of the people I know in this world. But as long as that drive keeps nagging at me, like a constant dull ache, I'll be here, working. What else is there? Nothing else has any real meaning for me anymore. Been there. Done that. Ho hum. The clock is ticking. Why am I here? Who am I? Vanity of vanities. All is vanity. Ecclesiastes 1:2 Like a carrot in front of a rabbit, fleeting moments of self-remembering keep me going.

I appreciate all of your-alls work and comments.

Upon arising, observe your first sense impressions and then ponder: From where does resistance to work arise?

During the day, as you walk, sense the body by scanning from the feet up to the head on the in breath, as if breathing in through the feet and following the air up, and scanning from the head down to the feet on the out breath. Try to observe the still point between the out and in breaths.

At mid-day, enter a collected, three-centered state and ponder: Is their a relationship between third force and impartiality?

During the evening, make a special effort not to work on yourself.

Before retiring, ponder: From where does wish to work arise?

---

by Harry

I like the last one. That will be difficult. A conundrum, to Work at not Working.

---

by Guest

During the day, as you walk, sense the body by scanning

This is very much supportive of the new impression which is coming to me, that I exist. I did not know that I felt that I did not exist. More to be observed here.

by Guest

Do you have a more basic task on learning how to look more into the subject of third force. Thanks

---

by Harry

Tim,

Third force is a long pondering. Try reading about Triamazikamno in All and Everything. O. did a lot on the Law of Three.

If I accept that three forces are necessary for any manifestation, then I need to start looking for the third force. Usually I'm only aware of desire and resistance. Plus and Minus. I'm used to two sides in an argument. But what causes the argument to continue? I think of inspiration as being a positive, of pushing me in a new direction, but every inspiration comes with resistances.

When I walk, my muscles push against the earth. And the earth pushes back. But something else is necessary for me to move. If I try to walk on ice I become more aware.

Harry

by James F

I like your thoughts Harry. I've been pondering third force for a while now. Ian suggested, about 5 months ago, that we look at how G described the Law of Three in Tales. I found that exercise very worth while.

On another note, I had an interesting experience last night. We had a snowstorm hit right before rush hour here in southern ohio. On my drive home from work I met with very little resistance until I got about half way home. Then I hit a parking lot of cars. (I heard that it took some people four hours to get home, and that was on a drive that was normally 20 minutes.) It seemed that the more everyone wanted, and tried, to get home, more and more force was created stopping them.

Anyway, I think G or O wrote somewher not to resist a force stronger than you. When I hit the wall of cars, I was about 2 minutes from my sister's house. I haven't seen her for a while. I thought: I can sit here in traffic like everyone else actively trying to get home, or I can go to my sister's house. I wasn't irritated. I simply took the whole thing in stride and headed for my sister's house. I thought: why oppose what is clearly out of my control and stronger than me?

My neice, who I don't see very often, was there. We had a very nice conversation. We talked about our journeys in life. She told me about some experiences she has been having where she feels like she is outside of herself watching herself go through life. Much of it has frightened her. She said she often had similar experiences as a child, has always felt like she was an outsider, etc. etc. In the end, I was glad I chose to "go with the flow" and stop at my sister's place. I think James said some things that were helpful to my neice (said some stupid things as well, I'm sure). Anyway, it seemed like she was less anxious about things that had been troubling her when I left.

For whatever it's worth.

Last night during a meeting, it was clear that what I wanted to say was going to come out as negative. I was sufficiently identified that I couldn't find the positive version of what I wanted to say. The inner smile tool popped into my head. I applied it and "it" transformed me and the external situation was positively resolved. It seemed to have a power of its own. I guess it amounted to a change of posture. An easy to observe example of third force. I was very impressed by the simplicity of this (new) form of affirmation. thanks.

Web site questions? How do you put a quote in a white box , as many of you do?
the quotation and other editing tools on my "post a reply" screen don't seem to work. I think it is generating HTML code. the little faces don't seem to stick?? Help.

by JohnG

Tim I may be misunderstanding what you are trying to express but if not I would advise being careful about bringing in outside work to group meetings, no matter where they came from. Be there as you are, you can leave your daily shoes at the door but be sincere in your questions, let them come as they are, whether they be positive or negitive. Your group leader can not learn and neither can you if you try to manipulate your feelings.

To get the white box, use the Quote button in the top right of the message you are responding to.

For the other stuff, go into your Profile (link at top of page) and make sure that - Always allow BBCode, Always allow HTML and Always enable Smilies - are set to Yes. Make sure that they are also not set to Disable just below the message editing box.

Tim wrote to me with a question in relation to my statement about bringing outside work to group meetings. Below is his question and my reply to him. I post it here for the benefit of others who may be unsure as to what I meant. If Ian or anyone else disagrees or has comments to add please do so.

Tim wrote:

Are you suggesting that efforts made on Endless Search should somehow be kept separate from efforts made elsewhere. Have I missed the point of that portion of your post?

Tim, I am not suggesting you keep the exercises you gained from Ian's site separate from your overall work efforts, work is work and work exercises from different sources, if rightly understood and applied, can be very beneficial, and Ian has some practical exercises to work with.

The point of my reply had to do with where we are in ourselves while at a meeting and being sincere, to ourselves and the group. I do not know to what group you belong nor the reason for your negativity, but that negativity was where you were in yourself at that moment and it is from here, from that place in yourself, as you were, that a sincere question could have come. If you were identified with something that caused you to be negative then so be it, see this and let the others see it, let your group leader see it. So often it is really from a form of fear that we don't wish to be seen. By manipulating your feelings (by the use of Ian's inner smile exercise) in order to express something in a positive way would have been a lie. This isn't to say that we should take the baggage of our daily self to the meetings (this is why I said you can leave your daily shoes at the door), but if the negativity was a result of something that happened while you were there then that is what needs to be expressed. Had you stayed with your initial feelings and spoke or asked a question from those feelings then you and the group leader may have uncovered something in you that was hidden and the negativity may have been reconciled through understanding.

This isn't written in stone Tim, this is just my understanding and opinion. Remember there is a certain dynamic that can be generated in an in-person group that can't be found on an on-line mail list, sincerity to yourself and the group helps in this, don't waste the opportunities given to you.

In many ways we are a duality of I and IT. IT is the organism which functions according to various laws. One aim of the Work is to observe how IT functions.

During the week, whenever we observe IT reacting with manifestations such as self-importance, self-righteousness, intolerance, anger, indignation, despair, depression, disappointment, suffering, etc., give the manifestation a "name" and insert it into the following phrase:

It is lawfully "name"; I wish to be.

Try to curb the outward manifestation while repeating the phrase several times internally. At the same time, sense and feel the sensations and emotions associated with the manifestation.

Finally, try to enter a still point within that is free from identification with the manifestations and ponder:

What reconciles I and IT?

---

by Harry

Most of my "it" seems to be centered in the solar plexus. Or in physical sensations.

---

by Harry

Some that have occured:
It is annoyance.
It is loss of control.
It is irritibility.
It is impatience.
It is frustration.

Naming these experience has some value. Saying it is "lawful" seems more important. I've allowed many of these to "pass" routinely. These are ones I'm pretty familiar with.

Harder is "It is unreasonable anxiety. . ."

---

by Harry

Spent much time with this week's exercise last night. Eventually came to a point where "it" was this machine that was responding to the outside world. A machine that inhabited me and responded for me, but wasn't me. i's may or may not be part of the machine. i's that are part of the machine are cogs in the machine, spinning wheels taking their turn at doing their thing. If I let them. And sometimes I should let it respond. But it I don't want to be the machine then I need to separate from the machine. Even though the machine is lawful.

Much of the "emotion" is also a product of the machine. it produces "feelings" based upon the input it has taken in over the years. These feelings are just as mechanical and unreal as the rest of the machine. When one wheel turns it pushes the button on another set and those produce artificial emotions.

There is another aspect of this machine. This compilation of unrelated but interjoined its. And that is the whole machine wants to be the "center of the universe". Everything revolves around the machine, in "its" perspective. "it" has no other perspective. Can it see itself? It can pretend to. And perhaps it has to pretend to, at first.

I and Thou and It.

by Anton

I don't know maybe just my ability to do the exercises raised this week but the exercise given has surely hit the mark. It had the quality of "calmness" so to speak - notice-name-curb-observe-go on - it didn't pushed the machine to useless efforts and suffering, just pointing to the observer.

I couldn't notice any specific reconciling medium between I and it - seems like everything is in connections of the centers and their parts - adding some connection to those already existing changes the picture radically.

The most often observed manifestations of it were annoyance and anxiety until I found yet another manifestation about which I simply forgot before - inner "explaining" of my actions and thoughts - this particular type of inner considering that makes me to explain everything that I'm doing externally or internally.

---

by Ian

> Anton wrote:
> It had the quality of "calmness" ...
> I couldn't notice any specific reconciling medium between I and it.

Maybe the "calmness" is a "reconciling medium"?

As Harry said on another post: third force is a long pondering. "What reconciles I and it" seems to be a long pondering as well. Could Wish be a reconciler. Wish to be?

Went to KING KONG yesterday afternoon (after "flushing" NARNIA and the faun) because "it" is always telling me what a trashy waste of time movies like KONG are. Choose a theater in the 'hood because I knew "it" would be irritated by the cell phones and "interactive" reaction toward the screen "It" always wants everyone to be quiet. I sat amongst all of the (predicted) chaos and brought my attention into 3 brains balanced being. When King Kong roared, everybody roared. When King Kong stomped in the theater's mega-watt sound system, everybody stomped. An extra large Pepsi, hurled from behind me, flew towards the screen when King Kong reached for the airplane from atop the Empire State Building.

I kept bring my attention back to the three brains balanced state. "It" wanted to have an uproarious time with everyone else after "it" got over itself concerning the "low-classness" of it all. "It" wanted to stomp its feet, shout and throw popcorn so it could feel a part of things.

I watched the abdominal muscles automatically "knit" in defense. I listened to "the movie critics" in my head chatter away.

Last night, I had the most vivid dream I've had for awhile.

In it, for a large part of it, the character in the dream that was me "acted" and "observed"

Interesting. My similar experience was the last Live play I went to. Can't remember the name of it, but it was one of those wordy, everybody talks and talks and talks things. And the audience was the opposite of yours. Entirely in "awe" of what was barely going on on the stage.

It wanted to be in "awe" of this culture. But my solar plexus kept getting more and more anxious. I couldn't allow my self to continue in the environment. Had to get out. But couldn't because I was a guest. Spent much time maintaining a balanced state.

Of course there are many who would find my penchant for Mamet to be equal to this "high cultured" audience.

Wonder what would have happened had someone thrown a Pepsi at the screen?

Search for a glimpse of the significance behind repetitive compulsive desires, attitudes, traits, features, fears.

Do not express negative emotions. Sense their location in the body.

Watch the flow of thoughts. Finish every thought then let it go.

Maintain Iamness by following every movement of the body.

Enjoy the joy of marveling at the splendor around you.

Generate a sense of awe by observing the complex capabilities of the hands, feet, animals, plants, etc.

Avoid gossip. Sense the spine and skull instead.

Do not insist on being right; do not justify yourself or your actions.

Do nothing that offends your conscience.

Use the Heptachord of Sensing before each meal.

Try to devote 15 minutes each day to sensing the body and watching the breath.

Arrived at work yesterday to find that "Paula Zahn" had been let go.

> Avoid gossip. Sense the spine and skull instead

As much as "it" didn't want to, "I" did.

Today I arrived at work to find out that my contact will be up in 2 weeks and will not be renewed.

Do not insist on being right; do not justify yourself or your actions.

I thanked everyone for an opportunity which afforded me experiences which had "challenged and pushed me into new directions".
I sensed my spine and my skull and kept a beaming professional smile on my face (one would have thought I was having a "religious experience" in the office!) I shook everyone's hand "warmly".

During the course I pushed my energy upwards along the spine --- aware of the potential "tar pits" beginning to form below.

But, everything was fine, everyone felt good about themselves later, the eviseration was clean and swift.

"I" had won over "it".

Punch and Counterpunch! Whew! What a week, Greg.

Having spent the last year recovering from similar experiences, I wish you strength and the knowledge that there is a better future.

I had Christmas lunch with my former co-workers this year. Funny. One will be left next year. Not even my boss will remain on the job. Only the person with the least tenure and the least experience. Because of major funding changes.

Somehow these ebbs and flows are events we're meant to experience. The last time I had an employment conflict my former boss ended up almost blind from diabetes some nine months later. And now I have Type 2 diabetes. Weird. Can you call these things coincidences?

---

by Greg

Thanks, Harry.

. . . and my father has taken a severe turn for the worse . . .

> Can you call these things coincidences?

Nope ---- I can't. It is the "order" of things. Sometimes, you are fortunate enough (as you and I have seemed to have been on this forum) to find someone with whom you can flash mirrored "events" images.

Yours took place "last year" and mine (in close duplication) took place "this year".

"This year", "Last year" . . . isn't it really one "Now"?

The Seeker asks every morning before arrising: "Where has my Search for the real stuff of existence taken me?"
To take stock, the Seeker will devote the first week of the new year to a daily recapitulation of the previous years failures and advances.

Each day the Seeker will occasionally pause to declare the following statements while performing the suggested exercises:

Monday: "I am at times aware of, amused by, and separated from the organism's identifications, attractions, interests, and goals."
Relax into a three centered Float of Being and perform the Sightless Gaze and Soundless Sound.

Tuesday: "I often experience two forces: the Denying force of the organism that automatically reacts, accomplishes, feels, thinks, suffers, sleeps, dies; and the parallel Affirming force of a new presence that observes, remembers, acts, is remorseful, endures, has aim, and lives."
Relax into a three centered Float of Being and evoke an inner smile.

Wednesday: "I am often present when the organism excretes the transformed product from the food it eats; when it exhales the transformed product from the inhaled atmosphere; and when the organism wiseacres the transformed product from the sense impressions it takes in."
When excreting transformed products, arrest the flow of products three times and attend to the silence in the intervals.

Thursday: "I understand that the personal satisfactions the organism gets from yielding to the demands of eating, breathing, and wiseacreing are the means by which certain cosmic needs may be met."
Perform a 10 Bone Illumination.

Friday: "I sometimes experience a deep inner calm while the organism is caught in heavy turmoil or sorrow."
Relax into a three centered Float of Being and remember your death.

Saturday: "I interpret the organism's considering of what others may think as a force that binds humanity together."
Say or do something that makes you appear foolish and savor the result of not yielding to inner considering.

Sunday: "I have a profound sense of membership in and responsibility to humanity as a prime factor in the earth's connections."

Perform a 12 Jointed Monks Walk and Ponder, "What are my responsibilities?"

Every night before sleep, the Seeker, mindful of the Merciless Heropass, may ask: "What can I give up - the absence of which will serve as a constant reminder to remember myself - while groping through the veil of illusion behind which I am otherwise destined to remain?"

Does anyone know where I can learn more about the distinctions between the 3rd, 4th, and 5th ways? I have some issues I'm struggling with, and I'm hoping further ideas here can aid my pondering. Namely, I'm struggling with the whole "teacher" thing. I've reached my present level of being through rejecting teachers and thinking for myself. I have found someone in the Fourth Way who I would, for lack of a better word, consider my teacher at present. I often struggle with contacting him and talking to him, however, because I have become so independent. While one "I" frequently wants to hug him, a minute later, another "I" wants to tell him to kiss my ass!  I often wonder what the role of a teacher really is; and whether the Fourth Way is the "best" way; etc. etc. Any thoughts would be appreciated. As many of you know, I only came in contact with the Fourth Way between 1 and 2 years ago.

Thanks,
James

P.S. Please assume the trouble is not with my "teacher." He seems to understand me very well, cuts me the utmost slack, and genuinely wants to help me grow with or without him.

---

by Harry

James,

I think it's important not to get hung up on language. Third, fourth, fifth way? Fourth way is something that was used in this teaching to distinguish it from the first three ways, mind, body, and emotion. The fourth way is the way of the sly man. He takes the pill rather than sticking to developing just one center.

Teacher? I guess a teacher is anyone who is at a higher level in a particular field than I am. So if I were to walk into a piano studio everyone there would be my teacher, just about.

Other times, anyone I meet, anything I experience can be my "teacher".

As to a teacher, on a pedestal, or something like that. . .I don't think you'd recognize a teacher if you found one. He'd recognize you as a pupil.

There's a great line in a song by Procol Harum:

The seeker was searching for answers. He heard that a certain wise monk lived atop a mountain. Climbing that mountain was difficult, almost impossible; but the seeker managed to get to the top of the mountain. There he said:

"What's the meaning of life, Father?"
"Well my son," the monk answered, "Life is like a beanstalk. Isn't it?"

That has always seemed to me a perfect example of what G calls a lawful inexactitude. Something that you know has more hidden in it than what you see is there. Nasruddin is full of such sayings. But I love the climbing the mountain and the relationship with the beanstalk. And simplifying life down to it's simplest.

I think a teacher is the same thing. Tomorrow you may be mine.

by James F

I can see some truth in that Harry. But something inside me wants more.

The guy I'm in contact with reminds me of Ian's style here. Laid back. Doesn't really "tell" me what to do, just makes a lot of suggestions that are often profound. Look at the the ponderings and suggested confessions this week, for instance. I see there is a lot to these exercises but I often feel like I'm missing most of it.

I sometimes wish Ian would just say: ok everyone, here is what you should get out of this.... Similarly, I got real frustrated with the guy I'm in contact with a couple weeks ago. I said: "Why can't you just tell me what the hell you're talking about! Of course, I already know one person's level of being can't be "downloaded" into another, so that was really just a rhetorical question--one made in frustration.

but that leads me back to my struggle. What is the point of a teacher? Nothing can be downloaded. And why stop at the Fourth Way? Some people seem to think it is "the" way. I've learned something from every religion, philosophy, and Way I've studied in life. Is the Fourth Way "the" way for this time, or just another way.

Just trying to figure out what I'm doing and WHAT'S GOING ON before the merciless heropass has its way.

Hello James,
I have been "gone" for a few weeks because I moved and have had a ton on my plate.

(The "Teacher" in me asks, "Then why didnt you just eat?)

I find that being distracted makes me want to chuck "practices" and focus on the millions of tasks in front of me.

(The "teacher" in me says, "Then why not make focusing on your tasks your practice?)

When I could, I "checked in" here " and saw, in what may be a similar vein to your observations, that there is so much here, too much in fact, and why didnt Ian or someone just take one f&%$ing exercise and hold us to it for the week?

(The "teacher" in me asked, "Why didnt you just take one exercise and do it?)

I began to feel guilty about lurking about, so much so that I felt guilty about feeling guilty and tried ignoring all if it, including my own desire for the Search. But I failed.

(The "teacher" in me said, "Good, you are beginning to remember why you are here in the first place.")

Then I remembered how pissed off I was for missing out on all the opportunities for Practice and began to blame everyone else, and smugly placated myself with an old Tibetan saying my former Vajrayana teacher gave us: "The Tibetans practice a thousand practices and accomplish none; the Indians practice one, and accomplish them all."

(The "teacher" in me asked, "OK, so which ONE have you been doing?)

I could go on...Now, I have had many "teachers" and have learned alot from each of them and, as Harry so wisely taught us, if I look around, everything can become my teacher. So why am I wasting my time worrying about a "teacher" and not "practicing " what I already know I need to?

(The teacher in me says, "Right on!)

Hi James,

I was in a perhaps similar situation re "ways and teachers" in 1982. It was quite time-consuming and painful.
There is an excellent section on "Seeking and Finding" in J.G.Bennett's book "Transformation". It is a small incomplete book but I found it invaluable.
I revisited it last night for the first time since the eighties.
Then I read your posts this morning.....

The second help came from reading a monograph or two of Nicoll's "Commentaries" each morning. Nicoll answers me and provides some heat and flux to keep the transformative process going. I still do that, together with practical work.

Reading is not Working, as you know, but for me it aids continuation of Work attempts, so that I stay centered and awake enough to hopefully not miss the opportunities as they arise. And they do arise, if the Wish to move towards Truth/Ultimate Reality is strong and sincere enough.

Looking back, it's clear that I was "waiting" for a lot of the time. So the question became "How to keep Working while waiting ?"
As Bennett relates in "Transformation", he waited all night in the Study House to meet G, who finally arrived after midnight, said, "Patience is the mother of Will.
If one doesn't have a mother, how can one expect to be born."
and then walked out of the Study House again.

Re the answering of questions with another question, or being given (when one is fortunate) a hint at most, does indeed seem to be par for the course in esoteric matters. Some time ago, Harry gave me a couple of hints about Chapter 17 of All & Everything. These hints, plus quite a lot of pondering, helped deepen a "learning to think psychologically" process which still continues to transform the book for me, so I have to be in favour, though it used to sometimes annoy me too.(Thanks Harry). I've kept quiet though, for the reason that I haven't developed the technique of commenting without "spilling the beans" very well at all yet. James, this paragraph reads like it is more to Harry, but simply seemed an appropriate time to mention this, as your post touched on it.

Best wishes,
Judy.

James,

"Teacher", I have found to be the state of three-brains-balanced-being. We know a taste of that state from the second wind of intensive Work.

I became a dancer because my gut brain was rarely and deficiently engaged. I was thinking thinking thinking OR feeling feeling feeling. Moving moving moving was always "in lack" when held against the other two (and their various combinations).

"Teacher" is thinking "best", feeling "best", moving "best" ---- all three in tandem as a fueling unit. We've all "tasted" this ---practice gives longer stretches.\

Anyone/thing outside that can only suggest, indicate, support that Place.

James,

I've been an ordinary teacher. In fact that's how I earn my living now. I teach English on-line. Let me use an ordinary life experience.

One of the things I need students to understand is a topic sentence. Topic sentences control paragraphs. This paragraph is about topic sentences. So everything in this paragraph has to relate to the central idea, a topic sentence.

That may well be a paragraph I'd give to students. The point is the point. It's a central idea. Often I will have students ask me to just give them the best topic sentence for their rambling paragraph. I can't do it. Not that I couldn't, but I can't. Because in doing it, I'd keep them from developing the ability to do it for themself.

(Yes, to all those who've read my ramblings here, I do understand how to organize writing!)

Symbolism is another such thing. I love teaching literature because it's like teaching a mystery. Gee class, Jamie in "The Sound and the Fury is 33 years old." Gee class, Steppenwolf is 33 years old. Etc. Class, do you think it's just an accident that these characters are 33 years old?

Now class consider, we're told that Christ was 33 years old? Do we have any idea if that's historically accurate? I mean we're told all these other age stories in the Bible, why should we believe Christ died at 33?

So does "33" in and of itself mean anything?

Wow it's the product of two prime numbers!

And three times three is nine.

And we can continue peeling layers of the onion away.

A teacher can always do that for a student.

By the way, I'm not sure if Steppenwolf was actually 33.

ahh yes. of course. yes and no. Do you need a teacher James? yes and no. Is the fourth way the way for you? yes and no. Is there an answer to your question James? yes and no. Should you continue seeking ultimate answers? yes and no.

Judy, Greg, Harry, Jose: Nice to hear from all of you. There are no death notices in cyberspace. One never really knows what has transpired when they haven't heard from someone in a while. I'm glad you all, like me, are still trying to see through the veil of illusions in this world. Mostly because I have so few people to relate to on this planet. The people I work with think I, and they, are really lawyers. My family? They are so proud of James and all he has done. (sigh). My friends don't even know me. Aside from two or three other humans, you all are the only ones I know with the same constant motivation for getting out of bed in the morning.

Thanks for your thoughts.

James,

I think one of the great things about this on line group is that we can reach out to each other.

One thing I've come to accept in my life is that what I think and feel is very different from what those around me "profess" to think and feel. But inside I'm not sure there's a lot of difference. As Willie Nelson said "Whatever gets you through the night".

We're fortunate. We found a real teaching. One that answers questions, gives directions. And in that we've also made ourselves different.

You've got a graduate degree. That alone makes you a small minority. You're an attorney with a conscience, damn I've known a lot of attornies and very few consciences. (That's not fair, but it's the "common point of view".)

Believe in yourself. Read All and Everything. At least three times. The world begins to change with each step.

It's not "yes and no" it's Every Which Way but Loose. And damn the orangutan.

Interesting that you mention All and Everything Harry. I recently read "Struggle of the Magicians." Patterson's opinion on the importance of the direct transmission of truth from teacher to student was blatantly obvious. As I was pondering his belief, I asked myself: why did G. write Tales? According to Patterson, G said: if I was writing this (Tales) for conscious men, it would be easy. But I'm writing for donkeys.

If G. thought oral transmission directly from a master was so crucial, why waste all those years crafting All and Everything? He wrote it for donkeys, not masters.

Life is just a big game of monopoly. But lawyers are the only ones who know the rules.

James

---

by Harry

It's only my perspective, but I think All and Everything is a Conscious Work of Art. That it is created intentionally for a specific purpose. G became aware that people like O had their own directions. This is one of those artifacts left behind. Like the Tarot.

And then there are legominisms.

Hi James,

The 5th Way is just a label some people use to denote distinguish what they teach from other paths or lineages. Another way to look at it might be that Gs 4th Way was a combination and synthesis of what he had learned in his Search from the 1st, 2nd, 3rd Ways, so the 5th Way might denote a synthesis of the 4th Way with other methods that G didn't teach or wasn't aware of. It could also mean a way of learning that doesn't depend as heavily on a Teacher as did the older ways.

The question of the necessity of a Teacher is a good question, with many arguments pro and con. Many Teachers are really just con-artists, creating a false dependence for their own gain. This is surely the first thing to look out for if one is seriously looking for a Teacher. And if the 'gain' is not overtly monetary, it may be harder to spot.

There was a time when a Teacher was the only source of this kind of knowledge. There was also a time when this knowledge could get you killed. So we have a great legacy of secrecy built into this idea. The situation has changed drastically in the last 50 years, especially with the internet. A change is taking place in the world and things are much more interconnected and less heirarchical. Knowledge flows freely and openly rather than being passed down from above.

I guess your real question is - What is that 'something' that a Teacher can give me that I am struggling for but can't quite seem to 'get'?

Are Teachers only necessary for donkeys? Can a donkey learn what he needs from Beelzebub's Tales? Or from all the books on the internet? Did Ouspensky learn anything from Gurdjieff? How many of Gurdjieff's students didn't 'get it'? The major religions have failed. Gurus come and go. Has the world improved in the last 5000 years? The success rate of all these Ways seems pretty dismal. Is that the Teacher's fault or the donkey's?

What are we all really looking for? A state of consciousness wherein we have some sort of assurance or direct inner certitude that everything is, or at least can be, all right with ourselves and the world if we act in a certain way; that it all has a meaning?

All those books and religions and gurus assure us that all those questions have an answer. Why can't we see that answer? Why can't we read Beelzebub's Tales like conscious men? What is the missing ingredient? Can a Teacher supply it?

Some people say that a Teacher is necessary because they can pass on that special something that goes beyond mere knowledge. Other people say that the special something can only come from Above. Others say that it must come from Within. In any case, whatever its Source, when it arrives, we will have an unshakable Inner Certitude or Self knowledge or Reason of Understanding or Objective knowledge that it is the Truth.

A Teacher may help show you your blind spots. May even help remove some of them. But he can't make you see. Sure, every now and then, a Teacher might get lucky and say the right thing at the right time and spark an Enlightenment, but can you count on that happening? You can lead a horse to water, but you can't make him drink.

Trust. You have to trust your own judgement. Faith. You have to have faith in your own judgement. Why are Teachers so popular? Because people don't trust their own judgement, so they place their assurance, their support, outside of themselves?

A Float of Being. There is no support outside of us. Everything in the Universe is in free-fall. Everything has its own center of gravity. Self-assurance. Inner certitude. A Teacher is a resource. A sun you can orbit for a while until you become your own sun. We are are own best book. If you are going to find the Truth anywhere, it is going to be within yourself. If it is not already there, how are you ever going to recognize it?

As G once said; What I teach is very simple - that when it rains, the street gets wet.

Thanks Ian, everyone. I have been waiting for a good time to bring this topic up. In fact, I've thought about it ever since Mr. Glock(?) stormed into the public area about six months ago and screamed that we were all lost and damned to hell unless we found a man in the Fourth Way who knows. Only then did we have any chance of salvation, blah, blah blah. Believe me, a part of me wanted to "jump in the ring" and clean his "Glock" for trying to shackle me with that bondage again. The only reason I wanted to find out who his teacher was, was so that I would know who to stay away from.

For many reasons, I stayed out of the forray about "What is real Work" and just laughed at the whole thing Instead. James is all about arguing and fighting and defying dogmatism to his dying breath. It was fun to watch someone else (Greg and Jose) be a conduit for Second force for once, instead of doing it myself.

When I finally left the Christian church for good, my mantra was a verse in the book of Judges: "In those days there was no King in Israel. Every man did what was right in his own eyes." I never heard a sermon that spoke positively about that verse. Every sermon talked about how horrible it is when everyone does what they think is right. Funny, though, how that is the last verse in the book of Judges and how there is no verse after it saying: And the LORD thought this was very bad...." Every preacher just decided to add that line in some way or another.

I can't go back to that slavery, ever.

Hello James,
(And Greg, et al.) You know, the talk of teachers, and the easy answers that such talk always evokes, whether that be to cavalierly dismiss them, or to insist with metaphysical certainty that they are no longer required, misses a point I believe. That is, no matter whether we have a living teacher or not, (or a dead guru, or not) we are still the last link on the chain. If we don´t practice what has been given us, the chain dies with us.

I have had, as I have mentioned many times before, many esteemed teachers, one of whom, I called my "guru" in a Tantric lineage. This kind of language was accepted by me and the vast panoply of teachings (and to an outsider, dangerous loyalty) that went with it was included, full force. This meant a committment that "outsiders" could not understand. As well they shouldn´t. How did I reconcile that with my anarchist political background? I didnt. I simply understood that when needing to learn to drive a car, I needed a teacher and when needing to understand Dzogchen or Mahamudra, I would need a teacher. But the conclusion I have reached after all this time is that there is one thing that always works, and one thing only, and that is my enthusiasm. Not the facile, I-can-do-anything kind of garbage, but what used to be called "faith."

Jesus once noticed (and was quite irritated when) a woman who, in a large crowd, had touched him and "taken" some of his power (implying without his persmission or participation). When he saw her desperate situation, he acknowledged her insistence and said that it was by the power of her faith that she was cured. Likewise, it is recorded in an old Tibetan teaching that if I see the guru as a Buddha, then I get the blessings of a Buddha. If I see him/her as a drunk, then I get the blessings of a drunk. What I put into the relationship, is what I eventually will receive.

My "faith" in the power of my teacher to bestow direct access to the nature of Mind was such that I am convinced he did. Whether that exists "objectively" outside of the context of the teacher/student relationship, and the accepted cultural and linguistic frames we both worked under is irelevant. Did Ouspensky "hear" G. speaking to him telepathically or did he merely project that unto G.? Who cares? O. benefitted and G. smiled. But either way, without the necessary conviction and faith, determination and push, we will get nothing, teacher or no teacher. We all know that what is within us will damn us or save us but we hardly believe that. So during those times, a teacher can be most helpful. Gradually, we can let go and see that the journey is ultimately taken by us alone. No one has done "my" path, no one has lived "my" life. But sometimes, yes, I still maintain that sometimes, we need someone on the outside to remind us of that.

I had another teacher once who said "If you don´t believe that I know more about you than you do, then I can´t help you." My belief carried that forward, and he taught me alot. My belief, not necessarily his expertise.

If you believe that the 4th Way offers something, if you really believe it, then it does, and will get you something. You will scratch the surface and get frustrated with the near incomprehensible claptrap, the deliberately obscure mish mash, and the intentionally muddled mid-level philosophy. But if you persist, you may get past that and find something worthwhile. And in the end, that will be the ultimate teacher.

5th way, for the record is a designation which has its origins in the "Ouspenkian Line". It is discussed by Maurice Nicoll and Boris Mouravieff as the next step in a stair step of teachings. 5th Way Schools are for Man No. 5 who has been born/quickly reestablished Man No. 4 in this lifetime. Beyond No. 5 is "6" and so on ----again, according to Ouspenkian interpretation and viewpoint. In order to "see" this viewpoint, O.'s Eternal Recurrence Theory has to be understood.

We don't KNOW whether this is True or not. How could we when we're still on a horizontal line?

Of course, some "I" in me knows it IS ABSOLUTELY TRUE!

Hi Greg,
Absolutely. I remember G. said something to the effect that we are all looking for a Jesus as our teacher but how many of us are "apostle" level students? I think there´s a great point there and confirms my own experience--you can have the greatest teacher around but if you don´t practice what you are given it is worth almost nil.

BTW, glad to be back and to "hear" you all again. I am hoping some of this list will be at the A&E Conference since I am planning on attending this year.
Best,

One thing I learned reading "western" philosophers was that none of them ever had the same definition for a single word. With every new philosopher, there was a new language to learn. Perhaps the meaning of "5th Way" depends on who is using it:

"Now that’s silly," said Alice. "The word ‘rate’ means ‘price per unit’ or ‘charge per unit.’ What if this price is not an estimate of the expected value of future costs? You can’t just take a word and make it mean whatever you want it to mean."

"When we use a word," said the majestic priest, "it means just what we choose it to mean – neither more nor less."

For the record, here is a quote from Mr Beidler about this -

"Along with other isolated (secret) monasteries of the 3rd way, they are already being replaced by the 4th and 5th ways. While we are grateful for the discoveries made in the 1st, 2nd and 3rd ways, we must recognize that in the course of evolutionary change the burdens of development have been passed onto the shoulders of seekers in the course of ordinary daily life."

As an aside - I don't think G actually endorsed O's Eternal Recurrence Theory.

Thanks Greg. I try to look witty, and end up looking silly. If only I could see them both as really the same.

In that same vein: I plan on using the "do something that makes you look like a fool" exercise for the rest of my life. I can't think of an exercise that I need more! As I've mentioned, I like to play billiards. Have played my whole life, and I'm a decent amateur player. Yesterday, I entered a tournament where nobody knows me and purposely played with my opposite hand. This made me pretty much play like a beginner, and obviously, my playing was laughable. I could barely make a shot. The first guy I played asked me if I was nervous. I said yeah, that's it. All in all, it was a good experience-from a Work perspective. And it only cost me a $10 dollar entrance fee.

For the Record's record 😜😉 G. said that Eternal Recurrence somewhat described an idea embraced by the Work but an accurate description was out of the reach of ordinary language. G. called "Eternal Recurrence" O.'s "hobby" (as in "obsession"). G felt ANY attention to this theory got the Work-er off track

Gandhi said: "The weak can never forgive. Forgiveness is the attribute of the strong."

Every morning upon arising, the seeker will establish a three centered state by repeating Gandhi's saying three times coordinated with a 12 joint illumination.

Whenever a seeker feels wronged by another, they will attempt to fully experience their immediate impressions, emotions and sensations of the situation objectively. Accepting their reaction for what it is, the seeker may then Ponder:
- what is to be gained by taking the wrong personally?
- what is to be gained by harbouring resentment?
- what is to be gained by expecting an apology?
- what is to be gained by seeking revenge?
- what is to be gained by resignation?
- what is to be gained by indignation?
- what is to be gained by anger?
- what is to be gained by violence?
- what is to be gained by hate?
- what is to be gained by self-acceptance?
- what is to be gained by forgivenness?
- what is to be gained by compassion?

The energy thus saved may be directed towards visualizing an illumunated spine and skull filling the body with radiated warmth, leading to an calm, quiet inner state, which might be called a buoyancy of being.

Every evening, the seeker will listen to some Gurdjieff music and ponder: What is the source of remorse?

Hi all!
Happy New Year to all!
I was very amazed of your discuss in previous topic. The question of teacher, search, "workresults" excites me so much. But what shakes me much more are many coincidences which i meet here. I often used to have a new idea or understanding and then read it in your discusses or in Ian's Work Programm! This is inconceivable! (in spite of my passivity with posts i stay by you). for example last days i read Bennet's "transformation" and commentaries of Nicoll and i find theese writings also invaluable.

Ian, could you explain to me what dou you call "a boyancy of being."? Is it like the boy who Nicoll called "Benjamin"?

I don't know anything about this Benjamin lad.

Mr Beidler had a phrase he used to describe being in a state of Being - he called it a Float of Being. Since something that floats is buoyant, I paraphrased what he said and called it a Buoyancy of Being. I suppose one could also say a Lightness of Being. It is just a more descriptive way of saying Self Remembering or Mindfullness or Presence.

Think of a log floating down a river. So long as it doesn't get caught up on the river bank, it will eventually arrive at the endless ocean of Being. If it remains Non-Identified in a Float of Being, it glides along the river unaffected by the things on the shores, but if it's 'desires' take over and it gets attracted to the things happening on land, it can get stuck on the river bank. It may rot there, or a storm or flood may dislodge it and send it on it's way again.

Hello Marina,
Lovely to hear from you.
Coincidences ?

The Work is much more than personal, ("more like air" is the simile I like - Bennett again, I think), so It can work through us if we are receptive enough, even though hidden, invisible, and unknown to me, let alone understood. Perhaps a higher energy, conscious or creative, but not coming from us. Another possibility ?

Anyway, we are fortunate to be in this group, and I believe there is an invisible "neighbourly" connection, and I am grateful for this, as well as for the online exchanges.

Re "boyancy", I just took it as a typo or mis-spelling of "buoyancy". Be interesting to see what Ian says.

Best wishes,
Judy.

Hi Ian and Judy,
Thank you for your replay,
I've had a very interesting experience two weeks ago- before i was asleep i felt a new "i" in me, it was a kind of very very lively energy, i felt it like a "boy" in me. I don't know why i thougt it "boy" and not "girl". And next day i was reading by Nicoll that we need to have something intermediate between high and low centers which can communicate with them, Nicoll reffers the boy, which he called Benjiamin. This was very shocking for me. After i tried to feel again this "boy" in me, but he was disappeared...

> Gandhi said: "The weak can never forgive. Forgiveness is the attribute of the strong."

Yes, the more we get aware about ourselves the more we understand other people- their difficulties, warryies etc. When we think that everything alright with us, than we judge and criticize others.

This week i tried to stop my negative reactions and visualized

Can you describe the negative manifestations? If it is too personal, email me.

Essentials

When eating first being food, be attentive to the sensed presence of the whole body and especially the sensations of eating. Also be attentive to the impressions from the food - taste, smell, texture, color, sound - without labeling them or expressing a like or dislike for them. Relax the mind and emotions.

When breathing second being food, be attentive to the sensed presence of the whole body and especially the sensations of breathing. Also be attentive to the impressions from the air - taste, smell, texture, color, sound - without labeling them or expressing a like or dislike for them. Relax the mind and emotions.

When perceiving third being food, be attentive to the sensed presence of the whole body and especially the sensations of the various sense organs. Also be attentive to the impressions from the environment - taste, smell, texture, color, sound - without labeling them or expressing a like or dislike for them. Relax the mind and emotions.

Spend some time each day relaxing all three centers together. When three centers are relaxed, they are working in harmony for a common purpose. When you move on to other activities, try to maintain the harmonious three centered state. Approach each activity in your daily life as an exercise for developing a three centered buoyancy of being.

When confronted with negative emotions, acknowledge them as lawful and redirect their energy towards sensing the body, watching the breath, and repeating several times an inner prayer such as:
"It is nothing; I wish to be."
or
"I wish, I can, I am."
or
"Holy-Affirming, Holy-Denying, Holy-Reconciling, Transubstantiate in me, For my Being."
Finally, endeavour to return to a relaxed three centered buoyancy of being in the center of the whirlwind of life.

Hi Ian,

As a beginner in the Work, may I ask you how can I relax the three centers together ?

Thank you very much to host me on this e-space dedicated to the G-Work.

Can anyone give any reference or insite to the line in chapter one of BTTHG, " making butter from air". It came up recently and I have no memory of it ever being used other than on that page.
Thanks for any help.

That saying comes from Arousing of Thought in BT. It is an interesting passage, in that it gives a definition of: "a "learned man" — defined as a "relatively transferable arising, depending on the quality of the functioning of thought, feeling, and organic automatism", and according to the definition of another also ancient and renowned learned man, the Arabian Mal-el-Lel, which definition by the way was in the course of time borrowed and repeated in a different way by a no less renowned and learned Greek, Xenophon, "the compound result of consciousness, subconsciousness, and instinct";"

G here makes an interesting correlation between the three centers and consciousness, subconsciousness, and instinct.
So, when G says elsewhere that man's true consciousness should be his subconsciousness, he is referring to the emotional center, which is, or should be, the center of gravity of the reconciling force.

> As a beginner in the Work, may I ask you how can I relax the three centers together ?

Hi Valentin,

According to the Gurdjieff teaching, man is a three centered being with physical, emotional and intellectual centers. Due to the improper education, we are not taught to properly integrate the functioning of the three centers and as a consequence we do not live and act in an harmonious way. For example, we make a decision with our mind, but our emotions may drive us to do the opposite of what we intended. If we are to act as integrated beings, all three centers need to agree to any decision we make. In Beelzebub's Tales, Gurdjieff called this integrated state "all-brains-balanced-being-perception".

Integrating the three centers is, or should be, the goal of all paths of development. Thus, every tradition has developed methods of integrating the centers, and the different methods may be more or less useful or appropriate at different times for different people. So, I will mention a few things you can try; you have probably learned a few things in your previous experience with other paths; and other members of the group will hopefully mention methods that they find useful.

A relaxed body is one in which there is no muscle tension. A relaxed emotional center is one in which there are no strong emotions, either positive or negative. A relaxed mind is one that has no thoughts.

Before you can relax the three centers together, you have to know what it means to relax each center by itself. Thus, it is best to start by working on one center at a time. You might start by devoting 10 minutes every morning to relaxing the body, 10 minutes during the day to relaxing the mind, and 10 minutes at night to relaxing the emotions.

To relax the body, move your attention to the various parts of the body in a sequence and let the muscles relax. Some people say start with the head, others say the feet. Use whatever you like. There are many sequence that you could use as you move your attention around your body, some very general and others very detailed. Whatever sequence you use, at the end you should have a complete sensation of the body as one whole relaxed unit.

In conjunction with relaxing the body, there is a practice in the Work called Sensing. This involves being aware of the sensations in the body. The scientific term for this is called propriaception. There are all kinds of sensory nerves inside your body to sense things such as: heat, cold, pain, pressure, muscle tension, muscle position, etc. There is a complete list here - http://www.endlesssearch.co.uk/exercises_sensing.htm. This practice is deemed very important in the Work. It is the ground or bed-rock on which all else is built, so it is very important to practice Sensing until it becomes virtually constant.

Becoming aware of muscle tension is a first step in learning Sensing. So the first thing you do when trying to relax the three centers is to relax your muscles. Then you add Sensing to that. With experience, the relaxing and the Sensing can be done simultaneously. Later on Sensing will be used in conjunction with other exercises.

To start with the experience of Sensing, take a comfortable position and relax all your muscles. Become aware of your feet. Imagine that you are being filled with a warm, thick, honey like liquid and that it is slowly filling your body, starting from the feet, and moving up to your legs, then your pelvis, abdomen, chest, arms, shoulders, neck, and head. Be aware of the sense of gravity pulling your body towards the ground. Be aware of the position of your limbs. When you have 'filled' your whole body, strive to maintain an awareness of Sensing in the whole body. This requires your whole Attention. Repeat the process several times each session.

Relaxing or quieting the mind involves stopping thoughts. There are several ways to approach this. One is simply to try to stop thinking. Another approach is to 'short circuit' the mind by deliberately thinking non-habitual thoughts. This is done by repeating a prayer or mantra silently to oneself. Another method is called Pondering. That is where a question is held silently before the mind. Whenever an 'answer' pops into your mind, it is simply acknowledged and then discarded. This is similar to a Zen Koan.

Relaxing the emotions is more difficult. It is very helpful to be able to quiet the mind first, as many of our thoughts evoke emotions. One has to make a decision to set aside all of one's cares about life and just be present in the moment. There is a strong connection between emotions and breathing. Breathing slowly, evenly, and deeply into the diaphram will help to relax the emotional center. The technique of watching our breathing is a well established meditation practice.

So, to sum up, one way to relax the three centers together is to first relax the body and establish Sensing, second to quiet the mind with one of the techniques suggested, and third to relax the emotions by watching the breath and just 'being' in the present moment, unconcerned with our worldly cares.

The elements of the just mentioned sequence can all be combined into one unified exercise, for example -

As you watch your breathing, use the following sequence -
On the in breath, Relax and Sense the body part ... and on the out breath, repeat the quoted words silently:

1. Lower right leg bone....."Holy Affirming"
2. Upper right leg bone....."Holy Denying"
3. Pelvic bone....."Holy Reconciling"
4. Upper left leg bone....."Transubstantiate in me"
5. Lower left leg bone....."For my Being."
6. Spinal column and skull..."Holy Affirming"
7. Upper right arm bone....."Holy Denying"
8. Lower right arm bone....."Holy Reconciling"
9. Upper left arm bone....."Transubstantiate in me"
10. Lower left arm bone....."For my Being."

The more you practice, the easier and faster it will become to enter a state of "all-brains-balanced-being-perception".

Hope this helps. If you have more questions, just ask!

Thanks Ian for this comprehensive clarification. I know some of these ways to relax (for instance, I've been cultivating breath yoga for years) but the one point wich was not clear for me was about "together", to relax the 3 centers together. But now, it's perfectly clear.
I would not like to wear you out with my questions (and matter-of-factly, anyone else in the group could maybe answer) but in the sequence you give, the words repeated in the second stage, "Holy denying", are not clear for me.
What can there be holy in denying ? More generally, what do the term holy point to ?

by Guest

Hello Valentin ,
From my experience, the word Holy is used here in the sense of "lawfully part of what Is". So putting the word holy with denying, the message to the centers becomes, "I see that this denying is alive in me now". On one hand, some distance from the denying is created and identification perhaps lessened. Over time (see the food factory - In Search) embrasing this Holy Denying becomes a key ingredient in transformation.

Ah, together as in - at the same time.

Gurdjieff refers to the 3 forces in the Law of Three as the Holy Affirming force, the Holy Denying force and the Holy Reconciling force. They are referred to as Holy because they all issue from His Endlessness and are the basis of all energy transformations.
Also each of our three centers has its center of gravity in one of the forces - Intellectual (head brain) is affirming, physical (spinal brain) is denying, and emotional (solar plexus brain) is reconciling.
Have you read Beelzebub's Tales? These are all described there, particularly in chapter 39.

If G. is right about the solar plexus, why do I feel my emotions emanating from my chest/breast/heart area, not my solar plexus. The only time I feel my solar plexus is when someone punches me there.

James wrote: why do I feel my emotions emanating from my chest/breast/heart area, not my solar plexus.

I find Ian's formulation above goes right over me. Surely the head does a lot of denying as do the body and the emotions so I must be looking at this from a level below that of the referenced idea.

This suggest to me that Tim doesn't have a clue. I often see the yes (I seek to understand this idea,) and the no (I'll never get it), and reconciling (I offer this suffering and continue to type prepared to accept making a fool of myself.)

James wrote about solar plexus in the same context. I have heard many express his question. All I can contribute is that a recent and ongoing study of sensing the spine at points on a level with the bottom point, the "center", the solar plexus, the heart, the neck, back of the head and top of the Head, with breathing, has for now created far greater "access" to each of these points including the solar plexus.

James writes:

It may be, James that your sensing of feeling and emotion is relegated to the outer portion of your solar plexus sphere. This would be a sign to proceed deeper into your feeling core. All of us have our areas to work on in the centers --- we all have our areas of more understanding and our areas of less understanding. Our conditioning as Westerners generally, and Western males specifically, does not allow for more than a tacit exploration of the solar plexus realm. We live in a world which is mostly about theories, concepts, strageties, arguements, abstractions, spread sheets, numerics, blueprints, plans, etc. etc. etc. so, most of us live in our heads. The head area is the "safe and affirmed place" in our society. Many people are lucky to even move down into the heart realm (much less the arena of solar plexus). It is not about any rightness or wrongness ---- it is about bringing more awareness to those areas where we are sensing less.

> The only time I feel my solar plexus is when someone punches me there.

Begin by breathing down into this area slowly and fully and observe what comes up and let it pass. This is a way in. The area you are referring to as being punched by someone is probably the center (or close to that center) of your solar plexus "spread".

I'd like to suggest that the Life is Real deals directly with the centers.

G. discusses the specific breathing exercise that goes with I Am, I Wish, I Can. From memory I think it's around page 107, but that could be off a little.

I is in the head, front of the head. Am is in the solar plexus. Wish emenates from heart and sex. Can from spine.

On to Denying. . .denying in G terms isn't the same thing as denying in our normal language. It means resistance. The opposing force. Sure the Secretary. . .which isn't a real center. . .denies all of the time. But this isn't "intellectual".

Plus. Minus. Equal. Plus and Minus elicit and destroy each other if the equalization isn't present.

Minus is denying.

In qabbalah terms, denying is Beth, the container, while affirming is the positive force which moves always forward.

The other reading that would help here is the Chapter in All and Everything that deals with Triamazikano. The Holy Planet Purgatory is a crucial chapter.

All and Everything is ALL and EVERYTHING. If you haven't read it at least three times, then begin.

Harry writes:

> I'd like to suggest that the Life is Real deals directly with the centers.

Thank you Harry for remindinding us where we are primarily placed.

The Feldenkrais work (along with Alexander technique, Reichian Release [Radix Therapy], Rolfing, Patterning) were suggested by me to inform what we are doing.

My physical/theraputic work with people sent to me (surreptitiously) by the local Gurdjieff Foundation branch confirmed my suspicions that after 20 years (and upwards) of Work practice most of their Work was being done from the neck up. There was an inordinate amount of inner tension and resistance to deep relaxation could hardly be conducive to the reception of "finer matters".

The solar plexus, in my experience, becomes the receptive and relay center for higher emotional frequencies. Deep relaxation is required for this.

One (aforementioned) students went on to do more intensive work with a better practitioner than myself. She insisted that this work was the key to her having been able to (in Ouspenskian fashion) "go up a step". All the others affirmed that this new (to them) physical understanding was key to fundamental change of direction in their Work. They also generally affirmed that this was a missing element from their Work training.

G. certainly understood this way of functioning bodily --- it is evident to me in the jumpy film clip I am so grateful to Ian for posting on our site. My suggestion (and it is only that) is that you can feel "You" in a rigid contained physical body well enough, but how much can "You Do" in that understanding of your planetary body?

It is often remarked that G. moved in "one piece (my emphasis) with a feline grace (again my emphasis)". My belief is that particular physical manifestation is key to this practice.

Part of the problem with the exclusive Ouspensky lineage (which most of the "official" G. groups practice) is that the Ideas tend to center only in concept and are rarely Work-ed through the planetary body. When asking after the Movements I have been told "Oh, we don't bother with those --- you don't really have to do them".

Oh.

There is an exceptional moment in the film clip (near the end) where G. walks from the car to the group of women. He is "acting" for the camera and (I am sure) posterity.

Good observation there. It is good that you feel emotions emanating from your chest/breast/heart area!

I use the Solar Plexus only as an indicator of a central point in the 'circle' of the torso. The whole torso expresses a range of feelings from the genitalia to the throat. (James refers to this in his post above.) We have sexual feelings in the genital area. We have 'butterflies' in the stomach when we are nervous, or a 'knot' of unease when in a threatening situation. Revulsion may make us sick. Feelings of joy or sadness in the heart area. Sometimes we get a 'lump in the throat'. Part of this Work is to open up all those areas of feeling and sensation to our consciousness. As Greg points out above, a lot of this Work has become overly intellectual, in spite of Gurdjieff's insistance that it be three centered, that we Work on the three centers in a balanced way. He demonstrated this by writing books, choreographing Movements and composing music. Gurdjieff, being a greek male, probably wasn't the best teacher to help people to open their hearts.

Gurdjieff mentions that the emotional brain is spread throughout the torso. This brain, or part of it, has been located. It is called the Enteric nervous system. "This 'second brain' is made up of a knot of brain nerves in the digestive tract. It is thought to involve around 100 billion nerve cells - more than held in the spinal cord. Researchers believe this belly brain may save information on physical reactions to mental processes and give out signals to influence later decisions. It may also be responsible in the creation of reactions such as joy or sadness."

http://www.ananova.com/news/story/sm_105441.html
http://www.aikidoaus.com.au/dojo/docs/2nd_braina.htm

Work on the emotions is an essential part of the Work. If the we are not feeling the full range of feeling in the torso, then we need to Work on opening those areas up. As Greg mentions above and I have mentioned elsewhere, we first need to learn proper breathing - breathing from the diaphram deep into the belly. Air is our second being food and is related to our emotional functioning. Watching the breath exercises are given quite often in this regard. Of course, there is great resistance in the Work to 'breathing exercises', but it is essential to breathe properly. If we observe that we don't breathe properly, we need to train ourselves to do so. Spend 5 minutes a day doing deep diaphramatic breathing and eventually it will be come more 'natural'.

This has to be combined with Sensing in these areas. I cannot stress enough the importance of practicing Sensing on a daily basis. Sensing is not only something involving the surface of the body, but also all the way through. This is why Sensing the bones is mentioned.

Also, remember that in Work language Sensing refers to physical sensations and Feeling refers to emotions. It is important to use these two terms properly when talking about the Work. It is not always easy to distinguish between Sensing and Feeling, so we need to spend a lot of time observing ourselves and learning to distinguish them.

Intentional Suffering is related to the feeling function in man. I mention this often in our weekly exercises. One of the reasons for this is to spend time actually feeling our emotions, both the pleasant ones and the unpleasant ones, rather than supressing them, or as Gurdjieff calls it, self-calming. If we are not 'conscious' of them, then they will 'drive' us unconsciously. They are the Horse that pulls the Carriage. If we do not develop the Reins, we will be at the mercy of the whims of the Horse. Being at the mercy of the Horse is essentially to be driven by unconscious feelings. This is what Gurdjieff means when he says that our unconscious should be part of our real consciousness.

Yes, what you say is certainly true.
One thing to keep in mind is that each center can be sub-divided into an intellectual, emotional and physical aspect. Gurdjieff's head, solar plexus, spine idea is an ideal situation when the centers are working properly. The analogy of the horse, the driver, the carriage, and the owner come to mind here.

In relation to Work on ourselves, it is most practical to thinkof it this way -
"Holy Denying equals our inherited mechanical "myself" manifested by our habits, traits, thoughts, feelings and actions in sleep. Holy Affirming is our conscious effort to accept, endure and to meet with objectivity all our Holy Denyings. Holy Reconciling is the resultant of them both leading automatically to a Transubstantiation. By self-observation we learn to recognize accurately our Holy Denyings to which we then eventually apply our Holy Affirming." (Paul Beidler)

A close reading of Beelzebub's Tales will confirm the method.

> James wrote about solar plexus in the same context. I have heard many express his question. All I can contribute is that a recent and ongoing study of sensing the spine at points on a level with the bottom point, the "center", the solar plexus, the heart, the neck, back of the head and top of the Head, with breathing, has for now created far greater "access" to each of these points including the solar plexus.

Would you care to submit that exercise to our growing repertoir of Work practices?

What you are referring to is related to Kundalini Yoga, and should be approached cautiously. The Taoists have similar exercises. Of course, I frequently mention Sensing of the spine and skull. The breathing and reverberations mentioned in the exercise that Harry referred to in Life is Real can be a part of this.
Sensing exercises in general are Kundalini exercises - sensing the flow of energy in the body. The energy we are experiencing is the electromagnetic energy (electricity) flowing in the nerves.
What we are learning by doing these exercises is developing our Attention and learning to direct it to parts of ourselves that we normally don't attend to, that we are unconscious of. These energies are moving in us all the time but we are not generally aware of them.

Interesting that G never did the Movements himself, he just created them and taught them. His own physical development Work must have been acquired in a different context during his 'travels' before he began teaching. Some of the Movements were of course based on things he had experienced during his travels. The Movements and the physical labour at the Prieure we an attempt to fill a gap missing in the lives of a western urban society. Sensing exercises are part and parcel of this aspect of the Work. Our meetings at Northeon Forest were very much like a day at the Prieure - physical labour all day combined with inner Work, with brief gaps for a little talk or discussion. The purpose of a Meeting is to give you the tools that are to be applied during your daily life where the real Work happens. Even Movements can be seen as training for how to move physically during our daily life. Can every move you make in daily life be as deliberately spontaneous and fully Sensed as a Movement?

As Mr Beidler used to say - The choreography of life consciously danced.

I have added a sunspot data link and a link to the site search page.

Have you noticed any planetary influences affecting your life?

---

by Harry

There is definitely a lunar influence. I don't think it's important to change my behavior in anticipation of that influence; but during both Full and New moons I can see and feel a lunar influence. And there are certain people who are more Lunar than others.

If the Moon pulls on the tides and we're 95% water. . .

I do believe that it is possible to step aside from such influences. But that's what Work is about. Because if we climb up on those stilts then we're above the sandstorm. Of course to get on the stilts we have to eat the sheep and goats.

I've also noticed a subtler, longer term influence. This seems to be a twelve year cycle. But I suspect you need to study this and examine your life in retrospect to begin to see such an influence.

And while the storm rages, the sheep huddle together. But when there is no storm, the stilts bind the sheep together and keep them 'in-line', forming a 'carriage' in which the 'shepherd' can ride. So we need to maintain a supply of sheep.

Could we eventually live permanently on stilts?

Yes, I have 'uncluttered' the front page.
I have added a sunspot data link and a link to the site search page.

Have you noticed any planetary influences affecting your life?

Hello again Ian.
Can't seem to get the quote function working today. Will leave it as it is for now.
To answer your interesting question;
Yes and no.
I know that the astrological influences are there, and I believe that they are felt by essence (as with the genetic influences). Some major decisions of my life have without doubt been influenced in these ways, though I had no knowledge of that at the time. I guess they are overlaid by the personality with all its sociological influences to be observed, so hopefully, as essence grows, I'll become more aware of these "felt in my bones" convictions which are indistinct and vague at present, though undeniable.

An example would be my "endless search" - (what a good phrase, don't you agree ?) - in that the need came from a place deeper and more meaningful than any intellectual or emotional decision - essence or magnetic center ? I mean, there certainly was no decision to search. I just couldn't "not search".

Also, it is incredibly complicated, in that apart from the general planetary influences and cycles, there are the personal ones as well. It would be one of the intellectual temptations for me to try to work out any details. I'll leave that to evolved astrologers/astronomers who have made it their life's work. Nevertheless, your section on the homepage serves as an excellent reminding factor of the totality of life, and thus of the need to work today.

As mentioned, I enjoy, and thanks for adding the sunspot cycles.
I also enjoyed the links to the recent science about the second brain. Fascinating stuff.

Need a quick summary;
No - in that noticing directly or trying to link cause and effect, is my achilles-heel of temptations.
Yes - in that I notice the influences indirectly through not understood convictions which I cannot ignore.

Best wishes,
Judy.

What an interesting thread all of this has been! Thank you all.

For a superb enactment of a second brain tied in knots see Heath Ledger's almost feral performance in BROKEBACK MOUNTAIN. He telegraphs physicality in the mode of a Brando or Dean.

Did anyone "catch" what I was refering to in Gurdjieff's walk from the car to the women in the doorway? I'd like to hear from others before I say anything.

OK,y'all, looks like I lead you down a primrose path, and I am so very sorry. In the transmission of the film (even after multiple playings) on my work computer there was a lag and a stalling during G.'s walk from the car. I took it as a moment of conscious movement deliberately enacted for the camera (like those moments in the film of REMARKABLE MEN). Seeing the film last night again on another monitor made me realise what had happened.

So, you are off the hook --- and I will embarassingly place myself on it.

So sorry.

Rodney Collin wrote a great book called the Theory of Planetary Influence. If you can find it, the time invested is paid back in full.

I spent much time with Astrology in my young life. The idea of color filters explained in one of the works is very good. I gave it up, because there's too much of a temptation to change in anticipation of an influence. And as we all know, as Mick Jaggar has told us all, Anticipation is the biggest problem of all. . .

Do you mean "The Theory of Celestial Influence"?

It is an interesting read, fascinating even, in parts, but none-the-less (and as the title suggests) theoretical. Extremely theoretical.

Some days I am very optimistic. Other days, I feel as if there is no hope! I know pretty much zilch about astrology, and only a smattering of astronomy. But I have decided, after just coming out of the "no hope" part of a cycle, that I am going to attempt to chart my extreme up and down times with the phases of the moon. Of course, this might be fruitless because there are so many other factors influencing my level of optimism as well. for instance, I have been sick the last two weeks, some kind of ear/nose/throat infection. I finally broke down and went to the doctor on Wednesday. After only a day on antibiotics, I'm feeling much better. I am astonished, looking back, on how being sick affected me so much emotionally. I'm even entertaining the possiblity again that one day I might actually have a soul!

In any event, the solar and lunar info on the web page are a constant reminder of the power of external influences.

Illness can (with the right Attention) bring us into contact with a higher level of ourselves.

I have the Moon in Cancer in my astrological chart which makes me something of a "lunatic". While working as a cowboy on a dude ranch in Wyoming in the summer of '73, I came in contact with an elderly German nanny who moonlighted as an astrologer. She cast and interpreted my chart and emphasized the need for me to pay close attention to the phases of the Moon and the ebb and flow of my emotional life. She also added that I needed to understand that my chart showed my natural bent and therefore the influences I needed to understand and gradually peel away from. All good advice. This, along with a visit to the Big Horn Medicine Wheel with my mathmatically-trained, astrologically inclined girlfriend (who was the spittin' image of Harriet Anderrsen, Harry!) heralded the beginning of my spiritual path.

I have always, since, watched the general "pitch" of my emotional life and it naturally does follow the trend of the moon's phases. I have to make great efforts (though it's easier now) to Work against some of it to Balance. It has gotten to the point (35 1/2 years down the road) that I can feel the pitch and sweel of the cycle within my body. Really. I have my own physical calendar.

The Rodney Collin book, though highly suspect, is valuable for encouraging a way to think, sense, and look at things while on this Earth---- scientific inaccuracy does not get in the way of that particular value. But, then again: You must verify these things for yourself.

Thanks. That's a good one, that I have never heard before.

Very true, too. Sickness is one of those denying forces that show us how little control we have over some aspects of ourselves. All one can do in the face of sickness is to endure it while it lasts. It will be the last thing that many of us will have to endure. Life is a disease with a terminal prognosis.

We have to find ways and means to Affirm, endure, Intentionally Suffer through our sicknesses.

Sickness can be a powerful liberator from the petty concerns and self-importance of our ego. It can brings us closer to what is real in ourselves and others.

Select three of your Little I's or Traits that automatically arise in reaction to certain types of events in your life.

Devise three Affirmations to be consciously applied to the three selected Denying forces when they automatically arise in you.

Observe your resulting state impartially.

Ponderings -
Does a Reconciliation arise as a result of meeting the Denying with an Affirming?
What are the characteristics of the Reconciliation?
Do the Reconciliations vary depending on the Affirmation?
Are there other exercises that are conducive to a Reconciling state?
Do other Little I's oppose the Affirmation?

I've selected some annoying I's who insist on;

having too many opinions explaining too much thinking they know too much and one brief affirmation to address them all.

In the tones of "Parade halt!", I'm mentally saying "Inner stop!"
followed by, "I wish to be".

Thanks to those who have shared so far.

The small ‘I’s’ that are particularly relentless now are:

1. The ‘hungry I’ is rather dissatisfied with what is and wants more.
2. The ‘superior I’ likes to dominate and feel powerful
3. The ‘timid I’ likes to hide in the background and feel safe

Writing this, I realize it sounds somewhat like an animal: safe, powerful and satiated! Lurking in my lair and looking out at the world.

The affirmation that seems to address these ‘I’s’ is: Sit/stand straight, inhale deeply into the belly, exhale completely from the nares and say: I have come to this point to be, I have come to this point to do.

Now the hard part: actually doing the Work and noticing the reconciliation’s. Looking forward to actually observing what happens.

Ian McFarlane said;
Does a Reconciliation arise as a result of meeting the Denying with an Affirming?
What are the characteristics of the Reconciliation?

Reconciliation noticed is a calmer state, tinged with "pleased with myself" meritorious I's. So these I's then become the second force for the affirmation, and so far, reconciliation from this has been a further calmer state.

Theory to me seems to be that I'm using the Holy Equation to transform/digest mechanical reactions to impressions.
A bit like peeling the onion.

I changed to "Lawful Holy Denyings, I wish to be", as earlier choice a bit too lively, and didn't work as well, which is a part answer to another one of the ponderings, I guess.

That's about it for now.
Judy.

P.S. PKelley, welcome . Good to hear from you.
J.

by Harry

I don't think affirming can be directed toward denying. Rather there is a state of calmness, that state of balance, with which we should embrace denying and affirming. And by that embrace we change what would otherwise be an explosion.

Affirming meets denying. . .boom.

Affirming, denying and reconciling meet and something new occurs.

By observing denying we can move.

Yesterday began with crashes. A broken shade. Knocked the boiling teapot off it's base. Nice for the rug. But these were things that were denying the beginning of my day. They were events that had that denying force.

If I respond then I get pulled in and find, perhaps, even a large crash later. But instead I allow them to flow. I accept them. And go on with a long day.

Funny, working at home I have less time to myself than when I'm out in the world of business. But I like it more. And many of my i's like it more.

Hey all. I finally feel alive again! The last week of a two week illness had me feeling very low. I had enough energy to look at the exercise this week and that is where it ended. After looking at what some of you came up with, I think I might be able to do this one after all. Hope those who shared don't mind if i use some of their ideas. Feeling timid is a big one for me, as well as saying "should," and feeling superior.

by Judy

I said earlier;

> Theory to me seems to be that I'm using the Holy Equation to transform/digest mechanical reactions to impressions.
> A bit like peeling the onion.

That's ambiguous.

The following may be clearer;

"I'm attempting,in accordance with the Law of 3, to psychologically transform the mechanical reactions to impressions (ie; the annoying mental i's belonging to false personality), into a more essential reconciled state (reconciliation), by using an affirmation to give added strength to the active force, which is my wish to be."

So there are four things here;
active force = what I want, or the wish to be.
passive force = force of the mental i's that I'm working with.
reconciling force =some unseen force (perhaps felt ?) resulting from the Work attempt of observation/self-remembering, and reconciliation =the calmer state.

Whereas in ordinary life, it is the active force which I see first, followed by the resistance to that, and I usually cannot see 3rd force, in this exercise I am attempting to reverse this in order to make personality a little more passive, and thus the mental i's are 2nd force to the active force of my essential "wish to be".
And the quality of the 3rd force (resulting from a Work attempt plus Higher help ??) will determine the state of the reconciliation .

Hope this makes sense. That's my current understanding, and comments always welcome. It's only an hypothesis, but theoretical clarity helps me a lot.

I'm at ordinary work today, and in a quiet spell, hence this post. After leaving my PC at the repair shop yesterday, been working a bit on separating from lots of "addictive i's, which keep urging that I head to the library to the computers there. Ha! First time I've been without one at home since 1994.

Judy.

I see it like this - if 'it' is hungry and I decide to fast for four hours before I let 'it' eat, then my affirmation to fast is directed towards the denying force of hunger.
Or if 'it' is offended by someone and wants to get even and I decide to restrain myself from acting out revenge, then my affirmation is directed towards 'its' angry reaction.

The resultant clash or dispute (controlled explosion?) between the denying and affirming leads to a resulting reconciliation.

The reconciling force, the state of calmness, has to be intended - affirmed - it can't happen unconsciously or mechanically. I see 3rd force more as a result than as something there from the beginning. Then there can come a higer synthesis that embraces all 3 forces.

As G states elsewhere - "Will a man unacquainted with this system of symbols understand a great deal if he is told that the knowledge of unity by the means of self-knowledge and self-perfection for man is the neutralization of the binary by the ternary and its transmutation into the quaternary in order to close the pentagram and realize the "Seal of Solomon"?

I had to chuckle when I read this. I think I've read the Enneagram lecture and tried to understand it on about three separate occasions. I have no clue what the hell G is talking about, but I can answer his question: "Will a man unacquainted with the system of symbols understand a great deal..." with an emphatic "No!"

Seekers may Ponder whether they have found that: "I often experience two forces: the Denying force of the organism that automatically reacts, accomplishes, feels, thinks, suffers, sleeps, dies; and the parallel Affirming force of a new presence that observes, remembers, acts, is remorseful, endures, has aim, and lives." (Paul Beidler)

During the next week, using the examples given above as a guideline, select an Affirmation to be consciously applied whenever you experience any of the automatic Denying Forces. Float in the being-presence of your resulting state of Reconciliation.

Each evening the Seeker may Ponder with Sensed breath: Can we experience a Reconciling state without first automatically experiencing a Denying force and then applying an Affirmation?

by James F

I'm beginning to think and feel a greater understanding of ideas such as "conscious labor and intentional suffering," "the holy equation," "the law of three," "three forces," and how they relate to the process of transformation taking place inside me. Over the last week or so, it seems as if ideas have been clicking for me, in so far as putting everything together.

Things started to click last week while reading the book "Transformation," by Bennett. Judy recommended it in connection with teachers and ways. (Thanks Judy). It is an easy read, around 190 pages, and nothing like reading Beelzebub's Tales, or Kant, or Shakespeare. So I'm sure anyone around here, or anyone who is serious about inner change for that matter, would be able to get through it fairly quickly.

Bennett made some statements in the book about the Soul. In particular, he stated that in his understanding, the soul is created from the mind, and that certain, particular kinds of experiences that we have create parts of the soul. As we accumulate these parts over time, they eventually come together and form the soul. When I read that, something inside me said Aha! That's it. That agrees with my own recent experiences, my knowledge of physics, science, and the general workings of the visible world, and with my understanding of my own inner life from childhood until now.

I'm not doing Bennett's explanation justice, I'm sure, so whoever is interested might want to read it for themselves. Anyway, my point is that something clicked in me about food diagrams, conscious labor exercises, and all that stuff when I read the book. And that something has carried over into this week's exercise.

It has carried over in the sense that this week's exercise makes sense to me. I read it, and I thought, hey, I can do that. And I did. The affirmation I formulated to apply to the denying force of my organism this week is the following:

“Remember your aim—to become a Real man. This is an opportunity to do that by seizing this energy and transforming it into something higher.” While internally repeating the above, I inhale, transform, exhale, and sense my body, beginning at the head and going down to the bottom of the feet.

Attention

1. Start by directing your attention into your hand and becoming aware of as many sensations as you can. Widen your attention to include your arm and then your whole body. Next become attentive to whatever your body is in contact with - bed, floor, chair, etc. Widen your attention to include the room or immediate environment you are located in. Become aware of as many impressions as you can take in, in a non-judgemental way. Gradually widen your attention in steps to include your town or city, country, continent, planet, solar system, galaxy, everything. The last steps will require more visualization and imagination than the first steps. Every step should build on the previous one, so that nothing is lost from the attention as it is widened. Finally. reverse the steps and gradually return attention to just your hand. Finish by collecting your attention into a three centered buoyancy of Being.

2. In free moments during the day, let your attention be directed to a series of seven distinct objects in your immediate visual environment. Attend to each object for one complete breath. Observe each object with a sightless gaze and without judgement. On the eight breath return your attention to the sensation of the whole of yourself. On the ninth breath, expand your attention to include the whole of yourself and the whole of the environment.

3. When listening to others talk, try to be more attentive to the pauses, spaces and quietness between their words.

4. Choose one denying force that you are particularly attached to or identified with. Resolve not to express or act out the chosen denying force in your habitual way, by substituting a consciously chosen and prepared counter action, activity or exercise to be performed instead. Finish by collecting your attention into a three centered buoyancy of Being.

Draining Exercise

This exercise is given to assist in separating from the daily turmoil. The purpose is to drain from the body everything that is unnecessary. It is best undertaken when there is little pressure of time. One should begin seated in a not too comfortable chair. The spine should be straight. Feet on the floor. Hands resting in lap or dangling from the side. Alternatively, one can use the lotus position if one can hold that position for an extended period of time without excessive strain. Eyes opened in an unfocused stare, a Sightless Gaze.

Begin the exercise by invoking the higher centers, intentionally, internally:

Holy Higher Intellectual
Holy Higher Emotional
Take control
Maintain my life
Maintain my impressions.

Drain Everything that is Unnecessary. This draining begins by opening 'valves' in the soles of the feet and the hands. Let the 'unnecessary' drain from these opened valves. Feel internally how the level of the 'unnecessary' begins to drain, first from the head, then down through the face, the neck, the shoulders, down the arms, down the torso. This is 'as if' a vat of 'unnecessary' is draining from the valves in the hands and feet.

Thoughts will intercede. I's will attempt to gain attention. Events will flit by. When this happens go back and continue from the level where the interference occurred. Notice when the flow is slower. Let it unravel, become uncongealed. It is important to maintain impressions. But to not pay undue attention to intrusion.

Once all of the 'unnecessary' has drained from the bodies, close the opened valves. Maintain that state of 'nothingness' as long as beneficial. As you move away from the exercise, shake the hands and feet to break the threads of 'unnecessary.' Try to maintain the simpleness as you enter back into day to day existence.

Walking Exercise

As you 'Float' hither and thither during the week, sense the presence or substance of the Hara or solar plexus as a small planet suspended in dynamic equilibrium between the planet earth and the Sun in your heart. Feel the emanations of the Sun 'as-if' they are manifestations of the higher emotional center - Faith, Hope, Charity, Compassion. Keep the head poised above with a Sightless Gaze.

Writing Exercise

In the evening, bring yourself into a three centered Float of Being, characterized by a quiet, relaxed, yet deeply Sensed, Felt and Observed, body, emotions and mind. With inward silence, Ponder for a few minutes or more:

Monday, Tuesday - "What is a question?"
Wednesday, Thursday - "What is an answer?"
Friday, Saturday - "What is the purpose or necessity of question/answer in our lives?"

Then, while Sensing your hands, compose a Haiku. Let the words emerge from the silence of your Pondering.
Seekers may wish to share their compositions.

This weeks exercises assisted me in a period of increasing personal turmoil.
In draining I have noticed less any blocks, per se, but have felt keenly the deep, heaviness behind my eyes (left side mainly), around my solar plexus and strangely enough, my hands. I hold my sadness and angst in those areas and each day the same areas were made "visible".
In pondering I found myself tearful every time I wondered why we question.
I could not write any haiku this week but noticed that the draining seemed to induce deep dreaming and not all were pleasant.

Hello Jose,
I too am struggling through what has been a recent period of personal turmoil, so thought I'd just let you know you are not alone.
Still feeling a little too fragile to really have an appropriate heartening comment.
These exercises, in particular "draining", have assisted me also. Sometimes, though, just repeating "Mercy", helped best towards equanimity. I had to keep it very simple.
Best wishes,

Judy writes:

> I too am struggling through what has been a recent period of personal turmoil

Well, that makes three. In fact, since I began this process nearly two years ago my life has been in a state of constant falling apart. But then we live in a bad place in this solar system where things decay without a boost.

What falls apart less and less in response to those things (although I am nowhere near where I would like to be) is a concerted effort towards doing Work exercises as part of my daily procedure (first line of Work), reporting to you as regularly as possible (second line of Work). Third line of Work (Working for the Work) not as solid for me.

A person close to me who I have been balancing care and attention for with the demands of an utterly insane workplace situation has been deceptively taking advantage of me. I found out in the nick of time and removed myself. At this point, another person's willfull destructive action towards me (and that's what it is) can not be allowed to enter and wreak havoc on what has been built up in terms of inner permanence with regard to this Work. My Work comes first. It builds that thing with which I am able to offer real support.

When you post here with your procedures working against the ongoing "falling apart" of ordinary life (friction) you help me immeasureably with that effort. I can only hope that my efforts might be of the same help to you.

---

by Ian

None of us are immune to dramatic situations in our lives. At the end of the day, it comes down to how gracefully we handle the situations. "External Consider always; Internal Consider never."
The second pillar of the Work isn't called Intentional Suffering for trivial reasons. We all have our Crosses of Suffering to bear and endure. And if one is to take this Work seriously, the enduring of Suffering is an essential aspect of it. So important in fact, that G states that without Intentional Suffering, it is impossible to create our Higher Being Bodies. The struggle between yes and no, between desire and non-desire, is the basis of the Law of Three. Out of the struggle between Affirming and Denying comes the Reconciling, which is the food, the substance, the energy, which nourishes or 'coats' our Inner Being Embryo. Without this struggle, we are nothing; we have no possibilities.

"One needs fire. Without fire, there will never be anything. This fire is suffering, intentional suffering, without which it is impossible to create anything. One must prepare, must know what will make one suffer and when it is there, make use of it. Only you can prepare, only you know what makes you suffer, makes the fire which cooks, cements, crystallizes, DOES. Suffer by your defects, in your pride, in your egoism. Remind yourself of the aim. Without prepared suffering there is nothing, for by as much as one is conscious, there is no more suffering. No further process, nothing. That is why with your conscience you must prepare what is necessary. You owe to nature. The food you eat which nourishes your life. You must pay for these cosmic substances. You have a duty, an obligation, to repay by conscious work." - Gurdjieff in a meeting on December 7, 1941.

"Blessed is he who can bear the unpleasant manifestations of others, for he has the makings of a soul."

---

by Greg

And please, I hope that was understood is that my removal is an act of intentional suffering --- my present capacity does not simply "allow'. Gurdjieff has said somewhere (anyone know) that there are times in which we must be asked to be excused because we have (with all humility) not built sufficient force to withstand a situation brought to us. After reasoning , on-going reasoning with "the devils" presented, I received the equivaqlent of psychological "pig slop" in my face. I can withstand some of this, no I can withstand A LOT of this. After an ongoingness of it I will, out of all humilkity for my present circumstances step back. I will be able to stepo in that much further the next time as I gain incremental strength.

A "Superman" rescue mission I went on during the AIDS crisis burnt me out because I egotistically refused to pay attention to what my real capacity at that time was. It was a very stupid and blind thing to do. I think Ouspensky has referred to it as being "Saint Stupid". Each time I have been presented with such things (or more and more have been presented) I go in a bit further and a bit deeper but this creature must watch it. A situation where I nearly killed myself cannot be repeated. What good would that be to anyone.

> One needs fire. Without fire, there will never be anything. This fire is suffering, intentional suffering, without which it is impossible to create anything. One must prepare, must know what will make one suffer and when it is there, make use of it. Only you can prepare, only you know what makes you suffer, makes the fire which cooks, cements, crystallizes, DOES. Suffer by your defects, in your pride, in > your egoism. Remind yourself of the aim. Without prepared suffering there is nothing, for by as much as one is conscious, there is no more suffering. No further process, nothing. That is why with your conscience you must prepare what is necessary. You owe to nature. The food you eat which nourishes your life. You must pay for these cosmic substances. You have a duty, an obligation, to repay by conscious work." - Gurdjieff in a meeting on December 7, 1941.

What a timely reminder, Ian.
Thank you.
Now I am thinking about these events from quite a different level, and, yes, I accept them, and can use whatever defects they are exposing in my personality. And I have seen some new ones, and failed twice in the effort to separate from and externally consider.
Your mentioning "reacting as gracefully as we can" is a big help too.

And I agree totally, Greg. All the posts are of immeasurable help to me also, and thanks for mentioning.

My conscious physical removal from the two situations above has worked in one instance. That person has begun to make strong efforts in the direction of rectifying her seriously degenerating situation, a situation which has gone on for a long long time and which has only know turned around since I said NO. The other person continues his spiral downwards --- simply put "The pain isn't great enough"

I am dealing in both situations with active addictions a serious and truely god-awful problem for everyone involved, but particularly for the person in the thralls of the addiction. While I cannot be physically present (as "enough is enough") I can be intelectually and emotionally present through persistant visualisation of that sufferer and a sincere wish for help and support.

For those who are interested in this sort of thing (and it may be no one here, for all I know --- please forgive me and "pass on" with the rest of this posting) a book published within the past couple of weeks is confirming what I have long suspected that the recovery programs of Alcoholics Anonymous, Al-Anon, and the Hazleden Foundation all have more than a casual connection with the Fourth Way movement as it was developing in its infancy in the United States. The first woman, it turns out, to enter the AA program and maintain continued sobriety, was an avid student of G. and O. and Nicoll. Her contribution (though largely uncredited up until this point) was through her introducting to Bill W. (co-founder of AA with Dr. Bob) the primary literature of the Work. Her other (uncredited) contribution was help with the authorship of a terse little "conscious/tough love" book put out by Hazelden called STOOLS AND BOTTLES. It has also long been rumoured that all three persons were one-time members of the Gurdjieff Group of Cleveland Ohio (which I believe exists to this day). Bill W. did seriously hang with Aldous Huxley, Gerald Heard, and one other 4th Way celeb(?) during the writing of the "12 Steps and the 12 Traditions" (the AA "how-to" text) which displays a strong link to Nicoll's COMMMENTARIES in highly simplified, highly 1950s-ized ""Presbyterian church language". This is the period when Bill W. was experimenting with LSD and had his "second spiritual experience" which may have resulted in his description of a Higher Power which could be "made conscious contact with". This clearly closely related to Nicoll's Higher Powers (plural) relating to G.s and O's Higher Emotional and Higher Intellectual Centres.

Having said all of that, I can't remember the woman's name! I will rectfy that as soon as possible.

Greg,

The past autumn I was in a situation where someone close to me was going through a very difficult time. Had experimented way too much and was falling hard. One thing I found helpful was to use:
I Am
I Wish
I Can

And then direct the energy toward the person. I did this similar to G's description of focusing energy toward an illness in the body. I AM redirect the amness; I WISH; redirect the wishing; I CAN; redirect the Can Do.

Breathing is part of this, as described in the third series.

I know that the contact was made and helped through the process. I was not able to directly intervene. That was an impossibility. For more reasons than I can explain.

Of course each of these always began with the above prayer segment: Maintain My Life, Maintain My Perceptions.

Harry

by Greg

Thank you so much, Harry. That is of extreme help to me and puts a Work orientation on the effort that I can and do make in this direction. Just because I have to change an orientation does not mean that I have to give up. I have done this "direction of energy" towards illness before through an instinctual process (before knowing of the Work) --- it is, of course, an intentional suffering as well. I don't think that is completely understood even within the Work community. You have to have been there (double entendre implied ) to Understand that. Something in you crystallises even from that remote procedure.

Thank you. Thank you. And . . . Thank you.

Marty Mann is the name of the woman who was referred to in my posts concerning the AA /Fourth Way connection.

The book she helped author was THE LITTLE RED BOOK not STOOLS AND BOTTLES.

While, I don't want to turn this into a discussion on recovery (we're here for focus on another teaching and I/we need to stay "on track") I wanted to follow up on the above that even though these programs might use the ideas of G. they remain exoteric work. People coming out of bottoming-out experiences with drugs and/or alcohol have had their outer mask destroyed or seriously damaged. In our lingo, the necessary buffers aren't always in place. You cannot, of course, survive in ordinary life without some modicum of "masks" to wear. In the case of a person in recovery s/he is learning to make /adopt masks to become aware of.

When I was in NYC in the 1970s I had a day job with a group called Synanon. I was paid to accompany a tough 5 foot tall woman into the Bowery to pull alcoholics out of debris and get them to Synanon's 12- Step meetings. Synanon was a reformist AA group which attempted to restore the practice of "tough love" and some of the edgier (read: Gurdjieffian-style) practices of the early days of AA. The two guys who founded it were from the (Robert deRopp?) fourth way groups themselves. Unfortunately, as happens so much with good intentions, the entire enterprise became a bizarre cult and went to hell in a hand basket. While I was there it was a marvellous way for a Presbyterian-raised boy from the lily-white suburbs to learn about the human capacity for a real descent into hell. And to see how that hell could be then worked against to create the friction necessary for a type of re-birth.

Hi Greg,
Thank you for all the info on the AA/Fourth Way connection.
Very interesting, and although I've been around 12-step programs for a very long time now, I was unaware of it.
The situation which precipitated a house-move for me involved both active addictions and mental health issues, and I was too close to help either person and remain balanced.
Removing myself required both "tough love" and "letting-go", the latter being the more difficult.

Enough said.
Much work was done over this time, with some real struggle involved.

Best wishes,
Judy.

from MW Thring. QUOTATIONS FROM G. I. GURDJIEFF'S TEACHING A personal companion - Revised Edition. Luzac Oriental. 2002.

D: Mr. Gurdjieff, this week I made an observation. I found myself in front of several boys who inspired pity in me because they were malnourished and poor. I didn't know what to think. At first it was pity, but I saw that I couldn't do nothing and soon . . .

G: Excuse me, you could have done something. You could have given something to nourish them. Not literally, but you could have seen to it that they had something to eat. If, objectively, you had loved them; if objectively you had wanted them to have something to eat, this would have been enough. They would have gone out and, automatically, they would have found someone to give them something to eat.

D: I really saw my weakness, and my pity turned to hate.

G: It's necessary to try a different way. Perhaps you only thought about that superficially. Think like a man, think about helping your neighbor with all your heart, with a real pity. Do you want him to eat well? First, convince yourself, collect yourself inside and pray:

"I AM, I WISH TO BE, FOR HIM"

And, believe me, on leaving school, before he has taken ten steps into the streets, he will meet someone who will give him something to eat. This is a law. Or perhaps, a week later,he will win the national lottery. Such is the power of feeling pity, of wishing, of loving with the whole of one's presence. Afterwards you will speak differently, you will be able to help someone, not with gifts of money or food --- next to this that's cheap --- but you will be able to help him with a real wish, a real relationship, with all the force of your I AM . Not with the head, not automatically, but with all your presence, you will be able to help.

Seven Factors of Enlightenment

Mindfulness - During the day, try to stay rooted in the present moment by observing the body and its sensations, the mind and its thoughts flowing by, the emotional center and its feelings both positive and negative. Also be attentive to what is happening around you in your immediate environment.

Investigation - Choose a Work related subject and read what someone has written about it, then spend 5-10 minutes wordlessly Pondering on the chosen subject.

Energy - Several times during the day, stop to absorb the energy of impressions by using the Sightless Gaze and Soundless Sound.

Joy - Stop several times throughout the day and evoke an Inner Smile.

Relaxation - Try to keep the body relaxed by only using the muscles necessary for the task at hand. During inactive moments, allow the body to completely relax by giving way to the force of gravity.

Concentration - Choose an object and pay close attention to it for five minutes.

Equanimity - Amidst all your activities, try to stay centered in a Float of Being, unaffected by the whirlwind of activity proceeding around you that lures you into Identification and Inner Considering.

by Zenas

Attempting to stay with mindfulness while the melodrama of the work-world and neighborhood is in one zany after another. There is something about being in the Work that holds a mini-Float even in the spin of things. A remembering to stay Mindful is so different, however. A nutshell so this doesn't sound too airy: the neighborhood (religious) busybody decides the one neighborhood dog is "bad", calls animal control that it's my fenced-in dog and I'm trying to deal with a man just trying to do his job while wanting to protect my "baby." Our family tries to protect the other dog but someone (not animal control)nabs him & he hasn't been seen since. Stopping negative thoughts in this is on-going. Equinimity, a presence I've pondered for years, as a thought is surprizingly helpful to watch the energies in all this.
Having read all the other people before the computer glitch, and being quite new, I'm uncertain where/if events vs. philo. discussion comes here.

Just wanted to post a reminder that this is one of the times that G. indicated was a time for Fasting. My own regime is to become totally vegan for all of Lent. Ingesting no cholesterol at all.
This can become quite tricky when buying premade products; and, of course eliminates most "eating out".
I've found over the years that this is a form of Intentional Suffering. A promise I make to myself. And, as G explains, it is a crucial time. It is a time of resistance. And by choosing what resistance I face, some of that resistance coming from the Earth and World of Planets can be stepped outside. Like climbing up on those stilts while walking through the desert.
Because Lent. . .early Spring. . .is one of those desert storm times.
(Wonder if George Bush ever considered that?)

Ian wrote:

Very busy week in unusual ordinary-life affairs, so I concentrated on exercises involving energy and equanimity.
Somewhere between the first intention to "stop to absorb" and the actual settling into the sightless gaze and soundless sound, waves of force felt throughout body. Similar to the awareness from some observings and rememberings.

The personal turmoil mentioned earlier still continues, but I'm able to see it as something outside of me now, and "reacting gracefully" is working satisfactorily most of the time. In this inner quiet I am able to see what options I have a little better, while choosing to remain in a rather disorganised household for today.
Interesting stuff...

Best wishes,
Judy.

This set of exercises was very helpful for me in several ways. First, it joined a Buddhist formula into a Fourth Way program for the week. It also allowed me several ways to observe my own turmoil - mentioned earlier - and to try to "see" what it was doing, where it originated and what might I "do" to alleviate it.

The times I stopped to absorb impressions were overhwelming - the sense that there were far more negative impressions than positive ones surrounding me exhausted me, though the actual stopping seemed right. Related to that was the concentration which rooted me--I chose a tree outside my back window and there were moments of peace, very solid though and palpable. For the investigation I chose to search out "attention" and found that fine. I remain intrigued by the discovery through last weeks exercise of finding tension and sadness in my hands. It is a question I will hold this week.

Choose three things to sacrifice for Lent -

For the body, it could be - giving up a favorite food that we indulge in, a favorite activity, a favorite posture, a favorite vanity.

For the emotions, it could be - giving up a negative attitude or emotion towards something or someone.

For the mind, it could be - giving up certain opinions, beliefs, inner considering.

Inner Work -

Suggested Affirmations/exercises to use when our denying force manifests an urge or desire or opportunity or temptation to indulge in what we have sacrificed.

For the body, it could be -
While observing and sensing the denying force, take an unusual posture, such as kneeling in prayer or doing a Movement or standing on one leg, and repeat silently - It is nothing, I wish to be. Finally, visualize yourself dead and being unable to indulge in anything physical.

For the emotions, it could be -
While observing and feeling the denying force, become aware of your breathing and repeat inwardly - What is the opposite of this negative emotion and can I intentionally evoke it now? Finally, generate an inner smile of compassion.

For the mind, it could be -
While observing the flow of thoughts, consider that many people hold an opposite opinion or point of view. Finally perform the ten bone illumination exercise.

I find that my ability to 'Wish' to Work always outstrips my actual ability to 'Do' the Work. This inevitably leads to self-recrimination and thoughts along the line that - I am no good; I am weak; I am not really committed; I am not sincere.
How do other Seekers deal with this?

---

by Harry

I find this week's exercise interesting. After I posted my own thoughts on fasting I was contemplating what other meanings G could have had. Certainly not "indulging" in other types of eating of the living flesh could be considered. It seems to me intentionally depriving one's self of anything that is desired can be a form of conscious suffering; if the suffering is done for a purpose. And not just routinely. I.e., as we were taught as youth to give up candy for lent or put a penny in the pot for orphans.

Ian, I agree with your self assessment. How do I deal with it? I try to turn any friction into a reminder for work. G. has an entire section about how he gave up hypnotism. This, of course, could be taken in more than one way. His ability to hypnotize, as well as his ability to be hypnotized. And many variations thereon.

This suffering is sometimes difficult. I got up this morning and did Tai Chi. I try to most mornings. Both for physical health and other reasons. But resist it often. The warm cacoon often wins. It was easier when I had to leave the house. But since I've been working at home, that presents a resistance to getting ready for the day's resistances.

Trying not to 'calculate' a response after x number other responses, i was stopped by your discussion of fasting, as a withholding - not doing. i hadn't before thought of fasting other than 1st food. Now i'm pondering what loves i have in the emotional and moving centers. A favorite position is relatively easy, the emotional and intellectual are not. Recently i was reading on the 7 deadly sins and pondered the centers while reading that sloth is also a slow response to G-d, and the different speeds of the centers. The spirit is willing, the flesh is hangin' out.
How to grasp at one time each center not doing its' own thing.
tks Ian and Herb.

---

by Ian

All of the 'deadly sins' will have a corresponding attribute in each of the three centers. So in effect there are 21 'deadly sins'. For each 'sin' there is a complementary virtue.

How do other Seekers deal with this?

Well, I have tio be for real and remember that for the majority of my "lived" life I am NOT in a "place" to really Work, That I am not in a "place " that really affords me to get it together. And why is that? Because, in my present "ordinary" circumstances " I cannot "Do".

If I cannot "Do" that it is useless to attempt Work.

BUT BUT BUT there in that recognition that "Negative" a solution is found.

This morning I woke into sluggishness (DREAMING STATE) below even a regular "awake". I stretched like a cat (asana?) butt torso neck head in one arching curve to bring sensation into the body. Then I self-remembered. A tiny gloimpse of awareness, a spark, but sommmething. That spark contains the beginning of the impulse to Do.

It is very far away.

But I must push and proceed towards that making more and more efforts towards self-remembering. At least ten are made from the beddy-bye to the coffee maker and they all disappear as soon as they are recognised.

In that spark, if I am lucky, a Wish to Work is made

And then another,

And then another,

Aided by action,

And then another,

Aided by action . . .

And then another . . .

I guess this weeks exercises had me baffled.
What precisely is Lent and why is it connected to the Fourth Way?

Otherwise I have attempted giving up some of my unnecessary suffering, the tight clinging to personal misery that has so characterized these past few months. What a failure! Perhaps the most promising was the assumption of posture. I am appreciating more and more the physical embodiment practices here and in consciously taking a different posture I saw quite quickly the change in emotions and thoughts even. Once, while in deep sadness I extended arms wide Heaven-ward I asked, "Why this, why now?" and immediately "received" a reply, "This is not the right question".

Amazing.

Lent is a Christian period of fasting that precedes Easter and is based upon the Pascal moon. The first full moon after equinox.

G. discusses fasting in All and Everything. And makes quite light of the practices of those who give up meat and the like in favor of the venerable Mr. Sturgeon.

He also discusses the fact that not eating the flesh of other living beings is something that is beneficial, but that is not fully possible for most of these modern creatures of new formation. Instead, Beelzebub says, they should avoid these products at certain periods of time.

The likelihood is that these are all associated with the solar changes of equinox and solstice. In the original religions these were times of fasting. And still remain so in Islam and other ancient religions.

When one studies the enneagram and the solar progression, it becomes pretty clear that mi and si correspond to Easter and Christmas. These also happen to be the traditional Christian periods of fasting. Lent and Advent. Interestingly the feast of American Thanksgiving preceeds Advent and Mardi Gras preceeds Lent. Saturnalia follows Christmas/Advent.

On a secular side there have been a number of studies about changes in bodies during the onset of Spring. (Lent). This has to do with the northern hemisphere turning into the solar wind. --I don't know how these correspond below the equator. There are Jewish periods of fasting in the Autumn, as well.-- Plants, etc. also change. As do animals shedding winter coats.

My own conclusion is to eliminate anything from my diet during these periods that contains cholesterol. Cholesterol is only formed in living breathing beings.

My other observations indicate that this is a period of mistakes, flubs, and short temper. By intentionally suffering these "attacks" of negative events can be used postively rather than simply suffered.

My own conclusions permeate this. Anyone else want to jump in, I'm open to other suggestions.

Harry wrote

I am back from away.
Intentional suffering is on my front burner and I find G's intentional suffering is very often changed by work people to conscious suffering. So your use of both is of interest. What I am observing is that separating from suffering (conscious suffering) has the usual benefit of any separation - more life is possible. What I am beginning to think of as intentional suffering includes a specific giving up for the particular transubstantiation which may be what Ian has referred to as a float of being, a still higher level of life. Have I made up the distinction?

---

by Harry

I think there is the distinction you make, Tim. You can probably consciously suffer something that you haven't intentionally suffered. But I'm not sure if there is a practical difference.

Begin everything with a prayer.

Alter the order of habitual proceedures.

Remember your arms and legs.

Alter the placement of dishes, furniture, books, etc.

Leave a mess.

Alter your handwriting.

Accept annoyances with an Inner Smile.

Hello everyone,
Back online after a house-move.

Ian, as the program for this week reads like what I've been doing for a week (except for remembering my arms and legs, and altering handwriting), I'll work on last week's exercises instead.

Good to be back.
I notice Greg has been talking about "removing oneself from the situation using the tough love of the 12 step programs" - and that is exactly what I had to do.
Thanks again for the wise comments and timely advice.
Best wishes,
Judy.

I began the day with a prayer for standing in the light suggested by Jose's excellent article ON DIVINE ATTENTION (see What's New? on Endless Search) George Fox is one of those historical figures we can't think enough of. It has been said that the Fourth Way manifested through him and through his teachings at the beginnings of the Quaker movement. (G. has often remarked on the importance of paying attetion to the very beginnings of any Teaching to glean the germ of its Truth) I followed this with a prayer for my "special circumstances" based on Harry's suggestion to me under the February 20 postings here.

As an aside:

I am re-reading and pondering all that G. has to say about Frantz Anton Mesmer. This is food for thought. There is a statement in VIEWS that bears reading. A duplication with a bit more elucidation occurs on pages 110-111 of CS Nott's TEACHINGS OF GURDJIEFF: A PUPIL'S JOURNAL. Mesmer and Mesmerism contains a germ of truth and was well regarded by G.

During the late summer and fall of this past year, I spent time with some Ancient Theosophists ("Ancient" is a term of endearment in this context). Many had been involved with the Blavatsky's teaching for upwards of 60 years! Something they told me about stunned me. Blavatsky at the end of her life at been seriously dissappointed with the turn her teaching had taken. She was adamant that study circles reading THE SECRET DOCTRINE were to eschew any sort of occultism and or any sort of Eastern religious spiritual practices. Instead they were to involve themselves in a deep study of Mesmer's writings and use that study as a basis for the development of healing circles. It was her belief that the concerted practice of healing in groups would bring to individuals (and to humanity as a result) a much deeper transformism than what people were seeking in techniques of "self-development" (read: occultism and yoga practices). No one paid attention. When HPB "passed on" CWLeadbeatter convinced Annie Besant to introduce the teachings of Laya Yoga with the assistance of a Hindu yogi and the teaching strayed wildly off-course. Their teaching, these days, is increasingly referred to as "Neo-Theosophy" --- a totally unrelated discipline.

Much of G.s talk of creation of substances bears a strong relationship to Mesmer's findings. There are traces in the Orgone Energy theories of Wilhelm Reich as well.

An engrossing film MESMER starring Alan Rickman with a script by Dennis Potter is now available on DVD.

****

Judy, a reading of the PHILOKALIA (the recent 4 volume edition, not the earlier Kadloubovsky READINGS FROM) with relationship to the practice of "becoming incensed towards" and "incensing" has been of untold value to me when present with the "trouble" you and I have been having. You can very easily read past the religious gloss and garner the psychological value. Besides, you've read Nicoll, so you know what else "Jesus Christ" stands for.

Thank you for everybody's patience

Interesting online exhibit/slide show about Mesmer. Pictures of original manuscripts. The Bakken Library has most of Mesmers original manuscripts and manuscripts by his disciples. http://www.thebakken.org/exhibits/mesmer/index.htm

It is an interesting website - "The Bakken is a center for education and learning that furthers the understanding of the history, cultural context, and applications of electricity and magnetism in the life sciences and their benefits to contemporary society." The Bakken was founded in 1975 by Earl E. Bakken, inventor of the first transistorized cardiac pacemaker.

A good book with translations of Mesmer's writing is --- Bloch, George (1980). Mesmerism, A Translation of the Original Scientific and Medical Writings of F.A. Mesmer. Los Altos, California: William Kaufmann.

Pile the floors throughout my apartment with piles of laundry and piles of clothes to be gotten rid of. First an anoyance to my way of wanting things. Then an obstacle course --- a neutral observation. Next, an exercise in attention as I must circumvent these unfamiliar mounds --- tricky at night when I have to get up in the middle of the night for a glass of water.

Read Mesmer's dissertation on planetary influence on the human body. Continually step away from "i"s who complained that this was mostly junk and the voices of "hypnotised" people parrotting someone else's fantasy. When I finished reading I had a 50/50 feel about the "scientific" authenticity of it all. Eventually after awhile of chewing on what I read it was clear that none of the so called authenticity mattered as Mesmer was having experiences that were authentic to him and he had to come up with stories and reports which supported that picture --- a case of our language not being up to a true rendering of the experience. ("Sometimes lies must be told in order to convey the truth"). Also, intuited G's description of tension between planets and a reciprocal action on earth.

Opened Wellbeloved's GURDJIEFF READING GUIDE about a third in (random choice) and began to read hard ---- straight through with little in the way of judging "i"s coming through. It was a muscular clean read. Ideas were beginning to feel like they were on the verge of really revealing themselves (BTW I use this reference quite a lot--- this time it was coming through in a voice other than hers) I went to bed when I caught myself losing the sleep battle for the second time. I had been chomping the ideas like pacman

Late last night after very busy day loaded with efforts, I pushed myself gradually over into second wind and began to was the first two mounds left on the floor. I watched some ridiculous TV for news ephemera and switched off after 20 minutes.

I picked up ISOTM and began to read everthing under planets and planetary influence. A momentum gained in mental concentration in reading each word as a single entity with meaning . I felt a clean strong emotional support "come up" and lift the mental ---- like two silversteak trains running full-speed in tandem along one ever elongating curve. There was a gap (the tiniest of gaps) a hiccup in my "processing" (correct word?) and in that briefest moment ME stepped aside and an entirely new Understanding of what I must have read at least a hundred and some times in my life came through --- shining through. The planets and planetary influence. This new meaning which was unfolding new revelations methodically one right after the other had been right in front of my face since the very first time I ever read this and yet I HAD MISSED IT. I now cannot read this section in the old way --- it has permanently changed.

The occult ("hidden from view") explanation of what this topic is addressing is found in what G. isn't saying and by not saying it he is laying it right out in the open? How did I miss it all these years. How did I settle for only the literal presentation? How did I get lost in the "positive" ideas and forget about the invisible ones (Hades)?

I crossed a threshold here.

Randomizing certain routine activities has pushed an envelope in me that now, towards the end of the week feels right, but up to today did not. I watched all those little "i"´s resist the need for integration and order, fight me when I left a cup near the edge of the counter, left a book out of its proper place and didn´t clear up a kitchen mess. Not quite liberating but certainly a loosening up of rigidity that too often passes for things being "right." What is getting it right or doing it right? Why has that been so important for me? How has this aided in alleviating unnecessary suffering or adding to it? These are some of the questions I pondered as a result.

My prayer has been the same meditation I am doing at night, to follow the Light from my crown down to my throat, heart, solar plexus, "hara" and then the earth space below my tail bone. To bring light to all these places and to see when and where thoughts and feelings pop up. Then to just stand there, like Fox said (thank you Greg for your kind words) and submit to the Light. It has helped greatly at the end of the day yet at the beginning of the day seems to suck in all the Life-giving energy it has too quickly.

Trying to leave a mess, without judgment or self-righteousness. Suddenly living with others and can not scream at much more than "mess." It helps me see vanity and judgment.
Trying to remember to start each thing with a prayer, having trouble slowing to realize where each thing starts instead of blends. Working to remember breathing, body and thoughts at the same time, then to remember myself within a world of others remembering themselves.

At first a minor irritation the exercises aren't in chronological order, then a little laugh that grew larger; having to look - and so a prayer of thanks.

I've been living in a non-self-created mess for about a month. My son is transitioning from graduate school to work. Has a job but is staying here temporarilly until the money builds up. And the mess accumulates.

Obstacle course is a good word for it.

Plus he seems to think the floor is where things are stored. When I ask him why he replies "gravity".

Plus two cats who are also visiting. He trained them, so they want attention on their own terms.

And it's that time of the year when things fall. When small annoyances become bigger if I let them.

So I tip toe around. And try to avoid the annoyance from building up. I've long ago learned to leave the mess. Except when i step on it.

But isn't that what shoes are for?

"The choreography of life consciously danced."

Begin everything with an Inner Chuckle.

Choose three habitual, mechanical, automatic body movements that you make each day. Alter the process of those movements by turning each one into an intentional sequence of positions. Coordinate a body sensing and a prayer/mantra with each position.

Intentionally accept annoyances, sufferings, displeasures without Self Calming. Concurrently, add a layer of Affirmation by singing from 1 to 10 in a rising octave as you do a well sensed and visualized 10 Bone Illumination Exercise. End with a state of three-centered Being perception.

Hello everyone.
Back online after several days without power after Cyclone Larry.
Safe and sound, though tired from the clean-up process.
Good to be back.

I've chosen the habitual, mechanical movements involved in the process of brewing the morning coffee for the second part of this week's exercise.

The last section is most interesting. I wasn't sure of examples of "self calming" - so checked the search function in Work Philosophy, and it found:

So we see that instead of suppressing or eliminating the emotions of unavoidable suffering, instead of what Gurdjieff called Self Calming, we must actively and intentionally endure the fire that arises from the experience of suffering. When we realize that this patient enduring of suffering is an act of service to His Endlessness, as well as a lawful expression of the Triamazikamno necessary for the coating of our higher bodies, then we may find the strength and humility that enables us to 'gird up our loins' and suffer gladly; suffer without suffering. And out of this fire may arise conscience, compassion, faith, hope, love, joy and awe. This is truly a transubstantiation of the suffering into the higher positive emotions.
(from Ian's paper "The Second Conscious Shock")

So I followed this, and have found the resulting centered calm state far preferable to any method of "self calming" I could have dreamed up.
Thanks Ian.

Most interesting.
Now to attempt the singing while doing the 10 bone exercise.....

Judy.

> Intentionally accept annoyances, sufferings, displeasures without Self Calming.

This was so difficult and yet, paradoxically so liberating. I worked at accepting, without comment or Work the stresses of the week, the minor and major frustrations, the familiar spousal spats, the tantrums, the tightness in the belly and what I saw was just a bunch of activity, centered around an emotion to be sure, but just activity. By choosing to Work with it, I seem (just me?) to grant it more power than to just let it swirl about and play its little theatre of the absurd out. Which it seems inevitably to do.

Anytime I have to begin with a chuckle, I get angry. Suppose I don want to chuckle, one "me" says? Suppose I want to be depressed today, or sad, or the usual-Life-sucks-these-days José? By chuckling, I sloughed off a bit of that and noticed a subtle intervention, perhaps a reconciling of sorts that requires little but returns much. My belly loosened up. My anger and my frustrations, a bit less obstructive.

The ten bone exercise I continually have trouble with, it frustrates me and actually angers me. I wonder why? Any help out there?

---

by Harry

Lots of annoyances this week. That spring time thing. Things dropped. Stuff going wrong. Obstacles in my path. Hard to not get involved.

Inner Chuckle Infinite Jest
Tom Robbins?

All those cowgirls and woodpeckers and roadside attractions. And skinny legs and all.

One of my three mechanical movements was the way i sit at my desk. An 'intentional' sitting down each day, moving toward the desk with the chair, bringing intention to why i open which drawer in an order was telling. Doing so, during little interruptions something would note the slight irritation at being taken from 'order'.

It was/is extremely difficult for me to sing anythiing, ever. This part of the exercise was done in private, only singing 'mentally' at work a couple times. It definately helped the irritation subside.

Try it in different situations - walking; meditating. Is one easier than the other?

Monks Walk. Shake the dust from your feet. Let go of past and future concerns and become present within a Soundless Sound and Sightless Gaze. With each step, nurture your own small portion of Great Being by filling one of the ten bones with light and breath. Ponder - Does searching necessarily imply finding?

While eating, use the Heptachord. Unhurried sensed motions. Breath. Soundless Sound, Sightless Gaze. Silently and attentively eat the three foods. Ponder - What are we food for? What parts of us are waste?

Suggestion to take snapshot of posture, breathing, emotions, thoughts, sensations. Label each snapshot according type and degree of Identification. Take the snapshot from the visualized point of view of being up in a tree looking down at yourself and the situation. Consider the opposite of each Identification.

Deeply sense the body at least once a day while pondering questions such as: Is the Seeker's Search all for Nothing? Has the Seeker sacrificed their Search for comfort? Can the Seeker's Search for a glimpse of significance be hidden within boring mundane everyday affairs? Does the stuff of Searching lie in the everyday anything and everything - the placing of a spoon, the getting out of a chair? The seeker refocuses their striving from a question of importance to a question of paying attention, being aware. The Seeker reaffirms their awareness of Remembering their Search: The Seeker gazes upon their own steps as they travel within their own land.

Evoke Gratitude for Being created with the ability to ask questions.

In the supermarket checkout, stand in the longest line. While waiting, stand erect and follow your breath. Ponder: Where am I in the great chain of Being?

Give a compliment to everyone you meet while using an inner smile.

Relax the three centers and visualize your bone marrow being illuminated as you breath.

Before sleep, recapitulate each day's events.

Went to the grocery yesterday. No one was in line.

Just thought it was a typical spring event.

Everything drops.

Everything needs to be picked up.

Went to the supermarket today and was looking for the longest queue when a very friendly cashier (who had earlier gone to some trouble to arrange for me to use the staff toilets!) beckoned me to an empy till. What can one do, when people are so kind?

It humbles one, at this time of Lent.

I took this exercise to heart and, in a country like Iceland, it was quite startling. People here rush to the shortest lines and, when I can go, its always with two kids in tow, 6 and 2. Boy what a struggle it is on normal occasions so, when I did the shopping this week I picked the most irritating line I could find, long and filled with people I knew would take their sweet time and I laughed. I was so pissed I laughed and it vanished. At least for a moment, on one day, my anger felt so ridiculous I could not but laugh.

Will try to remember this laughter.
On a note regarding the 10 bone exercise, Ian, I attempted this in a bunch of occasions and I realize the biggest obstacle is not, as I thought, the idea of "visualizing" something like light, although that remains difficult for me. The big one is the order. Perhaps its OK to change the order but I feel the need to get this straight and exercising the discipline remains a daunting piece of Work. When I was able to do it, the awareness of bodily sensations on the "outside" and a greater Being-sense on the "inside" made the efforts and struggle worth it.

---

by Harry

Funny. Went to the store again yesterday. And guess what? No one was in line again! I can't tell you how rare this is.

Spent an hour this morning with the ten bone exercise. Started out meditating and let it take over. Somehow there is a road to centering here.

> The saving grace of the Work...

I appreciate that thought Judy. The last six weeks have been challenging. And through my challenges, it seems more and more that all that REALLY matters to me is becoming more conscious, and aiding those around me in becoming more conscious. Feeling each breath as possibly my last this week has certainly not been difficult for me as well. I guess lying on an operating table with your chest wide open can have that effect on a person...  Right now, I don't know what I would do if I didn't have the Work. My gratitude for having met the teachings of Gurdjieff is beyond measure.

Yesterday, after a couple of hours of housework I took a walk in the fresh air, one careful step at a time. Turning the corner of a building, I received a shock: a clear impression of me still sitting at home in my favorite chair and smiling broadly. I kept walking and allowed the impression to seep in. Had I left myself behind? How could I still be at home and out in the fresh air? Is the issue that what we call taking a walk is really another way of 'staying at home' as movement has sometimes been defined as having stillness at it's core? I kept walking and a small dark cloud question came: "If I AM still at home who/what is 'walking' this body?"

I sit down on a bench in a playground, lift my feet onto a curb in front and immediately sense a gush of blood in the bottoms of my feet throbbing and pulsing away.

I align my spine relaxing my eyeballs to take in the full-view of the fresh green of new leaves dappled with delicate white tree-blossoms. I have been remembering myself at least 25 times through the course of the afternoon. It is so hard to do. Thirty feet (or so) seperates me from the blossoms themselves. At twenty-five feet a clear watery ripple snakes across my visual field in mid-air. I am immediately aware of a tension/relaxation inside of me which "allows" for this viewing. Just as immmediately, as a result of being startled by this, I lose sight of it.

How to maintain this inner pitch to "see" deeper? To what avail? Where is this placed in relation to Work? Is it just another "dead end"?

Later, that evening after attending a social event where I caught glimpses of machines, I take another walk in the cool night air. I sit on the same bench as before, straighten my spine, watch the breath, and an attempt towards self-observation I try to send myself down below the tree blossom now glowing in moonlight to look at my body sitting up straight. This is too large of an effort for me (too "Operatic" in scale) so I just try to sit in front of my body while I sit inside of it --- directly in front, facing it. Doesn't work. I admit to not being able to do it. Immmediately, I search for the Path back to the Quiet Place wWithin. Success. THAT is what I should have been after. I am still as a stone. The skin, muscles and organs seemed to have totally slacked around the skeletal structure. This procedure has been as easy as the other was difficult. I observe the body being breathed. I am aware of tiny resistances that just won't let that breath go further. Everything, inside and out, is still. A rustle behind me. A thump. of them. Within five minutes a wild rabbit has made an appearance, checking out this odd man sitting so still on the bench. We are 4 feet from one another. I make no move other than rolling my eyes in his direction. There is mutual terror between us. For one full minute we sit like this and then I lose my nerve. I move and the rabbit rushes off.

As I stand the earlier "air ripple" returns to my mind. It has left a tracing in my consciousness.

Found an i able to notice each step if 'I' was outside taking walk or at least solitary. To watch each moment was most difficult. While attempting this, it did, though, help watch judgements come about. Their swiftness was amazing.
When i am able to remember breathing when seeing habitual thoughts, i sometimes remember the idea we all live exactly the same amount of time, whether the stillborn or the centurian, if we live only in thoughts.

Last night's dream was intriguing. I'd welcome feedback from others.

I was cleaning the main street in town. Picking up trash and sweeping the street with a wide hard bristle broom. I was basically cleaning next to the curb, in the parking spaces.

The street is a two way street. (Though in the current day it is really a one way street, it was in my youth a two way street.) It runs North and South, but this was known as up and down, and still is. If you head toward Fourth Street you're going "Down to Fourth Street". Or Up to Ninth. (Fourth being closer to the river.)

Anyway, in my dream the street is two way. And I'm only cleaning the Down side. (I'm assuming the descending side.) I'm cleaning between eighth and sixth, close to seventh. My car is parked between eighth and seventh, and I'm moving between seventh and sixth.

It becomes Rush Hour. (I have no idea why I'm cleaning the street during rush hour.) And I have to move my car. All of the parking spaces on the street are open, but I can't park on the street because a police car is lurking behind me. So I make a deal with a guy working at a street level parking lot just below seventh. This guy works at the lot. He is obviously an immigrant. He lets me park my car in his lot so I can finish the job. (I have no idea what I am giving him in return, but something.) It is clear that I'm parking next to the City's newspaper building. (There is currently a multi level parking garage in this spot; but I can't remember if their was a street level parking lot in my youth. Not sure it matters. Parking seems to be resting spots.)

It is at this point that I realize why someone invented Street Cleaners. And I awake.

Seems an ascending and descending octave. What does it mean that I'm only cleaning the down side? What are the resting spaces? During Rush Hour?

Work week of April 10th
Sometimes, it takes me a week to really get involved in a work program and by then it is time to move on.
The requests to “Walk upon the earth as if it was sensitive to your every step.”
“Remember every breath as if it was your last. “ and “Maintain a Float above attraction and repulsion. “ can create a demand inside of me to be very “care full” about my actions especially to other people to whom I would normally be more harsh and opinionated. I say that these requests can change my inner attitude but only when there is an accompanying emotional shift that has the sense of valuing something or someone more dearly than my personal self interest. Once when this shift happened it allowed me to respond to a friends needs with gentleness and openess rather than avoiding or minimizing them as I otherwise intended to do. However, even when the shift does not happen these requested tasks from this weeks work sometimes bring me to increased awareness to an action, no matter how small, and how it effects the world around me.

Harry,
My experiences with dreams have often been useful for bringing to consciousness something that I have been trying to understand. This is particularly the case if I am deeply questioning something in my daily life. Coincidently, one of my most common symbols is a car and where and how it is parked. When I have a parking car dream, now it immediately gives me an indication of my inner attitude or state with regard to an aspect of my life. This experience has beeen useful for seeing something more clearly and then enabling me to move on from my attachment to it. With this dream of yours, there are a lot of clues for you to work with, the street cleaner, rush hour, policeman, downside, numbers, levels. These are personal symbols which likely only you can truly plumb the meaning. You are fortunate to have so many clues. Also, I find that sometimes other's comments about my dreams can give me a revealing perspective that I did not see myself.

This weeks exercise were substantial for me, mainly in the breach than in the practice. I saw occasions throughout the week to "maintain a float" and on the occasions I did, was able to get a panoramic perspective that lightened the load. But otherwise my steps were heavy and my breathing erratic.

I think Harry, there is much truth in what you said earlier about the spring confusion and with the weather up here going from blizzard to beautiful, sometimes in a single day, I have certainly noticed the "electricity" in the air pulling me in a thousand different directions. Just maintaining my nightly practices has been stress enough. As well, the sharpness of those clear days served to confuse me more than clarify. Odd.

I will be in England from tomorrow to Monday for the All & Everything Conference along with Ian and others. While it will be quite nice to reconnect with him and meet up with some new folks, I will miss my Work mates here. Until next week,
José

I see the cleaning aspect clearly. I'm cleaning the downstream. The question I keep posing to myself is whether or not I'm concentrating too much on one side.

I agree that the parking is significant. Any road dream deals somehow with directions. And this is at the "si" point. My wondering is if I'm resting rather than working.

---

by Judy

> I agree that the parking is significant. Any road dream deals somehow with directions. And this is at the "si" point. My wondering is if I'm resting rather than working.

Hi Harry,
Intriguing dream indeed...
Just a few thoughts..
Car often is "vehicle which moves you around" ie; physical body.
Rush hour could be symbolic of the masses of mechanical humanity.
Police for me would be my "authority I s"

Sweeping/street cleaning; an indication of your inner work of purification.

So, parking in a new place being looked after by an immigrant (also indicating new a little) is interesting. Sounds like a reassurance that the real work (way-cleaning) can continue even while the physical body is "resting" in a new environment ???
(on a light note, I'd be trying out a new yoga class or similar relaxation).

The sixth seventh and eighth interesting - as you say, at "si", so maybe a phase of inner work is nearing completion. as these numbers are connected with the actual "street" or "way".

Anyway, as others have said, if this doesn't feel right to you, then it won't be. That's however pretty much how I'd take it if it were my dream.

Regards and best wishes,
Judy.

Pay attention to the garbage of life - a shrivled leaf, dust on the floor, litter on the street, excrement, etc. Contemplate its past and future and its significance in the flow of life. How is it similar to us; what attributes do we share in common with it? Compose a prayer to it and dispose of it with a memorial service.

Pay attention to your shoulders and hips.

Evoke gratitude for the responsibility of being conscious.

I'll post this in this thread because I think Ian picked up on the sweeping.

Another dream last night. Strange these dreams are unusual in their format. But this one complied with the sweeping clean.

Was at work late at night. Didn't want to be there, but remained there because I had to be there. Finally everyone else had gone so I coulld go too.

Just as I was leaving a former boss arrived. (She is a woman I was somewhat obsessed with for a period of time. This obsession was a negative fantasy.)

In my dream she comes in and asks to be escorted to her car. I give her my arm reluctantly. We begin walking to her car and I realize the ground is sheathed with ice. And I have bare feet. I want to quit walking but continue to do so.

When I get her to her car we are both enveloped in a snow drift that comes up to my waist. I'm cold. My hand drops into the snow and lightly rests just above her exposed buttock. Which electrically draws but which I will not touch even though I can.

It is then I awake and realize that I am sweeping away this past obsession through enlightening it. It is an obsession I haven't considered in well over a decade.

I chose not to touch. And understood the cold and snow.

(Dang, typing on this laptop is strange.)

Hi Everyone,
This week's exercise was most refreshing for me. A lot of the focus in the work I usually do seems to be involved with "coming into the present moment", so, thinking of linear time in the past and future was truly a sort of inner world expansion.
Having had 2 house-moves in the past seven weeks,(I'm back in my old house again now), "dust on the floor" and similar didn't appeal much. However, contemplating leaves in their various stages of growth and decay was helpful for the visualisations of the exercise, and also gave a welcome break from inside the house.
There was a fresh awareness of the existence of the leaf's "time-body" which led to some observation of my own "time-body", and I saw a couple of things about myself which had previously gone unnoticed. Adding this knowledge to the existing list.
Thanks Ian.
Hope the Conference went well.
Best wishes,
Judy.

Pay attention to your shoulders and hips in order of right shoulder, left hip, right hip, left shoulder, repeat, etc.
Sense and breathe into each joint and visualize/imagine the following teachings/ideals residing in each joint: Jesus suffering and sacrifice; Mohammed and service; Lao Tzu and balance; Buddha and non-desire.

Attend to each joint long enough to fix the intent of your effort.

Every morning give thanks to the sun.

When you perceive someones manifestations as unpleasant, instead of reacting, examine the beliefs and opinions that shaped your perception. Try adopting an opposite opinion about their perceived behaviour.

---

by Harry

This is hard.

I can do it in the Work world and just traveling about. But my son has temporarily moved back in, having graduated and gotten a job locally. He'll probably be out in a month or so.

But the "floor is a shelf" attitude just annoys me. I trace it to a certain kind of laziness. And a focus on other things. But the floor has never been a shelf for me. Probably because my mother had rooms that people didn't even walk on the floor when they entered them. This, of course, annoyed me as a child.

We are, of course, clashing life styles. He's been on his own for four years. And we've always had a great relationship. And I remember having moved back home for a month or two when I was job hunting about his age.

Of course I would never have thought of living in my mother's house in that style. Probably because my mother would have thrown six kinds of fits and my stepfather would have pounced on it. But I've never been that type of parent.

Another source is probably my own lack of wanting to do things like dust. I'd rather the wind take it, until I can see it. Then I do it. Which probably taught him procrastination.

I know most of this is ordinary. It's my response to this exercise, because it's what I've been facing.

by James F

Harry wrote:

> I know most of this is ordinary.

I smiled when I read this Harry. I received a huge Work shock this week and it has changed my whole perception of what it means to Work and to have higher consciousness. Through the shock I saw that I desire to help those I care about and put an end to their unnecessary emotional suffering (the Yes) and I saw, at the same time, that I can't do anything about their suffering because I do not, at my present level of being, have the power to do (the No).

What I learned was something I thought I knew already. But it turned out that I only knew it intellectually. The shock was also very painful and if I had to pick a word to describe the Work now, I would use "plain" or "ordinary."

It is both sad and liberating to realize that I wish to do but can't. I only hope I retained enough of the shock event in my emotional memory so that I don't have to learn it again.

Great insights, James.

Do not do what can't be done has always been one of my favorite G quotes.

by Judy

I,too, found appication in ordinary life for this week's exercise.
It led to pondering about difficulties I have been experiencing in organising a proper funeral and afternoon tea for my friend. Every possible beaurocratic delay seems to have been in place, and I wasn't making the requisite headway. It seemed to be something I was unable to do. Yet it had to be done. So, I enlisted the aid of Tony's local doctor and his Anglican minister. After 3 frustrating days, they've succeeded, and we have the funeral this Thursday at 3pm. So what I alone could not achieve has been done by asking for help, and this was indeed appropriate in this case.

Over the years, making decisions about what I can do and what I can't do, this process has come to be called by me "The Getting of Wisdom". This week's activities added another facet to my understanding.

After all, the Fourth/Fifth Ways are all about Working from ordinary life situations.
And yes, Harry, I agree it is hard.

Best wishes as always,
Judy.

There was something about this exercise that was "easy," that is, it came to mind more often than most of the exercises. The first mechanical answer that 'popped in' was that it's because negative manifestation and anger are so over-used. It took a bit to realize these reactions are often so proud of themselves they are seen by other parts of the i. To actually stop in the midst of a unpleasant judgment about another's manifestations brought to the screen that they are manifestations.

And thank you, James, your thoughts were sincerely appreciated, they cause wide reflection.

Every day, pick one small, simple task that you will attempt to Do consciously later in the day. For example, taking out the trash or making the bed.

Before you attempt to Do the task, several times during the day relax the three centers and visualize the task in detail.
Imagine beginning and ending the task at specific times with a short prayer. Imagine the sensations, emotions and thoughts that will occur as you do the task. Visualize exactly the postures and motions that your body will take as you Do the task. Imagine yourself in a state of Three Centered Being as you Do the task.

At the planned time, Do the task.

When the task is finished, review your performance and determine how closely you followed your visualization.

Last night I decided to implement this week's exercise by observing making breakfast. Specifically making tea. Seeing the water boil. Measuring the tea leaves. Pouring the water in the pot. Infusing the Golden Yunan.

The interesting result was that not only did I find myself observing that process but it carried over into the making of my toast as well.
And into the process of eating.

The simple visualized act expanded into other routine acts that are done almost the same every morning.

---

by Harry

As I've moved on in the week I've noticed that the tasks I took in this exercise tended to remain as I continued. So four days later, observing the making of my breakfast continues.

Interesting.

by James F

A few months back, Greg kindly pointed out that I was "working too hard to work." My personality is such that if I decided to run a marathon, I would go out that day and attempt to run 26 miles. It has finally dawned on me that I need to relax and stop Working so much. With that in mind, I passed on the exercise this week and just focused on relaxing.

In relaxing more, I've observed that my Observing I has been acting like a policman, chasing away all signs of negativity as soon as he spots it. Consequently, there has been little opportunity to really see my dark side. I've also sensed more the importance of UNCRITICAL self-observation. If I criticize everything I see, I tend to not accept it as true about myself, or fall into self-justification. There is a cacophony of voices inside me that I am just starting to become aware of.

Interestingly, I also noticed that the more I tried not to Work, the more I was Working. That ticked me off.  I began to see that I'm just like a dog. Pull it and it resists one way. Push it and it resists the other way. I had to laugh, remembering an exercise a while back where we were to try not Working. That exercise made no sense to me back then. Now, though, I feel more aware of 2nd Force.

One more thought came to me as I've Worked at not Working: "Do not let your left hand know what your right hand is doing." I think I see why. If IT knows what I am doing, IT changes what IT is doing. The Observer affects the experiment, so to speak. So I have to outsmart myself and Work more cleverly. The Way of the Sly Man?

James

by Zenas

One of my observances was how i put things away at night and lay on the bed; this partly being about conscious energy affecting actual sleep. One noticeable difference was to sleep more deeply.
The second notation was that several i.s were able to catch themselves throughout the day, particularly in the little poses we call mannerisms. Working or visualizing the 3 centers at one time is something I've rarely accomplished, 2 yes.

"Consciously" turning on the computer, a task so simple and so regular I barely notice it and its significance, was my task. It represents for me a shift from the automatic movements of waking, preparing, getting the kids ready, etc., to the beginning of my day--typing papers, reading news, etc. I have actually come to resent the noise of the computer, its hum a signal that the inner quiet of my life will now be intruded upon throughout the day.

Alas, I watched myself turn on the machine each day with anger, resentment, with fear and loathing. The "i" that begins this part of the day is less attuned to the Real than the other "i"´s and they are far from knowing the Real. That is, I no longer see this machine as a tool but a hindrance of sorts. I saw how "plugging in", the very concept of using electricity to get news or knowledge stirs some old, primeval grudge against the "modern." I remebered how I came to computer use late in life and how difficult all "technology" feels to me. How impersonal and controlled versus the spontaneous and alive.

By trying to visualize doing the task the night before, I came across hopeful, expectant feelings, but then as the morning came and the "real" task began (only once a day in this case) I once again fell into the stupor of dead routine, dulled by resentment, filled yet again with anger. Rather hopeless it felt...

by Judy

I attempted the task of going to the local supermarket and shopping and returning home, for this exercise. This, after four daily attempts, proved to have been way too complex a choice. What happened is that, by the 4th attempt, there was so much new information being observed and received, that the velocity of the task was much too slow for practical reasons. Then each day the visualisation became more and more detailed, and also quite long.

It brought home clear realisation and strong emphasis on the incredible complexity of the organism, and its ability to function speedily on auto-pilot.
Also evident was how scant the knowledge of even the physical body movements and routines.
So though the choice was poor, results quite surprisingly informative.

Sorry this rather late. I have a new 8 month old Russian Blue (cat), and she is just wonderful, and I've not been near the computer till today.
Best wishes,

Ponder: When does food cease being 'food' and become part of the 'me' that I Remember?

Observe how the organism eats. What reactions happen when some if its eating habits are changed?

Before eating, perform a Heptachord, with each step accompanied by 3 inhalations and exhalations:

1. Relax all three centers.
2. Attend to the sight or presentation of the food on the table and plates.
3. Attend to the smell of the food.
4. Attend to the taste of the food by taking a small sample into the mouth.
5. Attend to the sounds accompanying the meal situation.
6. Attend to the touch or physical sensations evoked by the food and setting.
7. Intone the phrase from Beelzebub's Tales - 'aieioiuoa'.

Pause three times a day to relax the three centers and perform the Sightless Gaze and Soundless Sound exercise. Evoke a feeling of Gratitude.

> Ponder: When does food cease being 'food' and become part of the 'me' that I Remember

This seed idea for pondering is large indeed.
What has happened for me is that I've been engrossed with the "hydrogens" aspect of it, and their various values, and this seems to hint that;
(a) food ceases to become "food" and becomes thinking or psychic energy at H48.
(b) however, the "me" that I Remember part of the question involves further transformative steps - taking the energies to the finer levels of H24 and H12.
(c) then pondering about the various levels of food, and the fact that self-remembering, or the first conscious shock, acts at the place of the incoming of impressions (Do48), and that similar value hydrogens also occur here as Mi48 (from the air octave); then firther transformation produces Fa 24 and Re 24, then to the extra hydrogens Sol 12, Mi 12 and Si 12 finally from all 3 food levels.

This has been such a complex thread that now I'm unable to think of any other lines to pursue for this pondering. Please can anyone suggest others, or is this the main one? Maybe I'm being a bit OC here ( ), as have already pondered at some length. It's just one of those big ideas I haven't thoroughly thought about before, and now seems like the time.

Judy.

P.S. Most of the post above came from reading "On Hydrogens", Nicoll Vol 1 - which provided enough structure to work with.
J.

A query;
Does anyone know of any parts of All and Everything which deal with this topic please?
Judy.

by Judy

I found some references (partially answering my question of the last post above) in the section Work Philosophy/Conscious Labour/Transforming Exercises on this site.
Thanks Ian.

So back to the Heptachord to see what results, now that there is a clearer idea of what is supposed to happen here.

Judy,

When I was young I spent a long time graphing out hydrogens and all of that. I think at the time it was very very interesting. It seems, in retrospect, more of an O thing than a G thing.

G talks about combinations, but not in this detailed number system. O was a mathematician.

My own response is that I'm not sure when food becomes food no longer. Intellectually I'd say when it reaches its highest transformation which is either in the intellectual or the emotional center.

With second being food i can sometimes sense this. I can feel Oxygen being assimilated and transformed. Because I've worked with that long long times.

One of the things is that our own attitude can change how food gets transformed. I was angry about a couple of things last night. No need to detail this irritation. But I let it in. Something that has been building and I've worked on and I know the anger is not real, just I's that want their own way.

But I still felt my food in my stomach, even this morning. That usually isn't the case with my digestion. Transformation. But I let these other things interfere with the way my being was operating.

I do know that if I Work at being conscious during eating breakfast that the energy from the meal seems to last, be stronger. I could also say that my attention moves to different things when it is left to roam during the morning.

It is much harder for me to be conscious during those later meals. I'm already into the day. Even working at home. I just finished grading a bunch of papers and posting students' grades. So I'm moving at a different level.

I'll try, today, to do Lunch with the same focus as breakfast.

Thank you very much Harry.

I read your post a couple of times.
What followed was a mental snapshot of a large group of formatory intellectual "i"s chatting away together and enjoying themselves gossiping. This was quite a shock, as I haven't noticed them before. This probably means that I was totally identified with them.
So now there is a little awareness. And they have been unmasked.

Seems that less intellectualising and more experiencing is in order.
Strange how some of my once favourite "i"s which were useful in ordinary life, have limited value on the inner journey, in that the more complex the knowledge, the less am I able to verify it, so it doesn't really become mine anyway.

Your post somehow facilitated this shift. Also the excerpts from All & Everything provided by Ian on this site.
Thanks to you both.
Best wishes,
Judy.

It is indeed interesting to realize that those i's you rely on for daily success are not the i's you want to encourage to grow. But you need them also. They pay for your arrising. Some you can only start; but you can sometimes observe others by focusing on the simple parts of tasks. Like observing the physical parts of this typing. That observation can lead to other i's.

Dear Judy

MW Thring's book on Gurdjieff's Teaching (the one I referenced to you in how to pray for our neighbor) has been most helpful to me in sorting out what O. says and how it relates to BEELZEBUB and others writings. (It also shows, by objective comparison, how passive elements have entered the Teaching after G.'s death) I highly reccomend it.

Again, and I ask for your indulgence, Ouspensky and Nicoll are speaking to highly educated, mostly male, scientifically-oriented minds. (Can I call this classically Western rigid THINKING?) They are breaking things down into categories for the audience they are dealing with in terms that they can relate to. Gurdjieff never speaks like this EXCEPT early on (ISOTM) when he was working out IDEAS AND THEORIES with Ouspensky. And these ideas are being presented in THEOSOPHICAL terminology (the language most of his early followers already understood.) HYDROGENS, CARBONS etc are related to terms introduced by HP Blavatsky in her Theosophical writings. This is the territory Ouspensky was coming from. They are not the actual chemical elements, but occult (meaning hidden from view) "screens" or SYMBOLS.

Remember, Gurdjieff said that women already understood what he was talking about. I don't think that is a casual remark.

I would also add that men who walk with a feline grace (indicative of their connection with the Inner Feminine) also understand what he is talking about.

I feel that you are wrapping yourself up in intellectual knots --- not that I am against Intellectual work --- but perhaps you need to encourage more a more Feeling attitude towards the truth behind the ideas.

O. gives us a structure, an outline (And, boy do I need that!) but it isn't the whole story by a long shot!

Best to you,

Greg

Below is a link to the Theosophical Diagram of the 4 (Al)chemical Elements from HP Blavatsky's THE SECRET DOCTRINE. Scroll to pages 592-593.

http://www.theosociety.org/pasadena/sd/sd2-2-12.htm

from HP Blavatsky THE SECRET DOCTRINE.

Scroll to pages 592-593

THE SECRET DOCTRINE is (in my opinion) a gigantic wonderful mess of a talisman. To scientifically verify it, or even argue from that viewpoint is to miss the point entirely. It is a collage of ideas, lies, truths, falsehoods, representations and misrepresentations which, taken as a whole work, on the Mind to loosen. It, like a visual collage of disparate elements, creates an atmosphere to enter. Most readers have missed this crucial element. It purposefully "discredits" itself.

But back to our point: This chart is what underlies Ouspenky's discussion and (the story goes) Gurdjieff helped Ouspensky work out the THEORETICAL component of the Work with this Theosophical language.

It may do us well to remember that the esteemed founder of Northeon Forest (and the esteemed teacher of our esteemed Mr. MacFarlane!) found Ouspensky and his presentation of the Teaching NOT to his liking. He cleaved instead to Mme Ouspensky, who even from her sickbed (it seems) was able to impart a more Gurdjieffean stream. Mr. Beidler, it is remembered, was taught by Gurdjieff himself first.

And then there is AR Orage . . .

If you haven't read C Daly King's THE ORAGEAN VERSION, by all means do so. It totally challenged my long-held stance on what this teaching was all about and how it could be approached. There is also, for those who can avail themselves of it, an "egregore" to be contacted through Mr. King's style of writing and presentation--- a "deja-vu", as it were One can inhale chalk-dust from Orage's classroom. And this from an author (Mr. King) who all eschewed things occult. An 'egregore" is a SUBSTANCE --- it is related to impression food and (it is my experience) can connect one to SOURCE.

Happy Trails,

Greg

Greg,

I agree with many of your comments above. I spent years unworking some of the O intellectualism.

However I tend to think that Nicoll is a little different. There is a strong Jungian influence in Nicoll. The first two volumes of the Commentaries have more of the intellectual side. But the remaining volumes, which I find more useful, have less intellectual.

Then this would be the book, Greg?
Thanks for your informative posts, and good to hear from you. I'll get 2 new books, the one above plus C.Daly King's 'The Oragean Version".

I used to tie myself up in intellectual knots, and identification prevented me from seeing it. A few years ago I decided to only allow any study after the actual Work attempts had been made for the day, and have kept to that.
This week, though, was the first time these "i"s were clearly observed in me, and the said "shift" occurred. Now the balance will be coming from understanding rather than just discipline; hence far preferable, and stronger.
And yes, I felt the heart involved as a result of the observation.

All the best,
Judy.

It´s funny how the bodily subject of food so quickly becomes a "heady" topic.

This week I have tried to keep it as simply focused on the task as possible. Noticing the "heaviness" of certain foods, the "lightness" of others and their corresponding transformations (not always congruent with the "weight" of the substance) has been a challenge but a pleasurable one. How so many moods ar edirectly related to particular substances and how even the most common (and old) of habits (like coffee) can provide alot of material to consider that usually gets unnoticed. How, when simple or complex habits are changed, it requires adjustments throughout the organism and the shifts are unnerving at times.

On a related note, after a recent trip to the States I returned with a recently purchased copy of Nicoll´s Commentaries and have found innumerable gems throughout. Thank you Harry for suggesting these. Prof. Thring´s book I had not heard of and after hearing his talk at the Conference last month am curious about. Is it easy to find?

> MW Thring. QUOTATIONS FROM G. I. GURDJIEFF'S TEACHING A personal companion - Revised Edition. Luzac Oriental. 2002

Yes, the title above is the book I to which I was referring. I am not usually much taken to compilations, but purchased the book based on the care taken with its typeset and the way it felt in my hands. The weight and heft of the volume "signified" something for me, so I bought it without further ado. I perused it once or twice and then put it on the shelf for about a year and a half. Then around March of this year when ISOTM had started to "open" on a different level for me, I looked into it again and began to see its purpose. Quotations from a specific range of books are placed in a deliberate relation to each other. It still takes effort and it still takes pondering, but it has helped me break through some of BEELZEBUB's crust.

I don't know how easy it is to find this, but be warned --- it is on the pricey side.

Of course, (and I have stated it many, many times before) I remain a big fan of Nicoll --- there is a noticeable emotional/empathic element O's delivery does not have.

---

by Jose

I liked the way you put that, > a noticeable emotional/empathic element O's delivery does not have

It was my sense when I first read exerpts of the Commentaries, through quotes posted here and elswhere, that here´s a man I would have enjoyed sitting and having a beer with. I never got that sense with O. and his writings. Then recently I read that Nicoll often would "hold court" at a pub and with humor and grave sensitivity would continue teaching the Work. Again, its a wonder at how we know these things before we "know" them.

Best,
José

---

by Greg

During my "journeys" in the past couple of months --- I will not bore you with the details ---- I came across a little known bit of information which sheds another curious light on the Ouspensky line of the Work.

For many years it has been known that Mme deSalzmann, (G.'s heir and head of the Foundational aspect of the Work) had an abiding interest in the lectures and ideas of Krishnamurti. What hasn't been known is that Krishnamurti had an ongoing involvement with the Work starting as a somewhat regular attendee of O's lectures and meetings. As time went on, he and O developed a strong friendship, a friendship which in time was extended towards Os pupil John Sinclair (Lord Pentland).

After the passing of O. and G. and the development and setting in stone of the Foundation's foundation, Krishnamurti continued on as Pentland's friend and advisor.

A side by side comparison of statements made by Pentland and Krishnamurti reveals a sriking similarity of turn of phrase and presentation ---- the authors, based on the evidence of their written texts could be taken as interchangable.

Krishnamurti's philosophy, it is now generally acknowledged, is the product of a series spontaneous kundalini awakenings. There is no technique, no effort in his production --- there is no Work. It's not "wrong" --- it just isn't the same thing. At all.

MW Thring's book, through side-by-side comparison reveals how the Work is changing by the application of a more receptive and passive viewpoint (quotes from Mme des and Henri Tracol). What is as troubling (for me) is how there seems to be the need to link the Work up to being a part of a Great Tradition, as if the Work cannot stand on its unique merits and has to be "justified" according to its (alledged) comformity to other disciplines.

If all the above is in point of fact true, it does give one pause in terms of what the Ouspensky line has been (his estimable documentary work notwithstanding)

We are lucky to be here recipients of a line which has preserved as it was passed.

---

by Jose

Greg,
What you say is so good, and so important I hope we all ponder its ramifications carefully.

I, having been a part of a "Great Tradition" for many, many years, came to the Work partly because it felt like one, and yet...it was something different. Something whose power rested elsewhere, yet remained compatible (and competitive) with those other Traditions. And I have seen, in the relatively little time I have been in the Work, how what you say is absolutely true, how the people in the Work (many of them I mean) feel defensive or insecure about attempting to pass on what they received. As if it wouldnt stand on its own. Well it does. And rather well at that. And the flatulent seriousness given the Work by some of those very same people disregards the utterly complete humanness of Gurdjieff, and try instead to intellectualize it, or scientificize it.

The final litmus test for me rests in whether I would take a drink with this teacher, whether I would enjoy a meal with them, whether I could walk and breathe and cook with them. Using that test, very few "teachers" I have studied, seen, or been with qualify. Dilgo Khyentse Rinpoche, Shunryu Suzuki and G.I. Gurdjieff (along with Nicoll and a few others in the 4th Way) are about all I can come up with.
Anyway, thanks for your post.
José

> The final litmus test for me rests in whether I would take a drink with this teacher, whether I would enjoy a meal with them, whether I could walk and breathe and cook with them.

Yes, Jose. And this is it, isn't it? The "ordinariness", the refusal of us to sit with and do the ordinary.

There are some who view G. as creating some sort of hodge-podge, some esoteric smorgasbord. They may be right ---- I dunno . . .

My own feeling, and it has intensified through time, is that while techniques, practices and notions may indeed be borrowed from various Traditions, G. was using them to amplify, illustrate and elucidate for us a most particular and specific philosophic stance regarding HUMAN BEING. Unfortunately, through waterings-down and soft-peddlings much of that has been lost. And then, who could really be "Gurdjieff" in continuation?

So it really remains up to the ACTIVE efforts of each individual and how much s/he wants it and works towards it.

The Work ISN'T really like anything else --- I don't see it's demands reflected as bracingly anywhere else. I mean most of it is really impossible --- but that impossiblity becomes part of the point. You will never "get it", but it remains the point of Rectification.

Being silly and saying things like "oh we'll close our eyes and do a zen sitting 'cause Mr. G used EVERYTHING". It's superficial, it's immature, it's Un-Intelligent, and ultimately its an offense to a great deed done.

But, then --- Hell! --- what do I know?

---

by Harry

I think we need to realize that whatever bath is there, it is the path we were supposed to meet. I was a confirmed Ouspenski-ite when I first met this Work. My first reading of Gurdjieff came of a library copy of All and Everything. The City of Cincinnati actually had a copy in the stakes. I didn't think it remarkable at the time.

Contact with Mr. Nyland and the Barn continued the cracking of that original intellectualism. It was something taught to me. I went to college as a person who used "feel". I was taught that "think" was the more appropriate verb. Pooh pooh. Winnie, that is.

There are strange connections. Tom Robbins. Phillip Dick. e.e. cummings. I remember watching the Bionic Woman being interviewed on TV and noticing that Lindsay Wagner was wearing an enneagram around her neck. At first that was so cool. Then it became so innappropriate.

I had a friend in college. She and I had a mutual ever unfulfilled crush. Or something like that. Twenty years later email put us back in touch. And she was in Hawaii teaching in another version of the "4th Way" school. I read some of the work by that teacher, and admired my friend by couldn't digest her teacher's voice.

I have long time friends. . . or some word like that. . .who would never guess my connections here. My poor mother still worries in her 82nd year that I shall descend to a Catholic hell.

"Whatever gets you through the night," is certainly a starting place. But then we have to move on to how we walk through the day.

This exercise is enjoyable for me - rather fun, and the new information gained each repeat time quite reassuring.
I changed only simple things, such as swapping hands with utensils, and having tea/coffee without sugar.
Obviously meals became more of an event, and took more time, as the automatic i's were tricked a little.
Reactions this time occurred at different levels, and were many and varied: there were some who thought the whole thing rather silly, others who had mild annoyance that things were slower/tasted strange etc; but there was another large group which thoroughly approved.
There was definitely more wakefulness.

Greg and Jose,
Interesting info about Krishnamurti.
An uncle who was a devotee of his, lived in the family home with us when he wasn't overseas on his pilgrimages, until I was nine years old.
He was very big on household chores at dawn, then digging the vegetable garden, then out walking along the creek in the frosty morning observing the wildlife. I used to go with him most of the time. He was totally non-violent, and consideration itself (he'd take along a little brown-paper bag of hard-boiled eggs when we went to friends for dinner, so as not to onconvenience them with his vegetarianism).
A real human being.

Fond memories.
Fortunate influences.

Thanks everyone. I have recently realized, quite painfully, the ordinariness(?), realness(?), practicalness(?), goal (?) of the Work, and this discussion has helped to confirm what I've learned.

On the writings, it seems to me they all have their place. I've started reading Tales again, out loud (second time thru), and there is a feeling there I don't get from O or Nicoll. It seems to awaken my conscience, which is what I need.

I recently had some, for me, gut-wrenching experiences where I had to kill some wounded animals. I'm also simultaneously at the part in Tales where Beelzebub is trying to get humanity to stop animal sacrifices. The realizations about what the "Work" is all about that have followed from putting my experiences together with what I got from Tales have been mind-blowing. (A moment of conscience/consciousness?).

Greg: I liked part I, but got bogged down in the second part of the Oragean Version. Perhaps I will put it back on my list of things to read.

During the day, once each hour, stop and sense the heart beat throughout the body while observing the "M" pattern on the palms of your hands, which can represent "Memento Mori" - I remember my death.

While eating, Ponder that we are transient beings, that the food we eat passes through us, that the cells of our organism are constantly dieing, that nothing is permanent.

Thanks Ian. The "M" is so cool. Maybe I don't need that tattoo afterall.

"Mememto Mori" - and written on the palms - reminding factor par excellence. And when I put my hands together (as if in prayer), the Ms touch.

I expected this exercise to evoke sadness.
Instead, after a day of hourly attempts, the experiences are strongly motivating and are evoking instances of humility of better quality than I usually feel. This particularly noticed on the first instance the exercise brought about a mental snapshot of the people of the world walking past, and somewhere in the midst, I was a tiny speck in the endless stream. This now, with variations, continues to arrive in some of the other attempts.

With the eating part, thoughts of the birth and maintenance of cells, as well as the dying.

Thanks Ian. I'll be keeping this one.

And James, good one!
Really made me laugh.

Having had the kids all week while my wife was gone, I still pushed myself to see the "M" in my hand, the death reminder. While it is similar to a Tibetan Buddhist aphorism designed to awaken us, I found this exercise, with its practical reminder, a better one than its abstract cousin. Who wishes to imagine their own death in its full context? I thought how lonely, sad, and bereft they would be if I were gone and noticed a few extra trips to parks, to small mountains and horse ranches nearby to squeeze a few additional fun experiences with "papa." Oh, they missed their mother, but while I was repeatedly examining my hand and seeing that accursed "M", I also saw how this particular "I" struggled to get in another moment for them to remember me by. Needless to say, they had a great time this week. I too. Yet I also saw how the need to be remembered, to be present at the mellifluous eulogy of my own funeral, pushes me when I am not watching.

Food too took on this quality, wondering which substances remained and motivated the above while which ones were simply waste, and what, exactly, is the difference.

Three times during the day sit quietly in meditation. Relax the three centers. Watch the breath. Use a sightless gaze and soundless sound to absorb impressions without identifying, labeling or judging them. Allow the impressions to collect in the bone marrow. Ponder, without expecting an answer, "Are questions more valuable to a seeker than answers?"

As you walk during the day, Ponder, "What is the source of my desire for answers, conclusions and judgements?"

When you encounter the unpleasant manifestations of others during the day, try to absorb the impressions without identifying with them. Visualize the impressions collecting in the bone marrow.

---

by Judy

Last Friday, May 26th, was a milestone Work-day for me.

I had my first experience of a continuous self-observation process which lasted almost 3 hours.

I had Self-remembered first, and separated Observing I from It (the organism). Non-identification/awareness was as complete as I've known it to be from many successful, though momentary previous attempts.

I'd recently read The Oragean Version, kindly sent to me by a friend, and have no doubt that a few points of clarification in the early part of the second file helped a lot.

Perceived quite a bit of unnecessary movement of the fingers, excess muscle tension especially in neck and shoulders, closing the teeth together in situations of stress, crossing of legs every time I/it sat down. Also heard the tone of voice as if it were another person several times. And noted twice that what it was saying outwardly didn't agree with what it thought inside. The ordinary-life situation consisted of driving to town and doing three quite complex errands, then returning home. While driving, observed some irritated I's talking when the car stopped at the third red traffic light in a row.

Impartiality was not a concern, as the organism was doing its' own thinking and performing quite rapidly and efficiently, and even the slightest little thing had much meaning - delightful state. This in contrast to some earlier attempts (deliberation rather than observation?) where things became so slow as to be impractical.

Trees and buildings seemed more vivid and alive - there were more signs to read than I've previously noticed - just a lot more activity generally; and yet the people all presented blank expressions.

This was a joyous state, and I didn't wish to leave it, but late afternoon I started to lose it a few times, and then it was gone.

Friday night, when reflecting on the exercise, it occurred to me that a new candidate for Chief Feature is that I am a dreamer, almost always identified with either thoughts or emotions.

I'm confident the state can be repeated.
Unforgettable experience, and I wanted to share with all of you, as much credit due to Ian's Online Group.

On Saturday and Sunday, I did some sensing exercises and reading and meditation - felt like the right thing to do for solid equilibrium.
I'll try the observation exercise again very soon.

All the best,
Judy.

P.S. Comments and any feed-back welcome as usual.

Thanks Judy. Those types of experiences (flashes) are all that keep me pressing on sometimes. At the same time, I'm feeling more and more that if I don't work on negative emotions, not identifying, not internally considering, separating from "it", and really, sincerely, uncritically observing how the machine works, those experiences aren't going to bring me much good. I'm still a "lunatic"--I think I can do something, in particular, I think I can end suffering. I think that I know if, when, and how much, suffering should be in this world.

I also have this illusion of who I am that I cling to, and I don't want anyone to ever see the truth. It is tiresome to keep pretending, but there I go. Just beginning to see some of this in a fuller way. In this past week, I've felt overwhelmed at times by the jumble of thoughts and emotions inside me--so many contradictions in what I "know." Confusion. Feeling and thinking so much at one time. O's definitions of conscience and consciousness came to mind. Funny how I never thought attaining higher consciousness would cause me to feel so low!
Somewhere I heard we have to go down to go up. And Nicoll wrote we have to go down a long way before we can finally become sane. The irony of it makes me laugh.

As you walk during the day, Ponder, "What is the source of my desire for answers, conclusions and judgements?"

This exercise has been great for me. I'm realizing that I really don't know much about how my three centers work together. A lot of what "it" does seems to begin with my sense of vision. A lot of my movements seem to result from my sense of touch, pain, heat, cold. I'm very little in touch with my sense of hearing.

On one more note, we had an exercise where we were supposed to imagine carrying out a task at a specific time, then carry it out at at that time. This week I observed something that made me think of that exercise. I sensed the urge to drink some water. My thinking center then started trying to solve the problem of how to get water. An image of the kitchen area at my office popped into my mind, along with the hallway leading there. I also saw an office I didn't want to pass in the image, which caused some negative feelings to arise in me. A decision was made that the office would be passed anyway, and my moving center then kicked in to carry out the task of fulfilling my instinctive(?) center's desire for water.

Ah, Judy, three hours would be like days for some of us. This i/it often can work with two centers - foot-steps and hand gestures are the usual for movement and recuring thoughts the other; trying to consider my bone marrow collecting impressions has been amazing. Observation of my breathing has accompanied the still seconds i/it managed to remember its' bone marrow. If some future puppy finds the bones tasty, perhaps it will add flavor for him. A question implies a turning toward or seeing something; does an answer imply we no longer have to see/question it? This week's exercise has given many questions for a long time and, that is good, Ian.

There are many Demands in our lives - Demands from the Trogoautocrat, Demands from society, and Demands from friends and family. Ponder - Which Demands are essential?
Which Demands can be ignored?
How can we use these demands, especially the ones that cause us suffering, for growth of Being?

During the day, make a committed effort to maintain a constant sensation of air entering and leaving your nostrils. Ponder - Is there a difference between a Demand, a Duty and a Responsibility?

---

by Harry

Conscious suffering is the energy for growth.

Dang that sounds good.

Demands. Duties. Responsibilities.

Much, I think, depends upon the position. This past weekend I helped my son move some big pieces of furniture. It wasn't a duty or a responsibility. And he didn't demand it. But, in a sense, it was my responsibility to myself to help him with this process.

I have duties to my parent. My mother needs something and I have a duty. My mother also makes demands. Some of these I ignore because they aren't my demands. Nor are they my responsibilities.

There are Demands that are much larger. I must pay for my arising. And that leads to duties and responsibilities. I feel a responsibility to come in here daily. There are times when I feel it a duty to answer certain posts. Because of the larger Demand of paying for my arising.

By fulfilling these responsibilities and duties I also gain. It's a bargain. Just as I've bargained with "God" to do certain things. Of course my super christian ex-wife would maintain I can't bargain with god. I can only bargain with the devil.

Oh, that's right, he's beelzebub.

I have been struggling with demands, duties, responsibilities the past couple of months. Might as well throw in desires in that mix. My body demands. Duties? Responsibilities? A huge war in me about these things right now. In trying to understand and resolve this struggle, my thoughts keep returning to a book I read just prior to coming into contact with the Fourth Way. I read Ayn Rand's "Atlas Shrugged." And then I shrugged. Then somehow I forgot the inexpressible freedom that shrugging gave me.

1. James was taught he has a duty to help others.
2. James desires for everyone to be happy.
3. There's nothing James can do to fix anyone or anything.

The gradual personal realization of thes three ideas, and the colliding of them together inside me has been overwhelming. I haven't cried like this since my mother's funeral.

> During the day, make a committed effort to maintain a constant sensation of air entering and leaving your nostrils. Ponder - Is there a difference between a Demand, a Duty and a Responsibility?

This week I started with the above, to clarify meanings and differences, before moving on to the differentiation of various types of demands.
These are the etymologies;

> duty
> 1297, from Anglo-Fr. duete, from O.Fr. deu "due, owed > responsible > 1599, "answerable (to another, for something)," from Fr. responsible, from L. responsus, pp. of respondere "to respond" (see respond). Meaning "morally accountable for one's actions" is attested from 1836. Retains the s > demand

> c.1290, from O.Fr. demander "to request," from L. demandare "entrust, charge with a commission," from de- "completely" + mandare "to order." The political economy sense (correlating to supply) is first attested 1776 in Adam Smith

While pondering on these plus dictionary definitions (omitted for sake of brevity), some mental organisation took place and resulted in a hierarchy of these terms:
Duty
Responsibility Demands
in that,
Duty left no room for choice; it must be done or "I owe".
Responsibility often became duty once accepted, so I need to really think through the available resources of time, energy and money, before accepting a responsibility.
(example here is in buying a little cat; I've accepted the responsibility as well as the joy, so now have duty of care).
Demands also involve decision and some freedom of choice, and of course that beings in consideration of "unreasonable demands" etc.

Then the question moved on to "how to fulfill" the duties, accepted responsibilities and valid demands.
This kept bringing in another word; desire.
This "longing for" or "wanting" (emotional centre) has a huge effect on the EASE of performing the tasks.
I remembered how difficult it is to cook properly either when ill, or no appetite (desire) for whatever reason.
I remember how much easier to care for a new car/house, than one which has lost most of its appeal.
I remember the importance of the organism being in balance (health) for all of this too.
And much else.

At least when approached this way, the intellectual centre (often aided by the emotional centre) is in charge (or better still, Observing I), rather than a mixed-up reversal.

Of interest to me is the original etymology of desire;
de sidere from the stars. Nice.

Judy.

P.S. I've been thinking of working with "I am, I can, I wish" for some time. Perhaps a valid one to begin with would be a duty I keep putting off until it's desperate, such as disinfecting the wheelie-bins.... Or, maybe I can interest someone else in that responsibilty? Ha - only joking.

Hello all, My name is Lawrick and after several attempts to join the group I want to say that Ian and I finally connected last week. I will admit to using the week to surrepticiously scan the forum and would like to thank Judy, james, Harry,Jose, and others for making me realise the work is what we make of it and not some unreachable, elite, unknowable mystery. I'm not a person who joins anything easily but having done so I feel its my "duty" to respond to the weekly questions. Firstly, and for me demands are made and responded to with all the limitations of the personality. Duties are far more important but I find the repetition to engender a stage of sleep where I sometimes can't remember exactly why or what I'm doing. Responsibility on the other hand seems to arise from a more significant area of my being and always presents consquences either good or bad depending on my response. If good then I harbour a feeling of "doing". If bad, I feel a sense of shame and later, regret. This formula seems to have little relevance to the significance of the responsibility so I'll have to slightly disagree with Judy on this one.

With respect to remembering our breathing, at the beginning of the week these"rememberings" were few and far between and not very long. Today however, while perusing papers at my favorite cafe' I noticed two things: 1-every few minutes I would get lost in my thoughts but almost immediately I would regain my self-remembering state relative to my breathing. After doing this for approximately two and one hours, I felt tired but in a good way. The second thing I noticed is that after a few minutes a certain tension would build in my neck. Now this was not pain or strain and I couldn't locate the source but after refocusing I felt the tension diminish. After repeating this I actually became very relaxed but still alert. I also noticed that things have grown very quiet around my body lately. Self-remembering seems to eliminate a great deal of the exterior noise, "distractions, impatience{my chief feature?} and the extranious forms that siphon my attention and energy. However, splitting my attention between breathing and the Gurdjieff articles I'm afraid I couldn't remember much of what I was reading. I'm familiar with a great deal of the literature surrounding Mr. Gurdjieff, Ouspensky, Bennett, but have almost no knowledge of the practical work we do online. I would appreciate any and all input from the group. That's about it for today but I would like to make a few non related observations which may or may not interest you. I live in Western Canada, a land of endless prairies, towering mountains, and an ancient European history of about say.....200 years. I"m glad that the Europeans discoverred this land because the indigenous people living here at the time probably didn't know where they were and after being slaughterred with disease and guns and knives and such I'm sure appreciated learning the "real nature" of their situation. In Alberta there is a formation called the Athabasca Tar Sands. In 10-15 years the development will be such that it will produce more oil than Saudi Arabia. The question is.....why does wealth and conservatism seem to go hand in hand? Because the oil must be "steamed" from the sand, enormous quantities of water is used and now water as a residual runoff from the mountain snowcaps is becoming more scarce and the government will not charge the oil entities for its use because after all no conservative government wants to meddle in corporate affairs, at least until the water is gone or green or it burns. The city of Edmonton tears down any buiding over 50 years old on principle. I live in the oldest area of the city close to the University. It's an area of older buildingsand huge elms that spread their branches accross the streets. A block from my apartment is one of the oldest churches in town, minute when compared to the massive European Cathedrals, but for this city its red rust color and fire brick exterior is very beautiful with two exceptions. First, it's Anglican and there is no steeple. Is this a quality of all Anglican churches? Secondly being buily 75 years ago this beautiful Christian edifice is completely ringed with battlements , parapits and such. Why? I wouldn't be surprised to find a treboucher inside. This battlements seem to be a feature of many churches dedicated to the Prince of Peace. Am I missing something here? Well if you're still with me, bravo. This was a wonderful being exercise because I wrote almost the entire text an hour ago before hitting the escape button and deleting everything. After confronting a serious denying force ^^&^%$%%^&!!!!I decide to affirm my cussing by a do-over, a mulligan, something I would have never escaped even two weeks ago. I hope I have not made this introdution a denying force for you.

Welcome, Lawrick.

Yes, I take the point you make re duties and responsibilities.
I agree with it, in fact, without disagreeing with myself.
Different facets of the pondering process perhaps.

> First, it's Anglican and there is no steeple. Is this a quality of all Anglican churches?

Interesting.
No, here in Australia most have steeples, and chancels. Architects of many Anglican churches in Canada (especially Newfoundland and Labrador) chose the Gothic Revival style, and this has no steeples, or chancels.

Anyway, as mentioned, welcome aboard. I enjoyed your post.

Judy,

Try the draining exercise that was described a while back. It's a very good way to take a beginning step in certain other exercises. I've always found it helpful when I need to move away from or toward something.

Interesting thought of Church Steeples. They are spiritual cell phone towers. Much like the odelisks G describes. Interesting steeple ornaments also intrigue. There's one here that has a statue of Gabriel on it. And I once moved to Mississippi and drove into town to be greeted by a steeple with a finger point up. the index finger. The day I drove in it was very cloudy except for a single ray of sun light that illumined that steeple.

Mississippi turned out not to be a very good place to be though I did much there.

---

by Judy

Thanks for that Harry.

I take it you are referring to using the draining exercise prior to the "I am, I can, I wish" exercise, as an aid to minimising the "slavish impulses" of "desire", "like", "want", "need" here, (or "aversion" for that matter), in order to perform consciously as many ordinary tasks as possible.?

To stop the personality swings from its' extremes of "like" and "hate", and to be more often in the "float of being" at the centre of the pendulum's swing....

I'll re-read the Third Talk in Life is Real, and do the draining first, and see how I go.

Vigilance, vigilance, to minimise the personality's "field-days".

I am reminded also of the aphorism:
"Personality has almost no right to exist here."

Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by Harry

"Personality has almost no right to exist here."

And isn't the key "almost"? Because personality is the food by which essence grows.

Demands, Duties and Responsibilities

During the morning, maintain a constant awareness of sensations in the legs. Ponder - Is anything Demanded of me?
During the afternoon, maintain a constant awareness of sensations in the head and arms. Ponder - What are my Duties?
During the evening, maintain a constant awareness of sensations in the chest, abdomen and spine. Ponder - What are my Responsibilities?

During the week when suffering arises because of Demands, Duties or Responsibilities, transform the suffering by enduring its effects while sensing your breathing and Pondering - Is Life a Gift?

---

by Judy

> During the morning, maintain a constant awareness of sensations in the legs. Ponder - Is anything Demanded of me?

For 3 days, I had trouble with the constancy of awareness of the sensations.
Then yesterday, things fell into place with unexpected results.
While sensing the legs, perceived a strong impulse towards activity involving legs such as walking, playing with the cat, just leaping about really - quite rare for me. In fact, the physical body was demanding activity. I wanted to go with these impulses, so simply channelled them into useful tasks. Still, there was a lot of sheer fun and enjoyment as well. Much joy.
It occurred to me that contact was made with the positive side of the emotional sub-division of the moving centre. Healthy for me, as I'm distinctly a Man No. 3... Balancing.

Reminded of Whitman's "I sing the body electric..."

Ditto (with appropriate variations) for afternoon and evening sections of the exercise.

I'll be putting more emphasis on sensing after this experience. Finally getting a glimpse of its' great value and place in the Work.
Also, after partial sensing for some time, quality of total sensing attempts much improved. More life and joyous vitality.
Thanks for this one, Ian.

Judy.

I see myself similarly Judy. I can always identify with the thoughts you share. I feel a bit a bit red-faced when I think back to when I first started reading about Man 1-7 and thought, well I'm clearly a Man No. 4. This waking up stuff shouldn't take me too long. In reality, I'm stuck in my head most of the time. When I began my practice of the Fourth Way, I spent a lot of time practicing awareness of my movements, and trying to sense myself in my environment. After much effort, some very intense, new experiences, came to me. Then I got stuck in the excitement of that, and the observations of my movements eventually became mechanical. A whole new painful evaluation of the Work followed. The new evaluation seemed to be perfectly timed with my reading of the Commentaries. I read Vol I and II, and when I got to Vol III, I got a new "Oh I get what this is all about" feeling. This Group has also been a big help. The different viewpoints help to keep me balanced, and to keep me from wandering too far in my imagination. For instance, Greg, seems to emphasize and exude the emotional and physical. I can feel something different in what he writes that pulls me back closer to the center of my being and reminds me what it is I'm trying to do--Become Balanced!

Oh yeah, I forgot to add: I'm coming back around to again see the importance of sensing exercises such as this week's. Trying to sense my legs right now, and sitting with my feet flat on the floor, rather than in my usual feet up on the desk position, seems to help me remember.

With respect to my musings regarding the weekly work program I've found a couple of interesting gems. It seems the more I pondered the question, the more I noticed that this triad involves almost every aspect of my life. It seems that duty affirms demands and is reconciled by the choice to take responsibility and responsibility then becomes an affirming force for the resultant actions. I'll not elaborate on these conclusions because I would like to discuss and hopefully recieve some feedback on my observations of the pondering process.

During the pondering process I had some sense of my body with its many aches- pains- twitches. I particularly and persistantly noticed nervous energies throughout my body that were easily calmed when noticed but ask, why are these energies arising in the first place? Are these an aspect of one of the centres and if so, how might they be catagorized. I ask because I can,t seem to involve my feeling centre in my thoughts and I'm wondering if these nervous energies are some part of the feeling centre.

I've also noticed that the pondering process seems to take the form of an internal debate like some Pythonesque skit where two or more speakers list the pros and cons of the topic at hand. I understand this inner dialogue arises from the formatory centere but is there not a more efficent method of thinking. I mean its almost as if I'm watching a debate on T.V. When I try to examine the place of origin of the speakers I lose both my sensing facility and the question pondered. If I get back to pondering Mr. Cleese and his associates pop back up on the Tele. It's very frustating at times. I almost wonder if this internal debating dialogue is just another aspect of my waking sleep. I am not familiar with either the theory or the workings of this formatory apparatus, perhaps someone could enlighten me.

Finally, and I hope I'm not leaving the topic,but should we set aside a specific place to do this pondering- meditating? Why is breathing the food of the emotions? I ask because I have some serious breathing problems related to sport stupidities in earlier days, and several subsequent operations and I'm wondering if these relate to my lack of contact with the feeling centre while thinking. Dazed and Confused

Bennett had an exercise called the 60 point exercise that involved moving the attention to 60 points in the body. The more we explore the nooks and crannies, the fuller and easier will total sensing become.

Hmmm, I didn't have a triad in mind with those three, but you seem to have gotten some mileage out of it.

It is quite likely that the sensations are always there, but that we don't usually notice them. I wouldn't worry too much about them, just observe them and let them go, like passing thoughts. Some persistant ones may be related to emotional issues. Observe them, listen to them, see what they have to say. It may take them a while to be heard.

> I've also noticed that the pondering process seems to take the form of an internal debate like some Pythonesque skit where two or more speakers list the pros and cons of the topic at hand. Ideally, Pondering should be silent. One simply holds the question in mind. The question is the important aspect of the exercise, not the answer. Answers will come; let them go. Return to the silent question.

Is there not a more efficent method of thinking? There's a good question to ponder. Gurdjieff mentioned mentation by form. Thinking with images rather than words. Visualization.
The purpose of the heart is to pump blood. The purpose of the brain is to pump thoughts. We can still the mind temporarily and hopefully see something deeper.

> Finally, and I hope I'm not leaving the topic,but should we set aside a specific place to do this pondering- meditating?

You can set aside a space if you find it helps you, but I wouldn't consider it a necessity. Experiment and find what works for you. Since the 4th way is a way in life, one of the aims is to become adept at these practices in all times and places.

> Why is breathing the food of the emotions? I ask because I have some serious breathing problems related to sport stupidities in earlier days, and several subsequent operations and I'm wondering if these relate to my lack of contact with the feeling centre while thinking. Dazed and Confused

Why indeed? That just seems to be the way it is for us. Breathing seems to have an effect on our emotions. Of course without impressions there would be nothing tangible to have emotions about. The brain needs a lot of oxygen to function normally. Altering the ratio of O2 and CO2 in our blood affects our consciousness in various ways. That is the basis of many types of breathing exercises which can alter consciousness.
Developing emotional awareness is part of the process of this work. It will take time and needs to be worked with regularly. Emotions can be quite subtle and hard to see/feel. One may need to devote more attention to emotions and less to thinking.

A 60 point exercise is mentioned in Nicoll's 'Psychological Commentaries' (about the 5th book, I would have to go back to find the passage.)
As I know 60 point, I try to work with it each morning. Now that my career has taken me to this point of working with all of you (and I sincerely appreciate Being with this group,) I still do 60 point. If I am too rushed to do anything except run out the door of a morning, the physical is most likely to remember first it wasn't done.
Most mornings 60 point is done with the intellect and it is performed and done. Ian, when you speak of working with the emotions, there have been those quite few times an element of the emotions enters 60 point and it has such a different "taste" I can't describe the difference. I regularly go back to "Views from the Real World" to keep the differences between feelings and sensings; intellect and emotion can be even more difficult, intellect constantly wants to claim it is the emotion. Some of my regular poses are seen as emotion yet are negative intellect. Your suggestions, please, for catching the subtle differences for real intellect and emotions. Our Western culture is so hobglob at meshing them!

Hello Zenas,
Thank-you for that. I've been looking through my Bennett books since Ian mentioned 60-point, but so far no luck.
I have Nicoll, but no Index (I've heard there is one), so would really appreciate if you could point me towards the relevent passage, as would like to try this exercise asap.
And I've been enjoying your interesting posts lately too.

Judy.

Something like this - corrections welcome...

5 fingers left hand, left hand, left wrist, left lower arm, left elbow, left upper arm, left shoulder, 5 fingers right hand, right hand, right wrist, right lower arm, right elbow, right upper arm, right shoulder, groin, solar plexus, chest, spine, neck, backhead, tophead, forehead, left ear, right ear, left eye, right eye, left nostril, right nostril, mouth, tongue.

Ultimately the goal is to sense the body as a whole.
Following the points helps to avoid missing parts.
It also keeps the mind occupied and involved with the process.

Much of our inner dialogue consists of reviewing the past or rehearsing for the future.
Has the Seeker observed any underlying theme, motivation, inner state or emotional tone to their internal dialogues?

After observing their inner dialogue, the Seeker will bring it to a stop by using a sightless gaze and soundless sound accompanied by awareness of breathing and sensing the body, in an attempt to wipe the emotional slate clean and bring awareness into the present moment.

Ponder - Does the past or future exist?

by Harry

Happy Solstice.

I was and still continue to be a long time sufferer from "The disease of the Future." The Rolling Stones summed it up. Anticipation.

And I suppose someone else did a song called Regret.

Our culture specializes in Anticipation and Regret. We sell the future. And these little i's that we are raised in take over all of the time.

The endless gaze is a wonderful tool to work with The Disease of the Future. My last attack came when I was helping my son move. Absolutely no reason for me to be concerned. He was moving all but a mile and a half. But I tossed and turned the night before. I had little to do. Lift some big things up four flights of stairs with him. Yet this "i" or these "i's" within me want it to be something to "worry" about.

I learned much of this from my Mother. If my step-father was a half hour late coming home she'd be certain he was dead. I'm sure that her first husband being sent off to WWII and then coming home only to die a couple of years later had something to do with that. But she'd work herself into a lather of anxiety. And it would filter over to the rest of us. It's difficult to be around an anxious worrier without being infected.

My own way out of the night rolling is to lay still and breath I Am Now. I've learned when I'm anxious about an event that I have to participate in to use the sightless gaze.

This is working. This is what it's about. To separate from these kind of "dis-eases". They will continue. But they will lessen. And then you will find that your I moves into a different geography. It's almost a psychic geography. You see or feel what is going on as it is going on. And since you've accepted that you can't do anything about it, something different happens.

There was a time when I was sweating a grant. I needed a grant to keep my employment going. And it didn't look like it was coming through. I convinced these worrying i's to give way to I Am, I Wish, I Can. And suddenly, a day later, without any attempt from me, an associate came up with a years worth of funding. Out of the Blue. No solicitation.

I can't say that this is magic. I just became aware that the future is not something that is linear and effected by our negative emotions.

Hope everyone's solstice dreams are productive.

After almost 2 weeks in San Francisco I returned tired but emboldened to renew my own Search. Good to be back.

I watched as my daughter´s 6th birthday, in the soltices´ brilliant sun here in Iceland and filled with kids and games, became a flash and whirlwind of embodied enjoyment. And I realized that, in place of this enjoyment, ("Bliss" perhaps?) I have, over the years substituted a heady search for "Understanding".

And then I watched, as I sensed, that desultory revelation descend into another search, for "why" and "how" until I burst out laughing, freeing my belly and just gazed lovingly at the scene. It became for a few moments dreamlike, vivid and clear, filled with a simplicity I regularly deny myself and appear to run from. This happened freely by grounding myself to myself and away from the speculations or analyses that all too often I carry on my shoulders as some viewfinder in the events of my life. Neither past nor future existed; it was small, and gently miraculous.

Last week I complained about the Monty Pythonesque inner dialogue I've been experiencing of late. Appropriately this weeks topic deals with this madness. Ian must have read my minds. Harry calls this a disease of the future. This week I've noticed the truth of his words as usual. But... It seems quite happy to attack in the present and past. Why must I see the words, phrases, before I ponder or write them? Why must I carry on a debate before doing something. On the positive side I'm finally seeing how my long hidden emotions activate and present themselves. What an epiphany! Here's a few-just for you.

Self RighteousMess- Modonna says Christ would approve of "her manifestations". Must be a different Jesus. Grrrrr Machoegoism- I do my writing with a Bic pen. My Paper-Mate writes much better but it's thin and light blue and you know, kind of feminine. So I use the Bic. Right I mean write Please Please approve of me!.....Going for coffee the other day I caught myself rehearsing a few good openers so my friend would "like me, you know... find me cool". Gimme a break.

PanicNick..Half way through cleaning the months' accumulated mass of work around my desk I statrted to realize that it was Saturday and I would be here all day and why should I be doing this on my days off and oh, poor me, and blah-blah.

And a hundred more, most of which I probably missed.

Good is that Harry knows the story and always finds a compelling tune or mantra to devine and confront this evil. Good is the Knight of sightless gaze and soundless sound, the knowing breath and the " I Am Can" that seems to work for a least a while.

I do the daily ponder at my desk every morning. I just feel good sitting here. Yesterday while thinking about "What am I searching for" and sensing my legs, a car with a grating starter motor fired up outside. The sound of the starter produced a sharp pain in my left calf. The older car didn't start and when he tried it again the pain returned in my leg. How much our bodies must silently endure in this age of industry, sub-woofers, horns and arguments. An amazing experience.

Jose', I concluded many years ago that we learn at least as much from our children as we teach. They are a gift and a blessing. Laugh, enjoy, I envy you.

I've just installed a 2006 PCcillin virus protection program. To install it I had to deinstall my 2005 PCcillin anti virus. I am now getting a pop-up warning of an old 2005 virus alert that I can't block because I need my 2005 program to kill it. The warning pops up about every minute. Even the Mulla hisself would envy this irritant. Believe it. Any help out there? This things driving me nuts.

And.... a happy solstice to all. Now back to shuffling things around my desk!

by Zenas

Agreed. Ian saw our need.

One of the first a-maze-ments of the Work was beginning to see the maze itself of returning thoughts, past- and future-oriented, that one never realized were continuous. The sightless gaze with soundless sound takes so-o-o much work! Easy to think I accomplish it in solitary moments, experienced it this week once while sitting in a room of co-workers while at lunch, they'd been relishing little digs at vegetarians when I finished it with a reply of the m.y.o.b. type. They were so surprised I said anything, everyone was quiet. First, I saw the place of my vain irritation, then gently a moment of sightless seeing, soundless sound was experienced. Only a moment's. Then my breathing and theirs was noticeable and someone changed the subject to a news story in Florida. Such a difference in the moment with people and when solitary, akin to the difference thinking about talking to someone and then actually talking to them.

For someone blessed with usually good health, the disease of the future is something I arm-wrestle with, so many 'good' thoughts about it, haven't been able to keep an aim to sincerely struggle with it. One beginning was to get past being extremely good at quick replies to people, now many people are surprised when I reply to the daily little jabs people make to each other without realizing they said anything. I use to practice them and not even know I was. Taking Ian's suggestion about the emotional tone of each recurring thought showed a place to see their need and further want the i am behind these masks.

Hi everyone, and thanks so much for all the strong posts this week.

I was, to a degree, "trapped in the past" early in the week - part of the grief process probably - and what I read wasn't having much impact. So must admit haven't worked as effectively as usual. However, the posts allowed me to realise that this "dis-ease of the past" could be dealt with in similar fashion to the more usual "did-ease of the future", and balance has been restored somewhat.

Pondering brought out the magnitude of this topic. Seems of core importance.

On the "yes" side:
Of course I want memories, dreams and reflections. They are part of my human-ness.
They permit a bigger picture; eg; if I'm feeling sad, I remember all the other feelings which happen along mechanically (and thoughts), and so know that "This too will pass".
The treatment here for me is living in the present moment.

On the "no" side:
The emotional themes of my inner dialogues are often anxious,sad, wishing for what has passed, or being concerned about details of what is yet to come. If indulged in, this would lead to ill health (the "trap" referred to). If this happens, I am denying the present moment - having less "life", so to speak.
Treatment here is once again returning to the present moment.

I've had glimpses of something very big here.
Maybe the feelings of freedom many of the work exercises provide are partly due to being brought into the "moment".
Perhaps this is a liberation in itself: being brought back to the moment of possibility and potential and freed from some vague "area of time" - speaking dimensionally here??, or maybe just of linear time. I mean - what IS memory, really? Another whole topic...

The space dimensions definitely are less of a burden.
If I go to Sydney, I'm able to leave Cairns behind for a while. I know it is still there and functioning, but have no trouble moving forward to explore and "live" in Sydney.
Much more difficult with time.

Of course, these are simply personal ponderings.

Thanks again all, for the great posts, and happy Solstice to you too.
Judy.

The Seeker has observed that much of their habitual inner dialogue consists of reviewing the past or rehearsing for the future. Has the Seeker observed a common trait or chief feature which characterises their internal dialogues?

During those moments when they are able to observe their repetitive inner dialogue, the Seeker will bring bring an Affirming force to bear against the mechanical Denying forces by attending thricely to the raw sensations of the external world, to the raw sensations of the inner propriaceptive world and to the inner sound of a mantra or prayer such as "Po Do Bo Li Zo Va Ny" or "It is nothing - I will Be. It is nonsense - I can Do. It recedes - I Am."

Seekers may also curtail their inner chatter by Pondering - Is Life a Gift or a Responsibility?

---

by Harry

Chief feature is one of those things I've struggled with since starting this work. I'm not sure I could answer that.

As to the chief feature of that inner voice, mine is usually justification for past events and protection for future events. Armor, so to speak. And if the armor doesn't work, i get offended.

I have to ponder the positive and negative meeting each other. This is one of those things that a flag goes off in my head. Beelzebub sitting on Mars talking about their endless stupid Civil Wars. Of course that is our "selves".

---

by Jose

First thoughts:
"The Mediator". The interpreter of experience who distills what is good or bad and distributes its cousin, Understanding in exchange for Safety. A beautiful, consoling, healing, but, in the end, boring life. A daimon of moderation. The daimon of the middle child...

"I am" is the greatest threat, the arbiter who chooses when choosing means taking a place, a spot (as Castenada used to say) growing roots in places that may be "wrong" but are quintessentially one´s own.

A Great and painful exercise, Ian. Thank you.

by Greg

I am in the middle of possible new job situation where (at this point) I am the Puddy Cat and they are the Wittle Mouse ---- They Want Me. This is so difficult and this week's exercise could not be more apropos.

Difficult? Yes. That plethora of "whittling away" I's and that tendency to undercut myself.

So the I AM, this week, will be "this is my salary requirement"

What is underlying the "co-dependent" (ugly word, that, for an ugly trait) "underselling" is the arrogant position that I really shouldn't have to work for a living, that I should be "taken care of for "just existing". And it IS "just existing". One couldn't refer to it as "Being" after all --- could one?

But I WILL do it. I MUST. And it must be the "right" thing within the given context.

Am I going to let the Predator/Sociopath take charge?

I think not.

---

by Harry

Interesting. I was just talking with my son about "salary requirements" last night. He's being courted by a company. Big company. And he's evaluating his worth.

Funny thing is that at 25 he's already making more than I ever made in my life.

But worth is something else to me, right now. So much fades away. The desire for new things. As long as the bills are paid. What is my worth to myself?

I've always found that whatever "work" I'm supposed to get I eventually get. Also these things seem to be in cycles. Like 9 years, if that makes sense to anyone else.

Not much to do with this week's exercise.

Oh yes! An urging towards obliteration.

Today, walking home, it comes to me that really "being positive" (as we so cavalierly toss off) is only true in a complete state of Presence: Full Attention manifest and uncluttered. I stopped dead in my tracks and breathed that "aha" in. Below my feet, a dias, an inky "ook" (just barely perceptible) spread its circular self down over the landscape where I stood. Extending further and further out of sight I was reduced to a tiny "flame". A maroon psychic burr rubbed itself sycophantically against my right upper side and cheek. I paid the slightest of notice, not wanting to feed it in the least.

I swallowed hard, and in my mind traced the passage of the saliva while deliberately pushing it down, and continued walking, leaving this particular Past behind.

Brought attention make to the act of Walking Now as I climbed the three flights to my apartment. Upon entering the telephone is flashing a message waiting. The Wittle Mouse is begging more from the Puddy Cat and adds a stroke below the chin. I tell myself its an event in which I can practice playing a role, but . . .

I-yi-yi!!!!! Yikes.

Still believe chief negative feature is impatience, but the dialogue Kahuna seems to be rationalization in the past acceptance in the future. I've been watching certain "I,s pop up whenever I preview the indescretions, read, lies cheating, self indulgence pretty much the entire spectrum. Been subliminally closeting these monstrosities for years avoiding the pain and self disgust until I logged on this site. Being able to go back in time within an Ark of non-identification, and rowing through the many identifications and mistakes is possible only when I observe non judgementally. Thus I'm able to forgive some of my worse manifestations and face others deeper and better concealed such as the war with my father. The fact that I'm dragging these corpses out of the closet is for me at least an act of conscious suffering on several levels. The future at this time is filled with hope unfortunately the playright projects the sincere hope in terms of social,intellectual and material aggrandizements having nothing whatsoever to do with my real aim which is to grow without expectation or conditions.I can frequently turn off the inner debate through affirmations and sensing exercises. But when I'm fatigue the "I" that I call the RADIO{t} turns on my suppressed mind with an endless variety of jingles, tunes a few bars of this and that .Will anyone out there help me turn this damn thing off? Speaking of which, I m off to the rockies tomorrow at 6:00 A.M. sharp. Bringing much material gleaned from site information. I may even find some time to fish. Assalam u a"laikum to all. Peace Lawrick

Harry,

I just wanted to say that it always gives me a good feeling about our Work here when you and I (yet again!) reach that point of synchronicity.

It indicates (for me) that the Work really works.

Evaluating one's worth. What a fantasyic concept, and yet great. Usually we each just imagine our lives away; to actually think about our "worth" to something else(a job/career) seems a real start toward remembering oneself. What is my worth after 5-years, or 20-, at a place? Particularly now that Corporate Think is "cheaper is just as good." What is my responsibility to be more than when I started? Such a good concept here presented, evaluating one's worth. Because I so often do not remember the week's goad, I've given myself the aim each day of coming to this site to re-read and ponder the week's exercise.
Harry: I struggle with periodicity regularly (repeating myself?) It may be part of our type. With insight, it can aid building on new levels; I study and re-study the books of the Work and see anew things I thought were known. You're on a longer cycle, mine is about 5 to 7 years.
Zenie once told a 'teacher' who tried to tell her what her chief feature was that he was lost in space. He didn't say 'vanity' so she still disagrees with him. From watching other people, I certainly see G's comment that if we were told our chief feature we'd never believe; from listening to inner dialogue and watching my body movement, Zenie's emotional may be deceptive to the world, she's just not the humble person she'd like everyone to believe.

Hi Lawrick,
Here's what I do.

Select passage you wish to quote from post.
Right-click on "copy".
Click "Post reply" at bottom of post page. This brings you to here.

Then, here above, click "Quote", then right-click on "Paste", then "Quote" again.

Test by clicking "Preview" down the bottom here.

That's it...
Of course, there may be a simpler way.
Best wishes,
Judy.

Work Program week beginning 3 July 2006

Try to be aware of your breathing for 5 minutes of every waking hour. As you sense the rise and fall of your breathing, use a panoramic sightless gaze to take in the impression of your whole visual field. Let your breathing lead your emotions towards a neutral state.

As you walk, sense the hands and feet. Visualize them as glowing blobs of warm light.

Use the unpleasant manifestations of others as a reminder to practice impartial tolerance and to remember your death. Ponder - What is the source of my intolerance?

On a hot summer day, ponder Gurdjieff's assertion that the sun neither lights nor heats. Are light and heat part of the Trogoautoegocratic process?

---

by layne

Some miscellaneous comments from a newby...

(1) Visualization isn't something I'm very good at. My memory, and the types of impressions I'm able to conjure, is more aural and tactile than visual. I was still able to conjure the glowing blobs to some degree, but I think it was a more tactile than visual blob. It was an extension of the sensing experienced. Also, I found it easier to "visualize" the light blobs in my hands than my feet. Perhaps because the hands move freely while walking whereas the feet bear one's weight. My impression is that this aspect of the program is much less important than the others, but I thought to offer this anyway to see what it may evoke.

(2) Here the people have the rudest moving centers. When they walk they aggressively cut each other off like hasty drivers although doing so doesn't gain them anything. It's a frequent source of irritation for me. Anyway, what I found interesting was that today I actually sought out and welcomed this irritation I usually try to avoid.

(3) I think I understand what Gurdjieff means by "trogoautoegocratic," but it might be useful if someone cares to elaborate.

Thanks...

5 minutes an hour sounded so simple, then there was being able to take 5 minutes an hour particularly because I can't use a timer or such at day-work. My solution was to set the timer on my cell phone so when I turn the light on to see the screen it turns on the screen monitor after 5 minutes, quietly. After a few times there seemed an internal clock - like waking up at the same time as usual only this was/is going back to sleep as usual.

---

by Harry

To our two new workers,

Don't make difficulties for yourself.

Can't visualize? Then sense. Try to visualize. Just do it. And see what happens. Can't take five minutes. Well start. If the time lasts three seconds then you have three seconds you didn't have before. And next time it will be five seconds. Then a minute. You don't need a clock or an egg timer. You're already a complicated machine.

I did not yet do the exercise every our.
I did the exercise during a break of one of my jobs;i was outside on the street.
I noticed that short after starting the exercise everything moving around me was nothing than an event.
The experience of observing neutral events where normally all kinds of (associative)thoughts would react.
Also the feeling that whatever event would occur, it would not effect my inner observing presence.
The breathing as part of the exercise was slowing down and became a movement larger or greater than fysical breathing.
It expanded beyond the fysical body.

The source of my intollerance seems to come from my vanity and self-conceit as part of my false personality, which seems to be point 3 of the enneagram.(fresh observation)
"The Pretender" does not want to aknowledge events that are f.i. imperfect or not harmonious, or not serving his own "imago"
It intervenes with its self-image and is threatening the illusionary I, that stands above all.
It threatens also to break the barriere between the Pretender- as protector of "imperfect" and authentic feelings and needs- and the underlaying "world"
In my intollerance sentences sound like:You do not see me or hear me, this is not right(full),you are not respecting me etc

by Istvan

In the years that i am meditating i often wondered why the quality and feeling changed rapidly when giving attention to my hands and feet.
It is a feeling of everything in the body becoming more alive and flowing, glowing.
Could it be that the attention has to penetrate through the whole of the body, and that the experiental difference lies in the fact that i am often meditating while focusing or puting the attention in one aspect, f.i. the movement of breathing?
That feels more limited and not covering the (potential) experience of one-ness which seems to be more present with glowing hands and feet.

I just want to say one thing about the "sun neither lights nor heats". Consider an automobile parked in the sun. If the sun heated, then the inside of the car wouldn't be hotter than the outside. Consider space.

There has to be a reaction.

Or is that too much information?

---

The exercises are suggestions; simply do what you can with them.

They help to train and move the focus of attention, sometimes narrow, sometimes wide. Many exercises are suggested. Use the ones that help you or challenge you.

As I promised both Ian and my"self", I would post up every week as a Work Exercise. Frankly I'd rather be fishing right now!!! Reminds me of awise old fly fisherman who once pointed out that there is a distinct difference between fishing and "catching". The fisherman NEVER leaves the stream disappointed.

The breathing exercise was a true revelation to me this week. I found days where I remembered to breath hourly several times and for whatever reason the breathing was longer, deeper, more relaxing, and provided me with much greater energy. The other days when I remembered to breath but a few times I was generally wrapped up in the sleep of my identifications. Keep trying to solve the mystery of Mr. Sun and Light, but every revation brings a larger range of possibilities, and no Mr. Hroedoer for me at least you did not provide too much information.

As to the unpleasant manifestations of others I got into it real good with the president of our mountain camping community. He's a typical Marshall type with all the energy, persistence, fire and destructivenessof his type. A man who feeds on confrontation and in losing myself I fell right into the comfort zone that feeds his beligerance. An argument about nothing, the tossing and turning of two fools blisfully asleep ranting and raving about dreams. Idiots upon Idiots. But I learned a great deal later while pondering on this emotionally destructive "I" and he'll {read heal} need to be much better to decompose me next time. On the other hand, can you consciously pop a guy in the yap?

I had another epiphany in church this morning. Two university students scheduled to be married in December have asked me to attend church with them, initially because they thought me a candidate for conversion, but now simply because we enjoy each others company. And notwithstanding my presence, the church remains standing. They are remarkable because after living together for years they found a spiritual experience in Christianity and for the last year and until they are married in December they are being celebate. Holy Denying Force Batman. I give them great respect because it is something I could never do.

While doing the breathing exercise and sightless gaze in church and listening to the inspiring beautiful harmonies of their little choir, I felt a powerful force welling up in my chest and began to cry like a baby and nothing I did could stop it. So much for not getting in touch with my emotions..... and it subsequently happened two or three more times. Powerful uncontrollable. And while staring at the empty cross I felt humbled, undeserving, unworthy to be granted such indescibable gratitude given the way I've lived my life. It was as if possessed by something beyond my control leading guiding. I wonder if this is the real Remorse of Conscience the work describes. Comments?

While doing the morning ponder on love and levels I began to think of what I would say to these two young friends during a planned discussion over coffee tomorrow night. Without thinking I picked up Bennett's Gurdjieff Making a new world. I flipped it open to page 144. Page 144 deals with being" able to be"a Christian. What are the odds?. I then grabbed Beelzebub and randomly selected page 206 which discusses the effects of fasting and diet on Christianity. Again, what are the odds? Is it possible that under certain conditions we are directed by higher forces. I'm just now learning to trust these "events" as having a reality all their own. Something wants these two university students to hear these passages. God I hope I'm not wrong about this. I cannot describe this coincidence. Guardian Angels? Fate? I would love to recieve some input on this one. And to top off this series of sycronous events, I yesterday described a Moody Blues tune Watching and Waiting to Greg, and today found in Making a New World the Sufis describe a meditatation technique Muraqaba called Waiting and Watching.

12 cans in a case of beer...12 months in a year...Coincidence?

Flat Tires! The compound in which I keep my trailer is located about 90 kilometers from a Town called Rocky Mountain House, the only place where a tire may be repaired. Last Saturday,July Ist. Canada's Birthday. I walked outside my trailer to find my right rear tire had been screwed ,literally, by a 3 inch wood screw. I had to replace it with the smaller "donut" tire and drive the 90 kilometers at about 70 kilometers per hour. A long drive.....Not! I spent this drive repeating passages from the Qur'an and Holy Affirming Prayer sensing bones, joints, centres and arrived in a beautioful relaxed state. Good thing because only one tire store was open and nearing closing time. The service counter was like an out of control zoo but in this wonderful calm state I watched myself as a fussy, figiting, impatient, mercurical type almost jumping over the counter. I saw my similitude as a large bullying man hopelessly demanding the attention of the two tired and stressed out woman trying to handle the last minute rush by themselves and no doubt dreaming of a cold beer, marguarita and home. The temperature was 33 degrees celsius that day. And there were others all demanding service before the store closed. And for about 7 minutes I watched and calmly waited. When at last my turn arrived the service manager blissfully thanked me for my forbearance and when told about my flat tire regretfully advised me there was no one left in the service area who could repair a tire. Ouch! However the other servicewoman who had also made note of my patience said she would happily repair the tire if I would mount it on the car and happily left all the other work orders on the counter to help me. Why? Perhaps the same reason all the women want to talk to Harry? I looked in the mirror... still as ugly as ever, so something else was going on. What? Comments? And to top it off they wouldn't charge me anything notwithstand my protests to the contrary. I went back to the service desk and slipped the manager twenty bucks and I hope the two of them enjoyed a few cold drinks after work. they earned it. Perhaps this inner work somehow tangibally relates to our outer experience as well????

And that was the week that was. Work done. Miller time! If you've stayed with me this long, have one yourself. What a great place to BE!

Thanks, Ian, your last post pulled together a few things for me. One reason working with others is so much more important than pretending to work by myself is it tweaks the little vanities and irritations Zenie never sees nor feels on her lofty meditation pillow. Trying to remember Mr. G's admonition about not judging others in the work is a regular "count 10, then 20" for me. Over the years, I've found I prefer the people in the work because though their machines squeak sometimes at least they're trying to re-tool. Others' elaborations show me things my i.s don't ask.

And your slightly different 60-point is excellent for keeping it fresh and "difficult" to learn anew.

This part of the exercise brought two sensory experiences for me.

The first, long stretches of being able to feel my emotional body as distinct from my planetary body. It felt slightly (Very slightly) larger than my planetary body and it would swing slightly back behind planetary body in (physical) quick movements forward, only to swing back in alignment again. This was a repeatable experiences for about 5 days running. My Attention would initiate it.

The second (as a result [?] and in tandem with the first), a deeper awareness of the eyeballs moving and operating in the socket areas. Accompanying, was an acute awareness of the fragility of the "sight process". This was a little scary for me and I didn't want to be "there" for long. Almost, too much information. But, I stayed with it (and my fear) long enough to gain new Insight.

Sure, pun ("Insight") intended --- why not?

While walking, assimilate the impressions from the soles of your feet. Sense their reverberation in the skull.

Receive criticism with grace.

Let remorse of conscience simmer for a while.

Imagine you are a turtle and let the flood of impressions wash over you.

> Imagine you are a turtle and let the flood of impressions wash over you.

A brief comment on this wondrous little exercise:
I tried this several times this week already, and it has fast become a favourite.
In a situation at an office admin meeting, it was most appropriate, and somehow connected to another exercise for this week, in that, because I was "doing a turtle", , I apparently did receive some criticism with grace.

Effective separation from the organism (in this case, the turtle) happened here of its own accord several times. This brought about the familiar self-observation state. Other times I simply "was" the turtle, with the brilliantly clear aqua water of the Great Barrier Reef washing over me. Lovely.

Thank you, Ian, for this gem.
Judy.

P.S. Greg, what an amazing experience (the one with the emotional body) you have been kind enough to share with us in a post of yesterday.

Also, thanks for the two other very interesting and informative posts. What a wealth of knowledge!

. . . and, Judy, it was the most natural experience in the world in the experience of it. It just required a little "push" on my part. The accretion of the experiences brought by these weekly exercises has helped to experience so much more.

Where would I be without Ian's gracious gift to us here. Even if I got to those places on my own, it's a bit worthless to have no one to relay it to.

I really very strongly believe --- no, I KNOW ---- that when we talk like this, we help each other with a little supportive nudge up the ladder.

> While walking, assimilate the impressions from the soles of your feet. Sense their reverberation in the skull.

As I've mentioned recently, I've been putting some effort into trying to distinguish between sensations, thoughts, and emotions. (Not so damn simple afterall!) As I have been doing this exercise this week (when I remember, and keeping a reminding piece of paper in my pocket helps), it dawned on me that my mind does not readily label sensations. In other words, there is no word that pops into my head when I sense the impressions from the soles of my feet. That changes, of course, if I step on a nail, or stub my toe. We all can imagine the words that flood my mind then, I'm sure.

We in the U.S.A. are part of the Turtle; this was first "Turtle Island." Our turtles are extremely various. This walking exercise was both physical and intellectual for me: Zenas can tolerate most any temperature variations unless the hands and feet are cold and notices where a room's vents are when noone else would think about it. Reverberations to the skull didn't by-pass the body so, the pound of the earth line was almost visual at moments. It gave one totally unexpected realization, that i don't always 'hear' with just my ears, reverberations come through in many places.

Criticism with grace didn't go so well. Remembering the exercise did, though, help receive it without verbally answering.

High up on a ladder this whole week (I am writing this on the 25th, recalling my use of the exercises) painting the house outside and in, every time I climbed I tried to sense these reverberations. Not a pleasant experience! The ladder extends high up, the roofs are well over 20 feet up and Iceland is windy, even on sunny days. The soles of my feet keep me alive. Literally. The skull is nearly pressed to the walls while my arms extend above me with an extended roller. I am terrified. I am alive. I wished to retreat into my turtle shell and escape the withering criticism of this tiny error, this small spill. I let it wash me but the emotions get soaked too. A tough week.

Greg,
Come visit me in Western Canada in say..... mid- January. I guarantee your mind will be taken off both the heat and the color green{our primary blend of color} at that time of year is WHITE,WHITE and don't forget frost White. Did I mention White?

My observation this week is the number of bright eyed University students rushing hither and yon in their stressful bliss. There is an impression of a fulfilling directed intelligence and yet the reality.... It's difficult to remain non- judgemental, everything seems upside down!

Judy.... the sun within. The Gnostic Solar Gold. Even in my limitations I sense a glitter from your word.

The sun neither lights nor heats The Emanations must react? But where is the light? I don't seem to sense light as a reaction or am I overly complicating things if that is posssible. Is light a prime source emanation? .. He went fishing for answers in the stream{of electrons}.

Greg, your experience truly amazes. Thanks for sharing.

Finally, I do not like eating in the morning. This week I've noticed that this work, the exercises and pondering, demands I must fill up the tank more frequently, although in trying to eat consciously I'm getting much better mileage.

Not watching much T.V. anymore. The soap opera called my "I's" more demanding.

Good to be back home!

Funny. I have little purple flowers blooming on the balcony. And a blue jay just landed there this morning. A female blue jay. They are less colorful. My impression was that this bird was a being. I recognized its beingness.

A month or so back I had a Mississippi Kite land there. (I only know what it was because I had to search for it. It was that much of a shocking impression to see this hawk/eagle being sitting at my living room door.)

A crow has been calling in the mornings. This is different. I'm used to morning doves. And the chatter of small birds. But when a crow crows somehow the chatter is less.

The impression of hot and cold is interesting. As I'm working at my computer these days I don't have to experience the outdoors.

Impressions are taken in by the entire body. Or the entire being. Impressions come that we may not see the source of. In fact, I think that's the problem we perceive with hot and cold. Because those sensations are overpowering they drown out the other subtle impressions that we're used to perceiving.

Heat is the reaction of an energy. Cold is, I think, the converse. The absence of that energetic reaction. So our own energy is pulled out into the cold. Light and life. Because life comes from a certain amount of light. Save those blind fish at the bottom of caves. But are they a different level of life.

Do people who enjoy the heat have a lack of personal energy? Hmm. Digesting that one.

First thought was that I really wasn't sure how best to attempt this, so tried a few different modalities.
viz;1. sightless gaze, soundless sound
2. Using self-observation mode at point of impressions reaching the organism.
3. Attending to the impressions themselves; a sort of sensing/reverse sensing happened here.
All modes worked to some degree.
The second seemed to be best for digestion and assimilation, but involuntary categorising crept in a bit. The huge number of normally unnoticed impressions was quite startling, and brought a feeling of awe and wonder.
The first was more amorphous, little categorisation, but not sure about the quality of digestion.
The third was merely of interest as fingers and toes seemed to become sensitised without first putting attention on them (attention placed on the impressions, at point of contact though, so maybe just a sensing variation, now I come to type it out.)

So, Ian, and everyone, is there a preferred technique or method here?
For example, into which category of Work exercises would this usually be placed?
I don't wish to complicate, but rather to ask how best to attempt this. It seems of some importance, this assimilating, savouring, digesting deeply and finely - as regards the "food" aspect of impressions.

Best wishes,
Judy.

Hello,

You're probably already aware of that one. There's much fruitful pondering material there.
Best wishes,

Judy, the similarities in yours and my methods for approaching the exercises often causes me to stop and ponder. I followed a similar course with this week's exercise.

I also initially react with a "why?" with each exercise. "What is this designed to accomplish?" My intellect wants to understand before attempting a task. "What does it mean?" is a recurring thought with every new exercise. And "How can I do this if I don't even know what the result is supposed to be?"

In pondering on my reactions, I recalled an experience with a math teacher I had in college. He would purposely start by giving us very little instruction on how to do some new form of mathematics. He would then give us some problems and say: "Do them!" Perplexed, I often said: "But I don't know how!" He said: "just pick up your pencil and start." "Start what? I don't know what to do! "Just go. Do something!" was his usual reply.

I eventually got tired of fighting him, picked up my pencil and began writing. When I did so, to my astonishment, the "Way" to do the problems began to come to me. I learned not to fight that teacher so much as the course continued.

With that said, what in the hell am I supposed to get out of this Ian?

Judy and James,

In an AIRY SENSE: I sit and relax to the point of "dematerialising" (emotionally terrifying, sometimes)

I am then able to pull-in the impression and have its atoms mix with the atoms of my "Radioactivity". Of course, I only "let-in" what I am comfortable with. And to a level I am comfortable with.

IN A WATERY SENSE: Think of your body as a sponge absorbing impressions as water.

Is this clear? or clear as mud? Let me know.

---

by Greg

I should add that in the AIRY proceedure, the ENTIRE ORGANISM inhales and holds the impression towards "center".

This is why relationship with planetary body is so crucial to this Work.

Ian, please, correct any of this if you think it wrongly directed.

Hi Greg,
Thank you so much for that valuable "wake-up" call.
I was tied-up in left-brain diagnosis.
How on earth can I hope for balance when sometimes I leave the whole beauty and potential of the right-brain untapped from time to time? That's the question.
The answer today is that by sharing my various left-brain theories, a kind and caring seeker with developed right-brain (you) gives a gentle reminder.

I have no trouble with belief here.
I know "turtles" and "sponges" work.
Why else would I say the "I am" (mentally of course - ha!) in the dentist's chair to evoke a little Self-remembering?
And how many times has the simple use of the suggestion "Float not fight" be seen to work for patients with agarophobia or depression?

So for the past hour I've been experimenting with airy, watery - and fiery and earthy too, and yes, much clearer results with savouring and intensifying some impressions.

James, maybe you and I have both had many years of training the intellect?? Yes, I identify with many of your posts too.

Looks like back to BT on a regular basis for a while for me. That always brings in some balance, and then I don't neglect the originality and creativity aspects of our exercises.

Also, I'm currently re-reading Proust - and guess which volume? "In Search of Lost Time."
Why am I not surprised?
Cheers,
Judy.

Preach sister. I'll give a hearty amen to that! I was so strung out at one point on the "intellectual" path to truth that systematic theology was a "hobby" I delved into for fun when I wasn't pursuing some degree or diploma at a university. I refer to that all now as my trip to the Land of Oz. The curtain fell and behind it was a little man pulling strings.

Ian wrote: Savour your impressions-Let them linger

What a week!
Greg, thanks regarding the arch absurd. I'll contact Ian after this post.

All my impressions were colored this week by an ongoing feud with the President of our Mountain Association. He wants to relocate some tenants and replace them with friends of his. I've decided to make it my business, a decision that could not be taken lightly because it will either result in my expulsion or the removal of the President who might be described euphemistically as..... Stalinesque.... on a good day. Absolute power corrupts.... Either way it's war. My point is the negative connotations of this disagreeable situation have cast a dull hue over all my impressions this week not to mention the anger and frustration I,ve tried to Affirm below the surface. This week it hasn't worked well and my joyous approach to the Work has vanished in a haze of impatience and irritability. I'm not even paying attention to the stop exercise which is unforgivable. It's amazing how negative emotions can lock the other centres outside the doors of perception. On the other hand with respect to my decision I know I'm doing the right thing.

Birds....My sister has an highly developed intuitive centre. She has absolutely no interest in intellectualism{although she's extremely intelligent} nor philosophy, religion, the occult, etc. She has perhaps the most beautifully tended flower garden in the city. From her I've discovered that every " green thumb" is coverred in callouses. Paradise!
She once told me that her "Holy Grail" as it were, was to make the world's best compost! The power of an Aim. She lives and richly experiences life and to hell with the intellectuals or conceptualists. Surprisingly and with only a grade 12 education, she managed the Department of Anthropology at the University of Alberta for 30 years and is still highly respected and loved by all there. Last month while having coffee she told me that everything was vibration! When I told her how profound I thought her remark was and asked how she knew, she merely replied that she knew and that was that! If G. himself were to contradict her I wouldn't believe him so powerful are her insights. The point being that when I mentioned that a Robin was gleefully pecking away beside me the last time I was in the mountains{Robins are normally very cautious around people} she said birds bring good luck! Why I asked. Again, and because she senses things I can't fathom, she merely replied,"they do." And I have absolute faith in her insight. I think of Harry's kite and Casteneda's ravens. the Egyptian vulture. Time to buy a lotto ticket although I doubt that's what she meant.

Eternal recurrence. The death of Osiris and birth from the Scarab. Isis and Horus, Madonna and Christ. The Holy Denying Principle dying that materiality might come into existence over and over. I'm not sure how the absolute manages His gardens. Good intellectual fodder I suppose.

Before I joined this group and began doing the Work on a practical basis I despised the process of "mass reciprocal destruction" again the best definition of the insanity called War I've ever known, but only on an intellectual level. This week with the mass stupidity glowing once again in the middle east I am experiencing an emotional horror, a sickening sense of helplessness hammering through my chest and heart. A terrible, terrible, remorse for the beings, the babies and bodies destroyed on both sides of this madness. I now Hate War with all my being and it is not a kind feeling. It hurts. My eyes are tearing up as I write this. The earth demanding the Sacred Askokin gives no relief to my being.

This week from time to time I've been experiencing the outdoors as 3 dimensional fields, trees, buildings, objects, standing alone unique within my view shimmering. I wish I could see myself like that.

Great eats from the online diner this week! Thanks for the grub. Lawrick

The following is loosely related to exercises and discussions covered in the last two weeks and doesn't have anything to do with this week's exercise. Thanks for the indulgence.

*G.*_____

Writing this down late 7/19/06 (to be transcribed to ES on weekend) Nearly a week's worth of recapitulation has come to a head ---- I hope I have it all.

I spend Friday nights with a social group which manifested in my life 6 months after entering ES. Not given to this sort of thing, I forced myself to "hang out". It has since become a group as important to me in my public life as ES is to my private one. While I never equate the 2, reverberations and echoes of exercises, discussions, and proceedings of ES often "play out" in related (though less serious form) amongst these friends.

We meet for dinner occasionally and then broadcast a radio program between the hours of 9:00pm-1:00am. Content centers around all kinds of music (mostly retro and avante-garde) and a stream-of-consciousness discussion. Wide age range. Always lively and convivial. A real "gift" in my Ordinary Life.

Last Friday (7/14/06), after the show wrapped up, a member of the group relayed a shocking story riddled with gross fabrications, hurtful statements, and blatant falsifications. It was rather adamantly delivered as "case-closed" truth in answer to a casual statement made during the course of the show. To say it was "inappropriate" is an understatement.

Two things were not known by the teller of the tale:
1) that the story's content unjustly "hurt" 2 people present AND
2) that I had been present at the event being described (unlike the teller of the tale)

As the story was being told I caught the crestfallen look on the faces of the two people being hurt. I also recognized how much these 2 would have to put on the line to challenge the story ---- an unwise move on their parts: their privacy had to be protected at all costs. The story had also directed a few “slings and arrows” in my direction, but having much less to lose I decided to move in towards the situation with a corrective.

As the teller finished his tale, and while holding a lit Match of Transubstantiation to reactive behavior pushing forth in my emotional body, I listened keenly to every word. Each word became a “thing” and “object” to wrap my attention around. I sent my Observing Self straight across the room to stand behind the 2 Unfortunates while maintaining physical eye contact with them conveying a deliberate mask of “Yes-I-know-what-you’re-feeling-and-I-am-sorry”. Watching my physical body from my point of observation behind these two, I saw 1st body submit to the mental command to loosen and place itself in a non-threatening seated position on a stool. As the story “wound down” I inwardly uttered 3 definite “I AM”s and finished with an inner smile. All bodies aligned (relatively) and my Observing Self watched as the story came to an end.

With deliberately acted sincerity, I began: “Well, that is so interesting . . . you know, I was actually there and I witnessed something somewhat different . . .” After all those present agreed that I should speak, “surgery” proceeded. The initial words had rolled out like summer thunder. I now began to cut like summer lightening, backing up each statement with a softening and withering summer humidity. I took care to not once attack the messenger --- it was the lie at the center of his story I was after. I “cut out a piece of the lie” and I replaced it the corresponding piece of the truth. Piece by piece and on and on it went for the next hour and a half. My “social acceptability” (another consciousness acting job on my part), hung like a plucked and marinated duck in a Chinese grocer’s window. I never got argumentative (though my invisible indignance was supplying plenty of fuel for my Furnace Fire): I returned again and again to being Reasonable. The whole thing became Reasoned out and the truth was thorough this process moved to dead center.

By surgery’s end everything had come-out “all right”. My friends’ anonymous pain had been appreciably lessened. The six non-involved witnesses to this event exhaled a kind of “well it really wasn’t all that after all”. More importantly, the teller of the tale had seen how the continued passing of his version of the story would increase the security of a few at the expense of the majority. Even if my newly-told version could not be anymore proven than his, it was conceded that everyone had something to gain, even if that gain wasn’t in equitable amounts to each.

The situation (mostly) resolved and the night already very late, we embraced all around, as is our custom, and my “contender” and myself gave each other an extra-hug and pat on the back and assured each other everything was “all right”.

As I reeled Observing Self back “in” I discretely scraped the lingering porridge of atmospheric “unresolved feelings” into a “plate” and took it home to be placed on the altar of things “beyond my capacity and control.”

Returning home, I was unprepared for a sudden internal energetic “uprush” as I bolted the door. I returned to an intense observing state. For the rest of the night and on past daybreak a marvelous whit heat roared throught my torso. I pulled out ISOTM and carefully and deliberately read pages 40-44 dlighting in and savouring new Understandings. Something permanent and damage-free had blazed straight through this Perilous Night. In the words of DH Lawrence: “Look! We have come Through!”

CODA
7/15/06. After a three-hour nap, a twitch below the navel directs me straight to my favorite bookstore. It is a large Ali Baba’s Cave smelling of old paper, glue, dank concrete, and steel girder’s --- the dumping ground for thousands of used books.

Finding myself in ANCIENT ART AND ARCHEOLOGY I pick up a large coffee-table sized book titled something like THE ARTS OF RAMESES AND ABU SIMBEL. Throughout, in a highly expressive, idiosyncratic “hand”(what used to be termed “unschooled” and the kind of thing I love!) a rather perturbed “annotator” argued point-by-point with the learned, but rather dry and sterile academic text. In page after page of extremely personal esoteric comprehension, the writer struggled with great pain to put forth what he Understood.

On the inside of the back cover the “hand” concluded: Property of Mr.XXX, (Address) and in a clearly declamatory, albeit strangely-situated-on-the-page surface calligraphy:

I AM WHO I AM. I WILL BE WHO I WILL BE.

Good metaphor, this one.

And one that I must have used in similar vein. Suggestion given by a mentor then was;

" Yes. You start with a few trees. Get to know them the way a cow knows its' calf. Nourish them patiently. Then they will propagate (you know, the acorns fall, etc.) In this work, you grow your own forest; otherwise the connections will be missed."

All the best,

In moments when your patience wears thin, endure a little longer with a super effort comprising of a sub-vocal repetition of a phrase such as "All things must pass", with an inner smile and while Sensing your four limbs.

Eat with full attention to sound, taste and smell impressions. After eating, spend a few minutes breathing consciously.

In the evening, relax three centers and gaze at a candle or fire. Ponder - "Does the candle/fire light and heat?"

> In the evening, relax three centers and gaze at a candle or fire. Ponder - "Does the candle/fire light and heat?"

Many impressions from this. Most cannot be articulated and probably are best left "there".

On the brink, several times, of seeing this point as the illuminator of a pervasive light and heat that exists in the matter of our atmosphere.

---

by Greg

Last night, early during the radio show I've mentioned before, a heated discussion began centered around the current "world situation". And it went on and on and on . . .

> In moments when your patience wears thin, endure a little longer with a super effort comprising of a sub-vocal repetition of a phrase such as "All things must pass", with an inner smile and while Sensing your four limbs.

Using the discussion's commencement as an alarm clock I placed myself immediately within the above-stated territory. I stayed there for the next four hours of the show illuminating my forearms and my lower legs. Once in a while, I got up with one of the women there and danced during the musical interludes. (This is always a part of my contribution to the show) Keeping something of the hippie flame alive, the dancing is always along the lines of fluid pelvic-impulsed, undulating, "psychedelia". My partner and I smiled sweetly at each other as we danced "in love" for each other. A pervasive calm settled momentarily in the room. Music set over, we return to our respective "corners" and the discussion begins again.

Nothing wears my patience thinner than talking politics and talking World Situations.

At shows end, and during sign-offs, it is acknowledged that while a lot of heat was generated nothing came of any of it. The listening audience is told (by one announcer) that it is a shame they don't have viewing capabilities because they are missing Greg's "peace-keeping" activities manifested through his dancing. It is announced that I should be sent to the Middle East to put a "stop" to the swarming beehive through the example of my movements, that more is done through them, then all the discussion in the World.

Having been low-key all night I am a bit shocked by this. The inner smile shines and Greg says nothing other than a short inclining of his head in a suprised "thank you and you're welcome"

---

by Greg

Fred,

Your explication of the "types" has bored in deep this week. You are right in your suggestion that I might be coming too much from the Gnostic rather than the Work viewpoint on that.

Thank you for your story about the Solar Type girl-woman in your life. There have been three in my life (each at different "periods") and thery are as you say "Rare".

Pondering on this brought me into another of impressions regarding "The Sun that neither Lights nor heats" . . . something along the line of "The Loves that neither dies nor lives". That's not it exactly, but it implies a direction.

Greg

by James F

> In the evening, relax three centers and gaze at a candle or fire. Ponder - "Does the candle/fire light and heat?"

On the assumption that the question is more important than answers, I made an effort to simply hold this question in mind and discard or ignore all labels and theories, while gazing at a candle. My usual inclination has been to find formatory answers to these types of questions.

I sat down and began relaxing my muscles. when they seemed sufficiently relaxed, I observed my breathing. Then I began repeating the question in my mind while gazing at the flame of a candle. I found myself drifting away from the question, however, and onto a more familiar phrase I generally use while trying to enter/maintain a three-centered relaxed state such as: "I am here now," or "I wish to remember myself," or simply "relax."

Greg, thanks for sharing your experience at the radio station. Very practical, insightful.

James

---

by Greg

My mind has been on my dancing of the other night and how it was "defined for me". That always strikes me as "funny" ("odd").

I get up and move these days, when I can, to move the "chi" around. After a long work week there are plenty of blocks.

One of the sad things for me in growing up was how many societal issues there were in the notion of "guy's dancing". I will be eternally grateful to 1960s counter-culture for creating a viable social context for guys like myself.

I really cleaved to Gurdjieff's Teaching because of his Movements. The ideas were all intriguing but it was the notion that the planetary body was not excised from the proceedings.

Dancing is the language I speak best, and it's the language I speakat my Best. It is the Place Beyond Words --- reached by going deeper towards center (The Inner Circle of Humanity?)

It is also the most direct sacred activity I know.

So, in this radio group, two men have come forth within the last two years and made a committment weekly to dance during the music sets. Neither of them ever danced in their lives before. They never thought they "could".

And, in a really rather wonderful way this has all become as much a part of the show, as the actual broadcasting has. My Work efforts towards bringing my presence forth in appropriate circumstances seems to have opened a door. As I change --- things around me change.

Now, being a part of that "Peacemaking process" is something I don't mind in the least.

by Judy

> In the evening, relax three centers and gaze at a candle or fire. Ponder - "Does the candle/fire light and heat?"

This part of the current exercise is a familiar one from time spent on another "way" (A.M.O.R.C.) earlier in life. It has always been quite powerful.
Something extra seemed to be hinted at this time though. Relaxing the three centres, then gently holding the question within, resulted in not in any answers from the intellect, but rather in seeing (experiencing) something beyond the words; a glimse of "noumena" behind the phenomena, so to speak, where the act of being open-minded to the question permitted a shaking-up of a held assumption, a kind of loosening perhaps. So feelings quite altered in connection with the topic, and intellectual centre began some "thinking in form". There was a clear state of self-observation here for a while. Hard to describe: reminded of a quote of Einstein's: something along the lines of;

"I felt like a small boy at the seashore, paddling on the edge, while the whole ocean of truth lay before me undiscovered".

The other unusual effect was that my feeling about myself momentarily altered significantly. A clear temporary loosening of the bonds to the personality, a true passivity.

Getting to really love this pondering.
Thanks for this one, Ian.

Judy.

All things certainly pass...This week as I continued the Zen of house painting (thank you over and over again Harry) every bit of my patience wore thin and when it did I tried, boy did I try, to get theat inner smile going. It sometimes worked. When it didnt i repeated its inevitable passing. That helped. When it did work, it all moved fluidly, almost effortlessly.

Eating this way made the meals that much more sensitive occasions to "savor" the Time I have. Breathing is amazing, I thought, and I do it constantly. Very nice. Candles were rarer but "light" and "heat" are both as much in me. A story I once read:

In the highlands of Tibet a teacher and several students were on horseback. A set of prayers flags fluttered. The teacher asked, "What is it that moves?"
Student one, "It is the flag that moves."
Student two, "It is the wind that moves."
The teacher then looks to student three. "Well?"
"It is the mind that moves", says student three.
The teacher smiles.

Choreograph a personal, three centered, dance/movement/ritual to greet the morning sun, noonday sun and evening sun.

Take a little time each day to compile an inventory of your "personal holy denying sufferings". Sense both hands as you write the list.

Perceiving the suffering arising from our connection to a living universe, and suspecting that creative enduring of the suffering may enhance conscience, apply the Heptachord of Suffering to daily encounters with suffering. For example, starting from:

1. observing and naming a personal holy denying suffering, followed by
2. a holy affirming of the energy spent in the suffering, resulting in
3. a holy reconciled "impartiality", making it possible to
4. curb the suffering's manifestation, then diverting the energy saved
5. to the expression (affirming) of a companion chacteristic such as joy, followed by
6. a savouring of a transubstantiated comprehension between the suffering and its companion, leading to
7. a coating on an inner-being embryo often surfacing as a calm, quite inner state.

Ah..
So we're all into the dancing this week, Ian.

Greg, I've loved your posts about the dancing. Last Saturday watched an Australian film "Ten Canoes", which had its own moving snippets of what looked like 3-centred dancing. It made a big impact on me. Beautiful.

And Jose, I know exactly what you mean about "impossible task". I too am house-fixing and repainting. Also, visited Mossman Gorge last week, and crossed a long, high "swing-bridge". Pretty scary, but fun. I was reminded of your high ladder in the wind when looking down 200 feet at the wild waters of the gorge; walking afterwards was like having been to sea.

Boy, the second half of the exercise is a tall order for me. Good.

Practicing "regarding" my hand as it clutched the inside of the bus window this afternoon, I had an unusual disassociation with it. Hand as Object --- not hand as part of my body. This lasted about a minute and brought many impressions. Unusual and instructive.

Working with the Heptachord of Suffering went something like this;

1. Noticed and named a personal negative emotion.
2 and 3. "observed" and affirmed the suffering as lawful, but I wished to transform by separating from and thus gaining distance/impartiality.
4. This impartiality starved the suffering of energy (reduced its' force/magnitude) - making it possible to ...
5.Utilise (affirm) that spare energy in a feeling of joy/calm, and then..
6. Enjoyed the understanding that the suffering was transformed into joy, and was leading to..
7. A coating (food for) on the inner being embryo - which surfaced as a calm, joyous inner state.

I found step 7 particularly beautiful, as it sometimes resulted in a mental image of bright light with a shimmering effect.

Used a feeling of restlessness several times.
Used a feeling of dread (of tackling the cleaning of a store-room).
And just prior to typing this - worked on the frustration which occurred when I hit "preview" instead of "submit" in the first typing of this post, and lost it.....

Then started another cycle, by going on after the Heptachord to achieve the eg; cleaning.

Ian, is this Heptachord from Mr Beidler? Very beautiful.
Takes a bit longer than my usual methods of working with negative emotions, but has the advantage of some conscious clarity of both the Law of Seven and of the transformative process itself. And remembering/awareness-of the inner being embryo as an essential part of Work-attempts is achieved very simply here.

1. Anger and a wish to return home resulted from yet, a second bus not arriving in the 104 degree heat. I needed to get to the library 5 miles away so:
2. I admitted the wastefulness of "not -doing" brought about by "getting angry" about an

"unchangeable"
3. Accepted the conditions inside and outside of me, making it possible to
4. curb the anger/retreat from the heat manifestation, then diverting the energy saved
5. to fueling a one and a half hour walk in the heat during which time I experimented with procedures of breathing as
6. the anger fed an even "motivational fire" and a (can I say it?) "Victorious March"
7. a strength pushed inwardly upwards, coated in a creamy white coating which absorbed into "its" inner recesses, "flashed" otwardly evidences of fusion (?!?!)

I got to the library which I had to myself (thanks to the heat!!)_

Pushing through the heat had taught me a new way to exert.

The excessive attention to breathing had cleared my head and added yet another way to eat the air.

The super-effort had "cured" me of the previous night's sleeplessness.

(thank you Ian and Judy for the formatting of this!)

**** **** **** **** ****

On the way to the library today (temperature appreciably lower -- 90s) rank smell pulled my sight over the edge of bridge's overpass. A water melon smashed in a gutter below, its inside's "pinkiness" long rotted away into beige, played host to a stunning array of 15 butterflies (3 varieties) feasting away on the remenants of "sweetness".

A really extraordinary Impression. Loaded.

"I" feasted.

Yes, this exercise is from Mr Beidler.

You will notice that there is more than one reconciliation in it.

"This binary is every person who looks into himself. We may live by these transitory dimensions, giving ourselves up to their current and allowing them to carry us away. But to the whole of this process going on within us apart from our will, to all these "it wishes" we may oppose our "I wish", bind together yes and no, provoke a dispute between two opposites, a struggle of two principles, and neutralize them by the tertiary. A great dispute, if it is not purposeless, must give a result, a conclusion and an effect, and then four elements will be available: yes, no, dispute, result; that is, the transmutation of the binary into the quaternary." [...]
"The seven basic tones of the octave express the law of the septenary and the "Do" of the next octave added to complete the process, gives the 8 steps of a complete octave, being the symbolical expression of the binary of the quaternaries: 'Do, re, mi, fa' - 'sol, la, si, do'."

During the week, accept everything that happens as lawful and intentionally endure it all with an inner smile and full body sensing.

by Zenas

This seemingly short, 'simple' exercise takes SO much effort. Not always with an inner smile, watching my self and events as lawful can be a challenge. A little fore-sight of events, particularly economic ones, on either an individual or grand scale can be disheartening. When you have children you want to help them avoid pitfalls only to discover they can find their own pitfalls, with or without you. For one's own, how to keep enough of the right things you could make it through a month regardless what happened politically. And then we were talking about how the countries can't bring all the troops home because there would be no jobs and economic bases would shatter. An inner smile? Much easier for the 'good' things. Some of the things we look back and wish we could undo are quite easy to see the lawfulness in. I did attempt the inner smile and full body sensing for the smaller, day to day things, such as waiting in line, getting things in order to (everyday) work and, pleasantly, hearing from a long ago friend.
It was a good exercise, Ian. While first thinking of it as one of the simplist to remember, it was not.

by Judy

> During the week, accept everything that happens as lawful and intentionally endure it all with an inner smile and full body sensing.

There was quite a tumult of resistance to this exercise for me. While trying to accept everything as lawful, the mind came up with rationalisations and justifications such as ; "only lawful if that person is totally asleep!" and "why is she so emotional!" etc. As for the actual "enduring" of this unpleasant situation, the inner smile and sensing were not as efficient as last week's Heptachord of Suffering, which I seemed to want to change the exercise into.

However, having said that, there was a milli-second glimpse of the organism/"it" as judgmental/condescending during the episode - not just the thoughts but some far-from-noble emotions. I hated seeing this and didn't want to believe it. Scary. Who is that critical person?

This gave me quite a jolt, and some awareness of my part in the impasse. I realised that I didn't actually "know" the other person at all, and had been acting from some imaginary invented idea of her.

I don't often observe emotions. Quite rare, and shocking to my idea of myself too.
Strong medicine!

Judy.

---

by James F

I have been focusing on the first half almost as a mantra: "Accept everything that happens as lawful..." I spilled a drink and had to clean up a mess--this is lawful, according to law, I told myself. I made plans that were cancelled--this is according to law I again told myself.

It seems that accepting that very little (if anything) is truly within my control creates a feeling of peace. It feels almost as if I am just along for the ride, and there is no reason or point in being negative when, for example, I spill a glass of red wine or the movie I just rented doesn't play in the my machine.

This exercise is a keeper for me.

Last week an old, old friend revealed that she had passed a privacy we'd shared to a mutual friend of ours. She told me this without the slighest hint of a sense of personal responsibility to "Us".

Immediately the "thought/feeling": "I could kill you . . ." began an inner formulation. A split-second, shuddery awareness "Ian's exercise" followed. "I could kill you" was pressured down upon (hard) with a mental man-hole cover. The negativity put into service for the creation of an inner smile which rose from the motive center and permeated a fully sensed body dropping back away like a heavy woolen overcoat hanging on a hanger (shoulder/clavicle area). I commanded the corners of my mouth to spread and lift into a "smile" saying, with amusement (which actually had a feeling of some authenticity) "Oh? And what DID she say?"

All the above happened in "one fell swoop": instantaneously. Most times it never happens like this.

I lived with the suffering of the privacy revealed and conferenced with the "i"s interminable discussions later in the day: "Well, if 'we' didn't want it passed, why did 'we' pass it?"

Indeed.

Give it a try and see what you come up with.

---

by Judy

Ian wrote:

> Give it a try and see what you come up with

I have indeed been trying this since last Wednesday with interesting happenings.
The Heptachord of Suffering exercise had a strong impact during the previous week. It is just so complete. As mentioned earlier, the second transubstantiation brought with it a similar (though slightly different) feeling as the first, but with it also came unbidden mental images of light. Quite blissful.
Then came the "enduring" exercise. To be fair, if I had also concentrated on "acceptance" "lawful" and "intentional" as much as on the enduring, then, as well as glimpsing manifestations of the emotions involved, there would undoubtedly be some transformation. More work needed here.

Yet, on beginning with the enduring exercise, which brought about some self-observation, and then using the Heptachord to "suffer gladly", so to speak, many different facets of the Work were brought into connection in experiential manner. And, this is indeed the way an unpleasant situation progresses often in life - I get to thinking "Oh, this is painful nonsense" after putting up with it for a while, before remembering to transform etc.

These are such good experiences.
As well as the feelings (evoked by self-remembering, self-observation - long-time friends) this connected exercise seems to be "connecting in me".
I don't know how else to describe.

What happens now is that the mental saying and thinking of the words "light" or "inner-being embryo", evoke the feeling without doing the exercise.
(This obviously has a downside (not actually doing the work exercise), and herein lies another benefit in having a variety of exercises provided each week by you, Ian. Thank you.)

However, it maybe indicates the beginning of a few "associations of a higher order" - associations connected with the Work ideas and exercises - by that I mean that the word "light" now associates itself with the Heptachord exercise, and this association pathway evokes the emotional state of bliss/unity/light.

I'm being careful with this. For a very ordinary person, I'm being allowed glimpses of extraordinary things. This brings up the question of entitlement. So I've taken an extra shift of my volunteer community work, to make sure of being grounded in rationality, as well as to give something back.

Ian, your paper on the second conscious shock has gone from the class of "brilliant hypothesis" to "likely Truth", after these little experiential successes.

All this is decidedly real, definite, and repeatable.
Any critical comments welcome as usual.
Thanks everyone.
Judy.

P.S. Interesting that in the above, the active thinking comes before the emotional state - a bit of "right order" for once.

Your careful articulation has helped me so much today.

Thank you.

When taking in sight, sound, smell, taste, or touch impressions, try to see, or sense, or be aware of what is beyond, or behind, or the basis of, or the essence of all the colors, or sounds, or smells, or tastes, or sensations.

Ponder - What is an impression? What is it made of? What is its origin? What is its destination? Is it conscious?

---

by Greg

There is a place visually in the pusuit behind color where I stop. I chose melon/pinkish hue which is predominate in the paintings which hang in the apartment in which I am staying. Increasingly, throughout the week I have picked up a trail of this chromatic out in the streets. I continue the exercise there where I am able to be at a modicum of comfort and ease.

My proceedure is to relax the eyesballs in sightless gaze and to in tandem "push" in effort through that gaze. The manifestation of those diametrically opposed directions together came surprisingly easily for me. I intuitively arrived at this place after a point of exasperation which was uttered as "What am I to Do?"

To put it another way: sightless gaze spreads wide into absorbant atmosphere. An effort (sourced at hara point) "exerts" and follows in a line out through the pupil. I get to a place where the passive and active are working and supporting one another and then it goes no further in perception. Oddly, I can exactly state that I can't go past six inches in front of the color. Perhaps, I need to just leave it off right there (?)

Can someone help me with this? Am I in the correct place?

I hope this has been clear.

G.

---

by Harry

I guess my experience was different. I was making a salad and experiencing the various shades of green. I tasted a green pepper and tasted the chloraphyl that made it green. It was clear to me that this relation between color and chemical existed.

Then I thought of how my son would never eat blue food. That doesn't eliminate a whole lot.

Blueberries, which he eventually started to eat as long as it was jam.

I've always wondered at the taste and texture of watermelon. During a certain time of year there is nothing better than nice chilled watermelon. But unlike other fruits and vegetables it can't be duplicated. I don't care how much anyone tries, it's impossible to make artificial watermelon or to preserve it for some other time. This, I think, has to do with the liquid involved.

The closest thing to watermelon might well be cucumber. Pickles aren't cucumbers. But like watermelon fresh cucumber has a flavor tied to the liquid content.

Strangely both are green on the outside. But those rinds aren't really edible unless they are pickled. Yes, people do pickle watermelon rind.

My other association with this is what has happened to what we intake. Much as G. describes, most of our fruits and vegetables are never allowed to reach their full cycle. They are picked and transported in an unripe state. To get a really vine ripened tomato is to taste the earth, sweat. Funny, when cutting up tomatoes for a salad I always like to cut along the seams of the fruit so that the seed pods aren't disturbed. I have no idea why I started this, but it seems to preserve flavor for me.

But we don't eat local anything anymore. What does that do to us?

Well, Greg, I guess we're in different universes right now.

Without your help, there is no progress. Without my asking, I stay stuck in my own devices.

I realized that Macdonalds doesn't sell a good hamburger, but is very good at selling the image of a good hamburger and in our normal waking state that perception is the world reality. Can you provide the exact passage from the PT where that is written about the 2 palm widths?

Very Interesting. Two nights back I was standing in a moldy old Broadway second hand book store turning three volumes of a rare edition of Faulkner's Coffin Texts over and over again in my hands taking in their heft . . .

The prayer formulation is perhaps the missing piece for me.

I come right to the brink of seeing "something" about the color quite directly, and then, as I said it stops. There is a touch of Fear, but not enough to create a block.

Thanks.

> Ponder - What is an impression? What is it made of? What is its origin? What is its destination? Is it conscious?

After pondering for quite a while on the essence of impressions I put down my brains and began to write;

Strings and points,interfacing,destroying, changing, feeding the starving,creating, vibrating,spiritual materiality, forms and focus and function,The Body Electric,conscious feeding, Holy denying,Innerness,impact, the gift,giftness, gratitude, faithness, bullets, belief,changeness ,doors of perception, matter,innermatter,building,deconstucting, Holy Reconciling, form, singularities, Trinities, wholes,octaves, influences, influenceness,originality. Source Becoming,active conscious,Emanation,Holy Hammer,decaying radiation, banging the forge, forgeness,sensuality and steel,beyond comprehension, the Gaze of Ra, Christ's Nails, Allah's Tears, Blessed Food, the Herald. One day I'll learn to put it all in two lines like the American.

It strikes me that the First Verse of the Qur'an, The Fatihah, the Lord's Prayer of the Qur'an, given the first Invocation, the Seven Sacred Lines. and the Final Invocation Ameen,(Amen, Amun) srikes a perfect Enneagram. This is not an exact translation but is how I first learned it;

In the name of Allah, the Merciful, the Entirely Merciful

All praise and Gratitude belong to Allah,Cherisher and Sustainer of the Worlds

The Merciful, The Entirely Merciful,

Overseer of Judgement Day,

Blessed Lord only Thee do we worship, and to Thee we ask for help

Show us the Straight Path, the Way of Thy Eternal Grace

Not the way of those who incur thy wrath, nor of those who wander astray, Ameen Ameen.

Not an exact translation but what do you think?

Yesterday I got a haircut and the women at my favorite coffee shop were all raving how good I looked. I basked in this conceit for about 30 minutes before I realized the praise rightfully belongs to the skill of the barber not me but it displayed just how insufferable subtly my vanity and ego works and how on guard I need to be. Still, I did look pretty good.....

Judy, you nailed the weeks exercise for me. Movement radiance, beautiful!

Seedless watermelons, grapes, oranges, given our purpose is the creation of the perfect creative exiohary what does it say about the evolutionary value of such food? Perhaps technology will one day render these "slugs" incapable of reproduction.

The Pyramid Texts are the only Books of Ancient Knowledge, unchanged, perfectly preserved, perfectly written, to survive down to our century. We only need to learn the essential language.

Great Week again Ian, fantastic exercise.

Hey Istvan where are you? Miss your posts. Lawrick

Hi Lawrick,
Thanks for posting the info from the Pyramid Texts.
I did a Google search, and came up with a very nice online tour of the Pyramid of Unas, and the discoveries of 2000, which I somehow wasn't aware of.
Most interesting.

Work Program week beginning 21 August 2006

by Ian

We all came to the Work with different questions for which we sought answers and different sufferings from which we sought relief.

Several times each day during the week, while in a state of fully sensed, relaxed and gazing all-brains-balanced-being-perception, Ponder the following questions without expecting answers:

Monday - What can my questions tell me about my Chief Feature? How did my Chief Feature influence the development of my questions?

Tuesday - What can my sufferings tell me about my Chief Feature? How did my Chief Feature influence the development of my sufferings?

Wednesday - What can my aims in the Work tell me about my Chief Feature? How has my Chief Feature influenced my aims in the Work?

Thursday - What can my choices of Work ideas that I accept or reject tell me about my Chief Feature? How has my Chief Feature influenced the choices of Work ideas that I accept or reject?

Friday - What can my choices of Work methods that I practice or ignore tell me about my Chief Feature? How has my Chief Feature influenced the choice of Work methods that I practice or ignore?

Saturday - Make a list of all your I's, or Traits, or Features, or Personalities.
Each morning and afternoon for 15 minutes, use the sightless gaze and try to 'See' the volume of space that extends around you.

Sunday - Make a list of all your Sufferings, Irritations, Dislikes, Annoyances, etc.
Each morning and afternoon for 15 minutes, use the sightless gaze and try to 'Be' the volume of space that extends around you.

---

by Judy

I've done as suggested each day this week.
While not expecting answers, some did surface, and of course, more questions arose.

Monday through Friday gave fairly consistent results, and the intimation of Chief Feature which surfaced was not at all what I expected. However, no doubt as to its consistency even when not looking for it.

I saw that questions were quite big;
eg Who am I?
Where have I come from?
Where am I going to?
Why am I on earth - what is the task here?
How best to achieve that task?

Then a lot of sufferings I sought relief from came from seeking answers to the questions.

Aims brought in some typicality (preference for intellectual centre exercises) and like/dislike also raised its head. Awareness of the need for balance here brought about a little corrective influence sometimes. So a few old defects which I've often wondered about (in regard to Chief Feature I mean; eg impatience, laziness) appeared here, yet the overall "seeker" theme went through them all. Sometimes it wins. Sometimes it doesn't.

So is Chief Feature to do with being a seeker, or is it concerned with the primary personal stumbling-block to that?
Hmm. I have always believed the latter..

So Monday to Friday sends me to read up more on Chief Feature, for a start. Any suggested readings from anyone?

Then, today, Saturday, totally different flavour.
So many different sets of I's observed just in the morning. And yes, if I hadn't been doing this exercise, I would have been identified with most of them for sure. I notice that separating usually isn't done unless there is pain associated with the I's in question. So for the rest of the time??? Aagh!
What sort of freedom is that?
So a very sobering written few lines.
And the 15 minutes with sightless gaze did restore equilibrium.

Today is an eye-opener, as I had naively thought I was working quite well recently.
Okay, now to separate from the organism's dejected I's.

I wish to be.

Thank you, Judy.

I am going to withhold discussion of my work on this this week --- "something" just tells me that is best.

Began the week, interestingly enough, watching the film adaptation of Kathryn Hulme's THE NUN'S STORY, a fiction whose primary theme is Chief Feature. Hulme was a member of G.'s Rope Group and oversaw the minutae of the film's production.

So many things can be seen about zenas, yet, chief feature has not been truly pinpointed. A group leader once tried to tell me what my chief feature was, never did agree - and he thought it was timidity. not timid enough to agree with him. Had not ever considered along the lines of what was accepted or rejected in the Work. Attempting to overcome the laziness that allows thinking and philosophisizing without doing. To bring to printed words alone-working is difficult, watching the making ones' self write shows resistance; not from "what others think," just the actual get off the duff and do it. Remembering G's admonition not to judge others in the Work sometimes brings a portion of remembering myself better than many every day attempts. Once in a while, like today, i notice how others must view zenas, usually those times when vanity is being dinged and dented. Trying to see this mechanicality brings even more appreciation for the Work. The too numerous i.s wonder what an I would feel like to be around, the Presence there. Someone without a mechanical chief feature would stand out like a sore thumb?

by Lawrick

I couldn't focus or grasp what was expected this week and as a result less than "stellar" efforts were directed towards the exercises. Chief Feature, What? Where? Who? How would I know? Have I stumbled accross this chimera, have I stepped on it, eaten it, lost it, how does one know? How do we know? And why the reluctance to engage the exercise, knowing I may have already fought with damnable monster and lost without ever knowing or throwing a punch. Like bringing a snowball to a gunfight. But Friday I began to realize I had been swimming in this black pit of negativity for years seemingly without result, and watching my life and Being nearly destroyed in an endless helpless smoke of Chief Feature Filth, I did not want to revisit.

And I realized..... that "something" had made a conscious decision to seek joy, to discover my inner Being in life in lightness and laughter and Work! I mean it's all a choice isn't it? A conscious decision realized in gratitude. the Sufi wine. A realization that the driving force I had tried for so long to escape,ignore, rationalize was never going to give up on me and after bringing me back time after time in depression and suffering,it had finally given me the inner understanding that the work and sacrifice was also permeated with light, and epiphanies, deeper loving and conscience,fellowship and if even more was asked of me I could face it with this truth and blessed joy granted from wherever.And so enlightened or not, I was at least going to reach my end happy. If this is a cop out frankly I don't give a shit. I'm not even sure I made the choice alone.

So on Friday I realized that to engage the exercise was to dive back into that black hole of sucking negativity and depression, that frankly and figuratively makes me sick. But that going back now was a choice under my control, and that for the first time I was charging into the breach armed to the teeth and in the blessed company of tough seasoned warriors. And so I gazed and washed away the old sickness with affirmations and then began again to add to the endless list of nafs upon nafs.

Today Saturday I must have had 50 promps, waking up ,sleeping for a minute of two, coming back in greater or lesser moments of awareness but never gone for more than a few moments. Imagine never gone for more than a few moments. Beautiful. And I also realized today that the super higher states that the Right Reverend Mr. Pace correctly called righteousness, must be "Obtained" a"Grace". I am coming to believe all my efforts can only bring me to the door knocking..... And in the end the battered Hoopoe is still subject to the will of the door's guardian.

Tired, rambling, worried that the AzureMeister might rip me a new arsehole for not making efforts rising to "his" subjective understanding. You owe Jose' an apology my friend. Over the top.

Azure Noun ...sky, empyrian, firmament, vault of heaven!!!!!!!!!!!

So back I go rewriting revising reviewing the death list. My Chief feature longs for something joyful next week when I again return to my mountains to have it out with my nemisis Son of Stalin. Roses, Roses! Didn't Don Jaun say we all have one of these dispicable creatures in our life. Perhaps the personification of my Chief Feature. A fox can always smell his own hole, I mean den. Sorry.

So anyway last week my butcher bet me 2 to 1 that I couldn't jump high enough to grab the beef overhanging the top shelf in his shop.
I Ideclined.....

the steaks were just too high.

Joy is a wonderful weapon.

Regards, Lawrick

My first response to the request to look at my chief feature (again) was one of indignation. What the hell is that anyway? I read up on “For an exact study, an exact language is needed...” page 60, Views from the Real World. Although I did not find it particularly satisfying to think anymore about what the words, ' chief feature' , what they meant or do mean to me, the reading influenced my approach to this program and gave me a way to get in past some of my resistance.

By the end of the week I reluctantly began a list of traits. It was surprising to me how many times the word indignation came up. Although generally I have been thinking that this quality is not so bad and generally justified, the dictionary meaning is “to deem unworthy, to take offence”. I was shocked to see the companions of 'indignant' in the dictionary.com thesaurus, some of which are acrimoniuous, bugged, displeased, disgruntled, provoked, resentful etc., none of the ways that I would like to see myself. Surely I must be beyond 'justifiable indignation''. This uncomfortable effort gives me incentive to look iagain.

The sightless gaze, which is at times more or less accessible, changes the relationship of the inner space and the outer space around me. Volume has a different sense about it.

I wish to thank the others who dared these exercises giving me encouragement by their sharing of them.

Amen sister. For me at least this was the most difficult exercise yet. Thanks for sharing your thoughts as well.

If you would be a real seeker after truth, it is necessary that at least once in your life you doubt, as far as possible, all things. (Descartes)

Many of our beliefs are learned early in life and accepted without critical thought.
Other beliefs may be formed according to our attitudes and chief traits.
Beliefs may limit us to thinking and feeling according to preconceived notions.
Beliefs may limit us from considering alternatives.
Beliefs are answers which may prevent us from asking deeper questions.

This week give up a deeply held belief, such as a belief about yourself, society, religion, etc.
Try to believe the opposite of the belief.
Are there any beliefs that you cannot give up?

Ponder - What can replace beliefs?

A couple of preliminary comments on this huge topic;

I took "belief" to mean mental acceptance of, or confidence in, something, without rigorous proof.
A little pondering made me realise that I often use the word incorrectly. Also that I have many fewer beliefs today than earlier on.
And that, for me, belief is somewhere along a continuum between hope and fact; stronger than hope, but less than fact.

I'll only comment on the facet involving what to me are "holy cows". (leaving out all other facets concerned with "healthy beliefs" or otherwise, which are more concerned with everyday affairs - for example the placebo effect etc).

So - I believe that the life continues after the death of the form - is the example for the moment.
This is a strong belief - towards the fact end of the continuum.
I was able to mentally accept the opposite, but then a very strong reaction from the emotional centre I's. They simply couldn't deal with this. In fact they had a mini "panic-attack" at the suggestion. This brought up fear, confusion, accusations of nonsense and chaos rather than cosmos etc.; suffering in other words. (I'm not talking about the further question of whether individual awareness continues here - another whole topic - but simply whether the life continues or not).
So I'm presently unable to live comfortably without this belief, which means I can't give it up.
So is it "truth"?
Or is it some sort of "buffer" to prevent suffering and chaos in me?
After pondering a little more, the challenge from deep emotional centre becomes so definite that this belief moves even further towards the "fact/knowledge" end of the line.

It seems that knowledge, then, whether outer or inner, can replace belief. It may, on the other hand, be downgraded to hope.

Overall, looks like the few beliefs I do have are indeed "dear and esteemed", which interestingly happens to be the etymology of the word.

I gave up the belief that I exist and tried to believe the opposite by doubting my own existence. But I didn't get very far with it; I thought: "well something is here doubting its own existence. Thus, it seems that whether I believe I exist, or whether I doubt I exist, I exist." I am, I exist, this much is certain....Ok folks, that was a very bad attempt at some Descartes humor. I just couldn't resist.

Other than what is necessry to get me through the day, I don't have many deeply held beliefs left as well. I have a belief that I am able to help others. I desire to help others, and think I am doing good by "helping" others. So i tried to give up this belief and believe the opposite--that I'm no help to anyone. After everyone in my head telling me it was nonsense to believe I wasn't ever a help to anyone finally quieted down, I noticed something. I noticed I have a desire to be useful, well-thought of, and respected. I'm suspecting that motivates my "helping" in some, or many, instances. The alternative-that I am completely useless-is a hard pill to swallow. If I'm completely useless, then what good am I? At that point, an "i" took comfort in the Fifth Obligolnian Striving: that I have an obligation to assist the development of others.

I felt the need to read something "spiritual" this week, so I picked up my copy of Nicoll's New Man and started reading the chapter on Faith. I smiled when I read Nicoll's comparing of faith to belief. I thought of the pondering this week: What can replace beliefs?

Nicoll writes:
"Faith is connected with the idea of transformation and so is not mere belief, on the ordinary plane, as when a person might believe in this man or not believe in him, as the case may be. * * * Faith, in its essential meaning, denotes a conviction, a certainty, that a higher interpretation of life exists, ans a s a consequence, that the transformation of Man is a possibility. The peculiar quality of faith lies in this idea, that life can only be understood and solved by the sense of something higher than Man as he is, and that Man has this possibility of becoming transformed and passing into entirely new meanings in regrd to his life on earth. It is this peculiar quality that is the essence of faith and renders it utterly different from what we usually call belief. Faith, in fact, undermines all our ordinary and natural beliefs because it leads away from worldly belief and in a direction that can no longer be confirmed by natural belief and the evidence of sense."

Thinking about this exercise helped me catch a part of me usually ignored. I believe myself a nice person, reasonable and tolerant: let me have to deal with a company's circular rules, those that purposely make it so a customer can't get a straight answer or through to someone else, and Zenas becomes machine gun(mouth) Annie, never rude or verbally abusive, more stubborn and insistent, the one who ruins a rep's "time statistics" they're given to get you off the line. The sense of remembering yourself, when one is actually watching one's self, watches those intellectual beliefs get blown up. The belief in how things "should" work for their customers (me) has to be let go. Realized beliefs never go beyond the intellect, could feel - while watching the self, a 'disbelief' at what i was doing. Ian somewhere talked about being able to just do whatever one was asked; realized how many times silly beliefs about 'proper' and 'why me' stop my ability to be able to achieve such as that. "Sense" is too often used to mean "belief." Sensing one i's tantrum wasn't intellectual.

Thanks, James, I haven't read "New Man" in quite a while and now I want to sit and read it, again.

Morning exercise:
Sit quietly in meditation. Relax the three centers. Deeply sense the planetary body and follow the breath. Use a sightless gaze and soundless sound to absorb impressions without identifying, labeling or judging them.
Before you rise from meditation, resolve to live this day as a Work of objective art - as a "choreography of life consciously danced".

During the day:
- Search for a glimpse of the significance behind repetitive compulsive strivings, attitudes, traits, roles, chief features. Meet each observed compulsion by repeating 7 times a silent prayer, such as - "It is Nothing, I Wish to Be". Return the attention to the present moment and enjoy the joy of marveling at the splendor all around.

- While walking, maintain the flow of "I am-ness" by following every movement of the legs. Proceed "as-if" you had no head. Evoke an Inner Smile from the heart.

Evening exercise:
Return to deep sensing of the planetary body and following the breath. Review the days events with particular regard to moments of compulsive Identification. What triggers them? Also recall moments of freedom.

It's Tuesday morning here - fine and sunny. I walked down to the local beach to try out the following;

> - While walking, maintain the flow of "I am-ness" by following every movement of the legs. Proceed "as-if" you had no head. Evoke an Inner Smile from the heart

This took a while to get into.
It certainly produced divided attention, and after a while a portion of consciousness seemed to reside in the left toes. Then I realised that I was unconsciously counting my steps...
So the "as if" not too successful - though head energy certainly minimal for me, especially after Inner Smile, which brought in the body-trunk sensing pretty well.
The flow of "I am-ness" remained quite clear with its' familiar taste, and set-up the exercise effectively.
This exercise is a joyous relaxing one.

Thanks Ian.
Judy.

P.S. Why "toes" and not "legs". Maybe because walking barefoot on sand? Don't know really.

The morning exercise turned out to be quite an effective method of Self-Remembering for me. Although I was "absorbing" impressions, there was in fact some "digestion" going on. Reading Nicoll p336 "Digestion of Impressions" helped understanding of why this was so. (eg; certainly it was a "new way").

The searching for a glimpse behind etc. was more complex. The intimation of what I'll call "habit I's" was strong here. This reminded me of a Dr Marc Edmond Jones commentary on the Alice books where he describes a "four-fold body of man" - mental, emotional, phsical and habit. For anyone wishing to have a look at these philosophical commentaries, they are at http://www.sabian.org/alice.htm

Another good one Ian. I am fortunate to be in your Online Group. The weekly exercises make Work-consistency actual, rather than the "constantly hoping for consistency" which happened when I was working alone. The vastness of the system of Gurdjieff is slowly coming together piece by piece, like a giant jigsaw.

Best wishes to everyone,
Judy.

I found the morning exercises more effective than those that followed and am coming to the realization that one's store of energy plays a direct role in the participation and completeness of the exercises. For some reason I can achieve the sightless gaze more easily than the soundless sound and have no idea why. Comments?

Looking at the day as a work of objective art was beyond my capabilities this week because the possible departure of Greg has torn a gigantic hole in my gut, a hole in my being. As a relative newcomer I have come to embrace the commentary of everyone but Greg in particular, notwithstanding his penchant for roasting the ducks at every opportunity, also provided me with a vast repertoire of different views and approaches, insights and doors of perception unique to the group. How interesting that somehow I have come to depend on certain group views, not because they are similar but because of exactly the opposite, the variety and depth which satisfies an inner hunger impossible to fuel anywhere else. Greg, if you're listening, know you will be missed and I personally will be diminished beyond anything Dunne might pen.

Two weeks ago at church which (notwithstanding my presence) has not been stuck by lightning, an older woman with Being eyes stood in front of the congregation and confessed she had found her Lord after years of searching through the multitudes of thoughts and ideas piled on this planet. Her epiphany came when a member of a Gurdjieff New York group confessed to her that he had donated his entire fortune to the Group and that in his opinion The Work would one day become more popular than Christianity. Shades of the Beatles. Interesting opinion given the nature of these "slugs" inhabiting the third rock from the sun. I personally disagree with that point of view. The work is too hard! The statement so disturbed her that while walking home she was "struck" by something profound and turned her life towards Christianity. How interesting. Somehow through the crowd we made eye contact and after the service she came and sat beside me. Like attracting Like? How strange I told her that the very forces which drove her away from G.to church were enhancing my spiritual life to the point where I was needing that spiritual input to help fill my emotional bank, but with little chance of ever accepting the standard religious doctrine found in churches, synagogues, Mosques and such. We both wished each other well and I feel privileged to have met her. We'll talk again tomorrow.

Attacking the repetitive compusive strivings worked very well as I used these compulsions as a reminding factor and the affirmations were frequent and effective. Holy Denying!

With respect to compulsive identifications this need to be well thought of is a continuing crime against my Reason and I notice and struggle with this cancer on an almost daily basis. Why should "I" care. What is the relevance? Like an onion layers upon layers of negativity, but it feels so good to be well thought of. What a monster!

A deep and difficult week. No laughs today. Lawrick

...and Jose? I've learned so much from both of your points of view. I don't think I can overestimate how valuable this group has been to me over the last year. I hope you both hang around. But if not, may you fare well as you continue on your respective journeys.

"When walking, the practitioner is aware, 'I am walking'; when standing, is aware, 'I am standing'; when sitting, is aware, 'I am sitting'; when lying down, is aware, 'I am lying down.' In whatever position one's body happens to be, one is aware of the position of the body. When one is going forward or backward, one applies one's full awareness to one's going forward or backward. When one looks in front or looks behind, bends down or stands up, one also applies full awareness to what one is doing. One applies full awareness to wearing the robe or carrying the alms bowl. When one eats or drinks, chews or savors the food, one applies full awareness to all this. When passing excrement or urinating, one applies full awareness to this. When one walks, stands, lies down, sleeps or wakes up, speaks or is silent, one shines his awareness on all this." So said the Buddha.

Ponder: What is tolerance? Why do I tolerate some things and not others?
As one ponders, be aware of the right and left hands.

It's been a time of resistance for me. Perhaps natural as we move toward another Equinox.

I tend to find myself reverting to specific exercises when I start out on a particular one. Observing myself walking almost instantly jumps into the twelve joint exercise we've done in the past.

I've almost unconsciously found myself relaxing when sitting or lying this week. I say unconsciously because the reminder has jumped into my mind. I haven't brought it forth. But it's still there.

Tolerance. I think I'm tolerant. But it's one of those politically correct concepts that rankles my spine. What do I tolerate? Lots of things. Are there things I shouldn't tolerate. Yep. How do I make that distinction? The golden touchstone, to take a Victorian point of view.

by Judy

Hi Harry,
The following interests me a lot;

> What do I tolerate? Lots of things. Are there things I shouldn't tolerate. Yep. How do I make that distinction? The golden touchstone, to take a Victorian point of view Big question - wisdom required here. I'm often wondering whether I should speak up, or tolerate (take things on balance etc).

So when you speak of "a Victorian point of view", are you referring to Browning's Dramatic Monologues (eg; the psychology of the speaker, or, as if speaking to a second self), or to something much simpler, which I've missed? Please would you be so kind as to elaborate a little.
Best wishes,
Judy.

by Harry

There was a big philosophical idea in the Victorian era. The Golden Touchstone. I often associate this with internal work.

The idea was that there is a truth. That you could study the truth, but in reality you created a core inside of your self that knew the truth. And if you were faced with a decision the easiest way to accept or deny something was to place it against the touchstone.

I'm not sure this can directly correlate to the idea of Deputy Steward, but in my mind they are similar ideas. Somehow something in me recognizes things that resonate with the Golden Touchstone. Or the Work.

There's a movie, for example, called Something Wild. On the surface this is a rather raucus film staring Melanie Griffin. She is Something Wild. Someone who invades a bankers life, but puts him in "touch" with reality. Wild Thing is the movie music. But when you study this film, it's a pretty deep film. Lots of illustrations of Work versus Life ideas.

I think of these things as the legominisms that G. talks about. Things that ordinary life sees as ordinary, even salacious. But which are planted to pass information along. The Freshman and Joe Versus the Volcano are similar films. Even Cowgirls Get the Blues is an example of a novel. Poetry, of course, isn't exactly "ordinary", but people like cummings with his "undead" and Leonard Cohen with his version of Hallelujah are examples.

If we develop this inner core. The Victorian Touchstone or the Deputy Steward, then we are drawn to things which we need to find.

I remember first encounter O. I was walking through my favorite bookstore. In those days there was such a thing. And saw this book that I wouldn't ordinarilly pick up. The back cover said something like "The Key to Every Question you ever had." And my inner skeptic laughed out loud. But my touchstone, that had been fed cummings and O'Neil and Jung and who knows what all else took the dare and I bought my first O. book. By the time I was three chapters in I knew this wasn't anything like anything else I'd ever read. It resonated within me. I could even feel it on my face. I still feel the same facial response when I read G. When I experience a film like Something Wild I'm suddenly quiet inside. I'm eating the film. This happened recently with a film called 1900. (It's about a boat and a kid who is born on the boat and never gets off.)

Hope that gives some explanation.

Like Harry, this week's exercise has served as a reminder to me. When standing, sitting, walking, etc., "something" has reminded me to be aware that I am walking, typing, shaving, washing the dishes. My hope is that each time I do remember, a little bit of extra energy is created, stored, and serving some higher purpose in me.

I wonder if it is possible to be in a state of constant self-awareness/observation. In conjunction I have often pondered the thoughts of Paul Beidler, as stated by Ian: “We must work toward a constant state of self-observation where we become more and more connected with the observer who is objectively observing "it" (the observed). Self-observing requires conscious effort; the observer is the rememberer, who becomes the doer, who becomes.”

And where do "I" go when I lose that awareness of what I am doing? I believe Ian referred to consciousness, or awareness, or attention (one of those) as a searchlight that can be broadened or narrowed. When I’m doing a task such as pushing a broom, it seems easier to keep my attention divided--an awareness that I am pushing the broom and pushing the broom, and maybe taking in sights and sounds as well. But when doing a non-routine task, such as trying to fix some physical object that is broken, my attention is more focused on the task, and very little seems left over for attending to other things. Similarly, when “deep in thought,” there comes a point when I become aware of more than just my thoughts again. Where was “I” while deep in thought only a moment before? Was I identified with my thoughts?

Harry, “The Matrix” is one of those movies for me. The first time I saw it, it was only an ordinary, entertaining science fiction film. I watched it again after reading ISOTM and it became a totally different movie for me. I think I’ve watched it about 25 times since, and I get something out of it to ponder each time.

Thanks so much Harry.

The Golden Touchstone - what a beautiful concept.
Perhaps "touching essence"?

I remember instances like the ones you've described too. Quite undeniable.

And improving contact with this inner core which knows Truth - indeed many similarities to the Work we do.

Best wishes,
Judy.

P.S. Flying south today, so away from computer until I get a notebook organised there.

I've attempted this week's exercise just as written, and avoided any mental comparisons as much as possible (I get into them too often.) In spite of this, as Harry mentions, they were still there somewhere.

This exercise came close to achieving my idea of "a choreography of life consciously danced" which I didn't have much success with last week on my own.

James, thanks for the strong post. Sounds like you are really getting into it. And yes, routine tasks, often the simple physical ones, are easier to work with for me too; fewer thoughts and emotions. If you are attempting Work while doing something more complex, preceding it with the draining exercise found on this site is sometimes quite effective for me. Of course it also improves quality of awareness when done before working with simple tasks too.

Best,
J.

The question of tolerance took a surprising turn for me. In a shop buying the service of sending a fax, I was immediately offended at the cost that appeared way more than its value. Not thinking of any alternative at that moment I agreed reluctantly to accept. While the clerk was struggling with sending it the belief that I was being overcharged stirred my resentments. In those moments of waiting I observed and felt other aversions and judgments about dirt, greed etc. that the shop represented. I had the sense of being splintered into several different points of negative views. The most intentional thing that I could do was to act as if everything was ok and to walk out as if none of this had happened. This was the closest that I could get to “I am tolerating”. There is now a deep doubt within me that “I” tolerate anything. Each act of tolerating seems to be a mixture of aversions and whatever distance that can be generated in that moment. More questions came up for my pondering.

The reference that Harry made to the “Touchstone” from the Victorian culture or the “Chief Steward” from the work culture, make sense as they gather the masquerading “I s” into some order.

The practice of awareness seems to gather and collect more available attention.

I apologize in advance for the essay!
This week, as apposed to other weeks, I made a conscious effort to sense my hands rather than my feet, legs, body and discovered that my hands feel light, almost airy relative to the ponderous pace of my legs feet and body. It's as if the idea of activity, of creating, arises from a source more akin to the air of the emotional center rather than the physical certer. There seems to be a connection to both, perhaps even intelligence.

Tolerizationacreings! What I personally seem to tolerate, God help me, changes and drifts with every day like some smoking chimera. My initial reaction was that tolerance "becomes" with a deepening sense of self but I'm coming to realize that both the nature of the the things "tolerated" and the my personal objectivity change concurently. For example, my lack of tolerance for "the Process of war" has become so accute that I will now speak out regardless of the sensitivities of the company I enjoin. So to whom or what am I being tolerant. Smoke and mirrors on a base of personalized sleep. Pehaps as we "evolve" we acquire the ability to tolerate even more and more manifestations of life without prejudice or judgement. On the other hand deeper objective issues demand our personal computer connect with the "Source" and then permeate our being with this objective "something" to generate a conscious concience response. It's difficult.

PEACE! Last week while doing some deep work pondering..... the gestapo like command "STOP" hammered my computer speakers and..... something that I know as Peace happened to me. Peace. which I now know is not "peace of mind", it is not contentment, satisfaction, joy, happiness, it is not gratitude. It can only be defined by itself. Not peacefulness, but peaceness. And now I know one more "big" thing.One more giant thing. Thank you all, and thank you all, and may Peaceness rest gently upon Thee.

James wonders that I might leave this hard toiling Band of Brothers and Sisters..... While fly fishing with a friend for several hours two weeks ago, amidst this perfect Being the fish inhabit, while laughing and joking, while calm and subtle and perfectly quiet, later on while sitting around a large fire, all my friend could talk about was the fact that I had accidentally hooked him(his Jacket) with my fly a size 12, about the length of a trimmed nail on the smallest finger of the hand.On and on he went, a natural raconteur to the group around the fire, the fly growing in size, now a small knife, now a glistening terrifying blade, now a razorlike butcher's meathook driving into his jacket, transpiercing his vest, ripping through his skin, slashing sinew and bone and finally embedding itself into the very marrow of his arm. God knows, as he related, he suffered near exsanguinationation but somehow through sheer effort of will and sacrifice, managed to carry on fishing for another 3 hours the splatting blood following him around to entice the bear and the cougar and on and on. I relate this story because I felt similar to Greg in that given what must have been the vast agenda of the G. conference, the explosion of work ideas, one should relate what seems to me to be a simple incident of intolerance magnified. How appropriate to the weekly exercise. I'm not excusing Greg's rants but being a Scorpio it occured to me that his Passion may have arisen from essence and as such I don't believe should be condemned. I grew to know and respect Greg off line notwithstanding his acerbic and at times ill advised rants. If as I take it literally, we are trpped in a prison and need to escape, we've just lost one of our prime tunnelers. So thanks for your concern James, but I'm just about to inform Ian I wish to become a full time member and my irreverance will continue to color this endevour which is now becoming an integral, even vital aspect of my life.

Obligolnian Strivings....Assist in the perfecting of other beings , both those similar to oneself and....."those of other forms"???????????? Care to comment on this?

The weekly exercise was very difficult to maintain because in totality it requires a constant state of higher awareness and all the associated energy. Though I could not fulfill all the requirements for long periods I was able to experience almost all of these states at one time or another with differing results. Iwonder if through "doing" we build up a bank account of self remembering and obsevation in various conditions and if a kind of "interest" continually builds which we may perhaps redeem after many years of deposits, in one large withdrawl. Perhaps this is the nature of the grand epiphany experienced by other Seekers through the ages.

Finally and with respect to Ian's continued requests for submission of well thought out group exercises that at once must firmly engage all 3 centres in some harmonious unity, after pondering on several sides of both the request and a suitable response,and keeping in mind that this will be my first exercise as a relative newcomer, that the group as a whole might wish to contribute and respond to my initial attempt to manufacture an all 3 brain being participation exercise.... Begin a slow deliberate rhythmic tapping with the left or right foot, and sensing the "I AM" of every breath, engender a relaxed being state and ponder ..... How many Seekers does it take to screw in a light bulb?

The joy has returned and I almost appologize for my happiness.

Awareness of "Zenas is walking, talking, sitting, etc." this week produced surprize that it was so effective, more so than thinking "remember yourself." Thus, i attempted to look at what place was surprized & why. I didn't do well with sensing the right and left hands until later in the week, then was able to relate to how they work together - each knows which keys to type, how to put earrings in, where to go in exercises, how to reach out to others, etc. The left has been somewhat ignored, yet it still learned to write if it has to, take over when it needs. It touches out just as well as the right. From a medical perspective, there's a noticeable electrical difference between the right and left sides, dependent on which is dominant. It takes practice to feel this.

A question about "touchstone" (and thank-you so much for defining this): how does one know if their touchstone is real or another part of vanity? Nicol particularly, and also Ouspensky, never seemed to get past their eclectic views of the world or their social place in it. I don't want to make too much of this here because I've been pondering answering another post elsewhere on the forum. Yet, so much "truth" is just the views of the Day.

Ouspensky also said humor was touching two centers at once and as we move up we get beyond it. Regardless: thank-you! for the super "how many seekers does it take to screw in a light-bulb?"!!! One answer(?): none, they sit and ponder in the dark waiting for it to come on by itself.
Having had enough old Irish stories about the Sages who could make G-d laugh, i found Elie Wiesel's book, "Somewhere a Master" a tad dry when he spoke of the Chassid who supposedly did the same. Ah, books, our modern way of talking across time.

Fred, glad to hear you are hanging around. And the prison analogy is quite appropriate, I think. I wish to break out of prison. If I could do it alone, believe me all, I would. Losing a tunnler hurts me, and my Aim! Deep down, If I'm being sincere, that's what eats me the most. Now I have to work that much harder.

My Toleranceacrings: I used to engage in "letter writing" with my family members in an attempt to show one or two, or all, of them that they were wrong and that they needed to listen to me. I laugh now when I think back on that. At the same time, though, I felt an instense impulse this week (while pondering tolerance) to post something about the recent turmoil in this group. The intensity of the desire surprised me. I even thought out everything I would write. And I reassured myself over and over that it would be best. And my logic was sound, wasn't it? But in the end, I refrained. Maybe I remembered myself. Maybe I remembered how futile that all was when I tried it in the past. Maybe I remembered that I'm no better than anyone else, and that under strong provocation, I just might behave similarly. And maybe another "i" will come along shortly and convince me to post something anyway.

I've become much more tolerant in the last few years, but it seems that life requires me to draw a line somewhere. For instance, I simply will not just let my neighbor come over and "borrow" my tools any time he wishes. If I did that, I wouldn't have any tools left. What good is that?

by Zenas

Thank-you, James, I have an extremely strong "harmonizer" button and part of my work has been learning not to 'fix' things, or people, and usually remember they don't have to be in my image(ination). Sometimes I wonder if i'm really working, even on-line, because the real friction of a group and the work it can produce isn't there. Here, you can't feel my bristling, or knitted brows or silly nervous habits. Yet, when i sense disdain, it is easy not to post for a while and just let things pass. Before the work, i would have had to argue everyone to distraction. In my personal life i have reason to see my intolerance of a person that drives me to distraction because she absolutely won't clean up and my not making negative comments - skip the not making negative gestures, i'm just not there yet - is becoming increasingly hard. Tolerance? Some place in the dictionairy. I walk away when i can and do the mental backward counting exercises plus a few of Orage's when i can't. She was this way long before i met her and she isn't going to change. The intensity of my negative reaction bothers me most because she has made me realize someone in my family who was very close was more body-type mechanical than "depressed." It took away a veil i'd used for acceptance of the family member.

Sometimes the apparent hopelessness of breaking out of the prison is numbing, then i work to will, "better to die trying..."

Speaking of light-bulbs- can't resist this one...

How many psychologists does it take to change a light-bulb?

Only one, but the light-bulb has to want to change.

Hi Zenas. That may be true. But YOU can feel your bristling, etc. That is how I approach all this. If I'm being sincere with myself, then those feelings and sensations make for great opportunities to observe, transform, grow. Only James can do James' work. Do I need someone to see my mechanical reactions? It seems to me that I'm the one that needs to see them, and work on them.

Hello all, I am new here. Its wonderful to have discovered this forum.

I noticed during the week regarding the excercize with awareness of the body that something remembers and interjects from time to time "I am walking" or draws attention. Particularly when I am most lost in thoughts and identification (much of the time, of course) I remember. I feel more in these brief moments, wind, kind of "alive" sensation on my skin.

Tolerance: I have been thinking and experiencing a lot regarding tolerance lately. I realize that there is an inherent element of struggle in tolerance, e.g. putting up with something you probably don't like but allowing it to transpire without becoming identified (perhaps?). Definitely friction is a word I would use, and in that regard, tolerance or something like it is vital to the work.
I have experienced people that are extremely annoying in their behaviior, and trying to be mindful and put up with the manifestations of others. For instance someone I don't like this week was being excessively demanding of me at work this week (this person is great for work) and I felt annoyance, energy, electricity. I tried everything I could to not express my negative emotions. Not entirely sure I was successful (I think my body language and tone was kind of transparent). How much of that is tolerance? I don't feel I was being tolerant. Perhaps somewhat aware, but to me tolerance in that situation would have involved less of an automatic reaction on my part and less "leaking" of energy.

Hope this didn't sound too disjointed :O it is my first post here and all!

Work Program week beginning 18 September 2006

Begin each day by harmonizing three centers in a relaxed equilibrium and then filling oneself with sensation from the feet up to the head. Include a sightless gaze and soundless sound leading to a quiet mind. Be attentive to the process of breathing.

During the week, when you observe that you are either tolerant or intolerant of the manifestations of others, use that moment to remember yourself.

Ponderings:

- Can 'I Am' and non-identification coexist?

- Is tolerance enhanced by non-identification?

- Can I be identified with my Tolerant I's?

- Is there anything that should not be tolerated?

---

by Harry

Ponderings:

I Am defines non-identification. Identification is a product of Personality. I AM is an attempt to move toward Essence.

As almost all intolerance is the product of Personality, indeed the product of false self worth, then non identification must lead to more tolerance.

If the "I" is identified, then it isn't I. It's just another i. Tolerant "i's" aren't really tolerant. They're full of self worth. This is the politically correct attitude that so permeats our culture, today.

Christ threw the money changers out of the temple. Sin is missing the mark. Intentional evil. . .I'm not sure there can be such a thing as "conscious evil" . . .these are products of full personality. Very far down on the level of vibrations. Tolerating what is pulling down is a Sin.

Beginning and ending the day in ballance is a crucial exercise. Sometimes it is more difficult than others. In a ballanced state I'm closer to I or at least a deputy I. So I tend to be more tolerant. Sometimes, perhaps, too tolerant of my own little i's.

i devised a draw system for posting so i don't always wait until the last minute; today there was such an intolerant i scene (same scenario as last week) there is strong revulsion to posting tonight, regardless if slip says "Wednesday." One part of "should some things be tolerated?" has shown a strong vanity at "should." There was a statement by Mr. G (which i can't find presently)about we react most strongly to others mechanical behavior. It is so appropriate for this situation. It has produced a setting to watch my own attitudes, reactions and much inability to stop negativity - mine.

One note about beginning the day in balance - working to go to sleep with this intention, some part noted the breathing upon awakining. a little like watching your body faint, there is feeling in the separation.

A question for any of the group who may have read William Faulkner's short story, "Dry September" and would understand when i ask if there is anything we can not abet by our presence but must tolerate because there is nothing we can do to stop it, in our 'time's' social order?

by Judy

This week I have had very little to struggle with in the way of tolerance. I am still on holiday, and as have had some very quiet week-days, it has been like a "retreat into the silence" - quite blissful. The days are bright and beautiful and much Work done, plus reading.

The part of the exercise about noticing when one is "tolerant or intolerant to the manifestations of others" and then remembering oneself, has been quite fruitful, in that remembering myself then has had the effect of detaching and lifting above the situation, making a better decision thereby more likely.

This subject to my mind is directly connected with the developing of Conscience, and therefore my decisions at any one time will be dependent on my state. It is very much a work in progress.

The following is from John Bennett's "Talks on Beelzebub's Tales" Part 4, section on Conscience;
"Having rejected them (hope, faith and love),Ashiata Shiemash turns to the fourth sacred impulse, that of Objective Conscience, and concludes that through its regeneration alone can mankind be saved. The reason for this is subtle and needs explaining. In the first place, conscience is not understood, for it is often confused with morality. But morality is an externally imposed rule of conduct, whereas conscience is an independent self-judgment by which a being is able to determine, at any moment, what action to allow and what action to resist. No rules can be comprehensive or flexible enough to correspond to the complexity and variableness of human situations. Moreover, no rules can liberate man from the properties of the organ Kundabuffer or provide him with a safeguard against his own egoism."

(Reading this week has included this book, plus "The Master Game" and R.M.Buck's "Cosmic Consciousness" - all old favourites.)

The balancing at the beginning and end of the day is gradually becoming more regular, and I'm quite comfortable now with the sightless gaze and soundless sound. These are relatively new for me, and I used to compare them a lot with standard Fourth Way exercises, but now I love them for themselves..

Best to all,
Judy.

Good exercise there.

Haven't read it, but it seems to me that there are many things that we cannot abet, personally or globally.

Before sleep, make an intention that when you awaken in the morning you will sense your eyelids before opening your eyes, and then add an awareness of your breathing and finally sensing a whole of your body.

Three times during the day, begin a slow deliberate rhythmic tapping with the left or right foot, and sensing the "I AM" of every breath. Engender a relaxed being state and ponder: "Where has my Search for the real stuff of existence taken me?"

When in the grip of ennui, frustration, sadness, despair or depression, stop for a few moments and, whilst Sensing the whole of your body, Ponder the saying of Mullah Nassr Eddin: "Every-real-happiness-for-man-can-arise-exclusively-only-from-some-unhappiness-also-real-which-he-has-already-experienced." Conclude with an Inner Smile carried upon a Float of Being.

> Before sleep, make an intention that when you awaken in the morning you will sense your eyelids before opening your eyes, and then add an awareness of your breathing and finally sensing a whole of your body.

I remembered to make this intention Monday night right before falling asleep and, lo and behold, I woke up and before I opened my eyes, remembered to sense my eyelids, then my breathing, then my whole body. Interesting. I had no clue whether it would work or not. I didn't doubt it or believe it.

I have found the last exercize most helpful. I have the tendency to ruminate on things and experience ennui or frustration, angst, worry. I have been using this as an alarm clock lately to remember myself.

Nick

---

by Judy

Hi All,
Well, James, you did a lot better than I did with the first part of the exercise. Good for you. It took me three tries to remember the intention of the night before to finally sense the eyelids before they were open, and, needless to say, by the third night, the intention was very strong and repeated several times.
And Nick, I too tend to "ruminate" quite a bit. Also, welcome. Good to hear from you.
A comment on;

> Three times during the day, begin a slow deliberate rhythmic tapping with the left or right foot, and sensing the "I AM" of every breath. Engender a relaxed being state and ponder: "Where has my Search for the real stuff of existence taken me? "

This dove-tailed well with some work with the breath that I've been deeply into during the past four days, and, interestingly enough, the pondering question also relates. Here's how.
On Sunday my daughter and I did our tour of Brisbane bookshops that we usually do when I'm visiting, and I bought "The Miracle of Mindfulness" by Thich Nhat Hanh. (Buddhist Tradition). After reading from cover to cover, I've attempted a couple of the exercises to do with the breath.
I've often had difficulty maintaining following the breath for any length of time, mainly because the attempt seemed to slightly alter the breathing, which I didn't want. However, this author takes me through methods for western beginners which he suggests mastering before "following the breath" for long periods of time. The one I like particularly is involved with counting the breath, and is something like this;
"I am breathing in - one.
I am breathing out - one.
I am breathing in - two.
I am breathing out - two and so on until ten, when one begins again.
If one gets mixed up (goes out of mindfulness) one has to start again. This is to be done while doing routine tasks, up to and including calm conversation with another, until the process is easy and comfortable. (I'm still using the counting obviously - and have a way to go yet, though yesterday managed to stay in mindfulness for a couple of hours with no sense of strain or fatigue). It is impossible to identify (even with the breath) while doing this, and I really seem to be "following" or "watching" the breath rather than having any sense of self in it. This is a break-through for me.

So, yes, the searching takes me to many places indeed.
I am cautious, but accept what helps (using the experience itself as the main yardstick), even though as a seeker I am predominantly Fourth Way.
Seems that over time my search is more accurately descibed as a Fifth Way. The ES website has no doubt assisted this development, and I am most grateful.

The exercise mentioned, after about ten to twenty minutes, results in a clear, limpid mind, with minimal thoughts.

I've achieved this before with both mantra meditation (Vedic), and good visualisation procedures (the ones where the hypnogogic images of faces and geometric figures such as interlaced triangles and rectangles dance in front of one) - but these both have the disadvantage of not being able to be done in life, unlike the above.

I also mention, with astonishment and regret, that during the long period of mindfulness I noticed an instance of covetousness, so a good element of observation entered in too. What happened was that I was complimenting a friend on her new outfit - and some i's in me revealed that there was a bit of "I really want one like that" included.
This was quite a shock. I didn't think covetousness was in me much at all regarding material things.

That's it for this morning.
Ian, sometimes there's enough in one of your weekly exercises to keep me going for months.
Another most revealing one. Thanks.
Judy.

Does anyone have any thoughts on the broader ramifications, implications, and meaning behind the intention/sleep exercise? What is its purpose as it relates to knowing one's self, self-remembering, and personal growth?

---

by Harry

James,

You're making contact with a deeper level of your self. Something beyond your ordinary consciousness.

Beyond that you're starting off your day in a Work place. This leads you to a beginning balanced day.

There may also be some benefit to your dream life.

Beyond that I think these things should be pondered on for your own growth.

Harry

---

by Judy

Hi James,
I think there is much to be pondered on the intention/sleep exercise also. Harry's -

> There may also be some benefit to your dream life.

is worth a mention, if a somewhat peculiar one.
viz:
On Thursday night I dreamed that I drove my car into a ditch because of not negotiating a corner on a roundabout.
I didn't take too much notice - usually for me, car dreams are talking about the physical body (the vehicle I move around in), so just gave myself a reminder to have a preventive health check.
Nevertheless, on Friday evening when driving to a work shift, I took extra care. When on one of the many roundabouts here, the car began very loud clicking noises and didn't turn easily. I had to return home. Something to do with the driveshaft (??) which has to be fixed. First major car repair since I bought in 2001.

Reflecting on this, when in deep sleep, we have what we term "no consciousness" whatsoever. The closest state of consciousness to this is the dream state, which we have a thread to.

Best,
J.
"Remember yourself, always, and everywhere."

Dreaming and Consciousness

This results from this weeks exercise: the consciousness of the dreaming mind is only peripherally related to the consciousness that controls the body.

I have periodically had "blind" dreams. These are usually somewhat frightening. I'm driving and suddenly realize I can't see where I'm going. I fight to see and eventually awaken. I long ago realized that the struggle to see in the dream was related to a struggle to open my eyes, to move my eyelids away from my eyes, which my brain told me were functioning in my dream, but I couldn't see.

I had one of these types of dreams last night. But in the middle of trying to struggle to open my eyes the thought of the exercise came to my mind. I opened my eye lids, but remained in some state that was inbetween dreaming and ordinary, body control consciousness. If I closed my eyes I could remain with dream images. Much the same as closed eyes during meditation can call forth floating images.

There was still this fear of blindness that pervaded my chest. I got up, urinated, and layed back down and the state remained. So did the dream fear that was permeating my chest. My rational mind knew better. But something kept having to test closing and opening my eyes. Some almost primordial instinct to make sure I was still able to see.

At the same time I became keenly conscious that what was the consciousness of my dream state was not related to the consciousness of my waking state at all. This was almost as if the consciousness of my dream state didn't connect to my body. Now I am also aware of O's discussion of being cold and waking up to realize his body was cold. I've had similar experiences. But this was a clear demonstration to me that that consciousness that was at work during my dreaming couldn't control my body.

Perhaps, I think, as I'm typing this, that there is a relationship to the horse and reins as described by G. The driver has the reins. The passenger doesn't.

Judy, with regard to your dream life experience. I've had similar. The one word of caution I'd give is that it can become almost debilitating to pay too much attention to these messages. This one was real and you were saved something painful. Probably by this exercise and our connections here, as much as your own caution. Because you took it differently. But when dreams become omens, which they can after this type of experience, it's very important to remember that not every black cat is a curse.

by Zenas

The evening before exercise also seems to help sleep, it also helped show where thought has been during the night, otherwise. Such an endless train of drivel.
I had planned to answer before tonight, now I'm glad I didn't: listening to a family member talk about my "rountine" when I was younger brought to light my exasperation with the other family member is because I want her to be conscious - understand what she does to everyone else. She'd choose the "red pill" - not a judgement, just a statement she'd agree with any time. "IT" did not like seeing herself, yet, there was a sense of remembering oneself in the moment because of the conversation.
The rhythmic tapping exercise was one of the few I have been able to consistently carry through a week. It helped temper identification.
It has been of a week for understanding how little Zenas truly wants to see herself, it isn't pleasant.

Work Program week beginning 2 October 2006

The seeker now suspects something lurking behind the manifestations of annoyances and Ponders on the nourishment that could derive from an affirming of a more sustained effort when faced by a deeper facet of annoyance. The seeker dares to consider the undeclared hidden source of annoyance that lingers in the shadow. Can the seeker draw these elements into the light of conscious duty and intentional suffering? Can the seeker accept the irritation of annoyance while applying an appropriate affirmation springing from their hope for consciousness?

During the week, the seeker Ponders their willingness to consciously put their functional parts into the path of annoyance, so that they may practice further, deepening their acumen for impartial observation while in the throes of mechanical and habitual reactions to daily annoyances.
During the week, seek out the situations where you know you will be annoyed. Observe your predictable, mechanical emotions and reactions to those situations while sensing the spinal column.

The seeker may have discovered a fleeting joy experienced in this task of combat with their petty annoyances - but resolves not to be distracted by the rewards of Work.
During the week, when one experiences the rewards of effort, use the energy thus gained to enter a deep inner calm of Being, free from emotional polarity and grounded in a deep sensing of physical presence.

In the evening, while sensing the spine, the seeker Ponders: Like a pearl coated from the irritation of a grain of sand, is Being created from our struggle to sustain Holy Denying and Holy Affirming?

Again apologies. Break out the tea, coffee, whiskey, settle down, settle in.....

Back from the hills. Headed to the mountains to cut wood for the winter at my trailer and to build a desk and bookshelf for my suite. Alone, totally for 3 days out of the 10 days up in them thar hills. Bought a new chainsaw to attack the woods, ugh, ugh, Que in tool time gorilla sounds. After unloading the vehicle I awoke the second day to the sight of this beautiful new 43cc. massive horsepowered chainsaw, ugh, ugh ooo, oo. Prime 6 times, pull 5 times and voila she starts. For those unfamiliar with chainsaws, when the motor starts, the blade is supposed to remain stationary thus saving fingers, toes, legs, heads. Not this baby. It started at max revs and the blade revolved even faster. Caught unexpected by the ferocity of this ravenous dinosaur I watched the blade bounce up and down cutting intricate and unwelcome patterns into my new deck and nearly delimbing me in the process. No problem, turn down the idle. Prime-pull.....vroooooooooom 10,000 RPM and the blade hacking and slashing and me running and jumping and dancing and screaming. No problem, turn the idle right down, turn the blade limiter off and....Prime, pull vroooooooooooooom this time almost off the deck and head for the hills. After screwing around with this monster for another 3 hours I, in a moment of supreme consciousness, decided that it was my multi bit screwdrriver that was to blame for everything wrong in the whole world and threw it so violently at the deck that it exploded in a megaburst of fragments that would put the fireworks on the Sidney Harbour bridge to shame. I almost cried in frustration. I like cutting and chopping wood(it's a man thing), and now nothing. No cutting, no chopping, no piling, no large winter fires and what did I do to deserve this and why does God hate me and nobody loves me and.....!!!!!!!! A conspiracy I tell ya to deprive me of the pleasure and sweat of my woodpile. When I actually regained consciousness I began to ponder about this incident and came to realize that the beast is always lurking, always waiting to attack in moments of deep sleep and the only defence is awareness. My own executioner, let down by totally unnecesary feelings of anticipation and dashed expectations and poor planning. (Duh! Why didn't I start the stupid thing before I left). But still. I couln't account for the extreme anger and violence until Ian's post this week asking that we look deeper into the dark well underlying annoyance and frustration. So ponder I did deep and long.And when I finally looked entered that long black closet, I emerged in form fitting spandex tights,smoke tinted lacy nylons, scarlet pumps and a delicate chiffon V neck, accesorized by a matching denim belt and purse..... and wishing I was a girlie just like my dear papa. Hey, just deal with it! In fact when I looked into that black place I saw the face of my father in all it's ruddy fury telling me how useless I was, and how I can't get anything right, and how stupid I am . Very ugly. Very painful but also a revelation. How many other negative behaviors has this terrible voice influenced. But now I will watch carefully and correct and reconcile. Thank you Ian.

Zenas writes that O said humor was the connection of two centeres. Can you elaborate on this for me? Never heard this before and I can certainly connect humor and joy to all three centres very easily. I think once O removed himself from his intellectual domain he would be a very funny guy. Also Zenas, you were wondering if the Touchstone was merely another aspect of personality and I would like to make a comment. When we're asleep the Touchstone can provide no balance whatsoever. Render unto Caesar. But during consciousness and mindfulness this "center" is very relevant and an excellent guide and balance. I believe after all the work choices you have made, all your sacrifices and sufferings, that your own personal Touchstone exists in reality. Since at some point in your life you are going to have to trust this "inner-conscience" may I suggest you begin right now, even if only as an exercise. It is another step. A big one to be sure, but you just might find you have earned that trust and your decisions are well considered and faithful when taken in awareness.

Judy, Judy,Judy, What a great exercise the I Am 1-2-3-4- is. May you keep searching and sharing. As to the fourth way or fifth or whatever, this Work may be considered the thousand ways.... that work. If it works it's the fourth way or fifth way or whatever. A caution. While doing this exercise I fell asleep and reached I Am "37" before I heard my snoring. I then varied the count by jumping by 3"s and the focus returned. Keep up the good work Aussi, Aussi, Aussi, oy, oy oy.

Endlesssearch. Always thought of this as an unending tireless search for the truth. But now I also realize that this work is also an untiring search for His Endlessness. I'm slow, but I get there. Same thing?

Finally Zenas, enjoy your posts. I've noticed you are writing on a more regular basis and hope you keep shovelling. And to those who don't post, or post very infrequently, please share the workload and help us all escape.

Good to be back, Fred

I've currently been reading the de Hartmann (definitive version) which arrived from a friend this week. "The spirit of the Work" comes through clearly from the pages. It is a treasure.
This absorbing of the feeling of this book led to a dream-flash of a bold word in black capitals; ENVY was the word.

Okay. This horror is apparently not on the surface (well, the family hasn't noticed it anyway) - so, maybe not - or, what if it is there down deep somewhere and manifests some other way? eg ; envy (or anger/impatience etc) - to resentment - to a vague feeling of "I don't have much in common with that person" - to a mild dislike - to feeling either superior or inferior - to aloofness (this I have often been accused of even when small) - to thinking that I'm a loner and somehow "different" - to avoidance patterns.....
Ah - now that puts a different perspective on things.

This ties in neatly with this week's Work, especially > Observe your predictable, mechanical emotions and reactions to those situations while sensing the spinal column because in doing this, my mechanical reactions in particular were clearly those of avoidance.

Now, are avoidance patterns negative?
Maybe not always. But, where they are so habitual and mechanical, is there not the chance that they will carry over into activities where the avoidance is totally inappropriate?

The reason I'm reporting all this is that today - after 2 days of observation and trying to trace the reactions back to their source - or at least below the surface somewhere - and simply repeating "Remember yourself" in as many situations as I could, what happened was that I had cleaned out my wardrobe and delivered three large piles of clothes to the local charity op-shop

(and must admit it was all pretty satisfying and enjoyable) before it occurred to me that I'd been avoiding this task for ages.

Seems like a small victory to me.
I'll keep on keeping on with this method of working with negativity for a while - meaning working backwards from the physical reactions as well as the obvious emotions. Maybe the sensing of the spinal column helped with this too.

But Ian, this next bit was too much for me after these little insights that I'm quite chuffed about;

> The seeker may have discovered a fleeting joy experienced in this task of combat with their petty annoyances - but resolves not to be distracted by the rewards of Work.

Tomorrow I'll work on this part.
Cheers everyone,
Judy.

Very droll, Fred. Very droll.
(I'm referring to that hilarious description of your miraculous escape from the renegade chainsaw in particular)
Good to have you back.

And speaking of humour;
Zenas' reference to humour that you mentioned caught my eye too, and is of interest (thanks Zenas).
Reflecting on it, it dawned on me that not only does humour touch multiple centres (first the intellectual, as one has to "get the joke", then the emotional as a feeling of amusement or similar, and then the physical as the laugh manifests), but that the 3 centres actually work in the correct order .. in these instances.
This reminds me of Beelzebub's comment regarding humour. He said something to the effect that "the laughter was so hearty and sincere amongst the members of the Akhalden Society (I think that's where it was in BT) that for a moment he quite forgot which planet he was on".

That's it for now. The body is fighting with some horrible influenza still, so heading to bed early.. Probably be better by morning from the boost to the immune system from the healthy laughter.
Best wishes,
Judy.

She didn't make "sensing the spinal column" though a couple times the shoulders were sensed. This week's exercise did help me notice when irritation and anger was at a manager's mechanical anger and to withdraw, a little, to see "hurt feelings" and self-righteous indignation.

Sometimes, am able to catch and momentarily stop the head drama, which has a nasty theme of "shoulds" towards others. Have been trying to direct it to understanding - comprehension of the part to the whole (Possibility of Man's Evolution) On a general level, trying to sense Zenie's physical place within the rotating sphere and everything going on in it: wars and wars and wars, draughts, floods, famines, western economics, etc. Then I'll get to the planetary. This week's Amish tragedy affected me because it's such a Christian concept most Christians can't and don't want to fathom - forgiveness and real faith. It helps us question our own cosmology.

Lawrick: O's comments about humor are in "In Search of the Miraculous," I will have to find them and simply won't have time until at least next week. Thank-you for the encouragement. Don't know about the Touchstone, do know there have been a few moments of a special connection while practicing yoga (in a group) and when I was able to work with Movements. A calm exhilaration without time is the best I can describe. Different from even the "being there" detachment when one watches interchanges as the self(Zenas) inter-acts.

Here are the laughter quotes:

ISOTM, Chapter 11:

"Laughter is also directly connected with accumulators. But laughter is the opposite function to yawning. It is not pumping in, but pumping out, that is, the pumping out and the discarding of superfluous energy collected in the accumulators. Laughter does not exist in all centers, but only in centers divided into two halves—positive and negative. If I have not yet spoken of this in detail, I shall do so when we come to a more detailed study of the centers. At present we shall take only the intellectual center. There can be impressions which fall at once on two halves of the center and produce at once a sharp 'yes' and 'no.' Such a simultaneous 'yes' and 'no' produces a kind of convulsion in the center and, being unable to harmonize and digest these two opposite impressions of one fact, the center begins to throw out in the form of laughter the energy which flows into it from the accumulator whose turn it is to supply it. In another instance it happens that in the accumulator there has collected too much energy which the center cannot manage to use up. Then every, the most ordinary, impression can be received as double, that is, it may fall at once on the two halves of the center and produce laughter, that is, the discarding of energy.
"You must understand that I am only giving you an outline. You must remember that both yawning and laughter are very contagious. This shows that they are essentially functions of the instinctive and the moving centers."

"Why is laughter so pleasant?" asked someone.

"Because," G. answered, "laughter relieves us of superfluous energy, which, if it remained unused, might become negative, that is, poison. We always have plenty of this poison in us. Laughter is the antidote. But this antidote is necessary only so long as we are unable to use all the energy for useful work. It is said of Christ that he never laughed. And indeed you will find in the Gospels no indication or mention of the fact that at any time Christ laughed. But there are different ways of not laughing. There are people who do not laugh because they are completely immersed in negative emotions, in malice, in fear, in hatred, in suspicion. And there may be others who do not laugh because they cannot have negative emotions. Understand one thing. In the higher centers there can be no laughter, because in higher centers there is no division, and no 'yes' and 'no.'"

THE FOURTH WAY, Chapter 9:

Q. As we are now, are all impressions on the same level?

A. Oh no. Impressions can be very varied. In the Food Diagram we take them as H 48 because that represents the great majority of impressions. They are, so to speak, indifferent impressions—maybe of one kind, maybe of another; but by themselves they produce no effect. Yet at the same time they are food. They reach us as 48, and in our ordinary state they do not go further. Man would not be able to live in these conditions But there are some impressions 24—not as many as 48 but a certain quantity of them; and in very rare cases there may be impressions 12 and even 6, but these are exceptional. They do not enter into this diagram because they transform themselves If they come as 24 they may easily be transformed into 12 and maybe further. But they come in a very small quantity

In ordinary man, who is not learning to remember himself, some of these ordinary impressions 48 are also transformed, but in quite a different way. They are developed further, or helped to develop further, by reactions of a certain kind—for instance, by laughter. Laughter, in the sense of humour, plays a very important part in connection with impressions— again remember that I said in an ordinary man. With the help of laughter many impressions 48 are transformed into 24 But this is only because it is necessary for life, for we could not live without impressions. You remember I said that our chemical factory works only for itself It produces all kinds of very precious materials, but it spends them all on its own existence. It has nothing in reserve and nothing with which to develop itself So if man wants to change and become different, if he wants to awaken his hidden possibilities, he cannot rely on the mechanical means of production; he must look for conscious means But man's organism is such a wonderful invention that everything is taken into consideration, everything has its own key, so to speak.

A function that looks useless, such as laughter, helps to transform certain impressions which otherwise would be lost If there were no laughter or humour on our level, this level would be even lower than it is now.

It can be said that for a man on the ordinary level who does not try to understand what self-remembering means, or who never heard of it, laughter fulfils a certain definite function in the organism It replaces self-remembering in a very small, insufficient way, since it helps quite dull, uninteresting impressions to pass further and become vivid This is the chief function of laughter Of course, there are many different kinds of laughter, some quite useless.

What I just said about laughter and humour refers only to ordinary centres, in higher centres it is no longer useful. It means that a certain impression falls simultaneously on the positive and negative parts of a centre and this produces a feeling of exhilaration It helps to see the other side, increases the capacity of seeing things. But in higher centres there is no need for it. In higher centres we see things not as contradictions, not as opposed to one another, but we see them as they are.

Q. Laughter seems to have a physiological effect.

A. Yes, maybe a contradictory impression that cannot be harmonized produces a tension, and laughter relaxes it.

Impressions 48 enter constantly. As I have said, a certain amount changes mechanically but the greater amount remains unchanged. They can be changed by our becoming conscious, or trying to become conscious. If we are more awake, our impressions become more vivid.

Impressions based on or requiring only Hydrogen 48 are impressions we almost miss or notice very little. An impression that attracts attention and leaves a trace already passes to 24. If you try to analyse your past and write down what you actually remember of some particular episode in it, you will see how little you do remember. This is a better way to study the material of impressions.

Q. Is an impression anything I get through the medium of the five senses?

A. An impression is the smallest unit of thought, sensation or emotion.

BEELZEBUB'S TALES, ART, page 478:

“I personally preferred these Saturdays to all the other days of the week and tried not to miss one of them; and I preferred them because the demonstrations arranged on those days by the learned beings of that group frequently provoked such spontaneous and sincere laughter among all the other terrestrial threecentered beings who were in the given section of the club, that I sometimes forgot among which three-centered beings I was, and that being-impulse manifested itself in me which is proper to arise only in one-natured beings like myself.

BEELZEBUB’S OPINION OF WAR, page 1080:

“Yes, my boy, when you will exist among them and will be a witness of these incongruous being-manifestations, then, even in spite of the fact that you know the cause of these incongruities, you will be unable, as they express it, not to ‘laugh’ inwardly and at the same time with the whole of your Being you will pity these unfortunates, and with your ‘inner laughter’ there will gradually be mixed by itself what is called ‘an-essence-palnassoorian-grief.’

Interesting that Beelzebub refers to himself as a one-natured being.
Can anyone connect that to anything else in BT?

---

by Judy

Thanks for all that Ian.

Appropriate sincere laughter in ordinary life tells much about a person for me. I refer to "the ease of connection" with this person in ordinary life. One sees people in early recovery from eg; addictions, to whom everything is hilarious - maybe because they have masses of contradictions? Then, as they recover, laughter falls more into place with other people's amusement. This "normalising" is always a hopeful sign of recovery beginning to happen.
Just an observation really, but the life level does indeed seem to lift a little.
The following seems relevent to this;

>
> It can be said that for a man on the ordinary level who does not try to understand what self-remembering means, or who never heard of it, laughter fulfils a certain definite function in the organism It replaces self-remembering in a very small, insufficient way, since it helps quite dull, uninteresting impressions to pass further and become vivid This is the chief function of laughter Of course, there are many different kinds of laughter, some quite useless.

Of course, this pleasant ability to laugh (often at themselves), lifts them out of the "poor me's" and they are easier to work with or just be around too.

Best wishes,
Judy.

I don't recall this connection, and it is most interesting, so if it rings any bells for anyone, please would you be so kind as to share?

Work Program week beginning 9 October 2006

by Ian

During the week, Seekers may repeat the following phrases at appropriate times as they follow their breath:

Observing

Aware that I am angry (irritated, jealous, envious, inferior, depressed, etc.), I breath in, Letting go of my identification with anger (etc.), I breath out.

Pondering

As I breath in, I Ponder - Is suffering one of our most under utilized resources?
As I breath out, I Ponder - Is suffering one of our most under utilized resources?

Sensing 10 Bones

(Each number may be repeated several times if necessary)

1. As I breath in, I Sense my Lower right leg bone,
As I breath out, I Illuminate my Lower right leg bone.

2. As I breath in, I Sense my Upper right leg bone,
As I breath out, I Illuminate my Upper right leg bone.

3. As I breath in, I Sense my Pelvic bone,
As I breath out, I Illuminate my Pelvic bone.

4. As I breath in, I Sense my Upper left leg bone,
As I breath out, I Illuminate my Upper left leg bone.

5. As I breath in, I Sense my Lower left leg bone,
As I breath out, I Illuminate my Lower left leg bone.

6. As I breath in, I Sense my Spinal column and skull,
As I breath out, I Illuminate my Spinal column and skull.

7. As I breath in, I Sense my Upper right arm bone,
As I breath out, I Illuminate my Upper right arm bone.

8. As I breath in, I Sense my Lower right arm bone,
As I breath out, I Illuminate my Lower right arm bone.

9. As I breath in, I Sense my Upper left arm bone,
As I breath out, I Illuminate my Upper left arm bone.

10. As I breath in, I Sense my Lower left arm bone,
As I breath out, I Illuminate my Lower left arm bone.

Sensing bones was an astute awareness for me; I've had a curiosity about bones since I was young and saw my first x-ray of my own arm. Bones usually out last everything else, yet, we don't even think of them. I added the jaw-bone - strongest one in the body - and one I later in the week could be reminded of when it was moving.

On the observation: re-defining irritations, little depressions and envy as anger actually takes some seeing. There is something that wants to say "real" anger seldom happens any more; seeing how sneaky it has turned is hard to breathe out, I found myself breathing in too hard, almost holding it.

Suffering: I'm no longer sure I've ever achieved it.

---

by Harry

We suffer every day. Right now my ankle hurts because I've aged and helped my son move some furniture yesterday. Can I use that suffering, a little. But it's not the same as intentional suffering. By bearing my ankle I can try to consciously suffer. Intentionally suffering is to choose something to give up--thus G's example of giving up hypnotism.

As most here know I fast twice a year given G and O's discussion. That is a bit of intentional suffering. Because I've chosen to do something. And I must do it without moaning. This is different than when I was small and had to "give up candy for Lent". Because all I did was look forward to Easter when I could pig out on candy. That isn't intentionally suffering. That's sort of like the monks beating themselves.

More important, giving up something inside of me becomes a stronger intentional suffering. I'm a "know it all". I understand now that much of that came into being by learning to bluff. Being smart and being willing to open my mouth I learned to take control of lots of everyday situations. This illusionary control helped feed small i's. Because it was rewarded in the ordinary sense. Giving it up was and is an effort.

My learned instinct (contradiction of terms there by biological and psychologicl science; but real in the human, I think) is to have the answer first, loudest, most assuredly. Giving that up, especially in ordinary situations, is an intentional suffering. Because I can't bite my tongue. I have to fight my internal desire. And that creates friction that helps develop something else.

The small step of giving up meat and eggs and milk and cheese for forty days and forty nights built and ability to give up something else. Or to suffer the impositions of others in silence. Or to challenge them when it's time to throw the money changers out of the temple.

Very good, very difficult week on many levels.

I found the bone recognition and illumination exercise enjoyable and productive in keeping me awake. I like the fact that it includes and integrates all 3 centres at once and provides a sense of calm meditation while I am evoking. I added the breast bone to this exercise as my personal "I AM" seems to resonate in this area. I can't seem to feel my pelvic bone. When I have this experience with other bones I can physically touch them and thus find a basis for my sensing apparatus. But the pelvis? Anyone have any ideas on sensing this area as there seems to be a huge black hole in the middle of my attempted emanations.

The last few weeks I have made some super efforts in attempting to finish my office before the inevitable Canadian chill arrives. While working with my hands I made efforts to memorize a number of songs my best friend's wife loves to sing; approx. 20 of them. For the most part I was successful but the pressure of finishing my project and the added work of memorization absolutely drained the tank and ever since the door has been thrown open to, and, I've been almost unable to reconcile the anger and black irritations that have been attacking me these last few weeks. I try to rest but see only laziness. Energy is so impotant to recognize and neutralize these negative behaviors but as I wrote, the tank seems empty. On the positive side when I screwed up a minor assembly I started violently cussing myself and then very clearly saw that it was my father at the "I" and this was a remarkable revelation. How many more of these negative behaviors are intersected by these criticisms

And speaking of my father.....For many years I was unable to appreciate or forgive his demanding and critical nature. I can now say because of the insights and some of the work I have done at this site that something very positive has occured in the sense that I can now appreciate his frustration, his violent anger, his drinking. He wasn't offered the opportunities his children recieved as a result of his hard labors on behalf of his family. He never complained about trundling off to the coal mines at 5 in the morning or the fact thatafter working 12 hours digging coal he often worked a second job on the weekends. How creative both parents were but without the opportunities offered us. So because of this program I can now sincerly forgive and love and keep his criticism in proper perspective, a huge leap in my evolution and emotional growth possibilities.

In an attempt to fulfill the 5th Obligolnian Stiving or as an act of conceit or hubris I have started a small spiritual group to learn, to teach, and to learn to teach. The method last week was very successful. Listen very carefully, say almost nothing and people will think you're brilliant. I hope I can fool them long enough to figure out how to do this. This forum demands tremendous personal responsibility in terms of being honorable, demands a higher sense of being. I hope I'm up to it. Any suggestions appreciated!

Got nowhere with the pondering on suffering. Either I couldn't internalize the concept or unecessary personal difficulties barred the door? Why is it that some ponderings can be eaten and digested so quickly and others stand like steel walls barring entrance. Can our negative "I"s be that strong?

This is the part where I finish with a brilliant quote to amaze all with my insite intteligense and purspicasitty but I've suddenly lost it.

Peace to all, Lawrick

This morning I found myself in a somewhat heavy indifferent state where I was far away from the Work, and seemed at a loss as to how to reconnect. I knew I was asleep, but was unable to wake up properly.

The usual Self-rememberings/ being passive to the state weren't effective.

So I looked for something on this site to absorb - preferably something new, as attention and concentration quite limited in this state. I found Ian's treatise on Human Nature (this was added September 26, but I hadn't checked the "What's New" button for some time. I'll be checking it weekly in future.)

Ian, what a fantastic essay/treatise/paper.
Thank you so much!

The diagrams at the bottom of the page could keep me occupied and involved for months alone. This is so very valuable that you have supplied all of these for us to study. I know for a fact that several of these were treated as hidden secret treasure until only recently. The policy of openness allows all of us here to benefit if we wish.

While attempting to decipher the diagrams, the familiar shock of Self-Remembering reasserted itself. and my previous heaviness was transformed into a kind of lightness, as the Work came close again.

This result seems to fit in with the pondering question of this week, in that in this case, the suffering was utilised as a gardener's pruning would be - that is, to permit growth in a different direction. What joy to see all those brilliant diagrams - almost a life's work for some of their authors!

The following also impressed deeply;

> According to Gurdjieff, we need to intentionally apply two conscious shocks. The first has to do with Self Remembering and the second with Intentional Suffering.

Three things to note about the two conscious shocks is that, one, they are intimately connected with issues regarding our understanding of who we think we are and our attitudes towards life, two, they are connected to our ability to control our attention and concentration, and three, they are connected to our ability to control our thoughts and emotions.

The further evolution of the 3 octaves after the Second Conscious shock was not extensively elaborated on by Ouspensky in his writing, but he does relate some interesting quotes from Gurdjieff:

"The effort which creates this 'shock' must consist in work on the emotions, in the transformation and transmutation of the emotions. This transmutation of the emotions will then help the transmutation of si 12 in the human organism. No serious growth, that is, no growth of higher bodies within the organism, is possible without this transmutation. The idea of this transmutation was known to many ancient teachings as well as to some comparatively recent ones, such as the alchemy of the Middle Ages. But the alchemists spoke of this transmutation in the allegorical forms of the transformation of base metals into precious ones." (ISOTM, Chapter 9)

"As has been said earlier, there are two higher centers:
"The higher emotional center, working with hydrogen 12, and
"The higher thinking center, working with hydrogen 6." (ISOTM, Chapter 9)

I'm so to speak back on track and not so asleep again.
Nicoll reminds me that without these bad states, no Work could be done. They are, he says, tests or temptations, so that I can have much practice in transforming them - (my paraphrasing). This is from a wonderful commentary on a man's relationship to himself (pp 365-369) if of interest.

Best wishes,
Judy.

During the week, while Sensing the fullness of the interior presence of the body, Seekers may repeat the following phrases at appropriate times as they follow their breath:

When spending money - "As I breath in and out, I Ponder - What is the currency of Inner Work?"

When receiving change - "As I breath in and out, I Ponder - What portion of my Inner Work is returned to me for growth of Being?"

When excreting bodily wastes - "As I breath in and out, I Ponder - Are these transformed results a down-payment for Being?"

Inner silence should result from daily meditation. When habitual thoughts begin to obscure your inner silence after your daily meditation - "As I breath in and out, I Ponder - How do I maintain the inner silence that results from my Inner Work?"

by Zenas

I've been constantly on the road this week and not had an opportunity to get on a computer. Watching my formatory: possibly because I have so many money exchange opportunities (because I am on the road for my work), once I was in the 'mode' to remember this wek's exercise about currency, it came through often. A couple times I tried to breathe in, breathe out while repeating the phrases in front of the sales-people with whom the money exchanges occured, that didn't work well so I would step aside a little repeat and ponder. How is it most 'others' realize when you're "doing something funny" even if you think you're being discrete? An anedote about Mr. G, where a member asked an elevator operator what he thought of the man who had just left (Mr. G) and the operator answered, "that man knows something." That aura, "presence!" This is trying question if one is sensing the interior presence of the body is presence projected or are we "just actin' funny?"
It was a good exercise because it created realization how much is mostly "head stuff" and not brought back to the body.

by Judy

This week I've concentrated on the maintaining of the inner silence after meditation part of the exercise, using the breath, the inner-smile and half-smile, and doing as many routine tasks as consciously as I could.

I spent some time with the pondering on the currency of inner work, but really haven't come up with anything startling. The pondering has gone around in a circle somewhat.
To clarify;
At first I was considering things like suffering, going against the inclinations of the body, devotion, valuation of the Work, working along the 3 lines of Work (briefly considered some other lines Bennett mentions), the use of knowledge plus being to gain more understanding, etc..... - on the payment side of the ledger. On the receiving side I came up with help from higher sources, little epiphanies, awareness, transformation of suffering to equanimity or joy, increased ability to remember myself; basically all leading to some freedom from --- what? Myself as personality mostly it seems.
Of course there are many other considerations. I've just named a few as examples.

To return to going around in a circle, what the pondering led to was a realisation that the currency of inner work was indeed the practice of the inner work itself. I mean that it is a craft which has to be learned. This brings in much additional currency, such as discipline, wish, and valuation again. Again though, what stands in the way often is myself as a personality once more.

Why is this?
Am I so small and igsignificant and stupid as to not appreciate that I may as well face-up to the difficulties now, as they have to be confronted sometime for sure.
Perhaps so.

Best to everyone,
Judy.
Remember yourself, always, and everywhere.

Imagine that you were born with a sexual orientation that is opposite to what you are now. Given the above, whilst devoting 1/3 of your Attention to a neutral Emotional center, and whilst devoting 1/3 of your Attention to Sensing the presence of your planetary body, Ponder -

Monday - Would this have changed your relationship to your parents?
Tuesday - Would this have changed your conception of yourself?
Wednesday - Would this have changed your choice of friends?
Thursday - Would this have changed your relationship to people of opposite sexual orientation?
Friday - Would this have changed your choice of profession?
Saturday - Would this have changed your understanding of the Work?
Sunday - Would this have changed your conception of His Endlessness?

---

by Harry

If I were female instead of male? Certainly. Passive rather than active. Imagining myself as female is a bit difficult, though. I can compare the things I was expected to do with those my sister was expected to do. Working, for example, was a wholly different thing. As was education.

---

by Harry

I've been doing this pondering this week.

One of the lingering conclusions is that sex, after a certain point in life, ceases to have the same importance. We begin with curiosity as children. Then we move into lust.

As G describes this "lust" is really mechanical and chemical. As I reflect I've always had the same attractions. I can find beauty in many places but attraction has always been to a similar type.

Beyond that, the first three women I had a serious relationship with were all born within five days of each other. And the last two were born in the same day span of the astrological configuration. The same five days, even though years have intervened.

I can see sociological implications with many of these individual questions. But some of those go away. I've always cooked, for example. Though that was considered the female role. But then my stepfather cooked as much as my mother. And my grandfather did his own breakfast and lunch much of the time.

As a single father for over 20+ years I took on that role as well.

The only other pondering was whether or not the exercise includes the idea of being sexually oriented toward a homosexual orientation. That one is more difficult, in that it's not an inclination I've had. Would it have made differences? Gigantic differences in the culture I grew up in. My parents were strict Catholics and this is, in their minds, an abberation.

I've pondered and pondered and can't put myself in the sexual orientation of homosexuality. Somehow this seems connected with the question I started out with. Lust. And the same caveats apply.

---

by Judy

On first reading this, I expected huge differences.

The ponderings have shown that in fact the differences may have been much less than expected.
I have always been encouraged to be a human being first, and a female second.
And upbringing was fortunate in that both parents had professional careers in their own right, so emphasis was always on achieving potential in whatever field I chose. This has enabled financial and intellectual independence throughout life, which in its turn has allowed more "freedom" than would otherwise be the case.

Nevertheless, significant differences may have been there in early years especially. Now, as focus is on Magnetic Centre and The Work, the differences are much much less.
Even thinking about this, I recall that my husband of 22 years and I reversed roles for over two years when the children were early school-age.(I enjoyed this more than he did I think). So equal opportunity has been there even way back.

Even now, though, I'm aware how important my female friends are to me, in that they keep me on the straight and narrow. By this I mean that it's easier to get away with little things with men. They are quite forgiving with a polite female, even without her trying in any way. Not so with women. They've been there, so they see right through any contradictions or my lying to myself, the tiny attempts to get out of doing something unpleasant etc...
I'm not just referring to the sexual attraction element which may or may not be present in these interactions. It is deeper than that. For example, I simply didn't argue with my father, yet had many altercations with Mum in teenage years and later. It's more than hormones. It is something to do with the same or different knowledge and perspective within these relationships.

Thus our gender orientation certainly plays many roles, and a lot of these are "unconscious" ones.

Of course, though, it is almost impossible to know how different things would have been. However, what is very clear is that these differences are lessening as I become more involved in the inner life.

Best wishes,
Judy.
"Remember yourself, always, and everywhere."

---

by Lawrick

I've been giving this topic a great deal of thought for no apparent reason. Like most people raised in conservative Christian environments, my first taste of such sexual differences was the foul flavor of deviation, abberation, perversion, immorality etc., beliefs which I of course outwardly reflected concurrent with the with the contemporary party line. In fact I possesed these negative views until about 10-15 years ago when a greater openess, and tolerance began to pervade the thinking of our cultural consciousness.

It quickly became apparent that people of different sexual persuasions had been terribly persecuted in the past and were still being so persecuted everywhere in the world to greater or lesser degrees. What is the inner morality of such horrors? Are we not all equal creations of His Endlessness? Are we not all granted talents and expected to evolve according to our efforts and sacrifices regardless of sexual preference?

This week, in trying to walk in the shoes of my brothers and sisters so to speak, it is almost impossible to concieve of anything remaining the same in my life were I born with a different sexual persuasion. How would I deal with the rejection, the slurs, the contempt. Could I have become an athelete showering with the boys after a game had they known? More than likely I would have been beaten to a pulp. I would be forced to hide, and lie and obfuscate. My entire existence in my formative years, to the endearing joy of master kundabuffer would have had an irremediable influence on everything from jobs to values, to self esteem, and even to this Work. How much more difficult must be our lives growing up, being treated like a leper in such a society. In truth, at least in Canada, outwardly things have changed, but the snide remarks, the nudge-nudge , wink wink,is still pervasive and frankly I'm not sure any sort of parity will ever evolve given the nature of our "Christian Consevative beliefs. But that's just an opinion.

I can be very "liberal" now about my attitudes towards other sexual orientations, but this week when considering this question and taking it down to the level of eros,mano a mano, while I felt comfortable intellectually, at the same time my body felt a tangible inner revulsion at the thought of doing the beast with two backs with another man. My emotional centre, at such thoughts and feelings, from all the previous conditioning was, quite simply inwardly shuddering at the experience of deviation from my sexual preference. (sheep..... just kidding).

So.....two things. I am not nearly as evolved in this area as I have believed, and the exercises are providing an extremely valuable window because the separation of my centres are so obvious and observable regarding these questions. In this respect, the week so far has proven to be an extremely valuable though uncomfortable epiphany. I wonder if similar experiences have been felt by others.

Wherever though shalt be gathered 2,3,or 4 there also shall I be with thee. Hymn to Osiris 1500 B.C. Sound familiar?

---

by Judy

I approached this week's ponderings imagining I had been born male instead of female. That was interesting enough.

Then, I looked up on Google, and found;
Sexual orientation - Wikipedia, the free encyclopediaSexual orientation describes the direction of an individual's sexuality, ... Common terms for describing sexual orientation include bisexual (bi), ... en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Sexual_orientation - 82k - Cached - Similar pages which is another exercise entirely, and maybe an even more valuable one, as regards ability to externally consider. A whole societal Pandora's box....

And what does this say about our society?

Another person's sexual orientation is really none of my business.
"Live and let live."

Anyway, I'll ponder this corrected impression over the next couple of mornings.

While devoting 1/3 of your Attention to a quiet Intellectual center, 1/3 of your Attention to a neutral Emotional center, and 1/3 of your Attention to Sensing the presence of your planetary body and its breathing, be mindful of:

Monday - Being aware of one's disease as a challenge which moves you towards transformation and evolution.
Tuesday - Being aware of one's clinging to material possessions and money.
Wednesday - Being aware of one's identification with concepts about everything.
Thursday - Being aware of one's fear when chaos and doubt shows up within oneself.
Friday - Being aware of one's identification with thoughts and feelings.
Saturday - Being aware of one's fear to allow silence and emptiness.
Sunday - Being aware of one's death.

Dis-ease.

There are two things there. My dis-ease moves me toward transformation if I use it correctly. Because it is this friction which helps me to have the energy to move.

On the other hand disease, which is also a dis-ease, is a bit different. I've got Type 2 Diabetes. And some of that is dis-ease. I must watch my diet. And that is a dis-ease that is a friction that can be used. But the immune deficiency that comes with this disease isn't quite the same.

A while back I broke out in hives. First time in my life. Ended up it was a medication I had become allergic to. But that disease was different. More puzzling. Trying to determine where this new "thing" came from.

---

by Harry

Material possessions. There are possessions I identify with. Things I use regularly.

Simple things. My toaster blew up. And I needed to replace it. I had to have the exact same toaster. Because it made great toast.

Things I've saved and skimped to purchase. My TV. Because I wanted the best. I don't want to give up the best.

Other possessions I just get along with.

Am I tied to these things. Yes. Would it be better if I weren't? Yes. But can I be totally untied to them? Not in this existence.

Money? As long as I have enough to pay the bills I don't care. My son, on the other hand, wants more. Probably because he grew up in the environment in which money was a tool. Not something I saved.

An interesting thing in this meditation is that some things are more direct. Like loosing electricity. A storm knocks it out for a couple of hours, and if it's night that's fine. But during the day, part of my existence is taken away.

---

by Harry

I dropped a glass today.
It broke.
It was my favorite glass.
I almost cried.
I wasn't identified with my glass.
I just liked it.

> Thursday - Being aware of one's fear when chaos and doubt shows up within oneself.

This exercise is particularly important to me at this time as I am currently experiencing the serious dis-ease of doubt, chaos, anxiety, a singular mariner lost without a compass. How can this be?

Ever since my very difficult inner and outer work this summer and early fall I've experienced a state best described as running on fumes. Everything requires a monumental effort to begin and I continually finish out of fuel long before I reach the finish line.

I am not pondering to a necessary degree.
I have turned off the stop exercise from time to time and at times I am not observing the necessary meditation protocols to recieve any benefit.
I am feeling, expressing negative behaviors without reconciliation.
I am watching women exclusively with the left eye and on and on and on!

I have tried several stategies to explode this funk from making extra efforts to turning off the computer, distancing myself from the program, putting on an old T shirt. watching mind numbing television, passing as much gas as possible (now there's more than anyone needs to know) just trying to discover a charging mechanism for my Work Batteries.

I need to refocus, rediscover my intent and purpose, recover my sense of gratitude for the privelege of knowing a higher purpose exists.

Is it possible that we experience times, certain periodicities when we burn out and need to turn away from the pressures for awhile? Has anyone else experienced this phenomenon?

Other conditions of this state as it applies to Thursdays' pondering, is an unnatural sense of high anxiety and impending doom as I lessen and neglect the duties and tithes I owe the Creator.
Is this condition unique in the Work?
Are there any psychic aspirins in the medicine chest?
I don't like experiencing myself like this no matter how much Holy Denying potential is available.

Doctor, doctor, won't you give me some news
I got a bad case of the Being Parkdolg Duty Blues.

Hi Lawrick,

> Is this condition unique in the Work?
> Are there any psychic aspirins in the medicine chest?
> I don't like experiencing myself like this no matter how much Holy Denying potential is available.

I too experience these times.
I call them my earth-bound unconscious states.

Here are my generic "psychic aspirins", though the particular seem to vary with each phase of this experience, so they are not even suggestions, but rather just what I do now, and this is very much a work in progress...

1. I recall that for most of my life I have been like this and wasn't even aware of the loss.

This means I have really found something so valuable that when it seems lost, I feel pain. This implies that, however painful it is, it is indeed a progression.

2. You mention "burnout", and of course energy management is involved here - so the next thing I do is some "self-care" along the lines of going back to basics such as enough sleep, healthy food and trying not to express negativity no matter how I feel.

3. I remind myself that I have earth and heaven in me and that if I were entitled to be always in heaven I'd be "enlightened". But I'm not. I'm not fully unconscious either. I'm somewhere in between, towards awakening, and this has to be accepted with grace, lest negativity deplete energy further. This is so hard sometimes that accepting the suffering is maybe itself a form of Work - even without the accompanying "extraordinary aliveness" which accompanies it in smoother times.

4. I remind myself that a lake, to be clear, has to have an inflow and an outflow. Otherwise it will be stagnant and not in a good state.
This is where service to others comes in.
Self-talk is something along the lines of;
"Well, if self-consciousness is eluding me, I may as well do something useful in as mindful a way as possible, expecting no reward" - or even unconsciously useful if the darkness is really heavy.

5. Then I wait in faith and assurance that "This too will pass" - and it always does. The Buddhist influences of mindfulness in particular are very much a part of the Search for me now. The blessing of just "being present" sustains me here especially.

I think astrological and personal "periodicities" entirely likely. Your post resonated strongly as I experienced one of these "loss of connection" phases very recently.
In fact, it was doing this Wednesday's exercise -

> Wednesday - Being aware of one's identification with concepts about everything.

which brought the realisation that I was actually prolonging this unconscious state by identifying with the concept that I should always be able to have the self-conscious level.!
It may indeed be this resulting separation and non-identification with this concept which allowed some good Observation that day. I've turned the corner for this particular "dark night" now.

As usual, the block was myself, but it needed to be found and understood before it was dislodged.
(Nicoll likens this to the Biblical passage about the woman with ten talents who lost one, and had to sweep the floors and look diligently to find it again.)

So thanks to Ian for another good set of exercises.
And Lawrick, thanks for posting that.

A bit of synchronicity perhaps?

Best,
Judy.

P.S. No matter how tired or flat I feel, I can usually read. Favourites are Nicoll (he answers me), The Oragean Version, and "Our Life with Mr Gurdjieff" of de Hartmann, as well as anything of Mr G's himself. These are books where the egregore (spirit of the thing) is strong for me, and often this is enough. Before our Online Group, this would probably have been my main sustenance in difficult times. And Lawrick, just posting is work on the second line (as well as the first of course), and you are doing that, and you're obviously doing the weekly exercise too.
What I'm saying is I take things easy by using a natural personality strength (reading), as a way of being kind to myself (self-care aspect) during the "tank-empty" times. And I don't worry about it. It will pass.

Judy'

There must certainly be a large store of compassion in your "beinghouse" to respond in such detail to some of my inner dis-ease of late. I am not going into any detail with respect to your "generic" advice. Suffice to say it was a healing salve. The last thing I wish to produce is a sense of self pity and incapability as we all know the rules of the game. I'm begining to "feel better" again. You and others have most certainly helped in providing a ladder to emerge from my incomprensible nosedive into the pit. In the end of course, we must climb out of all negative states one rung at a time, hence the reference to a ladder. One thing I will relate is that for months my inner work has been highlighted by an outer light, a joy, a halo which brought me exceptional peace and happiness. This was the missing "element" in the work of late as I have now discovered, a beautiful gift neither requested nor expected. Now I must return to the "grind" without this visible reward and shall do so with real intent. This gift of joyous gratitude I now realize was a small scent of perfume of the greater purpose, something to be strived for but never expected or demanded. Off we go!

One other thing of note. As an athlete, as part of a team, I did things physically that would have been otherwise almost impossible without a higher team purpose. Driving my body to limits I would have never thought possible, playing half a game with a severely broken hand and thumb and not wishing to let my teamates down by leaving the competition and so on. I think of this group in the same way though I have met not a single one. I doesn't matter. We are all driven by a common purpose to whatever end and hopefully as a group bear some responsibility to aid our brothers and sisters in times of distress. So I extend my thanks for the time and trouble you took to help a fellow team mate. Off I go now to pick up my shovel and start digging again, for myself and others and the benefit of His Endlessness.

Gratitude is half the path of enlightenment..Rumi

Hang an object on the wall or ceiling where you will see it right away when you first open your eyes in the morning. This object will serve as a reminder before you get out of bed to inhale and exhale three breaths gently while maintaining a half-smile.

Sit in solitude for 10 to 20 minutes. Maintain a half-smile. Begin to follow your breath. Give rise to the thought, "I will use my finger to point at myself," and then instead of pointing at your body, point away in the opposite direction. Contemplate seeing your bodily form present before you - in the trees, the grass, the sky, the river, etc. Be mindful that you are in the universe and the universe is in you: if the universe is, you are; if you are, the universe is.

Sit quietly. Breathe and smile the half-smile. Visualize the image of a person who has caused you suffering. Regard the features you hate or despise the most or find the most replusive. Visualize the person in a coffin. Ponder that we all must die. Continue until you feel compassion rise in your heart and your anger and resentment disappear.

I am resisting this week, for some reason.
And what is around me is resisting.
Car stopped running at the drug store. Another bill.
Hit my head on the refrigerator.
Resistance.
Was it a full moon recently. Must have been.
Is there a full moon in me.
Still I resist.

Wish to thank you Ian for discovering another, for me at least, a far more effective snooze button.

> Hang an object on the wall or ceiling where you will see it right away when you first open your eyes in the morning. This object will serve as a reminder before you get out of bed to inhale and exhale three breaths gently while maintaining a half-smile.

Never fell back to sleep so fast,..... and never so happy doing so.
Three times I've tried and three times I've died. Well tomorrow's another day. Being such an insomniac I believe I'll try the exercise tonite. Just to let you know that I'm at least trying, I hung my shorts on the night lamp as a reminding factor. No way to sleep after that view right? Smiled harder, still went back to sleep, Geez! So much for that!

The exercise projecting my body to other spaces is really very fascinating for a number of reasons.
1.Am I dressed appropriately? Do I need to be dressed at all? You wouldn't want to see me hanging from a tree wearing a Speedo believe me. Why must I see myself dressed at all?

This exercise made me feel very alive, in touch with the elements, the air the sun, the ambient noise, a realization that plants exist directly within the elements, their food,water,energy directly absorbed without question. A realization also of the suffering of things, the limited inability to alter their environments and thus unconscious forbearance.

I also attempted this exercise as a spirit, becoming the tree, the sky, the bird, the dog and this was beautiful,releasing, liberating. A note of caution.... if one sits still for any length of time, quiet, smiling, in a Mona Lisa way,..... people may approach you to buy drugs. Only the good natural stuff my esteemed friends.

The final aspect of the weeks' exercise had a very depressing affect on my emotional center. Imagining an enemy, even the most bitter and disaffected gives me neither joy nor reconciliation at this point. It made me realize that I somewhere possess a fear of death, something I've either repressed, or perhaps lack the emotional strengh to totally face.

I am reminded of Ammit, the crocodile headed Ancient Egyptian eater of the dead. Interesting the Ancients did not profess a concept of our contemporary hell. Ammit is linguistically almost a female derivative of the word Amun(Hidden One) or God the beginning. We die, our energy is eaten by Ammit(Amun) eaten by His Enlessness? Sorry Ian, I don't possess the Bhuddist references. The image of our death is always powerful striking and for this reason, for me at least saddening. Then again, tomorow morning I'm going to wake up viewing my shorts on the night lite. How sad can that be? Lawrick

The exercise in projecting my "self" outside of my body was strange. It never ended where I projected it. And, to a certain extent, I'm not sure that my self is in my body. Well maybe somewhere near the base of my brain, but outside of my neck.

I have connecting threads. I don't see these. I feel them. I've used them in the past.

Fresh in breath in the morning is important. I particularly like it when it is cooler. I feel it cleansing. I feel the oxygen merging. Just the sensation of cool? Don't think so.

You can thank Judy for those.

For me, the idea of the pointing exercise was to see that all those other things are also a part of my body; that my body includes the world.

This weeks excercizes have been very revealing.
I especially have noticed that the smiling lightens the feeling of my body, more light, more happy in feeling. Even if it is a slight smile or inner one this made a suprising difference to me.

Something in me very strongly resists the intellectual piece of wanting to give up feelings about people who have caused me pain and suffering. I ruminate about them and run over in my head, causing myself suffering. I wonder how to approach this, it is more me causing this suffering than them anymore at this point.
In contemplating myself in bodily form I experience something like self-remembering, although more intense.

Our journey is from illusion towards reality. The integrity of our journey can be strengthened by daily entering a calm, quiet place, unfettered by the cares and identifications of our horizontal lives. To assist us in entering into this inner silence, we need to be present within our body here and now. We can prepare for this by sensing the warmth and weight of the body, the sensations on the skin, the bones that support us, and the energies that flow through us. We can use the sightless gaze and soundless sound to help the thinking center relax from its habitual desire to identify objects or daydream. To assist the relaxation of the emotional center, seekers may follow their breathing and allow the dark cloud of attachments and desires to drain out through their feet. Be especially attentive to the space between the in and out breath. Deeply sense any area of tension or pain in the organism and ponder its message. With directed attention, fill the tense or painful area with light and breath. Evoke an inner smile and an outer half-smile.

When in situations where the 'I' that desires to control others is reactivated, sense your solar plexus and ponder: Have I learned to control myself?

Yes I agree with you Harry.
And I've been remiss myself for the past 10 days or so with my daughter living and working locally for a change. Still, that's no excuse.

This Online Work Group is of enormous value to me.
It gives larger perspective, new ideas and companionship with others in the Work.
These I take back with me to my own work, which necessarily has an "aloneness" about it, and I return to it refreshed each time.

So I second the invitation to "chime in" to everyone.

Best wishes,
Judy.

The sightless gaze has proved invaluable to me over the last few years. This practice can help me move into an internal silence, a ballanced state that used to take me a much longer time to elicit. Helping silence that inner voice.

I'm wondering if others have found a pattern of resistance to work at certain times. Or does the lack of working elicit these daily "accidents" that seem a barrier?

by Zenas

I have been out sick. Unless others have traveling jobs, being too sick to work isn't the same magnitude. The body grabs total attention and the effort to remember to eat right, exercise when you least want to and get the back-side off the couch and DO something constructive - when I can't concentrate enough to read, I embroider - can be monumental. It can be a real time at looking at attitudes because there's so much time to "drift" into the sing-song thoughts, which I regularly did. That before the work no i would have ever caught this uselessness amazes me, yet. During sales, I deliberately use poses, while ill I had to remember to pull out from them.
I'm sorry, getting the wi-card out for the computer didn't get done, I will be back regular, now.

I've mentioned this lack before with respect to the great escape and respectfully ask the newer members for their several points of view regarding Ian's weekly exercises.

I've used the sightless gaze for years but not the soundless sound which for me as a very bad musician is difficult to tune out. Today while meditating in my favorite cafe I was rudely interrupted by a breathtaking lyric of music that statrted off something like" There are 9 million bicycles in Beijing, and that's a fact", one of the most beautiful and original pieces of music I've heard in years. Surprisingly I was able to reacquire my calm state almost immediately, progress I think.

During this meditation I tried to engender the subject- object relationship first sensing myself as an object in the cafe', then the city, then the world,Solar System, Universe, the Light..... at which point while staring beyond a tile on the floor I began to sense the composition of the tile, the sand, the molecules, atoms, quirks and quarks and between the two I began for the first time to sense my self as an separate cosmos, partially within the confines of my physical space yet reaching out a few meters beyond like an aura or electricity but not necessarily a brightness.. I stayed in this perfectly calm space for what must have been several minutes and returned only when I wanted to sense I AM within this structure. Bye,Bye. My question is how do we maintain an objective sense of self observation- self remembering when the construct of I AM with me at least always seems to return me to a subjective state.

Is this because I am one brain thinking and in the process destroying my balanced inner state? I wonder if anyone out in the ether can guide me through this? Feel free to contact me via my personal email if you wish.

Your poetry of last week set me pondering Harry.
Especially this bit -

> Is there a full moon in me.

Then I read this week -

> I'm wondering if others have found a pattern of resistance to work at certain times.

> Or does the lack of working elicit these daily "accidents" that seem a barrier?

Hmm... Very interesting.
A few thoughts are sailing through;

I was reminded recently that resistance to work exercises is actually the denying force of the first triad I need to reconcile, before work even begins.

In smooth times I forget that. But in others, what to do? I can increase affirming force/valuation as much as I can. That may be enough - even if it is just going through the motions with zero expectation of results. If this doesn't get me back on track - are there any tricks I can use to reduce (shape) psychologically this resistance? Ouspensky tells us of the elasticity of time. Einstein likens time to a mollusc (invertebrate), which can expand and contract to events/situations. Perhaps I can use this.

Regarding "pattern", well, probably there will be one, even if not apparent. So if I assume the pattern is like a chess-board, then I can try expanding in the white and shrinking away from in the black squares, for example.

I've noticed a natural ebb and flow to work exercises though, which I accept as lawful.

As far as whether "daily accidents which seem a barrier" are connected - I don't know. Maybe. Along lines of laws of inertia on different scales etc.? Some planetary influences affecting ?

Could full moon in me be this very resistance to doing what I must do to grow?

Work exercises going along okay for me again at present.
Enough for now - I'm rambling.

Best wishes to all,
Judy.

P.S. And Zenas, sorry to hear you've been sick. Glad you are on the mend now. I enjoy your posts.

It has just occurred to me that ----- (quoting myself here)

> As far as whether "daily accidents which seem a barrier" are connected - I don't know.

Speaking theoretically, it makes sense that there could indeed be a connection between daily "accidents" and lack of work, in that one of the laws we are under on earth is The Law of Accident, thus when living more consciously (much Work), we have a possibility of temporarily rising above some of the consequences of that law, being slightly closer to the Law of Fate.

(I notice that often after I've typed out some "woolly"associative thoughts, a decidedly different tasting "clear" thought appears. This is one of the benefits of posting regularly for me. Otherwise I'd simply be left with the unorganised thoughts. And of course, any ideas from others further clarify and correct, and are greatly valued. I seem to be often adding postscripts.)

Thanks,
J.

Part of my musing earlier was the change in my life style that has occured during the past couple of years.

For decades I worked outside the home like everyone else. I got up, got out of bed, dragged a comb through my head. . .And that daily trek to work was putting me in to contact with resistance and ordinary life on a daily basis.

For the last two years I've been working from home. The first experience was an actual decrease in my perennial blood pressure problems. No more alarm clock, no more traffic jams. . .yes I have deadlines to meet; but I don't have to be anywhere at any time or do anything except on like a 24 hour schedule. No more sixteen tons.

But of late I've been seeing strong resistances in the encounters that I do have. Car breaks down. Just stops. Drop a glass. Stub my toe. Silly little things. The shower keeps dripping at night.

I'd become used to employing work exercises through the day to day life I lived for decades. That half mile walk into the office after parking the car. Perfect for the sightless gaze as I walk. Especially when that monastery is on the horizon.

As I pondered these things I realized that there were certain patterns to these resistances in my former day to day activities. Generally peaking around equinoxes. Or beginning to peak with an equinox.

All of this is, of course, intellectualization. But as my physical existence produces fewer ordinary resistances, I seem to face larger ones; or must create some for myself. Create my own full moon, so to speak. Like not hypnotizing people, per G. And there is a real resistance to THAT.

This week I've concentrated on -

> Be especially attentive to the space between the in and out breath.

- trying it out in different states.

In the waking state I don't notice anything much at all.

However, the attempts made while using the "I am" with breathing and meaning until the slight reverberation in the solar plexus is felt, are quite different. Something distinct from ordinary mechanical breathing can be felt and sensed. The thinking has some emotional quality connected with a form of Self-remembering, and of course the awareness is better.
(This feels like good-quality self-observation - strong "aliveness".)

This was all quite definite and real.
This exercise much appreciated Ian.
I'll see if I can find some theory to go with this experience (Nicoll probably?).
Any comments or references most welcome.

Hi Lawrick,

> My question is how do we maintain an objective sense of self observation- self remembering when the construct of I AM with me at least always seems to return me to a subjective state.

Very big question.
No way am I able to talk comprehensively on it.
I can share what I've found from experience though.

We've both been using the "I am" this week - not so strange.

I'm wondering if the time used of the "I am" may be relevent here.
I quite often use it before self-observation attempts, as a form of S/self-remembering, to bring extra aliveness to the actual self-observation process.
Then I basically forget about it, and concentrate on achieving as much separation/distance between Observing I and it/Judy/personality. As Observing I is where I put "my sense of self", the degree and quality of objectivity to body/personality will largely depend on how well that separation process has gone, plus the degree of S/self-remembering which lingers throughout.

You are right about the construct (also the very words themselves, and their meaning) of the "I am" being subjective. "I" is where my sense of self is, and "am" brings me back to my "amness", my very awareness that because I am alive, and have form, I therefore exist. If time is the unique subjective (BT), then the "I am" may well qualify as the ultimate subjective? Any objectivity I had managed to get by separation would be lost for me too by attempting the "I am" exercise at the same time.

So basically, the stage I'm at currently is that the self-observation and self-remembering processes are two distinct processes/crafts, although good-quality observation invariably contains some degree of self-remembering. Various groups and even individuals within a group have differing ways of doing this. Mine changes as I change, and is an evolving process where the experience is the barometer.

Re maintaining self-observation - I cannot do that for very long by intention yet, but have had a couple of amazing long-term experiences, which I believe were gifts. Yet they are assurance that it can happen. I have to practise, practise.

If anyone in cyberspace "walks you through this question", would you be so kind as to ask them if you may share the email? There is a reticence to discussing actual Work methods - no doubt for good reasons - but any clues and feed-back as to whether we are on the right track are invaluable.

The above is a personal synthesis from the writings of Mr Gurdjieff, Ouspensky,C.Daly King, and Nicoll mainly. The working out of our own method seems to be considered an important part of the work itself, but for sure, I'd love a bit of "spoon-feeding" occasionally.

Cheers,
Judy.

by Lawrick

Hey Judy,
And any other others with their sensitive cyber ears up. Going on a bit of a rant here, exposing both my ignorance and my care, my concern regarding this topic:

> If anyone in cyberspace "walks you through this question", would you be so kind as to ask them if you may share the email? There is a reticence to discussing actual Work methods - no doubt for good reasons - but any clues and feed-back as to whether we are on the right track are invaluable.

Where are the clues and feedback??????????????

We can appreciate some of the reasons for this approach, from the necessary secrecy when the Work was first being expounded in Moscow-St. Petersburg, our subjective ability to absorb this knowledge according to our efforts and "talents", and the potential for abuse that is witnessed over the commercialization of both the Enneagram Typology and the unconscionable "fleecing" of Seekers by Hasnamuss candidates in all aspects of this Spiritual Search.

I do not sense any teaching for profit in this Group, a credit to our "Dear Leader" Ian and the other beings who contribute to the general welfare of our membership. Back to this later.

The exercises that work best for me all possess a similar "smell", that is Sightless Gaze
Soundless Sound
Always necessarily first sensing of the body to effect any state
Combined with an awareness of breathing
Judy's breathing Exercise I Am 1,2,3,4,5,etc.
G's Exercise as follows

Relax, disolve the day's cares for 15 minutes
A sincere admonition to one' centers that their cooperation is absolutely necessary for the digestion of air
That this cooperation WILL result in a coating of "something" within,

Sense on the inbreath "I" an all centered perception of the body,
The outbreath "Am" a portion of the outbreath is retained, sent through out the organism, sensed and felt in both the solar plexus, and as an ultrafine "lifting" of something in the brainmind.

These exercises always work for me, always alter my state to a more relaxed, composed, sensitized, condition. Well, there go all my secrets, I pray the site isn't being spied upon by some rising enterpreneur, or that I shall be anathemized for disclosing the inner workings of the "most, most, even very Secret Brotherhood"!

> The above is a personal synthesis from the writings of Mr Gurdjieff, Ouspensky,C.Daly King, and Nicoll mainly. The working out of our own method seems to be considered an important part of the work itself, but for sure, I'd love a > bit of "spoon-feeding" occasionally.

Who's looking to be spoon fed Judy? Certainly not you, nor I, nor I'll wager, anyone else on the site. I'll assume that at this point, nothing can be "spoonfed" to anyone, that Work is necessary to assimilate the gist, the knowledge encapsulated by the exercises. But given the 5th Obligolnian Striving, where is the feedback from those of higher learning, of longer work or more fortunate abilities and circumstance? Why the great silence. Our feedback, other than the work we do ourselves in this forum, is the response by each member to the weekly exercises via their posts punctuated on occasion by some directional commentary by Ian...But,
I do not understand why further direction cannot be infused by allowing us to see the possible reasons and outcomes for any given exercise which would naturally require further commentary by both the moderator and those on site who are more highly evolved. I have no idea how busy Ian is or even if this is possible but I would love to see more feedback relative to the nature and reason for the exercise. At this point this is not the methodology but if no one is looking to be "spoonfed" why can't some general commentary be presented? What do you think?

When I ask these, to me, very sincere questions, about why, and what possibilities-potentialities, and reasons it sometimes feels like I'm shouting down an empty well in some some infinite desert, never to be answered. Zen? Does anyone else feel this way? I'm not looking to be spoonfed anything but is commentary available, I mean my interpretation of this site is a teacher student relationship where we are all both. So where the hell are all the teachers?

Finally Judy thank you for taking the time to sincerely ponder my question and to provide your always helpful point of view. To me this is Manna unconditionally given from both your Heart and your Reason. And I want you to know how grateful I am for your taking the time, the thought and energy to respond. And if I recieve any positive feedback from this post, which I sincerly doubt, I will surely with permission pass it on to all..... as I feel we all should be doing. Lawrick

The Secret Work

I don't really see this group in a teacher / student relationship. I see it more as an opportunity to learn from others and to assist others by sharing some of the things that I have found useful.

I don't have any reticence in sharing Work methods and don't see any need for secrecy about them. In fact, the so called secrets are quite often the bait by which many people are fleeced. This knowledge belongs to humanity; no one has a right to control it or withold it from anyone else. Conversly, no one can be forced to share it, nor does anyone have a right to demand it be given.

The secret of this Work doesn't lay in hidden teachings and secret exercises; the secret of this Work is in the doing of it, in the making of efforts.

In the business world there is a rule of thumb called the 80-20 rule. It goes like this - 20% of your customers cause 80% of your service calls; or, 20% of your customers generate 80% of your profit; or, 80% of the wealth in the world is held by 20% of the people, etc. The 80-20 rule is reflected in this group where 20% of the members make 80% of the posts.

The exercises that we do are not secret - how can they be, when people have been doing them for most of recorded history? Quantum physics is not secret - just that most people don't have the time or inclination to learn about it. But the people who are experts in it have written it all down in books that are available to anyone. In the past, it was easy to maintain a secret society based on the ignorance of the lower eschalons because the knowledge of the exercises was held in the heads of the elites at the top of the hierarchy. In the past, exchange of knowledge between groups was limited by geography, but in the last century this has changed with the invention of the airplane and electronic communications. For various reasons, the knowledge about spiritual exercises has been slower to appear in books available to the general public, but that is now changing very fast. All the exercises we do here are available in books, in one form or variation or another. It just takes a bit of research to discover them. Secrecy and the oral tradition are outmoded methods of a bygone age. Another outmoded method is the way of subservience - the giving up of ones self-will to the will of the teacher.

The exercises we do are designed to train our nervous systems to operate in a more integrated and harmonious way. There are exercises to train our will, intention, self-reliance, affirmation, effort, concentration, attention, senses, movements, thoughts, emotions, desires, self observation. There are exercises to help us relax, quiet our mind, still our emotions. Exercises for transforming negative emotions, suffering, denying forces. Exercises to develop self remembering, objective reason, impartial mentation, being. There are exercises to help us in our relationships with others, to help us understand ourselves, to teach us moral principles and ethical behaviour. There are exercises to help us do do all these things at once, to harmonize all our centers so that they can work together for a common aim.

These exercises are only beneficial if we make the efforts to do them. Like muscle building, some of these exercises need to be practiced regularly or the muscle will atrophy. Other exercises need to be practiced until a certain level of skill is reached, like learning to ride a bicycle - once you have learned, you never forget.

The practice of this Works leads to several results or understandings. There is a saying: you can never step in the same river twice. Our experience of this Work changes as we go through life. In the beginning everything is numinous and fraught with mystery and the excitement of the chase, the quest for the Holy Grail. Eventually our initial enthusiasm wanes. We get discouraged or frightened or caught up in the affairs of life. Things that seemed mysterious become mundane. We begin to see that the spiritual life is not an endless spasm of ecstacy, but hard Work, daily efforts, with little reward. The river of our spiritual life passes through many different environments. We may go through several cycles of these ups and downs, with varying frequency. Our experiences change over time. Experiencing something for the first time is not the same after the 1000th time. Certain things begin to be taken forgranted and we begin to see new things we hadn't seen before.

There is another saying: before I was enlightened, I chopped wood and carried water; after I was enlightened, I chopped wood and carried water. Being enlightened becomes our everyday life and a process of going with the flow of our ups and downs. Being one with everything, being all and everything, is just they way it is - it is not something special that makes us superior, it is just who we are - the universe being conscious of itself.

As I become more used to the site I feel more able to contribute and feel that the discourse here is often very useful to me as someone newer to the Work it always benefits to hear the thoughts of those more experienced.
I found myself resonating with your statements about secrecy and the problems with these kinds of attitudes, Ian. I like it here because it is a good environment of openness and fairness.
Just my 2 cents.

Work Program week beginning 20 November 2006

---

by Ian

While walking, practice the sightless gaze and the 12 joint sensing exercise, coordinating each word of the Holy Affirming Prayer with one joint. Sense each joint for several steps and ponder the significance of each word.

When in the grip of a negative emotion such as boredom, self-pity, anger or resentment, instead of manifesting outwardly, relax physcially and count to ten while sensing the turmoil in your emotional centre. Then, let the involving emotional turmoil continue its descent down sensed legs into the earth, leaving a calm quite space floating above where Being can glow.

When in the grip of a negative emotions such as annoyance or depression, express gratitude for the opportunity to Work by adopting an intentional yet unusual posture and repeating silently:

Oh Endlessness,
Help me on the way -
To enjoy the unenjoyable,
To like the unlikeable,
To love the unlovable.

End each day with a hearty laugh and fall asleep with an inner smile.

---

by Judy

Ian,
A week of glorifying His Endlessness as well as the work on negativity!
Beautiful.
Thank you.

Lawrick,
Re "What do you think?" from your last post Nov 13th, I think... ...I'll use a quote of yours (Rumi's) which I love, from a few weeks back.

> Gratitude is half the path of enlightenment..Rumi

And thanks for sharing some great exercises of your own too.
I'd like to correct "spoon-fed occasionally" of my post to "extra spoon-fed occasionally", as I was not including the high value of our exercises provided weekly to create opportunities for personal work being free of mechanicality (which has inevitably led in the past to less work being done.)

Best wishes,
J.

---

by Harry

The first part of this week's exercise is something I do regularly since Ian introduced us to it who knows how long ago. I especially find it usefull when facing a daunting task. It helps me disconnect from the anticipation of the task, and just Do It. (Wonder if Nike sponsors secret legominisms.)

Also the drain into the earth is a nice variation.

Back to the "secret work" from last week. I believe the secret is All And Everything G. talks about reading this book three times. And much of what we face in exercises exist in All and Everything. Life Is Real follows up on Remarkable Men. Both including other hints.

I also believe that this is a closed sum system. I.e. there is only so much knowledge that is available to be had. Only some can evolve. Not because it's predetermined (except maybe by Karma) but because Knowledge is a commodity like anything else. Certainly explains the current state of American culture.

---

by Judy

This morning I made two attempts at the 12-joint exercise with walking and Holy Affirming prayer.
They were pretty awkward as I didn't know the succession of joints well enough and kept losing awareness.
Then I recalled Ian's -

> Other exercises need to be practiced until a certain level of skill is reached, like learning to ride a bicycle - once you have learned, you never forget.

and realised I just have to learn how to ride this particular "bicycle" more smoothly.
So I'm brushing up on the theory and will try again tomorrow.

After the above, I returned to the old favourite of "being present/mindful" while doing routine household tasks and self-observing. Self-observation took a step forward this morning. Instead of having to stay with one activity (eg pegging out clothes, washing dishes or chopping vegetables, or sweeping), to maintain some awareness, I experimented with..... following the breath during the change from one activity to the next, and being aware that "I am changing activities now for a few moments", then going back to the self-observation.

This was a big improvement - not seamless, but much smoother than my usual stop - start attempts.
Glimpses that "intentional continuous" is a lot closer now.
(I'm starting to look forward to the regular morning of chores!!! Unbelievable.)

If you hadn't asked your questions, Lawrick (which I hadn't forgotten, just was keeping in mind for a while), then I wouldn't have experimented at all probably, but just accepted that "continuous intentional" was not for me yet. Then of course we had quite the masterly treatise from Ian, which is like soothing balm and yet motivational at the same time. Much appreciated.

Judy.

Judy,

Think of it is a pattern. Circulation of the body. Visualize the flow of blood and then connect to the bones. This leads to the joints. Holy Rejoicing. . .

Harry

---

by Judy

Thank you so much, Harry, for that inspired suggestion.
Amazing.

I ended up with this infinity pattern (when arms upstretched), which then moved and flexed and bent as it walked along praising Endlessness - bouncing along in Work-shoes. Reminded me of an infinity-shaped cartoon character at times - a benevolent one, a little creature rejoicing in the Creator.

This exercise now on the favourites list. Sensing good quality too.
Regards,
J.

by Carlos

This is an exercise which brings tears to my eyes and engages my emotional center thoroughly, It is the nature of these work exercises and the quality of a work prayer (so different from those in the mechanical repetitions I have seen in most religious practices) that remind me how hard this path is, yet how sublime it is to bring us closer to reach towards the higher.

thank you

---

by Harry

The infinity pattern is a perfect way to describe it, Judy. And I usually end with a surge up my spine before continuing on to the next pattern. Believe this was in another exercise Ian suggested. But the pattern feels incomplete to me without the spinal involvement.

by Zenas

Hi Harry, first in regard to what you said earlier, I don't consider it a closed sum system. Finite knowledge for each level, perhaps. After we pass one level, there are higher steps. Then, I have never verified Ouspensky's ideas about placement in life pertaining to placement in the Work, an area he seems to have strongly disagreed with Mr. G. I have met a pretty full spectrum of peoples. I pondered responding to another post a while back (different section of this site)about prejudice in the Work. Yes, I think it can be verified there is. A knowledge "commodity?" Only so many people can be geologists, some can be teachers without ever going into the "real" earth, some can be students and or amateurs, and some people just won't care a twit. Our social system says not everyone can be geologists; I sense the Work is higher than any social system and doesn't need commodities any more than the earth itself needs geologists. The earth needs bodies, the moon must be fed. When we truly sense that higher system/The Work we're a part of, it's such an indescribable knowing.

This week's exercise has greatly helped through the holiday craziness - wading through people, trying to remember to LIKE such an unlikeable necessity and to sound genuinely cheerful to the holiday cheer. My top annoyance is the pet-pushers who sell animals and fish to just anybody as a "cute" gift so perhaps I can find a new way to accept this season without the judgement.

And I have had such a blessing of an opportunity arise this week, I can almost mean it, even in the thick of traffic. More about that when it materializes in a week or two.

---

by Harry

I came to the closed system based upon pondering G's discussion of man's position. Because man has destroyed rats and mice and even roaches, then man must take the place of these beings in the system.

Plus:
To he who has will be given.
To he who doesn't have, what he has will be taken away.

Ponder.

---

by Judy

Harry, it was this

> I especially find it usefull when facing a daunting task. It helps me disconnect from the anticipation of the task, and just Do It.

which motivated me to attempt to come to terms with the advanced sensing exercises. Some months ago I was getting into a nice tangle with them.
Any hints towards "Just Doing It" very useful for me.
And this one works well.

Regarding adding the surge up the spinal column, I'm doing that at the actual end of the exercise, but not between the patterns. It does indeed give a good completion.
Reply late as I've been experimenting with it for a few days.
Many thanks.
Judy.

by Judy

Interesting how we come to verifying some of the big ideas in BT by completely different methods.

Attempts to verify closed system (cosmos), and materiality of knowledge began for me by referring to the first two laws of thermodynamics.
The First Law confirms the closed system.
The Second Law (entropy) has in the past few decades been applied to various branches of science, of which information theory is the most relevent here, and thinking along the lines of entropic quality changes fits in well with knowledge being material.

However, in 1950, or maybe even 1980, the data for this wasn't available.
Mr Gurdjieff was so far ahead of his time - again..
My 2 cents worth.

There are some really interesting break throughs in Physics. Especially when they're done by real scientists. I.e. not those of new formation.

And when we go back and look at people like Newton we find so much that is beyond just the physical laws.

Ascending and descending the tree of Life, Wisdom is higher than Knowledge; to travel the middle path instead of the Flaming Sword is to mediate knowledge and wisdom at the same time. In the cube of space, that which is was, and will be; which is why no one life-time constitutes "all."

Ian: "When in the grip of a negative emotion ... instead of manifesting outwardly, relax physcially and count to ten while sensing the turmoil in your emotional centre. Then, let the involving emotional turmoil continue its descent down sensed legs into the earth, leaving a calm quite space floating above where Being can glow." Thank-you. This worked in wondrous ways this week.

In the morning, relax the three centers and disolve the day's cares for 15 minutes.
Affirm a sincere admonition to one's centers that their cooperation is absolutely necessary for the digestion of air and that this cooperation will result in a coating of an inner being embryo.
Sense on the inbreath "I", with an all centered perception of the body, emotions and mind.
On the outbreath "Am", a portion of the outbreath is retained and sent throughout the organism, sensed and felt in both the solar plexus, heart and as an ultrafine "clearing" of the brain/mind.

During the day at various times, to an always necessarily first Sensing of the body combined with an awareness of breathing, add a Sightless Gaze and a Soundless Sound. Then evoke a feeling of gratitude, thankfulness and appreciation in the heart combined with an inner and outer smile.

Attempts to bear the displeasing manifestations of others towards yourself may be affirmed by visualizing their 10 bones, by being mindful of their inevitable death, and by observing your emotions throughout the process.

---

by Judy

A few ponderings about.....

> the digestion of air and that this cooperation will result in a coating of an inner being embryo.

In the above digestion of air, I am looking for conscious digestion. So does this mean that I am utilising the breath as a Do in the impressions octave? That is, observing the breath (instead of observing/remembering the more usual movements, postures, facial expressions etc, to act as the first conscious shock ?
This will (if successful) lead to what Nicoll (pp436-437) refers to as the conception/birth of a "little child at Mi 12".
Is this simply different terminology here?
Or am I mixing things up?

Best wishes,
Judy.

---

by Harry

Judy,

I think air, more than 'food', is ignored as we digest it. We ignore food as part of our culture, unless we're gormounds. (How else to explain McDonalds.)

An aside, I took my son to a 5 Star restaurant for his birthday. Something he'd never done, and something I hadn't done since he was born. The act of dining in such a situation is a focus on a process we normally ignore and leads to an almost automatic centered state.

But back to air. Air has to combine with food. And it has to travel into our blood. That's part of the digestion. And if that combination occurs consciously more is used for that inner being. . .whether a little child or some "spirit".

Harry

---

by Judy

Hi Harry,
I understand and agree with all you wrote about the digestion of air through the food digestion process. And of course it is true that I will make Mi 12 (if successful) when I give myself the first conscious shock at point 6 of the enneagram. This is indeed one way of digesting air. But air itself in the ordinary food octave leads to 48 (intellectual), 24 (instinctive/moving) and 12 (procreation). This 12 is at Si in the octave, which isn't what I need for spiritual conception. So referring to air and its place in the food octave doesn't get me to 12 directly. I have to use the usual variety of ways of applying the first conscious shock as well.

I'm talking here about using the breath itself as the focus for self-observation/remembering/shock.

That is, a focus on the air of the breath (when the air is actually a part of the organism). This way I am using the breath not only as the given shock at point 3, but also as the focus of actual work at point 6, which I currently understand to be Do of the impressions octave, leading to 12 at Mi, where the coating or conception/birth of the entity represented by either the word "embryo" or "little child" - different groups use varying terminology - is possible, and represents the very beginning of my own rebirth.

Isn't this what I am doing in some favourite exercises such as "I am breathing in " etc? That is, I am self-observing (with a degree of self-remembering) the breath.

This is then an additional way to digest air.

I'm interested in this, as I find great benefit from many of the Buddhist exercises, and, to tidy-up my mental organisation, like to attempt to translate into Fourth/Fifth Way terms.

Why?
Because it is undoubtedly true that there are many enlightened people in other traditions, yet to me The Work is a complete and wondrous living entity, and I want better understanding of where all this fits into Mr Gurdjieff's System.

Sorry this post is so wordy. Quite difficult to express, and there's nowhere else I can formulate these thoughts. Or maybe it is all so obvious, and I just haven't picked up on it before.
Regards,
Judy.
"Remember yourself, always, and everywhere."

P.S. Your story of the 5 star restaurant brought flashes back to an old movie called "Babette's Feast." Do you remember it?
J.

---

by Zenas

Trying to time myself, I haven't been able to make a full 15-minutes, yet, for dissolving cares. That is a good goal. The vanity of petty cares is worse than an over-size purse and too small shoes.

Working to visualize the 10 bones of someone in the midst of a tirade at "the system" almost caused me to outwardly laugh and make things worse. It created a good exercise for which parts of us laugh. A couple times, thinking about Judy's statements about the breath brought a fuller presence of the breath.

---

by Harry

Judy,

I was about to answer and lost electricity. The wind intervened with my wind.

There's a current CD I have in my car. Anna Nalick. And the song is entitle Breath. The refrain is Just Breath. I'm not sure she's done anything else, but this is a wonderful reminder when it recycles.

Certainly remember Babette's Feast. Grew up on those great French and Italian films.

I think balance, breathing, inner silence, conscious attention. . .which is really what things like the 10 bone exercise prompts in use. . .all help us produce a higher energy. And the resultant inner silence allows us to use it without wasting it.

I remember being an angry young man. Such a waste of energy. So much that was being produced that could have been used but was flashing off into the universe as if I were a downed power line.

Wow! Isn't it wonderful how my writing brain just brings this full circle!

Food for the Moon. Energy flashing off of all the young rappers and all the angry young men of every generation. And the irritated old codgers as well.

We're having "unexplained electical and electronic problems on Australia's eastern seaboard at present.

At first I thought it might have been someone’s imagination getting the better part of them. Now I have received confirmation from NOAA/NASA Space Weather Center something indeed is occurring which could spell disaster if it was to form together. New sunspot 927 has materialized and it is very unusual. Sunspot 927 is shaped like a ring. The ring is about twice as wide as Earth and should be seen with moderate size amateur scopes. The magnetic field of this sunspot is posed to cause unstable conditions leading to severe eruptions.”
> “I fear we are going to get a repeat of Canada in 1979 when a giant solar flare took out the power grid of the entire eastern seaboard,' Mr Bennedick said.” I would advise people to protect their electronic equipment from power surges and even to stay out of the Sun.” We’ve had reports of people who normally work out in the outdoors getting badly sun burnt.'

> Astronomer Owen Bennedick is a 44 year veteran and has a special interest in solar activity. Mr. Bennedick has been using high-powered equipment at his Wappa Falls Observatory near Yandina, on the Sunshine Coast Queensland Australia, to observe what could be the largest solar flare ever recorded. And he warns it could create worldwide havoc. He says that this sunspot could be 25 times the size of the Earth and it would make a nuclear bomb look like “a firecracker”.

I checked on this site with Planetary Influences, but sunspot/flare activity not included or I couldn't locate.
My microwave, which is even closer to electro-magnetic, is still working, but all the digital readouts are up the creek... Maybe it can be reprogrammed I hope.

Just in case it is of interest.

I use the "I am" a lot. I have wondered what that tiny ripple through the brain/mind was. Wasn't sure if I was imagining or not. Thanks for this confirmation Ian.

Also, I've enjoyed the "admonition" part of the exercises this week - very Beelzebub's Tales - and pretty effective.

And like you, Zenas, I too experienced something akin to amusement when visualising the bones of the other person during an irritating/controlling monologue aimed at me. Really put things into better perspective. The irritation couldn't survive, and I managed to accept calmly, without too much reaction.

by Lawrick

This is assuredly one of my favorite exercises although it is never easy and becomes even more difficult the more one adds to it. The components of Conscious Labor, an act of will is necessary to sustain this exercise, and remaining conscious of one's environment during the exercise is , for me at least, very difficult.

I have been starting this exercise by just breathing within my body, a kind of illumination, or filling, and then beginning to direct the "airiness" to my plexus, heart and brain. Strange that in directing to my plexus I almost always find the reverberstion square in my chest rather than lower. I also locate my AM there. Feel no ripple effect within the brain but more a sense of clearing, clarity, lightness.

I've noticed that the breath prolongs when I attempt moving the attention from centre to centre, or when I try to infect all 3 at once. I'd describe this effect like the aftertaste of a good Scotch or it might be better stated as the aftertaste of a bad Scotch. It seems to linger.

I've also noticed on several occasions that the body aligns and realigns itself as the exercise deepens, it needs to be more and more balanced for some unknown reason.

I do a Sufi exercise that is similar to this but on a more spiritual level.
One breath-La-illaha.....There is nothing but Allah
One breath- Il- Allahu.....There is only Allah

Since I lack the understanding of the inner workings of the octave as described by Judy(can I contact you directly regarding this?) I can only submit by way of help something I read on site by Plavan Go who I believe is quoting someone. To paraphrase," the contact between the air octave and the octave of impressions is the basic requirement of Self-Remembering." And another, "if one's impartial observation of the relationship between the inner and outer world alters their breathing, then this is most probably a correct effort."

Given Judy's description of sunspot activity and the most "atomic dangers emanating from the radiating Sol,  I think it prudent, even necessary to add here, that due to an anomoly in the Pacific current, the temperature with windchill dropped to -43 Celsius a few days ago.  So Judy I don't give a damn about sunspots right now. By way of reconciling my feelings towards this "Act of God" I've noticed not one single mosquito bite this last week. But how do the sparrows survive? I see them outside my window munching on berries. In Ancient Egyptian thie glyph for Sparrow was weakness, bad. They look pretty tough to me right now.

"Sense on the inbreath "I", with an all centered perception of the body, emotions and mind. "

Doing this at a moment of non-thought that "something is happening" in the workplace or at home, the conscious breath enables a Knowing without specific knowledge. This past week, I knew there was "something going on" at work and in one of those unusual moments of actually remembering myself and consciousness of the breath (as if they're two instead of one,) it was apparent another staff reduction was coming. No leak had been made, no "locals" had a clue. Without the Work, we'd be drawn into some sort of "psychic."

I agree with Harry about how air is ignored, unless we're assaulted with aromas of perfumes, soaps (one client still uses Irish Spring....), cleaning fluids, vehicle emissions, etc. All this travels in our digestion; we are what we eat. A note: a florist friend tells me 'smell' has been bred out of the commercial flowers for beauty and longevity. How sad, a rose by its' own name does no longer smell as sweet.

---

by Judy

Hi Lawrick,
Of course I would welcome hearing from you. However, regarding "the inner workings of the octave", I'm a novice, as evidenced by several of my previous posts! Interestingly though, these naive (foolish) statements/questions, have been the very ones I've benefited most from. I've never been shot down in flames on this site. Usually what happens is that someone asks me to clarify a particular phrase, or provides a hint. If the post isn't answered at all, then obviously I need to rethink from scratch to formulate the question more specifically/accurately. All of these responses have begun the filling in of gaps in understanding.
Current octave ponderings are mostly following attempts to apply some point from Nicoll's Commentaries - in this case pp436-437. I read a commentary each morning, and digest/apply during the day where possible. This began because I seem to absorb and remember more of daily small chunks; plus am in improved state for the day.

And, I really like;

> To paraphrase," the contact between the air octave and the octave of impressions is the basic requirement of Self-Remembering."

I was up at 4.30 this morning (only to let Ellie the cat out), and read your post before catching more sleep.
The subconscious responded with images of octaves (curved) within octaves ending up as dancing double helixes which altered slightly depending on which points made contact. (Millions of ways of self-remembering? - "the dance of life" (DNA) of the microcosmos?)
Then all this connected on waking with this morning's Daily Ponder to do with subject/object, where connection could be the verb/action of the event - thus the remembering itself.

Also resonated with the mention of the re-alignment of centres during an exercise, and the "admonition" really strengthened this. A couple of times I even found myself mentally thanking the centres for their co-operation.

So thanks very much for all that.
Best wishes,
Judy.

P.S. Note to Ian.

Would you be so kind to either add my email address to the Member's List info, or pass it on to Lawrick directly? Many thanks.

Work Program week beginning 4 December 2006

by Ian

From a handwritten note of an exercise given by Mr G in 1939.

“Breathe in – ‘I’. Breathe out – ‘am’. With all three parts do. Not just mind. Feeling and body also. Make strong! Not easy thing.

When breathe out, ‘imagine’ part of air stays in and flows to corresponding place.

I take the word ‘corresponding’, to mean, with successive breaths, the Head, the Spine, the Solar Plexus, the Sex Centre and the Whole Body.

Where flow, how flow, that’s its business. Only ‘feel’ that part remains.

Before beginning exercise say: ‘I wish to keep this substance for myself.’

Without this conscious and voluntary labour on your part nothing at all will be coated. All in time will evaporate.

Just this small property in blood makes possible very big result if done with conscious labour. Without this, one month you must work for such result.

When doing, must be careful not to change exterior. It is inner thing. No one need know. Outside keep same exterior. Inside you do.

Not hold breath. Just breathe in and out. Of course, to change thinking will take time. Automatically breath will adjust.

To be able to do exercise not lopsidedly you must put whole attention on it.

To arouse feeling, interest and attention, for cooperation you must think following before beginning: “I am now about to begin this exercise. With full attention I will draw in my breath, saying “I” and sensing the whole of myself. I wish very much to do this in order that I may digest air.”

To arouse body to cooperate, take corresponding posture. Inner tension of forces. Mobilise your centres for working together for this aim.

In breathing, ‘imagine’ something flows, like when inhaling cigarette.

I am now about to begin this exercise, which I have been fortunate enough to learn from Mr. Gurdjieff, and which will enable me with the aid of conscious labour, to coat higher bodies in myself from active elements in the air I breathe.”

---

by Harry

Truly and interesting description.

The flow really happened for me when I was trying to implement the exercise in Life is Real that is related to this. The flow is clearly some "thing" that is flowing.

When I do this I can't help but think of Donovan's line:

"Happiness is a circular motion."

Though I suspect he was thinking of a different kind of circular motion.

But still sex energy, I guess.

---

by Judy

This is very special, Ian.
Thank you.

Of much interest is;

> To be able to do exercise not lopsidedly you must put whole attention on it.
>
> To arouse feeling, interest and attention, for cooperation you must think following before beginning: “I am now about to begin this exercise. With full attention I will draw in my breath, saying “I” and sensing the whole of myself. I wish very much to do this in order that I may digest air.”

added to this then is;

‘I wish to keep this substance for myself.’

as, although a routine exercise for me, I was not always doing it with full attention, or with the prologue of reminders as to what I am wishing. (I was often using it as an accompaniment to routine tasks etc).

Working regularly every few hours with this since Monday, and noticing improvement. Although not holding breath, there is awareness of the slight space between the in-breath and the out-breath.

Does anyone have any favourite "corresponding postures" please?

And yes, I too have good awareness of the "flow".

Judy.

Interesting...

A relevent reminder?

Thanks Judy. Didn't know about Etymology Online. I'm sure to use that one.

Studying word sources like this can be very interesting. I first got involved when I began reading Burton's translation of 1001 Arabian Nights.

Burton deals with the etomology on a regular basis. Often having footnotes of explanation that are longer than the text. This led me to look at the Arabic language and at various versions of the Kabbalah. (Fortunately Madonna meant Christ's mother in those days.)

It is interesting to look at words with ancient origin and look at them from the designation of masculine, feminine or neuter. Many of these designations seem to correspond with active and passive as G describes them.

I had to read and re-read the exercise to first envision it, then practice it.

Judy: in answer to your one question about "corresponding postures," tree pose or the DaVinci man pose can allow one to feel the flow of the breath and remember the corresponding places. A question your question helped give me: does anyone know if there was a corresponding tempo for this exercise? When I was able to work with movements, "Time" was particularly One for me because of the double concentration to tempo and movement, which sensing the breath goes all the way through the centers in the straight sitting spine.

by Carlos

Great exersice,
The remains of the flow brought to my whole an ideal balance to the centers.
I tried different postures but laying down straight on the floor made this exersice very different from the rest of the postures that I used throughout this week, you feel the force of gravity in every inch of your body while performing the exersice.
Not holding breath or pausing it in between ins and outs was difficult for me.

Thanks

Carlos

One addition to corresponding postures from yoga: remember to keep a soft face at all times. When conscious of the breath, sensing the face's 'look' and which parts tighten is quite helpful.

Ponder: Is Laziness or procrastination a lack of energy or a lack of Hope?

During periods of three-centered relaxation, use the Great Heart Sensing Exercise by becoming aware of the sensations of the heart beating within the chest and the sensations of the pressure of the pulse throughout the body, arms and legs.

Whenever a suffering, irritation or annoyance arises, accept it as a lawful manifestation of the denying force to be endured and transformed by an affirmation, such as by saying, "I wish this suffering to serve the growth of Being" and by breathing in and out while sensing one of the 12 major joints in the sequence: 1. Right wrist. 2. Right elbow. 3. Right shoulder. 4. Left hip. 5. Left knee. 6. Left ankle. 7. Right ankle. 8. Right knee. 9. Right hip. 10. Left shoulder. 11. Left elbow. 12. Left wrist.

> During periods of three-centered relaxation, use the Great Heart Sensing Exercise by becoming aware of the sensations of the heart beating within the chest and the sensations of the pressure of the pulse throughout the body, arms and legs.

This is an exercise I am experiencing improvement with this week.
I've been able to sense the pulse this time , especially in the hands and throat. Before, have only been able to sense the actual beating of the heart in the heart.

The next part is favourite and familiar ground now.
And, as per a comment from Harry recently, this 12 joint exercise actually aids the overcoming of some procrastinations.
I'm also using visualisation of myself performing the relevent task prior to the attempt, and this brings in a certain positivity to the emotional centre as it understands the visual imagery language better than the intellectual wishing to do it word language, it seems.
So perhaps parables work like this - appealing with words to the intellect, and with visual images to the emotional centre? (Thinking of the reins in the horse carriage and driver metaphor in particular here.)

The pondering part yet to do.

Judy.

Pondering procrastination and laziness as a lack of hope is revealing for me, I've thought a positive side of hope to be believing things can be different than they presently are.

Today there was a suffering from my own mechanical foot-in-mouth disease. After beating myself up for a few hours, I came back to the "I wish this suffering to serve the growth of Being" (it wasn't a location I could work on the breath and sensation.) This week's exercise is proving to be extremely valuable. I'm finding some preperation necessary before involving myself in the exercise. It would seem the value of considering every breath lies in an absence of time to consider or identify. The breath simply comes at me and takes over my perceptions of time and space. Thus I find it necessary to gain a both a sense of my body and feelings before begining, a kind of pre-meditation.
I'm discovering that I can easily do this exercise for long periods of time when time is available. The aftermath is the sense of fullness, an interfacing with my surroundings with my tripartate being. It simply happens like an unexpected refreshing desert.
As to the questions that come after each sequence I have no definite conclusions as yet, but, without a doubt, this has been one of the most intimate exercises yet. I've wondered during the past month whether any real "good" was being accomplished in this forum. Then I had a wonderful experience today that left no doubt whatsoever that something was changing. A greater alertness, deeper emotional feelings, a powerful sense of love, gratitude for the sacrifices of others that are making my journey relevant. I want you all to know how much I appreciate the input I receive from the Group.

Mr. Nicoll made a surprising and delightful appearance at my door a few days ago contrary to Amazon's post Christmas schedule. And there they sit like dogs begging in their new sleeves and here I type, inwardly screaming because I made myself a promise not to open before Christmas. Disputekrialnian friction. Holy Denying!!!!!!!!!!!!!!

Allow me to express at this time my deep appreciation for all your labors on our behalf Ian. If words are not enough I'll be happy to send you another Tenner for a pint and a shot of the Blessed Scots Elixir. As for the rest of our intrepid Band of Seekers, may His Endlessness pour His Blessings upon you and your families during the Christmas Holy Days and may His Peace be Upon Thee in the New year. I'm proud to be a part of this enlightening process, however small. An by the by, Happy Solstice all!

Lawrick: Mr. Nicoll is worth the wait. I read the first 7 straight through.

One of the points Ian asks, "does Being diminish?" is something I've questioned; always best to question in oneself, not others. It does take time, it also makes time. I tried part of the exercise while walking, it kept focus.

Thank-you, Ian, your Christmas present comes every week to us.

During the week, with all brains balanced, Ponder:
Monday - As I breath in, I Ponder: What is the meaning of Christmas to a Seeker?
Tuesday - As I breath in, I Ponder: Does Christmas have any relevance to a Seeker?
Wednesday - As I breath in, I Ponder: Is Christmas a Myth?
Thursday - As I breath in, I Ponder: Is Christmas an Allegory?
Friday - As I breath in, I Ponder: Is Christmas a Legominism
Saturday - As I breath in, I Ponder: Does Christmas represent a objective process?
Sunday - As I breath in, I Ponder: Does Christmas represent an subjective process?

Combine each Pondering with the following pattern:
As I breath out, I Sense: Right shoulder
As I breath out, I Sense: Left hip
As I breath out, I Sense: Right hip
As I breath out, I Sense: Left shoulder
As I breath out, I Sense: Head
As I breath out, I Sense: Heart
As I breath out, I Sense: Whole body

End each Pondering with an affirmation such as:
May the results of this Pondering feed my inner being embryo.

Ah!
New meaning
Floating images of the three wise men
With their gifts of gold, frankincense and myrrh

Thinking about Christmas, which was absolutely beautiful and tranquil this year, brought me back to Nicoll's "The New Man," so, I have been re-reading it to understand more fully both parable and allegory.
This week's exercise and pondering brings in all of one's "beliefs," regardless their religion upbringing. It also brought thought about special astrological times, the Solstice - times easier to the median to the Higher Worlds O speaks of, particularly in relation to processes. Embryo has also been much thought about as there is one in the house and with the new en utero films, it's absolutely amazing. Ah, if we could see a picture of OUR developing embryo!

Redundancy is sometimes a good re-enforcer. Thank-you, Ian.

Happy New Year to all.

by Lawrick

The repetition and observance of this week's ponderings has resulted in an hightened perception shining through the various windows provided by our "dear leader". This particular way of repeated ponderings of larger topics, I hope, will become a more regular feature of our Work. I have never before considered Christmas as a legominism, an objective process. Being born in a small town, in a non-religious family, this time of year was merely a celebration of lights, toys, friendship, no school! But it was also a time of drunken fueds, family fights, and all the "treasures" associated with excess use of alcohol. And as I became older and until I came to "my" senses", I behaved no differently but without the violence. Back then shops remained closed for three days because it was felt that people should have time off work for their friends and families. How times have changed. But in another sense, alcohol no longer plays the devil"s advocate to the extent it used to. The ever changing spiral.

The year, this Christmas was the first, I have truely observed in a deep objective sense, and made even more relevant by the exercises. How useless are the exterior forms of this "economic gluttony". So I bought a thing our two for my very beloved ones by way of expressing my thanks for their love and support, (fortunately , nothing was sent to Ian), didn't buy a tree, or decorate the house except with a few sentimental treasures and held a sense of peace and quiet about myself. Calmness. And the experience, the solstice, the Beautiful drama, presented me with a true Christmas present. Perhaps the best yet. And as I began to "rape" Mr. Nichol (isn't that an image) I decided it was "vitally necessary" to slow down and give a deeper, more conscious perspective to the experience. I reconciled this "passion" by inviting Mr. Beelzebub to travel with me, to proceed concurently, equally with the Commentaries. So the essence will arise more slowly and perhaps enrich the experience, though I am sorely tempted to read it in the "old" way.
It just might be that by spring, or summer I'll know and appreciate the input of the little Nicholian beings running around the site and saying,Ahah!

Harry, I"m using your randomly selected reading exercise and am finding as a preconditioning, before the daily ponderings and meditation to be quite enlighteneing. I am continually surprised by the depth of meaning in every paragraph, every page, every book I randomly select. And if I cannot completely comprehend the passage, the sense of conscious wonder in the depth of this teaching remains within and gets carried over to the daily work.

Don't mean to pry Zenas but are you saying.....

Finally, are there exercises to read more consciously or does the purpose lie in a deepened attention?

And Judy, for your support and the material you have provided, my joyous thanks  I mean appreciation, no, that's not it, well in any event, I Am grateful for you and certain others who blush!

Blessings Upon Thee all in the New Year. Lawrick

The joy resulting from this week's exercise came from new meaning of Christmas as an allegory.
It began with the question (a la Beelzebub's Tales study);
What is Christmas in me ?
Once on this track, understanding poured in down to every little detail of the Christmas story.
I'd say I haven't realised this earlier because the "3-brains-balanced pondering" has only a recent competence, and learning how to read allegories/legominisms is relatively new also.
This is thus a first attempt to do this in everyday life.
Now I too (Lawrick, you mention this) will be looking at other big topics to work on in this way.

Harry, you definitely rate a mention here for assisting first steps with this process some months ago.
This question bore fruit, and is a Christmas gift in the best sense.
(I said this in my first post this week - but obviously have a lot to learn about being sufficiently obscure so as not to affect others' ponderings, and yet still say something reflecting my experience.)

Very best wishes to all on the New Year's Day.
Judy.

Legominisms are all over the place. I'm still pondering on those that have no direct connection in "this reality". But there are many available for a nicely centered "ponder".

Fortunately I met a man in undergraduate school He taught Modern American novel. But he also had a film society. I think I've quoted this before, but sometime in my junior year I said to him "God damn every 33 year old character in literature isn't Jesus Christ!" He answered "Are you certain?"

His film extra curricular program was more illuminating. Introducing me to Fellini and Antonioni and Joseph Losey and Ingmar Bergman, among others.

I love the little works that allow for pondering. "The Freshman" is a good example. Mostly it's taken as a silly little comedy poking fun at The Godfather. But this is a different god-father. I loaned this to a friend over a month ago and he resisted watching it. Finally I just said "Think Last Supper". Finally he watched it. Wouldn't admit to all I see, but fond the outline, anyway.

Happy New Year All

Recapitulation

Looking back over the last year, a Seeker may ponder -

What was my chief weakness, fault, difficulty or obstacle?

What was my chief suffering, annoyance, irritation or corn?

What was my chief joy, satisfaction or accomplishment?

Every night before sleep, the Seeker, mindful of the Merciless Heropass, may ask: "What can I give up - the absence of which will serve as a constant reminder to remember myself - while groping through the veil of illusion behind which I am otherwise destined to remain?"

---

by Harry

I've been pondering what I eat. . .emotionally and intellectually. It is a fault to be drawn to titillating food.

This is a crucial understanding, I think. When G talks about the preserved foods of America he's not just talking about our jams and jellies. He's talking about the emotional and intellectual food we eat as well.

I saw my sister over the holidays. She is nearly agoraphobic. Not a fear of leaving the house as much as a desire to stay in the womb. But she bombards herself with horror films and mystery novels. This food is something she needs because she is void of other experiences.

I watched a couple of shows over the holidays, things I was drawn to, but that I felt dirty after watching. There was no redeeming value. Only the titilation that drew me to them to begin with.

This, I think, is the real value of All and Everything. Because All and Everything must be experienced. It cannot not be consumed as a predigested tid bit that adds to the fat on our brains. Our brains, all of them, must work to digest All and Everything.

---

by Judy

Hello everyone,

The second and third ponderings went smoothly - in that I am able to see them, and that some reconciliation has happened over the past few months, and not too much more work is needed there.

However, with

> What was my chief weakness, fault, difficulty or obstacle?

and

> "What can I give up - the absence of which will serve as a constant reminder to remember myself - while groping through the veil of illusion behind which I am otherwise destined to remain?"

it is a different situation.
These two are definitely connected, and though I've suspected this fault for some time, nothing consistent has been done about it.
I see it - and ordinary will seems insufficient.
Sometimes a trace of Real Will is touched momentarily - (I'm thinking of O's description of this as "freeing, lifting, like a solution suddenly glimpsed to a mathematical problem"), but then I fall back into life influences, and there are some strong personality (emotional) i's -(the intellectual i's aren't the stumbling block here) - which don't want to give this up - and they're convincing unless I can reach that self-aware state quickly.

So a raw nerve touched here. And now something has to be worked through, otherwise it seems the self-observation channel is somewhat blocked - this particular obstacle keeps jumping into awareness..... Quite uncomfortable.

Judy.

Excellent way to start the new year. You reminded me to start another note list of comments we call sniperisms made by people and at what point we see the same "look" on someone's face. After a while, it can help one give up chiding others and reflect on what "They" might have been seeing, a mechanical trait in oneself. Several years ago I gave up sarcasm; ok, sounds funny, yet I was good at it. Then I had to give up quietly saying "thank you for the sarcasm" to others who did such. It's the moments of being totally aware of the mechanical in self that keep me in the Work, particularly the sometimes hearing the samesong head dramas and realizing, "how did I never even have a clue before?"

Diet is still at the top of my resolutions list, although Harry has given it a new dimension. One major irritation was at a relative who not only watches blood-and-gore horror flicks constantly but re-watches them 5 and 6 times. It is so true that she has no life experience and horror films and chick-flicks are the window of her world. Perspective helped. Now, diet will include a daily and weekly menu of higher foods, regardless what city I'm in.

Note to Lawrick: thanks for the chuckle. No, not I. The new technologies that show 3-D pictures en utero and can tell a lot whether something will be "wrong" with a baby are amazing. If we could see we were, or were not, developing an embryo, would we prepare better, and 'eat' healthier for it?

A GUIDED MEDITATION ON THE DIVINE COMPASSION

Sit in your usual meditation position and relax. Observe your breathing. As you become aware of the thoughts of the day intruding, turn back simply to watching your breathing. Your body is breathing for you. When settled in this way, begin the meditation.

Become conscious of the existence of the cells which form your planetary body; become conscious of how they freely consented to differentiate in order to go beyond themselves, their individuality, and become specialist cells, part of a particular organ of your body. Did they do this consciously or mechanically?

Go further and become conscious of how these individual organs have given up their individuality in order to relate to one another and so form the complex interactive assembly which is your planetary body. Remember that it is only because of such sacrifices on the part of the cells, the tissues formed from the cells and the organs formed from the tissues, that it has been possible for you to inhabit the body which you consider as your own.

Then go further and become conscious of you, the far in you, observing all this, you and your body, your body the result of the sacrifice of all these millions of individual cells. Then begin to realise that you have a responsibility for your body, for its organs, for each of its individual cells. For providing them with all their natural essential requirements. Observe this profound thought. Meditate upon it.

At this point you may experience a Divine Compassion coming with the feeling of responsibility, of compassion for all the living cells which make up your planetary body. Are you also able to sacrifice your individuality in order to become no longer a human being but an infinitely small cell in the totality of Humanity?

Hold as long as possible this feeling of the Divine Compassion flowing through you. What is it that is aware of it? Real I? Be aware of the very small, the very low, and at the same time of the very large, the very high, and that you, Real I, is the intermediate between the two, the whole assembly forming the Eternal Totality.

If you want more, then consider or ponder the following "either or" of formatory thinking: Is it that the "irresponsible" human fears God and so in the ultimate expects help and forgiveness from Him?

Or by contrast, does the "responsible" human know that he or she cannot know God who therefore may or may not exist, and as a result has to accept that it is all up to him or her, that he or she is responsible for the future of humanity and so must act in the interests of humanity and not of himself or herself? So to be a "responsible" human brings one face to face with the terror of the situation. That one is simply a tool for the use of the "Divine". A tool that is not yet in proper order for its use and so must be worked upon by YOU so as to become in better order and so of more use to the "Divine".

Hi Ian and everyone: Not posting is only a sign this week's meditation is so good is takes a long time to digest it all. Having worked with the necessary wee beastie populations our bodies need, this is just something we don't much like to think about: we are a compilation of living populations. I always think of the trees, watching them, wondering if there is "tree knowledge" of the many living beings that rely on it, yet also remembering Mr. G's observation that limbs and leaves do not move/flutter in the wind, the wind moves them.

It is good for compassion and humility.

---

by Harry

How would we see tree movement? What is the "time" of a tree? A redwood?

---

by Judy

I tried this for the third time this morning.
A beautiful intuitive/emotional experience resulted.
Evoked were humility, compassion, responsibility, gratitude, sharp conscience, devotion, and something indefinable (which I'd somehow maybe "spoil" by any attempt to discuss).
It ended with a silent prayer.

I see from the web that Dr Herbert Sharp is one of the founders of The International Humanities Conference (All and Everything). I haven't been able to locate "My End is My Beginning" online though. Perhaps a new publication?

Thank you, Dr Sharp.

Judy.

The 'time' of most trees is so much longer than man's (there are a few trees left that were here when the Declaration was signed) we can't comprehend.

In a discussion about the various celebrations for Mr. G's birthday, responsibility came up; compassion vs. responsibility. I was thinking about our exercise and Ian's question about sacrificing our individuality to become an infinitely small cell in the totality of humanity, though my friends were discussing it in terms of our responsibility to the Work. Although I still have occasional contact with a few people I've known from other places, this is where I consider my "group" and was trying to ponder the natural essential requirements that we cells would provide.
(I don't think compassion & responsibility have to be a "vs.")

Yes, 'Bert' was one of the 'founders' of the All & Everything Conferences, an independant forum for the exploration of the ideas of Gurdjieff.
http://www.aandeconference.org/

Berts book is currently being prepared for publication. When the book is available on Amazon.com, I will post the ISBN.

It is his 'magnum opus' - his summing up statement of what he preceived the Work to be. It is very much comparable to Ouspensky's In Search of the Miraculous in its breadth and scope of examining the ideas of Gurdjieff. Bert was a materials scientist and thus there is a very scientific approach to the Work ideas in the book. It is also a very personal and touching account of one man's search.

Bert died on 22 August 2003. Here is his Obituary from the 2004 Conference proceedings -

Memoriam to Dr. H. J. "Bert" Sharp

It is with great sadness and a sense of bewilderment that I announce the passing of Dr. H. J.

"Bert" Sharp, a very good friend, one of the core founders of The All & Everything International Humanities Conference. Originally conceived as a congenial meeting of a few friends, notably Bert himself, Nick Tereshchenko, who passed away last year, and Sy Ginsburg, the yearly meetings of the Conference have developed into a major international forum for the presentation of scientific, spiritual and sociological papers related to the Gurdjieff ideas. These meetings were from the very beginning open to all serious studentsof the "Work" and have never been sponsored by any one particular "Gurdjieff group" or umbrella organization.

Dr. H. J. Sharp received his first degree in Physiology and his M.Sc in Metallurgy by private study while working in the industry. He later earned his Ph.D. in Material Science. He became involved in the psychological transformation of himself and others. In his search he had been helped by many, including Ronald and Murial Oldham, Lewis Creed, John Castanios Flores, Nicholas Tereshchenko and Sy Ginsburg; and, in many ways most of all, perhaps, his dear wife and daughter.

Bert had been editor of the Conference proceedings through 1998, a prolific presenter at the conference and an indefatigable contributor to it a Planning Committee activities. His good humor, positive spirit and organizational skills have greatly contributed to the success and essence of the A&E Conference. Not very widely known, perhaps even hidden from all that just met him in a casual way, was the wealth of Bert's emotional world. He expressed it in a series of astounding paintings, done in a style that reveals the way that his intellectual powers were always in harmony with the very real depths of his emotional experiences.

He will be greatly missed.

Dimitri Peretzi

Bert was an assiduous writer as well as an inspired painter. Among his writings are “My End is My Beginning; a Traveller’s Tale” (H. J. Sharp, 1996), “The Adventures of a Solitary Soul”, and “Sacred Geometry and the Enneagram” (H.J. Sharp 2000).
The paragraphs below are taken from Bert’s book, “My End is My Beginning; a Traveller’s Tale”, chapter 1.
The pages following contain photographs taken by Ian of a selection of Bert’s Paintings. (M.B.)

Childhood and the Beginning.

My beginning was on the 7th of September, 1922, or perhaps my beginning was my first memory. This was of sitting up in the high pram outside the toy shop and pointing to the farm animals I wanted. There were memories of greater intensity and significance which started in the second house I lived in in Southampton. One of the first memories of this house was of the staircase. There were two steps and then a landing that turned the stairs through a right angle; then nine steps and a second landing that again turned the stairs through a right angle; and finally three steps to complete.
My first memory of the stairs was of sitting on my grandmother’s knee one night as she sat on the first landing of the first two steps. We were both frightened of the thunder.

Then I learned to climb the stairs on my own. When I reached the second landing there was a picture that hung on the wall. I looked at it carefully every time I climbed the stairs. It was of an Angel bending over the four fallen soldiers propped up against a First World War tank; English; French; American; and German.
It was the Angel that fascinated me. What was an Angel? Then I noticed that it was as if the Angel was in my dreams, showing me the dream. And then it was as if the angel was always with me both night and day. It was by my shoulder or perhaps even within me. It became a silent watcher within. It didn't do anything or say anything, and yet it seemed to be showing me, to be directing my attention. Later this first was replaced by two, by one that watched and one that participated, and yet it was as if they were both watched over by the first Angel, the guiding Angel.

"Sacred Geometry and the Enneagram" will also eventually be published.
"The Adventures of a Solitary Soul", can be seen here -

by Judy

While reading "Adventures of a Solitary Soul" last night, I opened my Real Player library for some quiet background music, and clicked "Random" for a choice out of 6914 winamp files.
What came up?
Aeoliah's "Angels of Compassion", from their Zen Peace album.
Coincidence - or blessed little assurance?

"My End is My Beginning" is a must-have.
Dr Herbert Sharp - remarkable man.
Link and detailed post much appreciated.
This time, instead of any effusive thanks, I treated the joy/awe as denying forces (as Mr Beidler explains), and attempted to transform the energy towards being, until equanimity reached.
It occurred to me that "thank-you s" may in fact be presumptuous, as we are all doing these things primarily for The Work, rather than primarily for each other - right? And so rather than losing the energy-surges in expression of the form, I must use them towards growth of being.

Judy.

Ponder on the value and significance in your life of the 5 Being-Obligonian-Strivings accompanied by the indicated sensing:

Sense left leg.
First Striving: "To have in their ordinary being-existence everything satisfying and really necessary for their planetary body."

Sense right leg.
Second Striving: "To have a constant and unflagging instinctive need for self-perfection in the sense of being."

Sense left arm.
Third Striving: "The conscious striving to know ever more and more concerning the laws of World-creation and World-maintenance."

Sense right arm.
Fourth Striving: "The striving from the beginning of their existence to pay for their arising and their individuality as quickly possible, in order afterwards to be free to lighten as much as possible the Sorrow of our Common Father."

Sense spine and skull.
Fifth Striving: "The striving always to assist the most rapid perfecting of other beings, both those similar to oneself and those of other forms, up to the degree of the sacred 'Martfotai' that is up to the degree of self-individuality."

by Zenas

This has been a long week for driving long hours, barely getting in several times to re-read the week's program. What has been difficult in the emotional part of the intellect for me is to consider, "The striving from the beginning of their existence to pay for their arising and their individuality as quickly possible, in order afterwards to be free to lighten as much as possible the Sorrow of our Common Father." The concept of payment is understandable; payment in Work, what and how to give up the numerous 'tics' of time and social place is the real question for me. If you've ever met one of the people you think, "did he just walk out of the 50s, 60s, etc?" you understand what I mean by tics of time & social place.
The first striving is usually in place or one wouldn't have found the Work. Working this week with all these in body order, I found them working as a whole instead of only being individual ideas to ponder.
I think it was Jose who talked about yoga; while doing yoga practice this week I tried working with this week's exercise at the same time, as long as I remembered the breath, it actually helped both.

by Judy

The Strivings are always worth "spot pondering" for me. And I enjoyed bringing in the sensing. I agree with you Zenas, that the first striving has to be pretty much in place for one to begin the Work System. Yet, from time to time, this striving pops its head up again and requires action and finances - and yes, when this occurs, it is difficult not to allow daily work to suffer somewhat. So I've found, to a degree, that all the strivings overlap - a bit like the Mazlow triangle of needs and stages.
When the basic needs require attention, life is busy, and I realise (hopefully at an early stage) that the predominant emotion is one of constant but slightly-changing identification. I mean, there are lots of emotions, but they are all produced by reaction to outside events. Then I become aware of the waking-sleep, and remedy as best I can.
I've been going through one of these stages for the past couple of weeks, and the tricky thing about them is that a lot of the time life appears to be "happier", as much is achieved in ordinary life. Very seductive sometimes. So much beauty and joy, that I get distracted by it, until I realise of course that it isn't building anything in me, because I have not produced any of these feelings. They are simply mechanical reactions.

So back to the actual work I go.

This was my first week back after a lengthy break and I found it so useful to have an exercise which at once brought me back into my body in a very grounding way and at the same time focussed on five areas of strivings which could offer me a way of moving forward again on my path in the Work. What was particularly useful was that I could do part or all of this exercise whilst engaged in day to day activities, including, as Zenas pointed out, yoga. I've always found, though, that in, say, writing poems, the whole body is involved, and this exercise was a way for me to rationalize how this might be applied to all one's activities. I also observed that the pattern of legs/arms/head and spine is one which is shared in common with many animals, suggesting some sort of archtypal origin.

As mentioned before, I've recieved and am now reading Nichol's Commentaries. They are clearly and brilliantly written as many of you know, providing concise explanations to many questions I have understood only on a formatory level and in some cases never even considered. The urge to "read" in the old manner is a constant temptation as I started the line of Practical Work only within the past year in a real sense and all the theory in the world helps not a whit when we are not struggling with the inner dragons, the omnipresent desires of the "dolphin" and the sludge of a lifetime coating of negative perceptions and behaviors.

In order to "balance" my normal approach to reading Nichol I've been reading Beelzebub concurrently. As I mentioned to friend recently. "this is like reading a travel guide while sitting in the shadows of the pyramid'. Beelzebub is vibration, sensation, engagement, uncompromising, utterly demanding. Nichol is brilliant yet I now see what should have been obvious, that practical work, that work which we do daily and weekly, is the pyramid I must enter and explore. The rest is, well,..... "commentary" .

I have allowed myself the luxury of indulging my energy at the expense of my daily obligations thus disarming the Second Obligolnian Striving, and I've actually, for the last two weeks, paid only "lip service" to the weekly programs which is why I haven't posted. How easily we justify our behaviors. A two week sleep.
It has also highlighted the difference between Work and theory, that I've noticed to some degree with others. Ian screaming,"just do it", Harry stating," just sense it", and so on.

I've also become involved with my own little group attempting to moderate this merry band of maniacs and "savants" never realizing how utterly complicated and ego confronting and time consuming and psychic mind bending the impressions can be while also attempting to be considerate in an external way. My tongue has already nearly been bitten through, and I've only begun. Pray God I do no great harm!

So I'll get back to Work in a real sense after losing myself in "life" and all its delightful demands. Posting is a part of this greater obligation. "Roses", he said, "just Roses"!

Ian, the Link you sent exploring the "heights and depths" might be a wonderful thing to share with the group. It is particularly pertinent to the Meditation on Devine Compassion, but is equally fascinating just as a video. It's a Keeper!
And Recondita, appreciate your insights and posts. Keep them coming. Judy ditto.
Time to end this sad tale. But why do I feel a burden has been lifted in its telling?

A drowning man is not troubled by rain. Traditional Sufi saying.

Be well, Peace, Lawrick

---

by Harry

Not a sad tale.

If there were a fire, I'd try to grab All and Everything first. But the last three volumes of Nicoll would be in the same group.

There's a time we need an intellectual, and sometimes emotional voice to speak with us. And other times we have to try to find the secret passages inside the Pyramid.

We'll never find the observatory inside the pyramid if we just listen to the commentator. But without the commentator we might not begin to look for it.

---

by Judy

Yes, and these ideas and symbols are very powerful.
Sometimes, just thinking about Beelzebub on Mars looking through the telescope at earth improves the quality of my subsequent self-observation attempts. The observatory in me has more distinct separation, so to speak.

Contact Higher Centers Exercise

The object of the exercise is to prepare contact with the higher centers, so they can have an influence in our lives. It can be taken as an evening prayer, at the end of the day, when preparing to sleep. It can also be done as a prelude to meditation or as a meditation mantra.

Sense the body and relax its tensions. Let the breathing become deeper, slower. Let the thoughts and cares of the day flow out.

As you prepare to sleep, attempt to make contact with the higher centers:
Try to be aware of a higher intellectual center. Try to contact that center.
Intoning internally, on an out breath: "Holy Higher Intellectual."
Try to be aware of a higher emotional center. Try to contact that center.
Intoning internally, on an out breath: "Holy Higher Emotional."

Let control pass from your ordinary self to those higher centers:
Intoning internally, on an out breath: "Take control."
Intoning internally, on an out breath: "Maintain my life."
Intoning internally, on an out breath: "Maintain my perceptions."
Intoning internally, on an out breath: "Awake in the morning refreshed and revitalized."

The Draining Exercise

This exercise is given to assist in separating from the daily turmoil. The purpose is to drain from the body everything that is unnecessary. It is best undertaken when there is little pressure of time. One should begin seated in a not too comfortable chair. The spine should be straight. Feet on the floor. Hands resting in lap or dangling from the side. Alternatively, one can use the lotus position if one can hold that position for an extended period of time without excessive strain. Eyes may be opened in an unfocused stare, or closed in a similar stare. (Sightless gaze)

Begin the exercise by invoking the higher centers, intentionally, internally:

Holy Higher Intellectual
Holy Higher Emotional
Take control
Maintain my life
Maintain my impressions.

Drain Everything that is Unnecessary. This draining begins by opening 'valves' in the soles of the feet and the hands. Let the 'unnecessary' drain from these opened valves. Feel internally how the level of the 'unnecessary' begins to drain, first from the head, then down through the face, the neck, the shoulders, down the arms, down the torso. This is 'as if' a vat of 'unnecessary' is draining from the valves in the hands and feet.

Thoughts will intercede. I's will attempt to gain attention. Events will flit by. When this happens go back and continue from the level where the interference occurred. Notice when the flow is slower. Let it unravel, become uncongealed. It is important to maintain impressions. But to not pay undue attention to intrusion.

Once all of the 'unnecessary' has drained from the bodies, close the opened valves. Maintain that state of 'nothingness' as long as beneficial. As you move away from the exercise, shake the hands and feet to break the threads of 'unnecessary.' Try to maintain the simpleness as you enter back into day to day existence.

---

by Harry

I find it interesting that at times of most day to day resistance it is easy to do these exercises. But when life moves along there is a resistance to doing these exercises.

Certainly the draining exercise is something that has a specific purpose. It is harder to do when "satisfied". But, perhaps, that is the time and condition in which it is most important to be practiced.

---

by Ian

As Harry says - it's hard to Work when we are 'up' and satisfied.
It is also hard to Work when we are 'down' and depressed.
That leaves the in between 'mid course' times when we think that we have 'got it' and so don't have to Work.
So - when do we actually Work on ourselves?

Excuses aside, Work is necessary at some point. When is it going to be, if not in the midst of our denying forces? As Mr Beidler says -
http://www.endlesssearch.co.uk/northeon9.htm

"We understand the ordinary pursuits of our lives responding to desires to be educated, well thought of, useful, admired, superior, wealthy or spiritual, as examples of Holy Denyings. We try to meet these denyings with our conscious efforts in our search which we call Holy Affirming. Both are of equal substance and importance."

and

"Intentional Suffering is the intentional acceptance of all suffering which is a part of all existence. To prepare us for this type of Holy Affirmation in our daily lives we are assigned special exercises including seeking out or welcoming suffering in all its forms, especially those forms which are overlooked or moved into different categories, such as "anxiety", "fear" or "depression". It is sometimes useful as a preparation to induce self-imposed suffering but this is to be abandoned when we learn how to meet the normal lot of humanity's suffering."

The energy expended in our 'ups' and 'downs' is wasted unless we transform it. As Mr Beidler used to say - Being transforms the suffering through which it arises.

One might rephrase that to say - Being transforms the Denying Forces through which it arises.

Ian

---

by Judy

This idea of making conscious contact with higher centres frequently is surely a good starting-point to forming a relationship with them.

I resonate with Dr Bert Sharp's metaphor of the lightning strike, where he says that before it happens, a small amount of energy is actually sent up from the object.
His "possible analogy" of the higher centres being represented by the two strands of the double helix of the DNA molecule also has much beauty and force.

Including the invocation as a part of the draining exercise is useful to me, and adds a certain quality and depth.
I'm adding this invocation to the Holy Affirming as one to use regularly.

Examine the meaning of money in your life.
Observe how often you think about it and what emotions it evokes.
When does money bring satisfaction? Worry? Desire? Indifference?
How does it affect your job, your social relationships, your inner Work?

Whenever you handle money, credit cards, cheques, sense the physical attributes of it.

Ponder:
- Is money a language that some people speak better than others?
- Is the amount of money we have determined by fate, effort, need, necessity, chance?

---

by Harry

Money brings me worry. It's almost an unconscious worry. That I don't have enough. As many know I've been working multiple part time jobs that depend upon contracts. I just went through a two month period without a new contract. I have plenty saved, but the savings were diminishing. I didn't think about it, but noticed, recently, that once I had the new contracts I relaxed.

When I have money to spare it does help foster ordinary desires for things.

I do have to admit that part of me says it will take care of itself. Many times I've left go of the worry and something has presented itself. During my recent stretch of unconscious worry I was suddenly presented with an opportunity to teach locally that I didn't even know I'd applied for. I took it. I had to. And that's the part of money that is difficult. Often it is a "have to".

I don't think this has always been this way, historically. And some of it is peculiarly American.

There is also the part of being able to provide for myself and others. The Good Householder part. Some of that is overblown in me. I was raised by a German heritage step father who was also a depression era farmer. That brought little joy to money. There was a hording that was almost Midas like, but was more based on life circumstances. Even my son has had some of this transferred to him.

My grandfather on the other hand taught a bit of irresponsibility. I remember when he couldn't get where he wanted to go at about age 70 and went out and bought a car. I took some of that, too. I once bought a car on my lunch hour.

Much of this is ordinary ruminations. But perhaps there is something there for others to share.

by Judy

> Whenever you handle money, credit cards, cheques, sense the physical attributes of it.

This is particularly useful.
It is, in fact, what I do (not always with the actual "sensing", which is a nice addition) to keep income larger than outgoings every fortnight. That is, after each pay-day, I calculate disposable income for that fortnight (for food, fuel, entertainment, little extras etc) after savings and bills allowed for, and withdraw that in cash. This is the way I avoid most impulsivity and impatience spending. Then I don't have to think about money till the next time. Perhaps it is the actual physicality of the money which assists here, providing something tangible instead of just a "concept" of money as it is transferred from one name to another invisibly .

Guess it sounds a bit mad really -but it works.
The budget has to work as otherwise the inner work would be affected by excessive time spent on the first striving.

Rationale is that if I can't be trusted with ordinary knowledge and basic living skills, how can I expect to receive great knowledge?

To sum up, the optimum attitude towards money for me (which has the best results for inner work) is very much to walk the middle path. Too much would likely distract, and too little would take me to survival mode or dependence on others - both of which don't agree with the "good householder" prerequisite for the Work.

Having written all that, of course there are surprises sometimes, but at least they are the exception rather than the rule.

Judy.
Remember yourself always and everywhere.

---

by Judy

P.S. I forgot the basics. I prefer not to have to think about money much at all. It's a balancing act between the three major resources of time, energy and money though. I've chosen less money to have more time which is in accordance with my general aim.
And basic economics helps too. Don't lament sunk costs - assess opportunity costs with consideration of all three resources - do as many things myself as I'm able ("legal tax avoidance"?), especially when learning these things such as caring for the car or having more home-cooked meals, widens scope of knowledge and gives opportunities for actual Work attempts.

Sounds like I've actually had to think about this quite a lot in order not to have to think about it!

The fact is money is inseparable from the first obligolnian striving. For me the question is how to strive without identification. (I think I asked a related question here before.) Otherwise worry enters. Worry, of course, is negative imagination about the future. So it seems to be a matter of learning to strive without letting the mind wander and keeping one's focus on the present. This is true of all the obligolnian strivings.

by Judy

layne wrote;

> For me the question is how to strive without identification. (I think I asked a related question here before.)

Yes, how to be a Good Householder without identifying...
I haven't reached this exalted state, but find a few things helpful.
To me worry involves an ordinary-life thought going around repetitively in the thinking without resolution.
So first of all, I work out whether there is any action I can take that day to resolve, whether it concerns essential shopping for a meal or re-arranging finances (this - no surprise - needed attention yesterday after many months of comparative order), or whatever. If so, I at least make a start on this. During this time, I am identified, but try to follow the breath at least.
If there is nothing to be done at that time, I accept that, and replace the recurring thought with a recurring pondering of a Work-idea, or a mantra, or an exercise in remembering or observing, bring in some sensing etc. This higher state substitutes a sort of meditation for the worry, which is progress in the right direction.

I don't recall a like question from you. Maybe it was addressed to someone in particular, in which case I'd have left alone.
If I don't get answers here, it is usually a sign that I need to rephrase the question, or perhaps rethinking on my part is in order. Or maybe it is something best worked out for myself? Lots of other reasons too.

Best wishes to you,
Judy.

As it happens, this is a good area for me to work in general, and one which concerns me acutely at present, as I have to make decisions regarding self-employment status, whether to get the help of a book keeper or not. Money is something I prefer to push to the back of my mind. The thought of filling in forms and working out budgets makes me feel physically sick. Somehow, I have been fortunate in that there always seems to be enough, but I have no dependents or big responsibilities. Clearly there is a need for more conscious dealings in this area of life. A question which occurs to me is: what is the part of which centre which is most involved with financial dealings? Is it the intellectual part of the instinctive centre? Can anyone help me on this please?

---

by Lawrick

Well that works. If you require site input discuss sex or money. Goes to where we are with such unconscious frequency.
I was paying the bills at the end of the month and began to realize a very subtle almost ethereal undertone of worry creeping into the task.
and it occurs to me that this almost subconscious cellular system must be at work everytime I'm paying bills and probably leads the parade of daily life when I make my financial decisions. This is so incredibly subtle I'm almost shocked by it because it just hovers there, stealing energy so refined and disseminating but never enough that I would confront it. Sins of omission.
I could save a great deal more money by moving from this old and expensive area of the city. But I will forgo many things to watch the beautiful Elm trees covering the center of the street as a multidimensional green umbrella (spring, summer and fall that is). The architecture of one of the city's oldest brick schools outside my apartment brings me a sense and connection to the past and grounds me to an extent. The Universities trees , gardens and older buildings fill me with good impressions as i walk or drive the area.
As I age, the need for the noises and trappings of life lose their significance. I met a friend at one of the city's trendy restaurants the other day and after moving twice found the general hue and hum of background noise so pervasive I had to leave.
The moral? I've been very happy when I haven't had a dime, and terribly unhappy when I was "flush" as my father used to say. My parent's fondest life memories were during the depression when personal needs had to be set aside for the survival of the community.
I have enough for today and the near future. I should make more of a fuss about this but that's what it would be. Nothing but a fuss.
Musings from the financial part of my wallet centre.

Morning and evening sitting meditation: Visualize a sacred fire in the centre of the temple of your heart. When beset by intruding thoughts, emotions or denying forces, sacrifice them to the sacred fire. Visualize them burning and transforming into ashes and smoke, revealing the warmth of an inner calm and spacious luminousity. When the meditation time ends, carry the sacred fire with you through out the day. Sense its warmth as you go about your daily activities.

During the day, when beset by negative emotions or other denying forces, sacrifice them to the sacred fire. Visualize them burning and transforming into ashes and smoke. Re-establish your connection to the warmth of an inner calm and spacious luminousity and then continue to go about your daily activities.

by Zenas

"Heart-warming" would be an understatement, it took me a long time to learn the difference between fire and sacred fire. There is a fire triangle - 3 things needed for a fire: material, fuel, ignition source, for a regular or sacred fire. A sometimes difficult concept: materials do not burn, until they gas. Sacred fire includes intention and respect which connote the building of it and use. To build a sacred fire within, even visually, is real transmutation. Working with this together as a group reminds me of the old candle lighting services, one to another to light the entire congregation.
This meditation carries through out the entire day.

---

by Judy

> Visualize a sacred fire in the centre of the temple of your heart.

This happened so easily and naturally, and, as Zenas commented, stayed throughout the week to some degree.
During this part of the meditation, "shifts of energies" occurred not only from the head and the middle part of the chest in particular, but also from many parts of the body. It is as if the sacred fire is attracting things to itself, collecting unnecessary "weeds in the garden".
Then;

> When beset by intruding thoughts, emotions or denying forces, sacrifice them to > the sacred fire. Visualize them burning and transforming into ashes and smoke, revealing the warmth of an inner calm and spacious luminousity.

This part, though new, also worked almost effortlessly, and with some embellishments to the visualisation which happened of their own accord. viz; some thoughts/emotions/shocks of information in a difficult week took the form of pieces of paper which the fire consumed rapidly. Others were more like raw potatoes for example, which needed some cooking. (There was even a visualised testing of these potatoes and a couple could be "eaten and digested" but others had to be returned to the fire for a while - one problem hot uncooked potato is still there).
Many symbols were dredged up from the store-house of memories of times sitting in front of a fire (usually outdoors except for candles).
These embellishments seem to be adding another transforming triadic process to the exercise, reminding me of Mr Beidler's Heptachord of Suffering, which is so beautifully effective.

The result was indeed an inner calm and spacious luminosity.
Several times my sense of self was actually in the cool centre of the fire, and there was inner light all around. Unforgettable moments.
Other times watching it took me to the state of remembering/observing, with the sense of self in the observer in the head.

The possibilities for development of this exercise are promising and many, resulting in some progress and acceleration in the long journey from the head to the heart.
Enough words.
Judy.

Sunday morning in the Northern Lattitudes. A chrystal,crisp morning,four inches of diamond snow blanketing the ancient elm outside my window-18 degrees celsius. Clean, a meditation in itself to those who reach.

What is this sacred fire. What is Sacred? What form would this fire take? Can it be extinguished while I exist? And what of the Temple. From some National Geographic magazine?????? the temple stands on four marble pillars with four gates, a pyramid shaped ceiling with a hole allowing the burned smoked and ashes of Denyings pass. Where I wonder?

I sit in one corner, or something of me sits in one corner. On each of the other corners sit 3 monks faceless and motionless just watching and waiting. The fire is not radiation but emanation, for some reason a fine light pastel blue. The fire sits in a circle of rocks on a dirt floor. It does not heat but the light reaches for me and I for the light. Only light contact so far.

The denyings are not dragged but rather fed as finely shredded somethings into the emanation. . The are offered with apologies and a prayer for blessing, guidance, and forgiveness.

The sense and feeling of this temple is very tangible and pulses on the exterior of my chest. Some would say Chakra, basketball fans would say Shak Rah!. Can't be helped!

I think this fire is impermanent but perhaps with effort can remain and encompass. It is the flame of Higher Intellectual and Higher Emotional possibilities and as a continuance of previous exercises serves to remind me of the Miraculous.

Lawrick

by Recondita

This exercise, so wonderful in itself, was hard for me. Perhaps I have not enough fuel with which to supply a fire as yet. Certainly, I was overwhelmed by the volume of stuff which needs to be so burnt. What, indeed, is there in my life which is not such 'stuff...'? This question in itself was a useful exercise. What was possible for me at this stage was to pile everything up in a heap and attempt to observe it. And ask for help from somewhere to strike a fire....

by Zenas

It's ok, Recondita, we all realize how much we cherish our little negative emotions. We're like the people who run back into a house fire and die from smoke inhalation for their "stuff." Mr. G. spoke continually about the need to give up negative expression yet we pride ourselves, and self-justify the negatives.
I have a small statue of Ananda, though it is small and a churned out mass reproduction, when others are being negative I work to mirror that face so the purity behind it might some time come, too.
Maybe not expressing the negativity is letting the grasses get so dry you get a spontaneous summer grass fire? Suddenly they leave and later you realize they aren't there anymore.

by layne

Zenas (or anyone else), what does "letting the grasses get so dry" mean to you? ...becoming weary of one's habitual negative patterns, perhaps? ...or not giving them attention? Nice analogy; just want to be clear on what is meant.

layne

---

by Harry

Just a thought of the moment:

Dry grasses haven't been watered
No emotion
Means that Spirit can't get ignited
Because the fuel for the fire is the wrong fuel.

Zenas wrote:

> Maybe not expressing the negativity is letting the grasses get so dry you get a spontaneous summer grass fire? Suddenly they leave and later you realize they aren't there anymore.

And yes, lovely analogy.

My two cents is that if I don't nourish (water) the negative emotions, even if there isn't a spontaneous fire of Spirit, they will starve and die out eventually.
Lighting the Spirit fire with wish to be, conscious labour and intentional suffering, etc., greatly accelerates the process.
On the other hand, if I express the negativity or even let thoughts dwell on it, then I am nourishing/feeding it and making it stronger and more violent.

On Giving Us a Hand
(From Bert Sharp, My End is My Beginning)

We all need help, particularly in realising all that is possible for us. One way of symbolising our basic psychological structure is with our hands. Hold up either your right or left hand, as you wish, open, palm towards you. Look at the little finger. This can be a symbol of the Instinctive Mind, small, because while it is all important, it is far from our ordinary awareness, and yet we depend upon it for the functioning of our physical body, our first being body.

Then come to the next finger. Let this be the symbol for the Moving Mind. Most of us can move these first two fingers as if they were one. Then come to the next finger, which is the largest. Let this be the symbol of the Feeling Mind. It is the largest because, even when we try, we are frequently driven by our feelings rather than by our intellect. The next is the index finger, symbol of the new Intellectual Mind. This is why it is smaller than the one representing our feelings. Our use of it is only partly developed.

So here we have a symbol of the three lower Minds or Centres and the Instinctive level. But such a hand is incomplete. It needs the thumb. There is little we can do without the thumb as anyone will tell you if they have for some reason lost theirs. But with the thumb the hand really does become a hand. So the thumb “gives us a hand.” It is thus the symbol of the use of the other three in balance as a unity. Notice how when we do use the hand as a hand, we usually crook the little finger to keep it out of the way. What it represents, Instinctive Mind, operates of itself, independent of the rest. But it is the three lower centres of Moving, Feeling and Intellect which need to be used by the fourth, the thumb. The thumb can touch directly face to face the other three, in fact the other four, but they cannot really touch each other.

***

Three Finger Exercise
(From Gurdjieff, Life is Real Only Then When I Am)

First, all one's attention must be divided approximately into three equal parts; each of these parts must be concentrated on one of the three fingers of the right or the left hand, for instance the forefinger, the third and the fourth, constating in one finger—the result proceeding in it of the organic process called "sensing," in another — the result of the process called "feeling," and with the third—making any rhythmical movement and at the same time automatically conducting with the flowing of mental association a sequential or varied manner of counting.

***

From the above considerations, we can construct an exercise called the -

All Brains Balanced Being Mudra

Start by bringing the tips of the four fingers of the right (and/or left) hand together with the tip of the thumb. Then, dividing ones attention between all five digits and using your powers of observation, visualization, imagination, sensing, evoking and pondering, attempt the following -

1. let the little finger be the representative of your instinctive processes;
2. let the ring finger be the representative of your moving processes;
3. let the middle finger be the representative of your feeling processes;
4. let the index finger be the representative of your intellectual processes;
5. let the thumb be the representative of your real I which unites the lower centers.

Bring your fingers together in this manner as often as possible throughout the day as a reminder to remember the whole of your self. All brains balanced being perception.

In the beginning it may help to bring each finger individually into contact with the thumb sequentially, and at each stage attending to the corresponding center represented by the finger, thus building up to the unity represented by the thumb.

One might try alternating the hand used for the exercise each time it is attempted.
One could use both hands bringing the tips of all the fingers together.
One could hold the arms in various positions as one does the exercise.

After establishing some proficiency with the above indications, one could further enhance the exercise by letting the palm of the hand represent the higher emotional center and the back of the hand represent the higher intellectual center.

A final enhancement to the exercise regards the space enclosed by the palm and the fingers as a cradle or womb in which resides the glowing orb of an inner being embryo which is nourished by the combined energies of all the 'fingers'.

At the end of the exercise, open your hand to the sky and let your self fly free as a Float of Being connected with the endless radiance of All and Everything.

Sunday again.

This week has been very turbulent for me, and I found myself working still with the sacred flame in the heart from last week's exercise.
There has been heavy second force both outside and in. I've sometimes been able to watch it as it changes, and there has been plenty of fuel for the fire as attempts at transformation are made on the resistance within, and going back to the favourite basics of following the breath and the "I am" exercise.

Best wishes to all,
Judy.
Remember yourself always and everywhere.

Meditating on this seemed a little easier because the moving center could remind the intellect to look at the hands and think about this week's exercise. It would come throughout the days and especially while driving, which I do a lot of. The thumb is the only one I routinely think of individually, which seems true of most things in-life - we think we are one when we are actually many, only higher Being is one.
Like Judy, I kept going back to last week's exercise to the sacred flame. It let me watch some of the negativities burn and, like anything burning, exposed components I had not thought about since some of the negativities started, giving a place to see the 'self' I was in when they came about.

Second force time. The beginning of the forty days and forty nights moving toward equinox. Time for a major effort.

Like Judy, I had a turbulent week, and I found her generous account of how she dealt with it very enlightening and encouraging. Thank you. As for this week's exercise, I found it magical and almost endless in its possibilities for application in life. So many things involve the hands and the numbers, ordinal and cardinal, associated with them. Music, driving, almost any kind of physical work and activity, typing this..... It gave me a real taste of what to aim for, and how difficult it is to aim for it. It's an exercise I shall cherish and attempt to make use of always.

Stand by a tree. Try to sense its presence and inner stillness. Breathe consciously. Ponder on our reciprocal maintenance with trees through the exchange of oxygen and carbon dioxide. Consider other areas of life where one being's waste is another's resource. Do our negative emotions have any use in the maintenance of the universe?

During the day, when beset by negative emotions and other denying forces, sacrifice them to the sacred fire at the center of the earth. Visualize them draining into the earth through your legs and being transformed into planetary energies. Become like a tree. Re-establish your connection to an inner stillness and steadfastness and then continue with your daily activities.

by Istvan

Not being an experienced "ponderer" I still take my chances having in mind my goal; to learn.

Standing by the tree, touching it with my hands, I imagined being the tree and the image of a circle appeared.
Tuning in on the information this circle was giving me, I felt the eternal cycle of life and death, giving and taking,above and below, the silence, being nothing, and out of this nothingness everything arises.
Above all, the feeling that these are not seperate fenomena, but processes in a larger whole where duality is non-existent.
When I think about that, I realise that for me the Work is like the roots of the tree.
Everthing grows and will grow out of these roots if properly fed.
"Consider other areas of life where one being's waste is another's resource"
Pondering about that I found not an easy task.
I thought: the sun is a "being" also, so its warmth and light could be its waste, and for the living earth and its habitants it is food.
While trying to get deeper into that, I asked myself:Does the sun have other kinds of waste?
I tried to sense the sun as a living being, and came upon its waste called "information"
What kind of information?
Information of a higher order, that is connected with who we are,our great potentialities in what to become and how to become it.
What is the suns food?
I do not know (yet), maybe our growth in consciousness, but that is something I read, so merely formatory memory.
What I call "waste" seems to be actually substance in a certain stage of transformation.
When I let go of the word "waste" and its associations I can see it as a substance in a certain stage on its way; this gives a feeling of an endless ongoing process where everything existing depends on everything existing.

"Do our negative emotions have any use in the maintenance of the universe? "
Pondering about that mostly questions are coming up;
Is it right to assume that waste of a higher being or matter is food for a lower being or matter?

What is present in the core of negative emotions?
Fire, warmth which can be used by a lower being like the moon?
Even by the earth?
It could be food for non-fysical entities.

> Stand by a tree. Try to sense its presence and inner stillness. Breathe consciously.

First I looked at the tree.
How still it is - how deeply rooted in Being.
This awakened some stillness/awareness in me.
I was connecting with it at a deep level.
I felt a oneness with it through perceiving it through this stillness.
Love welled up and I hugged the tree.

This will be an apt exercise for when I lose touch with the stillness inside.
Perhaps when I lose touch with that stillness, I lose touch with myself. and when I lose touch with myself I am lost in the world.

Judy.
Remember yourself always and everywhere.

And hey, Istvan, for an "inexperienced" ponderer, you were effectively plumbing some depths in your great post, which I enjoyed a lot.
Good to hear from you.

Hey all,
Standing next to a tree in the Northern climes is a different experience than in other parts of the world particularly when its -21 celsius in the grip of a bitter north wind. When the temperature falls like this we can hear a specific cracking as the trees lose their limbs and nuts, hence the expression, "If you stand next to a tree in mid February wear your fur lined shorts". Makes me realize and respect just how tough and determined is the life within these long lived friends. The same spark that burns within me?

This mutual exchange of life giving substances makes me realize that my previous perception of waste, even the word itself, was completely subjective. There is no waste. Everything is used and reused down to the level of the smallest, and I don't believe we've discovered the smallest, and then returned and recycled. I love trees. They provide many of the real colors in the background of our lives. They provide the food of our emotions and the food of impressions for our intellect, and food for our physical body. They remind us of the cyclic nature of everything? They provide us with materials for building, for art, and for reflection.

This Sacred fire of the earth appears to be an extension of our previous exercises. Truly for me the distance at this point is too far so I'll keep burning these negative emotions in my chest for now. As to negative emotions and their use, they are not called Holy Denyings for nothing. "nuff said.
Be well, Lawrick
I think that I shall never see
A thing so lovely as a tree! Who authored this, I've forgotten.

---

by Harry

There are times when life gives us opportunities to practice these exercises.

My brother passed away on Tuesday and was buried today. I was called to the hospital early in the morning and fed my heart for some time as I comforted my mother.

Today I was a tree in church. I'm not fond of services, especially when I have to be front and center. Tensions develop and my roots went through the Church floor and found the earth. Found the earth again in the cemetary.

I told my son: "When my time comes shoot me to the Sun." Hope I manage to figure out how to get there, before he has to.

by Recondita

Lawrick - was that A.E.Housman, A Shropshire Lad?

Harry - deepest condolences on your bereavement. As my Mother died recently, we are linked by this common bond.

Somewhere I have read that trees which fall naturally have stronger wood. Something mysterious happens, a sound or vibration, in the moment before a tree falls.

And, deaf as I am, when I place my ear against a tree, I always hear them speak. What are they trying to say to me?

My greatest friends are trees. I spend much of every day with them. The birds live in them. From their branches they fly. The owls hoot.

Trees are all accepting. Totally formed, yet surrendering all form.

They live in the air, are rooted in earth, worship by the water.

What else can I say, but thank you for directing me to a tree as teacher....

by Lawrick

Recondita, Trust an English person to take credit for everything. Next, you'll try to convince me one of your sceintists discovered gravity when an apple fell on his head. By the way, where was gravity, what was it doing before it was discovered? People must have walked and jumped very differently don't you think.?
Enjoy your posts. Lawrick

U.S. American poet, Joyce Kilmer? "I think that I shall never see a poem as lovely as a tree." He was a soldier killed in WWI.

Trees have always been part of my life; to know when you're in the deep woods from the trees is a gift. Trees do have individual presence and a person can tell the difference when trees grow natural or were man planted. Reciprocal maintenance with trees - that was inspiring for me. I just wasn't able to think where human wasted negative emotions would be a resource, partly because I couldn't think of any other being that wastes emotions (yes, I've had enough animals, I believe/know animals have emotions.) Sacrificing emotions meant recognizing them, sometimes the pile got quite high before there was any cognition. Did anyone see what happened to the ashes or any colors emitted while burning?

One somewhat comical thought (2 centered) on reciprocal maintenance: the U.S.A. Ripley's museum had the tree form they claimed was "the tree that ate Roger Bacon." (Roger Bacon, the English philosopher) Seems he was buried and a tree grew quite tall near his grave, when it was cut down it was discovered part of the roots were in exact human form where he had been buried. Reciprocal maintenance at it's most poetic. Why, alas why, does our western 'civilization' insist on making our bodies inedible to the earth???

Return to the temple of your heart that you made two weeks ago.
Sit before the sacred fire and summon up all the negative aspects of your being that wish to rid yourself of. Offer them one by one as fuel to the fire. As they burn, feel the heat of love burn in your heart. Visualise it generating sparkles of golden love that suffuse throughout your body. Watch as the fire grows large, and the heat intensifies. Feel the heat increase in your body, and flow to the ends of your fingers, feet, and beyond. Feel the golden particles of love streaming out from the edges of your being into the wide world, showering it with love. Feel the contentement of having abundant love to give to the world whilst requiring nothing in return.

Realisation and random thoughts following this week's exercise:

I am awareness, disguised as a person.
We all are.
Layered, coloured, cooked, energy concretions - remember the big glass jars of licorice allsorts in the candy-shop?
Creations of a Master chef.
A bit like that.

Love life peace healing oneness, after a week of struggle with myself in difficult outside circumstances.
Lenten blessings of love consciousness.

Judy.

Visualise a cord of light emerging from the top of your head, that connects you to your higher centers. Along this cord flows your higher emotions and mentations. Whenever you feel negative emotions or denying forces, name them and curb their expression by sacrificing their energy upwards along the cord and blending with it the affirming properties of the higher centers, leading to a reconciliation. Affirming properties such as an intentional effort towards an impartial understanding of the required nature of the denying forces.

Affirm the energy thus saved further upwards along the cord by considering the contrary or evoking the opposite of the denying force, combined with an intentional sensing of the planetary body, possibly combined with a special posture or prayer. The higher blends with the lower to actualize the middle, resulting in a transubstantiation that leads to a state of inner silence, equanimity, compassion, faith, hope, love, and a coating on the inner being embryo.

Example denying force contraries:

incredulity - naivete suggestability - stuborn dogmatical - vacilate bigotry - charitability superiority - groveling hedonism - piety
indulgance - restraint carnal - spiritual suspicious - trusting blaming others - turn other cheek selfrighteousness - humility impatience - lethargy procrastination - impulsive stingy - generous arrogant - self-depreciating pessimistic - optimistic

by Harry

Just a brief note. My own experience seems to indicate that higher intellectual comes through the "head chakra", whereas higher emotional comes through the "heart chakra". Either way, this has been beneficial.

I believe it was O who said: imagine it as if it was connected. That helps.

by Zenas

With last week's program using sacred fire, I finally felt the continuity of the exercises. This week's, though, have been harder to hold together and focus. What especially came across was the special posture or prayer in connection with an intentional sensing of the planetary body. Taking a prayer-ful, though for me difficult, position of kneeling, the higher centers as a body was touched. Question, please: did most people do this regularly of a morning or evening and was a difference noted? Wondering if it was a sense of time of day or the group.

Each morning, use a three centered relaxation as preparation for greeting the day's allotment of suffering and joy with equanimity, that we may better hear the voice of conscience.

When in the grip of inner considering, return some attention to your breath and ponder why the personality is concerned with such things.

To promote the role of a reverant seeker of the universal interconnectedness, the seeker will compose a prayer of gratitude and praise to be offered to the endless source each evening in a state of all-brains balanced being perception.

---

by Judy

Instead of a proper composition, I settled for;

"Oh Endlessness, I thank thee and I praise thee."

to be said every hour.
This was a quick compromise due to a very busy week with much happening in life.
I'm a little surprised at just how helpful it is proving to be.

Also;

> When in the grip of inner considering, return some attention to your breath and ponder why the personality is concerned with such things.

is most effective in bringing about the separation of the observer and the personality, and is a neat way to cease the inner considering.

And, to all of you out there -
Where have all the flowers gone?

Regards,
Judy.

I just want to comment that this site is important to me. There are reminders offered, even when I regularly use the exercise in my life, to revitalize my work. And as we know each other we help each other, as well. I encourage all regular members to contribute at least weekly. Make it a Work task for yourself. And check in here every day.

by Istvan

Waking up in the morning most of the time has the same pattern.
Personality expresses lazyness, being a victim of life(poor me) having to get up so early in the morning.
I observed something of which I am not sure about.
It is as if the 3 centers have a mechanical "behaviour" to project its energies outwards.When I pull back my attention inwards everything changes. I feel the positive energies more then the negative energies.
I become a little bit more aware of the fact that it is good to be alive, that there is actually no reason for sorrow and negative responses to life, even that it is not so bad at all to have to go working.
I slowly feel more present and connected inside, as if collecting "myself".
This directing of attention inwards has a positive effect afterwards during the day, so it is really worth it, to give myself a chance after waking up.
It is also a way of remembering myself as a start of the day.

Sacrifice of the personal dimension

Pick a regular chore that you have to undertake in your daily life, that you dislike, but that benfits you. Ironing clothes, taking out trash, washing dishes, making the bed, or a similar task. Everytime you undertake the task, disengage yourself, and prepare by dedicating your performance to Endlessness. Carry out the chore as if there was no benefit to yourself, as an act of compassion and love for the universe and collective conciousness of all beings within it. Sense your hands while performing the chore, and repeat Om out loud, sensing the reverberations.

---

by Judy

I chose the daily taking out of the kitchen garbage for this exercise.
The sensing of the hands and the "om" brought some nice awareness.
I realised after this morning's exercise that I was leaving a lot of negativity behind as well - more garbage.

Then the phone rang. It was a man who had put in an offer to buy the house, to say that he couldn't go through with it because of finance problems. This was very disappointing.
I momentarily went into victim mode, before just going through the motions by taking a volume of Nicoll down to read (p557);

"Have you ever thought that you might in this 4th Way Work be deliberately put into some external situation which is extraordinarily difficult in order to see whether you could pass through it without becoming hopelessly identified? Certainly this would not be possible if you did not bring the Work up to the point of incoming impressions and deal consciously with the situation by means of what you understand of the Work-ideas."

This reminder had a transforming effect. So it seems that the phone-call was indeed "the crack which let the light in."
(Leonard Cohen; There's a crack in everything which lets the light in.)
Harry has mentioned this a couple of times.

So I accept what is, and, collecting myself, have increased "I am, I can, I wish".
Transformation from identification and negativity to gratitude and praise to Endlessness.

Judy.
"Remember yourself always and everywhere."

by Harry

I've used this in a slightly different way. When I see something that needs to be done but I normally wouldn't do it, then I go ahead and use that as a Work opportunity. Sometimes this is as simple as seeing something I dropped on the floor and going ahead an picking it up and throwing it away. Other times it might be vacumning the rugs when I haven't done it frequently.

Do it now and do it with good intentions.

by Istvan

I is not untill saturday 24 that I read the week-programm.
So I did not practise the exercise as described.
Nevertheless I want to share something that has a connectioning with the exercise, in the sense of "Like what it does not like"
Untill a month ago I was under the strong influence of my inner victim, in the sense that it appeared to be possible to quit one of my jobs, which is taxi-driving and I observed an increasing denying force while performing my "life-duty" in earning my money partially by driving.
Depression and moods were the results untill it was clear that financially it would not be possible at all to quit the job.
This functioned as a shock, resulting in the vanishing of my depression and resistance while working.
It gave me the opportunity of remembering and practising" like what it does not like" again and it is compelling how "little I's" can get hold of one and make one ill.
Also the importance of acting on the basis of "a goal" is clear to me again,
Without a goal-in this case taking responsibility for earning money- there is no center of gravity and my energy will mechanically splatter around undirected.

by Zenas

This week was an example of the Work pulling us out of the mire. I took the task of cleaning cupboards, in this case for a relative, finding heaps of negative judgement; first dedicating the task to the Endlessness and as an act of compassion and love for the universe and collective consciousness and then actually sensing my hands before putting on the gloves definately helped redirect the negativity, at least for a few minutes. Sometimes I realized I wasn't too disengaged when repeating the task as an angry mantra. A few times I remembered to sense my hands scrubbing, measuring, laying paper and this, more than any other, would halt the head vanity. The place of craft in every day life is extremely helpful, also, in not just mindlessly 'doing.' There were a couple moments remembering myself, actually seeing as part of the house.

It's easy to have a fantasy personal dimension in road sales, then, you come back to every day tasks you normally don't have to do and the bubble pops.

---

by Harry

Getting rid of that "angry mantra" is such a great experience. It is putting into action the eliminating of negative emotions that O spends so much time talking about. Not repressing, transforming.

Hey all,
Busy being consumed by that northern pestilence called the flu, cold infection, whatever. Some observations about this visit of our microcosmic friends.
We require energy of a certain type to function with intent. During this dismal process attempts to self remember and observe were neither encouraged nor effective when attempted.
Washing dishes quickly put me in a negative work state. My hands dissolved into impatience and so on.
I have been like this for about a month.

A few days ago while laying on the couch watching TV, a powerful negative I of guilty conscience emerged. It had to do with my divorce many years ago and the remorse and guilt actually brought me to tears. But, for some reason I became aware and began to observe this life eater and because of my fatigue my personality could not replace this I with another and I observed for several minutes.
And this "I" dealt with guilt and self failure, failure as a man and parent, and failure in duty. Yet I recieved an incomperable insight into the ways and means of negative states simply because I couldn't fight it off. The gift in the Cracker Jack box.
It was at the same time my health began to noticably improve as if this increase in awareness acted as a Herald .So I'm back.
I've read all the input with appreciation of this small but creative group. Keep up the good work. Good to hear from you again Istvan.

I chose to begin doing Tai Chi again, each morning. This is an exercise, but it is also a start into the day in a balanced frame of mind. Almost immediately I find myself in a sightless gaze while doing the exercises. And my breathing quickly modulates into the I Am Now cycle.

Don't think Tai Chi is necessary for this exercise. Do anything physical to engage the moving center and try to balance the other centers. Five minutes to begin with can start moving through the day in a different tempo.

by Judy

Over the past six months or so, I've added some exercises from the Buddhist tradition to my daily practice, and have found they complement the usual Fourth Way exercises quite well.

I chose the following for this week.
(It comes from the book "Thich Nhat Hanh The Joy of Full Consciousness" by Jean-Pierre and Rachel Cartier, P104.)

"How are emotions experienced by a person who lives in full consciousness? To give us a more vivid idea of this, Thay uses the analogy of a tree. Consider how the tree behaves in a storm. It moves very dynamically with the winds, but without violence. It simply bends with the movement - it has no need to "express" itself as a tree, no need to "react" to the storm.

If you watch its branches being whipped around, you may get the impression that the tree is very fragile. But if you turn your attention to the trunk, and think about the roots sunk deep in the earth, you will have a different impression. You will realise that the tree is strong, and stable in its foundation.

In the same way, when you ae beset by an emotional storm, don't let the attention remain at the level of the thoughts racing around in the brain. They are like the branches and leaves of the tree. You also have a tree within you, and it has a solid trunk and deep roots. Let your attention descend there, from your head down into your body. It is dangerous to remain at the level of the head. Come down to your trunk, to a spot which is located just a couple of inches below your navel. Let your attention remain there. And practise conscious breathing. If you are sitting, you can deepen this breathing. Observe the movement of the belly, and give it 100% of your attention. Breathing in, my belly rises. Breathing out, my belly falls. Keep your attention on the breath even as the storm rages in the head. You are safe, just like the tree. This practice must become your refuge. It will protect you from emotional violence. When you do it, you know that an emotion is just an emotion. It is not who you are. It comes, it stays for awhile, and then it subsides, just like the storm."

I've found this an effective way to obtain the "separation" required for a deeper self-observation of thoughts and emotions (or even the inner seeds of emotions sometimes present on waking - the little blocks of suffering I've maybe inherited or picked-up in early childhood). I add some sensing also.

After 5 to 10 minutes of this practice (it takes different times, depending on strength of the emotion - I have to "cook it", so to speak), then I move on and gather up the remnants, and feed them to the sacred fire in the heart.
There has been more equanimity more often, as emotions and thoughts lessen and fade away into the spaciousness.

Best wishes,
Judy.

by Zenas

I kept with last week's exercise because it was working well; I included giving over negativity to the sacred fire. It is was good to stay with the exercise and keep it new. "Old hat" tried to set in, sensing the hands moving with aim helped keep it focused and new.
Appreciated the Tree analogy, Judy. Thank you.

Daily three-centered Pondering: What traits might characterize a Remarkable Person?

April Idiots: Spring is the time of year when our 'sap' starts to flow. Use some of this energy to sense your left ear while acting out a conscious Idiotic Role, such as:
- Howling at the full moon.
- wearing a twig in your hair or button hole
- dancing a jig
- chasing a wind-blown leaf
- buying some useless item
- gazing at the sky
- bouncing an imaginary ball
- muttering to yourself
- wearing clothing inside-out
- walking backwards
- ending every sentence with a laugh
- ...?

Transform the results of the Role by chanting 3 times: It is nothing; I wish to be.

Compose a new prayer to be offered in a three-centered state every morning and evening, with an emphasis on help for transforming ones most persistent denying forces.

by Zenas

LOL! I actually attempted the "howling at the moon," knowing there has to be a full moon this week. At first I did it quietly, inner considering my neighbors opinions of a middle class, middle age woman in business attire howling at the moon. Solution: get the neighborhood dogs all howling and they can't tell the difference, ...I hope. It was chosen because I have never, ever considered doing any such thing. I was not able to sense just the left ear, though I did have a sense of both ears tingling. It's a fantastic release of tension (you get laughing too hard to be tense.) Fortunately, I had written down the chant or I would not have remembered; it was a good "bringing back."

My prayer is in a constant state of revision, though focusing on the three centers twice a day works in itself.

---

by Harry

I sort of resisted this exercise. It's an exercise I did. Infinite Jest. Tom Robbins. Karl Jung. And then the world gave it to me this morning. I woke up to snow on the ground and started singing "I'm dreaming of a White Easter."

Of course that led me to think whether or not that would be meaningful to Judy down in Australia. But it still was contact with the Infinite Jest.

---

by Istvan

Although a real part in me appreciates the exercise "as a possibility" I cannot "jump" over occuring and overwhelming inner resistance.
Imagening I do the exercise I feel shame, I feel ridiculous, "what will other people think and say", so once again there goes my "holy" self-image and illusion of "being free".
Today I will try to stay in front of all that and see what happens.
I am thankfull that once again I am confronted with the manifestations and power of my inner consideration.
And all these voices that do not help one little bit, like; why should you care? Just do it.... etc.

---

by Judy

The "April idiots" part was a lot of fun. I wore quite a large twig in my hair up to the local shopping centre. Sensing the left ear brought a bit of a smile to my face. Then I ran into a friend and started chatting (went back into mechanical mode after a while) - and she kindly reached out and removed the twig for me and put it into a nearby bin. It was just possible not to dissolve into inane giggles....

I've related to what everyone has posted this week.
"Laugh out loud" - indeed Zenas.
And Harry, I too was caught by life during the week - several times. Your experience - how lovely! Mine happened each early morning while carrying the cup of coffee down the hall to my room. I noticed that I walk backwards. This is to keep an eye on playful cat Ellie, who likes to leap out and "thwap" me gently on the ankles, which startles me to spill some coffee unless I'm watching her closely when she's behind me. Heh!
And Istvan - I totally know what you mean. I observed inner resistance too. I'm partly over it now though, since realising that I occasionally do some of these things quite mechanically.

Overall this is fruitful observation. Looks like I'm a strong candidate for being a natural idiot - so, if it's alright, I'd really prefer to see these little "April idiot suggestions" as "endearing little eccentricities".

Eastertime blessings to all.
I hope the time has been peaceful, safe and happy for you.
Judy.

Harry,
By the way, thanks for sharing the information about the BT dietary alterations suggested for Lent and Advent.

I gave them a try, and in spite of several slips to do with the vegan part of it, the changing of something as basic as eating habits has been en-lightening - in fact, a couple of observations were almost shocking to me.

I noticed that not infrequently, especially when very hungry, I slipped into unconsciousness while eating, and ate the food much too rapidly. Despite wishing strongly not to do this, I actually had to alter eating times to make sure that I didn't become very hungry before succeeding in remembering to eat consciously all the time. It seems to be connected to not giving proper thanks for the meals - taking food for granted, so to speak. It may take quite a while to "set" this conscious eating habit. It was having to change old habits significantly over the 40 day period which emphasised this. Of course there are occasional times when I may have to eat relatively quickly, and the aim there is simply to try to be aware of that.

Also noticed a frequent impatience (related to "waiting") and had to bring in mindfulness and being in the present moment to release the tension resulting in this particular form of "living in the future".

The whole experience has re-enforced the value of doing things differently, as a means of observing parts of personality and mechanicalness (especially habits and instinctive traits) which I've obviously overlooked before, or perhaps noticed but not worked against for long enough to form a new habit.

Best wishes,
J.

After I wrote down something about my inner manifestations in connection whith the week-program it was quiet surprising that as a result of my admitting "that-what-is" and writing it down "something" arose which I would call a sensation of freedom.
My resistance did not matter anymore, and I feel I am ready to try out some of the exercises.
Further on, I want to share that for the first time the Gurdjieff group of maastricht is going to participate in a movements seminar for three days in Paris, lead by Jose Reyes.
As we do not have any real idea about the movements, all of us jump in quiet "naked" which is probibly an advantage.

---

by Harry

Judy,
A long time ago I picked up a hitch hiker. She saw a copy of All and Everything in the back seat. (This was the era when it was safe to pick up hippie chicks or guys.) She asked me:

Do you fast like so and so(a local Gurdjieff "guru"--and I mean that literally)?

Yes I do.

Well, what's the deal with eating meat whenever you want, then?

And I explained that when I go to my Mother's for Thanksgiving, even though that is during my fast period, it's more important to eat her Thanksgiving dinner. (Turkey and everything cholesterol infested.) Because refusing to eat it drew attention to my task.

I also believe that this period of vegan food tends to cleanse the system, as well.

Hi Istvan,
Thanks for the strong post;

> After I wrote down something about my inner manifestations in connection whith the week-program it was quiet surprising that as a result of my admitting "that-what-is" and writing it down "something" arose which I would call a sensation of freedom.

Yes. I too experience a "release", a broadening of myself, quite often after posting here. It is indeed a bit of freedom from the power of "Judy/personality" whose I's boss me around a lot.

Nicoll expands on this pp 570-573, if of interest.
And your astute and correct connection of this with inner considering!! (I did this only after reading the relevant Commentary this morning).

Best wishes for the movements journey. Sounds interesting.
Judy.

Daily three-centered Pondering: Are the actions of a Remarkable Person constrained by thoughts/feelings such as, "what will other people think and say"?

Alter an habitual pattern of activity that you engage in every day, such as using your other hand.

Alter an habitual pattern of thought or opinion that you engage in every day, by thinking or expressing the opposite.

Alter an habitual pattern of emotion that you engage in every day, by evoking an opposite or a neutral emotion.

Compose a haiku (a 17-syllable verse form consisting of three metrical units of 5, 7, and 5) to be offered in a three-centered state every morning and evening, with an emphasis on help for transforming ones most persistent denying forces.

by Zenas

This week's was quite difficult for me. I composed a couple Haiku (a favorite form of concise expression) then realized they did not accomplish the emphasis for transforming a persistent denying force.

The habitual activity was relatively easy: using my left hand to open the car door; I'm fixed right-handed. Along with putting my keys in the right pocket and remembering they were there.

It helped to begin honestly seeing restraining thoughts.
A good week, watching the mounting tenseness in others as we begin a sales promotion and the "goal" of out-doing our quotas, which will just go up if we are able to make them. Real identification and how useful to others this negative quality is.

There are many kinds and degrees of fear, such as fear of - being a Remarkable Person, losing the ego, losing self-importance, the unknown, uncertainty, ignorance, appearing stupid, boredom, being alone, others, intimacy, being manipulated, loosing control, pain, suffering, disease, death, God. Make a list of your own fears. Sense the pen as you write.

When confronted by a fear, don't try to escape from it. Instead, endure it. Feel and sense the full force of the fear without giving in to it. Observe how deep it goes. Does it penetrate into your bones? Is there a place in you where fear does not penetrate? Is there a place in you beyond the reach of the object of your fear?

When a fear is experienced, visualize it as a pattern of energy and sense it in your body. Transform the fear by repeating affirmatively the haiku you composed last week. Visualize the energy leaving your body with the out breath.

Ponder, without expecting an answer, "Is a Remarkable Person beyond fear?" Deeply sense the body.

Now and then during your day, pause to generate an all-brains-balanced Inner Smile while repeating, "I wish to Be a Remarkable Person."

Interesting and difficult topic this week. I find these inner exploratory exercises difficult because I fear what I will find and inevitably find what I fear. Fears are viral. They feed on our negative emotions, suspicions and always remain just below the present to maintain their strength.
I've been experiencing outbreaks of hives. The doctors and specialists in a bout of spectacular honesty, have concluded they know neither from whence they came, nor wither they shall leave. So if I injest mind numbing quantities of antihistomines as prescribed I shall keep the rash under control until perhaps the cure evolves into a mainlining addiction. So I have the option of being continually drugged and tired or scratching around like a fleabag Chihahua on speed. A lovely Coopers choice it is.
Strangely these blotches began appearing coincidentally when I was struggling to do ther weekly exercises and something in me just wished to whistle away the time and everything would be just " Roses, Roses! So I apologise for failing you in the second line of Work. I shall try harder.
Back to the fear. Many are present here but I disclose two.
The first fear has to do with excluding myself from things I enjoyed before and now seem inconsequential. A Separation from all my warm buffers so I fear that this work will somehow leave me isolated unable to grab either the material world or the spirit. Alone.

Does anyone else feel this?
The second fear is a sense of unworthiness, of standing beside or walking with the great Beings who have trod and conquered this path. Once the self pity is removed I still feel a great divide between my efforts and possiblities relative to those who have marched before. Insignificant, unimportant, worthless.
Comments appreciated.
Comments on a dream of a friend soon to be joining our Work.
She is standing in a large, warm, non threatening body of water over which the stands a bridge. The water is thick and she is capable of climbing several steps to the shore and then to the bridge but just as she reaches the final step it collapses and she falls back in to try again. Perhaps some of you phosphonic Josephs might care to interpret this dream with me.
I read in Nicholl's Commentaries that the real battleground lies in creating a will powerful enough to do battle notwithstanding one's physical difficulties and I wonder does this will ebb and flow in others. Can the volumn be turned down for a while to recover?
Sharp's book is an epiphany. It is extraordinary and hopefully be put on your must read list. Kudos for what must have been a Heculian task by Ian and others to put it together. The Kahuna Prayer exercise might be a good weekly exercise Ian.
For the last few months I have been experiencing stages of Self Observation and Remembering almost every time I speak with anyone. Sometimes this takes the form of external considering and the effect of it seems to make the other person more calm, more responsive.
I always lose this sense a some point, usually when I begin to talk and become identified with my opinions. I ask if you know ways to deepen and lenthen this experience, some trigger or a way to channel into a deeper energy to prolong the experience. It is quite remarkable both in appearance and light.

I believe george Burns said, " a good sermon contains a good begining a, a memorable end, and above all a short text." I appologize for the length of the text.

P.S. Sorry to hear about your Easter snowfall Harry. We just recieved a lovely blast about 3 days ago. From an Alberta perspective, your inconvenient Easter just CHOKES ME UP! Be Well.

Here's a question for Ian and others,

Had one of my wonderful dreams last night. The end interpretation was pretty clear. One, I'd been traveling in dangerous neighborhoods. OK. I get that. Two, my battery was missing or wasn't holding a charge. I'm aware of accumulators, etc. Can a dangerous neighborhood short circuit a battery?

Well maybe I've answered my own question.

Lawrick, I'll trade regular Easter snow for universal health care. Though my grandfather used to say the last day for snow was always White Monday, the day after Easter.

---

by Lawrick

Can a dangerous neighborhood short circuit a battery?

That's an interesting question Harry. Does the battery require a stronger charge or need we build stronger retainers.Should we be aware of our strength relative to the neighborhoods we traverse. In the endIbelieve you answered better than I. Ginsberg says we must be ready to look at the lowest most disgusting parts of ourselves as shown in dreams. Perhaps the neighborhood was too menacing.
As to universal health care, as a Canadian, I find it absolutely outrageous that my Southern neighbor with all its wealth has not yet instituted such an enlightened policy of caring for its citizens. I noticed one or two northern states have already done so, perhaps as protection from the snow and cold. On the other hand you might possibly pick up a Canadian visa and get your ass up here. All services and medicines are covered to a greater or lesser degree, and an infusion of Southern wisdom would be welcomed with open arms. Be warned however, we now have a conservative minority government who would like nothing better than private health care. Their rallying cry, "Let 'em eat cake!" How comprehensive was Beelzebub's understanding of the political process

Again I ask, perhaps even from fearless leader, is there a way to deepen the self obsevation experience, to enhance and lengthen the awareness.
A few days ago while driving home I stopped my care to watch two spruces trees wrapped in a dance with the wind. What made it so remarkable was that other smaller trees were barely moving yet the spruce were weaving in a way far more reminiscent of underwater plants, smooth and flowing. Got very close to the light with this experience but still held a sense of time. Accumulator not topped off.
Where are you Ellieanish? Calmly assaying your garden?

Hello everyone,

Well, I was so identified with "being ordinary" that it didn't occur to me that the recent "remarkability" exercises even concerned me.
Then the universe gave a little encouragement. Here's how.

Last Saturday at a meeting of women and children, I gave a five minute eulogy about a rottweiler called Marmalade. This happened out of the blue, as a good friend and her daughter were very upset about the death of their pet of nine years.
Afterwards I was thanked profusely, and told it was an extraordinarily special thing to have done. And the following morning my friend phoned to say that it had really made a difference, and lifted her out of her sadness.

I had another look at the weekly exercise.
The journey of a thousand miles begins with one small step.
For example, a remarkable person would simply have written the haiku (and I see today that there is a sonnet to write) - no problem.
So there has been a perceptual shift in that these exercises have acted as pointers.

A friend in the Work commented some years ago now; "At least the journey from "ordinary" isn't as far as the journey from "genius" (very one-sided)." Thus somehow "ordinary" has been equated with "satisfactory" in the mind. Anyway, it is certainly time to add the aim of becoming a remarkable person to the list.

Now don't wait for my sonnet, you guys. Write your own. There are indeed some remarkable people here.

Best wishes,
Judy.

Hi Lawrick,
Re your friend's dream;

> She is standing in a large, warm, non threatening body of water over which the stands a bridge. The water is thick and she is capable of climbing several steps to the shore and then to the bridge but just as she reaches the final step it collapses and she falls back in to try again.

Some clear Jung/Swedenborg dream symbology here.
Bridge;
the rainbow antakarana of esotericism also in G's system we are told that it is necessary to reach the mi-fa bridge before help can be received water usually the emotions.

thick
the positive feelings are "firming up"?
shore
some destination or point to be reached along the way to the bridge (The Work?)
steps ways of making an upward path possible

So she's trying to get to the bridge, but emotions (wishes/motivations) are not quite strong enough yet ?
and then the last step collapses..
If this were my dream, I'd interpret as needing "new shoes" - like big flat snow shoes so that the step wouldn't collapse (G's "I have good leather to sell for those who wish to make shoes") or - step equals foundation.
In other words - very hopeful dream confirmation, but more knowledge and Work needed to reach the bridge.

Regards,
Judy.

While sensing your writing hand, compose a sonnet to be offered in conjunction with the exercises below, with an emphasis on help for transforming ones egoism. (A sonnet consists of three quatrains, each with an independant rhyme scheme, and ends with a rhymed couplet.)

Daily Pondering (in a three centered state): Is a Remarkable Person necessarly free from the seven deadly egotisms - Pride, Envy, Anger, Sloth, Avarice, Glutonny, Lust?

Morning exercise: Perform the Sightless Gaze exercise and sense your face. Recite your sonnet. Repeat this exercise several times throughout the day.

Daily Exercise 1: Each day choose one of the seven daedly egotisms. Whenever the egotism appears during the day, silently repeat your sonnet with sensed lips while calmly enduring the anifestations of your chosen egotism.

Daily Exercise 2: With the daily egotism chosen above, ponder - What is its source in human life? From which center(s) does it arise? Does it serve any purpose? While pondering, move your attention to each of the three centers in turn.

This poem came to me last night rather quickly, alas my brain locked on the last two rhyming couplets which I realy must finish before Friday as that is the day I've selected to confront lust and I fear the sonnet incomplete may play as an endless unfinished C.D. So help if you can. Lawrick

Thy Holy seven devils come and go
And nail upon my cross their cursed desires
Small comfort knowing that it must be so
For nothing's changed, except that's changed by fire.

The lie's, more what I want than what I need
Yet still know I the war within's the key
If truth told I fail far more than succeed
And through the failure's pain, still wish to be.

Awake ye slumb'ring I's there's violence asleep
And ev'ry breath's a fertile garden grown
My efforts low to even make the Angel's weep
In giant steps I tread, but not alone.

Continue to play the role of a Remarkable Seeker-Poet by composing Haikus and Sonnetts which question and reflect areas of the Seekers inner world where help is needed. Prepare for each attempt by evoking a state of three-centered inner quiet.

Daily Pondering: The Seeker will sometimes ponder in a three-centered state upon the extent to which the material acquired thus far has proved sound and of good quality.

Morning exercise: While doing a Sightless Gaze - breathe into the right arm 3 times; breathe into the spine and skull once; breathe into the left leg 3 times; breathe into the spine and skull once; breathe into the right leg 3 times; breathe into the spine and skull once; breathe into the left arm 3 times; breathe into the spine and skull once.
Continue for 15-30 minutes, whatever feels comfortable for you. For 5 minutes at the end, transform the results by impartially savouring the state of inner quiet characteristic of all-brains-balanced-being-perception.

This is my most effective sensing exercise so far. I'll be keeping it.
After several experiences of a vibrant energy buzzing around the body, I experimented with adding the Holy Affirming prayer to each of the sets of four breaths. This demanded better concentration and divided attention, and did not proceed smoothly each and every time (I've been doing this 2 or 3 times daily), but formed a nice rhythm after several minutes or so. Also began the sensing of eg; the right arm - with the beginning of the in-breath (as if the air is going straight from lungs to blood to arm immediately), then keeping the sensing going with continued attention, through the out-breath. This way the sensing seems a more continuous process.

The 5 minutes at the end were clear and spacious, with hardly any thoughts - just a low murmur of background mental activity from time to time. And this mental activity was connected with some visualisation of the inner-being-embryo as attention and concentration relaxed.

Best wishes,
Judy.

Morning: With sightless gaze and soundless sound, do the 10 bone exercise for 5 minutes.

Noon: With sightless gaze and soundless sound, do the 12 joint exercise for 5 minutes.

Evening: With sightless gaze and soundless sound, do the 5 bone exercise for 5 minutes.

While walking: Sense the bounce of an illuminated spine resonating to the sound of an intoned hummed Om, leading to a float of Being.

At work: Whenever you automatically judge the manifestations of others to be unpleasant, use it as a reminder to initiate an affirmation such remembering yourself in a 3 centered manner while visualizing the illuminated skeleton of the other.

I typed a post earlier - must have forgotten to click "submit".

This week, just doing part of our weekly exercise;

> With sightless gaze and soundless sound, do the 5 bone exercise for 5 minutes.
>
> While walking: Sense the bounce of an illuminated spine resonating to the sound of an intoned hummed Om, leading to a float of Being.

reasons being that I'd prefer to keep the 5-bone exercise we had last week going, as it is developing nicely, and also that there is sufficient "doing things differently" and "doing what it does not like" from the May work, to keep me making efforts.

While talking about bones, I'm interested in the possibility that magnetic centre resides in the bone-marrow. Any references to read, or comments to add from group please?

Thanks,
Judy.

Making the time for the first part of the exercise every morning before work was well worth it, though twice it was mid-morning before I could intentionally work with it.

"At work: Whenever you automatically judge the manifestations of others to be unpleasant, use it as a reminder to initiate an affirmation such remembering yourself in a 3 centered manner while visualizing the illuminated skeleton of the other."
This was amazing, the illuminated skeleton visualization aided a whole different state of seeing for several minutes at a time. I am still working to see the 7 deadly sins regularly. Those few precious moments when I see them, even if I can't stop the negativity, at the time they are happening, are worth everything. Would you say judgment if anger or vanity?

---

by Judy

Hi Zenas,

> Would you say judgment if anger or vanity?

I haven't tried connecting judgement to a particular egotism.
Most interesting.
It seems to vary with whichever of my buttons are pushed.
The visualisation of the illuminated skeleton, together with some self-remembering (even if it is simply "Here I am, visualising the skeleton of this person), while sensing the body, buys some time for further affirmation of "wish to be".
Judgement is a reaction from outside in, which is obviously the opposite to what I wish.

Judy.

Observe, sense and feel the remarkableness of your breathing, considering its purpose, its process and its product.

Observe, sense and feel the remarkableness of your eating, considering its purpose, its process and its product.

Observe, sense and feel the remarkableness of your impressions, considering its purpose, its process and its product.

Ponder: Is there anything in the megalocosmos that is not remarkable?

---

by Judy

Etymology of "remark" added significantly to the usual dictionary meanings:

> probably from a Gmc. source, cf. O.H.G. marchon "to delimit" (see mark). Original sense preserved in remarkable (1604)

---

by Judy

The part focussed on this week was;

> Observe, sense and feel the remarkableness of your impressions, considering its purpose, its process and its product.

This involves transformative work in the state of "3-brains-balanced-being-perception", which was relatively new and somewhat vague to me until I arrived at Endless Search.

I've been reading "Excavations", which includes a copy of "Herald of the Coming Good". Henderson believes Herald (which G. referred to as "my first-born") is the key to all three series of G's writings.
Below is exerpt from Herald Pp 31-33 for consideration:

"That which is called "reason" in man, as well as in all other external forms of life, is nothing more than the concentration of the results of impressions of different quality formerly perceived; and the stimulation and repetition of the se provides different kinds of associations in the being.

The recorded impressions have three sources of origin, and are subject to three law-abiding influences.
One category of associations is formed by impressions perceived involuntarily and coming directly from the outer world as well as springing from man's inner world, as a result of certain previous, constant and automatically repeated associations.
The second category is formed by voluntarily perceived impressions either springing from the external world or crystallising in man's inner world by means of deliberate active thinking and verifications of reality.
And the third category originates exclusively from the process of so-called "transformed contemplation", that is, from the confrontation of homogeneous impressions of all origins, which were already fixed, while continuous contact is maintained between their inner and separate centres.
The depositing in man's entirety of the three distinct categories of impressions, enumerated above, for the subsequent manifestations of man's general psyche confirms, among other things, the real diversity of the three determinate states of man's consciousness and defines their quality and importance.
By the methods of the Institute For Man's Harmonious Development one can quite definitely, and without the slightest doubt, establish that man's consciousness is made up of three definite capacities of manifestation, and these capacities are formed of and are determined by the associations of impressions which have their origin in one of the three above~mentioned categories.
One of the three states of consciousness, which, in the objective sense, is considered the highest and most desirable for man, reposes exclusively on associations of previously perceived impressions of the third category only.
The second state of consciousness is made up of the associations of impressions of the second order mentioned above, that is, voluntarily perceived.
In the third state of human consciousness can be attributed, without any difficulty, the kind of consciousness for which the modern man, in his desire to emphasize its great importance and never doubting the correctness of his denomination, has adopted the expression of the "waking~state~of~consciousness".

Which takes us from one book to another, the second being "My End is My Beginning" where Bert explains his thoughts on this, and which James and I have been talking about here this week.
Connections...connections.
Which reminds me that I'm on a roll with page 31 today, so nay as well check out BT page 31.

That's it for this morning.
Best wishes to all.

While attending to your breathing and associated sensations, become aware of the objects in your environment through visual, auditory and olifactory impressions. Be aware of yourself looking and ponder the impermanent nature of all things and specifically your own mortality. Try to refrain from indulging in feelings of self pity, fear and other negative emotions associated with these thoughts. If these feelings arise, simply observe them without judgement as you continue to attend to your breathing and your environment.

---

by Ian

This weeks program was based on a suggested exercise by Siddhartha (Dean), one of our new group members.

If anyone else would like to contribute in the future, please email me with your suggestions.

---

by Judy

This is effective for repeated little shocks of self-remembering over a short time-period.
Expanding the categories of sensory impressions as widely as I could, and then re-integrating them into one field also added a nice touch.
The "associated sensations" mentioned I took in a general way to include sensing the body as well.
Pondering my own mortality has ceased to be the shock it was a couple of years ago, but of course some negative emotions can be found, so this added another transformative aspect. A neutral 3-centred-state resulted.

Thanks Siddhartha for this exercise. Much appreciated.

by Lawrick

Just back from the mountains and begining to work with this exercise.
One comment with respect to mortality. This was at one time a difficult question to consider particularly with the burning pitch and sulfer of contemporary thought injecting fear into everything. My considering becoming a Muslim did not help as, if anything, the brimstone fate of wayward Muslims is even more horrific than the Christian Hell. Through the Work, Death simply becomes a change of state, something beyond this "mortal coil". Does fire and brimstone enter the equation here. I don't think so. It may be be the sacrifice we make to integrate the three brains before death of the physical body applies here. Purgatory!

Thanks for the exercise Siddhartha. Interesting name. Jewish is it not?

Your welcome for the exercise, thanks Ian for elaborating and expanding on it a bit.
The name Siddhartha actually comes from Buddha, his name was Gautama Siddhartha before he was known as Buddha. Its not my real name or anything, I'm just using an alias for the moment, although I chose it because I like the sound of it. I actually had the Buddhas ideas of impermanence in mind when I contributed this exercise, the transitory nature of things that he seems to focus on quiet often.

by Zenas

This exercise hit a note that was quite forward in being able to see Z looking at things, attention being captured by some things. It also lent to aromas and actually feeling their presence on the skin, not just the nasal area. There are times in my work when I am around impressions I would not choose; remembering myself at the time really brings their impermanance to a place that allows them to just pass instead of high-lighting judgement.

A question for Lawrick and all: fire and brimstone (sulfur-i.e. smell of rotten eggs or lava stones) is an extremely fast putrification method; could the fears of after-life be a part of changing ourselves instead of being changed? I'm reminded of a Jewish story about why Abraham tried so many times to get G-d to change his mind, that he knew the horrific things many people must suffer before they change. G talks about all the evils we prefer to endure rather than give up our precious selves. Would we walk through the fire and sulfur if we could come out the other side a more precious "metal?"

---

by Lawrick

Hey Zenas,

> could the fears of after-life be a part of changing ourselves instead of being changed? I'm reminded of a Jewish story about why

I'm not entirely sure what you are suggesting here so forgive me if I'm off base.
If you are suggesting the fear of immortal physical torture after death is an incentive to conduct ourselves in a more conscious way in this life you pose an interesting question.
The fear of hellfire and eternal damnation may make those who sleep less prone to violence and from that perspective it's better than the reality of "normal" existence, but can the negative emotion of fear create more or less consciousness in a Seeker given that it is such a powerful negative emotion. Christ spoke of Heaven, but what did he speak of hell? What do we gain if we react from fear except to empower the negative emotions we are trying to conciliate? Fear breeds fear, paranoia not metanoia.

> A question for Lawrick and all: fire and brimstone (sulfur-i.e. smell of rotten eggs or lava stones) is an extremely fast putrification method;

Death of the planetary body is pretty fast relative to the process of putrification. Now you're here, now you're gone. But I think I understand your meaning. On the other hand I might have totally missed the mark. If so.....

As to Siddhartha, I was pulling your leg with respect to your nom de plume being jewish. We have permission to add a bit of levity here and there. Everyone knows of course that Siddhartha is French. What is your name anyway? Mine's Fred

by Dean

My real name is Dean, I didn't know that the name Siddhartha is French, I would have assumed it originated in the far east, but languages and philology in general isn't something I would claim to be fluent in.
I personally think that an unrealistic approach to any religion can only give negative results. It seems that instilling fear, or on the other hand false self righteousness will inevitably lead to people using it as a means to subjugate other beings. Perhaps in some cases a person may be affected enough by certain doctrines to conduct themselves in a more humane way, but I wouldn't count on it. The many I's would prevent any sort of permanent consciousness or conscience to develop. Overall I think subjective religions can only have a negative impact on society and individuals. People generally justify themselves in one way or another with psychological buffers, and even begin to believe that wars and class systems are some how a part of a normal existence. A lot of wars and crimes have been justified in the name of religion and it seems that is the inevitable result of religions that have no esoteric basis. The different levels of religion that Gurdjieff illustrates give a good description of what usually occurs with mankind when they attempt to become more spiritual. Man number one is inclined to have a superstitious view of higher powers with strange rituals and sacrifices. Man number two is likely to have a very fanatical approach to their beliefs with witch hunts and persecution. Man number three has a scholastic view of things with a lot of useless knowledge and empty facts that don't connect anything with a whole. The idea that anything substantial could come from religion on these levels would be futile at best.

---

by Judy

Lawrick wrote:

> Everyone knows of course that Siddhartha is French.

Yeah yeah Fred - about as French as Taj Mahal!
You are in fine Homeric mode today.

by Zenas

Only one clarification: nothing about fear as negative emotion. Fear is on the list with miracles as an inducer of belief and faith. A miracle - a deviation or personal intervention in the ray of creation or 'natural laws' - would seem positive only if for a greater good. Water into wine? ho hum. Knowing someone's past, present, future? Ho hum - unless on a level to change him/her. Bringing someone back from the dead? First, why? ho hum. Unless, as in Nicoll's "The New Man" that isn't what is meant. Which is what this rather too lengthy explanation is about: could what has been degraded into physical fear have had true esoteric background? Someone help me with the actual wording of one of the sayings posted on the wall in France, listed in "Views:" "Fear is future presience." Can there be a "fear" to keep the Work the most important aspect of my life? Yes, watching sleep and seeing myself.
Sorry if I stumbled over my feet on this one.

by Dean

I see what you're getting at Zenas, I misunderstood what you meant earlier and thought of fear in a different sense. It does seem like fear could serve as a shock to awaken a person and could serve that purpose. Gurdjieff makes a comment that all our emotions are rudimentary organs for something higher, fear may be an organ of future clairvoyance, anger of real force etc. I'm not really sure if a method of using fear to try to awaken would be effective if it is a primitive form of clairvoyance or if it is something negative that we are trying to rid ourselves of. If this idea was taken too far it seemed it would only produce negative results but perhaps being fearful of not attaining a soul or being punished in the afterlife could motivate a person to work harder for salvation.

Your joke went totally over my head Fred, I obviously didn't ponder very hard before I responded to your comment about the name Siddhartha.

Intriguing associations. I've been told I was tone deaf. I probably am. And my ex-wife was a singer. I used to listed to practice octaves for endless hours. Still I will try.

Question, Ian. In all the mediation I've done my mind has taken a position of just letting thoughts flow by. How does concentrating on a question fit with that?

> Question, Ian. In all the mediation I've done my mind has taken a position of just letting thoughts flow by. How does concentrating on a question fit with that?

In all the meditation you have done, the fact that what you were doing was a meditation was always in the 'back' of your mind while you were doing it. Holding a question in mind is similar to holding the 'meditation' in mind. One still allows the thoughts to flow by without paying them undue attention; without latching on to the thoughts and getting identified with them or without focusing on the thoughts to the exclusion of the other things that you can be aware of through your various sensory channels, while at the same time remembering the question that one sets onself to Ponder. The question is the meditation, but the answers that 'pop up' are the automatic functioning of the mind.
Not that that is 'bad' in any sense, since the functionn of the mind is to provide 'answers'. Just like the function of the kidneys is to produce urine. The mind is a problem solving device. Its function is to weigh alternatives and 'spit out' an answer, but that answer can be ignored or let go of and then another answer may be forthcoming later. There is no end to answers provided by the mind, as that is what the mind does. But there is no reason to accept its answers as definitive, because it can always come up with a different answer at a later time. Therefore, it is recommended that we always remain on the question side of things. Or, every answer can suggest further questions. I think that is what is meant about digesting impressions - going deeper and deeper with our questioning and not accepting the first 'answer' that comes to mind.

I've gone on too long on this answer, and not enough on the question...

So, pondering is holding a question before the mind, staying with the question, but always being open that there is another answer beyond the provisional answers we have received so far.

All answers are provisional pending new information. The more we digest our impressions, the more information we have to form new answers... or questions...

So - what does it mean to KNOW?

Mr Beidler said - Avoid crystallization.

Answers are crystallizations.

Hang loose!

The exercise using ascending and descending octaves has come to mind several times particularly in short durations as I am waiting in line, or at a traffic light, or waiting for coffee etc. I have been looking for resonance while doing this but I guess I must be body deaf. This is a nice complement to the 5 bone exercise as it seems to arise from an entirely different place and provides continuity. Doing this exercise got me thinking about the universal AUM chant. Mr. Sharp say the AUM contains all vowel sounds, so I began to wonder if it contains all musical notes as well, and further, is this particular sound intonated in one particular musical key for example C major or perhaps as I believe G. once stated, to paraphrase,"the universal world sound is a minor chord". If so can anyone familiar with chanting this mantra tell me what Key Signature if any is used. Jose', are you still out there? Can you set us straight on this. I've not done the meditation.

Hello everyone,
I tried out the humming mentally in an unusually long queue at the supermarket. The lady before me really lost her temper with the girl at the check-out, who didn't respond but turned quite pink. Then along I come, humming just stopped, and some trace of contentment showing in facial expression as a result of the inner smile I suppose. The girl smiled at me and said; 'I really appreciate your patience.' Slight recollection of our April idiots exercises. Nice.

Thanks for posting such a detailed post on pondering Ian. What I usually do is to posit the question in the mind while continuing the 3-centred state, just allowing it to be there, and later taking notice (or maybe not) of any resultant thoughts/feelings/instincts. I have often found that while I don't have an 'answer' as such, there is often an altered perception of the question, which may modify the situation being considered (referring in particular to some ordinary decisions in life here).

Your description tells me to give less attention to answers which may arise, and to keep the relaxed attention on the question.
So tentative answers are simply seen as a sort of current commentary, and a further aspect of the question, which may lead to another question, and so on.
Is this the way it goes Ian? Or anywhere close?
Harry, thanks for asking this question.

Regards,

> While in a state of three centered meditation, ponder: Why am I doing this?

Does 'this' refer to meditating? As in, why am I meditating?

In relation to Harry's question about meditating/pondering, I've noticed that when I ponder a question such as: what is suffering?, my brain spits out answer after answer. But if I ponder a question such as: who am I? Or: what am I? Or: why am I here?, my brain doesnt have much to offer as far as answers go. Pondering: who am I/what am I? is one of my favorite meditations, perhaps because my brain doesn't really offer much in response. It's sort of like short-circuiting my associative thinking. I guess that's one way I can stop my thoughts.

James wrote:

I have noticed this too James.
It is as if I have to ask the 'big' questions to keep the questioning going. It seems to be helpful to ask something that the machine cannot answer by itself - something which touches a deeper level than the formatory parts of centres, closer to something essential.
So if easy answers pop associatively into the mind, then they only address a surface level, and there remain many other inner levels to explore.
I am recognising increasingly just how if the questioning stops, the triadic transformation work stops too. Answers kill it somwhow.
Etymology of 'question' is 'ask, seek' which says it clearly.
One aspect of 'endless search' is thus 'endless questioning'.

Towards an effort to be present in the moment, and grounded in the present, devote one third of your attention to sensing your body from within by sensing your skeleton. With another third of your attention, be aware of the world around you through the impressions received by your five senses. With the final third of your attention, maintain an awareness of an inner smile in your heart.

Ponder: "We are not troubled by things, but by the opinions which we have of things." (Epictetus)

by Lawrick

Well here comes another book!
I was practicing the weekly exercise in my favorite bistro this morning. It is almost impossible for me to observe negative manifestations of myself or others while imagining we are but our skeletons.There just doesn't seem to be any judgementalism when skeletons are sitting, talking, or marching around in a room. Which unfortunately displays the general way I perceive people, as bodies, clothes, hairstyles, jewelery etc. Just when I've almost walked away, they draw me back in. (The Godfather) Yet as skeletons people have none these normal persona judgements for me. The skeleton exercise can diffuse many unpleasant conceptions. It's hard to be angry with a pile of bones.

The inner smile. Why is it that when I'm practicing the inner smile as I was this morning, others perceive my neutral gaze as something warm and is invariably returned with the same non-judgemental warmth. I"m not sure the inner smile can be contained within. Is it the smile, that draws such a warm response, or the fact I'm trying to stay conscious for a few moments? Anyone else notice this phenomenon. Today for example a local businessman walked up to me and asked where I found all the interesting books I read. We've never met, never talked, yet he was absolutely positive I read interesting books and it was absolutelt important-essential, he found out???? This morning on the counter before me were, Nott's "Further Teachings of Gurdjieff", along with " The Herald..." and,"Excavations of the Buried Dog" and a hardcopy of this week's exercise. Interesting books indeed.
He asked who this Gurdjieff was? Has anyone else tried to answer that question under 10,000 words. Good Luck! I told the businessman G. was an Armenian Mystic. He made me promise to provide further details next time we meet. The whole episode was surreal. Now what do I do?
Another woman I'd spoken to a few times brought over her son and told him in no uncertain words that I was the-smartest-man-she-had-ever-met because I read with such quiet intensity. Weird! In fact realistically, I'm just the stooge who reads. Intelligence don't got hardly nothin' to do with my smartirness. Jes' book readin' is all. Now I'm convinced, since these manifestations have occured before, that there is something to the inner smile that is very charismatic to others. Why?

I certainly would enjoy sharing some of your experience with this phenonmenon.

The picture language found in Excavations. Surely Mr. Henderson is not the first to discover this dynamic is he? Comments?????????

Also, would anyone wish to comment or share thoughts on the meaning of G's "New Institute" (Herald of Coming Good P.84-85) where there will be 3 new "independent laboratories;
The "Magnetic-Astral"
the "Thoughthanbledzoin"
the "Mentaloethero-winged.

Other inventions include"
"the Luminous-Key-Board"
the Retro-Rebounding-Echoraising-Organ.

The first three laboratories would appear to have some resemblance to G,s mythacal beast of Akhaldan or as Henderson decribes them in Excavations, "A=Not Haldan=moon. Those without the moon. Pharasees.

I agree with both Cor-delia and James regarding ponderings. They can be like the "Brothers in Meetings. Sometimes the finest ponderings produce absolutely zilch, zip, nada. So why do I feel so bright afterwards?

The inner smile is a gratitude, joy, childish warmth and delight at the eternal mystery and infinite diversity of life, perhaps relating to some essential beingness, a permanent I of calm radiating in the vortex, a taste of real peace as reward for a meritorious attempt. Freud,

This week's exercise, shining in its beautiful simplicity, though certainly not easy. Dividing attention into thirds - now I have it and lo! it is gone again. All three centers involved and awareness of Presence in fleeting moments.
Who is catching this awareness?

Holy Affirming,
Holy Denying,
Holy Reconciling,
Transubstantiate in me, for my Being.

Henderson implies that as we study Beelzebub's Tales on its three levels - surface, inner and innermost (literal, allegoriacal and picture-form language) - then these are three of the laboratories set up inside us as we work at the creation of a soul by studying with Mr Gurdjieff himself. So these are inner laboratories as we do the actual Work to the very best of our understanding.
I enjoyed your post Fred.

Sit or stand in a large open area. Use half your attention to remember yourself in a three centered way, and the other half of your attention to embrace the space with the aid of a sightless gaze and soundless sound.

Find an area where you can do a walking meditation. You may call this a Path of Renmenbrance. Walk on this path every day this week for 15 minutes. Walk very slowly, hands folded over your navel, with attention on your feet and on your breathing. At the end of your walk, stand erect and visualize your skeleton illuminated and radiating light.

Ponder: What is a man without quotation marks?

Off to the hills for a few days with what appears to be the perfect exercise, for guiding my body and spirit through my most Holy Hills. I guess it's my way of escaping the manic activity on the site.
So to you my bretheren and my sisteren, I shall attempt to share the breathtaking beauty with thee over the next 6 days via telepathology or whatever it's called. Should you feel a sudden peacefulness for no reason enjoy the vision.

Read in Nott yesterday that Purgatory is our life on earth. Can't get much closer to the source than Charles Stanley hisself.

Cor-delia and I are exploring the nature and meaning of Essence. One explaination is presence. Presence= pre(before) + essence. Any other thoughts?
Be well,
Lawrick

by Judy

The Path of Remembrance walking is added to 'favourites'. I chose the beach and so had hands by sides, though managed to posit a little attention on the navel. There was a noticeable 'strengthening' sensed in the chest and belly after a short time, and this carried over to other activities of the day somewhat.

As Fred mentioned, we have been exploring material written about essence. A previously unread book on the shelf "Essence" by A.H.Almaas (1986) led to my having a look at his website, where I found the following:

http://www.ahalmaas.com/essence/essence.htm
in case anyone else is interested.
The author quotes Gurdjieff frequently, and seems to come from the Sufi tradition.
I've been pondering on the possibility that part at least of the 'buried dog' Henderson talks of may indeed refer to essence..?

Comments/critiques welcome as usual.
Best wishes to all,

I thoroughly enjoyed the exercise of embracing space in an open area. I have been thinking about the fact that we are cells in comparison with the Tritocosmos, and this exercise gave me that sensation, especially when outside in an open area. Embracing space is something I haven't done that much, but I think that it is a necessary exercise in order to be aware of your scale in relation to other things, it will definitely be added to my repertoire of exercises that I do.

Judy,

I have a friend from college who is an instructor for that group. She is currently in Amsterdam at a conference. She sent this link:

http://www.ahalmaas.com/

As she and I have sort of converged on similar paths, after being born in the same city and ending up at the same college, away from town, and then ending up in a version of the work, we've kept in touch all these years with infrequent email notes. And paper ones, before there was email.

Interesting comments there about essence and suffering.

Essence - Zen Koan: What is your original face before you were born?

Essence - Gurdjieff (paraphrase): Our essence is suffering. By enduring our suffering we ease the suffering of Endlessness.

It is through suffering that we come to understand and have compassion with others.

Well they all said Louise was not half bad
It was written on the walls and window shades
And how she'd act the little girl
A deceiver, don't believe her, that's her trade
Sometimes a bottle of perfume
Flowers and maybe some lace
Men brought Louise ten cent trinkets
Their intentions were easily traced.

Yes and everybody knew at times she cried
But women like Louise they get by.

Well everybody thought it kind of sad
When they found Louise in her room
They'd always put her down below their kind
Still some cried when she died this afternoon
Lousie rode home on the mail train
Somewhere to the south I heard it said
Too bad it ended so ugly
Too bad she had to go this way.

Ah but the wind is blowing cold tonight
So good night, Louise, good night.

Ah but the wind is blowing cold tonight
So good night, Louise, good night...

And why wouldn't you keep in touch!

There is an active Australian branch of this group too. There are even a couple of current students in Cairns, who are also at a Sydney workshop being held now, and we plan to meet for a coffee when they return.
I look forward to this. Rare chance in this isolated part of the planet.
Do you know much about the group? Have you looked at this version along the way at any stage? The local library has a couple of the texts which I'm perusing - seems to be Gurdjieffan with accent on uncovering essence through psychological plus Work exercises. Is that what you make of it?

Hi Siddhartha,
Belated little comment on your post. You wrote;

> I thoroughly enjoyed the exercise of embracing space in an open area.

I was reading that Michelangelo, when asked how he sculpted 'David', is reputed to have replied;
" I simply remove the unnecessary marble to reveal the correct space."

Isn't it an interesting reversal of one's usual perspective, this awareness of the positivity of space?

Ian wrote;

Ah, yes.
And here's another:
Essence is Being.
Being is Essence.
And the interface between mind and Essence or mind and Being is understanding. This is a way of understanding.

(A.H.Almaas again).

It's a big topic.

Judy wrote,

[Isn't it an interesting reversal of one's usual perspective, this awareness of the positivity of space?]

I think the awareness of space could maybe help in destroying the maleficent effects of the ego if it was done correctly. If a person could truly sustain the sensation that they are just a drop in the ocean, or a microbe in relation to the endless universe. If this perspective was developed it could perhaps give a person a more impartial and objective view of the role of humanity in nature and maybe even humble people to the degree that they could slowly shed the skin of false personality. This of course would have to be done in connection with other exercises and then it would maybe give a person enough of a shock to awaken them enough to the truth of the human situation.

That's an interesting quote by Michelangelo, he sounds that maybe he was operating at a different plane of being than the average automaton. People like Michelangelo and Leonardo da Vinci seemed to have knowledge of the law of octaves, or at least a very keen eye for symmetry and dimensions. I wish that modern art could actually hold a candle to more ancient art, it would be interesting to see what would be created in this age by a more objective artist.[/quote]

Hi Siddhartha,
Here's what I do.

Select what you want to quote, and then right-click and copy.
Then click on 'Post reply'.
Then click;
quote paste the text you have copied quote for example > could someone maybe explain how to get the quote to show up in the white box?

Click "Preview" to check if it is correct, and when you are happy with it, click "Submit". That's it. (If you hold the mouse over the quote button, it will display the directions to you.) See how you go.

Another way to do it is to click the Quote button at the right side of the message that you want to quote. That will open the Post a Reply box with all the message quoted. You can then delete any bits you don't want quoted and then add your comments below.

Imagine you are a new born baby, and perceive everything without preconceptions, judgements and labels. Revel in the remarkableness of every impression, sensation and emotion.

Ponder: What is more Remarkable - consciousness or identity?

---

by Judy

Something in me just welcomes and enjoys this 'new-born-baby' exercise. It is bringing to the surface many very early memories which are new. They are so vivid I thought it may be imagination - so I checked with a cousin who is ten years older than me, and she verified. She was really surprised too, as no indoor photos from that toddler time either.
So the whole life is recorded there in the unconscious, just as it is said.

The pondering on consciousness and identity is opening up new questions of course. A lot of the personal search for meaning/significance in life seems connected with looking for an identity - in other words - looking for answers to "Who am I?'. Maybe the question is always there in the unconscious.

We are experiencing a real Winter here in Cairns (17 degrees latitude) for the first time since I've lived here (12 years). Everyone is at present enjoying the novelty.
Happy Solstice to all.

---

by Harry

Happy Solstice Judy.

Ours has been hotter than usual. And we are officially in a semi-draught.

Was remarking today that this has been a peculiar solstice. I don't usually experience lots of resistances this time of year. But this particular summer has been filled with small annoyances. Little things broken. Plus lots of sudden burdens. My son moving cross country with a week's notice. My mother being ill. Little insects and small broken objects.

Reminding me daily that resistance is there. And I have to experience it. Embrace it, even. Do what I don't want to do but what has to be done.

---

by Judy

Funny you should mention this Harry;

> Was remarking today that this has been a peculiar solstice. I don't usually experience lots of resistances this time of year. But this particular summer has been filled with small annoyances. Little things broken. Plus lots of sudden burdens. My son moving cross country with a week's notice. My mother being ill. Little insects and small broken objects

Early this morning some little active boys with a heavy slingshot managed to put a marble through a large window - smash!
And last night my son James phoned from Tasmania to say the cylinder on their hot water system had cracked, leaked water, which shorted out the ducted heating system - so they had to sleep near the log fire in the living room to stay warm (2 degrees C and falling).
So I know exactly what you mean..
Cheers,

---

by Harry

Funny, I'm in the middle of having my airconditioning system restored. It's been leaking all over the hall way and the ceiling is falling down. I see it as another of those resistances we receive and have to work through. Earth gives us these. Or the cosmos. Or the airconditioner guy who installed it the first time.

Daily Ponder: What is my Chief Weakness?

During the day, as you walk, sense the body by scanning from the feet up to the head on the in-breath and scanning from the head down to the feet on the out-breath. Try to observe the still point between each breath.

For each day of the week, choose a negative emotion to observe. Count how many times you react with that negative emotion.

Every evening before sleep, review the days activities as if playing back a movie.

Normally I prefer to wait until later in the week, but this week"s exercise hits so close to home I wish to make a comment.
Yesterday a highly respected friend gave me a good dressing down for being so impatient and manic of late. A hard right into the plexus. Even asking if I was bi polar. God I hate it when someone questions my sexuality!

More seriously, I have been extremely jittery of late. Perhaps the 25% rent increase, the equinox, someone pulling a hit and run on my car.

I tend to lose myself when pursuing topics of great importance to me. I grab the topic and like a bulldog, shake it for all it's worth. How ironic that in my perservering pursuit of higher consciousness, I should become so keen, so identified, that I lose it. Lately I have been seeking answers as to the nature of essence with an almost blind persitance. In fact, when I went to the mountains it spent at least 1/2 its time reading on the subject. There I was in paradise walking around stunned, looking for it.. Little communion with either my mountains, the crisp air, the fire, the rippling streams and such. Reading, something I could just as easily do right here at the computer.
So after my friend's rant I decided to experience the manifestations of impatience today. And well I did. From leaving without doing my stop exercise at the door, to not letting my car warm up, not saying the Salat prayers while driving, aimless movements waiting for the bank teller, to interrupting my niece several times during our discussion of the Work, something I almost never do in her company. In other words there were plenty of incidents to observe.

One thing I noticed in particular was that when I'm truly involved in the Work I tend to see things more as events, totalities that have a lingering substance and duration. Lately all I've been seeing are fragments, not strong or persistent enough to keep me awake for any period.

So my life has appeared more as a manic discontinuity. Certainly strong enough to impact on my friends to whom I've apologized.

The question is what is impatience? From where does it arise? I can't seem to glue it to either self love or vanity.
The other question pointed out is:
Does impatience arise from a lack of control or does a lack of control arise from my impatience?

Well tomorrow I'm going to examine looking at women with the wrong eye.
It' going to be a long week!

Hey all,
I enjoyed my last post so much I put it up 3 times, 2 for each brain.
Today I surveyed the system to seek and observe the manifestations of that apparatus just south of the navel. Lust! ummm! Observing the opposite species with the left eye. Since this behavior is so pervasive in my life:
there was no end of emperical food,
there is no end to my visual debauchery, it is frequently difficult to see women as other than "objects" this exercise has an almost infinitely defined reminding factor.
This gravity in the left eye, that which causes the vision to drop immediately south upon seeing an attractive women, is very disturbing.
And it is disturbing not just because it happens so mechanically, butt(excuse the pun) because of the difficulty in stopping the process even when observing.
From all of this arises the opportunity to both observe a negative behavior and.... to fight to do so impartially and not lose myself in disgust. This fight to observe impartially is almost as difficult as coming to terms with the behavior.

How strange that I can observe the most beautiful of women as skeletons and feel nothing sexual. I recall the Pharisees not allowing themselves to look up for fear of seeing a woman and giving rise to the above impuses as well as something else. Many broken noses from them running into poles, walls,wells, doors. However our Work does not allow us the luxury of hiding in monastaries. I must look and observe and sense impartially.
Being a man I also know there is a woman within me feeding on these impressions. Perhaps with much work and time I can earn her respect.

Along with observing a specific negative emotion and accumulation of negative emotions, I have worked to note each day's first negative thought/emotion. It seems I do not wake up in negative emotion, it takes the moving around, association with people & places.
Chief weakness, that which anyone else would count on, still eludes. A form of vain stubbornness or willfulness for certain. There are times I'd like to be able to just accept what is said or given without hesitation or questioning; it doesn't happen.
"Things" have actually been going fairly well despite the retrograde. Playing back each day is rather discouraging in its' surreal nothingness. I haven't found a strong 'stop' for myself, those that happen are triggered. I have taken the one person who's extreme mechanical negativity can cause my teeth to grind to take the inner pose of serenity. It doesn't always work though it does help. There's an irony that others' negativity can cause us to see our own.
The scanning exercise just did not work well for me, perhaps because I'm in a car so much, or just needing more observation.

Well Z. that's the problem isn't it.
A female friend long ago once related her opinion of this male-female dichotomy.
In her opinion while it was true that men were often "physical pigs-prostitutes", she said it was equally true that women were emotional"whores". It took me many years to understand what she meant. Soap Operas, Penguin "cllassic" "novels". What do you think?
Your Betsy Ross reference went whoosh!!!! Try again!

Just a little addition regarding the male female dichotomy.
I was watching a video of J.Krishnamurti recently, and he was discussing how sex has assumed extraordinary importance in today's society, way out of proportion to its true place. He said that it is the last 'essential' aspect which our upbringing and spurious education and materialistic 'civilised' life-style hasn't managed to bury deep into the unconscious. So that of course it becomes paramount because it is the easiest way for ordinary man to make contact with his true nature - his essence. But of course we in fact need to embody our true nature so that it can shine through and guide the personality, which becomes permeable, for the whole of the life experience. Thus the resolution of much of this problem is to be found by becoming present, and working as best we know how to retrieve our essential natures. Then sex will resume its appropriate place in life, because we will experience true joy, compassion, pity, remorse of conscience, love, and the real emotions wherever we are and whatever we are doing.
Makes quite a bit of sense.
The video is to be found on the homepage of that seekeraftertruth website I posted in the discussion forum if anyone is interested - number 3 I think. There is a lot about self-observation on that same video.

Thank-you for the chuckle, Lawrick; of course the reference went "whoosh--h-h-h," it's a U.S. Americanism - nice little legend about Betsy Ross sewing the original 13 stars and stripes together during the American Revolutionary War, about 1776. A good reality check for eclecticism - we so seldom see it in ourselves.

Cor-delia: what you wrote stated well what I was trying to say. We are so taught the Intellect is the only 'noble' aspect, it's hard to admit anything else. J. Krishnamurti wrote a section on "Beyond Thought" that was one of my first introductions to serious seeking. Thanks for the additional info on him.

Daily Pondering: Is suffering a required function?

After eating, take a few moments to breathe consciously.

Each morning and evening, the Seeker will set aside a period of time to visualize himself as a magnetic point in the center of an icosahedron. Every triangle will represent an aspect of his mechanical external life. The central magnetic point will represent his innermost essential nature.

by Zenas

Pondering suffering as a required function, the seeker finds almost all suffering to be petty vanity and judgments of "shoulds." People we don't know or only have to work with now and then are easy to note the mechanical and let it pass. When we need to stay in place where others' mechanicality creates real friction, the robot inside responds like two fighting robots a grandson has, they just spar away for the amusement of others. 'Suffering' usually lessens when I can remember to keep my face relaxed and in a calm pose, particularly the eyes. If the eyes aren't with the face, little tics give away everything else.

Visualizing a icosahedron, it was interesting to reflect back through each mechanical aspect, some going to their beginnings decades ago. The magnetic point at the center did not come until just last night and it was warm and cool at the same time, like facing a camping fire on a brisk evening.

> Each morning and evening, the Seeker will set aside a period of time to visualize himself as a magnetic point in the center of an icosahedron. Every triangle will represent an aspect of his mechanical external life. The central magnetic point will represent his innermost essential nature.

Visualisation began to move this morning.
What I saw was one triangle moving in to try to touch the luminous point. Then other triangles joined in. Then they moved out and away from it. So there was a contracting and expanding icosahedron and the point began to grow larger.

Then the whole thing began to spin and lots of random movements continued. This brought about a quality of self-remembering.
Gratitude after, but also a brief overwhelming feeling (suffering) as I realised the enormity of the task. I had to relax and accept and sit with it, until equanimity restored somewhat.
I sensed movement in the body too, as if the whole back was being pushed forward by a triangle of all things, and the message was one of action. Imagination, but creative. Or slight essential movement? Or both?
I find this action of taking the work into life activites very difficult sometimes. That is another whole topic.
Best wishes,
Judy.

Hey all,
I've experienced difficulty with the exercise this week. I couldn't figure out why as I have attempted it frequently. Today however after meditating and putting myself in a three centred state, I began to realize results.
Once again comes the realization that exclusive mental preparation gains nothing but headaches and that we must find some state of consciousness before the "enzymes can funtion". It has displayed again the difficulty in staying awake and overcoming the inertia of sleep. It has shown me just how diabolical my personality can be.

So today the Icosahedron started taking shape and moving. In taking shape, the visualization of external forms, emotions, was like a pane of glass covering the triangles and bouncing my ideas back and forth. A growth process. When the glass "personality-life" was removed, all I saw were iron bars imprisoning my essence. Strange, one would think just the opposite.
I then took my newfound "spaceship and started exploring my inner life. Visiting various areas of my body and sensing. Light, airy. When I visited my "mind", a powerful pounding began at the top of my head. Again! Something desperately trying to enter? Common sense perhaps? There was also a growing warmth in the middle of my forehead. I took my "ship" two palm widths outside my forehead to see..... nothing. So much for second sight today.
The lesson for the day, month, year, is that there is almost nothing to be gained from attempting this work in our ordinary waking consciousness.
Wake up! Be! I say to me.

While reading C.S. Nott the other day, I was struck by the fact that he and his fellows, regardless of their fatigue, always made a point of discussing the ideas they uncovered and in doing so, their understanding must have grown exponentially. So here we are at the " Prieure" and being very quiet. Why? Why are we not using this precious forum to communicate. Is not conscious communication a form of Work? Just a thought

As to the Entity, I bring a quote from Orage in Nott's book "Journey of a Pupil";
"One of the chief purposes of a man is to develop from a substance called "essence", a special kind of reason,-objective reason-which will establish him as a permanent brain-cell of all life".

Heady brew indeed.
Will post on "suffering next week as I obviously haven't suffered enough to post this week and must do some more.
Be well my bretheren, (and sisteren)

On pondering whether suffering is a required function I came to the conclusion that it definitely had a purpose, that it maybe keeps things in check or sends signals in order for one to adapt to external conditions correctly. It seems that suffering would be the only way to progress in most things, that it takes many forms whether large or small and would serve as the neutralizing force in order for anything to develop. On pondering suffering I also began questioning whether all suffering is necessary, if mechanical suffering could serve any purpose whatsoever, or if it was just completely negative, adding to the chaos of mechanical existence. It seems that conscious suffering is one of the most valuable tools in self development so this also affirmed the conclusion that suffering is a required function.

On visualizing the icosahedron images of false personality revolving around a magnetic center became apparent, that our mechanical manifestations were like static shrouding us in sleep, and the magnetic point was like Noah's ark, an alternative from automatic attachments and salvation from the effects of this waking stupor of sleep. I had images that brought forth associations that could be compared to the structure of an atom, with the magnetic point representing the nucleus, and the triads of mechanicalness representing electrons revolving around this nucleus, waiting to create interference and oppose this other active force. The nucleus would not be overwhelmed by these mechanical influences as long as it remained active in remembrance and the orbitals of false personality and the ego could be impartially observed and diminished in the power of their influence. I felt the magnetic point to have an affinity with the nervous system at times, it seemed that the sensations of the nerves directed by intelligence seemed to bring forth associations involving the root of my essential nature or essence, as long as efforts of self remembering were successful.

Overall this exercise was useful and brought new insights, as well as giving me some experience with the art of visualizing, something I don't practice that often. Hope everyone is having a good summer!, keep up the holy work of our common father.

The pondering on suffering;
This is interesting Siddhartha:

> It seems that suffering would be the only way to progress in most things, that it > takes many forms whether large or small and would serve as the neutralizing force in order for anything to develop.

Yes I see what you mean.
I mostly think of sufferings as Holy Denying forces, yet they can actually be first or second or third force depending on the actual point in the process we are considering. I have mainly looked at what I'll call the Work triad I suppose, where Wish to work is first force, and second force is usually suffering of some kind. Then some aspect of The Work comes in as third force, and the resultant fourth thing to consider is hopefully equanimity or another higher emotion.

In fact, suffering is often the motivating force, first force, to bring about some Work effort on my part.
And I can see that suffering, somewhat earlier in the process, certainly has the role of 'neutralising' whatever previous mechanical state I was in.

Anyone else like to comment on this please?
Best wishes,
Judy.

On pondering the Four Noble truths of Buddha I thought of the cessation of suffering in the connection with this question, whether suffering is a required function. It seems from my understanding that since "attachment is the cause of suffering" and the cessation of suffering is "the path of the Buddha" that it seems that conscious suffering is the way forward in order to overcome mechanical suffering. The way or path requires much effort, work, and conscious suffering in order to overcome the negative force of attachment and identification. One may be necessary and one may be unnecessary, each one representing opposite forces, one serving involution and one evolution. So in this sense it might be a double edged sword whether or not suffering is required, it may depend on what level we are speaking on and at what angle we approach the question.

It could also be said that if there was no external pressure of any kind a person could not adapt accordingly and would wither up and die. It seems that things evolve, such as thought and emotion, to serve a function for survival. This evolution needs stimulus and friction in order to grow as well as a certain struggle and perhaps much suffering. As Buddha says "Life is suffering", which means the struggle for existence in itself is suffering. This resistance is the stimulus which makes anything strong in nature and gives it the ability to adapt to its environment. Without this suffering there wouldn't be any possibility for development so it seems in this sense, suffering is indispensable and is a required function.

In my darkest moments and conflict with life arises a need, a need to work on myself, to dig deep inside of myself for answers. Or even to be able to form the questions that seem to rest on the tip of my tongue.

Through discomfort and sufferings, it forces a need to work on myself.
It's always a tug-of-war between my mind and body. The mind tells me one thing and my gut (emotions) another. And then the search for balance, for harmony begins...

transubstantiate in me for my being

Hi Siddhartha,

> It seems that things evolve, such as thought and emotion, to serve a function for survival.

Interesting. I agree.
I am beginning to see one of the main functions of personality is that of protection. This means that it is a very good friend indeed, and even as essence is uncovered, I still need certain aspects of personality. Transform the negative and appreciate the rest, and integrate with essential aspects as they are uncovered. Creating/maturing the soul.

Hi Siddhartha,

I'd have to agree with what Judy says above about suffering being considered as the Denying Force in the Work Triad.

I presume you are familiar with Bennett's scheme of 6 triads. Those are fine within the appropriate context, but for Work on onself, the active force is the intention/plan/method to work, suffering in its various forms is the denying force, and the result, the mid-point, mid-course, the space of impartiality is the reconciling force.

As Mr Beidler says - "Holy Denying equals our inherited mechanical "myself" manifested by our habits, traits, thoughts, feelings and actions in sleep. Holy Affirming is our conscious effort to accept, endure and to meet with objectivity all our Holy Denyings. Holy Reconciling is the resultant of them both leading automatically to a Transubstantiation. By self-observation we learn to recognize accurately our Holy Denyings to which we then eventually apply our Holy Affirming."

Visualizing is a very important skill to develop. Some say it is the language of essence. So by practicing visualization we help to educate and communicate with our essence.

I agree with that for the most part, what I was thinking of was in the octave between si and do, thinking that intentional suffering could be the 3rd conscious shock if there is such thing. I've never read anything about the last shock, it seems people don't speak of that. Perhaps I was wrong in thinking it was the neutralizing force, I sometimes automatically think a shock is neutralizing force, but now I see that it depends on the process.

Right, for some reason people don't often mention the 2nd conscious shock, except in passing. I have some material elsewhere on the website expressing my views about it -

Just a note:

Holy Rejoycing
Holy Revolting
Holy Suffering

Equates to:

Holy Postive
Holy Negative
Holy Reconciling.

Remember, too, that the middle is higher for the preceeding lower and lower for the succeeding higher. The middle is suffering. The result of rejoycing and revolting meeting.

Thanks Ian for the information on the 2nd conscious shock, it's very well written and is the best exposition I've read on the subject. It has cleared up some confusion I had about the 2nd conscious shock. Thanks to Harry as well for the note on suffering, it has also clarified my understanding of the role of suffering in relation to the law of three.

---

by Judy

Hello Harry,

> Holy Rejoycing
> Holy Revolting
> Holy Suffering

May I just talk through this please?

I'm visualizing a pendulum swing; one extreme of the swing equates to rejoicing, the other extreme to revolting; the mid-point to suffering. (reconciling force here).

And the pendulum-swing mid-point is the point of balance, and the connection with higher on the vertical scale, thus it becomes a part of a valid Work Triad.
And in this Work triad, we introduce "wish to work" (which is higher up the pendulum vertically towards the fulchrum above) as the affirming force, and bring it to act on the suffering as the denying force (at the bottom mid-point in the pendulum-swing itself), to allow the actual Work to be a reconciling force, which may result in eg; an impartial state, which in vertical position is between the two.

Make sense?
Any comments appreciated as always.
Regards,

---

by Harry

I'm not sure I like the idea of a pendulum. Because the midpoint doesn't balance the pendulum. You've got momentum, plus gravity. The two points of the pendulum aren't opposites. They're the same thing.

Yesterday I had some work to do, and have been feeling slightly under the weather. Literally and figuratively. But the work had to be done. So the initiative is to do the work. The resistance is just that, resistance. Suffering can be pushed in either direction. So I push it to the higher octave and continue to do the work.

---

by Judy

Hi Harry,

> I'm not sure I like the idea of a pendulum. Because the midpoint doesn't balance the pendulum. You've got momentum, plus gravity. The two points of the pendulum aren't opposites. They're the same thing.

Analogies certainly have limitations. I cannot draw diagrams here, so seem to use them more often than otherwise would - mental pictures if you like. Perhaps instead of 'pendulum', please read 'pointer of the (Libra) balance-scales'. Anyway it is enough for the general idea.
Then yes, neutral point (suffering) can be pushed either way by adding more weight to either the positive or to the negative extremes.
I was mainly looking for a two-dimensional analogy to illustrate the centrality of suffering in ordinary horizontal life, and to illustrate that the way of transformation brings in the vertical Work dimension.
Cheers,

Ian asks

> Does essence have likes and dislikes?
> What does essence value?

A very pregnant question. Akin to asking something like,"is Beelzebub's Tales a good book or bad book?"
The essence of the question lays in the degree of comprehension of this "substance" of essence. The concept of "essence" has been my burning question of the day---- for about two months now. Along with another group member I have been burning up the email highway in trying to find some comprehensible definition of this, to me, absolutely vital question. We have been examining much of the Work literature particularly Gurdjieff, Nott, Orage, Sharp,Bennett, and from the perspective of John Henderson who just released a new book called, "Hidden Meanings and Picture Form Language in the Writings of G.I. Gurdjieff", in my opinion a brilliant and critical insight into our Work. We have also been exploring the work of A.H.Almass who seems to have done some excellent work in exploring the question.
As in BT, the deeper one searches, the more meaning, and more questions one faces. Like so many things dealing with my view of the Work, I took the "assumed" answer to essence, "everything which with we are born", as something already understood. Now with this weeks simple pondering, a hornet's nest of questions have begun to bite, and my ignorance revealed. If we learn anything here surely it must be to take nothing for granted.

Using the current literature:
We learn from Nicholl that,"Essence descends from a "high place" and becomes ultimately encased in a body of flesh and bones". and, "essence is like the germinal spot in an egg", that "comes from above", that, "must be fertilized by the Work", and "is the Word of God". (the I AM?)
Sharp discloses that,"until essence is able, ready, and willing to be born, conception cannot occur", a very mysterious statement, and,"The Tradition teaches that one is born with essence, one's total possibilities". Finally, simply stated from Orage,"Essence is Truth before God".

Where can Essence be found?
Henderson states,"The centre of gravity of essence is the Emotional Centre, but it is not found in the Emotional Centre.....essence is transformed in the Emotional Centre". Orage writes,".. the intellectual part of the emotional centre.....is the seat of essence", and as well," the spirituallity of essence lies in the future".

What is Essence?
From Orage again,"Essence is the Truth before God",that,"essence is not conscience, but Objective Conscience is its highest form" and that,"one of the main purposes of man is to develop from a substance called essence".
Patriarch Nott writes,"Objective Conscience.....is the Representative of God within the essence", and that "only a conscious man can distinguish from essence and personality....". In BT, Gurdjieff states,'the possiblity is foreseen for beings to acquire the kernel of their essence, that is to say, their own I....". Henderson comes right out and says,"essence is a real live person living beside us here, now, one step to the rear of us", and that,"we must learn to see essence in our daily lives"and, "Being manifestations are from essence". Patriarch Nott makes it very clear that,"The essence of a normal man is a Biblical hunger and thirst after righteousness-a thirst for Objective Reason".
In his book "Diamond Heart", Book IV, "Indestructable Innocence" the writer A. H. Almass writes, to paraphrase, "Essence is the direct expression of the fundamental Truth: it is what is between appearance and fundamental reality". "Essence crosses the boundary between the two truths, the two Worlds". "The quality of Essence are the first words"! (I AM?)
Such a tiny question and I could go on and on,and, oh yes, that's what I've just been doing.

So back to the original quote:

> Does essence have likes and dislikes?
> What does essence value?

1. In early life---Yes! I think
2 Righteousness perhaps
Or so I believe at this stage of my search.

What it all really means is to just do the Work. The meanings will take care of themselves. If anyone else would like to join us on our essential search please contact me via my email or on the group site and your input would be truly appreciated.

Will reply to the rest of the exercise when the blisters on my fingers heal.

Be well,
Lawrick

"But always there will remain a nucleus of those who really understand and who will keep the Method and the System as Gurdjieff has taught it".

by Dean

For the first question,

[Does essence have likes and dislikes?]

I came to the conclusion that essence has a more objective taste than personality. Certain fine impressions strike a chord with essence and harmonize with its functioning, while course impressions impede this energy flow and create harmful vibrations which would affect the organism in a negative way. It would be like comparing a wilderness at sunset to a dismal city, or music like rap to music by The Beatles or Pink Floyd. In the case of food I came to the conclusion that essence would appreciate organic healthy foods while personality wouldn't mind eating artificial processed foods, and may even dislike food that essence would savor. With this thought in mind you could say that essence is natural while personality is artificial, in the objective sense.

While pondering the second question, I felt that essence would value experience, or to be more specific impressions. It would obviously value subtle impressions over gross impressions, and would value the energy that came from these impressions.

On speaking of essence in general it stands to reason that essence would be a combination of many things. I think it would be easiest to approach the distinction between essence and personality by describing what essence is not. Personality is made up of all the previously perceived impressions that are localized in the formatory apparatus and which make up a persons education, their social mask, and many negative habits. It is all the mechanized information and memorized facts in us, including emotional impressions and moving impressions which are fixed in our common presence. All the preconceived, preconditioned opinions as well as stereo types and moral prejudices. Our mechanical and automatic actions are made up of personality and nothing more.

Essence in contradistinction would be quite the opposite. It is made up of all the centers which have been sublimated to the required gradation of reason. It would be direct knowledge that came from experience, from the higher centers, and from a more objective mind. Morality and social norms may seem foreign to essence, it would not be interested in putting on a facade or mask unless the influence of personality was there. It seems primitive people with more of an essence would choose truth over falsehood, and would express themselves accordingly, while "civilized" people wouldn't feel ashamed of posing or playing a social role that they have imitated, or having a fake display of emotions etc. Essence is presence and remembrance, the conscious part of the centers.

It does seem essence is a function of objective conscience in comparison with mechanical subjective morality. A fully developed essence would wish to pay back its debt to nature, and would have remorse of conscience if it didn't fulfill this function as it has been destined to do. I think having an essence and objective conscience would be the precursor to objective reason.

In trying to define essence, I don't think it could be easily done with the limited words of our language. Essence may be found in the right hemisphere of the brain while personality is found in the left hemisphere. This makes sense because the left hemisphere is responsible for structured manifestations (the formatory apparatus), while the right hemisphere is to do with artistic endeavors, and intuition. I believe that Gurdjieff was quoted to say that essence and personality may even be found in different parts of the brain, which would confirm this conclusion. Rodney Collin says essence is the chemical-physical blood that has been coursing through our veins since our birth, the information that makes up our state of being. This may also be an aspect of essence, but overall the best definition I think is saying that essence is what is our own, while personality is what is not our own, or Ouspensky's definition which says essence is our functions or centers while personality is all the impressions and associations stored in the centers.

I still have the feeling that I have only scratched the surface of this very expansive topic.

As always, exercises on doing what 'it' doesn't like have a strong impact. This week was no exception.
Focus over the past week was on -

> Refrain from a favorite person. Interact with a disliked person.

as it fitted in well with another current exploration so merited many attempts.

The machines reactions to a conscious attempt to interact with various people I don't usually have much in common with were usual and predictable. My personality's pattern here seems to be one of avoidance - I just want to escape and may even invent a reason to get away. This week I made efforts to reach impartiality by 'being present' as much as I could, using 3-brains-balanced-being perception (sensing the body proved invaluable here), and keeping both feet firmly planted on that spot and refusing felt inner instincts to move away.

There was some confusion arising from this, as I refused to simply accept the hostile "no", and tried to acknowledge the "yes" in the totality of the relationship.
Twice, amidst the salad-toss of thoughts, feelings and instinctive bodily reactions, I was able to know and sense something deeper - like a background if you like - and it was a real connection to the other person, as this background was deeper and somehow more real. Just briefly, essence was maybe touched, and the personality's antics were seen to be amusing and less important.

This mini-integration stayed with me afterwards, and in spite of noticing confusion at surface levels, something preferred this state. It was more real.
Then that evening, there was a quite emotional realization. It happened that I suddenly knew that commitments here in the far north were completed, that I miss my family, and that perhaps it is time to consider returning south to be within an hour's drive or so of them. Whether this is a reliable insight to be acted on, or simply an indication of returning emotional openness following deep grief in 2006, remains to be seen. I share this personal stuff because there is definitely a correlation between this increasing health and the week's exercise. Undoubtedly.

Thus it was a tumultuous week for the machine. Some of its cogs flew in all directions. This was a little scary, and I'm wondering if this relates to the "loosening" of personality read about. ?
I thank God that I have a safe place here to talk about these events with people of like mind.

Regarding;

> Does essence have likes and dislikes?
> What does essence value?

Depends on how 'essence' is viewed here, IMO.
If germinal Essence with a capital E, then I cannot find likes and dislikes - it just is; and I don't know what it values or even if it does anything at all other than simply be.
But if essence with small e, which I'll call personal essence, then yes, it has likes and dislikes; and it values reality totality love etc, and sees things as they are.

Interesting that the way to our true nature and becoming a complete human being is sometimes called real-ization.

Best wishes,

by Dean

I feel the need to dwell on this extensive subject of essence more, it has always been a topic which has been difficult to assimilate and understand.

In respect to what essence values I do believe that essence values certain things over others. I don't believe essence would value what the average person values in terms of money or materialism. I also can't see essence valuing being famous or having a lot of social status unless it was influenced by false personality. I do think that essence values sensations,movement, emotions, and certain intellectual impressions. Some examples of things that essence might value would be such things as the warmth from the sun, vibrant colors, the feeling of love, or the sound of birds chirping in the forest. Silence may be something that essence would value, it seems like unnecessary talk is a side effect of personality, the fear of feeling awkward or showing your true emotions in a social setting. It would also make sense that essence valued higher emotions such as compassion, joy, hope, faith and love. Most sacred things that come from the higher centers would be valued, and most things to do with a persons state of being I think.

Essence in connection with different types of people may weaken this theory that essence has likes and dislikes. Perhaps some types of essences colored with various influences of heredity and planetary influences would have certain tastes which others wouldn't. I'm not sure if these differences would be enough to say that there is no such thing as objective art, or universal forms of perception pleasing to the human soul.

I think you could say that essence is maybe the fusion between the higher centers, the substances of the subtle bodies, the working of the 3rd and 4th states of consciousness, and objective conscience. Perhaps the full development of essence would also bring about objective consciousness and the formation of a permanent I.

Hi Siddhartha,
I'll no doubt have a couple of questions for you as a result of your two thoughtful and strong posts on essence. Many thanks.

Also, a bit more grist for the mill which I forgot to post, on the same vast topic:

> Paraphrased from A.H.Almaas ‘Diamond Heart’ book IV, ‘Indestructible Innocence’.
>
> Issues and difficulties are not the only stepping stones towards reality. You need also your interest, your curiosity, your appreciation of, and love for, the truth. Your essential experience will help counteract your emotional identifications. However, such experience is not an end in itself. It is not something you get. It is a tool you use to help in seeing deeper truth. Essence is the direct expression of the fundamental truth; it is what is between appearance and fundamental reality. Essence crosses the boundary between the two truths, the two worlds.

The qualities of essence are the first words. The aspects are the first concepts; they are universal concepts, the archetypal states of being. They are more connected to fundamental reality than the world of appearance, but they are part of the world of appearance; Essence appears to us. Or, more accurately, experiences of Essence are glimpses of fundamental reality, viewed from the world of appearance.

The work on the personality and the realization of essential aspects is a method, whose purpose is to take us to the fundamental reality. The life of Essence becomes the beauty of that reality, as it appears in and through human beings. It is the fulfillment of the human life.

Hey Dean,

Want to say thanks for your valuable input re: essence. Will have time to sample your ideas this week and am looking forward to it. Since we can't tie up the site with our interests, feel free to contact me via email and later perhaps we can post further ideas for the group.

Hey Judy and Lawrick (aka "Rabid Chainsaw"), thanks for all the info on essence, it's very insightful and useful. I'd really enjoy talking about essence more at some point and time, it's always something I come back to in relation to myself and others. I'm going to check out A.H. Almaas, he sounds like he knows what he's talking about and I agree with his statements.

Peace be with you

Depends on how 'essence' is viewed here, IMO.
If germinal Essence with a capital E, then I cannot find likes and dislikes - it just is; and I don't know what it values or even if it does anything at all other than simply be.
But if essence with small e, which I'll call personal essence, then yes, it has likes and dislikes; and it values reality totality love etc, and sees things as they are.

Interesting that the way to our true nature and becoming a complete human being is sometimes called real-ization.

Best wishes,

Judy raises a thoughtful point here regarding a distinction between Essense and essence.

We must be careful how we use these words and use them in they way they were defined by G.

Here is what G says in ISOTM - "A small child has no personality as yet. He is what he really is. He is essence. His desires, tastes, likes, dislikes, express his being such as it is."
and - "A man's real I, his individuality, can grow only from his essence."

Essence as it is used in the Work does not refer to our "Essential" nature, so to speak; that is, it does not refer to our true spiritual or higher nature, our "Real I".

Essence would be somethinhg more like our natural 'character', and that can have defects, likes and dislikes. One could say that it is what we inherit in our DNA.

Essence is not 'roses, roses'. Likewise, personality is not all 'thorns, thorns'. We need a balance, a mid-course, between personality and essence; knowledge and being.

Real - I - zation?

Work results for:
Refrain from a favorite person. Interact with a disliked person.

So I had to convince myself that I was doing "it" for my future "I"...

my flesh wept and I wanted to run away and flee this person and situation, but forced myself to stare adversity in the face. If thoughts were visable, the air would be swarming in withheld negative emotions as hurtful digs spued forth

What was it that erked me about this individual? What am I seeing in them that is in me that needs to be recognized impartially, then released.

It was really hard to do because I was not indulging my usual tendencies to remark back and fuel the fire of negativity or get the last word. Ohhh what a waste of energy it is and how often I bask in its splendor. And ohh how grateful I am when I catch myself doing it or prevent such manifestations

Thank you for this exercise

The first time I read the week's exercise I chuckled: the immediacy of knowing the dislikes is so easy compared to having to think about choosing a favorite 'like.' That said, I purposed forced myself to try rhubarb this week. It's not as horrible as I remembered though I still wouldn't pay extra. Refraining from a favorite food wasn't nearly as difficult as eating rhubarb. I refrained from the pricey "good" drinks and stayed with the generic store brands, I attempted coffee but didn't drink much. I made it a couple days without classical and could listen to hiphop for about 10 minutes at a time. I constantly have to work with one dislike person and attempted to make the effort to stay in a quite pleasant facial expression, tone and pose around her. It didn't go as well as anyone would have wanted and I kept a little note of G's about what drives us to distraction in others is their mechanical, "no one's home" responses. The little refrains and interacts show how much Work we have, yet.

All these seeming little things add up. Somewhere else in the forum a poster spoke about doing the exercises above reading the books. This is so true. And we have the advantage of not listening to each grumble or excuse out of the parts they don't deem important enough, as in contact or residency groups.

I've been lucky in often watching children grow. It's amazing how the "line" between seems crossed when we blink. When in social work, there was one young girl in a made-for-TV real-life situation that went from being an innocent child quite likeable to being fully pulled into the negative poses of mind of her situation. Does essence have value? Both in the terms of value and values, I would answer yes. Watching some of the children get absorbed into their environments and which ones handled it or at least had something within to make it through at a later time, yes.

Hey all, quite a week,

This morning I awoke to several Endlesssearch site messages that poured like a feast from a cornucopia. After immersing myself in this delicious "soul food" for an hour, I switched off and went to my MSN mainpage for the "news".
Talk about complete impressions. Never before had I witnessed this clear, daily example of the difference between essence and personality. Like a light switching off when the MSN page came up with all the appeals to our vanity,self love, desires,.....the colorful merchandize, the gossip, the cult of celebrity, and the seduction of outer life, something in me witnessed the patent power we must struggle against. Try it for yourself next time you leave the site.

Yeah, I totally see what you mean Lawrick, its a sharp transition from the Endless Search site to the MSN site. It's like all the seven deadly sins are on one page, the impressions are very much in the way of vanity, self-love, and desires like you pointed out.

I sometimes wonder if feeling humility at not knowing the definitions of some of the words in the exercise is part of the exercise. I thought I was a "learned-being" of some formation, but I often wonder when I'm here. Icosohedron? Online dictionary says a 20-sided polyhedron. Oh... that helps! 😎

I'm looking forward to trying this tonight and this week. It might be a good segway for my recent inner questions about the meaning of "meditating on symbols." More on that later.

---

by Judy

Hi James,
If you 'Google' icosohedron, you'll get pictures and all!
I did this as visualization wasn't going too well when I didn't know quite what to visualize. 😜

I enjoyed your posts on the recent joyous wild ride on the thread of Excavations. Quite a little journey.
Kind regards,

Hi all,

> Each morning and evening, relax your three centers and visualize yourself as a magnetic point in the center of an icosahedron. Every triangle will represent an illusory conclusion drawn by your sense apparatus. Visualize your magnetic field penetrating the icosohedral veil of illusion and connecting with the reality beyond appearances.

This visualization meditation brought a degree of self-remembering several times, so I did some pondering to explore the connection.

Illusion was taken to refer to 'deceptive appearance'.
This connected with a phrase often found in other traditions; 'freedom from the senses', which is now understood to mean - not that I don't see or hear - but rather that I am 'not in bondage to' the senses alone. In other words, what the senses tell me is only a small part of reality, and it is a distorted perception, as if seen through an opaque filter of concepts. When a more complete reality is perceived, it changes what the senses tell me. Things are brighter clearer and more alive; some of the opacity is washed away by the self-awareness state.
What may be happening is that I was perceiving less through the discursive and discriminating concepts of mind, and more through the direct perception of awareness (still mental but different).

And the sense of 'self' was there in the centre of the icosahedron.
Thus the basic elements of self-remembering are there.

Then this clear-seeing seems to be strongly related to 'objectivity'.
What a vast topic. More and more exploring to be done.

by Recondita

It appeared to me, for what it is worth, that this magnetic centre is essentially 'good', and that I didn't have to worrry about that. Not sure why that is significant, but it felt so when doing the exercise.

Then, asking the questions prescribed I tried to relate them to the icosahedron and its centre: Is that a complete impression? (is it centred in the megnetic centre?); Is that a permanent conclusion? (is it resoloved in the magnetic centre?)

It seemed to me that my task was to try to live in, or from the centre, not from the triangles.

But then it seemed that in the triangles are represented also what we understand as 'good'. What is the place of 'good' as manifested in the visible world?

Only at the centre can sense be made of what in this manifest to the senses world we call 'good' and 'bad'.

And this is before I even considered the precise geometrical nature of the icosahedron as twenty sided solid.

Another thing that happened this week, which does not seem very related to the above, nor dramatic in any way, yet seemed somehow significant: Walking in the woods by the river and the fields I stopped and breathed (instead of forging ahead regardless) and noticed as I did so the trees' boughs crossing each other and supporting weight. I seemed to have sharper sensations. Was it in that moment of stopping, that this happened?

by James F

I first tried visualizing in my head a icosohedron with me sitting in the center of it, then i tried sensing/feeling me as a magnetic point in my actual physical living room (where I was sitting) and the icosohedron around me inside my room. I got stuck. Couldn't decide which to go with. My concentration/attention also wavered. Evidently, there is some resistance I need to work thru.

Before sleep, visualize in great detail a simple task to be performed the next day, say, cleaning a sink. Try to visualize it exactly as you will observe yourself doing it. Next day, perform the task and observe if your visualization corresponded to the reality of actually doing the task.

During the day, immediately before doing a simple task, such as opening a door, visualize yourself performing the task. When the task is completed, observe if you deviated from the visualization.

Perform the 10 bone exercise. Pay special attention to visualizing the illumination in each bone.

Choose one object from your immediate surroundings. Imagine all the events and processes that led to the existence of that object.

Imagine that you are a conscious being who has acquired their own "I". Live one day accordingly as you imagine that a conscious being might behave in every situation.

Hi,

I'm Cassandra and am new here. I'd like to start the work program for the coming week, but I don't know what the "10 bone excercise" is. I looked on earlier posts but didn't find an explanation.

Also, how should we incorporate the Work Guide for the month into the weekly practices?

Thanks a lot.

Cassandra

by Lawrick

Hey Cassandra,

The original Cassandra ran around screaming to be understood.. A computer might have solved many of her problems I think.

We've all asked about the exercises.
The 10 bone can be found by going to the Work Exercises section of the Endlesssearch Site, scroll to sensing exercises and you'll find it there.
Should you require other info, go to the Work Exercises or Work Philosophy tab, scroll down to Search and away you go.
You'll find years of material on site if you wish to explore.
If you can't find it, ask. It's actually pretty simple,

Welcome aboard,

After doing the visualizing exercise, I came to the realization that my visualizations don't correspond completely to reality, that I usually imagine myself doing things better than I do in real life. I never imagine myself being clumsy, or awkward but usually glorify myself while visualizing, and make myself out to do the tasks better in my imagination. I tried my best to visualize everything, movements, sense impressions, emotions, and thoughts, this was a bit difficult but gave me an impression in my mind of the task being performed.

The ten bone exercise was a good experience, visualizing the illumination of each bone gave a sensation that seemed to affect the emotions in a positive way. The exercise was a good way to train the attention and practice visualizing at the same time.

As for choosing an object from your surroundings and imagining the processes that led to its existence, I basically split this into the categories of being man-made, or natural. The man-made objects usually led me to think of how the material was extracted from nature and manufactured in a factory, and how people labored to create it. As for the natural objects like plants and animals, I imagined the process of evolution, simple proteins and amino acids being transformed to cellular material which would slowly form an organism of a complex structure. This exercise was a good way to put things into perspective, and made me think of how things came into being.

Like Siddhartha I found that when visualizing myself performing a simple task just before doing it, the real thing deviated from the visualization. Even for a simple task, I had quite a mistaken idea of what the physical actions would be. For example, when opening a door, my rear foot came completely off the ground while I was pushing it open with my front hand. This was completely unexpected - I had no idea it worked that way. My visualization was of standing flat-footed while opening the door. This pattern repeated for everything I observed.

In doing the 10-bone exercise, I found that I had some trouble visualizing the illumination in the bones. This was puzzling - I thought it would be easy. I finally realized that most of the exercises I'd done in the past have been oriented toward feeling rather than visualization. I Imagining that I'm a conscious being with a real "I": I kept putting this one off, often because I forgot about it until several hours into the day. When I did try, I felt really pretentious and wasn't sure how to act. I'll have to save this exercise for another week.

Thanks for the opportunity to try these exercises and post feedback.

Chuck

Paper and all events and processes leading to its existance.

A seed is planted, a tree grows, someone fells the tree, and loads it onto the truck to be taken to the factory for debarking, washing, refining, bleaching and cleaned for pulp prep to be flattened into paper (what a journey already) The paper then goes to be finished, cut, stacked, boxed, labeled, shipped and the list goes on and on.

If only paper could tell its story of the great sequence of events and the many hands that touched the process...

What an excellent exercise

Hi Cassandra, welcome.
Here is a link to the 10 bone exercise; it's about half way down...
http://www.endlesssearch.co.uk/exercises_sensing.htm
Also read The Basic Sensing Exercise, as it forms the basic method for all the various Sensing exercises that we use.

Please don't hesitate to ask about any other exercises that come up in the programs along the way.

The monthly program (which may last longer) sort of sets a general theme for ideas and exercises that we might want to explore in the following weeks. It can be consulted/remembered along side the weekly exercises.

As you will have seen by now, there are a lot of exercises offered each week. These are offered as suggestions for inner work. You may continue to use any of them that seem to resonate with you.

Hey all,
A full and interesting Work week for me.

I do not visualize well. This week I tried to see myself making coffee. Didn't get it right once. It is surprisingly complicated when one accounts for tensions, movements, and the physical manipulation of the objects. One day I forgot to open the fridge for cream. Another day, I didn't remember to use a pitcher for water and so on. One day I forgot I was standing.
I also noticed that I tend to visualize in black and white. Has anyone else noticed this in your experience? I recall my neice asking me one afternoon when we were watching an old black and white movie, she was about 5 years old, she asked, "Uncle, were you alive in the black and white days?" Apparently, yes. Still happens from time to time as for instance when I look at Chuck's site picture. Welcome aboard Chuck, welcome your input.

Recieved good mileage, kilometerage, from trying to stay conscious for a day. It seems I must be proactive and anticipate my particpation in events for the state to last. It's almost as if in trying to act consciously, one's attention is somewhat pre-divided as it were, and doesn't need to jump start the sensing-emotional centres every time. As soon as sensing disappears it's "adios" conscious state.

The "object" of my attention was a desk stapler. In this simple object we find extremely complicated design and engineering problems. The size of the staple, the bonding, the lever machinery. We find petroleum products, steels and alloys, fasteners, chemical compounds for the plastics, glue and plating. We find mining, drilling, raw and finished material manufacturing, marketing, distribution, and the engine of our economic systems all interwoven and interdependent. I wonder how few of us realize that a failure in any one of these processes would be catastrophic for our Material economy.

Well enough! Again I welcome those new ideas shared from new members and enthusiastically wish you keep the letters and cards coming in.

Be well,
Lawrick

In regards to the "imagine you are a conscious being" exercise this week, I see that Ian wrote a very helpful bit in another thread:

> We may not be able to immediately live 'as if' we are higher beings, but we can make a small start by focusing on various aspects or attributes such as trying to bear the unpleasant manifestations of others, or by trying to be compassionate, or by trying to rise above like and dislike of certain things, or by trying to enter a state of all brains balanced being perception, and so on.

I'll try again with this input in mind.

I stayed with the 'cleaning the sink' example for the visualization.
Results were less than satisfactory. So much so that after a couple of attempts I tried reversing the process. That is, I went and cleaned the bathroom sink consciously, and as simply as possible, and then visualized this process using recent working memory. Of course the results were much better when re-cleaning the sink.
So then I tried visualizing an everyday task which has previously been done consciously - taking out the garbage in this case. No surprise, the action followed the visualization pretty well.
So some verification here.

Sunday was a day of few outside events, so I chose that day to act "as if conscious." After some thought, I ended up following what Thich Nhat Hanh calls "a day of mindfulness" in his book "The Miracle of Mindfulness". To this I added 10 attempts at simple self-observation with a degree of self-remembering, and did the "I Am" exercise every hour. Following the breath and being aware of whether walking, sitting etc, were attempted for the whole day, but I fell out of awareness many times. This 'day of mindfulness' also includes two sightless-gaze sittings to which I added some three centered perception.

An interesting side-effect of this exercise was that there was some carryover into Monday and today, in that I am remembering to remember and observe, follow the breath and so on with very little effort. I'll begin this 'day of mindfulness' once a week again - or if not for the whole day, for several hours. I did it weekly for a couple of months a while ago, and noticed then that I was in a slightly more awake state for the rest of the week. Then of course I forgot to keep doing it, or was too lazy.

1. Guide your attention slowly in a circuit to each of the following joints: right shoulder, left hip, right hip, left shoulder. Breathe into each joint and sense it deeply, from within. Visualize/imagine the following teachings/ideals residing in each joint: Jesus suffering and sacrifice; Mohammed and service; Lao Tzu and balance; Buddha and non-desire. Attend to each joint long enough to fix the intent of your effort.

2. Sit quietly until the body is still and comfortable, the emotions open and receptive and the mind calm. Then allow the eyes to move from one object to the next within your sight. As soon as you notice a label popping up in your mind,("This is a --chair, lamp, papers, pen, carpet", etc.) shift your gaze to another object. Do not allow the eyes to rest too long on any object, merely notice the effects this has. Do things have a sense of Presence, for example? Alternate your breathing in through the abdomen (in breath) and out through the solar plexus (out-breath). Do this for 10 minutes then reverse (breath in through the solar plexus, out through the abdomen). What happens? Which centers get activated and how can you describe it?

3. Ponder the value and significance in your life of the Five Being-Obligolnian-Strivings. Breathe into each body part and sense it deeply as you Ponder each Striving.

First Striving: "To have in their ordinary being-existence everything satisfying and really necessary for their planetary body."

Sense right leg.
Second Striving: "To have a constant and unflagging instinctive need for self-perfection in the sense of being."

Sense left arm.
Third Striving: "The conscious striving to know ever more and more concerning the laws of World-creation and World-maintenance."

Sense right arm.
Fourth Striving: "The striving from the beginning of their existence to pay for their arising and their individuality as quickly possible, in order afterwards to be free to lighten as much as possible the Sorrow of our Common Father."

Sense spine and skull.
Fifth Striving: "The striving always to assist the most rapid perfecting of other beings, both those similar to oneself and those of other forms, up to the degree of the sacred 'Martfotai' that is up to the degree of self-individuality."

I've chosen this part of the suggested exercises for this week. It is new and exploring it so far is hinting at some interesting possibilities. This will also thus leave some time to spend on the July work, which I see has been extended to July/August

by Cassandra

I chose the first 2--guiding attention in body parts with visualizations of teachings and the breathing. I found the guided imagery stimulating, yet calming. It seemed to bring me more to center. I had a more difficult time incorporating features from the sages. Because I was brought up as a Christian, it was easiest for me to evoke Jesus' 'suffering and sacrifice,' but I knew this association would bring up sentimentality--feelings that I equate with pictures of long suffering Jesus. I didn't want to do this. As for the other teachers, I could relate much less to them. I felt like I'd have to fabricate even more, which I didn't want to do either. So I left the teachers out.

For the eye movement exercise, I found myself anticipating each new thing my eyes rested on. In other words, before I shifted my eyes to a new object, I had already named it. Sometimes this didn't happen, but mostly it did. So, I ask myself, am I able, to any extent, see something more clearly. I mean to really see a lamp, it's 'long body' and the vividness of that.

The breathing concentrations made me notice how much my mind wanders. I usually find breathing exercises boring, so I don't do them much because it feels so forced. I didn't notice any centers being activated for the most part, but in the first few days, I noticed the sexual center, perhaps, being stimulated. I've noted this before in some of my earlier meditation attempts 10 or so years ago.

For the 2nd exercise

> 2. Sit quietly until the body is still and comfortable, the emotions open and receptive and the mind calm. Then allow the eyes to move from one object to the > next within your sight. As soon as you notice a label popping up in your mind,("This is a --chair, lamp, papers, pen, carpet", etc.) shift your gaze to another object. Do not allow the eyes to rest too long on any object, merely notice the effects this has. Do things have a sense of Presence, for example?

In doing this exercise I felt the sensation of things detached from associations, when things become the things in themselves, and could appreciate things in a different way than usual. Objects lost their labels and uses and were sensory impressions rather than being intellectual impressions. I think things do have a sense of Presence, it seems that when self remembering this Presence becomes more alive than in the usual state.

Pondering the value and significance of the Five Being-Obligolnian-Strivings and breathing felt very good. Breathing into the various limbs seemed to stimulate circulation and pondering the Strivings added an emotional element which varied with each saying. Each striving gave a different impression and made me think and feel in a definite direction. It was hard to keep my concentration up at first, but with practice I soon was able to do it relatively smoothly.

Take care

I had trouble with this exercise. My mind seemed more eager than ever to label everything immediately. I can see the reason for the preparatory work (sit quietly...) This seems like a valuable exercise - I intend to keep trying it.

> Alternate your breathing in through the abdomen (in breath) and out through the solar plexus (out-breath). Do this for 10 minutes then reverse (breath in through the solar plexus, out through the abdomen). What happens? Which centers get activated and how can you describe it?

Concentration on abdominal breathing is quite familiar due to aikido practice. Did this exercise several times, but did not observe anything notable regarding activation of centers.

> 3. Ponder the value and significance in your life of the Five Being-Obligolnian-Strivings. Breathe into each body part and sense it deeply as you Ponder each Striving.

First of all, this exercise prompted me to do some research to learn more about Lao Tzu and Muhammed. I became much more familiar with the Five Being-Obligolnian-Strivings as well. Sensing the physical body and simultaneously placing thoughts or feelings there seems to be a component of many of the other exercises. I have some questions about this, but I'll ask over in the Discussion Forum, if that makes sense.

I concentrated on the shoulders and hips exercise this week. I too found the teachings difficult to incorporate, as I find that visualizing them is difficult without involving the thinking centre too much. So I tried to sense the presence of the teachers listed, without trying to focus explicitly on the teachings for now.

I noticed that following the sequence of the visualisation prescribed one describes a cross. And that the joints involved are fundamental to movement. As I am currently taking dancing classes I'm acutely aware of the importance of the movement of the shoulders relative to hips. Either parallel or in torsion. This exercise was something I could take here and to walking, where I noticed things never before noticed about the relative movement of limbs in what is automatic. Surely this is part of the purpose of the exercise, to gain a greater awareness of what is mechanical?

In the breathing exercise I noticed that there was a very pronounced sensation in the throat region when breathing out through the abdomen.

> Alternate your breathing in through the abdomen (in breath) and out through the solar plexus (out-breath). Do this for 10 minutes then reverse (breath in through the solar plexus, out through the abdomen). What happens? Which centers get activated and how can you describe it?

I noticed the emotional center and the sexual center being activated. For the first part, breathing in through the abdomen, I would have to agree with Cassandra and say the sexual center became active while the emotional center was passive. After alternating it was the opposite, the emotional center was active while the sexual center was passive and dormant. It almost felt like two different notes were being sounded, energy was felt in the sacral plexus which would correspond to sexual center, and a different sensation of energy was felt in the solar plexus which would correspond to the emotional center. I thought of the fact that both centers are supposed to work with hydrogen 12 ideally, this seemed to make sense why the two centers seemed almost to be linked in some way or another, and why one became active while the other was passive. Overall this exercise gave me new insights and observations that affirmed certain things in connection with these two centers.

That is OK. It is quite acceptable to make such alterations in the exercises to suit our personal particularities.

That sounds like an interesting question to persue. An aim is a question.

The 'watching the breathing' type exercises are not intended to be forced.
They should be very relaxed. They are simply being aware and attentive to what is occuring naturally as we breathe.
The 'breath in through the solar plexus, out through the abdomen' is somewhat more forced or contrived, but really only involves a shift of sensory attention from the nose/mouth/throat/chest to the solar plexus and abdomen.

If you feel any discomfort or apprehension about any of the exercises - don't do them. And don't be afraid to mention it or question any of the exercises here.

For the first part, breathing in through the abdomen, I would have to agree with Cassandra and say the sexual center became active while the emotional center was passive. After alternating it was the opposite, the emotional center was active while the sexual center was passive and dormant. It almost felt like two different notes were being sounded, energy was felt in the sacral plexus which would correspond to sexual center, and a different sensation of energy was felt in the solar plexus which would correspond to the emotional center. I thought of the fact that both centers are supposed to work with hydrogen 12 ideally, this seemed to make sense why the two centers seemed almost to be linked in some way or another, and why one became active while the other was passive. Overall this exercise gave me new insights and observations that affirmed certain things in connection with these two centers.

Many experiences like this will come up as we Work on ourselves. It is important to remember to observe and take note of these things. It is also important not to jump to hasty conclusions. Our understanding of these experiences will change over time with more experience.
In general, we may be becoming aware of parts of our body that we don't normally attend to, and this may initially be intriguing or disturbing to us.

That is a good approach.

As I am currently taking dancing classes I'm acutely aware of the importance of the movement of the shoulders relative to hips. Either parallel or in torsion. This exercise was something I could take here and to walking, where I noticed things never before noticed about the relative movement of limbs in what is automatic. Surely this is part of the purpose of the exercise, to gain a greater awareness of what is mechanical?

Yes, it describes a cross. Why might that be important?

Does it make anydifference if you simply let the diaphram relax naturally for the out breath?

> Sensing the physical body and simultaneously placing thoughts or feelings there seems to be a component of many of the other exercises. I have some questions about this, but I'll ask over in the Discussion Forum, if that makes sense.

Yes, that makes sense.
And yes, it is a component of many exercises.
In Life is Real, G gives a 3 finger exercise -
"First, all one's attention must be divided approximately into three equal parts; each of these parts must be concentrated on one of the three fingers of the right or the left hand, for instance the forefinger, the third and the fourth, constating in one finger—the result proceeding in it of the organic process called "sensing," in another—the result of the process called "feeling," and with the third—making any rhythmical movement and at the same time automatically conducting with the flowing of mental association a sequential or varied manner of counting."

One might say that this is a formula or pattern that is used in many variations in many exercises. In BT, G talks about a state of consciousness called all-brains-balanced-being-perception. All these exercises are simply various means to accomplish this. There are many variations and levels of complexity since different people respond to different 'flavors'.

1. Focus your attention for 5 minutes on each of the following joints: right shoulder, left hip, right hip, left shoulder. Breathe normally and direct each breath into the joint and sense it deeply, from within. With each joint, Ponder the meaning and application for you of the following teachings: suffering and sacrifice; service; balance; non-desire.

2. During the week, accept everything that happens as lawful and intentionally endure it all with an inner smile and full body sensing.

3. Take a piece of paper and a pen. As you write, sense the pen in your hand. Make a list of names or attributes that best describe each of your many I's, traits, personalities, ego characteristics.

For the work program for this weeks exercise,

> 1. Focus your attention for 5 minutes on each of the following joints: right shoulder, left hip, right hip, left shoulder. Breathe normally and direct each breath into the joint and sense it deeply, from within. With each joint, Ponder the meaning and application for you of the following teachings: suffering and sacrifice; service; balance; non-desire.

the main thing I noticed was that this is a variation to some degree of last weeks exercise, this time since I applied the meaning of these teachings to myself, a different group of impressions were aroused, and I could understand them differently. Last week when I sensed the joints while breathing and visualizing the different saints, it brought forth impressions that were previously perceived and became fixed in the formatory apparatus. Actually whenever I think of these teachings a group of impressions arise, like the yin-yang of taoism, or the devotion of Christianity, or different emotions that correspond with the imagery and aspects of these teachings. When I applied this exercise to myself I thought of my own experiences more, and how these related to me and my work. This was a good way to put this into perspective. Sensing the joints was a bit difficult, but I was able to sense them with effort and became fairly good at it after doing it for 5 minutes.

Farewell my fellow Fourth way friends

by Judy

I added the first part to the morning 'sittings', plus once when standing in a queue at the supermarket. Before beginning, I refreshed on the anatomy of the shoulder and hip joints in order to visualize. This added feelings of awe - how wonderfully we are made.
The breathing into parts of the body while sensing them seems to have a relaxing effect which lets me see passing emotional states which would otherwise be missed totally. During the pondering I was reminded of my parents and their suffering and sacrifice and service. This evoked some genuine sadness that I hadn't spent more time with them before they passed on. Then gratitude welled up.

As to accepting everything as lawful, well, the big situations seem to be handled reasonably rationally, but several little incidents during the week were reacted to with irritation and I had a momentary surge of violent thought towards a large bully cat who is terrorizing my little cat at the moment. I settled for a "shoo" instead of acting on wanting to kick him, and keep Ellie inside at night for the time being, which led to her jumping through an insect screen - more irritation. Really I have to smile! Now when I see the big bully, I say to myself "Essence of cat" and am content that he and his owners are leaving at the end of the month.
I also attempted putting myself in the other person's place twice in 'unpleasant manifestations' situations, and looked at my own.

As I rarely write much in longhand, I sense my hands while typing at the computer, and made a list of ten negative I's noticed over the week. Obviously irritated and violent were amongst them.
That's about it for today.
Cheers,

by Chuck

Although a week or two's practice at an exercise does not constitute mastery - or even correctness - the joint-sensing exercise seemed like an old friend, since we did a similar one the week before. My half-hour bus ride to/from work proved to be a good time for it. Great idea by Judy to look up the anatomy of the joints. I found that touching the crest of the hipbone the first time helped get my attention localized, then I could mentally work inwardly to the joint from there.

My written list of I's, traits and characteristics grew during the week, but I see it as a long-term task. Still, good to get started. Like Judy, I mostly type rather that write nowadays, but did do the list longhand. In fact, my writing has gotten so sloppy (always trying to go too fast) that it made a good exercise to write slowly and deliberately. My list has a lot of traits, and not many I's. I wonder if it's because traits may be easier to document, since one can think back and discover these from the past, whereas I's need more observation of the moment? Anyway, doing this exercise heightened my self-observation this week.

Chuck

by Dean

The second exercise was very comforting in situations when I was identified, and was a great way to give justice to things that I usually take as an injustice. Accepting things as lawful seems to definitely give me some piece of mind in situations when I am under the spell of illusions, and the inner smile was the frosting on the cake that made my habitual suffering turn to sweet delight.

For the third exercise I split this into two categories, first negative manifestations ,and secondly positive manifestations  .For the negative ones I connected this primarily with what I feel is my chief feature and type, and what I's revolve around this center of weakness within me. This was almost hard to do, it was difficult to admit certain things to myself even though I knew they were true, it was like it was taboo, or that I was afraid of exposing my self to my proud ego that would have liked to duck out of the responsibility. For the positive characteristics of my personality, I wrote these things down fairly easily, but found it difficult because I realized that I wasn't always one in the same person. My I's fluctuated too much to say that I was always like that, although generally I knew I leaned in that direction, so therefore I wrote a list down that I felt was a reflection of my positive half.

Judy, it's interesting what you said

> Now when I see the big bully, I say to myself "Essence of cat"

I've often thought about essence in relation to animals, it seems they do have a sort of essence, that one is aggression, one is lazy, or one is timid etc. They obviously don't have a possibility of developing an Essence with a capital E, or we would all be in a lot of trouble, but it's funny how heredity can affect things with such a wide ranging spectrum. I guess "every animal works according to its constitution" although this isn't necessarily what G meant with this statement, but could maybe have another meaning. Essence is such a simple yet elusive topic, it requires me to constantly reinforce the principle behind it so as to make it visible in life.

Until next time...

> Great idea by Judy to look up the anatomy of the joints.

This is a good task, looking up and studying our skeletal structure, since it is the frame that supports our body. It is helpful when relaxing and Sensing the body, to know the underlying form of what we are working with. The 12 joint and 10 bone exercise also require some knowledge of our frame, since those exercises ask us to Sense and visualize our bones and joints.

Another aspect of familiarity with our skeleton relates to an interesting idea regarding the locus of our essence and /or the 'womb' of the soul, the inner being embryo that we nuture and feed through our Work efforts. It has been suggested that the marrow of the bones could be involved. Many ancient burial practices sought to preserve the bones. The marrow is the source of our immune system, the primary biological system for maintaining the self/other relationship.

So a study of bones and bone marrow might be an interesting research project for group members to look into.

I listed "i's", traits, personalities, characteristics together as I see them as similar words/ways of trying to describe the same thing -- sub-programs or aspects or facets of the icosahedron of our total being that we identify with 'in the moment'.

Daily Pondering: What is my Work aim?

Morning exercise: Sit quietly in meditation. Relax the three centers. Watch the breath. Use a sightless gaze and soundless sound to receive impressions without identifying, labeling or judging them. Ponder: Have I made progress towards realizing my aim?

Daily exercise: Every time you experience a situation which caused you to react with suffering, ask yourself: What can this situation teach me about achieving my aim?

Evening recapitulation: What did I do today to further my progress towards (defining) my aim?

Hi everyone,

> Morning exercise: Sit quietly in meditation. Relax the three centers. Watch the breath. Use a sightless gaze and soundless sound to receive impressions without identifying, labeling or judging them. Ponder: Have I made progress towards realizing my aim?

After pondering one aspect of work aim in the first part of this week's exercise (that of progressing toward balance/harmony of personality as it is, by three-centred action), I realized that progress is slow. This motivated me to make more efforts towards taking the balanced state from the morning meditation into daily life.
Thus I've been trying to maintain the balance for as long as I can directly following the meditation. This has turned into immediately afterwards walking around the house for 5 minutes or so, and having what I call "a conscious pick-up" - just organising the morning's house chores really, and then staying mindful for another period of time.

James, your post on creating exercises has been on my mind. It's been sitting like an elephant in the kitchen and I haven't replied as haven't contributed many exercises to Ian myself. 🤔
Just briefly commenting here though;
Try looking at eg; the stopping before going through a door from the inside perspective rather than from outside. I see all centers involved, in that in the moment of 'stop' I intend (intellectual) and wish (emotional) to do the exercise. I in fact add sensing of the legs to this exercise, as the moving centre seems to look after itself pretty much with something this simple, to bring the body fully into it. And there are many triads there too. Sometimes not so easy to see - eg; the wish to work is affirming, resistance the personality may (or may not) put up is the denying, and the exercise itself will bring in the reconciling force of the Work itself, to lead to a resultant state. I do see where you are coming from though, and maybe the Jewish practice of putting the container above the door-frame in which are the words "The Lord is one" is to evoke emotions of reverence to further balance the exercise. Just a thought.

I don't know if that helps or not.

What I find is that more and more often I am creating little exercises which apply to my everyday situations. This results quite naturally from doing the weekly exercises given here, and sharing on them. Your post is a good reminder that perhaps there are some I could forward to Ian for consideration, even though the ones we are given are more interesting. In other words, I find some little exercise that works, and may be different somehow or another, and then try to put this into words after I've experienced it - working backwards rather than attempting to create from the intellect, though with a little experience that could no doubt be done too.

Best wishes,

On pondering the first question about aim, I came to the conclusion that I had several aims, some short term and some long term. It's something I've pondered before and read about, so my main aim is the same as what is spoken of in ISOTM, becoming master of oneself. This seems like the best, most universal aim that would encompass all things within ones possibilities.

As far as short term aims, these are basically things that I'm studying, or else just various exercises that I aim to practice and achieve. I usually have daily aims that I formulate for myself and try to fulfill, and these lately have had a lot to do with my chief feature. One long term aim I do wish to achieve on some level or other is to be able to influence people on a fairly large scale. This is an aim for later though, and I'm not to the point where I could even know where to begin.

For the morning exercise,

> Sit quietly in meditation. Relax the three centers. Watch the breath. Use a sightless gaze and soundless sound to receive impressions without identifying, labeling or judging them. Ponder: Have I made progress towards realizing my aim?

I came to the conclusion that I've realized my aim but don't always make the efforts that are within my abilities. The relaxing of the centers and sightless gaze etc., put me in a good, clear state for pondering, and was a great way to disconnect from mechanical modes of impression absorption.

The daily exercise was good food for thought, how my sufferings could be used to teach me about achieving my aim. This could be like an alarm clock that awakens me to the necessity of transforming my suffering into something useful. This was something that changed my usual reactions a bit, and made me more open to accepting suffering in life, as well as putting the work as more of a priority in order to push myself towards my aim.

The evening recapitulation reinforced my aim, and also made me criticize some of my actions during the day when I strayed from my aim. Overall I felt I usually did make at least some progress towards defining my aim, but I also had the feeling that perhaps I should make super efforts in order to advance more quickly and smoothly, and should be more organized with my efforts.

Sit quietly in meditation. Relax the three centers. Watch the breath. Use a sightless gaze and soundless sound to receive impressions without identifying, labeling or judging them. Ponder: Have I made progress towards realizing my aim?

As for making progress: I'm a bit leery of keeping track of things like this. I become focused on an end rather than paying attention to the present. Still, a consideration of my efforts at the end of the day is okay, I'm sure. Often in the past week, I've felt I was nowhere near realizing my aim. My aim is non-identification with emotions, good or bad. But I've found myself in anxiety quite lot. However, I'm trying not to run from it, to be in it to see what it may teach me. This may be a 'progression' towards my goal.

On another note: In doing the filling sensing exercise, I've noticed more 'presence' in my morning sessions. Used to I would sit cross legged on the floor but usually experienced some amount of discomfort. Sitting in a chair with feet on the floor helps to ground me, perhaps and take tension out of my body. In this position, there is the compulsion to say "yes" and a drawing upwards and to the right.

I wonder if anyone else had had a similar experience.

Thank you.

As various sayings go:
- It's the journey and not the destination.
- It's the question and not the answer.

> My aim is non-identification with emotions, good or bad. But I've found myself in anxiety quite lot. However, I'm trying not to run from it, to be in it to see what it may teach me. This may be a 'progression' towards my goal.

Striving for the neutral point, the mid-course, yet without running away from or supressing our emotions. We need to go through our emotions, rather than around them. Sometimes it helps to intentionally 'go into' our anxiety, etc, experience it deeply, observe it, plumb its depths, see through it. Maybe even transmute that energy into something higher?

by Chuck

This was a good exercise in helping to refine my aims. I have a daily sheet where I give myself "points" for various Work-related tasks, such as reading, clearing thoughts, end-of-day review, being present at breakfast/lunch/dinner, etc. There is also a larger task for the week, which is now the EndlessSearch weekly work suggestions.

But my longer-term goals were unclear. This prompted some reading of Gurdjieff and Ouspensky. Although one's aim undergoes a continual process of refinement, I have taken the task recommended by Ouspensky in The Fourth Way:

> "I have spoken about the question of aim because I advise you to think about it, to > revise what you have already thought about aim and think how you would define your aim now, after a study of these ideas. I would say that what a man can get, what can be promised him on condition that he works, is that after some time of work he will see himself. Other things that he may get, such as consciousness, unity, connection with higher centres, all come after this-- and we do not know in what order they come. But we must remember one thing; until we get this-- until we see ourselves--we cannot get anything else. Until we begin to work with this aim in view we cannot say that we have begun to work. So, after some time we must be able to formulate our immediate aim as being able to see oneself. Not even to know oneself (this comes later), but to see oneself. Man is afraid to see himself. But he can decide to take courage and see what he is."

So, my aim has become to see myself. One thing I've learned at my job about aims is that you have to know the conditions under which you can say "this goal is accomplished." Otherwise, how do you know when you're done? For an ongoing goal of this sort, that's pretty hard, but I've come to a conclusion. Since one reason for the aim to see oneself is that it creates friction between what we are and what we could be, that has become my measure of progress. If I have sufficient fire for the cauldron, then there is progress toward the aim.

Regards,
Chuck

by Cassandra

"So, my aim has become to see myself."

Chuck, this is the struggle for me, to give up the fantasies and lean into what is there, as suggested by Ian.

Anxiety arises for me when circumstances don't line up with the scenario I imagine. Instead of observing this discordance or friction, I try to make the friction go away by not looking at my features. Bottom line is I'm afraid that there's nothing really 'inside' that's better than what I can imagine.

Thanks a lot.

Cassandra

---

by Harry

You are looking for the friction. The friction is the energy you can use to change.

One of the things is to give up that imagination. Later a different kind of imagination comes to play.

I know it's a Beatles song, but "Let It Be". Or you'll be in a Rolling Stones Song "Let it Bleed".

The exercise of Aim prompted me to look up some notes I made twenty years ago about it, and it basically hasn't changed since then. What I am more affected by, though, is that, although subconsciously the direction has been the same - and realising from this that it must be very important to some fundamental part of my being - the absolute necessity of it is constantly forgotten by my everyday self.
Thanks, Ian, for the reminder, and once again (and again, and again...) I have set off in search of the aims of my Aim.

Work Program week beginning 20 August 2007

by Ian

Begin the day with a balanced relaxing of the physical, emotional and intellectual centers. Notice any sensations, feelings or thoughts that may disturb the relaxation and ponder what attachments may lie behind them.

During the morning, observe the intellectual center. What thoughts are you attached to? What opinions are you attached to? What ideas, things or people do your thoughts revolve around? Sense the head and face. Maintain a relaxed emotional center.

During the afternoon, observe the physical center. What sensations are you attached to? What things are you physically attracted to? Sense the arms and legs. Maintain a relaxed emotional center.

During the evening, observe the emotional center. What emotional states are you attached to? What things or people are you emotionally attached to? Sense the solar plexus and chest. Return to a relaxed emotional center.

In the evening, after entering a state of all-brains-balanced-being-perception, Ponder - "How are my attachments related to my self-importance?"

by Dean

This weeks exercises gave me quite a bit of insight into some of my attachments and weaknesses in general. I noticed in the morning when balancing the centers that a lot of resistance came from my intellectual center, but there was also some coming from the other centers as well.

Observing the intellectual center I noticed that a lot of my thoughts were about people. I often found myself reliving past conversations, or else a lot of the time I noticed I fantasized about having conversations with people about the work. I don't talk about the work with many people, but found that I imagined myself talking about it in a sophisticated way to elevate my own pride or inner significance.

During the second exercise I observed that I was often craving food, and also had a tendency towards listening to music. I also did some yoga exercises and martial arts and sensed the arms and legs while doing these things. I liked the sensation of movement and also the stretching of the muscles, which usually feels pretty good to me. Keeping a relaxed emotional center seemed to keep me more focused, and I was able to observe myself more acutely because of it.

For the emotional center I felt that I was attached to the feelings of happiness and positive feelings in general. I was always attached to emotional states that were easier, states that didn't cause me discomfort or pain. Watching the emotional center was sort of like watching a magnetic being attracted to one thing, then another. I was constantly being pulled to various attachments that were often combined with the intellectual and physical centers. I was reminded of a quote from the Yoga Sutras of Patanjali

> Attachment is that magnetic pattern which clusters in pleasure and pulls one towards such experience

Keeping the emotional center relaxed and somewhat neutral helped me overcome inertia a bit and brought me into a state of awareness again.

I thought my attachments were related to my self-importance in the sense that I emotionally felt that I should always feel good, that physically I should eat even when it's wasn't necessary, and intellectually felt that I liked to imagine myself being smart and being considered by others. I came to the conclusion that these things were unrealistic and that I really didn't deserve these things, and overall I felt this weeks exercise helped me break new ground in observing myself.

by Chuck

One interesting facet of this week's exercises was observing the 3 centers one at a time at different times of the day. This helped me quite a bit with observation and categorization. Rather than observing an impression and thinking, "which center is this," I was able to concentrate on those from a given center and ignore the rest. Since I often have trouble with the categorization, this helped quite a bit.

As usual, the emotional center was the most difficult to observe and not get "carried away," but taking the next step and considering emotional attachments did help preserve the thread of observation. The evening was a good time to observe emotions, as I'm at home and it's a more emotional place. Like Siddhartha, I felt that this week's exercise helped break some new ground.

Regards,
Chuck

---

by Judy

I am continuing this exercise into the current week as it has shown me quite well just how little I really 'see' myself clearly.
In particular;

> During the evening, observe the emotional center. What emotional states are you attached to? What things or people are you emotionally attached to? Sense the solar plexus and chest. Return to a relaxed emotional center.

The exercise went as expected except for this part, in which I had difficulty in working out what particular feeling was there a fair bit of the time. I began to focus on this centre throughout the day, and saw that I often called feelings "confusion" or "indecision" vaguely, when that wasn't accurate at all. Thus there was limited ability to go deeply into them, though the transformation seemed to work well enough at the time. In other words, I was treating the symptoms, but not able to trace causes such as ways of thinking or particular beliefs or conditioning which may be contributing. For example, is my self-importance connected with the belief that life should mostly go smoothly for me? Yes. Does this inappropriate belief lead to negativity? Yes. So I must alter that wrong belief if I don't want to continue using band-aids indefinitely.

Anyway, I looked through a few texts concerning transformation of emotions. One that confirmed what I had found out and expressed the process simply was Thich Nhat Hanh's "Peace is Every Step" in a section called Transformation of Feelings. I'll post this as a forum thread soon, in case anyone else is interested in the Buddhist psychology of this aspect of the Work. It is very similar, though terminology is different, and I add the Holy Affirming Prayer plus remembering the coatings needed for the inner entity to the process.
Best wishes,

---

by Judy

Just an addition to my post above.

I noticed that in the psychological process of inquiry which began as I tried to go more deeply into various feelings, the intellectual centre wanted to interrupt quickly with its 'solution'. It would not only name the feeling, but had a ready answer as to why it had happened, even if it was something as cliche as "yes, of course you have fear in this situation - that's just you - you've always felt that." Which of course is not only probably wrong, but also effectively shuts down the whole inquiry process. So to keep the questioning going, I have to take a position of not-knowing, or no position. This is changing from being uncomfortable to giving some sense of openness and space in which the exploration can keep going.

The exercise has opened up a couple of Pandora's boxes, one of which of course is - how best to begin to really change a long-held belief pattern and not just affirm the change intellectually? I'd like to open this one to the group, as true metanoia is rarely quick and easy, and we all seek it - yes?

Cheers,

---

by JohnS

I, too, have continued this exercise into this week, for similar reasons to you, Judy. There is something fundamental in this which I haven't quite been able to grasp, again for much the same reasons - the avoidance and justification mechanisms are so entrenched, they either colour a decision, or, more likely, completely reverse it at a later stage when I'm not looking. I have noticed this morning at the beginning of the work day that I have already not only planned what I will be working at today (from the list of work to be done), but I have ALREADY decided what mental reaction I will have to each job: if one turns out to be more difficult than planned, I have a justification in place for that, all nice and ready. And so it goes on. It will affect the operation of all centres, and will leave me at the end of the day with a feeling that life is not fair enough to me, as my talent would have allowed me to get everything done perfectly, if these impediments had not foolishly arisen.
I can see the end of today quite clearly. It will be interesting to see if I can keep that constantly in mind, and see what's ruling what.
Shall report back from the Centre.

---

by Judy

So I've been considering how to change entrenched belief patterns for a couple of days.

It seems connected to patience, vigilance, constant and consistent effort in the struggle with the old thinking. Mindfulness will play a central role in that I have to notice these old attitudes as soon as possible and correct them consciously. What I'm doing is building new neuronal pathways. They won't be used without conscious effort until this new path is well-worn. So "change of mind", what Nicoll calls metanoia, is quite literal. Perhaps it is valid to broaden the meaning of the word "suffering" to include this constant struggle with personality's old ways of thinking. This also adds motivation for this large endeavour.

There is a lot of recent work being done regarding the use of creative visualisation in speeding up new learning. The "as if" neural pathways speed up the formation of new learning by strengthening the newly made pathway. That also is worth a try IMO - even if used in hindsight for a while.

Morning exercise: Full Body Sensing - Take a comfortable position and from your head down to your feet. Imagine that you are being filled with a warm, thick, honey like liquid and that it is slowly filling your body, starting from the feet and moving up through your legs, the pelvis, the torso, down into the arms and hands, then into the head. Strive to maintain a complete awareness of Sensationing in your whole body.

Daytime exercise: "When walking, the practitioner is aware, 'I am walking'; when standing, is aware, 'I am standing'; when sitting, is aware, 'I am sitting'; when lying down, is aware, 'I am lying down.' In whatever position one's body happens to be, one is aware of the position of the body. When one is going forward or backward, one applies one's full awareness to one's going forward or backward. When one looks in front or looks behind, bends down or stands up, one also applies full awareness to what one is doing. One applies full awareness to wearing the robe or carrying the alms bowl. When one eats or drinks, chews or savors the food, one applies full awareness to all this. When passing excrement or urinating, one applies full awareness to this. When one walks, stands, lies down, sleeps or wakes up, speaks or is silent, one shines his awareness on all this."
- So said the Buddha.

Evening exercise: While deeply sensing your body, Ponder, without expecting an answer, "Can I exist without Sensation?"

by Cassandra

The awareness exercises made me realize how little control I have over external events. And I think that's one of the reasons why I've avoided attempts to be present to 'what is.' It means I don't get to try and change things to suit my comfort level.

But I realize also that simple awareness can show the way to a liberation from desires and fears. These are instrumental in my life, trying to avoid one and striving towards the other.

Thanks very much for all your posts.

The morning exercise of full body sensing sent a tingling, stimulating sensation throughout my body, and a creeping sensation of my body filling with a honey like liquid. It seemed to have an affinity with the blood and my circulation and while I was scanning my body with my attention I could feel my nerves being activated in a pleasant way. It was difficult to maintain a complete awareness of my body, and found I lost my attention after a couple of minutes, although I did successfully do it in short spurts that lifted my spirit to a nice level of physical awareness.

During the daytime exercise of being aware of all movements, I mainly noticed how my postures and movements were controlled by my emotional state. They always seemed to correspond with my emotional state and were a reflection of how I was feeling, when I was relaxed emotionally my muscles were relaxed and my movements were loose, and when I was nervous or tense emotionally my muscles were tight and contracted and my movements were rigid. I was able to keep my attention on my movements fairly well, and was able to observe myself more keenly when I did so.

As for the pondering exercise,

> "Can I exist without Sensation?"

without expecting an answer I noticed only the physical feeling in my body from this thought, I almost felt like laughing and felt an unorthodox sort of feeling from it that I can't put into words. Obviously I can't live without sensation, but not expecting an answer from my intellect created a strange impression different than what I am used to.

I have to admit that I have been most negligent in doing the exercises, but recognize how very important they are. When I do an exercise there is always a blissful result. Sometimes very small, sometimes large, sometimes the results arrive days/months later. But what a powerful force that keeps me from making an effort lately.

Any suggestions? Is there a better time or day or any tips/tricks to doing the exercises?

My experience was quite different. Interesting.
The sensation I experienced with this execise was a filling and cleaning of my body, a sensationlessness when full. A sense of just being here, existing full of that substance I drew into my body. My feelings became surprisingly neutral, my mind aware but calm.

Another qualility of this awareness had to do with the length of time I took to fill the "vessel". The longer my effort, the longer the state of awareness remained.
So there I sat full, not moving, just being, yet my presence felt significant, valid, rich.

I have no particular experiences to report from this week's exercises. These two exercises are favorites, they are solid as bedrock and profound.

Karen mentioned:

> But what a powerful force that keeps me from making an effort lately.
> Any suggestions? Is there a better time or day or any tips/tricks to doing the exercises?

Doing exercises at the same time each day is recommended. Yes, it IS hard to 'bootstrap' yourself (selves) into action, find motivation. The "I's" in control don't want to work, they don't value it. To get into Work I's, one could read a passage from a book, listen to certain music, or be aware of one's pending death. A phrase that's emotional for me is "to thine own self be true." For some reason, that really gets me cranked up.

Thank you Chuck and Fred for commenting. A quantum leap for me this week indeed, truly living in the attitude of gratitude!

The customer from my dream demanding my attention finally got some much needed care which I would like to share with the group.

I began my morning (6sep07) with the weekly work program and immediately felt liberated. So to keep the momentum, wrote down the daily ponder and patiently waited for a response while sensing the body and observing the emotions. "the mind does not hold the answer" is written on the page and I continue to write what is coming from that special place. A few hours later more info comes in and another question comes:

"When you are gone, what do you want to take with you, and what do you want to leave behind?"

While coffeeing with a friend we practice the "I AM" exercise and I immediately feel the body decompress and relax (shoulders release and each vertebrae collapses). While looking at the people in the room with an inner smile the message "only love lives here" floods my being. No past, no future just the now. I was present and nothing else mattered other than that very moment.

We take a break and move into Meditation #39 and the most beautifully foreign thing occurs. When arms are crossed "I" look down and removed from my self, its as though I'm outside of myself silently watching my body. "Just watch and embrace" an inner voice says, don't try and analyze.

Hours later while showering it happens again. I am watching myself shave as each water drop hits my legs and its as though the observer is what is real and what I'm looking down on is nothingness. And as I write this in all of its vulnerability, tears well up in my eyes, tears of joy, tears of a death and of a new beginning.

The exercises of sensing and mindfulness are two favourite foundation practices for me also - I agree with your comments on that Chuck. Thank you for sharing "To thine own self be true." I've adopted that as it is clearer and more accurate than my usual little affirmation of "Thy Will not mine be done", although that works too.

Karen, your insight of -

> But what a powerful force that keeps me from making an effort lately.

well and truly set me pondering, and where I'm currently at is;
This powerful force is personality/superego, and not even 'useful personality' but false personality.
I have many different reactions from it when I go to begin the exercises. The most common would be that I'd prefer to do them later. Procrastination is one of my machine's frequent indulgences.
Of course personality fights doing them! It is more interested in staying the boss, being entertained and keeping me unconscious.
Anyway, what I've realised is that 'preferring to do them later' actally means that I am betraying my true self, my essence, and that in fact nothing will transform solidly, because I'll always be late for myself, so to speak, and every time I give in to one of these dubious reactions, I am strengthening personality and will continue to mostly live in 'unconsciousness'.
More attempts to understand how best to deal with this followed through to the dawning knowledge that if I simply concentrate on understanding and seeing what is actually happening - that is, recognising each time that this powerful force is indeed coming from personality - rather than doing what I used to do, which involved working on the particular reaction, then I have a much better chance of success.
I also need to remind myself that it doesn't matter whether I fully understand what I'm being told to do. After all, "what" doesn't understand? This leads me to seeing that it also doesn't matter at all if I don't seem to have any 'results'. From the three-centred pondering state it would seem that the giving is also the receiving is also the transformation. I don't know how to word this very well, but it is clear that my old idea of "giving my energies/time/resources to the Work and receiving growth etc" is actually not quite how it is. There's nothing I can 'give' the Work really. It would be pompous to think that way. Can the plant that is rained on give anything to the rain? The plant simply has to be its receptive self and the growth happens. I'm giving/receiving/transforming personality towards becoming more essential by surrendering and having reverence for the Work - yes? Essence is finer energies, which connects with the transformation of foods part of the teaching.
So the Work gives and transforms all the time if my relationship to it is correct.
Which touches on another whole huge topic of course.

Back to your question Karen; I second Chuck's ideas about reading Work ideas etc. I've also found it a help to not think about doing the exercises too much - just making sure I make a start as that is the hardest part. Once begun, something deeper is very pleased and to continue is well possible.

And Dean, Cassandra, John, Fred, thanks for your replies and insights also.
I've given myself a rap on the knuckles for being so late with this post; no excuses. And Karen, sounds like you and your friend are achieving something valuable - good for you. Thanks also to everyone for the most interesting posts which I've been motivated by. What benefits one benefits us all.

One added thought;
This 'powerful force' is an important part of the work itself, in that it provides the strong denying force/friction which Harry reminds us of - thanks Harry. Without it, where would the transformative triad be?
Regards,

Judy;
Much thanks for the reminder that receptivity is the key to it all. I have to keep reminding myself that receptivity contains so much action (the Right Action) through its nature of connecting with what is really essential. I have been so 'busy' over the past fortnight, its time now to look at the results of those weeks: good on paper, but nothing changed with regards to receptivity, and hence no exercises done. Shame.

Judy writes,

> The plant simply has to be its receptive self and the growth happens. I'm giving/receiving/transforming personality towards becoming more essential by surrendering and having reverence for the Work

How simple yet profound Judy!

Your post sparked the following insight. When looking closer at the workings of nature, I'm in a state of awe. It appears as if everything occurs so effortlessly, so gracefully (flowers budding/blooming, how grass grows, snowflakes, the spinning of a spiders web etc). There is a beautiful flow in nature, so natural. In life there seems to be such chaos, such unnatural, unecessary struggle against the flow. For example, the unpleasant manifestations that may occur while waiting in a long line at the supermarket. Thinking about past memories or the places you have to be in the near future (draining energy, resisting and fighting the present! while growing the ego)

So the following message presents itself after reading Judy's post and through this past weeks experiences:

"get out of my own way (false self), observe the personality but do not feed it, (no analyzing/judging), this assists in shutting out the noise, and clears the path to openly receive, give and just be in the moment"

Thanks for posting Judy!

Work Program week beginning 3 September 2007

Upon arising, stand with arms upstreached, sense body from tips of toes to finger tips, evoke an inner smile, take a deep breath and chant the following invocation three times:

Oh Endlessness,
Help me on the way -
To enjoy the unenjoyable,
To like the unlikeable,
To love the unlovable.

During the day when you encounter something unenjoyable, unlikeable or unlovable, evoke an inner smile, sensed as proceeding from deep within the marrow of your bones.

---

by Judy

I would be kidding myself if I said there was much success with the "enjoying the unenjoyable" part of this week's exercise. It would be more accurate to say a couple of times I imagined I enjoyed a couple of the tasks by simply changing the terminology! No idea why this one "stuck" as difficult when the liking the unlikeable and loving the unlovable proceeded with some reality at least.
The closest I came to enjoyment was when I took to the task of emptying the vacuum-cleaner. Something wasn't working properly and I ended up half dismantling it before finding the problem. Later I realised that I had quite enjoyed managing that, and it was connected with my curiosity as to how it worked more than anything else. Maybe the curiosity took me more into the present moment, in spite of the dusty process?

So it seems to require strong presence/observation/remembering?
Overall I had difficulty, so if anyone has any little tricks or methods, in addition to the inner smile???

It could also be due to the fact that as I've been behind for a couple of weeks, only did these exercises since Friday, and for less time than usual.
Cheers,

by Lawrick

Sometimes simple exercises as this weeks offering are welcome. I found it very easy to kickstart my day this way, to jump right into the Work on arising.
I've taken for granted the meaning of the inner smile. Has it ever been defined? There are many ways to smile inwardly and many are quite negative, the sinister joy watching a competitor failfor example.

We were asked to bring the smile from the marrow. I found this difficult. I find bringing forth the smile from the I AM much easier and fulfilling. I sense myself fully on the first breath,I, paying particular attention to the force that remains after expelling the breath. On the verb, the AM, I sense the fullness of being alive, of existence and existing. From this proceeds a sense of oneness with all, and humble gratitude for the gift of this precious life. Locked within is the sense that I've done nothing to deserve this precious gift. And it makes me smile in love and humility.
That's my take on it. How it compares with others I do not know. Hoving so stated should I continue with my efforts to bring it forth from the marrow I wonder.

On the wake of 9/11!

In the liking the unlikable I chose a very difficult topic for me , that is WAR. I had no luck whatsoever enjoying the peculiar human phenomenon. I just may be that conscience will not permit me to enjoy this and perhaps that's alright. So I tried to love Mr. Bush with better results. I found some admirable qualities and decided his behavior mirrors more a fish out of water than a Hasnamuss candidate. I'll leave it there for now.

Be well all,
Lawrick

This exercise shows me how much I want to be the center of just about everyone's attention. I find myself coming from a place of expected priviledge--"How dare I still have a cold"--something I don't like, but the task asks me to consider liking the unlikeable cold.

"I can't believe he/she isn't thinking about me (or my kids, or anything else that somehow relates to my ego)." The challenge was to evoke Endlessness in considering a different take on these things I find unpleasant.

I'm grateful for the chances to observe.

Thank you for this weeks exercise.

This is the first time I can remember honouring the present moment, focussing on the action and not worrying about what the fruits of my labour would be.

This exercise was a gift of presence and a glimpse at how much of my time is spent in the future. It allowed for a new understanding.

When I found myself in a situation of unlikeable and unenjoyable, I tried to feel the emotion from within, just listening to a friend, unattached, smiling inwardly. I was doing ok until my son acted out in a series of unfortunate events and I was consumed by a strong emotional charge. "lights out"! I'm grateful either way to have witnessed this event!

I too had trouble sensing deep from the marrow of the bones. Any tips?

Hey Cassandra,
Hasnamuss,
"Hasnamuss designates every already definitized common presence of a three brained being, both those consisting of a single planetary body as well as those whose higher being-bodies are already coated in them and in which for some reason data have not been crystallized for the Divine impulse of Objective Conscience." BT 235

The term hasnamuss is mentioned several times in BT. I can only give you references as relates to the original version of BT. These are as follows:
As relates to religion:
Pages, 203, 233-4, 343, 694, 709-10, 776
detailed definition:
pages 405-410
Universal Hasnamuss Lentrohamasanin which I believe may be shorthand for Lenin, Trotsky,Stalin among others:
pages 392,396,400-401
There are other references. If you tell me which edition of BT you have perhaps I can connect the dots.

There is a Guide and Index to BT and published by Traditional Studies Press, Toronto Ontario. It does not define but collates references in groups for easier reading. It's an excellent purchase for you. If you can contact them perhaps you can get the reference relative to your edition of BT.

Take care,
Lawrick

---

by Dean

Hi Fred,

I would have to disagree with you and say that Mr. Bush is a candidate for a Hasnamuss individual, along with Mr. Cheney and Mr. Rumsfeld and a lot of his other cronies. I would consider most politicians who are involved in war to be candidates for Hasnamuss individuals, since they are willing to sacrifice others and cause a tremendous amount of suffering for their own egotistical aims. The seven 'Naloo-osnian-impulses' in BT p.406, which I will list seem to correspond quite clearly with the American agenda, and the way in which Americans seem to manifest themselves in this modern age.

1.Every kind of depravity, conscious as well as unconscious.
2.The feeling of self-satisfaction from leading others astray.
3.The irresistible inclination to destroy the existence of other breathing creatures.
4.The urge to become free from the necessity of actualizing the being-efforts demanded by Nature.
5.The attempt by every kind of artificiality to conceal from others what in their opinion are one's physical defects.
6.The calm self-contentment in the use of what is not personally deserved.
7.The striving to be not what one is.

I'm not saying that all Americans are on the way to becoming Hasnamuss individuals, but the Hasnamuss influence trickles down to the Lunatics and Tramps and drives the whole system in a definite direction. The media and our educational influences are some of the biggest culprits I think, and reinforce the idea that we are somehow more human than other cultures.

Hopefully there aren't any adamant right wing conservatives out there!, I would have to hang my head with guilt for seeing through the scheme of false American Dreams.

So long

by Lawrick

Hey Dean,

Given the paranoic, suspicious atmosphere pervading the U.S. right now, perhaps the site is not the place for strong political opinions. I might agree about Cheney but every country has some candidates for this hidious brotherhood of the Hasnamuss and no doubt every one of our members would have some strong views. As a Canadian I prefer Americans to comment on the Iraq process of Mass Reciprocal Destruction suffering what surely must be an embarassment of catastrophic proportions.
The Vietnam analogy. Repeating mistakes. America should be the light not the fire.
Despising the War is one thing. Personality opinions are quite different.
Nevertheless passion in some areas is not always a bad thing. Doubt there are warmongers onsite but you never know.

The naloo-osnian-impulses are each a horror unto themselves. How concisely beautiful does G. frame the monsters who qualify.

Be well,
Lawrick

---

by Dean

Hey Fred,

I'll refrain from expressing anything further concerning politics, although a part of me is quite disgusted with the American public for being so passive, especially when you compare the outrage and protests that were shown towards Vietnam as opposed to what is being done now. It may be a bit difficult to say if someone is a full blown Hasnamuss, or if they are just leaning in that direction. I'd also like to say that the best form of patriotism is being able to question authority and stand up for what is ethical and humane.

An Inner Smile denotes a 'positive' heart centered inner attitude characterised by attributes such as - good will, love, compassion, benevolence, happiness, pleasure, recognition, knowing, bemusement, congeniality, trust... The 'feeling' and 'sensation' of an Inner Smile can radiate throughout all three brains. Our eyes tend to 'light up' when we smile.

> We were asked to bring the smile from the marrow. I found this difficult. I find bringing forth the smile from the I AM much easier and fulfilling.

If that works for you better, then, fine

No harm in experimenting once and a while. Anyways, try beginning with a real, beaming outer smile. Try to sense that penetrating to the 'marrow'.
Then relax the facial expression while trying to retain the inner glow and light in the eyes. Then try reversing the order -

The marrow things is kind of a metaphor anyways, like saying get to the heart of things. It has been speculated that the marrow is the repository of the soul, as it is the deepest and most protected part of our physical being and also the source of our immune system and blood cells.

Hi Cassandra, Could you explain a little more what that means to you?

> Lawrick, what's a Hasnamus?

In addition to the other answers to your question, if you have the PDF eBook version of BT, you can use the Search function to find words in the book.
http://www.endlesssearch.co.uk/books/BeelzebubsTales1950.pdf
http://www.endlesssearch.co.uk/books/BeelzebubsTales1931.pdf

The Guide and Index is very useful study guide, but is $50 new. Besides listing page numbers, it has -
• the original Russian spelling for all of Gurdjieff's uniquely created words
• a suggested pronunciation for these and other words
• editorial notes on words from Eastern cultures and languages which may be unfamiliar to the average Western reader

http://www.traditionalstudiespress.com/ ... Index.html

There is another 'Guide' published Sophia Wellbeloved - Gurdjieff: The Key Concepts. It focuses more on indepth explanations.
http://www.amazon.com/exec/obidos/tg/de ... 0415248981

Both books are valuable references for a deeper understanding of BT.

Another useful book and practical to have for explicating Gurdjieff's teaching is The Oragean Version by C Daly King. It is a record of what he learned from Orage in his American groups.

Lawrick,

The Hasnamus question was in response to your mention of it earlier in this thread. I only wanted to know it's origin and how you were using it. I'm just now reading BT for the first time (All and Everything, First Series). I'm at the beginning where he's talking about his first desent to earth. The references should be very useful.

Ian, thanks also for the BT references.

[Ian wrote]Hi Cassandra, Could you explain a little more what that means to you?
[/quote]

This is about asking to perceive experiences from an unusual (for me) perspective. I see something as unpleasant, but that's only one take on it. I ask Endlessness to help me see more of this phenomenon. Can anything be absolutely good or bad or anything. The point, maybe, is to simply see it.

To be sure, I'm not clear on my relationship to Endlessness and evocation. I've read that there's nothing 'out there' to evoke, petition, or pray to--it's all inside. My 6 year old son had a bad cold. When I woke to comfort him one night, I wasn't sure if I should ask Endlessness/God/Universe to heal him or more simply to send him good wishes. My husband says I should just do for our son that for which I ask God because I am God/Endlessness. At the same time, I'm not that.

Is there a place for prayer/petition in the Work. Do we ask the Absolute to help us connect with our higher selves/God within? Thanks.

by Dean

Hi Cassandra,

> Is there a place for prayer/petition in the Work. Do we ask the Absolute to help us connect with our higher selves/God within?

Ouspensky touches on this question in the Fourth Way.

> Prayer is also an inseparable part of any religion; but prayer can be very different. Prayer can be a petition for help in anything we may undertake, and also, through school-work, prayer can become help itself. It can become an instrument of work which can be used for reviving ideas of the system, it can be used for self remembering and for reminding us about sleep and the necessity for awakening.

For the second part of your question I would have to say that you could try to connect with your higher self, your own absolute so to speak, by using it to serve as a reminder to remember and observe yourself.

Ouspensky also says some things concerning God in the Fourth Way

> If we take the Absolute as God, we can see that it has no relation to us. The Absolute is God for gods; it has relation only to the next world, that is, World 3.

> The World 3 is God for the next world, that is, World 6, and also for all the following worlds, but in a lesser and lesser degree. Then the Galaxy, Sun, Planets, Earth and Moon are all gods, each including in itself smaller gods. The Ray of Creation as a whole, taken as one triad, is also God: God the Holy, God the Firm, God the Immortal. So we may choose on which level we wish to take our God if we want to use the word 'God' in the religious sense, that is to say, in the sense of a God having immediate access to our lives. From the system point of view we have nothing to prove that any of these worlds may have a personal relation to us; but there is a place for God in the system.

The cosmos can be taken as a creator on a certain level, the sacred impulse of conscience may also play a role in making a person feel indebted to work towards God. It may be helpful to start on a level that you can perceive directly to act as an alarm clock to awaken yourself. Rodney Collin mentions that you can be aware of yourself as the active force, your environment as the passive force, and a higher power like the sun etc. as the neutralizing force. Remembering yourself in this way seems to promote a triangular awareness of your place within the universe.

Hopefully that answers your questions at least a little

Dean, thank you for the following, which I can relate to:

Ouspensky also says some things concerning God in the Fourth Way

> If we take the Absolute as God, we can see that it has no relation to us. The Absolute is God for gods; it has relation only to the next world, that is, World 3. The World 3 is God for the next world, that is, World 6, and also for all the following worlds, but in a lesser and lesser degree. From the system point of view we have nothing to prove that any of these worlds may have a personal relation to us; but there is a place for God in the system.

It doesn't matter so much what the higher source is, traditional image of God or sun, moon, etc. My question is about there being something besides my individual effort in this work that can be of assistance.

> Rodney Collin mentions that you can be aware of yourself as the active force, your environment as the passive force, and a higher power like the sun etc. as the neutralizing force. Remembering yourself in this way seems to promote a triangular awareness of your place within the universe.

Yes, I can see myself as active and the environment often challenging action that I would do (passive). I'm not sure about a neutralizing force.

> Hopefully that answers your questions at least a little

Yes, these are helpful.

I've been wondering about this as well, this idea of prayer. I'll be echoing Dean's response to some degree, just want to add a few things as I believe prayer is vital expression of our being.

Collin writes, P155 Commentaries," In the teaching of the Work the idea of prayer and the idea of Self-Remembering are so closely connected that one cannot be separated from the other. Without Self-Remembering Prayer is impossible."
Praying from a normal waking state is like dreaming we are praying. Words without intent. Nicholl states that," we must be conscious of both ourself and that which we pray for." He adds that we should feel our real I is making the Prayer.
I've read in some Sufi literature that we should pray with the presence of God in front or beside us. Very powerful image.

Bert Sharp in "My End is my Begining" talks about the Ancient Kahunas, the Polynesian concept of "spirituality". While almost now destroyed by Christianity and Islam it is in fact an extremely refined system with parallels in the beliefs of Ancient Egypt and a Ray of Creation not dissimilar to that which we study.

Mr. Sharp mentions two forms of prayer: Petition and Contemplation.
The Kahunas suggest all forms of prayer are telepathic because the higher Spirits have neither ears nor other senses with which to hear.
So we are to use thought forms but thought forms or telepathy of a specific type. Prayers must be sent in the form of the desired conditions, not the present state. So I suppose when praying for your son you must present him in the form of perfect health and vitality. As well, the prayer is spoken aloud which engages our physical being with the emotional-mental image. Fascinating!

The Christ said:
"Therefore I say unto you, What things soever ye desire, when ye pray believe ye receive them, and ye shall have them. And when ye stand praying, forgive, if ye have aught against any; that your father also which is in heaven may forgive your trespasses."
How interesting that the Kahunas and the Christian prayers say we must come forward free of the guilt of hurting others.

I'm no Bible thumping Christian. In fact until I began the Work I never attended church at all. But contacting that "Something" higher in my world is important for the growth of my being. So I try.

As to petitioning for the health of our loved ones among others,
I don't believe we can pray enough.

When praying I find it helpful to sense my breathing. It is a bit difficult at first but it definitly keeps me within the moment. There is a sense of gratitude, humility, oneness in this. Practice the Lord's Prayer whle remembering your breathing. Perhaps you'll find some Peace there.

Dean I have some material for you. If you wish to contact me via email I'd be happy to send it along.
Be well,
Lawrick

My husband says I should just do for our son that for which I ask God because I am God/Endlessness. At the same time, I'm not that.

Yes, that's an interesting observation/question - I am God/Endlessness - or - Am I God/Endlessness?

It's a tough question, and I am not sure there is a definitive answer that will satisfy everyone. This very proposition was the basis of a Seminar we had at the 2007 A&E Conference. There were many different points of view. Some people thought it was relevant and would affect they way they lived their lives, and others thought it was irrelevant and would not affect the way they lived. Wars have been fought over this question - to what end? Nothing has been resolved. In the end, it seems to come down to peoples egos and self importance - eg. some people gain self-worth from seeing themselves as 'agents' of Endlessness, whilst others get more self worth seeing themselves as 'particles' of Endlessness. We need to take ourselves out of the equation. As long as we have a personal 'belief' at stake in the answer, we are Identified with it.

"You can safely assume that you've created God in your own image when it turns out that your God hates (or loves) all the same people you do."

This is a question that we each have to answer for ourselves - no one can do it for you; you have to have some sort of personal experience to base your answer on. No one can dictate your religious beliefs for you.

We are are alone in front of this question. We have to take the personal responsibility to answer it for ourselves. There are, of course, lots of resources available which we can study about other peoples views on the subject. We can weigh the arguements pro and con. But what we choose to believe - nay - what we have experienced, will be the deciding factor in our answer. And since we must always remain on the question side of 'higher knowledge', there is always the possibility that we may be wrong. But there is no passing the 'buck' - we are responsible for our own conclusions. In the end, does it make any difference which conclusion we draw? I think it should not.

Whether we pray to a higher power, or pray to our higher self, what is the difference? Should not the conclusion be the same?
Should not the dictates of our conscience be the same? Should not our sense of right and wrong be the same?

If we remove ourselves from the question, should not the higher ideals remain the same? If they don't - then maybe it is our ego that is getting in the way. We may be Endlessness; we may be not. Would it make any difference either way as to what you prayed for for your son?

Start the day by sensing the flow of breath in and out of the nostrils.
Add to that a Pondering: What prevents commitment from leading to efforts?
Be open to any Reconciliations in the emotional center.

At mid-day, re-commit to the effort of sensing the flow of breath in and out of the nostrils.
Add to that a Pondering: What function does Remorse of Conscience serve?
Be open to any Reconciliations in the emotional center.

Before sleep, sense the breath as if it were entering and leaving through the soles of the feet. Imagine that your tensions, thoughts and emotions are draining out of your feet into the earth to replenish it.

---

by Harry

This is a bit in response to this exercise and some in response to the suffering that was being discussed in another thread.

Breathing and being aware of all of the centers is beneficial. And draining to remove those things which are "its" that pop up at random is wonderful.

But let's combine this with the concept of suffering. O and Collin both emphasize that the only thing we have to sacrifice is our own suffering. Our unconscious suffering.

This week I faced a situation which produced suffering. This is a relatively recurring type of situation. One I have been prone to over the years. Suffering that I bring to myself because I like the role of rebel; I like the attention, and enjoy that interaction. I found myself, once again, dealing with a superior employer who found my self inflicted actions offensive.

As I saw this coming I did what I would call a variation of this. An exercise which we've done before: the twelve bone exercise. I also made sure to fall asleep with I am, I wish, I can; including a draining using other orifices or centers in addition to the soles of the feet. And began my mornings greeting the sun, as usual. Actual I began somewhat before that, awakening about five and then laying silently and breathing through the circular cycle.

It became clear after some readings. . .Nicoll at random is wonderful for this. . .that I was, of course, bringing this suffering, and imaginary sufferings as well onto my self. But more importantly; I felt the interaction of emotional centers and moving centers regularly through the day. I at first identified this as the suffering; but soon realized that what I was actually experiencing was those centers being awakened. If I emptied myself and followed my energies without putting identification on what was happening, then I began to realize that these centers were active. Yes there was some suffering; but that suffering was also awakening the centers, once I allowed it to be transformed.

It is interesting, in retrospect, that the instigation of this suffering event, beyond myself, belong through other individuals who I would say I felt positively toward. But that "I" doing that feeling was ordinary i. The one who enjoyed this rebel roll I like to unconsciously play on a periodic basis.

---

by Judy

This worked very well in many instances;

> Be open to any Reconciliations in the emotional center.

So much so, that the "openness" was all that was required to allow the breathing exercise to begin and keep going from there.
It was as if the freedom actually is the understanding, rather than being a result of the understanding.
Most interesting and effective. Thanks for this one Ian.

I also liked the sensing of the breath coming and going through the soles of the feet together with the draining exercise and visualisation. Feelings and thoughts slowed right down.

And Harry - I experimented with this, after reading your post:

> Yes there was some suffering; but that suffering was also awakening the centers, once I allowed it to be transformed.

To elaborate just a little - I've been recently able to look at other emotions/thoughts which are present in me as well as, for example, the suffering, and this has been useful in lessening identification with whatever the main observation is.
And yes, it was possible to see the activity of the different centres a couple of times, which added to and broadened the self-observation, while keeping detached and relatively impartial.
There was a lot of movement to and fro that I was previously unconscious of - as if seen from a distance.
Thanks a lot for sharing that.

Best wishes,

Begin each day by dedicating your Work efforts to the benefit of the Megalocosmos and not yourself.

For a period of time:
- refrain from justifying or explaining your actions to others.
- refrain from laughing.
- refrain from idle chit-chat and gossip.

Ponder on the statement in Beelzebub's Tales that Time is "...the Ideally-Unique-Subjective-Phenomenon." (p.123-4)

---

by Harry

The first and last refrains are wonderful examples of things that can free energy. I'd add the second if we defined it as laughing with derision. Laughter, however, can be something that is beneficial. It can also be a lawful response to stimuli.

Time. My time is not your time. Is certainly not your cat's time. And has nothing to do with my flea's time. (We all have them sometimes.) Three years for a three year old is a lifetime. For me it's a short memory. And beyond that my time today is different than my time was ten years ago and certainly different than thirty years ago.

Time also changes by situation. I don't have any external demands on me today. But yesterday I had to be at class at a specific time. So my time was different yesterday. And that time was different from the time of the students who were coming to the same class. And five minutes of that class can be different for everyone. For the speaker when speaking, for the audience, for me, the teacher. Time passes differently. Slowly up in the mountains, if we are to believe Bob Dylan.

More esoterically, Heropass is probably named wonderfully. Even heroes pass. George Washington is a face on a coin. He barely has his birthday recognized. And who remembers Audey Murphy, today.

According to Tom Rapp: I asked a wise man for a saying always true and after much contemplation he said: "These things too shall pass away."

Gives some different tone to the idea of "always keeping Death present."

by Karen

As I ran the water for an evening bath, I practiced the I AM breathing exercise. The reflection of the water danced on the wall and rippled on the ceiling, alive with energy. Looking closer I became aware of each water drop clinging to the tubs edge, to the body and particles in the water. A whole other world was right before my eyes and very easy to miss if not looking or alert. Moving deeper into this peace, I picked up a book by Collins and began reading. Ahh haa after ahh haa the words seemed to make sense. My husband bolted in all worried and said, "Oh I was scared you fell asleep because you have been in the tub for over 1 1/2 hours." Feeling the temperature of the water and looking at my feet and fingers for the wrinkle factor, neither were a tell. The water was warm and the finger/toes not that wrinkled.

Where was this timeless place I had gone to, so vast?

Then simultaneously the weekly exercise was posted with...

> Ponder on the statement in Beelzebub's Tales that Time is "...the Ideally-Unique-Subjective-Phenomenon." (p.123-4)

So I ask myself what is time?
I've experienced psychological time where I am mentally and or emotionally in the past and time where I am in the future, this is where I've observed to spend most of my time, and clock time used for making appointments and being somewhere at a certain time, and then the timeless time of being in the moment.

Then Harry posts, opening up a door a little further for observation:

> Time. My time is not your time. Is certainly not your cat's time. And has nothing to do with my flea's time.
>
> Time also changes by situation. Time passes differently.
>
> Even heroes pass.

So what keeps time alive?
I began to get glimpses of one generation to the next within our family circle.
For example, my baba died 17 years ago (seems like yesterday) because I have kept her fire alive in all of the ways she touched my life. Like Harry said, "my time is not your time." My time with her is different from my cousins and her children’s etc. But each of us, through conversation and experiences have kept her fire burning in some way.

I have heard the saying "this too shall pass" similar to what Harry mentioned:

> According to Tom Rapp: I asked a wise man for a saying always true and after much contemplation he said: "These things too shall pass away."

So I pondered, How can I keep these beautiful, positive thoughts/things/ideas alive longer? Who will carry on my light? and what generational learned behaviours need to be left behind and pass away?

The wild horses have my attention (hard horses to face), and when I follow them wherever they want me to go, it seems the strong, well groomed seemingly perfect horses make their presence soon after revealing the beauty that was also present in that time.

Yesterday I logged onto the computer and looked out the window to see something I'd never seen before. Outside the window are trees, housetops and trees as far as the eye can see. A radiant band of almost fluorescent yellow trees illuminated and glittered with life beyond words.

Ideally-Unique-Subjective-Phenomenon

by Dean

Dedicating my daily efforts towards the benefit of the Megalocosmos has been a good way to start off my day. I usually take a while to progress with my efforts, and many selfish I's are present in me before I get settled into my work day. This exercise helped keep me from indulging in these tendencies, along with observing myself.

For the next exercise I kind of cheated. I had been doing exercises during the day and had had definite results and was in a certain state. In this state it wasn't difficult to refrain from talking about unnecessary things, and refraining from laughter or justifying my actions to others. I would agree with Harry and say that this was a good way to conserve energy, and my internal considering was kept at bay enough, so I wasn't using up energy with this negative habit either. It did seem like taking this too far would be detrimental to my external considering though, and people would definitely have a strange impression of me if I did this for an extended period of time.

I don't have that much to add about time being the Ideally-Unique-Subjective-Phenomenon, Harry covered a lot on this topic. I have definitely had the feeling that time is going faster now that I am older, a school year dragged by so slowly that it seemed like an eternity. Now I am thinking where all the time is going, it's going through me, only my perception of it is quite different. I've also noticed that my internal states change my sensations concerning time. Time seems to go faster when I have more energy, when I have more concentration, and when I'm having less associations. I'm not really 100 percent sure why this is, but I'm thinking it has something to do with the frequency of vibrations, and how intensely my centers are working. This may be true, but then again trying to prove such things is difficult, although if something can be observed consistently then I basically would say that that is proof enough.

Anyway these exercises were great, I really enjoyed them and felt I gained some new insights.

Hey all.
There have already been many interesting observations of Time. People in this Work (Ouspensky) have made it a driving aim. Collin has more than touched on it.

So why dwell since in G's words,"Time itself no being can understand by reason or sense by any outer or inner being function", and "Time alone has no sense of objectivity because it is not the result of the "Fractioning" of any definite cosmic phenomenon".
Fractioning! So time is not created by law. It can neither be felt, sensed, touched, tasted or smelled. It is always appears relative to the nature of events proceeding within one's inner and outer world. It is described by simply noticing a change in something.

The word Ideally in the phrase confuses me. To what degree or comparison is it ideal, that is a perfect archtype , of what?

Time seems more obvious when we are younger. Events seem longer. That is, these events which impact our consciousness are niether understood nor judged by our essence. Therefore one the qualities by which time speeds up is our attatchment of ideas, associations, or feelings to it. It was a boring meeting! Finally we have some time to ourselves? Hurry up, we need to be anywhere else?

Time itself neither flows faster nor slower and we have no access to it except that within this moment, if we are present, we can fill it with impressions and in doing so time may not just merely pass, but expand, be filled. Be more expansive, more fulfilling to us. The task is to stay in the moment.

This weeks's exercise should have been simple since I dislike "idle" or petty talk, and I believe I don't justify all that much. Wrong!
Here's an example of how subtle the monkey mind works. When I go for coffee to ladies always greet me kindly and I in return tell them a little joke or anecdote to satisfy my social obligations. They enjoy the laugh.
So one day last week they greeted me and in sleep I performed the same mechanical response waking up only after the moment had passed. A few days later. I did not smile, did not create a little joke, I just sat down to do my reading. I could feel the back of my ears burning with their shock and with my acting totally out of my sleeping persona. I finally turned around to defuse the situation. When asked why the "cool" greeting I then went and justified myself by saying "It must be the weather", which was gloomy at the time. Jesus!

How incredibly conscious of me. The laughing part of the exercise was as mechanical as the rest, even more so because I thought it the one aspect I could use as a reminding factor. So monkey man swings sublimely through another week. Anyone got bananas.

I must say that I enjoyed the pondering on something specific from BT. Can we do more of this?

Be well,
Lawrick

Hey Fred, and all,
This comment of yours caught my eye;

> The word Ideally in the phrase confuses me. To what degree or comparison is it ideal, that is a perfect archtype , of what?

Having spent an inordinate amount of time (no pun intended) and energy trying to understand 'time' in an earlier phase, I finally moved on, having accepted that I couldn't understand it.
I too pondered on the word "ideally".
It seemed to connect with the idea that what 'time' measures or monitors is change itself - thus how would it be possible for it to be anything other than uniquely subjective? By this I'm inferring that the moment I experience anything "changeless", it is "timeless" also, at least in the sense of time as we usually know it. (We use the word "eternal" for these moments; one of Ouspensky's inclusions into his time dimensions.)
Then there is a connection to 'movement' - in the sense that "Creativity is the movement of life" - which brings us quite close to an idea read somewhere; it is a bit of a cliche perhaps, but a nice one;
"Time is God's Patience."

Cheers,

I have been lucky over this past week in that something has happened where I did not need to analyse Time - what a relief after all this trying, as Judy mentions. It somehow occurred that I observed an action, and 'below' the action was me. Some 'time' later, another action was performed, and what I noticed below was the same 'me': time had passed, a different situation was in place externally, but the 'me' had not progressed along the time line at all, it seemed. So I have had constant glimpses of two parallel worlds: the one of time's progress and the actions within it, and the constant presence below which is uninvolved. Of course, when I say 'constant', I mean about ten seconds per day; however, the relief from the pressure of 'doing' in these moments lasts much longer in recollection than the actual sneaky-peek time I have been granted.

I was about to conclude by saying something like "Next week, I'll have probably lost the ability to do this" - then I realised what a categorisation "Next week" was. There is no Next Week!

With this exercise, I did everything but refrain from the above--most of the time. A phone call with a girlfriend from college got me doing all of these. I told myself I'd do the refrains later. Sometimes I was able to, other times not at all.

I liked the task of dedicating this work to the megalocosmos (I'm assuming this is a term from BT meaning the universe). I often look for or at least think of how I might perceive a benefit with these tasks. Then I thought, what if there is a benefit or help on some level I can't perceive. Because isn't the purpose of existence to help out the whole. I can't begin to know the whole in my present fragmented state. But what if in some corner of the universe, my efforts have been useful.

Yes, megalocosmos is the universe.

According to what Gurdjieff taught, when we work on ourselves we are indeed assisting or helping Endlessness maintain the functioning of the universe, as well as developing our own higher nature. Kind of a win/win situation.

This theme is mentioned in Beelzebub's Tales.

Begin the day in a state of all-brains-balanced-being-perception.
Ponder - Is there a contradiction between developing a Real I and realizing our Nothingness?

Observe the full moon in a state of all-brains-balanced-being-perception.
Ponder - Does space separate us or connect us all together?

---

by Harry

I couldn't avoid the moon.
Well my aging prostrate couldn't.

Twice I awoke, as usual, part of the way through the night rest and saw light glowing into the living room. The full moon reflection. Brought immediately to myself. And isn't that part of the point of such exercises as this?

by Dean

In pondering the first question I couldn't help but recall some of the existential literature I have read in the past that describes nothingness, or the unreal nature of life. I felt their was a definite contradiction between developing a real I and realizing our nothingness in the sense that one side of the spectrum actualizes all possibilities, while the other side is utter negation, nothingness that undermines the whole overflowing abundance of everything with emptiness. These contradictions are really the same as all other contradictions but perhaps on a larger scale, and I felt that realizing one's nothingness is just one of the more reasons why one should work on themselves.

While watching the moon I couldn't help but feel connected with space, and felt like a small part of a much larger system. It's illuminating glow that lit the night seemed to be extending itself towards the earth, and while pondering this question I thought of the fact that if the moon was removed everything on earth would crumble and fall to pieces. This thought amazed me and made me a bit grateful for this great balance weight that kept everything in check, even if it was somehow the cause of influences that affected mechanical humanity. So in the end I came to the conclusion that we are connected with space quite directly and take certain things for granted, like the great orb that we call the moon.

by JohnS

Dean, I think we take EVERYTHING for granted, until it is taken away from us: our slot in the universe, our health, our opinions, actions, beliefs, way of life.....
It would be great if the world worked like this: ask a question about some aspect of our life, immediately it is answered by that condition being taken from us, then immediately given back. I presume we would still learn from it despite our certainty that what was removed would be returned to us, but in some cases the contrast and the stark reality could be breathtaking (coincidentally, there's a good example: taking our breath - in the crisis of our breath-taking (ex. drowning), we're in a different reality).
I'm not trying to be sensationalist or theoretical, its just that I'm trying to find a way of making what you saw and felt with the moon somehow more permanent or longer-lasting, ie being present being made more present! My constant experience has been that I come to more conclusions and 'revelations' at night than in daylight, but that inevitably they evaporate the next day, no matter how positive and permanent they seemed the night before.

I think Wordsworth is questing reality, not expressing pessimism, when he write this sequence of our lives:

"Heaven lies about us in our infancy;
Shades of the prison-house begin to close upon the growing boy;
But He beholds the light, and whence it flows,
He percieves it in his joy;
The Youth, who daily further from the East
Must travel, still is Nature's priest;
And by the Vision Splendid
Is on his way attended;
At length the Man percieves it die away
And fade into the light of common day."

---

by Judy

What a week of pondering!
Such very deep yet relevant questions sent me into various "refreshers" of certain study areas - in particular, Object Relations Theory. (Interesting Dean that you mention existential psychology in your post).

> Ponder - Is there a contradiction between developing a Real I and realizing our Nothingness?

On the surface they appear to be contradictory. So how to find a reconciliation, as both are reality?
Maybe the "Nothingness" spoken of refers to us in our usual waking consciousness - that is, almost exclusively personality/ego actions and reactions, automatic as they will invariably be, because ego structure and development means that we view the world through the filter of the past, in particular through the various subject-object representations we have internalised in our early childhood. So this implies that we see nothing "as it really is". We see nothing as it is NOW. This connects with the theory that we are actions and reactions of our self-image - which is exactly as the word says - merely an image of reality. Hence some traditions say; "Ego is not."

Man developing Real I on the other hand, is learning to act from Being/Essence/true nature/real identity. So he lives often in the now, and thus is not a bundle of automatic reactions, but acts spontaneously with appropriateness, and sees things as they are in reality.
There is much that I don't understand clearly. But a couple of the pondering streams I floated along on were connected with the possibility that:
During development of Real I, one would most likely experience what I'll call oneness or universality from time to time. This relates to the "no-self" of the Buddhist Tradition perhaps-nothingness?
Yet when one is one's true nature in the personal sense - Personal Essence if you like - then one can be a true human being in the fullest sense with Real I.
So personal does not necessarily contradict universal. The antonym of personal is impersonal.
Thus realisation of one's "Nothingness" during experiences of universality may be something like an aspect of experience available to a Man with Real I?

Then we come to the second pondering. It is indeed closely related to the first:

> Ponder - Does space separate us or connect us all together?

Again it seems that it depends from which perspective/level one views the question from.
Space separates personalities.
Space contains realities/essence in a unity.

And John, I love that part of "Intimations of Immortality" of Wordsworth's.
I take it to again refer to the fact that we are born in essence (Heaven), and then as the ego, which I think of as a mental construct,(along the theory-lines of Jacobsen, Mahler and Kernberg) takes us over, we are more and more put into the prison-house of the personality and our essence "fades away into the light of common day" (ordinary life affairs).
Thanks for posting that. Certainly sounds like Wordsworth had "views from the real world".

In reading about the structure and development of the ego identity through the stages of introjection and identification with various early childhood 'objects', and then how it expands on the number of these 'objects' as life experiences accumulate, there was a moment of amazing clarity about Mr Gurdjieff's doctrine of the many I's - and no Real I. How could it be any other way? This verification was a gift. More reverence and awe for Mr G, who lived long before the recent theories of psychology.

Hey John and Judy,

After reading your posts I realized I may have misinterpreted the first pondering exercise and connected it with something I had thought about earlier in my years of seeking for truth. Instead of taking it as nothingness like G states on certain occasions, to do with a person's nullity or their mechanicalness, I took it in a different sense to do with the illusionary nature of life. I was also thinking about the universe in general starting from the absolute which contains all and everything, to the outer reaches of the void which is nothingness. Anyway what Judy said seemed to be right on, and I would strongly agree with her statements. The nothingness of being an automaton in comparison with being a conscious individual seems contradictory at first, but such a realization may bring about the effort that is needed for development. Also seeing the infinitesimal scale on which humans live could perhaps have a similar affect.

John, thanks for the Wordsworth poem, he's one of my favorites. It does seem like he's referring to the loss of essence, sort of like Blake's Songs of Innocence and the Songs of Experience. Losing the childhood vision of the world and the suffocation of imagination seems to correspond to a certain degree to the Work, but then again I don't think it could be captured in the same way after being polluted and educated in a bad way. I suppose having an experienced essence is obviously better than an innocent essence anyway, in order to meet the requirements of life without being too far out.

Before each meal, perform the following Heptachord:
1. Relax all three centers.
2. Attend to the visual impressions of the food.
3. Attend to the smell of the food.
4. Attend to the taste of the food by taking a small sample into the mouth.
5. Attend to the sounds accompanying the meal situation.
6. Attend to the touch and sensations of the body.
7. Intone the phrase from Beelzebub's Tales - aieioiuoa.

Eat in silence. After eating, be aware of your breathing for a few minutes.

When Suffering a remorse and inwardly sing the phrase "AIEIOIUOA" while longing for a glimpse through the fog.

---

by Judy

This was very appropriate during the second of my 12-week food restrictions and it is a favourite too.
The whole process of less food eaten more consciously, followed by intoning aieioiuoa and then following the breathing allowed deep appreciation and interesting observations.

One I'd like to mention has to do with "it's" suggestibility. This can indeed be used to advantage. For example, the organism wasn't too keen about compliance for several days of these restrictions, yet, given no choice, it readily decides that it prefers it. Hmmm.
This then brings other considerations to mind as to the importance of not beginning any 'downward paths', however innocuous they may appear. If I'm heading uphill, just keep it going - even though rests or 'going nowhere times' will happen. The organism adapts just as well to good choices as to poor ones.

As to "Enduring", in particular -

> Our Seeker has observed that the deepening of intentional enduring of his quota of suffering may proceed in seven steps: recognizing of inner distress as suffering; naming it; accepting it; using it; believing it to be a required function; knowing it falls on everyone; recalling its compassion.

I used this on hunger at various times. "Knowing it falls on everyone" brought thoughts of many people in the world followed by a deep and poignant remorse and compassion.
This is a beautiful Heptachord for working with negative emotions and any suffering. Working with pleasure comes next.

Cordelia,

How is the intonation done?

Hello everyone,

For some time, I've known the importance of awareness while eating, but had not managed to reliably "do" anything, so having this exercise suggested for the week was very valuable. I did manage to attend to most meals and snacks this week and follow the Heptachord, other than sometimes not eating in silence when the whole family was present.

This exercise increased the amount of time being present at mealtimes and often spilled over for a while after the meal. My usual state is that of trying to do several things at once, probably related to my computer job. In any case, for many years I've felt that unless several tasks were in progress at once, I wasn't being productive. Doing this exercise forced me to slow down and concentrate while eating.

Hi Cassandra,

> How is the intonation done?

This seems to be a personal choice. Earlier in another thread I recall a discussion about this; 2 main ways were mentioned.
One was to inwardly sing (again a choice as to whether on the same note or not) the nine separate vowels.
The other was to break aieioiuoa into - ai - ei - oi - uoa

I usually do the first, but the second can work well too - a bit like a reverent lament.

Anyone else like to comment on this please?

Best wishes,

Work Program week beginning 8 August 2005

Morning exercise: Quiet meditation or sitting. Relax and quiet the three centers and watch the breath. Keep the eyes open and use the Sightless Gaze.

Daily exercise 1: Whenever you are walking during the day, use the 12 Joint Exercise. At every outbreath step, move your attention to the next joint in the sequence below. While sensing each joint, intone inwardly or gently under the breath, the AIEIOIUOA.

1. Right wrist
2. Right elbow
3. Right shoulder
4. Left hip
5. Left knee
6. Left ankle
7. Right ankle
8. Right knee
9. Right hip
10. Left shoulder
11. Left elbow
12. Left wrist

Thanks Cordelia and Chuck for tips on the 'aieioiuoa'.

Regarding the eating exercise, similar to Chuck, I realized the resistance to more conscious eating. I'm sitting at my desk at work with my lunch because I try to leave at 4 instead of 5pm. So I'm working through lunch but still feel obligated to actually get something done.

I felt it an imposition to pay attention to eating because there seemed to be so many other things needing attention.

Still, I did the task a number of times, both at home and work. It was harder to do with the children at dinner because they want to talk: "Let's play 'who wants to be a 'ten-cent-onaire'? or simply "Why are we so quiet?"

Our evening meal prayer is invoked with "Are we all present?" Often, this is the most attention I give to dinner.

Aieioiuoa could be intoned many ways, silent or aloud. Be creative. Adapt it to different situations. Emphasize different letters, frequencies, durations.

Sense it as it resonates in the body. Nasalizing the sound will help increase the resonances in the body. Nasalize by pulling the tongue towards the back of the mouth. Kind of like old country and western music.

One may want to associate it with a higher emotion, possibly trying to evoke such emotion: "And this sacred process Aieioiuoa or 'Remorse' always proceeds with the 'Omnipresent-Active-Element-Okidanokh' also." - BT page 141

Another association of Aieioiuoa may also be with the Nirioonossian-World-Sound: "... the standard unit for their confrontative calculations of specific gravity and specific-vibrations that part, established by objective science, of the most most sacred Theomertmalogos which still contains all the fullness of what is called the Vivifyingness' of all the three holy forces of the sacred Triamazikamno..." - BT page 141

In other words, Aieioiuoa is the sound of Okidanokh.

Aieioiuoa is the equivalent of the Hindu OM. So one could try chanting it in a similar manner. Another variation might be to chant it in a manner similar to Tibetan Overtone chanting.

One of the things we're taught early is "do what 'it' doesn't want to do". Let's combine that with another teaching: "The only real sin is to break your own oath."

In order to put our own beings in order we must learn to work toward a future. "It" has been running us for all of our lives. So we want to put the coach and reins in order and sober up the driver.

Begin with somethings simple. Pick up the thing you've dropped on the floor. Do the dishes when they're dirty. Get out of bed when the alarm rings.

These are all "positive" actions. In other words, you see something you've dropped, or even something someone else has dropped and you know it has to be picked up. Pick it up. Wash the dishes. Get out of bed and greet the sun. Or whatever "it" resists for you.

Take an oath to yourself. You will do what "it" doesn't want to do. Something small. Not something big. But then do it. Observe yourself doing it. And observe yourself when you aren't able to do it.

by Lawrick

Hey all,
This week I made a commitment without fail to pick up anything I dropped. I drop many things, leave some, kick some under the rug.

This week I've commited to this aim and surprise, surprise, not only does it present a sense of diligence, but this little exercise brings consciouness before the act, that is, I become more careful in the preparation and carrying of things. Which creates more opportunities for self remembering.
Which creates conscious events, gestalts.

Also I find more things not to drop. As in the knife in the sink. Works better when I put it in place rather than flinging it into the sink which spashes water here and there and creates more work. Another form of dropping. Dropping the coffee grounds in the garbage rather than partially on the floor. I told my sister dropping a filter of coffee grounds was the messiest thing imaginable. "no", she said, "the worst was my daughter spilling a large bag of sugar"! Carefully putting milk in my coffee without spilling creates another state. Not throwing my socks on the floor makes them so much easier to find in the morning.

So the simple exercise expands and in its wake small wills are created here and there which always leave a residue for the future. I enjoy these seemingly simple exercises because they give me a definite starting point upon which I can expand. So as they say in Joisey, "How you doin'" with the exercise. I hope things are picking up if you'll excuse the pun.

Good work Harry, Ian.
I'll incorporate the rest of the exercise as the week rolls. Eeeee rock and roll.

Be well all. Why so quiet of late?
Lawrick

---

by Harry

Great Lawrick,

Your experience mirrors my own.

I also find that I have a tendency to drop things at a certain time. And a second thing that happens is that I give up the negative response to dropping something. If I've already decided that I must pick something up, then that little stab at a conscious activity takes away the "negative reaction" to something which is beyond my control.

(My own observation is that at certain times of the year I go through dropsy. And other small accidents. I'll leave others own observations to see if they have the same type of responses. At these same times there is also a tendency to drop internal things.)

We have an old cat, almost deaf and pretty senile, but for some reason still insistent that she gets fed! Doing this is the task I chose. The hard part is, she meows loudly, usually between 4-5am, to be fed. Before this, I usually did get up to feed her, but reluctantly and often with a mumbled "stupid cat!" Occasionally I would just let her meow.

So my task was to cheerfully get up early and feed the cat without resentment or reservation. During the course of the week, the goal was extended to being more attentive and affectionate to the cat in general (with two dogs in the house, the cat is often forgotten).

An added bonus developed during the week. Since the cat takes about 15 minutes to go through her routine, it became a perfect time to do Work exercises, usually IAM or the I-have-a-body exercise from The Oragean Version.

Challenge to come: Sat and Sunday, when the hour will seem earlier. The stupid cat doesn't know it's the weekend...

Regards,
Chuck

I was contentedly brushing cat Ellie late on Monday while idly thinking what I'd choose to take an oath to myself on for the week, when I dropped the hairbrush. Okay. So I chose the picking up of anything dropped also. This has expanded to picking up anything that needs picking up, and to other little events such as forgetting where I've put something, not completing simple tasks (such as you mentioned Lawrick, regarding leaving rinsed plates/cutlery in the sink).

I've observed distinct similarities to the "stop" exercise in that each time I am brought quickly back into a state of some self-awareness.
Just as others mention, this simple task has altered much in how I do little tasks. The increased consciousness also equates to some economy of energy.

There is a sense of "preparing for an event" there as well - a la Karapet of Tiflis, in that the negative reaction which usually goes with any clumsiness is avoided. Or, as written in the exercise: "In order to put our beings in order we must learn to work towards a future."

I noticed too that having to immediately restore harmony and order connects with the idea of a small "payment".
And that what has "dropped" first, before the clumsiness is seen, is my state of consciousness.

Time and time again it happens, yet still I'm surprised - at how one simple work task connects with all and everything.

Good one Harry - much appreciated.

I forgot to mention... one of the things Gurdjieff mentions that I'm sure 'it' doesn't like is a cold shower. One approach is to turn the water cold at the very end of the shower. Been doing that for some time, and I think it also may help to prepare one's body for the upcoming winter (except for Judy, where it's spring now?)

Chuck

My task this week began with manageable things such as picking up clothes, toys, dishes, laundry, emptying expired items in the fridge. Which brought me to: while I am here, if dropped, pick it up, clean it, if need be, and put it away or throw it out.

The question arose, this could be endless, a bottomless pit, where do I draw the line?

But wait, stop, I am to focus on small manageable things, here and now, and stick to my oath.

A very profound exercise indeed! Thanks Harry

Making an oath for myself and following through with it was great for testing my will and sincerity. I had been putting off my work out routine that I do, but after taking this weeks exercise into consideration I decided to get up early when my alarm went off and put an end to this putting things off until tomorrow. It went well and I felt that I had overcome some resistance within myself.

While walking through an enterprise known as Wal Mart a bag of Halloween candy mysteriously fell off the shelf in my vicinity, and remembering this exercise I decided to pick it up and place it back in it's proper spot, usually if this would have occurred I probably wouldn't have thought twice about passing it by. Not a big thing, but something that I felt I could do that would offset my usual automatism.

I also made a promise to myself that I would do dishes, something I don't usually do and something I don't particularly like doing. I fulfilled my self imposed obligation, although I think my mom found it odd that I was all of a sudden insisting on doing the dishes.

Anyway, this weeks exercise was a great task to take up and kept me thinking along certain lines that could modify my usual behavior patterns and give me some force from transcending certain weaknesses and subjective habits.

Hey all,

I'm posting this not only to relate an interesting experience but to answer 2 of Cassandra questions. She asks" what is the two ended stick" and, "is a sense of body necessary for self remembering?"

By way of an answer:

Last Saturday I had just finished shopping and had stopped for gasoline. After fueling up I wetted the window sqeegee and shook off the water. Immediately my sense of the week's exercise kicked in and along with it a sense of the 2 consciousness' at work.

I recognized and even heard/saw the inner dialogue which proceeded like this. Mentation by words, association.
"let's go, get the windows done, we've got things to do". (We, I didn't have anything pressing. Living in the future.)
"Why are we doing the back window first", we have a clean brush and clean water."
"Who cares let's just do it" and so on. (Who needs movies when this is going on?) I should have charged myself, made some popcorn!

At this point I decided to sense my body and with this a certain consciousness came flooding back. The reconciling principle having seen the 2 sides of the stick decided thus:
Clean brush, clean water, do the driver's window first, what could make more sense. Yet in the back of my mind conditioned by years of habit, this "voice" continued,"Why are we doing the front first, we never do it this way?"

But from now on, the front window it will be. Another habit observed and confronted. I hope this answers your questions Cassandra.

Be well,
Lawrick

---

by Harry

Do not do what can't be done.

That's one of my favorite quotes from G. Does it really matter which window is cleaned first? the squeegee can always be dipped back into the water.

As to the two ended stick. Every stick has two ends. One good, one bad. If you take the good end, then someone else gets the bad. If you clean the front window first today, you'll be backing up tomorrow.

Use your irritations as reminding factors for conscious efforts such as counting to 10 while sensing each of your fingers.

Use your angry reactions as reminding factors for conscious efforts such as remembering your death and visualizing an illuminated skeleton.

Use your strongly held beliefs as reminding factors for conscious efforts such as considering an alternate form of the belief.

Use your physical discomforts as reminding factors for conscious efforts such as observing objectively with a neutral emotional center.

Use your inner thoughts as reminding factors for conscious efforts such as quietening the flow of thoughts and dwelling within the inner silence. Renew your effort with each stray thought.

Hey all,
Forgive me if I stray off topic for a moment but I have a small announcement.

Several years ago a beautiful essence in the form of a lovely blond little girl entered the plane of this earth kicking and screaming.

The world is a better place for her appearance.

Karen,
Judy and I send your our sincere wishes for a very Happy Birthday today and by way of celebration we recall G's wise words,
"If you go on a spree go the whole hog including the postage"!
Happy Birthday again,
Lawrick

by Judy

Hello all,

I chose the first section to concentrate on as sometimes notice minor irritation in interacting with others. Previously "to endure the unpleasant manifestations of others" has often been thought of (especially at administration meetings).

However this week it has become obvious that there is often another factor. That being that I'm actually contributing to the irritation myself.

For example, I caught myself "wiseacring" in a discussion about a medical disorder. This was such a shock that I stopped in the middle of a sentence - looked at my feet, collected myself, and finally said; "May I start again? I don't really know much about this at all." (adding to myself - "it" seems to be theorising at best, or making it up as it goes along at worst - unconscious lying)

I'm not sure what was happening really. It seemed like something other than "it" suddenly woke-up and took charge. There was also a feeling of weakness, a sort-of emptiness in the belly,which disappeared after the correction and the belly felt quite full again.
I wouldn't have noticed this if I hadn't been silently counting to ten and sensing each finger. Certainly everyone was wiseacring - I was quite aware of that - and this may have played a part in the irritation. However, why did I automatically join in? Did "it" react mechanically to the wiseacring and try to go one better?

Talk about a "Tower of Babel!"
This is a revealing exercise for me - much appreciated.

Exercise: Allow the ring-tone of your telephone to be a “reminding factor” to self-consciousness. Then sense the hands and answer the telephone with the opposite hand to your usual practice. Observe this process and allow the self-awareness to continue into the listening process for as long as you can.

At the end of the call, when time permits, use the seven step process as stated in our three month program “Enduring” to transform, or intentionally deepen towards a neutral state, the energy from any feelings you may have noticed during the conversation, whether negative or positive. Or you may prefer to do this at a time suitable to you, choosing one call from each day.

That is, our Seeker has observed that the deepening of intentional enduring of his quota of suffering may proceed in seven steps: recognizing of inner distress as suffering; naming it; accepting it; using it; believing it to be a required function; knowing it falls on everyone; recalling its compassion.
He finds that he may use a similar procedure in deepening enduring of pleasure.

Observe your emotions, both when you remember to wake-up at the sound of the telephone and when you forget.

Pondering: Upon retiring each evening the Seeker will ponder on the ways that he himself is blessed by a Divine Love which is objectively bestowed on everything. Remember to Sense your body and Observe your emotions while pondering.

by Lawrick

Hey All,
This is a very interesting exercise for several reasons at least to me.
I might be the most right handed being on the planet except when it comes to politics when I use my left side to "swing for the fences".

I cannot remember the last time I answered or dialed a phone using my left hand. It is both a "Stop", and an ongoing reminding factor. If you'll excuse the pun. "an excellent wake up call". Sometimes I remember, others I don't. Either way I'm bound to notice the state of my sleep.

I've extended this exercise to use the ring tones of cell phones as wake up calls.  I do this because the growing use of cell phones interupts my lunch, my studying, my reading etc. I see our race turning into a form of the BORG, implants already attatched to our mouth and ears, soon T.V. eyepieces will be "en vogue" further shutting out the necessary impressions served up by nature. So when the irritating tone of a cell reaches my ear, I use Judy's exercise to awake (I try to listen using only my left ear) and use Ian's exercise of counting and sensing to reconcile my irritation.

The enduring portion is not working as well as I would like and hope to come to terms during the next few days.

Pondering Divine Love should almost be an obligatory nightly exercise. How fortunate we are to bathe in that Bountiful Blessing of unconditional Love Good work Judy. Will get back in a few days.

Be Well all,
Lawrick

The exercise of using my opposite hand to answer the phone and becoming more self-conscious has been quite an awakening experience indeed. Using my left hand instead of my right felt very foreign to me, so foreign that I thought I would be a little awkward talking to the person, but I basically just did this exercise at work when the front desk called me, and it was mainly just for usual sorts of things. After hanging up I observed my emotions and thought of the seven steps for enduring suffering, this did have an affect and was quite calming, I really could see how I was affected by the conversation and it brought me to a more conscious and aware state.

The pondering exercise has become a sort of milestone for my work, and with the combination of some of the suggestions on the monthly guidelines I feel I have reached a higher level of understanding. The realization that everything has a purpose and that suffering is a required function has given me a new perspective on life, and has brought me to be a more objective observer of the planetary situation. The emotional state that is attained from this is so great that I am disappointed when it's gone, but then I just remember the enduring exercise and just work towards it again, so it's really just a pendulum swinging from one spectrum to another, so I feel it's lawful and natural.

Thanks Judy for the great exercises

by Cassandra

Hi All,

At first I thought I wouldn't have much opportunity to practice this exercise with phone calls because I don't get that many. (I don't carry a cell because I don't want to create more calls.) I decided to try it with conversations. To my surprise, I received more than my average number of calls this week, both at home and work, so I was actually able to practice with the phone. I didn't do the neutralizing part after any calls (so far) because I forgot it. But I could see the Law of Seven, I think, with the extra effort needed to attend to the task in a call I received this morning. It was a call from a parent and had to do with grading scales at our local schools. I have elementary aged children, so I'm usually strongly identified with issues about schools. Any objective observation I may have started with easily vanished. I could see myself in the interval between mi and fa and the experience taking a turn other than that which I originally intended. I can take time this evening to do the neutralizing component.

Also, I've noticed that preservation of energy (psychological, emotional, physical) is paramount to effective work. I've noticed that when I'm able to observe (not give opinions, interpret, etc.), there's a very small peace that comes. But I must work very hard for this.

Cassandra

Great self-awareness exercise Judy,

First I recognized a tendency to answer the phone with either hand interchangeble, but being right handed, for the purpose of this exercise desided to give my left hand a workout.

I extended this practice to dialing with the left and assigning other duties to the left such as holding a water glass and picking things up. A great reminding factor! I definately didn't get an A+ but I'll settle for an E for effort.

I have questions regarding enduring and the 7 steps. I get hung up on the 4th step of "using it". Will post at a later date in the 3-month exercise.

Pondering Divine Love: When retiring to bed, I visualize a most brilliant white light and golden light enveloping me, bathing me with its radiant energy. With hand on heart (r) and solar plexus (L), I give thanks for being part of this beauty and a warm peace comes over me.

Hi all,
Just a brief comment or two.
Where I was coming from in the construction of this exercise is that the ringing of the telephone was the closest everyday event I could think of which provided a modern-day equivalent to the church-bells and Eastern gongs which were a "call to worship/meditation".

Most of us don't live even within the sounds of a Town Hall clock anymore. Thus it is an attempt towards a "call to Work."

I found a little added twist to it, in that there was almost always a noticeable trace of either irritation or annoyance or anticipation to work on as well, as this happened most times the phone rang.

And Karen, concerning -

> I have questions regarding enduring and the 7 steps. I get hung up on the 4th step of "using it".

One idea of "using it" connects with the transforming of the emotional energies towards the fine substances required for us to "coat the inner-being-embryo." - in other words, to develop Essence, or provide conditions for soul-growth.

Thanks to Mr Beidler for the beauty of his three month Work program which Ian has provided for us, some of which I incorporated into our weekly work.

This idea of "using it" connects also with Cassandras post here -

> My first reaction to your post is: why aren't these I's a part of you? Maybe the 'black murky' stuff is as much you as the 'light and love.' I don't want to think that I have to exorcise myself of the egoisms but rather be able to distance more and more from them. They are there to teach, I think. Seems a lot of people over millenia have gotten into trouble trying to rid themselves of egoisms--like lust.

How we "use" our suffering is a big part of the methodology of this Work.
Physical suffering is only a little part of this - there is the psychological and emotional suffering caused by wanting this, or not wanting that, or wanting things otherwise than they are now, etc. These sufferings manifest as the "unbecoming manifestations of the organ Kundabuffer".

It has been said that the Work is not about changing our personality, rather it is about developing Being, essence and higher bodies.

The intense energy that manifests through our suffering and associated negative emotions can be channelled into more productive use towards development of Being through the use of Affirmations and Work Exercises, rather than wasted on expressing the negative emotions or otherwise suppressing or stopping their manifestations.

The method adheres to the Law of Three - the higher (Affirmation) blends with the lower (Negative Emotion) to actualize the middle (Reconciling Force), which becomes higher for the preceeding lower or lower for the succeeding higher.

The 2nd step involves Remembering ourselves enough in the heat of the moment to bring a higher Work Affirmation to bear against the lower negative emotion so that the blending of higher and lower result in a Reconcilliation characterised as Impartiality at the 3rd step.

Being in a state of Reconciled Impartiality or non-identification at the 4th step allows us the inner freedom of "using it", that is, of using or directing the energy of the negative emotion to another purpose, such as "the expression of a companion characteristic such as joy" or of visualizing our bones filled with light or doing a Sensing exercise whilst repeating a mantra, etc., which is the 5th step.

This octave of steps can be placed on an enneagram. The first working of the law of 3 is represented by the lines between 1, 4, 2. The second working of the law of three is 8, 5, 7.

In any case, the essential thing is not try to stop having negative emotions, rather it is to try and transmute their energy; Alchemically to turn lead into gold. The heat comes from the sacrifice (sacred fire) of suffering.

It has been said that the Gurdjieff Work is a form of Tantric Yoga - "Tantra is understood to teach the method of changing the 'outgoing current' into the 'return current', transforming the fetters created by Maya into that which 'releases' or 'liberates'. This view underscores two maxims of Tantra: "One must rise by that by which one falls" and "the very poison that kills becomes the elixir of life when used by the wise.""

This was made abundantly clear by Gurdjieff in a meeting on December 7, 1941, when he said:

"One needs fire. Without fire, there will never be anything. This fire is suffering, intentional suffering, without which it is impossible to create anything. One must prepare, must know what will make one suffer and when it is there, make use of it. Only you can prepare, only you know what makes you suffer, makes the fire which cooks, cements, crystallizes, DOES. Suffer by your defects, in your pride, in your egoism. Remind yourself of the aim. Without prepared suffering there is nothing, for by as much as one is conscious, there is no more suffering. No further process, nothing. That is why with your conscience you must prepare what is necessary. You owe to nature. The food you eat which nourishes your life. You must pay for these cosmic substances. You have a duty, an obligation, to repay by conscious work."

Gurdjieff said the Work was Esoteric Christianity. The Cross is a symbol of suffering. Our Real I, our higher Self, our particle of Endlessness has to bear that Cross - "Take up your Cross and follow me.", as Jesus said. Taking the Body and Blood, the Bread and Wine of Communion is a Symbol of participation in our shared suffering. When Jesus says to love your enemies and turn the other cheek and give him the cloak off your back, he's not only talking about external 'enemies'. Those attitudes and acts towards your inner enemies represent your Affirmations towards your Denying force as manifested in negative emotions.

Your post clarified a couple of points for me too Ian.
Re;

> t has been said that the Work is not about changing our personality, rather it is about developing Being, essence and higher bodies.

Yes, I see that. Isn't it also said that at a later stage, when the "I" is stronger, it will begin to participate in the life of the personality, and thus have quite an effect in this way?

Daily Pondering: Which of the seven deadly egotisms - Pride, Envy, Anger, Sloth, Avarice, Gluttony, Lust - is a characteristic of my chief feature?

Daily exercise 1: Throughout the week, whenever you observe one of the seven deadly egotisms arising, endure its emotional manifestation with a calm indifference firmly rooted in a full sensation of the planetary body while repeating silently - I wish to Be.

Daily exercise 2: Each day choose one of the seven deadly egotisms and devise your own Affirmation to be performed while calmly enduring any manifestations of your chosen egotism during the day. The Affirmation may include a combination of a verbal formulation or prayer, a posture or gesture, a sensing exercise, an emotional evocation.

by Dean

The daily pondering question lead me to come to the conclusion that all the seven deadly egotisms act as devils 😈 each taking their stab at my more pure and positive half. If I were to choose one that seems to crop up the most, I would have to choose pride because I take a lot of pride in my views and beliefs, old beliefs that are slanted and biased. Things that I was brought up with and may be true, but have been taken to an extreme and have become a bit one sided. I have a lot of anti-establishment views that overlap into how I view people, and these views have pride attached to them that act as resistance to some of my aims. Other than that the other egotisms play a part all alternating, sometimes with associations that coincide with external stimuli, and sometimes just happening from lack of self observation.

I did the second exercise quite a bit during self observation, and whenever an egotism arose I prayed in a three centered way and brought myself to the present moment. I also did some emotional evocation to head off the onslaught of negative emotions that were rooted in these impulses. It definitely helped to see and sense the transition from a sleepy state to a more awakened and perhaps righteous state, this gave me some positive energy to use to keep the momentum of self remembering alive.

I began the pondering and observation expecting to find more "Pride" than any of the others. (On re-reading that sentence it has occurred to me that to even consider for a moment that I wouldn't notice too many of the other egotisms is in itself very prideful 😔)

In any case, I noticed more "sloth" than anything else this week. In working with the emotional state of it (calmly enduring it), I saw that it really was a very boring state. I observed facial expression, posture, gesture, movement (or lack of it), and all of this brought awareness that I wasn't really there. So much so, that the old song "What's it all about Alfie? Is it just for the moment we live?" automatically ran through the brain - which made me think "Well, maybe it is.", and brought me back into the present moment with some self-awareness.
The observation began with impartiality but the boredom was obvious almost immediately.

Also noticed an example of gluttony, when I just had just eaten a large slice of fresh cream cake even though I wasn't hungry.

I chose the Holy Affirming Prayer, followed by the "I am" for most of the observed egotisms, and the "I am, I can, I wish" for the sloth.

Best wishes to all,

Hey all,

So far, I've worked through pride, envy, anger and lust. I've been distracted and have not put myself through with the depth that perhaps I should.

Nevertheless, I don't feel my pride as the "quality" of my chief feature which probably means it is. A good example of pride was pointed out to me as I was trying to win an argument rather than being impartial about the process and the result. It always likes to win doesn't it? As a result nothing was gained but a loss of trust. Foolishness always finds its depth.
I did not try to reconcile the argument with a wish to be. I did not create my own mantra. "It won" thay day.

Nor did encounter envy as a major problem. The architect with his maroon Porche Carrera pissed me off for awhile. Life is so unjust. So I place myself in the driver's seat for a day and..... nothing. At the end of the day it sits alone and rusts. I wish to be works off this Denying. It is nothing, it will pass works. How does envying a thing, a thing belonging to another help either he or I? Wishing harm on my brother brings a necesssary shame.

Anger is an ongoing concern. Relative to the last few years I have made signigicant gains in appreciating anger impartially. For the most part I can observe it without identification. The problem arises when I'm tired and cannot bring the necessary hydrogens to bear. Then anger can turn into justification, to me a terrible state. Resolve with , "this is nothing, it will pass". And, "it is unbecoming to a Man".

Lust as always is an omnipresent and subtle beast. Why is one TV show more appealing. Nice looking anchor person, what was that she was saying? Nice looking actress, listen to the gossip! Nice looking waitress, hope she doesn't notice it is looking at her ass. I don't even know it is looking at her ass until I awake. I can reconcile this behavior rather well by visualizing the "she" as a person, as a skeleton, and realizing she will die and what an unseemly "requiem" my green lust would be. Possible candidate for chief feature. 😎😟

If I keep in mind my promise to post on a regular basis, my self observation is more significant, more present. i find it a good reminding factor for doing the Work.

Be well,
Lawrick

Hey Lawrick,
This is so true for me too -

> If I keep in mind my promise to post on a regular basis, my self observation is more significant, more present. i find it a good reminding factor for doing the Work.

I've often wondered why this is. It seems my "work I's" have a better chance of some consistent success if I manage to involve "its" interest as well. The weekly exercise sometimes on the first read kind of "whooshes by" - but there will be a word or phrase which "it" is curious about. And before I know it, the work has begun. Then others' experiences fuel the fire of curiosity and experimentation, which allows a much better partnership between work I's and it than would otherwise have been possible.

And other factors such as conscience, being true to the group, and lots of varying emotions can all be utilised to aid this process. Sometimes being true to others is easier than simply being true to myself (I can let myself get away with more by justification, for example). So accountability is also useful.

A more usual way of explanation is that the will of the group is being drawn on by my little will to make it stronger. I may imagine my will is strong enough, but in fact it often isn't.

So no conclusions here, except the one that this definitely increases perseverence and quality of work attempts.

Thanks for sharing that Fred.

Hi Y'all,

A wonderful exercise for me, now and always. When I first read the task, I'm thinking how can I choose among these because most of them are omnipresent--except maybe anger. But I clearly deal with envy/jealousy and lust (more emotionally than sexually) most often. I see these clearly as chief features. Psychologically, maybe these features have something to do with wanting deep relationships with others. I don't know, but I had many chances to endure emotional, mental, and physical reactions this week to envy (actually big internal considering), and I tried mightily to stay with my reaction and repeat the mantra I wish to be. I think I felt these features strongly because I tried not to run away from the experience. They didn't weaken with my repetitions, maybe even intensified because I realized there's no way around this but only through it.

When I chose envy for the second part of the task, my response was something like 'please teach me' through this experience. May I have the courage to bear it long enough to learn something useful. What blessing may be contained through these often painful emotions. There were moments when I could make an intellectual argument for not being desirous, but this wasn't consistent. So, I think the state of Being one is wishing for comes about by some other means, not merely from rationalizing--"the peace that passeth all understanding."

I've realized how important it is to work in the sense of preparing oneself to receive guidance. I'm so often engrossed in imagination/fantasy that reinforce egotisms, yet I claim to want release. No...the way must first be prepared.

I appreciate everyone's postings.

Daily exercise #1
Pride, Envy, Anger, Sloth, Avarice, Gluttony and Lust...all inside of me. Anger and pride appear to show up most often with a smile and a bowtie just waiting to stir up old habits.

All of these impressions of the mind, all of these years, got into my interior and I never transformed them. Wow do I ever have a bad secretary! She's misfiling the impressions and didn't direct them to the correct centre, so they all end up in the wrong departments.

My angry I's came out this weekend and brought their friends, rearing their ugly heads. Observing the infolding of their arrival made the body tense and resembled a murky black color, turning into a 'large beast of old habits'. The out of control party in my mind lasted for some time before I kicked the unexpected guests out and thanked them for showing themselves.

This is not me. I wish to be. I wish to be. I wish to be, followed up by Meditation #39

Karen,

My first reaction to your post is: why aren't these I's a part of you? Maybe the 'black murky' stuff is as much you as the 'light and love.' I don't want to think that I have to exorcise myself of the egoisms but rather be able to distance more and more from them. They are there to teach, I think. Seems a lot of people over millenia have gotten into trouble trying to rid themselves of egoisms--like lust. I don't know about getting rid of it, I like lust, but I don't want to be only lust, if only for a few minutes.

The key word in this quarter's guideline is "Intentional".

Exercise 1:

We usually see enduring as something we must do. If we endure something it is "negative". Someone who has great endurance is considered internally strong. But to intentionally endure, we must begin to have inner vision. Because what we "endure" we are usually reacting automatically to. Counter this reaction by practicing "Inner Stop".

Take an oath to yourself that when you recognize certain circumstances you will stop internally. You will stop, if only for a second, the ceaseless flow of thoughts; the up storm of emotions. If you feel irritation you will simply stop. You will let whatever was happening go on. But you will separate from it internally.

This moment of quiet should be extended as much as you can. More importantly, you should not express this inner stop externally in any way.

Exercise 2:

As we continue to work we also continue to need energy. One of the greatest sources of energy is to preserve what we waste.

Begin to pay attention to your movements. Especially when apparently at rest. Or in a positive frame of mind. Notice that your hands are moving when you're sitting in the chair. Notice that you are shifting weight from foot to foot. Notice the tensions in your body when you are having a conversation.

When you find yourself using energy in this way, let your body come to rest. Don't fight the movement. Don't command yourself to oppose the movement. But allow yourself to come to rest. And the energy will be redirected. You can begin to fully observe in that moment.

Hey all,

I must say that I have had some wonderful results with this exercise in terms of just being relaxed, unworried, decompressed.
In not examining every emotion, feeling, mood, physical comfort-discomfort and by standing apart, letting it go without disturbing my Self?,

I've been able to maintain a state of relaxed awareness for considerable lengths of time.

I believe I frequently lose my sense of observation by making efforts to "name that tune" and becoming identified with what I'm observing. How do we move around this? By simply standing apart?

I acheived a wonderful state of distance and awareness, non judgemental, just de stressed enough to let my self be, without recrimination.

One of the difficulties with observation is that judgements or negative associations arise with my observation. I lose my sense of impartiality. this was brought clearly home to me last week when doing the lust exercise. At one point I became disgusted with my behavior. Reacting instead of being impartial
So this works very well at the moment although I realize observing , naming is necessary. nevertheless, I've been able to STOP and in doing so am able to carry on a more impartial state for several minutes and longer.

I've also been able to observe myself in more relaxed states which is something I almost never do. Yesterday I found it twirling around a back scratcher and unconsciously tapping my feet to some pianola rhythm.

On the other hand, after reading very diligently for several hours today, I drove to our local "shopeasy" to get some groceries. I go there because I can just park outside the door. I was very fatigued. After paying, I pulled out my keys and, get this, Pointed my key fob at the exit door and pressed the open button. Well of course this didn't work! Why? because my keys only work on my car not the doors of shopping centers. On the brighter side, at least I was conscious enough to see how utterly unconscious it was a moment earlier.

Thanks Harry, Ian,

As an alternative to 'naming', I wonder if forming a picture would be of any value? This relates to Gurdjieff's remarks about picture form language.

The second exercise this week is always a very good one for me, especially - as my hands seem to be my Achilles heel of self-observation. They are often mechanically busy - just tiny movements, or there is at least unnecessary tension in them almost each time I observe, which makes the hands quite a barometer of state for me. It even happens when thoughts and feelings are relatively quiet, as if they are getting ready for action somehow. Thus this was the main observation work this past week.

Thanks Harry.

by Dean

The first exercise gave some really great results after doing it for a length of time. I focused a lot on trying to enter the "quiet place within" and trying to keep my mind quiet and stopping emotions. The result was quite peaceful and put me into the present moment very effectively.

I did the second exercise at work and noticed that I had some restless habits of movement that became apparent after observing and attempting to stop them. I noticed I shifted my weight and moved back and forth during conversation so I did the stop and relaxed myself. After doing this on several occasions I realized I could relax a lot more and that I was tense in certain situations. It opened my eyes to certain habitual movements that were quite unnecessary, and was a good exercise for observation as well.

Much appreciated Harry

This was a great exercise for me, as it gets me where I continually live--in imagination. At the start of this week, I was committed and really KNEW, like never before, how necessary it is to distance from the constant flow of thoughts and arguments. I had this committment down solid- until Friday. I fell way off due to a heavy emotional interaction and just sort of stayed heaped in a slump for the remainder of the weekend, telling myself that I'd get back on the wagon the next day. The imagination started slipping in again, criticisms, talking way too much. One of the things I had been watching for was inflated pride and insisting on my opinions. Seems every other conversation I got into I talked constantly about my position. Almost without fail.

So it seems I wasn't able to exert the needed energy to get me through this interval. The Law of Seven big time.

1. As you arise from bed, repeat silently the following affirmation: "Today I will dispell the fog of egotism with the sun of Being Affirmations." Sense an illuminated warmth radiating from the heart and entering each of the 10 Bones in the sequence -

1. Lower right leg bone.
2. Upper right leg bone.
3. Pelvic bone.
4. Upper left leg bone.
5. Lower left leg bone.
6. Spinal column and skull.
7. Upper right arm bone.
8. Lower right arm bone.
9.Upper left arm bone.
10. Lower left arm bone.

2. Continue to Observe yourself for hidden and subtle manifestations of the seven deadly egotisms - Pride, Envy, Anger, Sloth, Avarice, Gluttony, Lust - is a characteristic of my chief feature?

3. Each day choose one of the seven deadly egotisms and devise your own Affirmation to be performed while calmly enduring any manifestations of your chosen egotism during the day. The Affirmation may include a combination of a verbal formulation such as a prayer or mantra, a posture or gesture, a sensing exercise, an evoked emotion, etc.

4. The seeker may have discovered a fleeting joy experienced in this task of combat with their petty egotism - but resolves not to be distracted by the rewards of Work. During the week, when one experiences the rewards of effort, use the energy thus gained to enter a deeper inner calm of Being, free from emotional polarity but grounded in a deep sensing of your physical presence.

Hi all,
Wikipedia has quite a useful article on original meanings of the seven deadly egotisms.
Of particular interest are expansions of meanings of sloth (a connection to sadness), pride, avarice (as in hoarding unnecessary things) and lust (as in loving others too much and making God secondary).

Hey all,

In Northwestern Canada, there is a period of time, after the trees have shed their golden leaves and before the snows blanket the earth with their cleansing contrasting white.

I refer to this period as the "greys", the "blahs" etc. This year I've observed this grey depression with striking clarity and in doing so am barely managing to keep my life force above "go". I've neglected friends, and duties, I've not put myself fully into the work and suffer remorse from my negligence. It's been enough at some points to just carry on.

So in this vein I appologize for not participating in the weekly exercise as I should. There is no rationalizing this as I only hurt myself by this lack of effort, and now the week is almost done.

Perhaps periods like this are necessary and even helpful, I don't know.
I'll do better next week.

The ten bone exercise gave some good results. I noticed that my effort for sensing came from the intellectual center and the warmth that radiated from the heart gave an emotional element that when working together created a strong force for creating presence. Any mechanical resistance acted as the denying force, but with the help of intellectual attention and emotional attraction acting together, it was overwhelmed easier and without a long drawn out struggle. The daily affirmation gave me some direction and made me think in a definite direction as well.

Being aware of the seven deadly egotisms has been helpful and is giving more insight to observation, which has brought more self knowledge along with it. After observing the seven deadly egotisms within myself for a period of time I've noticed that I can see it in others more clearly and in a more objective way. The awareness has brought about a change in the way in which I see myself because I can see my chief feature in action in a more clear way.

Great exercises

Work Program week beginning 19 November 2007

by Judy

I wish to share a long-time favorite exercise in self-observation with you. We are going towards objectivity, which necessarily brings in impartiality.

This exercise involves an awareness of our routine bodily movements. It can begin at any time in the day, the earlier the better. I have found that the early morning time is a good one, before the centers have picked up speed for the day of ordinary affairs. The early start usually has an effect on my state throughout the day.

It goes something like this:
On waking, I say to myself - “Well, here I am. Thank you for another day. Let's get at it.”
Then - “This body is lying here and something is seeing it.”
As I rise I keep the awareness going - “This body is getting out of bed now and something is seeing it.”
The inner dialogue may change to - “It is walking and the objective faculty is aware of it”.
Or - “This face has some tense muscles around the mouth and eyes and the observer is noticing.”
And so this continues throughout the day whenever I think of doing it and wish to make the attempt.
If I forget on waking, I just begin when I remember. I do not berate myself. I accept that mostly I do not have self-consciousness.

We need to be clear with this basic exercise. We wish to develop an objective faculty which can become an “I” and eventually have some relation to magnetic center, so the attitude has to be serious and impartial. There is to be no analysis here. Forget about like and dislike. The attitude of this faculty is one of acceptance of us as we are. There is loving benevolence towards us. Any criticism or descriptions will detract, and the attempt itself requires honesty and sincerity.

Ponder: “Why am I undertaking the Gurdjieff work?”
Remember to sense your body and feel your emotions while pondering

This may increase the wish to work which will help overcome “its'” resistance. No resistance means it cannot truly be called “work”, so acknowledge this fact. The benefit of doing the exercise is for ourselves; sharing our experience is also for us, but connects with the second and third lines of work – working with others and work for the Work itself. Of course if there is no wish there will be no work. This too is clear and simple.

Each night be grateful for another day in the body which has been given to you. Do not say - “Oh, I should have done so-and-so”. Rather say something like - “I hope tomorrow my wish will be greater”. This is towards impartiality. Retire with a song in your heart and praise on your lips.

Well Judy, this exercise is already producing results. Today I met with a friend interested in Eckhart Tolle'. She was telling me that entries into the world of self remembering were exclusive acts of Grace, (no argument from me). On my part I was trying to explain the week"s exercise in terms of apprehending and enhancing the experience. There was a glimmer in her eye but as the old joke goes, "the bells were ringing, the gate was down, but the train was definitely not coming"!

While thinking about this after she had left, I pulled out an old book on Bennett and opened to a chapter on Djartklom. Synchronous?????
So there it was. When Grace turns on the light, it's not enough to enjoy the surroundings but we must make an attempt to Work. Duh! So I polished up the bones, began breathing, relaxed, and watched this "event" unfold. So strong and lasting was the "moment" that someone stopped to ask what I was doing? Has anyone ever asked you a question during one of the moments? I replied that I was just trying to understand: at which point this fellow decided we must have lunch together and discuss what was meant by "just trying to understand". I suspect only in dreams. I'm continually surprised how non threatening these states are, and how people wish to respond to them.

Still, it's been awhile since my intent was strong enough to hold the picture for any length of time. So thanks J.

And thanks to Cassandra for sending me the Florida sunshine  . Must be magic in them rays.

Be well, Lawrick

Hello Lawrick,
Thanks for the strong post.
Regarding;

> Today I met with a friend interested in Eckhart Tolle'. She was telling me that entries into the world of self remembering were exclusive acts of Grace, (no argument from me). On my part I was trying to explain the week"s exercise in terms of apprehending and enhancing the experience.

As to Grace being a "random" gift - yes and no.

It is certainly random if we are in ordinary waking consciousness and are occasionally taken to a higher state prompted by life events, and this does happen.
However, self-observation exercises, if done successfully, are in Gurdjieff's "first conscious shock" territory. This is between the mi and the fa of the octave of the emotional body (The Oragean Version bodies diagram).
We are trying to proceed in this octave (in usual state we have do-re-mi). Sometimes there is a surge of emotional energy (feels like a shock of bliss) which accompanies self-observation/remembering, and for a long time this surge would literally shock me out of the exercise, right back to ordinary consciousness. This may be the experience you mention, or maybe not. I, too, looked for understanding of what I must do here. I have read that we need to allow the exercise to continue as much as we can, in order to "bridge the fa" of the emotional body octave.
Our Work is to eventually develop the sol-la-si of the emotional body together with the do-re-mi of the Intellectual body (Soul).
The note fa of the emotional body is thus the bridge.
Other traditions refer to this bridge as "The Rainbow Bridge" or "The Antakarana".

Now, to get back to the topic of Grace - it is said that if we can get to the bridge, then Help (Grace) will come from higher sources, because at the Bridge, this is the Law. So no randomicity here. It is law-conformable.

You also wrote;

> When Grace turns on ther light, it's not enough to enjoy the surroundings but we must make an attempt to Work.

This is it absolutely! Well, as I see it at present anyway.
I am not working simply to "collect" beautiful experiences the way I collected stamps as an eight year old.
I am seeking to grow-up to a mature human being, and must bring the three centers into harmony, acting together appropriately and together. This involves three respective elements; understanding (intellect), Being (emotional) and Action (physical).
Or, put differently, the understanding of what must be done plus the Work exercises will lead to states of Being (aspects of my true nature), which must then be embodied. This is where taking the exercise into simple everyday tasks comes in. Sensing the body is also always an aim.

And Fred, I'll beam some Cairns sunshine over to you as well along the Kahuna cords Bert Sharp speaks of, so don't forget the sun-block! 😀

Best wishes,
Judy.

by Lawrick

Judy,

Thanks for the heat.

Mr. Bennett was refering to "Grace" the arriving of which was something incomprehensible as opposed to the artificial way of instigating Djartklom, that is, relying on the input of a teacher to provide shocks which Mr. Bennett goes on to say, "provides a bright flash" but then disappears.
Relative to the methods of which you speak in your exercise, how do we define the difference between self-obserbvation, and self remembering? This is a matter of degree to me yet I'm not sure they are equivalent processes. Certainly there is a difference in terms of "depth" although I do not feel qualified to make a judgement here.

As I see it, self observation can be continued by "artificial" methods but what "wakes us up in the first place". To me, that's the Grace of the question.

This is a wonderful program. 5 Stars or perhaps

Judy,

I so appreciate your comments on the octave and the interval mi-fa and the bridge analogy. I've often wondered about the Christian concept of Grace and what part it has in the Work. I've thought that one must do one's part to be able to receive--in other words be on the bridge. Yes, the individual has a part to play in this as well. Your comments relate to Ian's from a week or so back regarding intentional suffering. These intentions get us to the mi fa interval and could result in something out of the ordinary.

But there is such strong resistance from various Is to the continuity of this awareness. I could read a post like yours at 8am but by noon find myself not caring so much. I see this playing out time and again in my life where I have a choice to try to make the do re mi-fa connection over to so la si but fail to make the effort, instead repeating a "do loop." That's why this forum is so helpful-as a constant reminder to keep working.

It's Thanksgiving in the U.S. tomorrow, accompanied by family gatherings. I will make an ernest attempt to observe my states as I eat turkey and dressing.

Fred, I hope you're warming up some.

Judy,

What a wonderful exercise that ties in beautifully with what I've been working on the past couple of weeks—Observing as many actions, movements, thoughts, emotions, reactions as possible, without judging, analyzing or condemning myself, but just simple being a minute/note taker.

Some examples, noted over the past couple of weeks I would like to share:

- I have a body and something meaningful and deep that exists beyond my current form and name.
- My feet are touching the carpet, and walking up these stairs.
- That car just cut me off, I react instantly, call him a name, note the waste of energy and that I'm annoyed in a detached sort of way.
- I am in a state of bliss, a euphoria.
-I am running around carefree like a child, no inhabitions.
-I am biting my bottom lip. I am restless.
- I take note of microscopic energy or something that looks like little balls of light dancing rapidly in the air.
- I drop pasta on the floor and realize my sleep, smile and accept it
- I am continually meeting myself in my interactions with others and this brings a sense of wonderment
- through watching a coworker, I witness what I look like in a hurry, how I act when playing a victim role, how I talk to fill a gap and diffuse tension etc

Thanks Judy, this exercise is a gem. Now I wish to keep the momentum going for the remainder of the week!

Hi All,

The concept of Grace is complicated with a couple of issues. One is related to what it means exactly in the Work context. Another is complicated by meanings associated with various religious Traditions.

Grace is only used 4 times in BT, only once in reference to Endlessness as far as I interpret it, and that not in the same context as the word has been used above, or as it might be used in a Christian context of the descent of a 'Blessing' or a state of religious insight or ecstacy.

As I see it, Grace can come in two forms -
1. a spontaneous state of religious ecstacy or insight or self remembering...
2. a moment of confrontation with our egotistic impulses; a moment of revelation of our personal properties of the organ Kindabuffer. In other words, a moment of Remorse.

So grace can be a moment of Remorse, or a moment of connection with the Divine.

In either case we are shown our limitations AND our potential. A moment of grace is ineffectual unless we take its message and instill/destill its message into our Being.

So, in the context of these moments of Grace, we have to Work on ourselves to prolong the moment in order to receive/imprint/realize the import of the revelation. In this context, our Work becomes a Reconciling force.

In spontaneous moments of Grace, Grace acts as the Affirming force and our response is a Reconciling force. Otherwise, in our daily life, when we respond to our regular repertoir of Denying forces with an Affirmation in the form of an exercise, the Reconciling force is the RESULT of our personal Affirmative efforts.

In either of those cases, it is still our conscious response to the situation that determines the result. The Work is not accomplished without a conscious, deliberate and intended action on our part. The achievement of a higher state is not a passive thing that happens to us. We must be actively and intentionally involved in the process.

Hey All,

Exercises sometimes bring results quite different from those we anticipate. This may arise because of the inherent compexity of "our" own private Universe.

Yesterday I was having a coffee and reading the newspaper when I experienced an awakening. Since I was staring down at the time, my glance shifted slightly from the newspaper to my right forearm and something decided to examine my hand and arm in detail. Quelle revelation! The forearm and hand possess an almost infinite variety of tones textures, elevations, lumps, bumps, and striations.

I noticed that the arm contained grouped "pixils" of 7 or 8 shapes that seemed to blend and interact with the other to produce an ever changing surface. Not only different colors but shapes as well. These I viewed for several minutes.

Then the 3 aspects of the hand came into view: the 3 aspects of the fingernail. the fact that the fingers contain 3 segments and three joints, the arm 3 segments and joints as well. The palm seems to change color texture and shape continually when viewed in depth.

I noticed the striations on the fingers (palm side) that are directed towards the fingertips (very interesting) and they are changed in the fingerprint to circular whorls. Given the nature of the finger, one might expect these lines to be created in a sideways aspect like the folding lines on the joints.

I noticed the hand even in rest contains a dynamic vibration which is more like a pulse and may be associated with it.

When I was young, I had an experience when I saw right through the hand. That is to say, I could have a coin placed under my hand and I could see the date on the coin. Quite useless of course, but no less wonderous.

I was able to maintain this awareness looking at my hand and arm for several minutes. This is the 3rd time in the week I was able to greatly prolong a "Moment". Amazing!

Thanks Judy,
Fred

Interesting observation which set me to thinking about "resistance" and how it manifests both in things we are aware of and things which are unconscious - like lack of interest - maybe the strongest resistance of all. So how can I approach this? Well, at least I can be aware that lack of interest in doing something which should be done is resistance. See how it goes from there.

Lawrick, I haven't ignored your question about definitions of self-observation and self-remembering. I actually found a wealth of material simply by googling both terms. Exact differences and definitions elude me too. It does seem evident though, that quality observation involves a degree of self-remembering in it. One of the best descriptions I've come across is found in "Gurdjieff Unveiled" where Sy Ginsberg shares his teacher's explanation of true self-remembering. Worth a look. Both of these are not only evolving processes but arts and crafts as well. We are fortunate in that I recall Thomas de Hartmann saying in reply to his question to Mr Gurdjieff as to what self-remembering meant, he was told to just do it as he understood it. I've noticed that "at rest dynamism" in the hands too Lawrick. Isn't it interesting how the element of curiosity assists the quality of observations - maybe allows better impartiality?

Sometimes I have this curiosity as to why certain exercises become favourites and others don't. With this one and those similar, there is perhaps a double 3-centered involvement. There is the usual one we begin with, and then we have another balancing where awareness (mental), presence/self-remembering (emotional) and action (physical) harmonise in the moment.

Karen, I really like your comment about "simply being a minute/note-taker" in the observing process. Thanks for that.

Regards to all,

When one has an experience like you describe, one doesn't need outside diversions. Thank you for relaying the experience.

This was an "aha" moment for me.
I used to think I had lots of experiences of Remorse - I mean, doesn't everyone? But no, those times of sadness/regret were more along the lines of intellectual regret.
Quite recently though, I've experienced twice what I presently believe may be true Remorse. It was more connected with the heart - almost an actual sensation there, and yet there was no mental negativity to speak of.
So this comment of yours Ian resonates strongly, as even at the time I could think of no obvious cause nor method employed - it indeed seemed like a gift.
The moment was connected with a knowledge of not having loved and appreciated my parents more than I did. I saw clearly and instantly that my own self-importance had been a barrier to this when they were alive. I was looking through some old photos at the time, but have looked at them many other times without the gift of this form of grace.

In fact Cassandra, relative to others I know, my experience with "psychic" phenomenon is minimal. Like many others, there have been a few events for which I've had no explaination. As stated in my previous post, they are really quite useless as "I" was not there when they happened.

With this work however, a simple act like examining my hand in a 3 centered state does become marvellous. Because it is real, because it is my unique experience, because now I truly "know" something not present before. Furthermore I know several others experience similar things while in a balanced state of awareness.

Ian's post about Caritas- Karatas- Karnak, Love residing in Will rather than emotion brought me to a state of tears. There is something beautiful-remarkable in this revelation which touched me very deeply and I know not why. Perhaps because this Love is so "pure". The image of this Love residing in the "Transpace Ship" Karnak is truly humbling. Within this I can sense Remorse of Conscience as a part of awakening.

I recall something Mr. Bennett stated in one of his books. Something like this, to paraphrase," We are all particles of God. Since God is indivisible, then we must possess all aspects of od within us."

Hey Zenas, are you still with us??????????

Work Program week beginning 26 November 2007

by Ian

The seasoned Seeker will be prepared to endure with equanimity the sacrifices and deprivations required for a prolonged voyage across the tumultuous seas of life towards the calm shore of being on the trans-space-ship Karnak.

With conscience as their compass, the Seeker will prepare a fit and hearty vessel for the rough seas and spaces ahead by sacrificing the use of a favorite stimulant beverage for the following week. Whenever magnetic anomalies affect the accuracy of their compass, the conscientious Seeker will remember their responsibility towards their small portion cargo of Great Being by raising their gaze towards the sun and moon as required during the day and night and murmuring under the breath, "It is nothing - I will be; it is nonsense - I can do; it recedes - I am."

Each morning before embarking into the seas and spaces around, the Seeker will weigh their anchor, set their sails and calibrate their instruments of navigation to their present position by relaxing in a three-centered way and asking with measured breath "Who am I?", while visualizing an illuminated cargo of Being radiating throughout their physical vessel.

When traversing calm, open seas and spaces, the all-brains-balanced-Seeker may replenish their vessels' energy stores by opening wide the portholes of Soundless Sound and Sightless Gaze to the surrounding seas and spaces.

When navigating narrow, treacherous straits an alert Seeker will sound their way past the shoals and reefs of pride, arrogance, egotism, bossiness, self-righteousness and self-justification by taking a deep breath and intoning three times "po-do-bo-li-zo-va-ny" while Sightlessly Gazing and Soundlessly Sounding the surrounding seas and spaces.

Once committed to a prolonged voyage upon the seas and spaces of the infinite Void, a Seeker must avoid the mirages of false harbours in the lands of Knowing, Judging, Finding and Concluding. Keeping a question always on their bow, the Seeker will attempt to pierce the veils of illusion on their voyage towards reality by asking, each time that they are so tempted, "What has been overlooked?", while attending to an abiding inner presence of Being.

Occasionally, with sails billowed by the ill winds of emotion and false judgement, the vessel is driven off it's course. Not to worry - the accomplished mariner has learned how to sail against the winds of inconvenience, euphoria, anger, disappointment, false judgement and inherited belief. The order goes out: All hands on deck; the sails are trimmed; the rudder is set; and apparent adversity is put to advantage by adopting an intentional inner posture supported by an illuminated skeleton and an Inner Prayer of, "I Wish, I Can, I Am".

While braving the vicissitudes of the icebergs, hurricanes, tornados and tidal waves of envy, jealousy, lust and greed the weathered Seeker will batten their hatches and gird up their loins in order to calmly endure the turmoil while maintaining a calm exterior and directing the energy thus saved into a well visualized inner illuminated skeleton, each bone resonated with an inner-chanted song of Remorse - "AIEIOIUOA."

Whenever an unruly crew threatens the integrity of the Seekers course through the miraculous seas of life by neglecting their duties and responsibilities, or by sleeping during their watch, or by stepping out of line with a well co-ordinated 3-centered reaction, the uncompromising Seeker will administer the punishment of visualizing his decaying corpse being devoured by ravenous sharks.

Each evening after sunset the Seeker will maintain his course towards Being by setting his astrolabe on the constellations of Faith, Hope and Love and Pondering in a relaxed manner: "Is Faith more than belief; is Hope more than expectation; is Love more than tenderness?"

Each night, as the Seeker prepares to drop their anchor and renew their strength for the day ahead, they will visualize the jetsam and flotsam of egoism, hate, revenge, anticipated pleasures and rooted beliefs sinking to the bottom of the sea to be transformed by bottom feeders whose unseen planetary function within an interconnected universe attests to the panoramic brilliance of an Omnipresent Being, of Whom the Seeker is an integral part.

I am aware the the Work is not primarily for assistance with life problems, yet sometimes this happens as a side-effect.

This morning I decided to wait until there was more guidance regarding a situation in my home here. Two weeks ago I was late for a meeting with a housemate at a Sunday market. He took it personally and hasn't spoken since - not at all. This is a first experience for me with such a lengthy "silent treatment". I see it as an over-reaction which has little to do with me, as feel the apology offered was sufficient. Thus I've been basically ignoring, while continuing to observe occasional pleasantries of "Good morning" or "See you later" and so forth. He actually said he was leaving, but hasn't left.

Anyway, now I have - for the heavy energy of this "narrow strait" - po-do-bo-li-zo-va-ny
It is nothing - I will be; it is nonsense - I can do; it recedes -I am.
Who am I?
What has been overlooked?
I Wish, I Can, I Am.
AIEIOIUOA
Visualisation of the decaying corpse being eaten by ravenous sharks - when I have an unruly crew.
Is Faith more than belief; is Hope more than expectation; is Love more than tenderness?
And then each night renewing strength by transforming any negativity of the day using the visualisation of the bottom feeders whose unseen function in an interconnected planetary universe attests to the panoramic brilliance of an Omnipresent Being, of Whom I am an integral part.

Strength, agape and progress to all.

Hi Ian,
Please would you elaborate a little on the use of po-do-bo-li-zo-va-ny? It seems to contain a lot of energy. I've been using it this past week and looked in "Life is Real" where I found;

> The text of this manuscript is expounded, as was done in antiquity, "podobolizovany," in the form of symbolizing, or, as it is called in esoteric science, "making alike," that is, alle-gorically—quite different from the form now established for mentation among contemporary people. As the difference between these forms is very well-known to me, of course also accidentally, I will endeavor to transmit the sense of this text as exactly as possible but in agreement with the form of mentation now established among contemporary people.

which connects it with allegorical mentation and exposition.
That is all I've found.

Yet,

> When navigating narrow, treacherous straits an alert Seeker will sound their way past the shoals and reefs of pride, arrogance, egotism, bossiness, self-righteousness and self-justification by taking a deep breath and intoning three times "po-do-bo-li-zo-va-ny" while Sightlessly Gazing and Soundlessly Sounding the surrounding seas and spaces.

brings about an improved state reliably and rapidly.
I'll continue with this practice.
Any extra snippets of information you may have and care to share would be appreciated.

Oh, yes; and the home situation stabilised about a half hour after I posted, coincidentally.

A few of the exercises this week have been really fantasitic ways of gaining energy and keeping myself centered in the work. The "It is nothing - I will be; it is nonsense - I can do; it recedes - I am." has been a mantra for me the last couple of days and has helped me fend off some resistence that has been plaguing me recently. Another thing I found useful was asking "Who am I?" and relaxing in a three centered way while visualizing an illuminated cargo of Being radiating throughout their physical vessel. This has kept me on a more objective path and has kept my mind from always straying into trivial and thoughtless territory. The soundless sound and sightless gaze is a very affective way for replenishing energy and is something I find myself doing for fun because it always gives good results.

The exercise this week was really creative, and the metaphors gave some more color to the exercises. I'll be working on them more throughout the next few weeks.

It is also in BT but spelled differently - "... and that at that time the transmission of ideas and thoughts was in consequence still what is called ‘Podobnisirnian,’ or, as it is still otherwise said ‘allegorical.’" BT 738

We used it at Northeon Forest now and then as a mantra or inner repetition, as we did with I wish, I can, I am, and aieioiuoa and a few other things from BT.

I remembered to add the Who Am I after morning sitting 3, maybe 4 times but didn't include the visualization. As always, there is a calm after sensing various parts of the body, sometimes very strong sensations other times not. But I try not to get occupied by these tangents.

The soundless sound and sightless gaze were new for me. I don't know if I did it correctly, but I also noticed a slight calm afterwards. I guess the denying force comes in when my mind keeps asking 'have I done it enough; have 5/10 minutes passed;' desperate to get back to idle wanderings.

I tried the AIEIOIUOA when distressed but more helpful was a self generated mantra, something like: 'Please show me the blessing in these feelings.' Always my struggle came from emotional hurt, imaginings, a mind that wouldn't/couldn't let go. I didn't want to use the "it is nothing" mantra on certain difficult feelings because they ARE/WERE something that I feel can be viewed from a different angle or be an experience I can learn from. These feelings come again and again. Finally, I may be at a place where I can turn around and confront the struggle rather than run away--actually attempt to bring in a Higher to counter the Lower.

I found that the hard feelings abated after a while. I don't know if it was the effort put in to challenge or simply time healing the wound. In any case, some effort was made.

Thanks for the task.

This exercise was beyond my understanding in many respects, but I still tried to make an effort for the duration of the week.

> With conscience as their compass, the Seeker will prepare a fit and hearty vessel for the rough seas and spaces ahead by sacrificing the use of a favorite stimulant beverage for the following week.

Ahh my dear friend COFFEE who calms and at the same time nerves me if more than 2 cups are sipped. The week started off good...Much inner resistance experienced. A great struggle taking place in my mind—dialogue "I need to have that coffee to kick start my day" and in the stomach—dialogue "where is that coffee? - I'm dying down here, I need some caffeine!" I'm not going to lie to you, I did have a total of 3-4 cups for the entire week. Something inside of me felt defeat. Must keep fighting!

> When traversing calm, open seas and spaces, the all-brains-balanced-Seeker may replenish their vessels' energy stores by opening wide the portholes of Soundless Sound and Sightless Gaze to the surrounding seas and spaces.

When aware of the awareness that I am and others are, many wonderous things occur.

I was able to see the human aura emmanating approx 2 feet out from the body, illuminated white and yellow with traced of light blue. A new experience, results of the work perhaps??? Aside from one time years ago after sitting in a waiting room for 3 hours, an elderly woman in the DR's office had a black aura and the accupuncturist confirmed she was suffering drastically from cancer and that her aura was black

> When navigating narrow, treacherous straits an alert Seeker will sound their way past the shoals and reefs of pride, arrogance, egotism, bossiness, self-righteousness and self-justification by taking a deep breath and intoning three times "po-do-bo-li-zo-va-ny" while Sightlessly Gazing and Soundlessly Sounding the surrounding seas and spaces.

Did not work on this. The word po-do-bo-li-zo-va-ny resonates as holding much power, but I do not understand it.

> Once committed to a prolonged voyage upon the seas and spaces of the infinite Void...

12 months ago I was worrying about what career I was going to pursue next and if I would find a job to pay the bills. In hindesite everything worked out in its own way and in its own time, not my will...
Who would have expected that today, if I am concerned, its in regards to being worried I will neglect THE WORK and weekly exercises and am so grateful for this transformation and being brought to this path.

Each evening, when retiring to bed, I call back all of the negative emotions emmited over the course of the day (I call back all anxieties, worry, irritations) and visualize them as a ball of energy which I then send to the earth to be transformed into light and love, or caring and compassion etc. Then I ask that all persons who projected negative emotions towards me be returned to them as posistive energies that they can use for their highest good. Then I visualize the bright white light of the Holy Spirit illuminating my body, then moving outwards filling the house and the neighbourhood and surrounding communities and am gratefull for the blessings in life.

Hi Karen,
Thank you for such a beautiful work report.
As to;

> This exercise was beyond my understanding in many respects,

I too find this with what I call the Sacred Manifestos which Ian allows us to share from time to time.

It seems to me that while understanding is very important, the presence of sacredness is equally so.

Best wishes,

For this week, when you experience internal resistance; when you are feeling resented; when you have an emotional negative experience, instead of going with it remember:

If it be your will.

And then recite Christ's words to yourself and understand the teaching lesson therein:

Not my will but thine be done.

This week I have been reading Nicoll's comments on "Thy Will be done on Earth", arguing that we are told to pray for this condition, because God's will is not done on Earth, as it is done in Heaven. Thus all our private worries, as well as everything else that happens, is not God's will, but the "will" of the the entities that oversee these levels of the operations of our Universe. This leads to a proposed (complete) objectivity to everything that happens here, but this exercise must be repeated constantly ("Thy Will be done") to have any hope of it becoming real for we slack minions with our constant waverings, weaknesses and distractions.
Thanks, Ian, for the synchronicity.

This quote is truly powerful, and has been such a great way to overcome certain selfish habits, as well as being able to see certain manifestations in action. After doing this for a period of time, a deep and profound state was achieved, and a feeling of devotion and religiousness. It seemed to awaken the gnawings of conscience that seemed to proceed with its own momentum after thinking along these lines for a time. It brought many associations that were altruistic and selfless, and created many emotional impressions that caused a sort of rushing flow of energy that couldn't be overwhelmed by resistance in the same way normal emotions are. It was also helpful in bringing objective pondering into presence, and gave some perspective that was very expansive.

Thanks for the shock

Hey all,

I was shaken by the depth of Cohen's words.

Draw us near
And bind us tight

Your children here
In their rags of light.

Rags of light. An almost perfect decription of my disunited being.

I have wondered for many years whether artists, sculpters, writers of greater works percieve the world in different forms than I. Cohen's song would seem a confirmation. I was taken by the brief explaination during one of the song's musical interludes about the object sensitive relationship we have with our environment. And I am reminded that this is always a form of awakening presence. A form of wonder and awe.

If it be Your Will,
Thy Will not mine our Lord.

This has for many years been a mantra for me in gratitude and humility, and in all the depth of love I can muster at the time.
In the simple Mantras lay the greatest learning.

This week's work is a lesson in Grace and Humility for me.

Thank you Harry, keep scanning your charts,

In moments when your patience wears thin, endure a little longer with a super effort comprising of a sub-vocal murmuring of a phrase such as "All things must pass", with an inner smile and while Sensing your four illuminated limbs with each word.

Eat with full attention to physical, sound, taste, visual and smell impressions. After eating, spend a few minutes breathing consciously deep into the solar plexus.

When you talk, sense the sound vibrations resonating in your abdomen. Use the vibrations to help you Remember yourself.

In the evening, relax three centers and gaze at a candle or fire or star. Ponder - "Does the candle/fire/star provide light and heat?"

---

by Judy

What a busy time of the year this is!
I chose the following out of the exercises this week, as it is one of the basic self-observations I often neglect.

> When you talk, sense the sound vibrations resonating in your abdomen. Use the vibrations to help you Remember yourself.

Yet I found quite a few occasions when "All things must pass" proved effective - lots of haste and much impatience around at present.
An astrologer friend reminds me to take extra care to remain aware during interactions with family and friends, as we have Jupiter conjunct Pluto (Heaven and Hell together aspect) at the moment. This happens only once every 13 years. The explosive argumentative opinionated influences are strong. He says we are mere pawns to this cosmic influence unless awareness is maintained.
Interesting that we are currently reading Chapter 3, which it seems to me gives indications as to how to deal with "results from higher forces which are beyond our control".

by Lawrick

This week's exercise was both good and bad. The "All things must pass" aspect worked reasonably well particularly after a sharp disagreement with a close friend left us both in an incomprehensible state. Using the "all things must pass" exercise, not only was the disagreement resolved but the surrounding tensions and mistrust were transformed to something that brought us even closer. This is surely what the Work is about.

On the other hand, I had almost no success with allowing my vocalizations to vibrate in the plexus. This might have been as a result of the above mentioned disagreement but I think not. I was almost completely unconscious about this exercise. Even when I managed to create a pre talking field, within moments I lost myself in the clutter of the conversation. And there were days when I was completely oblivious to it. I suspect my awareness was very flat this week. Perhaps it's the season or other things.

Be well,
Lawrick

There was a Persian king
Who wanted to know
What he could say on Every occasion
That always would be so

Illusions, circles and changes
Illusions, always changing
Like the wind and the rain
He summoned three wise men
From his eternal throne
One from each border
Gave them his order
To write words always true
The wise men thought so hard
For a night and day
Found these words to say on Every occasion
These things too shall pass away

Here's more in song lyrics; this time the title song of George Harrison's "Concert for Bangladesh" album.

Sunrise doesnt last all morning
A cloudburst doesnt last all day
Seems my love is up and has left you with no warning
Its not always going to be this grey

All things must pass
All things must pass away

Sunset doesnt last all evening
A mind can blow those clouds away
After all this, my love is up and must be leaving
Its not always going to be this grey

All things must pass
All things must pass away
All things must pass
None of lifes strings can last
So, I must be on my way
And face another day

Now the darkness only stays the night-time
In the morning it will fade away
Daylight is good at arriving at the right time
Its not always going to be this grey

All things must pass
All things must pass away
All things must pass
All things must pass away

Work Program week beginning 17 December 2007

by Judy

Draining exercise: This exercise is used as preparation for work attempts and for equilibrium. Draining is the intentional lowering of a certain level of tension which exists in the body. This reduced activity allows more energy for our wish to wake-up. This assists the quality of our self-observation/self-remembering attempts, as too much activity in the observed object is distracting and confusing. Ordinary relaxation is more passive than this exercise. Draining begins where ordinary relaxation leaves off. At completion, there is ideally an alert and alive state with minimal tension in the organism. We may experience aware or even awake moments, but this is not the main purpose of the exercise.

Do this exercise from a sitting position mainly, as the contact with the world when lying down may reduce the energy of alertness and aliveness. It can thus be incorporated into the regular “sitting” each day if convenient.

Start from the top down. Compare the tension to a liquid which fills the body, as if the level of the liquid is gradually lowered.

Begin with:

Forehead – the level is all around the head. Visualize the surface of the liquid becoming smooth and lowering slightly.

Expression – especially the tiny facial muscles around the eyes and mouth.

Neck – this is the area which, when relaxed, will take away much of the energy used for thinking processes.

Shoulders, shoulder blades and tops of arms – after arms relaxed tension flows from elbows and fingers.

Solar plexus and heart – ideally we don't want any particular feeling present here.

Back.
Sex organs.
Legs.

Toes – tension will again flow out here.

So the tension will drain out through the extremities; head, arms hands and fingers, legs feet and toes, leaving only the minimum required for relaxed maintenance.

If you stand up and notice an expression on your face, go back and repeat the draining exercise. It is to reduce the energy in all 3 centers to a minimum.

Now we are ready to make some attempts in self-observation. Use your favorites, or one of those outlined in program of November 19th 2007.

Pondering: (remember to sense your body and feel your emotions) Do I notice any difference in the quality of self-observation when it is done following the Draining exercise?

Hey Judy,

Thanks for this prequel to self observation. In mentioning my lack of success with some of the exercises over the past few weeks you have reminded me what was missing. I couldn't make any deep contact, I now realize, because I was carrying too much tension, stress, unresolved issues into the attempts.

This program reminds me that to gain the necessary energy, it is always advisable to first decompress. It is strange to me just how effective is relaxing the facial muscles. I would normally think relaxing the larger muscles would work better but in fact it doesn't seem to work that way. Much of my anxiety becomes apparent only when I observe facial tensions and expressions.

This week has already been one of the best in months and comsidering the time of year the washing away of tension and simultanious filling of light, is making this truly a season of experience and joy.

Way to go Aussi!

Hey all,

Through the use of the exercise, this week I experienced 3 very powerful manifestations. 2 of these have taken place working on my own and another tonight while working with Karen. I leave it to her as whether or not she wishes to disclose her experience.

One thing has become obvious this year, that being, that the exercises from time to time bring extraordinary results. These results are completely unexpected and cannot be imagined. I do not understand how or why the simple act of doing an exercise can bring these beautiful manifestations. But if these things are occuring to me then they must surely and inevitably affect all the members doing them. So I encourage all to be persitent and patient. Expect nothing and just let it happen. What a marvellous Christmas present tonite.

Speaking of which,
May the new Sun, bring you all the Gold of It's Being. May the Peace of the Season be upon Thee.

A little gift! (turn on SOUND)

The draining exercise brought about a great state that is hard to put into words, it definitely gave a feeling of wholeness and being able to sustain an awareness of presence. The sensation of draining was strong, and was calming, but I also noticed that I also felt energized and more awake. When I observed myself and my environment I felt quite relaxed and was able to sense my body and emotions, as well as being able to observe in a calm unidentified state.

> Do I notice any difference in the quality of self-observation when it is done following the Draining exercise?

I noticed the quality of self-observation was way up, and in general I was able to observe myself better because of this preparatory exercise. It brought about a consistent state that could definitely be useful in relation to observation and self remembering. My sense of being was there and at the same time I was able to gain knowledge from what was being observed. This combination may very well be a good formula for gaining a sense of understanding, from a balance between the mind, body, and emotions.

Thanks, Judy for this exercise!

This exercise resulted in new progress in relaxing and subsequent sensing. The idea of associating the level of imagined liquid in the body with the level of tension worked very well.

It's such a simple and direct idea to imagine draining the liquid and one's tensions with it. I found that making several passes was effective, and added the idea that the liquid was dark, and became lighter on each pass, until clear.

On a somewhat related note, I found something interesting about reminding myself to do the exercise during the day. Just trying to 'remember' it had some effect, but didn't occur frequently enough. But when I planned to go to a class in which the instructor is constantly beseeching us to relax, I 'remembered' to do the exercise much more frequently. I think that something in my personality (vanity or the like) made a difference - because I didn't want to appear tense in class, I got the reminder much more often.

Regards, Chuck

When in the grip of a negative emotion such as anger or resentment, instead of manifesting outwardly, count to 12 while sensing the hands and feet.

When in the grip of a negative emotion such as annoyance or depression, express gratitude by adopting an intentional yet unusual posture and repeating silently -

Oh Endlessness,
Help me on the way -
To enjoy the unenjoyable,
To like the unlikeable,
To love the unlovable.

While walking, practice the sightless gaze and sense the spine.

End each day with a hearty laugh while sensing the body.

The exercise of sensing the hands and feet and counting to 12 after a negative emotion has been quite good for a couple of reasons. It was great for heading off negativity in general and every time it produced a stop that brought me to, so to speak. I also came to the conclusion that I may as well work and not try to procrastinate and be lazy, it was inevitable that when I wasn't working or observing that negative emotions would arise from some form of momentum. I noticed a tingling feeling in my hands and feet, hands especially, and could feel something flowing to my appendages. It was a pleasant feeling and promoted awareness and gave some focus after my focus had been lost in negativity.
